that the hon. Minister will give fair-play to all, irrespective of political opinions, when he sees his way to obviate the recurrence of the damages I have just alluded to.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). (Translation.) I have, of late, looked into the matter which the hon. gentleman has just called my attention to. I may say that the state of things referred to has prevailed for a good many years, and it is to be regretted that more attention was not bestowed upon the matter by the former Administrations. I just received, a few days ago, the petition containing the statement of facts which the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) has just brought to the notice of the House. That petition will receive my most serious consideration. I may further tell the hon. gentleman that I have directed the competent officials of my department to inquire into and report upon the matter, and should that report, as I believe, be to the effect that the evils complained of by the hon. gentleman can be remedied, I will be most happy to afford relief to those good people who have already too long suffered from those inundations. The hon. gentleman, in his closing remarks, made a statement which I cannot pass over in silence. He stated that the majority of the landowners who have suffered from the flooding of their lands and who now pray for Government interference, are supporters of the Liberal party, and the hon. gentleman further said that I would not hesitate, he trusted, to act upon their petition. Let the hon. gentleman allow me to remind him that I will not allow my mind to be swayed by the political views held by voters in the different localities in which public needs may be felt. I am public-spirited enough, I trust, not to refuse public works to certain counties, because they happen to be represented in this House by hon. gentlemen opposite. And in so doing, I hope that my policy will be endorsed by hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House and by the country at large. As I just said, a large number of our public works are in a most deplorable and dilapidated condition, owing to the fact that, under the late Administration, the policy pursued by the hon. gentlemen opposite was to refuse carrying on any works in the constituencies represented by members of the Opposition. Under the late Government, too often were the hon. gentlemen heard to say: Such and such a constituency is represented here by a Liberal, and we do not wish to build any work there, not even to make any repairs. I trust that so long as I am at the head of the Department of Public Works, as I said, I will commit no such blunder.

Mr. SPROULE. I think we have not got sufficient information in regard to this item. I do not wish to be unduly severe on the hon. gentleman, because he is new at the business; but it does seem to me that the members of the House will naturally expect when a Minister asks for an appropriation of money, that he should say what he requires the money for, whom he is going to pay, how he is going to expend it. It is the most reasonable thing in the world to expect that the House should have that information. Then we would be able to tell whether the appropriation was required or not. Now, the hon. gentleman has informed us that he has made a great many dismissals in different branches; he has mentioned several branches, but, although we have gone over these branches, he has told us nothing about the deductions in each branch owing to the dismissals. He speaks of the dismissals he has made in several lines, but we ask him to confine himself to information belonging to this one branch, and tell us how many men he is going to employ there, what he intends to pay them, and then we will know whether the amount he asks for is too large or too small.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will simply repeat what I have said. I said I would be delighted to bring down to the House the names of all the men that are now in the employ of my department, and for which I am asking this money. I will do this to-morrow.

Mr. SPROULE. When the hon. gentleman furnishes that information, I would like him to make a distinction between the branches, that is, to tell us the branches to which these men belong, and the amount of money he proposes to pay them.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will do so with pleasure.

Collection of Revenue—Public Works... $172,800

Mr. SPROULE. On the item for the collection of slide and boom dues, $4,000, can the hon. gentleman tell us what the total collections were during last year?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. $70,686.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman spoke about having dismissed some 200 men. Were any of the dismissed men employed upon the staffs which are paid under this item?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No man paid out of that vote was dismissed.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to inquire what is the vote under which 200 men were dismissed.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The vote for public buildings at Ottawa, $25,000. Under that heading I dismissed 74 men.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that is a satisfactory answer.

Exchequer Court .....$ 10,402

Mr. GILLIES. I desire to refer to the Exchequer Court in regard to admiralty cases. When the Colonial Courts Admiralty Act was passed in 1891, I asked a question on this subject from the then Minister of Justice, Sir John Thompson. I brought to his notice the fact that it was very inconvenient to have the Admiralty Courts as then constituted. I brought to his notice the fact, and many of my learned friends agreed with me, that the practice was extremely inconvenient, inasmuch as all processes in admiralty cases had to be issued from the metropolitan cities of the different provinces, and I pointed out that it would be a great convenience to the profession and to the public if admiralty jurisdiction was conferred on county court judges in the different districts. With this suggestion the Minister of Justice agreed, and he stated that inasmuch as the Act gave power to the Governor General in Council to fix the number of judges at any time, this suggestion would be attended to in due course. This has not been done, and the practice remains now as it was then. If a collision occurs on any part of our coast application for a remedy has to be made to the Admiralty Court at Halifax. This is extremely inconvenient. If the county court judge had power to issue an attachment against a ship, application could be made to those judges and a remedy applied. I desire to ask if it is contemplated by the department to give county court judges admiralty jurisdiction?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). Formerly the admiralty courts were imperial courts, and were supposed to be under the control of the Imperial Parliament. A change took place by which the admiralty courts became branches of the Exchequer Court. Now, the judge of the Exchequer Court has the right to appoint in different districts judges to act as his deputies in Admiralty matters. When that change took place and admiralty courts were brought within the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court, the old judges of those courts—those appointed by the Imperial authorities on the representation of the Federal authorities—continued to act. At all events that was the practice in my own province. The judge of the Exchequer Court has the right to appoint deputies.

An hon. MEMBER. I do not think so.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am speaking from memory and cannot of course carry all these Acts in my recollection, but I think you will find that all the judges in admiralty are acting as deputy judges of the Exchequer Court, and are presumably appointed by the judge of the Exchequer Court. So far as the province of Quebec is concerned we have only the one judge in admiralty there, and he resides in the city of Quebec. I think you will find that there are but two judges of Admiralty so-called, that is the judge at Halifax and the judge at Quebec. I understand the question is this: That the jurisdiction which is now exercised by these two judges should be extended so that the judges in the county courts in the maritime provinces, and the judges of the Superior Court in our province should be vested with admiralty jurisdiction. That is a question which so far as I am concerned I have never heard discussed before. I do not know how it might operate, but so far as Quebec is concerned I do not think it would be advantageous. I shall undertake to submit the matter to the head of the department, and to get the views of Sir Oliver Mowat on the subject. I cannot do more to-night, because I have not considered the matter myself.

Mr. LISTER. The question which my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Gillies) has brought up is one of some importance to the profession in Ontario. Some years ago an Admiralty Act was passed by this Parliament and the county court judges in counties bordering on the lakes were appointed surrogates having admiralty jurisdiction. They had power to issue warrants for the arrest of ships and to try causes. For some reason or another that Act was repealed a few years ago, and as a matter of fact we now have only one judge in Admiralty in the province of Ontario. He is in the city of Toronto, so that if any cause in admiralty takes place it is necessary to have the affidavits sent to Toronto, get the warrant for the arrest, and then return it by the marshall to the sheriff of the county in which the cause of action arose. From actual experience, the Admiralty Court is of very little use in the province of Ontario, because by the time the process is issued and returned, the vessel is out of the jurisdiction, and the person who has issued the action has lost his remedy against the vessel and must look to the owners. I would call the attention of the Solicitor General to the fact, that on the great lakes nine-tenths of the shipping is registered in the United States, and I know from actual experience that many just claims have been lost in the last few years by reason of the extreme difficulty of getting a warrant for the arrest of the boat. I would urge upon the Solicitor General to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to this condition of affairs. There is only one judge now to try admiralty causes in Ontario, and they must be tried in Toronto, entailing very heavy expenses; whereas formerly they were tried before the judge of the County Court in Lambton, Essex, Lincoln and other counties bordering on the great lakes. They were then tried inexpensively, and the procedure was convenient to the parties, to the profession, and to the witnesses. At the present time an action in admiralty is an expensive proceeding, even if you succeed in getting the boat seized. I think we ought to return to the law as it was prior to the last Act. It would be more convenient for every one concerned, it would be less costly, and I think it would give justice more generally than it does now.

Mr. BRITTON. Having heard the discussion I must ask the indulgence of the committee to say a word or two, because having heard it, if I remain silent it would imply that I did not know anything about it. I want to mention that one of the last acts of the late Government was to take action in that direction. I do not exactly know the modus operandi, but whether under the Act as it exists or by Order in Council the judge of the County Court of Frontenac was appointed Judge in Admiralty, and since the session commenced I have asked to have a registrar appointed so that the machinery may be put in motion. There is now another judge presiding over admiralty matters in Ontario besides the judge in Toronto. The judge of the county of Frontenac is an Admiralty Judge, and a registrar is about to be appointed, if he has not already been appointed. There will in future be a vice-Admiralty Court in Kingston.

Mr. LISTER. We have none in the west.
Kingston Penitentiary ..... $211,300

Mr. RICHARDSON. In connection with this item I beg to call the attention of the committee to the binding twine "industry" which is run in connection with the Kingston Penitentiary. Hon. members will recollect that I put a question yesterday to the Solicitor General with reference to the matter, and he was then unable to give me the information. Since that, I have looked into the question, and I would like to supply members of the House with some information that I have been able to collect with regard to it. The manufacture of binder twine was begun at Kingston Penitentiary in the year 1894, and the cost of the plant was some $40,000. The Government made up its mind that it would be better that it should not dispose of this binder twine itself, and so it gave a contract to a man named John Connor of the city of St. John, N.B., to handle this twine. Mr. Connor had some connection with cordage manufacture in the past. The contract that was made with Mr. Connor, was as follows:—

This memorandum and agreement made the fifteenth day of April, A.D. 1895.
Between

The Warden of the Kingston Penitentiary, hereinafter called "the Warden," of the first part, and

John Connor, of the city of St. John, in the province of New Brunswick, hereinafter called the "Agent," of the second part.

The said parties contract and agree with each other as follows:—

1. The warden agrees to sell through the agency of the agent, and in the manner and upon terms and conditions hereinafter provided, the whole of the binder twine now on hand at the Kingston Penitentiary, and all binder twine which shall be there manufactured between the date of this agreement and the fifteenth day of August next; and the agent undertakes to sell such output in manner aforesaid and upon such terms and conditions.

2. The warden is to fix, from time to time, the price at which the binder twine is to be sold by the agent, such price not to exceed that of the same grade of twine manufactured elsewhere in Canada; and sales by the agent are, as regards credit, to be upon the usual terms in the trade.

3. Cartage and freight at car-load rates are to be allowed by the warden in accordance with the usages of the trade, upon twine shipped or delivered on the agent's orders.

4. The warden is to expend two hundred and fifty ($250) dollars in advertising the binder twine, in such manner as the agent may suggest.

5. The agent guarantees the sale of the whole of twine, and is to be personally responsible to the warden for the aggregate value thereof at the prices so fixed, or to be fixed as aforesaid, less ten per cent.

6. The agent agrees to clear the penitentiary of all twine remaining on hand on the said fifteenth day of August, paying therefor as therein provided.

7. The warden is to deliver and the agent is to take delivery of such quantities of twine and at such times as the agent may desire; provided that the warden is not to be under any obligation to deliver at any time more twine than is on hand at the penitentiary. The agent is then to furnish the warden with satisfactory collateral security to cover the value at the selling price of each shipment of twine delivered to him or to his order.

For the proper performance of this contract and to ensure the Government against any loss, the agent of Mr. Connor was to furnish the Government with satisfactory security; and what does this House suppose was the nature of the security that Mr. Connor furnished? His security to the Government consisted of certain bonds of the Baie des Chaleurs Railway. I may inform the House that these bonds were perfectly worthless. They were not worth the paper on which they were printed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that that was the only security?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Evidence on this subject was given in the Public Accounts Committee, last session.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is with the view of calling the attention of the Solicitor General to these matters that I have risen at this time. My information is that the only security Mr. Connor gave was these bonds. If they are not perfectly worthless, I am sure the House will be glad to know it, although I fancy that there is little doubt in the mind of any hon. member that they are worthless. After this contract was executed and this worthless security given, the warden, acting for the Government, handed over to Mr. John Connor 1,063,757 pounds of binder twine, the value of which was $56,783.36. Mr. Connor was a member of a firm known as the Continental Binder Twine Company when this contract was made. Other members of the firm were the notorious Michael Connolly and N. K. Connolly, those men whose names stink in the nostrils of Canada at the present time, those men who have been a grim spectre in Canadian political history for several years past. As I say, the value of the twine delivered to these men was $56,783.36; they accounted to the Government for some $27,000; and the amount still owing to the Government by them is $27,372.71. About this time this Continental Binder Twine Company got into difficulties, and were unable to pay the Government this amount, and up to the present time they have not paid it; but Mr. Connor offered to hand over to the Government the debts that were owing to the company, or perhaps it would be more accurate to say, to himself, as he was the agent. Large quantities of this twine, I may inform the House, were advanced to gentlemen all over the Dominion of Canada; and I am credibly informed, and it is my belief, that the men, or the greater portion of the men, who got this twine were political partisans, Conservatives; and the amounts owing by them on the twine have not yet been paid. I want to read to this House a list of the gentlemen who have secured this twine, and who still owe for it, first to Mr. Connor, but now to the Government, to whom Mr. Connor has handed over these debts. A. W. Cranston, of Clearwater, Man.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Where does the hon. gentleman get this information?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It does not make any difference to the ex-Minister of Justice where I get the information; he and other hon. gentlemen ought to be quite satisfied so long as the information given is correct. Mr. Cranston owes for the twine he got, $1,425. Mr. Robert Rogers, also of Clearwater, Man., owes $850 on account of binder twine.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. For what year?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Secured from Mr. Connor in 1895.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The answer given in the House last session was that the amount had been claimed from Rogers under a judgment of the court.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to inform the House that this Mr. Robert Rogers, of Clearwater, Man., was the president of the Conservative Association of Manitoba, and devoted almost his entire time, for the last three or four years, to the interests of the made 50 cents per day on the convict labour employed in manufacturing this twine. It seems to me that this would be a good subject for investigation by a commission. It seems to me that in this matter there are worse phases than even in the notorious McGreevy-Connolly scandal. It is high time, Mr. Chairman, that we had decent, honest methods adopted in conducting the public affairs of the country. In the province from which I come, I believe that the cry which was raised against the Government, that it had pursued dishonest and corrupt methods, was the most potent cry against it. The people had come to the conclusion that it was high time that honest and decent methods should prevail in the conduct of public affairs, and it was because of that conviction that I believe the late Government was defeated and the new Government brought into power.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has been very badly advised. I am afraid, by some who were perhaps afraid to discuss this matter as boldly as the hon. gentleman has done, though they might have understood it a little better. For instance, he has mixed up several accounts and has got tangled up considerably on this question of twine. He has given us the contract for 1895 and the contract for 1896, and did not make the slightest attempt to keep the accounts in proper order. I would call his attention to an answer given in this House on the subject of Mr. Rogers, who, the hon. gentleman said, is a very prominent Conservative. There was another debtor in that list, a member of a firm of Hamilton, whose rating is very high, and one of whom is a member of this House. I do not know how far that is correct. I am told, I do not know how correctly, that the gentleman is a member of this House, but I am told at any rate that the firm is one of very high standing. But take the case of Mr. Rogers who is, as the hon. member says, connected with the Conservative party in Manitoba. The late Minister of Justice was asked as to this account on the 29th January, 1896. The following is the question and answer:—

Has Robert Rogers, of the province of Manitoba, paid the account due from him to the Government for binding twine and reported unpaid last session? If so, when paid?

Mr. DICKEY. The amount of the invoice has been paid. There is an amount of about $65 still due for freight prepaid by the penitentiary, which the agent of the department has been instructed to collect.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the hon. gentleman assert that the amount owing by Mr. Rogers, this $50,000 or $60,000 has been paid, that it is paid to-day?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Surely the hon. gentleman understands English. I will read what the late Minister of Justice stated. I take it that he was correctly informed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It may have meant that it was paid by a note, but that is not paying the account.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I did not say that this was paid by a note. I say the ex-Minister of Justice would have stated what was incorrect and misleading, if he was referring in this case to the giving of a note. What he stated as a matter of fact was that the amount had been paid and not that a note had been given; and any one who knows Mr. Dickey, who was Minister of Justice at the time, would know that he had no intention of misleading the House and must have spoken as he was advised by the officers of his department. I think the statement made was so extraordinary that the Solicitor General should enlighten the committee. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) disdained to say how he obtained his information. He seemed to think that in regard to Connor's contract he had given information to the committee of a novel character. But it is within the recollection of members of the Public Accounts Committee that last session the question of Connor's contract was taken up and that officers of the department explained the whole transaction. Connor was not only the contractor for the Department of Justice, but also, I believe, for the Central Prison Binding Twine factory. At any rate he was a man, enjoying the confidence of the department before I went into it, and one of the few men the department could lay their hands upon, at all conversant with the business. He had been exceedingly successful in the business in St. John, but was then out of it having sold out to the Cordage Company. He was considered in every way reliable and able. The contract which the hon. gentleman has referred to was made with him, and the securities were given. I cannot state from memory what those securities were; but, while they were not of the highest class or satisfactory in every respect, they were far beyond the bonds of the Baie des Chaleurs Company, according to Mr. Newcombe's statement before the Public Accounts Committee last session. How much has been paid since I am not aware. But, if my memory serves me aright, we were advised that full security had been given. We were also told by Mr. Newcombe in that examination the particulars in regard to the class of security taken and of those securities not having been so satisfactory as the department desired. The department called for security to be given to the satisfaction of the warden; and that officer had not reported on this subject as soon as he should have done, or before the contract was in course of being carried out by Mr. Connor. No doubt there was in connection with the contract an unfortunate circumstance in the manner in which it was done. It was not satisfactory. Nevertheless the committee were led to the conclusion, apparently last session, that there would be no loss to the country in the end. How far that has been realized, is more than I can say. I hope that the statement that has just been made, from what source I cannot in any way gather—it cannot be official, because it is in so many respects obviously incorrect—will be explained by the Solicitor General and that gentleman will give the debtor and creditor side of the account with Mr. Connor.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). As to the source of the information used by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), I may explain briefly. Yesterday that hon. gentleman put a question in the House referring to this contract. The answer would have been long, and I asked the hon. gentleman if he would be good enough either to move for the papers or to come to my office and I would be glad to give him any information in my possession. He called and I stated very frankly and as fully as I could in the time at my disposal what I had to say about this matter. I have no intention of hiding what I said to Mr. Richardson, and I will repeat to the House what I said. The position of this contract was represented by me to be about this: In 1894 we sold about $16,000 of twine through the agency of Mr. John Connor and every dollar of the account was paid. In 1895 our troubles began. In that year a contract was entered into with Mr. Connor, under which contract he should have furnished security that he would pay for the twine that was to be delivered to him, the security to be satisfactory to the warden. Mr. Connor received twine to the value of about $50,000, which he disposed of, and on account of which there is still due the sum of $21,000.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Before the hon. gentleman goes on, I would ask him what security he has?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Originally we had the Baie des Chaleurs Railway Company's bonds.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Only?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is what I understand. Of course I am giving this information as I gathered it from the documents placed in my hands by the officials of the department. In addition we have certificates of the trustees of the Tobique Valley Railway first mortgage bonds.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How much?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. $13,500. We have an order on the trustees of the Tobique Valley Railway Company for first mortgage bonds that we have not got, $7,200. We have a claim against one James Stratton, $12,000, which appears to represent goods sold to him and for which he was indebted to Mr. Connor.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Who is James Stratton?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I have his name, and that is all I know about him.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). I understand he is a St. John gentleman.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In addition to that we have a seven-twelfths interest in a gypsum deposit somewhere in Victoria county, N.B. We have also a one-sixth interest in another gypsum deposit. We have also stock certificate of the John Good Cordage Company of $7,500. We have a note of Mr. Akers for $1,113. I am not sure that it is fair to say that we are going to lose this balance of $29,000. I do not think we are, because we shall sue N. K. and M. Connolly for that balance. The suit has already entered. Our contention is that they were partners with Mr. Connor in this transaction, and we believe, from information we have in the department that we shall be able to collect that $29,000.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Have you a mortgage on any property?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Not that I remember; we have an assignment of different claims to which the hon. member for Pictou referred a moment ago, which I will more fully explain. Now, if we are wrong in law, we stand to lose the $29,000; that is if we do not make out that the Connollys are partners. But if we succeed, we have a chance to make them pay the account. That is exactly the position so far as the department is concerned. But in addition to the legal claims that we have against Connor, we have an assignment from him to the department of different accounts that were due to him for twine furnished under his contract. Among these accounts were one or two that were referred to: one by Mr. Rogers—I do not know anything about Mr. Rogers, I never heard of him before; and the other by Mr. Wood. Since the question was put by the hon. member for Pictou as to the position of the Rogers account, I have made inquiry, and it appears that the Rogers account, stated to have been paid by the Minister of Justice in January, 1896, was the account for goods furnished under the contract of 1894, and that the amount transferred to us still remaining due according to the schedule we have prepared, is the amount due for the contract of 1895 from Connor. I am giving that information as it has been furnished to me. But I think it must be right, because you will notice that the answer of the Minister of Justice was given in January, 1896, and I see this note I speak of was endorsed over to the department in March. Therefore, the matter could not have been in the hands of the Minister of Justice at that time, and he could not have answered that the matter was settled. Now, about Mr. Wood, I am directed to say that so far as he is concerned, he dealt with Connor to the extent of $32,000. He became suspicious of Connor's dealings and wrote to the department to ascertain whether he should pay this money to Connor or to the department. I have got the letter here somewhere, and I find he was informed that he might deal with Connor, and he did deal with him, and the $1,200 the hon. member for Lisgar referred to as being due by Wood, Vallance & Co. has been paid. That is the information I have from the officers of the department, but the amount is entered in the schedule as still due.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Lest the House might get an impression that I had sought to mislead it in any way in regard to the security, I would ask the Solicitor General to state whether he told me that there was additional security other than the Baie des Chaleur bonds.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No, that was the security given in connection with the original transaction.

Mr. BERGERON. If I understood the hon. gentleman, he thinks in law he cannot collect the money from Connolly & Co.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I say the contrary.

Mr. BERGERON. I understood the hon. gentleman afterwards to say that if we are correct in law, we will get our money back from the firm; if not, he says, we will run the risk of losing it. I want to ask the hon. gentleman if he means to say that these securities that are supposed to be in his hands, are good or bad.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My information is that they are substantially valueless. As to the claim against the Connollys, I have been consulting with the Deputy Minister on the subject, and he is of the opinion that they are liable, and from the experience I have had of him to the present time, I think his opinion is of considerable weight and of great value.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What do you think of the Connor liability as regards solvency?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I cannot say much about that, but I am told this difficulty was brought about because the Messrs. Connolly, who ought to know all about him, proceeded against him, and that would give the impression that he is not very solvent.

Mr. BERGERON. It is to be regretted that the hon. member for Lisgar did not put his question at first, instead of reading to us a lot of names, because what the Solicitor General tells us is not quite as bad as what the hon. gentleman said.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I would like the hon. gentleman to point out in what respect we differ.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. First, in regard to the colour which the hon. gentleman from Lisgar gave to his statement, and the colour of the statement of the Solicitor General. I think a business man reading them would be more satisfied with the statement of the Solicitor General than with that of the hon. member for Lisgar. I think the hon. member for Lisgar did not carry the committee with him in withholding information so valuable to the committee at the outset. Had he told us that he had gathered his information after being allowed to examine these papers in the Department of Justice, no one would have quarrelled with that, and we would have been able to follow the information he was giving us. But for some reason he seemed ashamed to let us know where he had found out these facts.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think we must be fair about this. I cannot allow the hon. member for Lisgar to be attacked without defending him on the facts. He had a short conversation with me this morning, and his information on this point, though accurate, was not complete, because I did not give him that information as extensively as I ought to have done, because I was not possessed of it at the time. Since he called upon me about these papers, I went through the whole of them myself, and I had the advantage in addition of having the assistance of the gentleman in the department who is more conversant with this matter. When the hon. gentleman for Lisgar spoke to me about it this morning, I told him that these were matters I did not want him to say much about.

Mr. BERGERON. But he has not followed that advice.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If he manifested any hesitation about expressing the source whence he got his information, it is probably my fault; therefore, if there is any blame in connection with it, I am to blame. Now, to complete the statement of this matter, I may say that for 1896 there were 500 tons, or thereabouts, of binder twine manufactured. Of that quantity, ten tons were sold and 490 tons are still on hand. Kelly, the man with whom the contract was made, not having fulfilled the conditions as to security, the twine was not delivered, and the department is proceeding now to dispose of 490 tons, and we have called for tenders.

Mr. CASGRAIN. There is another difference between the statement made by the Solicitor General and the statement of the hon. gentleman for Lisgar. From the statement made by the Solicitor General, it is apparent that probably the Government will lose nothing at all, because they have taken action against the man whom they hold liable on this claim, and on the advice of the Minister of Justice, no such action would have been taken against the Messrs. Connolly, unless good ground had been found against them by the department. This, of course, changes the condition of the case completely. But this statement of the condition of affairs was withheld from the committee by the hon. member for Lisgar.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not think the hon. member for Lisgar withheld that statement, although he did not make it. So far as the Connollys are concerned, I believe myself that we can collect the amount, that is to say, we can get judgment against them, and I believe we can collect the amount too. But my hon. friend knows that we have already a judgment against them of $40,000 which is not paid.

Mr. BERGERON. What I take exception to is the fact that the hon. member for Lisgar got up a few moments ago to ask a question from the Solicitor General, and took advantage of the occasion to make a speech. If he had put his question and waited for the statement made by the Solicitor General, the whole story would not have looked as bad as he presented it to us.

Mr. LISTER. The whole thing is disgraceful to the late Government. It cannot be disgraceful to this Government, because they have nothing to do with it as yet. If the Solicitor General and the Government in power to-day have as much success in collecting this money from Mr. Connor as the late Government had in collecting nearly $900,000, it will be little indeed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That amount was never owing.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman need not try and raise a false issue. There was no want of candour on the part of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), in the statement he made to the committee, which was substantially correct, as the facts were subsequently stated by the Solicitor General. These goods were sold to political friends of hon. gentlemen opposite. They were sold on credit, no security, in fact, having been taken, although apparently security was given. The security was of no value. The bonds of such railways as were mentioned were absolutely valueless; and we have this fact before the committee, that the Government sold the products to their friends. The late Government stands accused of using the binding twine factory at Kingston for the purpose of compensating friends through Manitoba and the North-west for political services rendered and to be rendered. Hon. gentlemen opposite may try to excuse themselves, but the fact stands out prominently, that this has been, from first to last, a disgraceful piece of jobbery on the part of the late Government.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has formed an extravagant opinion on the whole transaction, and it will relieve his mind somewhat in regard to the question of jobbery, when I state that the Government did not sell those products, and, as the Solicitor General has explained, the Government had nothing to do with the sale of those products to Conservatives or to Grits. The only bargain made was with Mr. Connor.

Mr. LISTER. Their agent.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And he sold to whomsoever he pleased.

Mr. LISTER. Connor was the agent of the Government.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He was at one time agent of the provincial government of Ontario.

Mr. LISTER. He was the agent of this Government, and he is so described in the contract. Mr. Connor was a strong supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, and he took care, apparently, to sell throughout Manitoba and the rest of the country, as regards his credit sales, at all events, to people who, apparently, were worth nothing. As regards the firm of Wood & Co., their credit stands pre-eminent in the country. They did not need credit, and, as a matter of fact, their purchases, amounting to upwards of $30,000, have been paid in full. It would be well if the others to whom sales had been made had paid in the same way.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. With respect to Mr. Connor: he is a warm friend, a personal political friend of an hon. gentleman whom the hon. member follows, the Minister of Railways and Canals.

Mr. ELLIS. With respect to Mr. Connor, I may say that he was at one time a manufacturer of twine and rope of various kinds in St. John, and had quite a number of people in his employ. He joined one of the "combines," closed up his factory—he is a great protectionist—and received an allowance from some association for not working his rope-making factory, so that it was no longer necessary for him to carry on his establishment. I should like to inquire whether he did not sell a large quantity of raw material to the penitentiary? However, that is not a very important matter. This must, however, be said, that Mr. Connor was a most extreme partisan. He seemed to be in the secrets of the then Ministers, and he knew all their movements. I never knew a Minister to pass through St. John without Mr. Connor knowing it, and, if a Minister was prepared to take him to Moncton in his private car, he accepted the invitation. It is certainly a surprise that these facts have come out, but it has always been a surprise to the people of St. John, Liberals as well as Conservatives, that Mr. Connor was so much in the confidence of the Government, and that he was given those privileges, which he appears to have worked so well to his own advantage. With respect to Tobique Valley Railway, or gypsum bonds, no one would like to be burdened with them. I understand, however, that Mr. Connor has lately stated that all his matters have been very satisfactorily arranged, and that there will be no further trouble in regard to them.

Mr. SPROULE. I desire to draw attention to one feature of the statement made by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), namely, that the statement made by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) was substantially the same as that given by the Solicitor General. The statement of the hon. member for Lisgar was that there was only one kind of security, that of the bonds of the Baie des Chaleurs Railway; but the Solicitor General mentioned two or three kinds. One security was the bonds of the Baie des Chaleurs Railway, another was bonds of the Tobique Valley Railway, and there were gypsum bonds and others. When the hon. member for Lisgar read over the names and commented on them, the impression he left on the committee was that those accounts were perfectly valueless; yet among them he read the name of Wood & Co., a partner in that firm being a member of this House.

Mr. LISTER. That firm paid long ago.

Mr. SPROULE. Then, that firm must have been of good standing. The hon. gentleman said that from the information he could gather, all the accounts were perfectly worthless. This was leaving a false impression on the House. The most charitable conclusion at which we can arrive with reference to the hon. gentleman's conduct is that the hon. gentleman was endeavouring to give information on a subject of which he knew little. He gave the committee only a portion of the information required, but withheld a larger portion of which he should have given to enable the committee to judge this case fairly, and, besides, it was not the same information as was subsequently given by the Solicitor General. No doubt, if we went over the accounts, we would find that many of the parties were all right, and the amounts would be realized at a later date. I wish it to be distinctly understood that I am neither defending transactions that should not be defended, or justifying transactions that could have been better done in some other way; but, in all fairness, when the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) attempts to give the House information, he ought to seek to satisfy himself that it is correct before giving it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. With respect to the statement that I displayed a lack of candour, I wish to say this, that I have no excuse to offer, that I obtained my information from the Solicitor General. When the hon. gentleman asked me where I got the information, I did not know whether it would be quite proper for me to state that I obtained it from the Solicitor General, and for that reason I kept silence, and simply said the information was no doubt correct. The Solicitor General has risen in his place and told the House that the information I have given was correct.

Mr. SPROULE. It was not correct. Was the reference to the security correct?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The information was probably not as ample as that supplied by the Solicitor General, but in so far as the information went it was correct. Now with regard to the security question. I said that according to my information the only security that the Government had when the contract was given to Mr. Connor, was these worthless Baie des Chaleurs bonds. The Solicitor General has just informed me that that is true, and that there was subsequent security furnished. I am quite sure that hon. gentlemen know that if there was any additional security and if I knew it, I would be very glad to tell it. Do hon. gentlemen suppose that a young man would enter this House and deliberately try to mislead it. Why, it would be against my own interests to state anything that was not absolutely true, and what information I gave to the House this evening was the information obtained from the Solicitor General, and the Solicitor General has told the committee that the information I gave was correct. It was not as ample as was given by the Solicitor General, but it was accurate as far as it went. The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) charged that there was a discrepancy between the statement I made, and the statement the Solicitor General made. He said that I stated that the country might lose this $27,000, but that the Solicitor General said that this money might be recovered from the Connollys. With regard to that point all I have to say is, that if that money can be recovered from N. K. Connolly and Michael Connolly, there is no thanks to the late Government for it. It was merely an accident, and perhaps a fortunate accident in one sense, that these men may have made enough money out of this country in boodling, so that we may collect this sum from them. Now with regard to the account of Mr. Rogers. I stated that according to my information Mr. Rogers owed $850 for binder twine, and the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) will see that according to the statement of the Solicitor General I was perfectly correct in that. Mr. Rogers seems to have owed an amount in 1894, and that seems to have been paid, but then he owes $850 for 1895, and that amount is not paid. The fact that Mr.

Rogers is President of the Conservative Association probably accounts for the fact that it was not paid.

Mr. CLANCY. I have listened with some interest to the statement made here to-night, and it is rather a serious charge to say that any hon. gentleman would mislead the House. I am in the judgment of this committee when I ask, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) when he got up and made a fair statement was it without any colour or any animus in it from first to last? The hon. gentleman will hardly contend that himself. In every stage of his remarks he endeavoured to blacken the character of the men connected with the transaction. He could not mention the name of the Connolly Bros. without telling the House that they had been hoodlers in the past. I would like to ask at this stage, if the Solicitor General told the member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) in any part of the conversation with him, that the Government did hope to recover that sum from the Connolly Bros. ? If the Solicitor General did not make that statement he surely should not have sat quietly in his seat, and allowed the hon. member (Mr. Richardson) to give the impression to the House that this money would be a loss to the country. Sir, if that fact was not disclosed in the conversation between the two hon. gentlemen, then I believe that the Solicitor General should have stopped the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) and said: "Don't go on with that because we do hope to collect that sum of money and there may be no loss." There is no doubt that the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Lisgar would lead a man without political bias in this House to come to the conclusion that the Government of the day had personally caused these sales to be made to men of a certain political stripe, that in consequence of their political leanings they were permitted to go without paying these debts, and that therefore, to use the classic language of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), the whole thing was used for the purpose of hoodling, and the money lost to the country. Sir, if the Solicitor General had made his statement to the House at the outset, everyone would have been perfectly satisfied, and no wrong impression would have been given to the country as to any financial loss accruing. There was another point that the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) laid great stress upon. He went so far as not only to make it appear that the country was going to sustain a very great loss from the sale of binder twine, but that it would also sustain a loss because of the non-sale of the twine. He tried to show that a large quantity of twine was being held over, interest being paid upon it presumably, and that in consequence of it not being sold a great loss would accrue. If that hon. gentleman had inquired he would have known that a year ago there was such a fall in the price of fibre for the purpose of manufacturing binder twine, that it was quite possible the twine may be worth 2 cents a pound more next year.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Ob.

Mr. CLANCY. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but if they read the evidence of Mr. Noxon one of the Inspectors of Prisons of the province of Ontario, which evidence was given before the Public Accounts Committee of the legislature, they would have a more intelligent appreciation of this subject.

Mr. FLINT. The course of discussion from the other side of the House must prove conclusively that hon. gentlemen opposite have been placed in a very embarrassing position when they are obliged to attack the Solicitor General and the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson). The whole effort of these hon. gentlemen seems to be to try to intimate that the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) has in some particular failed in his duty to the committee. Let us glance over the statement of the case as made before the committee by that hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) and let us see if there is anything in it on which hon. gentlemen opposite should congratulate themselves. Let us look on the whole thing as a business transaction, and I ask any business man in this country, if there was ever so ridiculous a business transaction as this which was entered into by a department of a Government. It is supposed that when a department of Government is dealing with a matter of this kind, they will be more careful in looking after the interests of the public even than a private concern would be in looking after its interests. Here we find a new enterprise undertaken by the Government, and one in which great care ought to have been exercised. It ought to have been shown conclusively in the first place, that instead of dealing with first-class business concerns in this country and inducing them to handle the products of the Kingston Penitentiary factory, they dealt with a well-known and leading politician, one who in consequence of his connection with the combine was enabled to close up his factory, receiving from the combines a subsidy, and thus set free to engage in transactions of this kind. The Government, through its agents, with its eyes wide open, with the Department of Justice at the head of it, has entered into a contract with this man, giving him full and absolute control of the product of the Kingston Penitentiary in binder twine.

Mr. TAYLOR. Just what the Ontario government is doing.

Mr. FLINT. What the Ontario government is doing is no excuse. The gentleman then proceeds to give the Government security, which I think no business house in Canada would have accepted for one moment as security for any financial obligation whatever. It is enough to make one smile to have it intimated that bonds of the Tobique Valley Railway Company, or an interest in gypsum mines in the province of New Brunswick would be taken as security for large sums of money due on a business transaction. Yet this was the security taken by the Government, and upon the same $50,000 or $60,000 worth of product belonging to the people of this country was handed over to this man Connor. Following that transaction, when he has closed his connection with the Government, we find that he has handed over to them, as the wreck and refuse of his transactions, claims against an enormous number of leading Conservatives in the province of Manitoba, and some in the province of Ontario, as assets to meet this liability of some $27,000 or $28,000. Taking into consideration the character and political standing of the man who has been given this contract, and taking into consideration the political stripe of the gentlemen to whom he handed over various quantities of this product without pay and without security, I ask if it is not a fair conclusion that through the grossest negligence on the part of the Government directly, or through direct connivance between members of the Government and these men, the property of the public was handed over to political favourites to be used for political purposes. I believe the conclusion is almost irresistible to any impartial mind that the Government must have known the purpose and the object with which this large fund was being made use of by this man Connor; and when we are called upon by hon. gentlemen opposite to congratulate ourselves that we have these ducks and drakes, from which in the course of a few years, after the settlement of disputed and doubtful points of law, we may recover something, I think they are trying to satisfy their minds with something which the country will not be satisfied with. It is possible that we may have a big pile of costs to pay by and by; but I think that any impartial student of these accounts must conclude that it is very doubtful if we shall ever see a cent of the money.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In connection with the security, I wish to make one point clear, which perhaps I did not make sufficiently clear. When the contract was entered into for the sale of the product of 1895, the security taken at the time was exclusively Baie des Chaleurs bonds. After the twine was disposed of, and after the deficiency was established, then it became necessary for the Department of Justice to ascertain how the account stood, and to get a settlement. Then, in March, 1896, a contract was made, under which an assignment was taken by the Department of Justice of the accounts remaining due, to represent the $29,000, and other securities, among which were the Tobique Valley Railway securities. In order to put the House in possession of all the facts, I think I ought to place at the disposal of the House a list of all the securities, because there were a lot of others in addition to those mentioned.

Mr. BERGERON. Is that all, besides the Connolly affair?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is all, besides the Connolly affair. I will put the House in possession of all the securities, and the House may come to the conclusion as to what they are worth.

Mr. TAYLOR. I want to say to the hon. Solicitor General and to the hon. member for Lisgar that this matter was before the Public Accounts Committee last session. I was a member of that committee, and the officers of the department came there and declared that the security was ample. That is on record in the report of the proceedings of the committee, which I sent for to the distribution office a few minutes ago, but the office was closed. I think, therefore, that the item ought to stand until these hon. gentlemen read that report.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If that is the case, I want to know it, and am willing to let the item stand.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I think, considering the hour, that the item may stand; and I think, too, that it is desirable that this matter should be more fully investigated.

Mr. TAYLOR. There are other members of the Public Accounts Committee present, and they will know that what I state is correct. I wish to say, further, that the output of the penitentiary this year was to be disposed of, but it was not given to Mr. Connor. But the Ontario government, knowing that Mr. Connor was the best man in the Dominion to handle the output of binder twine, have entered into an arrangement with him to handle their output this year on the same terms.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Does the hon. gentleman state that the terms on which the Ontario government dealt with Mr. Connor were the same terms as those made by this Government?

Some hon. MEMBERS. He is not the same man.

Mr. TAYLOR. I made this statement: that the Ontario government believed that this Mr. Connor, who handled binder twine for the Dominion Government, was the best man for that purpose, and they arranged with him to sell their output for this year, and he has done so.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman said that the Ontario government had made a bargain on the same terms.

Mr. TAYLOR. On the same terms.

Mr. LANGEЛИER. On the same security?

Mr. TAYLOR. I did not say on the same security.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Does the hon. gentleman know the security taken by the Ontario government?

Mr. TAYLOR. I am not in the confidence of the Ontario government, as the hon. gentleman is, and he can get the facts.

Mr. McHUGH. I think this House is indebted to the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) for having brought this matter to their attention this evening. I think he has exposed a transaction which reflects no credit on the late Government. Some hon. gentlemen, supporters of the late Government, have said that the securities were good. I would like to ask those hon. gentlemen why they have made no attempt before now to collect on these securities if they were good. They have said that the accounts are good. If so, it is high time they were paid or an attempt made to collect them. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), I think it was, found fault with the late Government because they did not sell this year's output and made another loss on that. It is quite possible for the country to have suffered two losses from the way this transaction was managed. In the first place, there was the sale of the output to men who were not responsible; and in the second place, there was the failure to sell this year's output to men who were responsible, and in that way there were two losses. The hon. member for Pictou said it would be an advantage for the Government not to put this year's output on the market. Does he expect this Government to go into the business of speculating in binder twine and holding over from one year to another what they should put on the market. Hon. gentlemen opposite have referred to the Ontario government. Well, if the Ontario government managed their affairs in this way, they would not be where they are to-day, and would not have the confidence of the people of the province. No charge of corruption has ever been brought home to their doors. An hon. gentleman has said that the people expected us to transact the business of this country by following the same business methods that we would in conducting our own private affairs. Well, is there any one who would transact his own private affairs on the security these hon. gentlemen have accepted in these transactions, and I consider this whole business demands more investigation than it has had this night.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). We will let this item stand and go on with others.

St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary..... $107,800

Mr. BERGERON. There was a rumour that a very prominent prisoner of the peni-tentary stood a chance of being pardoned, and I might say that the people of the constituency which I have the honour to represent are very much exercised over this rumour. I refer to the prisoner Shortis. The newspaper mentioned that his mother was here, and that steps were being taken to obtain his release. Is that true or not?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). I never heard of the rumour before to-night.

Mr. SPROULE. I notice an increase of $8,508. Will the hon. gentleman explain?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is the result of the working of the new system. Under that system, which has been adopted by the Department of Justice in the last year or two, the working of the quarry is under the penitentiary branch of the Department of Justice.

Dorchester Penitentiary ..... $51,650

Mr. SPROULE. I notice an increase in this of $3,074. What is the information?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The first increase is in salaries, $1,130. That includes the salary of the matron, $500, and the difference in salary of two guards, $200, and one teamster, $200, estimated under the new schedule and appointed under the old schedule. Then, there is the difference arising out of the statutory increases.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I thought the salaries of the guards were regulated by scale.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. These are according to scale.

Mr. GILLIES. What are the names of the instructors in the different departments of the penitentiary at Dorchester?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The report of the Minister of Justice for 1895, page 170, gives the names of the instructors. Charles Miller is carpenter instructor, and John Downey, blacksmith instructor.

Mr. GILLIES. When was he appointed?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. On the 1st May, 1868.

Manitoba Penitentiary ..... $44,150

Mr. SPROULE. I see there is a saving here of $3,643. What is the explanation of that?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There are increases in the salary list but there are certain decreases also. One of these is in the expenses of the uniforms. The House will understand that there are some years when the suits required are more numerous than others. There is also the fact that a better class of cloth has been used in making the suits. Then as to the maintenance, there is a considerable saving, resulting from the better supervision over the officer's mess and also the increase of the farm products.

British Columbia Penitentiary..... $46,200

Mr. SPROULE. In this there is an increase.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There is an increase on account of repairs in re-roofing the main prison. Another increase is in supplying plant for brick-making. It appears that the penitentiary is built where they can get but little stone, but there is material that can be used to make brick, and they utilize the labour of the convicts in this manufacture. Of course plant had to be supplied.

Mr. PRIOR. That is a new industry.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Resolutions reported.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 1.20 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, September 18th, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to make a personal explanation. After I left the House last night, an hon. gentleman read a list of debtors to the Government for binder twine, and in that list was the name of the firm of which I have the honour to be the head. We were put down in it as owing the Government $1,200. I wish to say most emphatically that we do not owe the Government one cent. When an hon. gentleman asked a question in the House, the other day, with reference to the binder twine business, I telegraphed to my friends to send me down a statement of our twine account with the Government. It came down by the next mail, and I handed it to the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick). It showed that we paid every sixpence the Government had against us. This morning I received a letter from my partner, in which he says :

Your telegram of yesterday afternoon reached me at 5.25, which left only a few minutes to send the information asked for. However, I mailed you last night copies of the statements which we sent to the Warden of the Kingston Penitentiary on the 31st March last. I now inclose a copy of our letter to the warden which accompanied the statements, and which more fully explains the difference arising between the amount claimed in their statement and the amount which we remitted them in settlement. I trust that the statements which I sent you last night gave you all the desired information.

The following is a copy of the statement sent by our firm and addressed to the warden of the Kingston Penitentiary :—

March 31, 1896.

To the Warden, Kingston Penitentiary,
Kingston, Ont.

Dear sir,—Herewith we beg to hand you our cheque for $1,074.55 in favour of Dominion Government binder twine, being balance due on twine as per statement attached. We also inclose memo. showing where the difference arises between your statement and ours.

Amounts entered in your statement as $4,200. (June 18th, $1,050 ; June 24th, $2,100 ; July 23rd, $1,050.) $5.48 May 6th.

We have no trace or record of these whatever, nor are they included in Mr. Connor's memo. to us of July 31st.

$632.28. Difference in freights. We were to be allowed 25 cents on all North-west shipments and carload rate between Kingston and point of delivery on all others.

$731.25. Returns not credited. We have marked "x" on our statement returns you have not given us credit for.

$54.21. This is for freight we had to allow on twine reshipped on account of balls being too large and also late shipments not accepted.

$2.31. Telegrams to North-west re twine.

$3.00. Difference in price of Maple Leaf twine. Mr. Connor agreed to put this in at 5½ cents.

$193.66. Difference in cash account. As we repeatedly wrote Mr. Connor for statement, without effect, we feel that we are entitled to full cash discount. We deduct full amount, $1,003.66, while in your statement you allow only 3 per cent on $27,000, equals $810.

Kindly acknowledge receipt.

Yours truly,

(Sgd.) WOOD, VALLANCE & CO.

We received an acknowledgment of this statement from the penitentiary, accepting it as correct. Now, when we were making our contract with the gentleman named here, we knew quite well the character of the man with whom we were dealing, and we refused to make a contract until we had the authority from the Government that he was authorized to make a contract for the sale of binder twine. When he asked for payment, we refused until we had the authority of the Deputy Minister of Justice for whatever payments we might make. We gave him one cheque, I believe, for $7,000 and a cheque for $18,500, and we sold him three cars of twine for $3,000. These figures make up the amount of our transactions with the Government, and I was quite surprised to see that our name was on the list of debtors. To whose fault this is due, I do not know, but it is certainly an error and I wish to place myself right before the House. I wish to say that we do not owe the Government one cent. If we did owe the Government anything, we would be prepared to pay it, but we do not owe them a farthing. I would like to thank the gentleman upon the other side of the House who gave my firm rather a high character in this House last night. I am very much obliged for that.

MAJOR GENERAL CAMERON'S RESIGNATION.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I desire to lay upon the Table of the House the letter asked for by the hon. leader of the Opposition addressed by Gen. Gascoigne to Gen. Cameron. I will make the necessary motion that an order of the House do issue for the production of this letter.

Mr. SPEAKER. This is covered by an order of the House already issued, and this letter should be regarded as a supplementary return.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Militia if he will be good enough to lay on the Table also the letter addressed to him by Gen. Cameron a day or two ago which has relation to this matter—a letter of the 15th or 16th of September.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Does the hon. gentleman refer to a letter addressed by Major General Cameron to the Minister of Militia? Did that letter refer to travelling allowance?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It referred to this whole question. Will the hon. Minister lay on the Table of the House any correspondence on this subject not already brought down.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I have here a copy of a letter from Major General Cameron dated the 5th September.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The letter I refer to was dated the 16th September.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I will look that letter up.

SUPPLY—SCHOONERS SEIZED BY THE RUSSIANS.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Government what progress has been made toward the settlement of the claims made by the owners of the schooners "Willie McGowan" and "Ariel," seized by the Russians.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I would like to point out that on calling of the Orders of the Day no questions are permitted of which notice can be given. It is altogether irregular to ask questions at this stage without proper notice. Of course, if the subject is one of great public interest and of immediate urgency, a question may be asked, but the Government may answer it or not as they see fit. I do not wish hon. members to get into the habit of asking ordinary questions at this stage.

Mr. McDOUGALL. This is a matter that I consider of extreme importance.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). My hon. friend (Mr. McDougall) will realize that it would be impossible, without notice given, to furnish the information he asks for.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I am not in a position to answer the hon. gentleman's question. He did not give me any notice of it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not wish by any suggestion to limit the right of any member to bring up any subject for discussion, but only to refer to the asking of questions of which notice might be given. Of course, an hon. member can ask questions, but it is at the option of the Government to answer.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I hope this will serve as if it were a notice for a future day, as there might not be time to put it on the Notice paper and then reach it in the regular way.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There will be plenty of time. Let the hon. gentleman put the notice on the paper now; it will appear on Monday, and I can answer it then.

THE DISMISSAL OF WEBSTER AUGUSTUS.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Militia to a matter of supreme importance as affecting an individual. I spoke to the hon. Minister yesterday and gave him the name of the individual in question, and he told me he would be prepared to answer the question to-day. The gentleman I refer to is Captain Augustus, of Kingston, a gentleman who has been engaged for some years in the Militia Stores Department. On the 28th August he received this letter:

Kingston, 28th August, 1896.

Mr. Webster Augustus, Kingston.

Sir,—I am directed by the Director of Stores to inform you that by direction of the Honourable the Minister, your services will be dispensed with from the 1st September next.

Your obedient servant,

F. STRANGE,
Captain, S. of S., M.D. 3.

This was the only intimation he received that his services would be dispensed with after faithful service. Captain Augustus writes :

Sir,—I was notified of my discharge (as sail-maker) from the militia stores on the 28th August, for what reason I do not know. If it was for interfering in politics, I defy any person, either Liberal or Conservative, to prove that I took any part in the last Dominion election. All I ask is a hearing, then I will have an opportunity to make a statement to show where an error has been made in my dismissal. Inclosed are a few statements that I have received from gentlemen who say that they will make affidavit if it is necessary. Mr. Britton—

I suppose this refers to the hon. member for Kingston.

—is personally acquainted with these gentlemen, I think. I will thank you if you can procure me a hearing.

I am, yours respectfully,

WEBSTER AUGUSTUS.

The testimonials he incloses are signed, one by E. W. Sullivan, one by S. Anglin, one by H. H. Taylor and one by Hugh Doney. They are all in substance the same. I will read only one of them :

Kingston, August 26th, 1896.

To whom it may concern,—

As secretary of Rideau ward of the Conservative Association of this city, I asked Captain Webster Augustus to turn out election day and work for D. M. McIntyre, Conservative candidate. He refused point-blank to do anything of the kind. I am in a position to swear to the above if necessary.

E. W. SULLIVAN,
Secretary, Rideau Ward.

So, Captain Augustus says he does not know why he has been dismissed and states that if it is for interference in the elections he is not guilty, and all he asks is a hearing before the hon. Minister who dismissed him.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I do not understand the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) to charge that this man was removed for political reasons. I can assure the hon. gentleman that, so far as I am aware of the facts, such is not the case. I was advised by my deputy that this man was an employee by the day, that his services were no longer required and he was given notice accordingly. That is all I know about the case.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What is to be taken up first ?

The DEPUTY SPEAKER. Militia, beginning with item 106.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I thought you were going on with the Justice Department.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I thought that might be debatable, and I wanted to take this up, believing it would be unopposed.

Pay of staff, permanent corps and active militia, including allowances..... $347,650

Mr. SPROULE. I notice by the papers lately that some difficulty has occurred in connection with the Queen's Own in Toronto. Will the hon. gentleman inform me whether the rumour is correct which appears in the press that Lt.-Col. Hamilton is to be reinstated in that regiment, and what is the nature of the trouble ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Nothing whatever has been done with reference to the matter of the Queen's Own regiment since I came into the department. I have had no opportunity of taking up the case. Col. Hamilton has not been reinstated, nothing whatever has been done. I hope when the session is over, to get an opportunity of taking up the case and settling it one way or the other.

Salaries and wages of civil employees... $62,000

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask my hon. friend, in continuation of the question I put to him some time ago, whether he has yet dismissed Capt. Mackenzie from the caretaker's office on the Sussex property.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. He still remains.

Mr. FOSTER. Has my hon. friend made up his mind whether to retain him permanently ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I find that Capt. Mackenzie seems to be employed at present as caretaker on the rifle range at Sussex, at a salary of $1.25 per day, with an allowance of 30 cents a day. I have had no opportunity of enquiring whether it is necessary to keep an officer there ; but nothing whatever has been done in the direction of removing Capt. Mackenzie.

Warlike and other stores..... $35,350

Mr. DOMVILLE. I would like to say to my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence that, now he has charge of the department, we shall find our regiments getting proper equipment. At the present moment they are in a position that is hardly creditable. We have a large force on paper, and if they were called out to-morrow they would have little or nothing to go with. I only call his attention to the matter now. I propose to take up the details on an occasion when he will permit me.

Mr. CASEY. Perhaps this would be as good an opportunity as any to ask how far the delivery of the artillery and rifles ordered last year, has proceeded?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I may say to the hon. gentleman that 9,000 of the 40,000 rifles ordered last year, have been delivered. I am not aware that any of the artillery has been delivered yet.

Mr. TISDALE. I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Militia and Defence to a matter that I brought up on some statements in the newspapers, and concerning which I had the honour to submit an Order in Council to the late Government, and which was passed, in regard to the purchase of the Oliver equipment. I had not an opportunity at that time, under the orders, to make the statement in regard to it which I wished to make. It is true, as stated in the newspapers, that the late Government passed an Order in Council authorizing the acquisition of the right to the Oliver equipment for the militia of Canada, both permanent and active, for $5,000. I understood from the Minister of Militia and Defence at that time that that order had been repealed.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. It has not.

Mr. TISDALE. Then if it has not been repealed, I wish to call his attention to my view and to the view of the late Government, that it would be much to be regretted if it were repealed. At that time not only had it been recommended by the Major General in command of the forces, and had received strong recommendations from the militia force, but I also understood that it had been strongly recommended by General Wolseley and by Sir Redvers Buller, as being the most efficient equipment that had hitherto been discovered. We were given to understand that it could be acquired for $5,000. I thought it desirable, from the representations made to me by the officers of the department, that some equipment should be adopted, because it is very difficult to get a proper equipment unless one of that sort is adopted. In view of the strong representations of the gentlemen I have mentioned, who are so well qualified to judge, I think it would not be desirable to repeal that order. If we ever expect to acquire it for so low a sum as that, immediate advantage would have to be taken of the offer, for the reason that the gentleman who had invented this equipment, in consideration of getting immediate payment, was willing to take a very much less sum than he would be willing to take at a later time. I understood from the Minister of Militia and Defence that the Major General had subsequently, not exactly changed his mind, but had recommended, because of experiments going on in Great Britain, that it might be desirable to delay the acquisition of that equipment. Now, I think if the delay took place there would be danger of its costing this country a good deal more; and in view of the recommendations of these distinguished men who were so well able to judge, I think it would be to a certain extent not exactly as a breach of faith, because the Order in Council could not of course bind the incoming Government or the House to take it, as the vote had not been given, but something which should not be done. I still hope that the Minister will again confer with these gentlemen and consider the importance of acquiring this equipment, which I believe the force generally who have taken the trouble to examine it, approve as being the best and cheapest equipment obtainable.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I would ask the Minister to ascertain whether there is not a new equipment that would be worth looking into before he purchases the Oliver equipment. I do not speak from actual knowledge, but I am told that something has either come out, or is about to come out, which, perhaps, is an improvement. Now, I would like to see the Militia Department moving in an effective manner. I might point, perhaps, to one regiment in which I am interested, where we find a corps going about with bits of worn out ropes or leather round their waist, called a sword belt, year in and year out, and whenever you make application for a supply you get the answer, None on hand, or, none to issue. Now, I am not finding fault about our getting an equipment, but I say it would be well for the Minister to ascertain whether there is not a new equipment which would be an improvement on the Oliver. I have no doubt that the Oliver equipment would be very good and very serviceable if we had to go to the front. With the present equipment it is just like sending soldiers to the front with no boots. How can men march without boots? Now, I am not merely speaking for myself; I know that the militia have ideas and views of their own regarding their requirements. I can point to my own regiment. We have rifles issued to us, the strap of which is disgraceful. We never took them out of the packing case, yet we are held responsible, for they are charged against us. We either have to abandon them or use them, and by and by we find the leather all stretched with the rain, and when we complain we are told, Oh, it was ordered. Now, I suggest to the Minister that before he commits his department and the taxpayers of Canada, to any vast expenditure, it would be well for him to look into what is going on in the world generally, and make up his mind, perhaps with the assistance of some of the corps, as to what would be in their judgment most beneficial and useful.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I may be permitted to say a few words in addition to what has been said by the late Minister of Militia (Mr. Tisdale), and the reason why I rise is that the Oliver equipment came under the notice of the Department of Militia when I happened to be the head of that department. As to the excellence of that equipment there can be no possible question, either in this House or outside of it, because that point has been settled by the highest authority known to the Imperial service, and, in fact, all over the world, so far as practical experience is concerned. Field Marshal General Wolseley has, on more than one occasion, recommended it, for, if my memory serves me, when the equipment was first submitted to the Department of Militia and Defence, of which I was then the head, the samples sent to the department were accompanied by a letter highly recommending its adoption, from Lord Wolseley, who at that time was not Field Marshal. I fully agree with the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Domville), that, in matters of this kind, it is very desirable we should be practical, but I hardly see that the hon. gentleman is practical, when he states that we should not adopt for the service of Canada this new equipment, even although experience shows it to be the best possible equipment at the present time, because experiments are being made. Experiments are carried out every day, and the trouble in regard to the adoption of the Oliver equipment in Canada is the strong opposition of contractors abroad. I do not object to that competition, but I am giving it as a reason why the Oliver equipment—although I admit, it is the best known at the present time—has not been adopted, and that opposition arises from those who are experimenting in equipments in England and here. Let me ask hon. members who are familiar with the requirements of the force, to look into the Oliver equipment, and determine whether or not it is desirable to introduce it into the force. The weight being distributed by means of straps, renders it the very best equipment known. When it was proposed to introduce into Canada a system of manufacturing tunics and uniforms for the Canadian force, similar opposition was raised. Where did the opposition come from? It came from the contractors in England, who, at that time, were receiving $200,000 a year from this Dominion, and who opposed the system by which we succeeded in keeping in Canada that money and using the labour of Canada to produce the goods. That was the reason why that change was made. The same opposition will be met with by the present Minister of Militia, so far as the Oliver equipment is concerned. Dr. Oliver, who is a surgeon, has built his equipment on scientific principles and from his experience as a surgeon; otherwise it would not be the perfect equipment now furnished. The fact that at the present time he occupies an important position in the Imperial service, that of Surgeon General to the garrison at Halifax, indicates his high qualifications. When hon. members look into the question, as regards the requirements of the Canadian force, as I have done, they will, no doubt, be convinced that this equipment should be adopted. I will now state to the House why it was not adopted when I was Minister of Militia, and this may be necessary, in order that hon. members may understand why I am now advocating its adoption. The only conditions under which Dr. Oliver would hand over his patent to the Canadian Government, involved greater expenditure than the department felt justified in making at that time; but it must be remembered that the amount demanded at that time was very much greater than the small sum of $5,000 now asked, which appears to remove any possible objection to the purchase of the patent. When I was Minister, $12,000 or $14,000 were asked, and, after discussion, the amount was reduced to $10,000. At that time the General in command considered this equipment better than any in the Imperial service, and I am told by the member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) that the Major General in command has recommended it. I look upon it as the very best equipment that could be adopted. A very good equipment is that invented by Mr. Lewis, which is known to the Militia Department here. I hope, when the matter is considered—and I must admit that the Oliver equipment seems to me to meet all the requirements of the force—that the Lewis equipment will be given a trial, in order that we may be able to judge of the respective merits of both systems.

Mr. DOMVILLE. If the Oliver equipment commended itself to the Minister of Militia, why did he not buy it when he was in office? What was his object in waiting? If there was a pressing necessity, why did not the Minister of Militia purchase it then, instead of asking the present Government to do so? Now the hon. gentleman is asking the department to adopt an equipment which may be superseded by some better system.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The fact that I did not commit myself as Minister of Militia is possibly the reason why it was not tried at that time. The fact of the hon. gentleman waiting until the last experiment has been tried, means that we will never adopt anything, because experiments are going on every day and they are improving every day. We know what it has been so far as rifles are concerned, and it would simply be absurd to expect us to wait until the last experiment before we select an equipment.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). My hon. friend (Sir Adolphe Caron) pretty effectually answered himself. First, he told us that the Oliver equipment was offered to him some years ago for $14,000, but as it has come down to $5,000 now, it is a pretty good argument in favour of waiting. If we wait a little longer perhaps it might come down further.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. You might get it for nothing.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The hon. gentleman weakened his case in favour of the Oliver equipment by stating, that while he hoped we should adopt it, he trusted also we would look as favourably as possible upon the Lewis equipment. The hon. gentleman admits, therefore, that there are some other equipments beside the Oliver which deserve the attention of the Government. Now the position is exactly this: the late Government, after having had the Oliver equipment before them for a very long time, very shortly before they went out of office decided to pay Dr. Oliver $5,000, simply for the right of being allowed to use his patent. Since I came into the department I have discussed this question with the officers, more particularly with the general officer commanding, and I have been advised by him that important experiments in reference to equipment are being made in England at the present moment, which are sure to be decided within two or three weeks of this time. I was advised by him strongly to suspend judgment until we learn the result of these important investigations in England. The Order in Council has not been rescinded. The hon. gentleman from South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) seemed to think that we were under some obligation to Dr. Oliver because of that Order in Council. I scarcely think so. The hon. gentleman answered himself in that argument, when he said that the Government could not possibly bind Parliament. I, for one, as Minister of Militia do not propose to ask Parliament to vote $5,000 to pay Dr. Oliver for his patent, if it is not the very best equipment that can be found in the world. When the country goes to the expense of supplying its citizen soldiers with this very necessary article, we should take very great care that we provide them with the very best thing of the kind extant. That is the course which the Government proposes to pursue in this matter.

Mr. CASEY. It is very natural that the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Caron) should try to justify his line of conduct when he was Minister of Militia. As my hon. friend the Minister (Mr. Borden) has pointed out, the hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) when Minister of Militia had not the courage to implement what he states now were his opinions of the Oliver equipment, by buying it, but he now urges his successor in office to do so. Sir, the Dutch auction that has been going on, on the part of Surgeon General Oliver, offering his equipment a little lower every year, certainly does not seem to indicate that it is increasing in value. Another point which the hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) has never been accepted as the equipment has been before the British army authorities for 20 years at least, has been experimented on by them to a large extent, and has never been accepted as the equipment for British soldiers. If Lord Wolseley, Commander-in-Chief, were now as strongly in favour of the Oliver equipment as he was when he gave the letter referred to, it would undoubtedly by this time be the equipment of the British army. The whole thing has the air, to me, of being an attempt to sell damaged goods in the colonies. This thing, after long inquiry and experiment, has been found not good enough for the Imperial service and it has been tried to shove it off on one of the colonies.

As a practical measure I would suggest to the Minister of Militia that before he decides on any equipment for the Canadian militia, numerous samples of any equipment under consideration should be sent out to the different corps to be tried during a few weeks' actual service in camp, so that the men who have to wear the equipment will be able to judge as to its convenience in actual use. Canadians, Sir, are an inventive people. There are a good many in Canada specially versed in the carrying of weights through rough countries, men who have had experience in lumber camps, &c., and I would urge therefore that some inducement be offered, a prize or something of that sort, for inventions in this line. I believe that we are just as likely to get as good an invention in the way of equipments from a Canadian source, as from a British or from any other source. If attempts were made, say, during the coming winter, to get samples of equipments, we would have some of Canadian origin to try next summer, and in all probability, from the circumstances of the case, they would be much better than those invented elsewhere.

My hon. friend from Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) says there can be no possible question as to the superiority of this Oliver equipment. I have pointed out already that there is such a very serious question about it, that it has never been adopted in the army in which it has been invented, and in which it has been tried. He laid great stress on Dr. Oliver being a surgeon general. Perhaps he is not aware—for there are a great many military things he is not aware of—that this distinction is simply the result of being a certain number of years in the service as an army surgeon, and it does not indicate any very distinguished standing or ability on the part of the man who holds it.

Mr. PRIOR. Does not that apply to a general just as well ?

Mr. CASEY. He is not surgeon general of the British army ; he is " a surgeon general," which is a very different thing. The opinions of the hon. member for Three Rivers in regard to equipments are not probably of any more value than his opinions as a Minister were on a notable occasion when our men were using ammunition in the field in the North-west. When, in 1885, I asked the hon. gentleman if it were true as reported, that the cartridges served out to our soldiers in actual service were not as good as they ought to be, he calmly told me across the floor of the House : that they were certainly not quite good enough to use at practice at the targets, but they were quite good enough for use in the field. I submit that the opinions of the hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) on matters of equipment, ammunition, &c., are not deserving of any very great weight in this House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not want to prolong this discussion, but I think there must be some mistake in connection with the statement made by the hon. Minister of Militia to the House. This question is one of a good deal of importance. It is well known that the late Government made provision for a very much increased means of equipping and arming the militia. Parliament was asked for a very large expenditure for the purpose of putting the militia of Canada in the most efficient state possible. We found that this question of the Oliver equipment was one which it was very important should be promptly decided. If it were true that this was the best invention that had ever been presented for the service of soldiers in the field, it was of great importance to Canada, at a time when we were about to undertake a very extensive improvement in the equipment of the militia force of Canada, that we should have the very best means available for that purpose. My hon. friend the former Minister of Militia (Mr. Tisdale) has stated, and stated correctly, that the question of having an equipment of the very best character, one that can be borne with the least fatigue by a soldier marching, is of vital importance to the force. Under these circumstances, the matter was naturally brought to the attention of the late Government, and my hon. friend the late Minister of Militia has stated to the House, what is the fact, that he brought down to Council the recommendation of the general officer commanding, Major General Gascoigne, recommending the adoption of the Oliver equipment ; and the Order in Council passed by the Government adopting that equipment, was based upon the advice of Major General Gascoigne. Now, I can hardly understand how that can coincide with the Major General's opinions being of such a flexible character that he could recommend the next day the very reverse. The Governor General in Council acted upon the recommendation of the Minister of Militia, supported by the recommendation of Major General Gascoigne ; and, having offered one-half of the sum that was asked by Surgeon General Oliver for the patent of his equipment, the Government felt that they would be warranted in purchasing that patent at the small sum of $5,000, or one-half of what had previously been asked for it. An Order in Council was therefore submitted, passed, and signed by the Governor General, and Surgeon General Oliver having been informed that his equipment had received the approval of the Governor General in Council, and an Order in Council having been passed and signed by the Governor General to complete the transaction. I think it is a little late in the day for an officer of high standing, who ought to know his own mind, to find that his views are so flexible that he can change them and recommend a postponement. The hon. Minister of Militia says that in three weeks we shall have this question determined in England. Why, he has just heard from the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) that this question has been before the authorities in England for twenty years, and that they have not decided it yet. I do not know that the hon. gentleman was exactly correct in that statement ; but I do not think it at all unlikely ; and I have myself knowledge enough of the extremely conservative character of all arrangements made by the Imperial Government, to know that it is next to an impossibility to get anything changed, however important and necessary a change may be. The fact remains that one of the most distinguished officials in Her Majesty's service, a gentleman known not only throughout the British Empire, but throughout the world, Lord Wolsley, has borne again and again the most unqualified testimony to this equipment, as being superior to anything that is now in use, or that has ever been devised for the purpose. That opinion from so high an authority as Lord Wolsley, a gentleman who has had experience again and again of commanding a force in the field, and is, therefore, in a position to recognize the vital importance of this question, is backed up and sustained by another gentleman of the highest standing in the British army, General Redvers Buller, who has also testified, after careful examination, that this equipment has never been equalled by any other invention submitted for the purpose. Under these circumstances, I think the late Government will hardly be found blameworthy in having consented, at a time when they had proposed to make a very great improvement in preparing the militia force of this country for the discharge of their duty, to adopt a patent so highly recommended, on the recommendation of the Minister of Militia, supported by the recommendation of the general officer commanding the militia force. I may say that Lord Wolseley has not only had wide experience elsewhere, but he has had experience, and very valuable experience, of the Canadian militia as well. I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman's statement that this Order in Council has not been rescinded, and I hope it will never be rescinded. After the Government having entered into a contract with this gentleman, who has spent a great deal of time and money in preparing the invention, declared by the highest military authorities to be the best that has ever been produced for the purpose, I can hardly believe, even though this Order in Council had the misfortune to be passed by the late Government, that party feeling, or any other feeling, in this House will be carried to the length of destroying or changing an agreement which has been entered into with such deliberation by the late Government, and supported by such high authority. We all recognize the opinion of the hon. member for King's on these military questions; but I think he will at once himself see that this decision was arrived at with the utmost care and deliberation, and that it would be impossible ever to arrive at a conclusion on any question, if one waited until there was no person in the world to come forward and claim to have invented something better than that already produced. I sincerely hope that the Minister of Militia and the Government will carefully consider this matter; and, if they do, I am quite sure that this arrangement will be carried to a satisfactory conclusion.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. My hon. friend may disabuse his mind of any idea that there is the slightest party feeling in this matter. In fact, I do not know to what political party Dr. Oliver belongs.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Neither do I, but I can inform the hon. gentleman that, as an officer in the Imperial service he refused to have anything to do with our party politics.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The hon. gentleman seemed to run away with the idea that I was acting from some party motives.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, not on account of the inventor, but on account of the fact that this arrangement was made by the late Government.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I admit that, on general principles, it might be pretty safe to go in the opposite direction of the late Government, but I can assure the hon. gentleman that

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

I was not governed by any such idea in this matter. It is only fair to the general officer commanding, who, I think, has been handled rather unfairly by the hon. gentleman, to say that he has not intimated any change of mind whatever. He has simply said that having ascertained, after this Order in Council was passed, that a crucial investigation into this whole question was going on in England, where certainly such investigation can be best carried on by the War authorities, he advised this department, and he would have failed in his duty had he not done so, to wait before carrying out the Order in Council we are discussing, until we know we are getting the best article for our money.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I would like to correct the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) and the hon. member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper). The hon. member for Three Rivers said that Major General Oliver was stationed at Halifax. He is not stationed here. The hon. member for Cape Breton said that he was an officer of the Imperial army and a surgeon general. He is not now on the active list in the army. Like many others who have acquired age, he has had to retire. Major General or Surgeon General Oliver, or whatever his title may be, is not an officer today in the British service.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. It is in my knowledge that, at this moment, Surgeon General Oliver is in the employ of Her Majesty's service in that capacity at Halifax.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I hold in my hand the Army List and his name is not there.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I cannot help that. He is, at this moment, in the pay of the Imperial Government.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Here is the Imperial Army List, the one last issued, and Major General Oliver is not in the army in any capacity whatever.

Mr. TISDALE. When was that list published?

Mr. DOMVILLE. The 1st July, 1896.

Mr. CASEY. It may possibly be that Surgeon General Oliver may have been temporarily employed in some capacity by the Imperial Government, but it is clear, from their own official statement, that Surgeon General Oliver is not an officer of the British army in active service at present.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I undertake to assert that Surgeon General Oliver is at this moment in the service of the Imperial Government.

Mr. CASEY. I call the hon. gentleman to order. I insist that the Army List be taken in preference to any personal statement of the hon. member for Cape Breton. He cannot know as well as the authorities who issued the Army List. It is absurd to put his statement of personal knowledge against that. It is also absurd for the hon. gentleman to keep harping on the support of General Wolseley to this particular pet equipment of the hon. gentleman, for he has certainly taken it under his special charge, not realizing that in so doing he is taking the best way of making it unpopular with those who have to decide the question.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear. That is just what they repudiate.

Mr. CASEY. The majority of this House will have the settling of that question, and they are distinctly not prepared to accept the ground that what the hon. gentleman takes under his pet charge is just the thing we ought to get. The hon. gentleman has had pet schemes here before, and they did not materialize. He is not doing Surgeon General Oliver any good with this side of the House, or with either side of the House for that matter, for there are many on both sides who have very small confidence in the hon. gentleman's pet schemes. It is absurd for him to bring up, again and again, the pretension that Lord Wolseley, the Commander-in-chief, is in favour of this equipment. Why, before he made that statement, he was informed by the Minister of Militia and Defence, on the authority of the Major General commanding, that at this moment Lord Wolseley is trying this very equipment, not for the first time, but giving it another chance. It has been tried for years back and failed, and it is being tried again in competition with other equipments. If Lord Wolseley were in favour of that equipment to the extent that the hon. member for Cape Breton would have us believe he is, he would have adopted it and not tried it over again. It is many years since Lord Wolseley wrote the letter quoted by the hon. member for Three Rivers, and at that time it was no doubt the best he had seen. It has been condemned, however, in the British service, and is now being peddled in the colonies, under the patronage of the hon. member for Cape Breton. So much for that little matter, which is a very petty affair in itself. I must, however, join my voice to that of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) in urging upon the Government the necessity of securing some good equipment at a very early date.

I want to ask a question as to the distribution of the 9,000 rifles which the hon. Minister says he has received. By what method does he propose to distribute these rifles—are they to be given, so many to each corps, or according to efficiency in shooting, or what other considerations are to prevail in the distribution?

Mr. TISDALE. I hope the House will permit me a few words before this matter is dropped. I have no intention of prolonging the debate upon it. I regret very much the tone of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey). I was in office for a very short time, occupying the position now held by the hon. Minister of Militia. While in that position, I endeavoured to eliminate politics from the administration of militia affairs. It is not possible always to do that, but, as far as possible, the Minister of Militia, I believe, ought to keep that as one of the principal rules to be followed. I believe and hope that the present hon. Minister will do so, as he is an old volunteer officer. In getting this equipment adopted, I had one sole object in view—to lighten as much as possible the burden our soldiers have to bear in active service. I took the responsibility, as I would take it again, of recommending this change. Before doing so, I got such recommendations and information as I could, from the Major General commanding, who, in every way—and I wish to bear this testimony to him—took the deepest interest in all these matters connected with the militia. I understood that high military authorities in England had approved this equipment. Further experiment may have improved it. But thirty years ago I bore, as a private soldier, the burden which had to be carried by one who went out at the call of his country. I know that it is an almost intolerable burthen. I asked the Major General whether, under the circumstances and in view of the price asked, it was best to make this change, and, on his recommendation, and with the concurrence of the Government, it was decided upon. I hope that, if there is a better equipment, we may get it. But let us have it soon. Long enough have the volunteers of Canada borne an equipment which they ought not to be compelled to bear. They have been able to bear it, because many of our volunteers, I am proud to say, are young and strong. But still, this equipment is a serious impediment to the performance of their duties in the field. There was no question of party politics about it. The only reason why I brought up this question was to urge that not only should we get the best equipment within our means but that we should get it soon. It is twenty years since it was possible for us to improve upon our present equipment, and improvements have been going on ever since. No doubt, further improvement will be made, but let us not wait five, or ten, or twenty years more, but let us get the best we can now. If there was anything I was proud of doing for my fellow-soldiers, it was proposing this change. I was willing to relieve my successor of this responsibility and I did nothing that I would not be glad to do again.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. In reply to the inquiry of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), as to the new rifles, as I have already said, we have received 9,000. They have been distributed as follows:—Royal Regiments of Infantry, 4 companies, 100 each company, in all 400; camp at Aldershot, N.S., 500; camp at London, Ont., 500; Niagara, 500; Fredericton, N.B., 400; Levis, 400; Laprairie, 500; St. Johns, Que., 400; Charlottetown, P.E.I., 500; Kingston, Ont., 100; total, 3,700. There are 5,000 in store at Quebec, 200 at Kingston, and 100 at Ottawa, making in all 9,000. The rifles shipped for practice to the camps are to be returned into store, when the camps of instruction break up.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Do you mean the old rifles?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No, the new rifles. They are not to be used except in camp for practice in rifle shooting.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I wish to ask a question or two with relation to the camps. Strictly speaking, this may not come under this item, but probably this is the most convenient time to ask this question. I would like to know, in relation to the camp in King's county, N.S., what arrangements were made to obtain tenders for stores.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. With regard to supplies for camps, I may say that in two of the camps it was found impossible to ask for tenders in the usual way, that is, the camps at London and the camp at Aldershot, which began on 8th September. I was advised by my officers that it would be impossible to advertise for tenders for supplies for these camps, and I was informed that the usual course was to ask the D. A. G. of the district to make the best arrangements he could for supplies, and report to Ottawa for approval. I may say that, when I came into the department, I found a list of names of tradesmen to whom patronage was given whenever supplies were required by the militia. I was informed that these were people who had been utilized by the late Government for this purpose, and I was asked to provide a new list. I believe, to be perfectly frank with the House, that the list which I found in the department was a list of tradesmen belonging to the party supporting the late Government. I was told that such was the case, and I was asked if I wished to supply a new list. I consulted the members for the different counties, and asked them to send me names of reputable tradesmen to make up this patronage list. This was done. When the supplies were wanted for the camp at London, the Deputy Adjutant General was instructed to make his arrangements with those whose names were on the patronage lists. In the same way the Deputy Adjutant General for Nova Scotia was instructed to make the best arrangements he could with those whose names were on the lists supplied to him. I believe that the supplies are being provided at as low rates as ever before—at least, as low—and, therefore, the country has not suffered by the arrangement. I was informed by my officers that this was the course which was always pursued under similar circumstances. As to the other camps, tenders were called for by public advertisement, and in every case the lowest price was accepted.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I may mention to the hon. Minister that I have been informed differently. Most likely he is correct, but the information that reaches me is that a radical change has been made with regard to public advertisements for tenders. I am told that on the last occasion when a camp was held—I suppose, last year—a notice appeared in the papers asking for tenders, that tenders were put in, and that, in many cases, some of which were named in the letter that I received. Liberals were successful in obtaining the contracts, having put in the lowest tenders. That information, of course, is quite at variance with that of the hon. Minister, as these people would not be on such a list as that he mentions. Nevertheless, the statement was that this year, supposing that the same public competition would be opened, the parties who tendered previously vainly attempted to ascertain where, when, or how tenders should go in. One name was given to me, Mr. Douglas Bent, of Aylesford, who drove into Kentville to put in tenders, and was unable to obtain any information where it could be done. But what makes the information more important is that Mr. Dodge, who is the local Liberal member for the county, and Colonel Chipman, one of the active militia officials of the district—I do not know his particular duty—were given charge, and Mr. Dodge was the lucky individual who got the contract. Is that correct?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. It is absolutely untrue—not a single word of truth in it, as regards Mr. Dodge having received the contract. Mr. Dodge received no contract, has no interest whatever in the contract. I may say that it was suggested to the Deputy Adjutant General who lived in Halifax, Colonel Irving, who is, I believe, a very strong supporter of the Conservative party, that he should consult Lieut.-Col. Chipman, of the 68th Battalion, who lives near Aldershot, and who has been a life-long Conservative, as the hon. member for Pictou knows, and as the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition knows, and who is one of the strongest supporters those gentlemen have in Nova Scotia. He is also agent of the Bank of Nova Scotia and one of our most respectable and influential citizens. The Deputy Adjutant General was asked to confer with him and with Mr. B. H. Dodge, local member for the county of King's, and form a sort of board to see that they got their prices for the camp at the lowest possible figure. I think my hon. friend did not catch what I said with reference to a departure. I admit at once that it was a departure from the ordinary course with reference to the camp at London and the camp at Aldershot. It was impossible to ask for tenders, because there was not time; it was necessary to deal with certain men because there would not have been time to post advertisements and make contracts. I can assure the hon. gentleman that we shall give all particulars as to what has been done with the parties who have received contracts.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then, am I right in understanding that in future public competition will be resorted to for securing supplies to the camp?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. As the Minister of Finance states that there is great exigency in the different departments in the service that the main part of the supplies should be passed as quickly as possible, he might allow one of the items, say, No. 111, to remain, on the understanding that all matters concerning the militia may be discussed later on.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. It is understood that there will be an opportunity of discussing all these items upon the one that has been reserved.

Grants in aid of Artillery and Rifle Association, bands and military institutes ..... $37,000

Mr. PRIOR. I would like to ask the Minister of Militia if he could not see his way to give a larger grant to the Dominion Artillery Association. At present they only get $2,000 from the Government, whereas the Dominion Rifle Association get $10,000. Now, this year we have seen Dominion artillerymen go across to the old country and carry away the highest prize against the whole of the militia forces. I think, as the hon. gentleman knows, the artillery is a very important branch of the service, it is a branch that requires a great deal more study on the part of the officers than the infantry does; they have to spend more hours at drill, and have to pass a more difficult examination, although I do not say they are any better men. I think the country can well afford to give the association a larger grant to assist them every year in sending across a Shoeburyness team to see what Canada can do in competition with the old country.

Mr. DOMVILLE. A good idea.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I shall be very glad to accede to the request made by the hon. gentleman, but, of course, it would involve an increase in the total vote. I do not think it possible to reduce any of the grants made now, the tendency seems to be altogether in the opposite direction. Does the hon. gentleman think it would be impossible to increase this particular vote?

Mr. PRIOR. Put it in the Supplementaries.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Very well.

Miscellaneous and unforeseen contingencies ..... $15,000

Mr. BRITTON. For the year 1894-95, I see that one gentleman, D. Bergin, is paid $700 on account of travelling and personal expenses. I suppose that is the gentleman who is a member of this House, and who has been the Surgeon General. I would ask the Minister if he is still employed in that capacity, and will that amount be required to pay him?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. There is no change. That hon. gentleman is not in the House just now.

Mr. BRITTON. Do I understand, then, that he is in receipt of $700 from this Government, although a member of the House?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I am informed that this $700 was to pay travelling expenses of the Surgeon General who was sent out by the then Minister of Militia to inspect the sanitary condition of several localities.

Defence of Esquimalt, B.C. .... $6,500

Mr. PRIOR. I desire to ask the Minister whether this expenditure is for works, or to provide for pay and allowances for the Royal Marines.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. These works at Esquimalt have been carried out by arrangement with the Imperial Government. They have almost been completed.

Intercolonial Railway ..... $211,500

Mr. McDUGALL. I observe an item of $20,000 for extension to deep water at Sydney. The extension to deep water at Sydney is already complete. This branch is a re-vote, and applies to North Sydney.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). It is intended to be North Sydney, and if the word "North" is omitted, it is simply a clerical error.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to draw the attention of the Minister of Railways to a point to which I directed the attention of the committee last year. I applied for a statement from the late Minister as to the number of hands employed on the Intercolonial Railway. He furnished a reply, and I made an estimate from the statement by which it appeared that there were three and one-third men for every mile of road, or  $3\frac{1}{3}$  men for every 10 miles. There is no road in Canada that has an equal number of men employed to the mile, not even the Grand Trunk or Canadian Pacific Railway. I now draw the attention of the Minister to this state of things, and I hope that the reduction which has taken place in the Public Works Department will be extended to the Intercolonial Railway. I believe there are more men employed on the road than are necessary, and I trust that, when the Minister investigates its operation, he will be able to make considerable reductions, and at the same time maintain its present efficiency.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The hon. member must be mistaken in some way. I am acquainted with the portion of the road in Cape Breton and eastern Nova Scotia. There are not more than 3 men for 5 or 6 miles over that section of the road.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What is the class of employees referred to?

Mr. McMULLEN. I included all employees usually engaged on the railway. That, of course, included station masters, trackmen, and, in fact, the whole staff. I was informed that there were three and a third men to every mile on the Intercolonial Railway. I made inquiries in regard to other roads, and I can assure the committee that there is no other road in Canada having such a number of men to the mile.

Mr. WALLACE. Have you the figures to give to the committee?

Mr. McMULLEN. No.

Mr. SPROULE. If the Minister possesses the information, it may be desirable that he should furnish it. How many men are employed on the Intercolonial Railway?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. A complete list of the employees in the different branches of the Intercolonial Railway is being prepared, but at the present time it is not in my possession. I shall certainly take occasion to consider very carefully the subject to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) has referred.

Mr. SPROULE. I observe by the newspapers that several dismissals have taken place. Will the hon. gentleman inform the committee as to the number of men dismissed since he took charge of the department?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I cannot state the number at this moment. I have in mind three or four daily workmen whom I have authorized to be removed, but those have been replaced by others. I do not know that there are more than three or four in all. There have been no changes whatever in that class of employees which could be classified as permanent employees or experienced officials.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I remember the discussion that took place last year, but I think it had special reference to the comparative proportion of trackmen employed on the Intercolonial Railway as compared with other railways. If I remember correctly, the information which was given to the committee then, showed that the road in that direction at least, was run quite as cheaply as other lines of railway.

Mr. McMULLEN. I classified the men, station men, baggage men, night men, day men, &c., and the Minister gave me the gross number that were engaged. I then took the length of the road and divided it by the number of men and the result was that there were  $3\frac{1}{3}$  men to the mile.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) must be wrong, because the Minister of Railways has just told us that where he found occasion to remove three or four men he has promptly replaced them by three or four others. If this road was over-manned, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) seems to think, surely it is quite impossible that the Minister of Railways would not have availed himself of the opportunity to reduce the force by the number of men he dismissed. If there are a large number of persons more than required to do the work of that road, there is no reason why they should be retained and paid. It is a very important question, and if the Minister could give us the mileage of the Intercolonial Railway and the total number of persons employed, compared with the mileage of the Grand Trunk Railway and total number of persons employed, it would give us some opportunity for comparison.

Mr. McMULLEN. I agree that that would be valuable information to have. The Minister has only come into his office within a few days and it cannot be expected that in such a short time he would be able to look over the employees with a view of reducing the number. These men who were dismissed and whose places were filled may have been a class of employees with which the road is not overburdened.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Did the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) include all the hands on the track and in the shops, or merely the men engaged in the operation of the road?

Mr. McMULLEN. I included all the men engaged in connection with the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That plan of comparison I think would be a very imperfect one, because you can scarcely find two railways that are run upon the same system. One may employ hundreds of people building its own rolling stock, and another may not build its own rolling stock at all. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) will see, therefore, that it would be perfectly unfair to compare the staff of one road with the staff of another not operated in the same way. If the hon. gentleman wants a pretty fair comparison, he should take the train mileage run by the Intercolonial Railway and the train mileage run by other railways, or take the passenger traffic on the Intercolonial Railway and the passenger traffic on the other road, and then adopt this as the basis of the running expenses generally.

Mr. McMULLEN. All these returns could be got from the Year-book. My hon. friend (Mr. Montague) knows that the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway build their own rolling stock almost entirely, whereas I believe the Intercolonial Railway build less of their rolling stock in proportion. That comparison would not be fair to either the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Grand Trunk Railway. In making the comparison I took the gross number of men employed on both lines, and the result is as I have stated.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I confess to be entirely unable to express any opinion to the committee as to whether the Intercolonial Railway is unduly manned or not. I do intend to address myself later to a full and careful investigation of that subject. Assuming to be true what the hon. member (Mr. McMullen) has stated, that the number of employees on this road amounts to  $3\frac{1}{4}$  men per mile, I am quite unable to say that that is too many. I do not think the committee has the information before it which would enable it to arrive at that conclusion; at all events I have not that information. I do not therefore see, that the procuring for the committee of the exact number of men who are now in the employ of the different branches of that system in all its departments, would furnish us after all with a very great deal of useful information. Let me add, that the conclusion which the hon. the leader of the Opposition drew from the fact that two or three, or four it may be, of those who were discharged, were replaced by others, would not perhaps be a fair or reasonable conclusion to draw. The men who were discharged were trackmen and they were replaced by other trackmen. I would not like to have it assumed by the leader of the Opposition, that I considered the road as not over-manned because I allowed these vacancies to be filled.

Mr. FOSTER. Would the hon. gentleman state, if these trackmen were dispossessed of their shovels and picks for political reasons. It was because of reasons of inefficiency, I suppose?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Well, they were displaced on the strong representation of gentlemen whose opinions and whose statements upon the subject I felt myself warranted in accepting. They were not permanent or skilled employees. They were not persons who were discharging other than that class of labour which an ordinary labourer can do. I have not felt that I was called upon to enter into any very elaborate inquiry as to whether a workman on the system had been guilty—to have it proved by formal evidence, at all events, to me—that a man had been guilty of any political offence in order to entitle him to be removed. I have acted upon this rule, that unless the employee is a skilled person or a person of experience, and is filling a permanent position, I would not take very much time or enter personally upon very much of an inquiry as to whether he ought to be replaced by another or not. I am going to be guided, so far as my administration of the department is concerned, in these matters by the advice and information of those responsible gentlemen who have been elected to be representatives of the people, and whose advice I know can be safely taken by the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not quite see the justice of the distinction which my hon. friend has drawn between poor labouring men and those who are skilled. In reference to the labouring men, he seems to lay down the rule that they have no rights; but that if a man is skilled and gets a high salary and occupies a permanent place, a different rule should be applied to him. I should rather come to the conclusion that it would be better to have the greater care for the labouring man, the unskilled man. It is often very difficult for him to get employment. But what I want to ask the hon. gentleman is this. He says he took the advice of responsible persons. I want to ask him, did he dismiss those men on the advice of the officers of his department, who are the responsible persons, so far as the running of the road is concerned? I do not suppose my hon. friend intends to give up the railway to a committee of members to be run by them. There are experts on the road, from the head down, whose advice he surely asks. Was it on the advice of those officers that the labouring men were discharged, or on the advice of outside parties?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have insisted, in the very few cases with which I have been called upon to deal, on the head of the branch of the department concerned being careful that the persons employed were proper persons to be employed, and that at present, until the matter could be more fully inquired into, they should not be employed on any terms less favourable to the service than were those who had been removed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I must enter my protest in the most solemn and formal manner against the statement made by the hon. Minister of Railways to this committee to-day. During my experience in this House, until this moment, I have never heard a member of a Government announce that he intended not to use but to abuse the power which the country has placed in his hands, of summarily dismissing and depriving of his bread any man at the request of a member supporting him in the House of Commons. It is a monstrous doctrine, one subversive of every liberty of the subject, and I think the hon. gentleman must have made that statement without due consideration of reflection. Is it to be supposed that a man holding in his hand the power of depriving of their bread, upon an hour's notice, thousands of people in this country, is only to say: "I am prepared to dismiss a man whenever any member supporting this Government says he wants that man's place for one of his friends"? The hon. gentleman has not stated that he has been furnished with any ground whatever for dismissing these people and depriving them of their means of living. He says it was done at the request simply of members elected to this House. We have had a good deal of discussion on the principle of dismissing persons from the public service; but down to this hour I have never heard from any member of a Government, of any party in this House, the statement broadly made that the tenure of employment, however well and industriously a man may discharge his duties to the country in the position in which he is placed—at all events, a man in a humble position in life, a person earning his bread by manual labour—that his tenure of employment is to be at the call of any gentleman supporting the Government who wants his place for one of his friends.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman tell us the names of the four whom he has dismissed, and on whose recommendation they have been dismissed?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will furnish the hon. gentleman with the information.

Mr. FOSTER. I think we ought to have it now.

Mr. SPROULE. Can the hon. gentleman give us any information as to how this road is paying now—the gross and net earnings of the road, and the running expenses?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I cannot give the hon. gentleman the information as to the year that has just closed. It has not yet come to me. The officials of the road have not yet prepared the information in detail, nor even, I think, in a general way. The best information I can give to the hon. gentleman is in regard to the operations of the road for the year ending the 30th of June, 1895.

Mr. SPROULE. We had that last session.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. On the 28th of August I asked for information with respect to the dismissal of two men who were employed in taking charge of the draw on the railway bridge crossing the harbour at Pictou. Those men were dismissed summarily. No complaints were laid against them. They are to this day, as I am informed, ignorant of any cause of dismissal. Later I called the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways to the subject, and sent to him across the House, I think at his own request, a memorandum in regard to it. At any rate, I told him that I particularly hoped that he would be able to give me in Supply the reasons for the dismissal of these two men, and the names of ten others who were discharged in the county of Antigonish in the month of August from positions they had held on the Intercolonial Railway for a number of years. I gave in the statement, and it is found in "Hansard," as to the number of years during which these men had been employed. This year they were discharged, and after they were absent from the work for a few days, other men were put in their places. I would be glad if the hon. gentleman would now give me the particular information I desire in reference to all of them, that is, the grounds of their dismissal, and any further particulars he may care to mention.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have the information with regard to the two men whose names were mentioned by my hon. friend from Pictou—Roderick McLeod and Robert McKay. I made inquiries and procured that information, which I intended to lay on the Table this afternoon, but I did not happen to be in time. These men were employed as bridge tenders on the draw of Pictou harbour bridge. Complaint was made by Mr. M. E. Macdonald, a gentleman with whom I think my hon. friend from Pictou is acquainted, complaining that these men had been very active partisans in the late election, and requesting that they should be removed, and that two others, Messrs. Thomas Fraser and A. Thomas, should be appointed in their places. I directed him to communicate with Mr. Maxwell; Mr. Maxwell communicated with Mr. Archibald; and, under general directions, touching these two cases, which I gave to Mr. Pottinger, these men were removed, and the two persons, Thomas Fraser and A. Thomas, were appointed in their stead. I have no doubt, from the positive statements made to me that the charge against these men by Mr. Macdonald was true. I acted upon it, and authorized their removal on that ground. As to the other cases which the hon. gentleman has mentioned, I have no information. I do not know the names of the persons said to have been dismissed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I gave the list to the hon. gentleman, and referred to the page in "Hansard."

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will inquire about that, but have not the information at the moment.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Am I to understand that Mr. Archibald or Mr. Pottinger or any other officer investigated into the truth of the charge preferred by Mr. Macdonald?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not think they did.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Am I to understand that if Mr. Macdonald the defeated candidate for the county of Pictou, charges any officer in the public service with having actively opposed him or having committed other offences, even more grave, the hon. gentleman proposes to remove the accused from the service without investigation?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will answer the hon. gentleman's questions as to any specific cases that have arisen.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I want to understand the principle upon which the hon. gentleman intends to administer his department. He says it is sufficient for him to know that my opponent wishes these men removed, and that if my opponent prefers a charge against them, he will accept that charge without investigation. I wish to know if he proposes to act on that principle.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not say that it was sufficient for me to know that the opponent of the hon. member wished these men discharged. I did not act upon any such principle, nor shall I do so. There must be a charge preferred, and I must be well satisfied that the charge is well founded, but I propose to draw a distinction between permanent officials of the road, persons who are in continuous employ, as officials, and those who are simply employed as day labourers. I cannot do otherwise. It would be utterly impossible for me to administer this department, with 5,000 people employed in it, on any other principle, and I came to the conclusion that if any responsible gentleman—any member of this House, whose advice the Government would consider it safe to act upon, or any responsible candidate before the country, who had been defeated in the late election, in the interests of the Liberal party,—made representations to me that, of his own personal knowledge, persons whose names he had mentioned and who were in the employ of the Government, in the capacities I have mentioned, had taken an active part in the election, and assured me of that from his personal knowledge, on his personal honour, I would accept the statements thus made and permit the officials of the department to allow the changes to take place. I want to say to my hon. friends opposite that it is perfectly idle for them to tell this House or the country that, in dealing with officials in the public service, even in prominent, and much less in subordinate capacities, they have proceeded upon any nice rule. They have never done it. They have simply decapitated the individual, when they felt that the interests of their party demanded his decapitation; and while I shall not act upon any such principle, and would be sorry to do any injustice to any individual, whether employed in an inferior or superior capacity, yet in administering my department, it would be utterly impossible for me to make a personal investigation or to adopt any system of inquiry which would be as elaborate as the hon. gentleman would suggest, with regard to the hundreds and thousands of employees on the Intercolonial Railway and canal service of the country. I shall endeavour to avoid doing any injustice, and shall only act upon the representations and assurances of gentlemen who tell me that they know the truth of the facts they affirm, whether they are members of this House supporting the Government or gentlemen who have been selected to be our candidates.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think that is the most monstrous doctrine I have ever heard. It would be difficult to find language to characterize as it should be characterized, such an extraordinary principle as this one, upon which a Minister of Railways, for the first time in our history, proposes to govern a large department in this country. And I think it will be a very serious question whether this House should put in his hands the control of a large sum of public money, when he avows this small political spirit as the one which shall guide him in conducting the administration of the Intercolonial Railway. He has drawn the line distinctly between the poor man and those better off. He treats with contempt and cruelty, and proposes to continue to treat with contempt and cruelty, the labouring element on the Intercolonial. Any man who is paid by the day is to have one rule applied to him. A man employed by the year, occupying a higher position, is to enjoy the rights of a British subject and be treated with a certain amount of justice; but if the man's position be a humble one, the hon. gentleman neither has the time nor the spirit to treat him with the same amount of fairness and justice. But knowing that he has avowed a nasty doctrine, knowing that there was something mean and contemptible about it, the hon. gentleman turns on his opponents and accuses them of having also been mean and nasty and not nice in this matter. He charges them with having cut off heads without notice, and therefore he is going to proceed with the same summary and abrupt decapitation. Hon. gentlemen opposite have, time and again, vainly attempted to fasten charges of that kind on their opponents. No member of the late Government and no member of Parliament that I can remember since 1882, ever had the audacity in this House to advocate the justice of such a course or the reasonableness of it. I am within the book when I say that the hon. gentleman cannot give an instance, in a long period of years, when any member sitting on the Treasury or on these benches laid down such a revolutionary and outrageous proposition. What is that proposition of the Minister of Railways? It is that he will take the statement of members sitting behind him or those who fought his party battles in this country and were defeated, that he will take their bare ipse dixit, and cut off ruthlessly the heads of public servants whenever he is told that they are Conservatives or that their places are wanted, and they are paid by the day. The fact that they are paid by the day is his justification for thus endeavouring to bolster up the political fortunes of his party. I protest in the most serious manner against that policy, and I think it would be well worth the consideration of this House to dwell with the subject more thoroughly, at a future stage of the session, unless that doctrine is promptly repudiated by the leader of the Government. The leader of the Government has had to repudiate the ideas of his colleagues, in this very short session, several times already, and I trust this will be another of these occasions, for there is no doctrine more pernicious or offensive than that which the hon. Minister of Railways has laid down as his guide in connection with the appointment and dismissal of public officials.

Mr. QUINN. Representing, as I do, a constituency in which probably the largest vote is that of the labouring men, it would be impossible for me to remain silent, after an announcement such as that which we have heard from the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair). I rise to make the most formal and decided and solemn protest that can be made by a member of this House against such an outrageous doctrine. If that doctrine be carried to the extent to which the hon. Minister threatens to carry it, it will mean this, in the future, the labouring man—he who is most liable to be unduly influenced by men in power—is to be at the mercy and dictation of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals and his supporters. It means that it will be impossible, in any portion of the country, for any workingman opposed to the Government to seek employment, or even to retain employment on Government works. It means, in a word, that these men, in whose independence and honesty lies the welfare of our country, are to be oppressed and subjected to a system of terrorism unequalled even in Russia. Men who are depending upon their daily bread for the support of their families will be taken virtually by the throat and compelled to support Government candidates, or else, on the mere recommendation of that candidate, they will be ruthlessly thrown out on the world and deprived of their means of livelihood. It would not be possible for me, without violating the rules of the House, to give proper expression to the contempt I feel, not only for such a course of conduct, but for the people who adopt it in the administration of public affairs, and who are not even ashamed to proclaim it in this cold-blooded manner. And we hear the charges made that gentlemen who have occupied the Treasury benches before the Conservatives of this country have adopted the same course. Why, Sir, I am in a position, from my own experience, limited as it is, to give a most formal denial to this statement. I am in a position to say and to tell this House that within a very short time I saw a Government officer canvassing his labourers to vote against me, to vote against the man who was defending the Conservative interests in the election immediately preceding my own. But I challenge the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals to show that any charge was made by me against him or against the labouring men who were working under him. And yet we are told that gentlemen on this side have done the same thing. I deny it from my own experience, short and limited as it has been. I deny it as being wholly opposed to the record, wholly opposed to the traditions of the party of which I am a member.

Mr. McMULLEN. We are much amused at the indignation of hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for Ste. Ann's, Montreal (Mr. Quinn), denies that the dismissal of officials on political grounds was practiced by the Conservative party. We had this question up a few nights ago, and I refer the hon. gentleman to the fact that I then stated that the "Hansard" translators were ruthlessly dismissed without a hearing and without any opportunity to defend themselves.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes, they were. The hon. gentleman, when he undertakes to speak of the Conservative record, should have a more extended experience than he has had. He tells us that he is only a politician of yesterday. But we know the record of his party for many years. We know, for instance, that there never were two men upon whom the indignation of a party was visited with greater determination and vindictiveness than in the case of the two translators to whom I have referred. The hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), works up great indignation at what he calls the monstrous doctrine of the hon. Minister of Railways. When this matter was discussed on a previous occasion, the principle was laid down. It was declared that where any member of Parliament was himself personally cognizant of active interference in the election on the part of officials he was justified in reporting to the head of the department, and having that officer dismissed. That was acknowledged as the principle that the head of any department was justified in acting upon. And the Minister of Railways has carried out that principle and no more.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes. These men were reported to have been actively and determinedly and openly interfering in the elections.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will you allow me one word?

Mr. McMULLEN. What is your question?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will tell the hon. gentleman the difference between the principle upon which the Minister has acted and that for which the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) contends in the case of the translators. The hon. gentleman says that the translators should have a fair trial, but in the case of a labourer he would cut his head off at the request of a party heeler.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) states that the doctrine propounded by the Minister of Railways is a most monstrous doctrine. He goes on to say that the treatment accorded to other servants of the Government is not the treatment accorded to the workmen on the Intercolonial Railway. I have sat in this House a good many years, and I never heard in it a more demagogic speech than that the hon. gentleman has just delivered. What are the facts? The Intercolonial Railway was under the control of hon. gentlemen opposite for eighteen long years. They used it as a vast political machine. Why, Sir, we know that there is scarcely a man from the head of the railway down to the occupant of the most subordinate office who is not a Tory, prepared to support the Tory party through thick and thin. The hon. member for Pictou knows that well. We know that hon. gentlemen opposite have abused their power, they have given passes to their political friends throughout the country, they have carried freight for their political friends at merely nominal rates; and we know that some hon. gentlemen who sit in this House to-day hold their seats in Parliament because of the fact that the Intercolonial employees in the last election voted solidly for the Conservative party. We know perfectly well that the position of an employee on that road while these gentlemen were in power was most unpleasant unless he was an avowed supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite. Why do these men take an active part in politics? They have been trained up to it, they have been taught that adherence to the Tory party was the price of preferment. They thought, as the leader of the late Government thought and stated down in Nova Scotia, that we had no chance in the wide world of carrying the last election. He announced to the people that he was sure of success. And these people believed him, and they did as they had been doing for eighteen years before, they openly supported the Conservative candidates throughout the country. They were found in many cases openly supporting that party and taking an offensive part in the contest, assailing the leader of our party and the party generally. Not content with discussing political questions, they must needs go on to attack the personal as well as the political character of gentlemen opposed to them. Sir, they must learn that neutrality in political matters is the price of office. They must understand that, for the future, whether this Government or any other Government is in power, they are expected to be neutral in politics, so long as they hold office under the Crown and receive the money of the people. And I say my hon. friend is accused of having done what hon. gentlemen on the other side actually have done over and over again, dismissed public servants without cause, though no complaint was made against them and for no reason except that they were adherents of the Liberal party. My hon. friend from Montreal (Mr. Quinn) talks. He is a new politician; he does not know the men he is associated with; he has only been with them a few weeks. If he had been near them for the last fourteen or fifteen long years he would know more about them. Let me tell him that almost the first act of the party he supports when they came into power in 1878 was to dismiss not one but hundreds of officers by repealing a statute and re-enacting it so as to enable them to appoint their political friends. Then, Sir, the breast of my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) was not bursting with sympathy for the poor people. Men with families were thrown out by the dozen, simply by Act of Parliament passed by these hon. gentlemen to give them an excuse for dismissing hundreds and hundreds of good men. Go over this country, take the departments here, if you will, and I venture to say that not five per cent of the public service in Ottawa are Liberals. If they are Liberals at all, they have had to speak below their breath, they dare not come out openly and exercise the rights these gentlemen are now advocating. If they voted, they did so in silence. They were subjected to spies throughout the departments, and if they opened their mouth the chances were that they would be decapitated. How dare hon. gentlemen come to this House and try to arouse the country with such a record as they have, a record that shows that from one end of Canada to the other, from the time they took office down to the time they left, a Liberal in Canada has had no chance? If he was an office-holder, he had to be silent or he would lose his position. Sir, we know what the law is as laid down in England, laid down in every colony of England, well known in Canada, and about which there can be no question at all; it provides that a man who accepts office is expected to be neutral in politics, in other words, neutrality is the price of his position in the public service. Sir, the quicker public servants in Canada know this, the quicker they will cease from interfering in elections. The time will come when we will go to the country again, and hon. gentlemen who will be opposing us will then appreciate, to some extent, how offensive it is to have men who are being paid with the money of both Conservatives and Liberals, using their influence for the purpose of defeating one political party and helping the other party into power. Now, let it be well understood throughout the length and breadth of Canada that men who enter the civil service, while they have a right to exercise their franchise, must be absolutely neutral in politics. They have a right to vote, their political sympathies should not be interfered with at all, but they should devote their lives to the service of the country, and then there will be no political party in this country who will desire to put them out of office. It does not come with good grace from hon. gentlemen opposite to talk about the dismissals that have taken place, or may take place. Sir, the most offensive partisans that could be found in this country were to be found amongst men drawing pay from Canada, making their living out of the public service, and these men should not be permitted to hold office any longer. Men who exercise the franchise should not be disturbed, they should feel as secure in their positions as men can feel; and I venture to say that there will not be in any constituency in Canada a desire to interfere with these men who attended to their duties. But men who are politicians must accept the fate of the party with which they are allied, and when that party is defeated, they must expect to go out of office.

Mr. QUINN. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) has been good enough to say that I did not know my friends on this side of the House. Well, I have the advantage, in the short time I have been here, of knowing the hon. member for Lambton and the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), and knowing the position they occupy. They seem to me to occupy the position on the other side of the House of the long stops in a cricket match. The Ministers may stand up and defend any charges that are made, and then come in my hon. friends from Lambton and North Wellington and act as long stops.

Mr. LISTER.

Mr. LISTER. What stop do you take?

Mr. COCHRANE. Stop your mouth.

Mr. QUINN. Another position they occupy is this: they occupy the position of men who try to distract attention from the subject under consideration. We are not now discussing the question whether public officials have a right to vote or interfere in elections, as both those hon. gentlemen have tried to make the committee believe, but we are discussing the pernicious, the outrageous doctrine that has been enunciated by the Minister of Railways and Canals, that he will, on the 'ipse dixit' of any member on the Government side, or of any defeated Liberal candidate, dismiss any labourer who happens to be in his department, and without investigation. Now, that is the principle which has been enunciated here. It may be clothed in different language, but that is the principle. Now, I ask these hon. gentlemen who have done so much to root up in the political swill barrel all the scandals they can against the Conservative party, and to trot them out before the House—I ask even them if they will advocate a principle of that kind. I ask even men having the tendency of the hon. members for Lambton and North Wellington, if they will approve of that doctrine. Sir, from what I know of members on this side of the House, I believe there will not be found one who will approve of the policy advocated by hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for Lambton said that all men have a right to vote, that these public officials have a right to vote, and that they shall not be interfered with no matter for what party they vote. But according to the views of the Minister of Railways and Canals, they have not a right to vote, because, on the mere representation of the defeated candidate or of a Liberal member in this House, a labourer is to be dismissed. That is the doctrine, and I have no doubt the hon. Minister will give proper effect to it if he is allowed to remain there much longer. Mr. Chairman, I again wish, in the most solemn and most positive manner, to protest against such a pernicious doctrine.

Mr. POWELL. Representing as I do a county in which there is probably a larger proportion of railway employees than in any other constituency in Canada, I cannot allow certain charges put forward by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) to go unchallenged. Now, I make bold to say—and in doing so I hope I shall not give such an exhibition of large-mindedness and patriotism as he has given, but I shall confine myself to a few simple statements of facts—I make bold to say that since 1882 down to the present time there has uniformly been passed a most generous policy and one diametrically opposite to that stated by this hon. gentleman. I defy any hon.

gentleman opposite, I challenge the Minister of Railways and Canals, who is familiar with my county, to name a single mechanic who was dismissed from the service of the Intercolonial Railway during these fifteen years because he was a Liberal.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). There was not a Liberal among them. You never employed a Liberal as a labouring man on the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. POWELL. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries says we never employed a Liberal. I have heard statements from that hon. gentleman before. I know very well how his imagination sometimes runs away with his recollection and his judgment. I have heard him in my own constituency.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Name a Liberal that you employed.

Mr. POWELL. Sir, I have much pleasure in giving him names. I can name not only one but dozens. I will give one who is employed in the Intercolonial Railway offices, and if the Minister of Railways will look at the list of officials he will find his name, a gentleman by the name of Mr. Walker, who was appointed a few years ago under the Liberal-Conservative regime. I can also name two other men named Sutton, and I can name dozens of others. At the time a large number of dismissals were made from the Intercolonial Railway shops a few years ago, about one-half of those men who were dismissed were Liberal-Conservatives. The dismissals were made entirely irrespective of politics, and when men were taken on, Liberals and Liberal-Conservatives were taken on together promiscuously.

An hon. MEMBER. What about 1878?

Mr. POWELL. I am not going back into ancient history as far as 1878. I will come down to the charge made by the hon. gentleman that members are sitting on this side of the House who have been elected by and owe their election entirely to the votes of railway men. The hon. gentleman looked at me when he made that statement, and no doubt he had me in his mind's eye. At the last election I did not receive anything like half the railway vote at Moncton.

Mr. LISTER. How was it in the election before?

Mr. POWELL. At the previous election I about divided the vote; but in the general election in the month of June last the two large booths where the railway vote was deposited, I was defeated by a very large majority indeed. When the statement is made that the Intercolonial Railway is run for political purposes and ends, that statement is unfounded in fact, and is indeed nothing more than an idle rumour. There is no basis whatever for such a charge. This fact rebuts the charge, for since 1882 no Liberal has been dismissed on account of politics, and the charges against the late Government and myself are entirely false.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Is the hon. gentleman aware of the fact that at the last election railway men, supposed to sympathize with Liberal opinions, were sent out of Moncton in order that they should not vote against the Government?

Mr. POWELL. I am not.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I undertake to say that I know them, for I met them on the way.

Mr. POWELL. This mild-mannered man, the Minister of Finance, can assume a tremendous attitude of acerbity. I can assure the hon. gentleman that this was far from being the case. There are in elections tricks resorted to by both sides. I do not say our party is entirely pure and that your party is entirely corrupt. Men are men on either side of politics, and there may have been an instance or two. But I tell the hon. gentleman this, that the machinery of the Intercolonial Railway cannot stop because of election day, and if the hon. gentleman says that men were sent out of Moncton because they happened to be Liberals, he is making too large a deduction from a single fact when he says this has systematically been done as a part of a settled policy—conceding that the statement of the Minister of Finance is correct in its fulness of meaning of which I am very sceptical.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I should like to ask the hon. Minister of Finance a question. I desire to know whether it is correct that railway employees in Nova Scotia—they being suspected of being in a large degree Tories—were disfranchised by the local government?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am delighted to have an opportunity of answering the question. There is a law in Nova Scotia under which a large number of Dominion officials are disfranchised. Far from regarding it as obnoxious, I think there is much to be said in favour not only of retaining it, but extending it. I have been appealed to by officials who expressed a desire to be disfranchised, because then they would be perfectly free to abstain from voting; and I tell the hon. gentleman that under Dominion Government management in Nova Scotia there was created a system of terrorism among employees, whereby those suspected of holding Liberal principles dare not vote, and disfranchisement would have been a real benefit to those men. Hon. gentlemen opposite rise in this House and assume the position of possessing superior virtue, and yet they dismiss men without cause. If their speeches are read in the maritime provinces and by employees on the Intercolonial road, not only Liberals but Conservatives will laugh openly at the statements made, because they are aware that in the maritime provinces, not only the Intercolonial Railway, but the Customs, Post Office and other services have been converted into political engines. Hon. gentlemen opposite would not have had a Conservative party in Nova Scotia if there had not been Dominion officials to constitute its backbone; and more than that, they would not always have had candidates unless they had been able to secure Dominion officers. I am sure the members from Nova Scotia in the Opposition are smiling and chuckling to-day at this discussion, when they know, as we do, that down in the maritime provinces any man in the public service suspected of being a Liberal was made to feel that he was under a ban. If officials supported the Dominion Government they were protected, otherwise opportunity was sought to drive them out. They reduced the salary, as was mentioned in a case the other night, with the hope that the officer would resign, and when the Government could do nothing else, they dismissed officials. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite pretended that they exhibited in office great virtues—a proposition that is simply ridiculous and hardly admits of serious discussion. I can assure hon. gentlemen that throughout the length and breadth of the maritime provinces—and I speak of those provinces because I know them best—the whole Dominion service has been made a political engine, not only in Dominion but also in provincial affairs. Where officials were not allowed to vote, many of them worked at the polls in opposition to the Liberal local government, year after year. They carried party politics into municipal affairs. I remember a case where a man who was a Dominion official, a candidate at a municipal election, had signed a requisition to a candidate for municipal honours who was a Liberal, and who had to withdraw his name, because he was made to fear that if he interfered in municipal affairs and supported a Liberal, he would be punished by his superior officers. It is beyond question that in Nova Scotia the whole Dominion service has been used as a political engine, and it is high time there was a change.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I do not wish to detain the House at any length, but I consider that I would be lacking in my duty to my constituents, my party and my country if I did not meet the statement of the Finance Minister with a square denial. If I had the opportunity to make this denial in any other place, I would make my statement very much stronger. A more dastardly, contemptible statement in regard to Nova Scotia was never enunciated.

An hon. MEMBER. He is bringing in local politics.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Certainly, it is bringing local politics here. So far as it has been within the power of the hon. gentleman opposite and the majority supporting him, he has denied the right of voting to every man who was a Liberal-Conservative. He has done everything that would tend to oppose the Liberal-Conservative party and the policy and principles it advocates. As long as it was possible, he denied the privilege to our school children of having a national holiday. I know the politics of the province; and at Pictou men known to be Liberals have been appointed to office; and the hon. gentleman opposite went too far in assuming that every one in the civil service in Nova Scotia was a Conservative.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We did not assume it.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). You not only assumed it, but you said it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You stated it this afternoon.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They were appointed by you, and many of them were wise enough to change their opinion afterwards.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). It would be well for the hon. gentleman to pay more attention to the statements made by his supporters. The point to which we direct our strong objection, is the statement—

It being Six o'clock, the committee rose, and the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 13) respecting the Hamilton Powder Comnpay.—(Mr. Geoffrion.)

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 26) to incorporate the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway and Navigation Company.—(Mr. Maxwell.)

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Mr. Chairman, the statements made by the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) just before recess, in reference to the conduct of the Liberal-Conservative party in connection with the treatment of officials, was, in my experience, so very much at variance with the actual state of affairs, that I think it is only right, in justice to our party and to our province, to show that the calumnies heaped upon that province by the Finance Minister are entirely undeserved. In the county of Pictou there has been no dismissal of officials by the Conservative party on account of any action those officials have taken in our political struggles. When the Liberals were in power before, a gentleman belonging to the Conservative party had been removed from office, in order to appoint to his vacant place a gentleman supporting the Liberal party; but, on the accession to power of the Conservative party, in 1879, that Liberal official was not dismissed, but was removed to an equally good position in another part of the province, in order that justice might be done to the Liberal-Conservative who had been unjustly deprived of his office by the Liberal Government. That is the only instance within my recollection in which any change was made with respect to an official in the county of Pictou. There are numerous railway and other officials in the county which I have the honour to represent. Many of these are Liberals, and, so far as they chose, they have always exercised their right to vote, and have never been found fault with for so doing. Nay, they command the respect of the Conservatives of that county, on account of the manner in which they have adhered to their principles and their party. I may say that some of these gentlemen have even gone so far as to be active partisans. I have within my recollection a case in which a life-long Liberal, a station master on the Eastern Extension Railway, acted in a manner that would justify any one in characterizing his conduct as being disorderly in the extreme, and such as would warrant dismissal. Yet, so far as I know, no charge has been brought against him, and I am sure no charge will be brought against him by any member of the Liberal-Conservative party. Therefore, when the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) told this House that the Liberal-Conservatives had practically set up a reign of terror—these are his exact words, I think—in the province of Nova Scotia, he slandered that province, and he slandered the Liberal-Conservative party. Not only has there been no reign of terror there, but, as I say, Liberal officials who were appointed by the Liberal Government, when in power, have never been interfered with. Moreover, they have voted in perfect safety, and they are thought the more of because they exercised their right to vote. I know numerous cases in the town of New Glasgow. The station master in that town is a life-long Liberal. I have no doubt, and I believe no man in New Glasgow has any doubt, that he has always voted for his political friends; yet there has been no voice to accuse him or to find fault with him. The collectorship of customs in Pictou, the best office in the county, is held by a Liberal. I do not know whether he votes or not; but I do know that a subordinate of his, a gentleman named Russell, has always voted; and I am sure that if he were here, he would be glad to bear testimony to the fact that he has always done so without any interference whatever. In fact—I am sorry to have to say it—so far as the part of the province from which I come is concerned, the position of affairs is utterly at variance with the statement made by the Finance Minister. But when we come to consider who the Finance Minister is and what his career has been in the province of Nova Scotia, if the members of this House were as well acquainted with that hon. gentleman and his career as I am, they would share with me the wonder and amazement with which I heard the impassioned manner in which that gentleman poured forth to this House to-day a series of statements in which he himself could not have believed. That gentleman has not, at any time during his political career, shown any inaptitude or hesitancy in using the power held by him in Nova Scotia, as leader of the Government of that province, to advance the interests of his party. I would like that gentleman to mention any case in which he or the gentlemen who have supported him in Nova Scotia have ever appointed to an office of emolument one of their political opponents. Has he ever failed to draw more and more into the power of the local government the patronage of that province, and to use it as far as he could to advance the interests of his friends? Ever since 1867 the Liberals have held power in Nova Scotia, with the exception of four years, from 1878 to 1882; so that you may easily understand that in that province, almost without exception, every official is a supporter of the party to which the hon. Finance Minister belongs. Yet so anxious was he to make the very most of his power and position that when, after that brief interval, the Liberal party again came into power in Nova Scotia, they actually changed the law in order to bring into their own hands, and under their own control and disposal, the important office of sheriff in the various counties of the province; and from that time, whatever few appointments the Liberal-Conservative party had been able to make in the province, in the shape of registrars of deeds and prothonotaries, were open to the attack of every greedy office-hunter in the county in which they lived. Some of those registrars of deeds were placed on trial for the most paltry and petty offences, such as errors in counting the number of folios in documents which they registered; and if any petty offence could be proved against them, their heads came off. More than this, the hon. gentleman claimed a great deal of credit for the fact that he and his party had disfranchised Dominion officials in Nova Scotia, going so far as to represent that those officials were grateful to him for that act, and that some of the officials who were not disfranchised had come to him, and almost with tears in their eyes had implored him to put them in the same happy position. The hon. gentleman knows that when the Liberal-Conservative party held power in Nova Scotia, those people petitioned that party to restore to them those rights as men of which they had unjustly been deprived. He knows that the Liberal-Conservatives in Nova Scotia have introduced legislation to restore to those officials the franchise, and that that legislation has always been defeated by the gentleman who is Finance Minister of Canada to-day and the party who followed him. But when the occasion came, when the Liberal-Conservative party held control of the lower branch of the legislature, and when they passed an Act to restore that privilege, they failed to carry it into law, because the legislative council, which remained under the control of Mr. Fielding and his friends, refused to allow the lower branch of the legislature to do the act of justice. More than that, this hon. gentleman, who speaks so warmly of the improper conduct of his opponents, who sets up himself and his party as exemplars of the highest virtue and purity, did not hesitate to gerrymander the various counties of Nova Scotia in order to affect the political complexion of the county councils. They have not stopped at even smaller acts. They even passed an Act to prevent a political opponent from holding the small office of clerk of a county council in some cases. In one of the counties of Nova Scotia, first of all, in order to strike at one individual, an Act was passed declaring that no member of the Dominion House of Commons or Senate could hold the office of clerk of the county council. Then a new Act was passed providing that the partner of such an individual could not hold that office; and, to show to what an extreme of smallness these men are capable of descending, in spite of all their protestations of political virtue, they finally passed an Act providing that the clerk or employee of such a person could not be a clerk of the county council. I think this House ought to be grateful indeed to the hon. gentleman for giving it an opportunity to discover the breadth of statesmanship displayed by the Liberals of Nova Scotia. Now, Sir, I think I am perfectly safe in saying that I can repel with the utmost confidence the charge that the Liberal-Conservative party ever terrorized or attempted to terrorize over or interfere with any Dominion official whatever in the exercise of his franchise. I think I have made a very good case to show the character of these gentlemen who attempt to make these charges, presuming that because they are a thousand miles from the scene of their operations, distance may give them some security; but I think the evidence I have adduced here, which is incontrovertible and which is recorded in the statutes of the province of Nova Scotia, shows that these gentlemen are capable of descending to any base use of the legislature of a country over which they may have obtained control, for party advantages. But it may be said that possibly these gentlemen are honest and in earnest, that their zeal to disfranchise Dominion officials grew out of love and regard for those officials. Do they not say that those officials came to them in tears imploring to be protected; but, marvellous to relate, those bowels of compassion which they feel impelled to exercise towards their opponents are not moved at all in the case of their own supporters. The Dominion officials were protected by these gentlemen, but the local officials, of whom there are a great many more, were left unprotected. Marvellous to relate, though they came to these gentlemen on their knees and implored for protection, they were left to suffer from the evil consequences of having the franchise. The truth of the matter is that in this as in every other matter in which the two parties come into comparison and contrast, the professions of the Liberal party stand in inverso ratio to their performances. The more they cry purity, the less trouble you will have to discern the absence of whiteness on their shield; the more loudly they proclaim their adherence to everything good and pure, the more hastily you will button up your pocket, the more you will be on the alert, and the more carefully you will watch them, because the louder their assertions the worse their practices.

I have devoted as much time to the hon. gentleman and his career in Nova Scotia as is becoming, but I may say there are several chapters of these reminiscences which may be drawn upon, if necessary, in the future. Let us revert to the cause of our being engaged in this controversy now. What is it? It is the declaration of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) that, so far as he is concerned, and so far as he represents the Government of Canada, there is one unfortunate class in this country that does not appeal to them for protection or sympathy, or, even justice. What class is that? Is it the class that is best able to sustain the storms of evil fortune? Is it the class that is best able to protect itself? Is it the class that has the most resources to fall back on in the day of disaster? No, but, wonderful to relate, this Liberal Minister of Railways and Canals, this Minister of a Liberal Administration, coolly and in the most callous and heartless manner, affirms that where the stipend, the existence, the very life of the workingman hangs in suspense, there he has not time to inquire into the matter, but he deliberately hands the unfortunate man over to the machinery of his department to be decapitated without benefit of clergy or any other benefit whatever. I need scarcely say that this is an amazing revelation to those who might have been led to believe in the past that the Liberal party stands for the principles of Liberalism. So far, however, as my political education has gone—and I do not know but that I may be open to the charge which the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) made against the hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Quinn) to-day, that of being a chicken politician, who has no right to rise and set his opinion against the dictum of a Minister—but even if we be young in this House, we have learned in other fields as well as here something about the true inwardness of that party which claims to represent the true principles and spirit of Liberalism. I have heard in the legislature of Nova Scotia a very distinguished Liberal coolly and openly proclaim that the Liberal party was a great and good party and that the other party was made up of the common working people and the aristocrats, and that these had no claim whatever on the protection of the Liberal party. Now, that is a very strong doctrine, and we ought to thank the Minister of Railways for preaching it so frankly and openly. We did not expect, even if it were, as we have reason to believe, the policy of the Liberal party to treat their opponents without consideration and dismiss them, whenever it suited them, in order to put their own friends into positions, that a gentleman, occupying so high a position as the Minister of Railways, would proclaim, with such unblushing frankness, that, so far as he was concerned, the poor workingman had no rights which should be respected. I would not care to call upon the workingmen of the country to make capital of this somewhat extraordinary statement. I do not think that would be a proper act, because it would savour of appealing to them as a class; but I must say, as far as this side of the House is concerned, that the statement of the Minister of Railways meets with no response whatever. We do not, on this side, see any reason why the poor man who has to live on $1.15 per day, deserves no consideration whatever at the hands of the Administration and is to be handed over deliberately by the Administration to be destroyed and ruined, simply at the dictates of a defeated politician. Now the Minister of Railways, if he was not misrepresented, did say, in the course of his canvass in Queen's county, that railway men might vote as they liked, that, so far as he was concerned, no penalty would be visited on them for voting against the Administration or against him. I have not had time to verify the statement, but it was made openly, and I believe it is correct; and yet we find him here, just as soon as the workingmen have served his purpose, abandoning that most creditable position and deliberately announcing his set purpose to dismiss from office, without trial and without sympathy, every man whose head is demanded by any politician of the Liberal party, whether that politician be in office or has been refused a seat in Parliament by the people. A more dangerous doctrine I could not imagine. And yet, remarkable to relate, when hon. gentlemen on this side raise their voices in protest against this open, cold-blooded, unfeeling proclamation, they are greeted with laughter from the other side. The fact that they rose to make a solemn protest against such a doctrine was the ground apparently of well enjoyed merriment on the other side. I wonder do these hon. gentlemen think that this is a laughing matter for the thousands of workingmen who, according to the authority of the Minister of Railways, are existing in such a state of uncertainty, that, at any moment, their heads may be taken off. I wonder if any one of these workingmen, who have to look forward to a coming winter and keep house and maintain a family on their small allowance of $1.15 per day, will read that statement with laughter? Not so. It must be a most dreadful threat to those workingmen to learn that their chances of making a decent living depend on the accusation brought against them by some defeated politician, unsupported by any evidence and without inquiry of any kind. On such an accusation, without inquiry, brought against them by some man who has not been able to secure the confidence of the people, who has been discarded by his county, they are liable to be deprived of their means of existence. One hon. gentleman on the other side assumed that the doctrine had been accepted by this House, that those persons who took any part in politics were to be dismissed, and that the price of their continued existence in office was absolutely neutrality. That doctrine has not been accepted by any one on this side; and I need scarcely say that this heartless cruel extension of it, promulgated by the Minister of Railways, cannot meet with acceptance on this side, but must meet with our most indignant condemnation and protest. I had hoped that the Minister of Railways had declared this in an unguarded moment, but he repeated it twice or three times in the course of the afternoon. I would like to know on what basis the hon. gentleman draws the distinction he did. He told us that he drew the line so that it would exclude from the region of mercy and hopefulness the men who most required protection. If the workingmen should use his power in the state in the light of the statement made by the Minister of Railways that hon. gentleman would see that to this legislature very few hon. gentlemen will come who are capable of meeting with laughter the protests made against the announcement of the Minister of Railways to-day. On this side of the House, we cannot accept the doctrine enunciated by the hon. gentleman. We cannot allow the country to believe that we agree in the proposition that it is to be left to our opponents, to defeated politicians, in many cases, to dismiss without trial men who have come under their dislike and ill-will. To show how dangerous it is, take the case of the dismissals made in Pictou by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. That gentleman assured us, in the House, that he had grounds for dismissing Messrs. Noonan and Davies, because he knew they were active, aggressive and offensive politicians.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has no right to refer to a previous debate.

Mr. BELL. I presume this is rather strict ruling, not often applied, I think. I do not wish in any way to violate the rules. And I may say that there is every reason to believe that this power of accusing and condemning will be exercised, and exercised without the slightest attempt whatever to gain information in relation to the party accused. What is the motive in all these cases? Simply that the party has come into power and its adherents desire positions. That is the sentiment reflected in the speech of the hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Somerville). They say the Conservative party have been in power long enough; they have been in office eighteen years, and it is time they were dismissed, and now the Liberals are to have their turn. The consequence will be that men who have never made themselves obnoxious, who are prepared to state and prove that they have never taken an active part in politics, are going to be dismissed, and not because this is determined by the responsible Administration. This is the most disagreeable thing about the whole affair, for where the Administration does not shirk responsibility, some reply can be had to the accusation of injustice. But they do not assume responsibility. They say: We delegate our authority to behead these men to our supporters in the House or our defeated supporters in the country. Now, I am sure that it is not in the interest of Canada that any such doctrine should prevail. It is not a part of the platform of the Liberal-Conservative party to consent to the adoption of such a policy. I hope, and we have every reason to believe, that if, in some counties in this Dominion, this power is exercised as coldly, and unfeelingly, and as callously as, from the statement of the Minister of Railways, we might expect, there are other counties in which better feelings will prevail and better sentiments exist, and the officials there may hope to have their official existence spared through the kindness of their neighbours. Why should this Administration deliberately incur the odium of being converted into an executioner, in order to gratify the malignant, revengeful or greedy sentiments of the lowest and poorest class of politicians that are to be found in the Liberal ranks? It appears to me that, as a party, they cannot afford to take such a position. Let them be in this case, as they should be in everything else, guided by their best men, by those who occupy the highest positions in the estimation of the people of Canada, and not undertake the odium of being represented, or rather misrepresented, by those who have less claim to the consideration and respect of the people of this country. I think we should remember, in this matter, that there is one great interest to be considered, and that is the interests of the country. I believe in the whole people being served by these officers and employees—if there is to be a distinction between these two classes who have been thus named. The interests of the country demand that, no matter what party is in power, the guarantee should be given to every man engaged in the public service that he will be allowed to retain his position until good reason can be shown, after fair trial and an opportunity to rebut evidence, that he should be dismissed. And the Liberal-Conservative party are ready to take their stand upon that, and they do so, throwing back with indignant denial the charges of hon. gentlemen on the other side that they were guilty of wholesale dismissals. In 1879, after the Government of Sir John Macdonald came into power, all the changes, superannuations, removals and dismissals did not reach a total of 200. And the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie set for hon. gentlemen opposite, in this matter, as in many others, a good example that they might well follow, and that was that the dogs of destruction should not be let loose among the officials and employees in every county because the Liberals have been successful at the polls and have come into power. It is only for us to protest; we cannot do more. If it be the pleasure of hon. gentlemen opposite, and if there be no restraining influence, in their own party, if there be no better feeling prevailing among them, it is perfectly evident that they can carry on these dismissals. Under the doctrine laid down in this House by the hon. Minister of Railways, there is nothing controlling them in this matter, and nothing to prevent them dismissing every official appointed by the Liberal-Conservative party. And still, I find it hard to believe that the Liberal party will deliberately surrender itself to such a course as that marked out by my hon. friend. And most of all do I hesitate to believe that the Liberal party will deliberately inform the workmen of Canada that, while the official drawing such a salary as enables him to live in a style somewhat approaching gentility, is to be protected with something like care, the workingman, the horny-handed son of toil, as he is sometimes called, the bone and sinew of the country, as the Liberal party is fond of calling him, has no rights, no privilege, and that no justice is to be extended to him. I hesitate, and I will hesitate a long time, to believe that, in making this declaration, the Minister of Railways and Canals spoke for an undivided Cabinet. In the debate of yesterday, the facts showed a division existing in the ranks of the Cabinet on the question of the fast line, just as it was shown that they were divided on the question of Chinese immigration. So the facts, I think, will bring to the knowledge of the country that even in relation to these dismissals and the wholesale decapitation of officers, there is not a united Cabinet. I hope that is the case, that there is some better feeling and some more kindly influence in the Government, that all are not wedded to this heartless, cruel doctrine. Finally, the hon. Minister of Railways gave his reason for exercising his authority as he proposed to do. He said there were about 5,000 in his department, and it would be impossible for him to administer the affairs of the department and see that every man got justice. Surely the hon. gentleman must have anticipated that there was going to be a wholesale attack on the officers. If all the place-holders appeal to him at once, of course, he could not find time to hear the cases. But is it possible that the whole railway and canal service is to be thrown open to the thugs and the despoilers? I would fain hope that forty or fifty cases would be all that would arise. Is it possible the Minister says he is administering that department and will not take time to try the cases of forty or fifty poor workmen? Has it come to this, that at this time of day, the material things handled by his department, the ties, rails, and so on, the inanimate part of his department, appeal to the hon. Minister more strongly than do the hearts, the flesh and blood of the poor employees entrusted to his care?

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). I am more than surprised to see that the hon. member from Pictou (Mr. Bell) works himself into such heat at the very thought of the present Liberal Government doing anything for the Liberals of Pictou county. He told this House, with the greatest emphasis, that the Liberals were determined to cut off the heads of the officials of the county of Pictou without benefit of clergy. Well, I tell the hon. member for Pictou that the time is not long since when the very men with whom he is now associated cut off his head without calling in a clergyman, either. Sir, the time is not long since, I say, when he had to fall back upon the friends of the Minister of Finance, when his present associates declared that he was not wanted in the county of Pictou when he resigned his seat in the local legislature in order to secure a nomination in that fine county. I say to the hon. gentleman, and to his associates also, that it was well for him, then, that the Minister of Finance was not such a political bigot as to call upon his friends in the fine county of Pictou—the Liberals in that county—to refuse to support that gentleman in his dire extremity, when his friends had abandoned him. The hon. the Finance Minister, then the Premier of Nova Scotia, who had great influence in that province, and still has, permitted the Liberals of Pictou to come to the rescue of the hon. gentleman when his friends failed to nominate him in that county. The Liberals of Pictou manfully stood by that hon. gentleman on that occasion, manfully voted for him, and saved—his deposit.

An hon. MEMBER. When was that.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). In 1887. The hon. gentleman, following in the footsteps of some other leading gentlemen in that party, came back to the party, and is now one of the most docile supporters of the leader of the Opposition among hon. gentlemen opposite. I remember the time when I had a seat in the local legislature of Nova Scotia, and when the hon. gentleman held a position in that House in opposition to the Administration led by the Minister of Finance. I was elected on that occasion as a supporter of that hon. gentleman. Like himself I abandoned that party, but unlike him I will never go back to it. On that occasion I was associated with one of the most respected members of that legislature, and who still occupies a seat in it, namely, Mr. Alexander Campbell, the present member for Inverness. That gentleman and myself, and the member for the county of Halifax, were constrained by sheer force of the requirements of our constituents, to abandon the lead of that hon. gentleman, and to support the policy of the Minister of Finance in a measure which saddled the province of Nova Scotia with a debt of one and a half millions, namely, half the gross debt with which that hon. gentleman's administration is now charged by the Conservatives of Nova Scotia, as being so recklessly incurred. We, elected as Conservatives, I say, were constrained by sheer force of the needs of our constituents, to support the administration of the Finance Minister on that occasion. I therefore think that it is only due to the hon. Minister of Finance to say that two of the leading counties in the province of Nova Scotia electing Conservative representatives, were obliged to support the administration of that hon. gentleman upon its most important measures. And need I give a better testimony of the manner in which that hon. gentleman administered the affairs of Nova Scotia than to tell the hon. member for Pictou that out of 38 members of the local legislature to-day, there are only seven or eight Tories in the whole body? And yet the Minister of Finance led the government of that province for the past fourteen years. Is this House to be told, then, and through this House the country, that the hon. Minister of Finance led the government of Nova Scotia unsuccessfully and to the detriment of the interests of that fine province. I say the very fact of that hon. gentleman having at his back three-fourths of the representatives of the people of Nova Scotia when he took the honourable position of Finance Minister of Canada, should be a sufficient certificate of the character of his administration, and should weigh much more with this House than any objections the hon. member for Pictou can present. Now, with regard to Liberals being determined to cut off the heads of Tory officials, I say that I can only admire the square and fair manner in which the hon. Minister of Railways declared his reasons for dismissing certain parties in the employment of that department. In that respect he differs widely from others who dismissed much more important officials, but had not the manliness to come before this House or before the country, and give their true reasons. I will give an instance of this in connection with the Intercolonial Railway. The Eastern Nova Scotia terminus of the Intercolonial Railway is at Port Mulgrave, on the Strait of Canso. A steamer connects the Island of Cape Breton with Nova Scotia proper, and constitutes a portion of the Intercolonial Railway, inasmuch as it ferries passengers and freight from one side of the Strait of Canso to the other, and from one train to the other, from the Nova Scotia side to the Cape Breton side. On the Cape Breton side there are two termini. At one of these termini was appointed by the Dominion Administration, a Liberal, namely, George C. Lawrence, Esq., a gentleman who is a most efficient officer, by the way, a brother of the Speaker of the House of Assembly in Nova Scotia, educated and of excellent ability. It was found rather inconvenient to take that man squarely by the official throat. But other means were found, not the frank, fair, square and manly way declared by the Minister of Railways this evening, but a round-about way, a measure, and a manner that enabled the leader of the then Government to protest against the party being guilty of this, that and the other heinous crime against political decency. It was done in this way: Commands were given from headquarters that Port Hastings was no more to be the railway terminus of that ferry steamer, that the railway steamer, as it is called, was no longer to stop at Port Hastings. Mr. Lawrence then found that he was—his official head cut off as this is now-a-days called—out of office. In order to give their action a show of decency, a few months were permitted to elapse, and lo and behold! a brand new Tory official starts up and ensconces himself in the office of the railway agent at Port Hastings, and is there to this hour. I would ask the hon. leader of the Opposition if he would solemnly protest against my recommending to this Government a measure of the same description being meted out to every gentleman who holds office in that way now. I say to this Government that the people of Inverness would consider that I was recreant to my duty as their representative if I failed to ask this Government to dismiss partisan officials in my county. In regard to the statement made with respect to the line of demarcation between partisan and non-partisan officials, I hold that public opinion is the court of last resort, and the electors of Inverness County have sent me here to ask among other needed reforms the Liberal Government of Canada to dismiss any partisan official in my county, and I feel that this Government can safely rely upon public opinion in that county not to command anything in this regard to offend public or political decency. The leader of the Opposition and the hon.

member for Pictou invaded my county at three points in last May, during the heat of the campaign, surrounded by an escort of individuals, seven out of ten of whom were Dominion officials, and he and the then Solicitor General predicted, and did their utmost endeavours to secure, my defeat; and why I ask should I now heed their protests in regard to dismissals of these same partisan officials however solemnly and emphatically these may be made. I say here and now that it is unreasonable in these gentlemen to expect me to pay heed to these solemn protests in view of the action of those partisan officials, the leader of the Opposition being my best witness as to their guilt, at the same time declaring that I would not be elected. I ask if it would be unreasonable for me to ask for the dismissal of the partisan officials who went around with the leader of the Opposition in the steamer "Blue Hill," when they invaded my constituency and announced that I would be defeated by the then representative who had been in Parliament eighteen years. They declared I would be left at home; but I am here to represent the county of Inverness, and also to declare that I will ask the present Government to dismiss partisan officials, and I call upon the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) to say whether or not seven out of the ten men forming the escort of the leader of the Opposition on that occasion were not Dominion officials? I recall also a party paper published at Port Hawkesbury, containing a portrait of the leader of the Opposition and of my opponent, declaring that the Conservatives would be successful at the elections of 23rd June, describing the magnificent success which had attended the leader's political tour in my county, and depicting in glowing terms the procession that escorted him from Port Hood to the steamer "Blue Hill" to the stirring strains of the pibroch, the tune being equally soul-stirring: "Wha will be king but Charlie." Bonnie Prince Charlie was a pretender to the throne of England. He never became king, however; and history only repeats itself, because the coronation in the case under consideration has been indefinitely postponed. There are Government telegraph lines running through a great portion of my county, and there are six Government telegraph offices, but at the present time there is not a Liberal holding one of them. The office at Margaree, where I reside, was in the hands of a Liberal, but was turned out two or three weeks before the elections, and there was not one operator I could trust to send a message as the instrument was removed to the office of the most violent Tory in the county of Inverness. With respect to Nova Scotia officials, I must say—and I appeal to other Liberal members from that province to endorse my statement—the strongest charge that the Liberals have made and are making to-day against the Finance Minister and his Government is that he was too conservative with respect to retaining Tories in office under his government. One of the first speeches I ever delivered in the local assembly of Nova Scotia was against the measure to which the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) alluded, and that was with respect to sheriffs. My first public utterance was a protest against that measure. I am happy to say that my predictions on that occasion failed of being realized; for at the present time there is a vigorous Tory official as high sheriff of Inverness, who has held office under the provincial government for the past fourteen years. I need scarcely give stronger proof of his partisanship than the fact that he was appointed by my predecessor as returning officer in his county. We have a Liberal majority in the municipal council of Inverness, but we have a Tory treasurer there, we have a Tory judge of probate, and we have a Tory registrar of probate. These are the principal offices in the gift of the government of Nova Scotia in that county.

Mr. LISTER. Are these men under a Liberal Government?

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). Don't say anything about it, Sir, but they are. In view of the fact that these questions have very little to do with the subject with which the House has most to deal, I shall not occupy any more of your attention but will later have some further observations to make in reference to more important subjects.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. It is opportune, Sir, to say something about the general principle that should govern the dismissal of officials from the civil service of Canada. When the question came up in the early part of the session, the purely partisan state of the case was emphasized. There was a marked difference of opinion amongst hon. gentlemen as to whether the partisanship of the Ontario civil service was more offensive than the partisanship of the Dominion civil service, and vice versa. In the two cases cited in the previous debate upon the subject, namely, the case of the registrar of one of the divisions of Toronto, and the case of the librarian of the provincial legislature, I know that both these gentlemen have an active, continuous, and very lively interest, not only in provincial but in Dominion politics as well. In the event of a change in the political complexion of the Ontario legislature I do not think that either of those gentlemen could or would complain if they were asked to step down and out. It is all right for an office-holder to say: I will exercise my rights, I will go on the platform, I will talk for my candidate, I will use all my influence and if my party goes down I am ready to do down with it. But, Sir, it seems to me that there is something more important than the interests of the office-holder, if we are to have any approach to the system that is in vogue in the United States.

I doubt not that the Liberal members of this House have good reason to complain of the activity—to use a very mild term—of many of the Dominion civil servants. If I were a revengeful man I too would have complaints, because during the last election, the custom-house, the inland revenue office, and the post office were all committee rooms for my opponent. If the Liberal members of this House have their grievances I have mine, but notwithstanding all our grievances, I would urge the Government to establish the principle, that no civil servant should be an active partisan, but to establish it by not punishing those who have sinned in the past. I maintain that the civil servant has no right in politics beyond the right to vote, and the right to express his opinions in private conversation. The Government owe something to the independent voters of this country. The Government owe something to such of the independent newspapers as were reasonably fair to them when opposition. These papers have spoken for themselves, their utterances agree with the sentiments that I now express, and I believe that my sentiments express the honest convictions of the independent people of this country. Now, Sir, this reform in the civil service cannot be carried out by the dismissal of one set of offensive partisans of one political colour, and the appointing to their places of another set of offensive partisans of a different political colour. The precedent which this Government will make in the present case, will stand as an influence for good or for evil for all time to come in Canadian politics. I do not recollect in my forty years' experience as a close observer of Canadian politics—and my memory goes back to the days when the old Parliament of Canada met in Toronto in 1856—I say that I do not recollect ever having heard a more unique, surprising, and unprecedented statement than that which fell from the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) this afternoon. And when I look at that hon. gentleman with his kindly and benevolent face, I can hardly credit that his own views are these which he announced on the floor of this House. I only hope that when he sleeps over the matter, he will act as the First Minister did in connection with the Chicago "Record" interview; I hope that he will very materially modify his views. I can tell the Minister of Railways and Canals, that his statement will be a great surprise to the workingmen of Ontario, a great surprise to the workingmen of East Toronto, in which I need hardly say, a very large number of the working-people of that city reside. It is a good thing we have no Government railways in Ontario, but we have canals and other public works there, and I do trust that the Minister will not carry out his intentions with regard to the workmen of Ontario as he has done with regard to the workmen down in the eastern provinces. If the Minister of Railways is going to introduce these methods into the administration of the Dominion of Canada, then all I can say is: "God help the Dominion of Canada." I am not saying for a moment that the Government would act unjustly in dismissing active and open enemies; but if the Government should do anything in that direction, it will be a precedent that will encourage the next Government—unless the present Government hang on to power forever—it will encourage the next Government to do more, and the next Government more, and the next Government still more, in the same line. How can we hope for a reform in the civil service if such a precedent is laid down. The safeguards of our civil service will be swept away, and our politics will be degraded into a petty squabble over the right to peddle out offices which are opened by every change of Government. The Government can now establish a precedent that will prevent similar offences in the future without making a gallows to hang the unfortunate sinners who have offended in the past.

Mr. MILLS. When I entered Parliament in 1887, I was taught by the Liberal-Conservative leaders of that day, that no Government official should be dismissed unless there was a proper charge of malfeasance brought against him and sustained. My county of Annapolis was smarting at that time, under the unjust dismissal of a number of its prominent officials by the then local government—I refer more particularly to the high sheriff and to the registrar of deeds—it was smarting as I say under the dismissal of those two officials, men who were eminent as citizens, high in social position in the county, men respected by all classes, but whose positions were desired by the partisans that were bolstering up the local government of Nova Scotia in the county of Annapolis at that date. These officials were dismissed, one upon a most paltry charge—the charge that in the deeds and other documents which he was recording in the registry office he had not counted the exact number of words in the folios for which he charged. Before an unprejudiced and unbiassed man, on the testimony that was brought out, the charges could not be sustained, and were not sustained by the very best people in the county of Annapolis, Liberals and Conservatives alike. Smarting as I say our people were under these gross dismissals of officials, many of them came to me and asked me to dismiss this preventive officer, and that clerk or collector of customs, this postmaster and that postmaster, all Grits. There were no less than three dozen such officials, open and active Liberals, men who took an active part in all the revision courts on behalf of

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON.

Liberals, who were chairmen of committees, who attended all the caucuses of the Liberal party in the county of Annapolis, who were prominent in everything that was done in the interest of that party. My people came to me and said, "We want these people dismissed." I will mention the names of some of them: Edgar Porter, collector of customs at Thorn's Cove; Augustus Fullerton, collector of customs in the county of Annapolis; Warden Roop, warden of the county of Annapolis, postmaster at Clementsport. There was Elliott, the late postmaster at Port George, a man who was so violent a partisan that in 1887 the only insult I ever received in the county of Annapolis—and it was a most desperate fight that we had in 1887—I received from this man. Charges were brought against him. I came to the leaders of the Liberal-Conservative party in the Dominion Parliament and asked them to dismiss this man. They said, "Bring a charge against him, and have that charge sustained, and we will dismiss him." I went back to my people and told them that. I said, "The policy of the Liberal-Conservative Government is to dismiss no man unless there is a charge of malfeasance brought against him, sustained and proved." That was done time and time again. I could mention more of these names. Not one single man has been dismissed in the county of Annapolis since 1887; and, as I have said, there were no less than about three dozen Liberals acting as postmasters, collectors of customs, preventive officers, and lighthouse keepers in that county. But now, forsooth, the political morality of the Dominion is to be thrown back twenty years, and by whom? By no less than the local premiers of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, who have been wallowing around in their little mud holes for the last eighteen years, and doing those very things they want this Dominion Parliament now to do.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Not in New Brunswick.

Mr. MILLS. Yes, and in Nova Scotia as well. I know of my own knowledge that this has been done in Nova Scotia; and now the defeated candidate in Annapolis writes up to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and alleges that certain officials in that county have been active partisans against him, and that he wants them dismissed in order to put in—whom? The most degraded of political partisans. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries smiles. I will mention one man's name.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, I would not mention the name.

Mr. MILLS. This man is so insignificant that I will not mention his name.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. MILLS. I will not mention his name, as my leader has asked me not to do so; but I am not afraid, so far as the county of Annapolis is concerned, to mention his name. The man who has circulated that petition against this official, is one of the most degraded human beings in the county of Annapolis; he has been shown to be so in the courts. This is the man who seeks to be put in the place of a man the only charge against whom is that he voted for me and did not vote for the Hon. Mr. Longley. It was a shock to me when I heard the Minister of Railways to-day rise and say, We will do thus and so with reference to these officials. I tell you the better sense of the Liberals of this Dominion will be against this, and I have no doubt the late local premier of New Brunswick will rather modify his statements, as other statements have been modified already in this House.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Mr. Speaker, I think I must have been singularly unfortunate in giving expression to the views I entertain as to the proper method of dealing with charges against officials and persons in the Intercolonial service, if the strictures which have been made by some of our hon. friends opposite are at all warranted by the statement which I made to the committee. I was interrogated by hon. gentlemen opposite on the subject of two or three dismissals which had taken place since I assumed the administration of the department; and, being catechised as to the principle upon which I acted, in these dismissals, and as to the methods on which I proposed to act so long as I held the office, I stated to the committee, as I thought, clearly and frankly, the views which I entertained and by which I hoped to be guided in the future. And, Sir, when it is assumed by hon. gentlemen opposite that I discriminated between the class of officials in the railway service who hold the better offices and the offices to which the greater emoluments are attached, and those who are temporary and from day to day labourers, and that I discriminated unfavourably to the latter, I do think that hon. gentlemen opposite have unwarrantably and unfairly interpreted the language I employed. I did point out that in dealing with employees in this department, I must necessarily be guided by a different rule in treating with that vast class who may be characterized as temporary or day-labourers, from the rule that should be applied to those who fill permanent official positions, who might be said to be in the civil service of the country. I have no desire in my heart to discriminate unfairly against any class in the public service. I have no disposition in mind, heart or thought to deal unfairly by the labouring class. It would be the last thing which I would be guilty of doing. I have not the slightest intention of meting out to any class of the public employees anything but the fullest measure of justice. I am not appearing here in a public capacity for the first time in my life. I have a somewhat lengthy public record behind me. For a long time I have been responsible, in a considerable measure, for the legislation which has been placed upon the statute-books of New Brunswick, and I can point with the utmost confidence and with some pride to that legislation, during a period of fourteen years as showing that it is dotted with measures having for their object the improvement and the protection of the interests of the labouring classes. I invite hon. gentlemen opposite to make that investigation of these statutes, with the utmost and unbounded confidence, and I do not fear that when any statements which I have made in this House to-day come to the knowledge of those who have watched my public course, they will not interpret anything I have said as unfavourable to the great labouring classes of the country, nor will they believe that my administration is likely to be wanting in justice or fair play to them. There is this difficulty which will confront any man who administers the office I have the honour to hold. There are in that department hundreds, and indeed thousands of persons who fill, in the fullest and largest sense, temporary positions in the employ of the Government. They cannot be classified as belonging to the civil service, or as being permanent employees of the Government, but they are dotted all over the counties in the maritime provinces, and, so far as our canals are concerned, all over Ontario and Quebec. I feel that, when responsible men, whether they are representatives in this House or have been deemed worthy of being the standard-bearers of the great Liberal party, give me the positive assurance, upon their word of honour and on their personal knowledge, that any of these temporary employees, as I have described them, have been active partisans in the elections, and have departed from the policy of neutrality, which it is the duty of the lowest, as well as the highest, employees of the Government to observe, I think I am justified in taking these men at their word and in dealing with them as being guilty of the charges made against them. It would be absolutely impossible for me, or any one filling this position, to institute the same close, minute character of judicial inquiry which I would be able to make if I had only to deal with two or three hundred permanent officials of the Government, under continual official supervision. Into the cases which have been the subject of this debate, those of Roderick McLeod and McKay, I invite the closest scrutiny, confident that such scrutiny will furnish evidence that I have dealt with them in a fair, judicial spirit. I have no personal desire to cut off any man's head who is in the service of the country. I take no pleasure in seeking to deprive any one of his employment or office. For fourteen years I was in the Government of New Brunswick, and during all that time I never once, without the weightiest cause, took upon myself to interfere with any man's tenure of office, and during all that period there were men whom I retained in office under me, who were strong, though of course not active, political opponents of mine. I am, therefore, not bringing with me from the province of New Brunswick any disposition at all to pursue a severe or rigorous course with regard to the employees in the public service. Now, what did I do in the two cases to which the hon. member for Pictou called particular attention? There is no one in this House who will not admit that Mr. Macdonald is a responsible man. There is no one in this House whose personal assurance and statement would be accepted more readily than that of Mr. Macdonald, barrister, who was the opponent of the hon. member for Pictou. When he wrote to me to say that these two men had had been active in the campaign and should be removed, I wrote to him and said I trusted he was not making the statements without having every assurance of their accuracy. I said to him: I want you to satisfy yourself beyond the shadow of a doubt that what you say is true, and I trust that you will only ask me to sanction these removals until you have convinced yourself and can give your personal guarantee that what you state against these men is perfectly true. He assured me, in reply, that he knew, from his own personal and actual knowledge, that these two persons had been active partisans in the campaign. I do not care, Mr. Chairman, what may be the opinions of hon. gentlemen on the other side as to the fairness of my treatment of these two men. I want to say and I am prepared to take the responsibility, as the head of this department, of acting upon this principle, that, when it is brought to my knowledge, when I am satisfied—acting as I am determined to act, in a spirit of fair-play and justice to all—that a man, whether his position be high or low, whether he fills the office of a temporary employee or is a permanent employee, has acted as these men were said to have acted, has entered actively into the campaign and chosen to put his official life into the hands of his opponents, then I am prepared, as the head of this department, to dispense with the services of such a man. I feel myself justified in this, because I do not think that we can carry on party government, as we have been carrying it on in times past, if we act in any other way or upon any other principle. It is all very well for our hon. friends opposite, who have filled every department of the public service with their own appointees to cry out against the adoption of this rule, when it operates against them, and when by crying out against it they hope to reap some political advantage. Why have they not applied this principle in times past, when they had it in their power to do so? Talk about 200 persons only being removed at the time or following the defeat of the Mackenzie Government. Two hundred—it is ridiculous to us who know the actual facts to make such a statement. Why, the heads of unoffending Liberals fell in all directions, and without the shadow of a judicial inquiry. I have in my possession the sworn declarations of gentlemen who were thus treated, gentlemen of the highest character and credibility, who have satisfied me, and will satisfy the public, if the occasion offers, that they were not dealt with in the judicial manner in which persons ought to be dealt with who are permanently employed in the public service. The evidence of this lies on every hand. I say it is not unreasonable that the Liberals of this country, who have during even the whole period of Conservative administration constituted at least one-half of the population of Canada, should have some share in the civil service and in the patronage of the Government of the country. When a charge is made and sustained—I do not say by any process of official inquiry, held by myself personally, because that cannot be available—when a responsible Minister is satisfied by evidence which is at his hand, or which he receives from persons upon whom he may rely, that any employee of the Government, against whom a complaint is made, has violated this principle of neutrality, has been an active and violent partisan, has entered into a campaign against his opponents, no one can complain, least of all those on the other side, if the Government exercises its undoubted right to dispense with the services of that man. Before I take my seat, I wish to give the information to the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) concerning which he called my attention this afternoon, and which he says he asked me for a few days since. I have referred to "Hansard," and have procured the names of the persons he spoke of. I find that the following are the names of those for whom he inquired:—

John G. McDougall, R. McLean, Hugh McPherson, D. A. McDougall, James Landry, John Morrell, D. R. McLean.

The hon. gentleman asked me whether or not these persons have been dismissed from the Intercolonial. I may say that I was not aware, and personally I am not now aware, as to whether or not these persons were dismissed. I have been informed by the Deputy Minister of the department that John G. McDougall, R. McLean, Hugh McPherson, D. A. McDougall, James Landry, John Morrell and D. R. McLean were seven carpenters employed in repairing bridges and stations on the line between New Glasgow and Port Mulgrave. As soon as the work on which they were engaged was completed, in July last, their services were dispensed with, which caused no vacancies, as they were merely extra carpenters; however, John McGillivray, Wm. F. McDonald, John J. McDougall and John McDonald have been employed for the last two days in putting in a culvert near Pine Hill bridge, about four miles east of New Glasgow. There have been no dismissals for political causes approved by me, except these two, and another that I spoke of this afternoon, in which I acted on the strong representations and statements of an hon. member of this House, that the person against whom he made this charge had been actively participating in the elections. These are the only three cases of which I have knowledge. If gentlemen opposite choose to characterize the statement I make, as to the course I ought to pursue, as a mean course, as an unworthy course, I can only make them a present of their judgment and opinion upon the question. I can truly say that I do not set a high value upon the opinion which they entertain of what is a manly and honourable course. I think it infinitely more manly and more honourable than the course which hon. gentlemen opposite unquestionably pursued in their administration of the railway department in this country. That is not too much to say, for, as the hon. Finance Minister stated this afternoon, there was a system of terrorism prevailing from one end of the line of railway to the other. The workman or employee who was in sympathy with the Liberal party dare not whisper the fact to his nearest neighbour. He dare not let it be breathed, lest he should be dismissed the service, or that means would be taken to prevent him exercising his franchise. I think it is infinitely meaner to resort to expedients to prevent a citizen of this country, upon whom the law has conferred the franchise, from casting his ballot freely. I think it is infinitely meaner treatment, and I prefer being classed as mean and brutal among the men who will take pains to satisfy their honest judgment as respects a charge made against a servant of the public—no matter whether he be high or low—and, if satisfied, acts upon the conclusion at which he then arrives, rather than with these truly honourable men who terrorize the independent electors of the country who happen to be in the Government employ. One word to the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell). I was correctly reported when I was represented as saying that, so long as I remained at the head of this department, so long as I was capable of exercising any influence over its administration, I would see to it that the men employed by the department are left free to cast their ballots according to their honest judgment. I never will sanction or permit the use of any means to deprive them of that privilege. If the labouring classes of the country are led by the misinterpretation of my words and meaning persisted in by gentlemen opposite to think me capable of treating them unjustly, then I am afraid I must allow them to retain that judgment and entertain that opinion.

Mr. DYMENT. It may be on account of my youth, but for whatever the reason, it seems to me, I am more appreciative of a joke than some hon. members of this House. To me it seems extremely funny to observe the righteous indignation of these hon. gentlemen on this side of the House on behalf of the poor workingman. And yet all the time they were in power, during the last eighteen years, almost every man employed under them has been nothing but a slave. These men could not even exercise the right to vote as they saw fit. I have instances of this here to which I wish to draw the particular attention of the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills). The hon. gentleman says he came into this House in 1887, I think. The policy of the Conservative party at that time, he says, was that before an official could be dismissed, a complaint must be made and the charge investigated and substantiated. Now, in that very year, 1887, occurred an incident that proved the contrary. In 1884, one of the officials in the Customs Department was removed from Winnipeg to Port Arthur. In 1887, he was summarily dismissed. If I may be permitted, I will read an extract from his letter:

In 1884 I was sent to Port Arthur from Winnipeg in the Customs service to assist Collector Nicholson, who was the only officer at that port at the time. I was there until the close of 1887, when I was dismissed to make room for a secretary of the Conservative Association of Port Arthur, and one of their most zealous workers. In all my time in the Customs service I took no part in politics whatever, but somehow they found me out and I had to go.

The sleuth hounds were on his track. They found that he had voted Liberal, and he had to go. He asked the reason, and this is what was written by the head of the Customs Department, Sir Mackenzie Bowell:

Department has a high appreciation of your services as an officer, but the Government could not overlook the claims of the Port Arthur Conservatives.

Mr. SPROULE. Name.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPROULE. I rise to a point of order. I want to know if the hon. gentleman is not bound to give the name of the writer. I believe that the rules provide for that.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not understand that the hon. gentleman is bound to give the name of the writer of a private letter.

Mr. DYMENT. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) was asked to give the name. At first, he said he would, but his friends behind him told him not to, and he did not.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me that no judge in any court would allow a letter to be read without requiring it to be filed, and the name of the signer to be given. Although I know of no case such as this laid down in our procedure, at the same time, I am quite sure, Mr. Chairman, that no hon. member should read a letter in this House bringing evidence to bear as to the truth of what he is stating to this House, without necessarily laying that letter upon the Table, or at least giving the name of the writer. I do not believe any hon. member who has been in this House for a number of years, would dispute that position.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). An hon. gentleman has a right to read a letter in this House, and it goes for what it is worth. But no one has a right to ask him for the date or for the name.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER. On this point I will quote from Bourinot, at page 407 :

It has been laid down by the highest authorities that when a Minister of the Crown quotes a public document in the House and founds upon it an argument or assertion, that document, if called for, ought to be produced. But it is allowable to repeat to the House information which is contained in a private communication. When such private papers are quoted in the House, there is no rule requiring them to be laid on the Table. The rule respecting the production of public papers, quoted by a Minister of the Crown, is necessary to give the House the same information he possesses, and enable it to come to a correct conclusion on a question. It does not appear that the English Commons has ever applied this rule to the case of private members citing public documents not in the possession of the House.

Mr. DYMENT. If the committee will allow me, I will read a quotation from another letter. It is from a gentleman asking to be reinstated, if possible, to an office in my riding, a postmaster in one of the towns.

The position had been taken from me by Mr. Macdonell, the late Conservative member, and the reason given by him, which the Post Office Inspector informed me, was that I had gone Grit in the preceding election.

Now, I would like the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) to consider that carefully and digest it.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman would, after having cited these instances, give us the names of the persons who have written the letters so that we might have recourse to the documents and investigate the matter, it might be found that quite a different set of circumstances surrounded each of these cases from what is given in the correspondence from the gentlemen themselves. The portion that was read in each case was simply a statement by the person who had been dispossessed of the office, giving his reason therefor. But, certainly, as every member of the House knows, the value to be attached to testimony of that kind shrinks into insignificance unless there is an opportunity, first, to know who the person is, then to have a chance of referring to the records in order to find out the whole facts of the case. The hon. gentleman can keep the names to himself if he chooses, but he thereby diminishes the worth of the testimony he has been trying to adduce. If he wants to have the case fairly decided, let him give the names of these two officials.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want briefly to recall to the committee the manner in which this discussion started, and to some phases of it. Most of the hon. gentlemen opposite, without attempting to go into the merits of the question which has been raised, have been trying to take a wider range and to carry the discussion on over the whole question of dismissals by different parties. That is not germane to the question, though it may be interesting. But it appears as if all who spoke on that side of the House felt themselves obliged to keep as far away as possible from the real statement made by the hon. gentleman, and the principle which he laid down as the one upon which his practice would be carried out. I think they were wise in doing that. I think the leader of the Government was wise in sitting still and saying nothing. I think the other members of the Government were wise, the most of them, in sitting still and saying nothing, and the one who did speak in straying as far as possible from the question at issue. Now, if the committee have attended carefully to the statements of the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals, they will have noticed that there has been at once a great difference and at the same time a great similarity between them. The hon. gentleman arose the second time and introduced his remarks by asserting his determination to do justice to every class of persons, to labouring men as well as others. That is a good sentiment, and everybody will approve of it. He then cited his fourteen years of provincial service, in which he said that he had done a great many things for the labouring man. I am not so well acquainted with his provincial course as other gentlemen who are in this House, and for the time being I do not propose to touch that question at all. But my hon. friend had not proceeded far until he re-affirmed the statement that he made in the afternoon, and out of which this whole discussion has arisen. And what was that statement? Baldly it was that the man who was engaged on a railway in a temporary capacity at a dollar or a dollar and a fraction thereof per day, was a man who would be dismissed, if he were complained against, and would be dismissed without any investigation, whilst those who held a higher position and got a larger salary, and were more permanent, would have extended to them the courtesy and the right of having an official investigation, and would not be dismissed until the result of that investigation was known. Now, my hon. friend himself will not deny that, he reaffirmed this in his last remarks. He affirmed again what he stated in that respect, and he affirmed it in almost the same words. Now, I take issue with him there. The point arose about four men whom he said he had dismissed, and when I asked the hon. gentleman whether they had been dismissed for political reasons, with an impression in my mind that they had not been dismissed for political reasons, he baldly stated that they had been dismissed, and that they had been dismissed on representations made, not from officers of his department, not on charges which were preferred and which were investigated as well as preferred, but that they had been dismissed because a defeated candidate, forsooth, had told him that these men were opposed to him during the last election. Now, I say that we ought calmly to look at the principle thus laid down. And looking at it, what will happen if the practice is founded upon it, either in the hon. gentleman's department alone, or in the other departments of the Government? What is the principle that he lays down? Surely the poor man who is a temporary worker at $1 or $1.25 a day, has the same interest in his little work as the other man doing a larger work has in his larger work; in each case it is the living of the man. The labouring man who works for $1 or $1.25 a day, his whole stake is in that work, and on its payment he maintains his family and gets his living. It is just as important to him in his capacity as the $800, or the $1,000, or the $2,000 is to a higher official in his capacity, and he ought to be surrounded with just the same safeguards as the man in the higher capacity. I think there can be no dissent from that on principle and upon even justice. But under the principle which the hon. gentleman proposes to adopt, and for which he urges the virtue of frankness so far as temporary employees are concerned, it is that the labouring man who works with pick and shovel and who receives but $1 or $1.25 per day, is a case of a quite different fashion. The hon. gentleman has not time in his case to make investigation. He simply submits this principle for the acceptance of the House—that because a great many men are interested in a certain thing justice shall not be done, but where only a few are particularly interested, their views shall be considered. This means that justice shall not be done because there are many of them, but the great man's attention can be given to the demands of the few, not to the demands of the mass. I will submit to the hon. gentleman a certain way to get rid of that responsibility, which is, not to disturb the poor labouring man. He has been engaged in his work on the road. He has worked faithfully, and to the satisfaction of the section boss and the superintendent. He has exercised his right to vote, as he had a perfect right to do, and because he did not vote for a certain party or candidate, the hon. Minister says that the representations of that candidate, whether he be successful or non-successful, are quite sufficient; that he, the Minister, has not time to hear their cases or to deal out fair and even-handed justice, because there are so many of them. The hon. Minister tries to get rid of his responsibility by saying that these cases are too small, and that, in carrying out so great a department, he cannot go down to section men on the railway and investigate their cases, but that they will be summarily dismissed, if they happen to have voted for some person who is not a party supporter of the hon. Minister. If the hon. gentleman had confined himself to members of Parliament as regards making representations in these matters, he would not have been so far astray. A representative sitting in this Parliament has a certain position that a defeated candidate does not and cannot possess. He at least is the choice of his party, he at least is the representative of his people here, and in that capacity his representations have a certain weight which would not otherwise attach to them; and if the hon. Minister had stated his proposal with respect to those principles to be that if a member of Parliament, as a representative man, stated to him and convinced him that certain public employees had taken an active and offensive part in the campaign and they should be dismissed, and he subsequently dismissed them, he would not have been so far astray, but even then he should hear the man's case. There is, moreover, this important point, that a representative holding a seat in Parliament can be questioned about this matter and made responsible for his answer, and held responsible to the people in a parliamentary sense. But the hon. Minister goes further, and says that any defeated candidate, no matter who he may be, who has made a claim to represent the people, and where the people have refused to elect him to represent them, has simply to tell him that these poor labouring men voted against him, and their heads will be cut off, and some other men will be employed. That is a principle and practice which I do not think the good sense of the Liberals or Conservatives in this country will approve, and it is a practice which I am very sorry to hear the hon. gentleman state is to be put into practice in the great department over which he presides. Let me ask, what is the direct influence of a course of that kind? It is simply this. My young friend who has just come into Parliament has truly stated that hon. gentlemen opposite have declared that the employee of the Liberal-Conservative Government was a slave. Hon. gentlemen opposite have declared that there was a reign of terrorism. The Minister of Railways and Canals has declared, without bringing a particle of truth to support his statement, that there was a reign of terrorism under the Liberal-Conservative Government, and that employees were slaves. What will be the position of the employee on the railways and canals when he reads the dictum of the Minister, and when he understands what that dictum means, that he must crawl before the defeated candidate or the person who wished to be a representative of the people, and must do his bidding, and fawn around him before he has a chance to get a place on railway or canal, that his political future is to be reserved and conserved to him by this same fawning to the defeated or prospective candidate, or even to the member. Will that make a slave or a free man? Is that going to improve the position of the labouring men of this country, their bread and butter depending on the mere whisper of a defeated candidate in the ear of the great man who employs them. On the one side there is his manhood and independence as a man; on the other side there is bread and butter and the defeated candidate, who cannot secure the suffrages of the people, standing as the fate to decide whether that man shall get his bread and butter or keep his independence. Does that make labouring men good citizens of this country? I think no man will answer that it does. The principle is wrong, and the practice based on that principle cannot be considered to be right by the good common sense of this country. There is no principle of justice in it. Again, who is to run the Department of Railways? The department is an entity from the head down to the lowest man in the service of the road, and its prosperity depends upon what? Upon the discipline and the quality of the servants employed on the road. Where will the discipline of the road be after the dictum of the Minister of Railways has gone out, that every labouring man, every temporary man, every one of the two or three thousand men on the railway is dependent upon the breath, whim or will of a defeated candidate as to whether he shall retain his place or not. If the men depend for the position on a defeated candidate, that man is their master, not the superintendent of the section or the superintendent of the line. They have obtained their places through the defeated candidate. They know they can keep them if they remain on the right side of the defeated candidate. Where is the position to the road? Throughout the service there will be lack of discipline and disregard of the officers of the road, which will come about entirely from instilling into the minds of the employees, which the hon. Minister has done under his dictum, the idea that if they want to get on they must fawn to the defeated or successful candidate, and if they want to retain their positions, all they have to do is to pursue the same course. I say it is against the discipline and usefulness of a great system like the Intercolonial Railway to introduce a practice founded on a principle of that kind. More than that, Sir, who is to run the road? It is to be run by the representatives of the people and the defeated candidates of the people; Liberals, of course. They are to run the Intercolonial Railway so far as the officering of the road is concerned. Look at it from whichever point of view you like, the statement that has been made, and the rule that has been laid down by my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) is a vicious statement and a bad rule, and it cannot but be productive of evil in the service of the road and in the general interest of the country.

But what justice is there in this, Sir: that a man shall stand up here and declare that political neutrality is the price to be paid for office, when the very moment that they create a vacancy by this kind of sword practice, the very next moment, who fills it? Is it the neutral man in politics; not by any means. It is filled by the most decided partisan in politics. Is there any justice in that? If hon. gentlemen, on Liberal principles and on the line of policy which they consider is good, say that political neutrality must be the price of office, let them make it that, so that both the man who holds the office shall know it and the man who wants the office shall know it. But, so long as what is the penalty in one case becomes the reward in the other case, the hon. gentlemen opposite are inconsistent, and instead of curing they ten thousand times aggravate the very evil they say they wish to cure. These are sentiments which I believe we, sitting without partisan bias,—if we could put ourselves in that position for a single moment—would believe to be proper and right. Will the course taken by my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) help or hurt in that matter, and what is to be the effect? Hon. gentlemen opposite sometimes talk about the spoils system of the United States, but these hon. gentlemen know very well that they cannot make that reproach to the United States to-day. The time was when they could. The time was when this vicious system which my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) is introducing into Canada now, which teaches every man to fight for the spoils of office, and to get them by making himself solid with his party candidate; the time was when that was in vogue in the United States. But that was years ago, and to-day the system no longer exists. Within the last ten years the civil service on fixed principles has given place to the spoils system until now on a change of Government, there is the smallest possible change of the offices in the United States. They have left the spoil system, but we are going back to it. Let it be recorded in history that the party which is post-dating civil service progress in this country, is the great Liberal party which might be expected to be in favour of the strengthening and purifying of our civil service. My hon. friend (Mr. Blair) made the observation, that he does not propose to discriminate, but his lips were not cold from that declaration until he declared that he had not time to investigate and must, therefore, discriminate against the labouring man. What is the evidence he will take? If a man who runs against me in my county and is defeated comes to him and says—

Mr. DOMVILLE. You have no county.

Mr. FOSTER. I have adopted the policy of leaving my hon. friend (Mr. Domville) to the calm judgment of the House, and I shall pursue that. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Domville) will not rile my temper in the least, and I trust he will not interrupt me. What I was going on to say was this. I stated that in the United States the spoils system had been supplanted by the better system, and that now in Canada we were going back to the old system of spoils. Nothing that has transpired in this Parliament will tend to do that more rapidly than the statement which has been made by the Minister of Railways and Canals to-night. My hon. friend the leader of the Government, I do not think was in his seat when the statement was made, but he cannot be ignorant of it. He went far the other night when he laid down the principle that a man should have the right to vote but that he should not have the right to go any further. He also said that that man had a right to fair-play. My hon. friend (Mr. Blair) behind him, a member of his Government, goes as far as does the Prime Minister, but he goes further than him, and he says that amongst the labouring men he has no time to see that they shall have a fair trial, and so he will just take an assertion.

The hon. the leader of the Government shakes his head. Does he not know that his Minister of Railways said this afternoon, in reply to a question from myself: that with regard to labouring men who are temporary men, he had not time to investigate their cases, and that when representations were made to him against a labouring man by the defeated candidate or by the member he would take these representations, and he would displace that man as he has already displaced several on that same principle on the Intercolonial Railway. Without judge or jury, Sir! The labouring man's living is there, but that is nothing. The man's daily work is there upon which alone he has to live, but that is nothing. The whisper of the defeated candidate is sufficient that the man should lose his work and have his means of livelihood taken from him though he does his work satisfactorily to every man on the road. That poor man has no recourse, no redress, no opportunity to show whether these statements that have been made against him are true or false. Yet my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) calls that justice. Is it justice in any court of law that the accuser shall be the jury to find the verdict, and that my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) is going to be simply the judge who records that verdict. That is not justice. It is a discrimination against the labouring man, and it is an unfair discrimination against any class of men. I care not whether they labour in the higher or in the lower degree, whether in skilled or in unskilled work.

Now, Sir, we may depend upon it that if my hon. friend the leader of the Government chooses to allow his Minister of Railways and Canals to carry out that principle, and to go still further than he himself has laid down as the policy of the Government: we may depend upon it that he will have to reckon with a disorganized branch of the service in the first place, and later on, he will have to reckon with what I believe will be the righteous indignation of the sober-minded people of this country when they find out just what will result from this practice. My hon. friends opposite think they have a perfect answer to this when they cite some one case or other in which some Liberal had been dismissed by the Liberal-Conservative Government. I say that you cannot make much of such a case as that, unless you go into an examination to see what were the causes that led to the dismissal. I say that nearly all these assertions that have been made on the other side, have been general assertions without special proofs, and even when we come to the citation of a special proof the hon. gentleman who refers to it will not give the names so that we might be able to see whether there are other circumstances in connection with it or not. I say that the policy of the Liberal-Conservative Government has not been to disturb men in office because they were Liberals. I understand this thoroughly well from my own experience. In 1882 I became a member of this House, and up to 1885, while I remained a member of this House, the same representations were made to me over and over again. I always got the answer which my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Mills) stated: "If you will bring a charge of malfeasance in office or neglect of duty or anything of that kind, and that charge is substantiated, and you have a good case, the man will be dismissed, otherwise he will not be." And I call the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals to the records of the Railway Department which are at his disposal; he can go back over them for twelve years if he likes; and I invite him to do that and find a single case in which I endeavoured to interfere with a man connected with the Intercolonial Railway, because he was of a different political persuasion from myself. He will not find a single case. That was the principle on which the Liberal-Conservative Government went then, and it was the principle on which they went when I was a member of the Government. You may cite cases in which that principle was sparingly applied; you may quote other cases, the circumstances of which you do not know in which you may think it was not applied. But that has been the rule of the Liberal-Conservative party. Now, however, we have a different rule, a rule for which the leader of this Government will be responsible if he establishes it himself or allows his Ministers to carry it out. That is not the worst of it; it will be a bad thing for the public service and for this country.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). It so happened that I was a member of the Liberal Government which preceded the late Government, and I have a tolerably distinct recollection of what occurred at the time of our retiring from office. Unless my memory is wholly at fault—I am speaking from recollection, and therefore subject to correction—I think that on that occasion every employee on the Prince Edward Island Railroad was dismissed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. True, a certain reorganization took place, and a certain number were reinstated. But a vast number were dismissed. I believe the same thing happened on the Intercolonial Railway. Under pretense of economy and reconstruction; and I think the first man to lose his head was Mr. C. J. Brydges, then manager of the Intercolonial Railway, who made himself especially obnoxious to the hon. gentlemen who sit opposite me. The fact of the matter is that for a great many years back the Intercolonial Railroad has been, from top to bottom, from cellar to garret, a political machine of the very worst type. I am not going to waste the time of this House by dwelling too long on evident facts, which are known to all men of any political experience in this country. But I have here the report of the Civil Service Commission, issued by hon. gentlemen opposite in 1892, and I propose to read a few sentences from that report; and when I have read them, I think every intelligent man in this House will agree with me that for the last eighteen years the Intercolonial Railway has been nothing more nor less than a political machine. Here is the sworn evidence given before that commission by Mr. Schreiber, at present and then the chief manager of the Intercolonial Railway:

How are the station masters, the conductors, the brakemen and all the other officers, appointed?—In the appointment of station masters, etc., the member for the district is consulted, and his nominee, as a rule, is appointed, unless some good reason is known why he should not be.

And the member for the district nominates the station masters?—The station masters and station operators, section men, section foremen, and brakemen, as a rule, are taken from the nominees of the member for the district.

Always excepting, I presume, that he is not a supporter of the Liberal Government. But I think the House is tolerably aware what the facts were. Now, I want to call the attention of the House to this:

Mr. FOSTER.

Have you any sort of check upon inefficient men being appointed, or do you require any qualifications?—If we consider a man is really of no use, we object to him, and we ask for another name.

Do you find that you have to do this often with men who are not efficient or not as efficient as you would like?—Yes; we have a large number of men now employed whose services we think could be dispensed with.

Is not the work on the railway of a technical character, so that not everybody is fit for any position there?—A conductor requires to be a man of experience, and a very careful man. If he does not perform his duties satisfactorily he should be dismissed, and so with station masters, train despatchers and others.

Thus they required to be men of special qualifications, and therefore they should not be appointed by the members for the district for political reasons, as they were all through the time of hon. gentlemen opposite. I venture to say that when my hon. friend came into office he did not find one man in a hundred, probably not one in a thousand, on that railroad, who had not been put there by hon. gentlemen opposite more or less for political reasons. Now, what did my hon. friend the Minister of Railways declare? He did not declare that he was going to interfere with any man's political opinions. On the contrary, he most expressly declared that no man should suffer at his hand in exercising the franchise as he pleased. What he did declare was this, that when sufficient evidence was laid before him to satisfy him that a particular man had been an active partisan, then he would dismiss that man. That was what he stated and nothing more; and that, Sir, is, I think, entirely in accord with the declaration made by my hon. friend beside me (the Prime Minister), and entirely in accord with the principles which have always been laid down. Now, Sir, I do not want to see the spoils system introduced in Canada; but I tell hon. gentlemen opposite that if civil servants are permitted to take an active part in politics, to speak on public platforms, to act as organizers, or in other ways to identify themselves with any political party, they must share the fate of that party. It is because I do not want to see the spoils system introduced that I uphold my hon. friend, and I say that it is his duty to make an example of all railway servants of the public in any capacity who refuse to abide by this wholesome rule. The rule is plain and clear, and hon. gentlemen have got to abide by it, whether they like it or not. We do not propose to deal with them as they dealt with us in all respects; but we do propose to say that civil servants who have actively interfered in political matters shall suffer the fate they deserve, and be dismissed on sufficient evidence of that fact being adduced.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I should not have said another word in this debate but for the statement that has just fallen from the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. In 1878 I had the honour of succeeding the former Premier, Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, in the Public Works Department, which at that time embraced railways and canals as well as other public works. The hon. gentleman has said that my first act was to dismiss Mr. C. J. Brydges. That is not exactly the case. The hon. gentleman knows that Mr. Brydges and myself had come into such strong and violent collision in reference to the management of the Intercolonial Railway and the department over which I presided, that it would have been quite impracticable and quite impossible for me to ask him to continue in the discharge of that duty. Under those circumstances the change was made, but there was another reason, and that was that under Mr. Mackenzie and under the management of Mr. C. J. Brydges, the deficit between the revenue from the Intercolonial and the expenditure was from one-half to three-quarters of a million per annum, and I think I am right in saying that Mr. Brydges had committed himself to a statement, which had become public, to the then president of the Grand Trunk Railway, that the Intercolonial could not be operated without the loss of something like $700,000 a year. The best advice and information I could obtain led me to the belief that a great reduction could be made in the expenditure for the Intercolonial, and I took measures for that purpose. A gentleman was appointed superintendent of that road who, from that time to this, has shown the value of that change by the remarkable success of his administration. The reorganization of the road in such a way as to reduce the expenditure to something like the income involved the dispensing with the services of a large number of individuals. That duty was discharged by gentlemen who were declared by Mr. Brydges himself to be the ablest and best men on the road. It was discharged by them in a thoroughly impartial spirit. They made the selection of the persons who should be retained and whose services should be dispensed with. I make the statement in the presence of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I refer the hon. Minister of Railways to the department, where he will find the facts as I state them, that the reduction of the employees of the Intercolonial, was done without favour or affection for Liberals or Liberal-Conservatives. Although the great body of those employees had been appointed by Mr. Mackenzie and his administration, all who were required and whose services were most valuable were retained, and I was assailed constantly, day in and day out, by Liberal-Conservatives who said to me: you have dispensed with a large number of your own friends and retained a large number of your strongest opponents. That does not bear out the statement which the hon. gentleman has made at all. The effect of that reorganization of the department was of a most striking character. It enabled us, as my hon. friend will find by the records of the department, to bring its expenses practically within the receipts. Nothing can be more unjust than the aspersion that there was any reorganization for the purpose of getting rid of the Liberals and placing Liberal-Conservatives in their place. Nothing of the kind was done. I am not able to charge my mind now, having had the honour of administering the Department of Railways and Canals for many years, with a single instance in which a person's services were dispensed with because he was a Liberal or had supported Liberal candidates in the elections. An effort was always made to retain the best men; and so long as I remained in charge of the department, if the gentlemen who had the responsibility of working the Intercolonial, said that a person was not required for any particular post, no person was pressed upon them nor were they called upon to obtain the services of any such person. No one knows better than the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, how strongly the late Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, who led for so many years the Government of this country, set his face against the spoils system, and how firmly he resisted in every possible way the introduction of the system of political dismissals, and I feel that no greater injury can be done to the public service than to do anything which is calculated to lower the tone and character of a public servant, as it will be, if it is found that civil servants are to be slaves. No system of terrorism, under the Liberal-Conservative administration, with which I have had the honour of being connected, ever existed. We never adopted anything in the shape of terrorism or coercion or anything else to prevent the free and independent exercise of the franchise or that moderate expression of political opinion which both sides of the House were of opinion ought to be tolerated and exercised. I am sorry my hon. friend the First Minister was not in the House to-day, when his colleague, the Minister of Railways and Canals, made his statement of the policy which governs his administration of that great department. It was one which I think would have startled the First Minister as much as it startled me when it fell on my ears.

Mr. McGREGOR. You were not startled very much.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman has no better ground for interrupting, it would be well for him to permit me to complete my remarks, without interrupting me. I believe it would have startled the hon. First Minister as much as it did me. It was greatly in advance of anything intimated by the hon. First Minister as governing the tenure of office in the civil service. What rendered it more objectionable was that the Minister of Railways did draw, in the most clear and emphatic manner, a line of distinction between the poor man and those who hold better and higher positions. He said that, so far as regarded the day labourers, the persons who were concerned in manual employment, the great body of the poorer employees connected with the public service—which cannot be less than four or five thousand, at the lowest computation of the Minister of Railways and Canals—so far as they were concerned, it was impossible for him to give personal attention to the charges of complaints made against them, and that he had taken, and intended to take, the opinions on that subject of the candidate of the Liberal party who had been defeated, or the member who had been elected to support the Government. I do not believe that the hon. First Minister will go that length. I do not believe that he will, for one moment, say that the Government of this country is to deprive a poor man of his living, who does his work faithfully, because he has exercised his franchise in opposition to anybody who is ambitious to sit in this House. That is the length to which the hon. gentleman went.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman not only went that length, but in his later defence, in which he drew us away to what he had achieved in the province of New Brunswick, upon which I do not intend to say a word, because I dare say that the hon. gentleman may have done all he said he did,—he came back again to the subject and reiterated practically the same thing, and that was that it was impossible for him to undertake to deal with the numberless cases that might be presented in connection with the employees engaged in his department, and that he would have to depend, and intended to depend on the advice he received and the opinions expressed to him by gentlemen who had the distinguished honour of bearing the Liberal flag at the general elections, whether successfully or unsuccessfully. That is the principle laid down by the hon. gentleman. It means that the word goes forth to-morrow to the thousands of employees who are under the thumb of the hon. gentleman to-day: Support the standard-bearer of the Liberal party, or your employment will cease.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, Sir, there is no other meaning that can be given to the statement than that. If the hon. gentleman stands by what he said in the most clear and emphatic terms, and if "Hansard" reports his words as they fell from his lips, the First Minister will see that that statement is accurate, that the hon. gentleman, while explaining that it was impossible for him to investigate the cases of these lower classes of employees, the officials might not be too numerous for him to investigate their cases. So far as the employees were concerned, he intended to rely upon the statements made to him by the standard-bearers of his party, whether they had been successful or unsuccessful. That is the statement made and reiterated. And what does it mean? It means that the fiat goes forth and that every man who is in the employ of this Government and from that employment obtains bread for himself and family, is told that his continued employment, his means of supporting his wife and children depends—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but it is not a laughing matter to men whose bread is at stake. But they will find that a deep feeling of indignation will be aroused in this country, not only among the employees, but in the heart of every honest son of toil, and that there will be a universal feeling that a more tyrannical, a more terrorizing doctrine never was promulgated by a public man on the floor of Parliament. This doctrine means that even the man who has been rejected at the polls, has practically the power of life or death, so far as the living and happiness of these poor people are concerned. It is a startling doctrine. It is a doctrine at variance with every principle professed by the Liberal party, when they were in power before, at variance with every principle adopted by the Liberal-Conservative party, when in power, and repugnant to the principle of common justice, that should appeal to every man. I regret that the First Minister was not here to hear this statement. I have told my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) the circumstances under which the reorganization of the Intercolonial took place. I have told him of the care that was exercised during the period I had the honour of discharging those duties, and which, I believe, has been continued in the management of the Intercolonial Railway. But to those who believe that the Intercolonial Railway has been made the means of terrorizing employees or controlling public affairs, I will offer the evidence of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies). I stated in my place in this House what I believed then, and believe now, that in the recent elections at least one-half of the employees of the Intercolonial, from the highest to the lowest, voted against the Government.

An hon. MEMBER. More than half.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend says, more than half. He knows I always like to keep within the mark. But the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries stated that 75 per cent of them would prefer to vote against the Government. If, after eighteen years of Conservative administration of the Intercolonial, such a statement is true, it can hardly be said that we exercised a very despotic control in the management. This subject is one of the most vital character to Canada, one of the most vital import to the Government and to every man who wishes to see an honest and impartial administration of affairs in this country. I trust the First Minister will give it his careful consideration, and that means will be taken to make sure that there is not established in the management of this great work a despotism compared with which anything of the kind that exists in Russia is insignificant.

Mr. DOMVILLE. My hon. friend from Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper) seems to have forgotten the circumstances of the dismissal of Mr. Brydges and his assistant. I thought then that they were very properly dismissed, because they were interfering with the party whose policy they were supposed to carry out. They were replaced by gentlemen who have served the Liberal-Conservative party up to date. And some of them will have to be got rid of for the very same reason that justified Mr. Brydges' dismissal—that the Government cannot place confidence in them. The hon. member tried to confuse the cases of the employees on the road and the officials, and tried to make it appear that the Minister of Railways was dealing unfairly with one class. But the hon. gentleman knows, and I know, and the country knows, that some of the men serving that road on a very small salary are rich men—at least, rich enough for all ordinary purposes. I can only put it down to their economy in living. When a man receives a salary of $1,200 or $1,500 a year, and can accumulate a fortune upon it, perhaps that might be a justification for his remaining on the railway, that he might get richer on a smaller salary. There are matters concerning the past on the Intercolonial that I would not care to discuss, but the hon. gentleman must know that, with the present party in power, there cannot be the confidence between the Government and the officials as a body that should exist.

*Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not with 75 per cent of them their political friends?

Mr. DOMVILLE. My hon. friend says 75 per cent. I tell him here that not 75 per cent, but 95 per cent of the men on the Intercolonial Railway would vote for the Minister of Railways and vote for the Liberal party if they were permitted to do so.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They will have to now.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Well, if they do vote for us, all the better. But I can give instances right along that line of railway where men were instructed by telegram and by letter to go away, that they could not vote. I will take the case of Mr. Joel Gross, station-master at Penobsquis. A letter was written to him by one of the committee of the hon. gentleman's friends, because the hon. gentleman went down to King's county and organized that wonderful organization that did such wonderful work. One of his leading men there, a lawyer, a Mr. MacIntyre, wrote a letter to Joel Gross and told him that he was suspected of taking some part in the election. It was thought he was giving me some influence, and he was warned that if he did, they would turn him out when the election was over. I can give the case of Mr. Gambling, in my hon. friend's own riding. Why did he turn out Mr. Gambling from the Fisheries Department, and put in his friend Mr. Pierson, a strong partisan? I took his word down, but he qualified it afterwards, because he saw my eye on him, and he put in the words "so far as the Intercolonial Railway is concerned"—qualified it with what we call in boat racing, a sliding seat. Will he tell me what he did with Fairweather, postmaster at White's Corners, when he turned him out for political reasons and placed the office in the hands of Mr. Keirstead, who was his political standard-bearer, the man who placed the money for him in his county, and to whom he telephoned after the election was over to know what had become of Springfield and the money he had put into it.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend will allow me—I am obliged to rise in my seat in order that other gentlemen may not be led away by this statement, and to characterize it right here as being entirely without foundation.

Mr. DOMVILLE. My hon. friend always characterizes everything without foundation.

Mr. FOSTER. I am afraid I shall have to in your case.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I can remember when I had the pleasure of unseating him in 1882, and when I had him up before the court trying him, his standard answer was "It has no foundation in fact." It was the stereotyped answer. My hon. friend has a marvellous way of getting rid of difficulties. Why, when we were trying to get him to face some difficulties in King's county in 1891, he went out of the county, and his deputy went with him from the county. He avoided the difficulty by going away. He is trying now to lead people astray in King's county and the rest of the country, by his attack on the Minister of Railways. Now, when the hon. gentleman ran away from King's county on that occasion, it put me in mind of a story I heard of a battle down south. They were fighting, and the general came along and he saw the sergeant-major and said to him: "What in thunder are you running away for?" "Why," said the major, "because I have not got wings."

Well, Sir, I am satisfied, and my record on the statements I make is pretty good in King's county—I am satisfied that there has been a reign of terror all along that railway. I am satisfied there has been more than terrorism, there has been undue influence in every way. I will tell you that during the last election at one poll men were directed to fold up their ballot in a certain way, and they would show it folded that way to the representatives of the Conservative candidate at the poll, so that when they would get the counterfoil off the edge, it could be opened up to see how they had voted. Take the case of my hon. friend when he ran his last election with me. He was heralded throughout the country as a paragon of virtue, as the great prohibition leader of this country, the man who had stated on a platform that if a bottle of rum or a dollar bill would give him his election, he would not take it. I am now going to state an actual fact that occurred on that railway. I make this statement fearlessly, because I can prove it by twenty men. The section-master at Rothesay, actually, in broad daylight—I could not believe the man would do it himself, he would not do it except under orders—received a consignment of liquor which was sent up and ladled out on the account of the hon. member for York from the section master's own house. Yes, Sir, in a moment of weakness that section-master forgot all the preachings of his leader, the member for York, he forgot himself so far as to accept that liquor when he was told that he should touch not, taste not, and handle not. And yet my hon. friend comes here and talks in this manner with all these things before him, with the liquor and the railway in his interest—men sent away that they might not vote against him. A station-master threatened to be turned away if any evidence was seen in them of supporting the Liberal candidate. The station-master had done nothing, but he was cautioned. A caution was sent to him and his friends warning them that neither they nor their relations were to give their support directly or indirectly to the Liberal candidate, and if that poll did not give a certain vote, the station-master would be turned out. Now, is that a correct state of things? The hon. gentleman talks about the labouring men in New Brunswick. There is not a labouring man on the Intercolonial Railway, there is not a labouring man around the city of St. John, or in York County either, I have no doubt, who would not gladly place his case in the hands of Mr. Blair and look upon him as their friend now and hereafter. Then, Sir, the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) drags his Nova Scotia politics into this discussion. I would advise him to keep them to himself, because we don't want him to drag New Brunswick into the same category as he has brought his own province. Then my hon. friend from York said that he was startled. Now, that hon. gentleman makes these speeches, and they sound well here to an appreciative audience, and they are sent through the country by thousands. But when they go down to the county of York and go through New Brunswick, people will simply fling them aside, and say that he has been so unfortunate in his own province as to do nothing for it, nor to those whom he represents, that he never did anything for the county of King's, nor for the city of St. John. We have had to-day a deputation from St. John, and it was easy to see how pleased the people at the head of it were to find that the present Administration are looking after their interests.

Mr. MILLS. And the steamships going to Portland.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I wish you would go to Portland, too. Mr. Chairman, if you could but see the happy faces of these gentlemen who came here. They came up feeling that St. John is going to have something done for it, feeling that an era of prosperity is opening to the whole country, feeling that they have got friends in the Government, notwithstanding what the hon. member for York will say, because they will say to him: Sir, we cannot rely on your statements. You told us you were going to carry the country, you told us you would carry King's, you told us you would carry Queen's and Sunbury, and you failed in them all. The hon. gentleman has obtained a seat, and I will not say anything about that; but he is aware that the people of New Brunswick have no confidence in his statements, that they have withdrawn the confidence they reposed in him in the past; and when the hon. gentleman tells this House that disastrous effects are going to be produced in the maritime provinces in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, I venture to say there is not, even among the Conservatives of New Brunswick, any one who will accuse the hon. Minister of Railways of attempting to do what is unfair or prejudicial to the interests of workingmen. It is an unfair attack. It is unfair to the hon. Minister to endeavour through the press to arouse the workingmen of this country. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) or the hon. member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper) talk about Government employees being slaves. Do those hon. gentlemen forget that a Conservative Government repealed the Weights and Measures Act in 1875? They wiped out 200 or 300 employees without thinking of the men or their families, and they never considered whether they would have bread to eat or water to drink. That was not the worst of it, because later on, as they had to find places for supporters, they re-enacted the Act and replaced those discharged by their own friends and partisans. The hon. member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper) was in the House at that time and was a party to this measure, and in fact was responsible for it as a member of the Government. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) is not acting with a proper measure of fair-play, and even this House will not consider he did justice to himself when he attempted to place the hon. Minister in a false position, for generally there may be two readings of a statement, and the hon. Minister no doubt considered there were cases in which, when the evidence was placed before him and the facts stated, he would be in a position, being an able lawyer and a far-seeing man, to decide them on its merits without sending them to any tribunal. Is there anything wrong in taking that position? In my opinion, and I think hon. gentlemen opposite will agree with me, we should have a permanent civil service, into which men should enter by competitive examination; that men should not be pitch-forked into positions—and I hope that practice will not be followed by the present Government—and that political hacks should not be in office; because owing to this system our boys who have passed the military college or the Port Hope school, or other similar institutions are forced to leave the country and the positions are secured by partisans who are prepared to do the biddings of their party at all hazard and risk, receiving as a reward the thirty pieces of silver. If we had a civil service into which our young men could enter by competitive examination, in which they could steadily rise to the high positions, our young men would hold these positions in the service and would be a credit to Canada and to its Parliament when we have passed away. I hope one of these days the Government will be able to look into this subject, and see what can be done on the line of English civil service. I desire that the Minister of Railways shall not be assailed by one member after another on the Opposition benches on the charge, made by implication, that he is going to hurt the working classes of Canada. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) I am afraid will be disappointed. He has to swallow the medicine—he must do it. I never squealed, and he should not squeal now. I promised to follow him from pillar to post, and I did it. I did my duty to the country, and my county thanked me for it. When the hon. member for Queen's and Sunbury (Mr. Blair) came to Ottawa after his election, I was on the train. As we passed through the county of King's, there were bonfires, bands were out, addresses were presented, because it was felt by the people of King's and by the whole people of New Brunswick that the interests of Canada would be safe in the hands of a man who had done his duty when he was Premier of his own province. I tell the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) that if he wishes to regain Paradise he must serve an apprenticeship to virtue. The hon. gentleman must bide his time, and probably in the great hereafter, when he is quite an old man, when all hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have passed away and party lines have changed, he may have the honour of being recalled to power, perhaps from his own province, although I think that is very doubtful, and I shall regret if when that day comes I am not able to be on the Opposition side to criticise his measures, as the hon. gentleman is doing here to-day, but I trust it will be not in such a spirit of captiousness and carping as the hon. gentleman who possesses undoubted ability, pursues a course of asking questions on subjects which he has dealt with during the last twelve or fourteen years, and unfairly endeavours to embarrass the Government by questioning Ministers who have not had time to read up the subjects involved.

Mr. McNEILL. I cannot attempt, in anything I may say, to compete with the interest and sparkle of the speech to which we have just listened, nor shall I try to do so. But I do wish to say a word on this question to hon. gentlemen opposite, and I will say it in all earnestness and sincerity. I entirely agree with what has been said by the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Robertson). It is what I myself have endeavoured to express before, and it does seem to me that the principle underlying those remarks should commend itself to the intelligence of the House. I do think, as has been said by the hon. member for East Toronto, that, so far as the civil servants are concerned, if the Government intend to pursue so strict a method with them, the proper course to adopt is, first, to lay down a rule—let hon. gentlemen make their rule as severe as they please—but, for goodness' sake, do not inflict the extreme penalty of dismissal upon officials who have broken no rule whatever of the civil service. It is a most cruel thing to turn out permanent employees who have broken no rule of their employer; and especially is it cruel to turn them out during a period of depression in the country, to look for a livelihood in the best way they can, and to support themselves and their families as best they may. It is, I say, cruel to dismiss men who have for eighteen years been accustomed to a different régime, and who have never been taught that it was improper for them to take a reasonable part in politics. I am quite sure, Sir, that the country will never approve of a policy of that kind. If I were speaking from a party point of view, and if I had no regard for the interests of those who are to be sacrificed, I would say that the Government could not play any game better calculated to strengthen the hands of the Conservative party and, per contra, to weaken the hands of the Liberal party, than to pursue this policy of dismissing civil servants. I wish, Sir, to say a few words in regard to another class of persons who, greatly to my astonishment, I find are in danger. I refer to the labourers of the country. What Government labourer in Canada ever heard before that he would be dismissed from his employment, if he took a part in politics? Where is the justification to the Government for such a course? It may be said that, in the case of civil servants, there is a different condition of things, and that warning has been given them across the floor of this House (though I repudiate that argument), but where, and when, have the labourers of this country ever received any warning? But, Sir, before passing from the case of the civil servants, I wish to emphasize what I have already said and what has been stated by my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Mills), that my experience, since I have had anything to do with public life, has been that the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party, as enunciated by Sir John A. Macdonald to myself, has been the very opposite from that policy which has been enunciated to this House by a Liberal Government. I am sure there is not a member of this House who will doubt my statement in this regard. That is what I learned from Sir John A. Macdonald, when I spoke to him on this subject.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No one doubts the hon. gentleman's statement, but every one in the maritime province knows that the practice has been different.

Mr. MILLS. Every one from the maritime provinces does not know that.

Mr. McNEILL. We have had the evidence from my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) from the maritime provinces, who gave case after case, and stated exactly the contrary to what the Minister of Marine says. Even if there have been individual departures by members of Conservative Governments from that general rule, I hope that is not a reason why a cruel and general rule should for the first time be laid down by the Liberal Government, and that a man should be punished by infliction of the extremest penalty for breaking a rule which never existed.

Now, with regard to the labouring men, I ask hon. gentlemen opposite if they will kindly consider this question from the point of view that they are threatening in a most serious manner the political liberties of the whole labouring classes of this country. I ask, without any desire to be unfair, that the Minister of Railways himself should regard the matter from this point of view. Let him consider that the Government is a great employer of labour, that the manner in which the Government treat their labourers will be to a large extent an example to other employers of labour in Canada, and that, if the Government lay down the principle that their labourers are to be dismissed, if they take any other part in politics than to vote, then that other employers of labour will be inclined to act in a similar way, and plead as an excuse for their conduct the example of the Government. Why did we establish the ballot? Was it not for the protection of the labouring men, and was it not because we wished that these men should have the fullest liberty to discharge their duties as citizens. But how can you say that the labouring man has the fullest liberty, if you say that he is to take no other part in politics than simply to vote? Why, we never heard before of such a thing in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend says "Oh." I ask him if such a principle has ever been laid down before, and I ask him is it to be the great Liberal party which is to lay down the principle that any employer of labour is justified in dismissing his employee, if that employee happens to exercise his right, as a British subject, to work for whichever party he thinks best in the interests of his country. Whatever excuse there may be with regard to civil servants, I say there can be no possible excuse for applying such a principle as that to the labourers of this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. McNEILL. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but it is a very serious question, and the labourers of this country will consider it a serious matter.

Mr. BRITTON. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McNEILL. Yes, with pleasure.

Mr. BRITTON. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if these men are allowed to work in elections, where is he to draw the line? We confess that they should have the fullest possible liberty to vote, and my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) says that, if they are not allowed to work in elections, then their privileges are interfered with. If they are allowed to work, where is he to draw the line so that they may not be considered the partisans that are complained of?

Mr. McNEILL. I do not draw the line at all, so far as the labourers are concerned; and I say that I never before heard of the line being drawn in the case of labourers in this country. I never before heard of any political party in this country maintaining the principle that an employer of labour should coerce his employee and should not allow him to take any part in politics that he pleased.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Some of them do it.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not say it has not been done; but I say that it has always been considered as shameful to the man who did it. It has always been considered, if known of, as something worthy of reproach; and I have heard with astonishment that the great Liberal party of this country has committed itself to that policy and that principle to-day.

Mr. MCGREGOR. You have been doing it all the time.

Mr. CRAIG. I wish to say this on this important question—and if I did not think the question important, I should keep quiet at this hour of the night—that if I were looking at this matter from a strictly party point of view, I would be very glad that the Minister of Railways had used the expression which he did use to-day, because I think nothing could hurt his party or his Government more than the words he used. But I regret that he used that expression, because I do not look at the matter from a party point of view.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Hear, hear.

Mr. CRAIG. It may seem strange that I should say that; but I assure you that such is the case, although it may seem to some members of this House quite impossible, as it is impossible for some to look at any question except from a party point of view. I think that is very unfortunate. There are some questions, and I think this is one of them, that should be looked at by members of this House entirely apart from party. What was the statement made by the Minister of Railways? I will give it as I heard it myself. The statement made by the hon. Minister of Railways, as I heard it, was this, that he had dismissed some men? Why? Because he had been asked to do so by a defeated candidate in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia. I do not know which; and he said that he proposed to follow this course—that if a defeated candidate or a member of this House, belonging to the Liberal party, recommended the dismissal of any workman on the Intercolonial Railway, he proposed to take their advice and dismiss those men.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. CRAIG. I am saying what I understood the hon. Minister to say. I am very glad indeed that the hon. leader of the Government and the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries repudiate this statement,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not intend to repudiate any statement made by my colleague at all.

Mr. CRAIG. I refer to the statement I made.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend made no such statement and used no language that could be construed into such a meaning.

Mr. CRAIG. I understood the hon. Minister of Railways to say, with reference to labouring men working on the Intercolonial Railway, that he intended that if a defeated candidate of the Liberal party or a member of this House belonging to the Liberal party recommended the dismissal of any of those men, he intended to dismiss them without any further investigation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. He did say so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. Minister might explain what he did say. Certainly the House understood him to make the statement which has just been made.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am exceedingly sorry that I failed to make myself understood, and—I want to say it in all fairness and candour—I am at a loss to understand how any gentleman using his faculties could draw such a conclusion from what I said. I stated that when a charge was made against an official or a person in the employ of the Government on the Intercolonial Railway, I would necessarily be quite unable personally to investigate it myself; there are such a number of persons who are largely temporary employees that I would necessarily have to be satisfied upon evidence and by other means. But I wish the hon. gentleman to understand that I never, directly or indirectly, hinted or intended to hint at the intention of removing any person in the public service unless there were charges preferred against him which I was satisfied had been substantiated. I could not be satisfied that those charges were substantiated by investigating them myself; but I could be satisfied if they were established by the personal statements of persons of reliability and credit which I could accept.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. Minister will remember that the two men whose names brought this matter up were two bridge tenders on the Pictou Bridge who were dismissed on the complaint of Mr. Macdonald. Will he kindly say, in the first place, what the specific charge was against these men, and then, whether the investigation of the charge went any further than Mr. Macdonald's letter or communication?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is a fair question, and I am very willing to answer it. Mr. Macdonald first wrote to me to say that there were two men—and he gave their names, and they are in the recollection of the hon. member—then in the employ of the railway who had actively intervened in the election, who were exceedingly active and exceedingly offensive.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Was the activity described?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He certainly did describe to me that they were active canvassers in the election; and in a subsequent conversation which I had with Mr. Macdonald, he entered somewhat more fully into details. On receiving that letter from Mr. Macdonald, I immediately wrote to him saying that I proposed to take a very careful course with regard to Government employees ; that while I could not investigate the matter myself, I desired him to tell me what the facts were on his own personal assurance as a gentleman, or something to that effect, implying that I relied on his word of honour as a gentleman, that what he alleged was true ; and on his giving me that assurance, I authorized Mr. Pottinger to permit the displacement of those men. Let me say further that these two men were not in the permanent employ at all. They were persons called on to work from time to time as their services might be required.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Year in and year out.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, they were not employed year in and year out.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I mean that they were the regular men for that duty. There were no other men.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I quite concede that for three or four years, perhaps longer, they were called on when required.

Mr. CRAIG. I beg to assure the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals that I have no intention of misrepresenting him at all, and I think he said just now that in this case he did discharge the men on the representation of this defeated candidate.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. On the personal assurance of Mr. Macdonald.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Well, Mr. Macdonald is just as reliable a gentleman as any in this House.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No person proposes to attack his character, but any man's opinion may be wrong.

Mr. CRAIG. Then it comes down to this, after all, that without any further investigation, and relying on the assurance of a defeated candidate or of a Liberal member of this House, men will be dismissed if these gentlemen wish it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not at all.

The PRIME MINISTER. Nothing of the kind. There must be substantial evidence.

Mr. CRAIG. I cannot understand how there can be substantial evidence when it is done at the mere wish of a Liberal candidate or member.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is not at the mere wish of the candidate. There must be a specific charge made.

Mr. BLAIR.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am willing to say this, which is entirely in accord with the view upon which I have stated I should act, that if, upon being satisfied by the best evidence that is open to me, that the charge is sustained and a removal follows, and the person who is removed upon making representations satisfies me that he was not open to the charge I should not hesitate to redress the wrong and restore him to his position.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Why not do that before dismissing him ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I regard it as practically impossible, that, with the vast staff of men who are in the employ of the department, I could institute a personal investigation into each case. I could not do it nor could the hon. gentleman do it, and it has never been done.

Mr. CRAIG. No doubt the hon. Minister of Railways thinks he is acting on proper principles, but I am afraid that the country will not think so. After all I do not think it is a commendable course to take the evidence of a defeated candidate. The ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) drew a distinction between a Liberal member of this House and a Liberal defeated candidate, which ought to have some weight with the hon. gentleman. A defeated candidate naturally smarts under his defeat, and no doubt will magnify the partisanship of those who have been against him ; and I am satisfied that a great many of these men, before they have cooled down sufficiently, will think that those who had merely voted against them, acted as partisans and would be very glad to be revenged by getting them dismissed. I think it is an unfortunate position for a Minister to take, that, on the assurance of a defeated candidate that a labourer has been a political partisan, he feels called upon to dismiss him. I am glad the hon. Minister has somewhat modified that by saying that if a party who has been dismissed proves his innocence, he will reinstate him. But it certainly is opposed to British fair-play to punish a man first and then find him not guilty afterwards. I think the Government should not take such a stand. I think there is something in what the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) has laid down this evening, that labourers do not belong to the same class as civil servants ; but leaving that out of the question, if the principle laid down by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) that absolute neutrality, except the act of voting, is the price of continuance in office is to be followed, the Government should at least not make it retroactive. I do not see how the hon. leader of the House can lay that down as a principle of the Liberal party, when we find in Ontario that office-holders are the most active and violent partisans. If the principle laid down by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) be that of the Liberal party, surely they would have it put in force in Ontario. But in that province, the local officials are rather encouraged to take an active part in politics and become sometimes offensive partisans—

The PRIME MINISTER. How would my hon. friend deal with them if he came into office in Ontario ?

Mr. CRAIG. I would deal with them in this way.

The PRIME MINISTER. Cut off their heads ?

Mr. CRAIG. No, I would not.

Mr. MCGREGOR. Your party has done it.

Mr. CRAIG. That is no argument at all. We have heard that over and over again to-night. In fact, it is the only argument we have heard advanced : You did the same thing some years ago, and would do it now if you had the chance. But the Liberal party came into power with great professions, and I for one hope they will carry them out. I should like to see them govern the country well, and I say, in all disinterestedness, that they will take a most unfortunate step if they inaugurate the system of dismissing every man because he took some part in politics. I never knew it was laid down by any party that office-holders should not take part in politics.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It has been laid down in the despatches from the English Home Office, time and time again.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It was laid down five and twenty years ago in this House and acted on.

Mr. CRAIG. It is a wonder to me then that the Liberal party in Ontario have not put it in practice. It cannot be held that they have practised it at all. Very often office-holders—I am not blaming them, but merely stating the fact—take a very active part in politics. We naturally expect that the Liberal party would practice as they preach, but they certainly have not done so in the province of Ontario. I could bring in the case of my own election, if I wished, striking evidence of this practice. I find no fault with the man for doing it, and I would not have him turned out, even if I could, for I suppose he thought he was serving his party, but he certainly took a most active part against me and was a most violent partisan. In Ontario that is the way a good many keep their offices. It is laid down by the Liberal party in this House that neutrality is the price of office. Well, Mr. Speaker, if that is to be the rule for the future, it ought to be understood. But it is not the rule which was followed in the past. I think I heard the First Minister make this statement, that an offensive partisan should be dismissed ; but that is a very different thing from a mechanic taking a small part in politics and doing little more than voting, and yet he will be brought under this rule. I hope the Liberal party will not make this rule retroactive. If this rule is to be put in force, let office-holders understand that they are to do nothing but vote. They will then understand their position. If necessary, let the railway men on the Intercolonial understand that they are to take no active part in politics. I think it would be most unfortunate that the Minister of Railways should have said that there are so many of these labourers, he would find it impossible to attend to all their cases. That seems to imply that a great many complaints have come before him, and we may expect that hundreds of these men will be dismissed. The hon. Minister's statement really invites charges from defeated candidates. Let the defeated candidate complain that any of these men were active partisans against him in the late election, and they will be dismissed. I think it is an unfortunate step for any party to take. The argument that the Conservative party have done this, and would again, is no argument at all for the Liberal party. They do not pretend to regulate their conduct by that of the Conservative party ; they claim to have a higher ideal of government than we have. I hope they will live up to it. Now, I say this deliberately—I said it at home after the defeat of this party—if the Liberal party can give a better Government to this country and make this country more prosperous, I am willing that they should stay in power. That is the sort of party man I am. I do not live for my party and am willing to give this Government a fair show. In some things I do not agree with them. For instance, I do not agree with them in regard to protection—but I believe they will come to our views pretty much after all, perhaps I may be able to agree with them on everything.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Come over with us.

Mr. CRAIG. Stranger things than that have happened. But I do hope they will not plead the actions of the Conservative party as a justification for their own. Whatever they may think about it, the country will not accept such an excuse. So I would ask them to reconsider this matter, to remember that these labouring men must provide for their families. Even though they may have taken some part in politics, they did it without thinking that they laid themselves open to such punishment.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Are there no other labouring men having families but those you have appointed to office ?

Mr. CRAIG. Yes ; and there will be a great many chances for appointments in the course of time ; but if the Liberal party are in such a hurry to provide for applicants that they dismiss those now employed, I think they will make a great mistake.

Mr. LOGAN. To a member from the maritime provinces the statement that the Intercolonial Railway has not been used as a terrorizing influence causes a good deal of amusement as well as amazement. I represent the grand old county of Cumberland, in which there is a large mileage of the Intercolonial, not only of the main line but of the short line as well. And I am here to tell you that that railway has been used as a terrorizing influence from end to end of my county and has been so used for eighteen years. I listened with surprise to the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), the old war horse of Cumberland, in whose place I am happy to stand, when he stated that the railway was not used to tyrannize over the men. I am sorry he is not in his place, but if he were I could tell him that the railway has been used as a terrorizing influence by his own friends and his own relatives. I can tell him that his own nephew, Charles Tupper Hillson, who has been connected with the road for eighteen years, went up and down the line in the months preceding the last election, coercing the employees to vote for the late Government. That gentleman, while drawing a salary of from $5 to $10 a day, went down to Cape Breton in the last by-election and terrorized the men there so that they did not know whether they could call their very souls their own. In the general election he went to the railway men in my county and said : Vote for Dickey or you leave the service of the Intercolonial Railway. If the Opposition want evidence, I can bring evidence by the volume. I have men by the dozen who will come forward and swear that this gentleman went to them and told them to vote for the ex-Minister of Justice or they would lose their positions and their children would starve. No man has known the existence of this practice better than the hon. leader of the Opposition, who formerly represented Cumberland. I might quote the case of a gentleman who occupies a position on an express train. I hesitate not to give his name, because I am in a position to prove every statement I am making. His name is McKim. Mr. Hillson approached him and said: I hear you are going to vote Grit. The reply was : I am. Then came the threat : If you vote Grit you will lose your job. This gentleman, Mr. McKim, runs on the express from Halifax to Moncton. But on election day the order went forth that he was not to stop at Moncton, but to run through from Halifax to St. John. Why ? To disfranchise him ; to take from him the right of voting, which every British citizen should have. To say that there has been no terrorizing on the Intercolonial Railway is to talk rot. The ignorance on this subject of the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) is probably due to the fact that he does not live in a county in which the railway runs, otherwise he would not have the effrontery to tell us that no tyranny was exercised on the road. The hon. gentleman said that under the Conservative rule no official was dismissed unless a charge against him was made and proved. I defy him to name the time and place where a charge was investigated and the tribunal before whom it was tried. When a change was deemed best in the interests of that party, off went the head of the man who stood in the way. In the county of Westmoreland lived a gentleman named Thomas Allen. Every one who comes from Prince Edward Island, and many who come from Nova Scotia, know Tom Allen. He occupied the position of mail carrier from Cape Tormentine to Cape Traverse for fifty-four years. He entered the service as a young man, spent his middle age in the service and came down to the very verge of the grave, and still in the service of the Government. More, he had suffered severe hardships in his work. He had lain upon the ice all night ; he had been upon that boisterous sea three and four days at a time. Yet when he would not endorse the tactics of the Government, the hon. senior member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) then the Minister of Marine, wrote him a letter : Your services are no longer required. There was no superannuation in that case, although this man had served the country for fifty-four years. He is a poor man to-day living in the town of Amherst. Any one engaged in the by-election in the county of Westmoreland held last year must know that the men in the shops were terrorized. And not only that, but they were watched by spies to find if they were going to vote Liberal. I could quote many cases of dismissals made without cause. In my own county is the town of Northport, a shipping port. The only physician living there is Dr. Campbell. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), no doubt, would say that he lives in splendid medical isolation. He was the medical examiner for ships coming into the port. The salary was about $50 or $60 a year. There was another physician living about twelve miles from the port who was a Conservative, while the doctor at Northport was a supporter of the Liberal party. Dr. Campbell was notified by letter that his services were no longer required, and the position given to the Conservative ; and from that day until the present time, when a man become ill on board a ship in Northport harbour, he is rowed ashore and put into a wagon and carried twelve miles to a Tory doctor, and past the door of a Liberal doctor living within half a mile of the ship. This is the way that the public service has been looked after in that province. The hon. gentleman professes great concern for the political freedom of the employees on the Intercolonial Railway. Sir, I hope I will never drop so low in political degradation as to desire to compel a man to vote against his conscience. A man should exercise his franchise freely ; but when a civil servant goes further than that and becomes an obnoxious partisan, then I say it is time his services were dispensed with in the best interests of this country. Why ? Because the very maintenance of the public service in a state of efficiency demands that there shall be mutuality between the head of any department and the men who labour therein. You cannot have the Department of Railways or any other department conducted successfully when there are traitors in the camp ; and wherever you have active partisans occupying positions in any department, there are certain to be traitors in the camp who will stab you in the back at the first opportunity. Now, the hon. junior member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) made one of his characteristic harangues in which he referred disparagingly to the Minister of Finance. Now, I would not refer to this to-night if I did not come from the province of Nova Scotia. The hon. member made an onslaught on the local government and on the present Minister of Finance, and intimated that under his administration the spoils system had existed in Nova Scotia. Why, the hon. gentleman must know that the system there is the most distant from the spoils system of almost any government in Canada. In my county of Cumberland, the best and most lucrative office in the whole county is filled by a Liberal-Conservative, and a very decent Liberal-Conservative he is, too. Many other offices in that county are filled by Liberal-Conservatives, but they are men who do not take an active part in political matters. A few years ago the office of Superintendent of Education for Nova Scotia became vacant. It is one of the most important offices in that province, one that requires to be filled by a man of honour, a man of superior education, and a man who has the tact and qualities of the best order. Where did the present Minister of Finance go to get a Superintendent of Education ? Did he go into a Grit hive ? Did he go into a Grit caucus room to find the man ? No ; but he went to Dr. McKay, Principal of Pictou Academy, and appointed him Superintendent of Education, although he was a good Conservative and comes from one of the most rabid Conservative families in the province. The hon. gentleman's reference to the Fielding Administration was not a happy one. What about his own connection with governing that province ? Suffice it to say he occupied the position of provincial secretary at one time. He kept it for a period of three months. He and his party went to the people, and they were snowed under, and for fourteen long years the administration of the government of that province has been presided over by the Minister of Finance, and I will tell you why. While he may be admired and respected in the larger field of Dominion politics, I can tell you that among the Liberals and many Conservatives in Nova Scotia he is not only admired but loved ; and when he appealed to the country he was returned with a large majority at his back every time, while the hon. gentleman and his party were politically annihilated. Soon the hon. gentleman disappeared from provincial politics. Only a few years ago he was known as a free trader, who denounced the National Policy and the Tupperts, but now we find him sitting cheek by jowl beside those hon. gentlemen, and probably we will find him before long lauding the National Policy and high protection in this country.

Now, Sir, the hon. leader of the Opposition has made a statement here to-night that 75 per cent of the railway employees on the Intercolonial Railway have become Grits. Well, why is that ? It is because they have not been used with common decency by the Government and its officials heretofore. The salaried officials on the Intercolonial Railway, have ground the labouring men down, and I have not the slightest doubt that a large number of them did go to the polls and vote against the late Government as a protest against the way in which they had been terrorized. He has spoken to-night with great feeling, saying he was very much startled at the declaration of the Minister of Railways. What declaration ? Why, the declaration that men can go to the polls hereafter and exercise their franchise as they please, without being interfered with. That is the declaration made by the Minister of Railways when he said that employees on the Intercolonial Railway, both Liberals and Conservatives, may go to the polls and vote as their conscience may dictate ; and I believe when that declaration is published a great feeling of relief will be experienced by the employees on that railway who will recognize it as a declaration of liberty, and that in the future they will be free men to vote as they please, and be treated like men and not like serfs.

Mr. TAYLOR. At four o'clock this afternoon when an item in reference to Penitentiaries was brought up, I desired to make some remarks upon it, but my respected leader and the ex-Minister of Finance informed me that the Finance Minister was very anxious to get as much of the Supply Bill through to-day as possible in order to get money to carry on the affairs of the country, and therefore I yielded reluctantly. However, I will take an other opportunity on concurrence to discuss this question fully. It is now 12 o'clock, and from the evidence we have seen, the Minister of Finance and the leader of the Government are not very anxious to go on and get a Supply Bill passed. The hon. member for North Wellington

(Mr. McMullen) and the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) made an attack on the Opposition, which has led to a discussion and the members supporting the Government have occupied nearly two-thirds of the time since 4 o'clock saying: You did so and so, and we are going to see you, and go one or two better. But I cannot allow this discussion to close without making a reference to what I have seen in the newspapers to-night with regard to some of my friends with whom I have done business for many years, men of standing, men of means who have been maligned, and their names have gone broadcast through this land, as men who are not worth a dollar. The statements made in the newspapers are to the effect that these gentlemen have purchased binder twine from the Government, that the Government cannot collect a dollar from them, and that they are Tory heeled. The first man I will mention is that of a personal friend of mine, though a political opponent, and his name appears in the press as not being worth a dollar, that the Government cannot collect a dollar from him. It is stated in the papers to-day that Mr. Mowat, of Toronto, the respected nephew of Sir Oliver Mowat, is not able to pay for the binder twine sold him by the Government last year, to the tune of $254. He was one of the Tory heeled to whom the late Government sold binding twine.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. We are discussing the item of the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am discussing what I read in the papers to-day.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I must ask the hon. gentleman to confine himself as much as possible to the item under discussion. The hon. gentleman appears to have forgotten the item, which is concerning the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. TAYLOR. An hon. gentleman, in discussing the item, took the privilege of speaking with regard to himself. The gentlemen to whom I desire to refer are not members of this House; they are personal friends of my own.

The PRIME MINISTER. Order. The hon. gentleman may have a statement to make, but there is a proper way of doing it. We are discussing the item of railways.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend will not be long.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman can make a statement on the motion of the adjournment of the House; but we are now discussing the item of railways.

Mr. TAYLOR. I want to say this on behalf of my friends.

Mr. TAYLOR.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must confine his remarks to the item.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then, I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. I am not going to have those gentlemen lie under these imputations.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman will have an opportunity to speak when the motion is made to adjourn the House. I do not desire to deprive the hon. gentleman of doing so, but, if we are to proceed with business, hon. members must discuss the item before the committee. The hon. gentleman knows that, as well as I do.

Mr. TAYLOR. I thought the committee was about to rise, and that I could make a statement; but hon. gentlemen, apparently, intend to rule me out of order. I shall take the opportunity, if we stay here till morning, to make my statement, because I do not think hon. members desire that the names of gentlemen should be published throughout the country as bankrupt, and they should be glad to allow any member the earliest opportunity to say a word in their behalf.

The PRIME MINISTER. Certainly, at the proper time.

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not want specially to discuss the item. I yielded to the Government to-day, when I had the opportunity to bring up this matter, but the Government do not appear anxious to have the Estimates pass, because they put up man after man to abuse members of the Opposition. They have laid down the doctrine that every poor man in this country working for his dollar a day—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. TAYLOR. I may say that in my county as many Government officials turned out, voted and worked against me, as supported me. If we are going to speak about workingmen, I may say that men out of our own factory at Gananoque turned out, and the foreman took the stump against me; yet they were not called to account. Workingmen would not be called to account by any honourable employer. Yet these Liberals, who now control the destinies of the country, declare, as regards the labouring man, that, if he voted against even a defeated candidate, his head must be cut off without trial by judge or jury. That is the policy of the Liberal party, as exemplified by hon. members to-day. A poor fellow employed in Kingston, got three day's notice before his head was cut off; he does not yet know the reason.

Mr. McGREGOR. Order.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. member for Essex (Mr. McGregor) was always a most orderly man. He took his medicine from the then Government side of the House—and it was always mild—and he never said anything; but since the hon. gentleman has crossed the floor, no hon. member can speak more than a few minutes without the hon. gentleman interrupting him. I hope, in the future, that, when hon. members are addressing the Chair in a respectful manner, he will try and hold his peace and not interrupt. I could tell the hon. gentlemen opposite something they would not like to hear, but, no doubt, they will rule me out, although I yielded to-day to a request made by the Government. But, when Concurrence comes, more time will be occupied than would have been occupied to-night, as I did not intend to speak for more than a few minutes. Hon. gentlemen opposite declare we are obstructionists. I have been looking through "Hansard," and estimating the space occupied by members of the Government and the Opposition, and before the session closes I believe two-thirds of the "Hansard" will be occupied with speeches delivered by members of the Administration and their supporters, thus showing that they have been obstructionists, and not members of the Opposition.

The PRIME MINISTER. Then, the hon. gentleman had better take his seat.

Mr. TAYLOR. We want to get even with hon. gentlemen. Although the Opposition is not so strong in numbers as the Government, we think we can equal hon. gentlemen opposite in speaking, and they will find that we will be able to fight them. As it is apparent that hon. members will not be able to go to their homes at twelve o'clock, I shall occupy a few minutes when the motion for adjournment is made, in rebutting the vile slanders uttered against honourable, upright, honest business men of the country by hon. members last night.

Mr. McALISTER. I regret to be compelled to offer any remarks at this time, as I did not intend to say anything, but, as the matter of interference with Intercolonial Railway employees has been dealt with at some length, I think it is my duty to refer to what has been done in my county. I live in a county where a great many railway men are employed, and, so far as I am concerned, and so far as I am informed by officials of the Intercolonial Railway, no pressure whatever was brought to bear on any of the Intercolonial Railway men in my county. The day before the elections, an arrangement was made by which all the train hands going in different directions along the line to have them brought in on election day, as far as possible, in order to allow them to vote, irrespective of party or of the way in which they intended to vote. The only complaint I heard made was that two men, a driver and his fireman, were sent up in the morning to Metis, and did not get back in time to vote, and they made complaint; but the singular part of that occurrence is that those men declared their intention to vote for me. I do not know whether such was really the case, but, at all events, the superintendent of the road had nothing whatever to do with keeping them from voting.

With that exception, I am not aware of any other in the county who was kept back from voting. Further than that, the only man I know of who took a most active part and an offensive part I may say, was a man who took a part against me. I said nothing to him. I did not try to influence him in any way to refrain from voting or to vote for me. He was allowed to vote, he was allowed to say what he liked at any of the public meetings or in committee meetings without any pressure whatever being brought to bear upon him. So far as interference was concerned in the county of Restigouche there can be no complaint whatever on the part of the Government, or on the part of any person, as to any undue influence whatever being brought to bear.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I was asked in the early part of this discussion for a statement as to the earnings and expenses during the past year on the different branches of the Government railways. I find that I am now in a position to furnish that information to the committee. It is as follows:—

Statement of earnings and working expenses of the Government railways for the year ended 30th June, 1896 :

Intercolonial Railway—
Earnings .....	$2,957,640 10
Working expenses...	3,012,827 62
Loss .....		$55,187 52
Prince Edward Island Railway—
Earnings .....	$146,476 54
Working expenses .....	225,138 56
Loss .....		78,662 02
Total loss .....		$133,849 54
Windsor Branch Railway—
Earnings .....	$36,561 83
Working expenses .....	16,476 46
Profit .....		20,085 37
Net loss .....		$113,764 17

Mr. POWELL. In this vote to increase the accommodation at Moncton, is it intended to provide for a new station house ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There was $20,000 placed in the Estimates for a proposed new station house at Moncton, and I am informed that in addition to that it was found necessary to continue making provision for the proper equipment of the workshops. There is, therefore, $10,500 for machinery, making $33,500 in all. I may say to the hon. gentleman that it is not to be supposed, from the fact that the Estimates only asked for this amount for a station house at Moncton, that that sum would not more than begin to cover the cost of the building.

Mr. POWELL. Is it intended that the station should be built in accordance with the plans and specifications that have already been prepared?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not quite able to answer the hon. gentleman's question. It has been impossible for me to give any attention to this matter as yet, but I propose to do so at the earliest possible date.

An hon. MEMBER. Strike it out.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Oh, no. I have no doubt whatever that it is necessary to make additional provision for station accommodation in that city. The only reason why I am not able at the moment to answer the question of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) is, that I would like to apply my own judgment somewhat to the plans and provisions that have been made. It may be that the plans will be adopted just as it has been prepared, but I have not been able to look into the matter at all as yet.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would like to ask the Minister a question which I know the late Minister of Railways intended to ask if he were present. There were some promotions made in the Department of Railways and Canals in the last days of the late Government. Is the hon. gentleman in possession of the facts just now so as to enable him to tell me what has been done in reference to this matter?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I can say this much to the hon. member (Mr. Montague). There were two, if not three recommendations for promotion from inferior to superior classes in the department. These recommendations were not—as of course the hon. gentleman knows—they were not completed before the change of Government, and therefore they had to come for consideration before the new Administration. I believe the Treasury Board has not decided to approve of the recommendations. Action, or inaction, perhaps, was taken before I came to my department here, and the recommendations were permitted to stand over as I understand it. No action has yet been taken in respect to them. I think it has been decided not to recommend them, or at all events no action whatever has been taken.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to call the attention of the Minister to an item in the vote for "increased accommodation at Pictou." When that item appeared in the last Estimates I brought to the attention of the then Minister of Railways representations that had been made to me as to the inadequacy of that amount to do anything like furnish the accommodation that the business interests demanded there. I merely wish to remind the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) that his predecessor, after consulting his officers, led me to believe that the Supplementary Estimates would contain a further amount for that work. I would like if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) would take occasion to confer with his officers, as to how much more, if anything, is needed to give the accommodation required on that part of the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. DIMOCK. I would like to call the attention of the Minister to a matter somewhat similar to that mentioned by the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). I refer to the item of $1,000 to extend the freight shed at Truro. The town of Truro is a growing town, and I am sure that the hon. Minister's deputy will tell him that with our growing business we need more accommodation than can be provided by $1,000 spent extending that structure. The building is entirely too small; our trade has been for years beyond its capacity. Therefore, I respectfully call the attention of the Minister to this matter, and would ask that in the Supplementary Estimates he will provide such an amount as will give us the accommodation we require for the increased freight trade of the town of Truro and the surrounding county of Colchester.

Mr. MARTIN. I was very much pleased to hear the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) say that if any officials had been discharged without investigation he would take much pleasure in having them reinstated if the circumstances justified him in doing so. I desire to say that in the little province from which I come there have been many officials discharged without investigation, and I hope the hon. Minister will carry out his promise and have them reinstated, as the officials in the province of Prince Edward Island have taken little or no part in the elections. I, however, understand that quite a number were discharged from the Railway Department at Charlottetown very shortly after the accession of the present Government to power, and I would like that those discharged would be fairly treated and reinstated. While on my feet, I wish to call attention to a false impression that might be drawn from the statement made by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). He said that he understood that a wholesale dismissal of officials had been made from the railway in Prince Edward Island in 1878. I venture to make this statement, that more men have been dismissed from the Railway Department since the present Government came into power in July last than were dismissed in the last eighteen years during Conservative rule, or in fact since confederation. I think I can safely make that statement. I may say, for the information of this House, that there are to-day in the province of Prince Edward Island quite a number of people in the employ of the Railway Department who have been there since 1874 or 1875, when the Prince Edward Island Railway was opened for traffic—men occupying very important positions, men who were known to be Liberals and strong party men who did not conceal their ideas on the political questions of the day. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) knows this very well. Prince Edward has been cited as an example of what the Liberal-Conservatives did in 1878. The Government of the day cannot find a precedent in Prince Edward Island for the wholesale dismissals which have been lately made. In that Island the Liberal-Conservative party have dealt very fairly and generously with the employees they found there in 1878. I think there were only two or three dismissals. Indeed, the record of the Liberal-Conservative party in their dealing with the civil service of Canada, is a very creditable one. They have sought to raise the standard of the civil service by making the positions in it as permanent as possible, and I think every lover of this Dominion will approve of their course. I trust the Government will not degrade the civil service of Canada. The great Liberal party will surely not fall back on precedents which they condemned, to justify any improper course.

Mr. HALE. I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals a question of great importance to the people of Carleton county, whom I have the honour to represent. It is well known that the Intercolonial Railway has been run at a loss to this country ever since it has been built. The section of country I represent, especially the river counties, is affected by this more than any other section of the Dominion of Canada, I think, as we receive no advantage from the railway, either directly or indirectly. The coal that is shipped from the lower provinces is an advantage to the province of Nova Scotia and also to the upper provinces. Another matter which is against the agricultural interest of our county is that produce is shipped from the upper provinces to the lower provinces to our natural market at a very much lower rate of freight than we have to pay to get our produce carried a distance of 150 miles to the city of St. John or to the other markets of our province. Freight are carried on the Intercolonial Railway a distance of a thousand miles from the province of Quebec at a very much lower rate than they are from the county I represent. This operates very seriously to the detriment of our people; and now that we have a Minister of Railways from our own province, I hope he will give this very important matter his attention. I brought this matter to the attention of the late lamented Mr. Pope when he was Minister of Railways, and he told me I was entirely mistaken about it. After I had talked with him for a while on the subject, he consented to look into it, and after he had done so he told me that I was right, and that he would undertake to have it rectified. But that gentleman did not live to carry out his wish in that regard, I am very sorry to say. The road should be run on business principles and the same rate should be imposed for up and down freight, and the rates generally should be proportional to the distance carried and imposed with fairness to every section of the country. There is another matter which has been pretty well threshed out in this House, that is, the dismissal of public employees. While I am elected to represent the people of my county, I came here to assist in doing the business of the country as best I could. I do not come here for the purpose of telling the employees of this country how they should vote. I do not come here to tell any man in this country, rich or poor, how he should cast his ballot. I believe that is each man's right, whether he is rich or poor. While I am elected by the people, I am the servant of the people. Every man in this House is a servant of the people. The hon. gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches to-day are servants of the people just as much as the employees of the Intercolonial Railway. While they only receive very small allowances, these hon. gentlemen receive large amounts, and I claim that they are just as much entitled to vote and to speak as they see fit, as any gentleman in this House. I do hope that the hon. Minister of Railways will not carry out the course which has been attributed to him to-night, because I do not think he is made of that kind of stuff. I believe he will give the labouring men in our country fair-play and a fair, honest trial before dismissing them, and I hope we will hear no more of this matter in this House. I think there has been a great deal of valuable time wasted, which would have been spent to much better advantage doing the business of the country, instead of undertaking to tell the poor labouring men how they should vote. Their vote is all they have. All the comfort they have is their little home and the wage they receive for their day's labour; and, no matter from whom they receive it, they ought to have the freedom of this country, and I believe that every honest man will agree with me that that is their right. And no man, no matter what position he may occupy, has a right to dictate to them how they should vote. Every hon. gentleman who sits on the Treasury benches, has the right to have a man of his own political complexion and whom he can trust as his deputy, but, outside of that, he has no right to interfere with any other man in the employ of this country. These hon. gentlemen are just as much employees of the country as the men who handle the pick and shovel, and I believe the people will bear that out.

Resolutions reported.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

BINDER TWINE.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before the House adjourns, I wish to refer to a matter which I brought up a few moments ago, when you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, ruled me out of order. I have read in the press of to-day that a number of prominent business men in this country are reported as owing amounts to the Government, and that the Government are unable to collect these debts. On behalf of some of these gentlemen, who are thus reported, and who are not able to contradict the statement themselves in this House, I beg to say that the statements are not correct. Mowatt & Co., of Trenton, are reported as owing $252.61 to the Government which the Government cannot collect. Well, Messrs. Mowatt & Co. are a firm of good standing, able to pay any liabilities that they incur. N. Turner & Sons, Cornwall, are reported as owing $41.48. I have done business with them for many years, and I know that they are men of good standing, well able to pay any debt they incur. J. H. Ashdowne, of Winnipeg, a gentleman with whom we have been doing business many years, and who is well able to pay his debts, is reported as owing $39.90. W. H. Anderson, of Kemptville, is put down as owing $120. He also is a man of means, able to pay anything demanded of him. P. S. Stewart, of Renfrew, also a man of means, and well able to pay, and now not owing the Government or anybody else a dollar, for he always pays cash, is put down as owing $115. George Sears, of Kingston, a gentleman to whom we have sold for years, and who has always paid his bills, and can pay anything the Government has against him, is entered as owing $81.38. James Reid, of Perth, always pays cash at the same discount, yet he is down for $201.70. George Thompson, of Cobourg, another gentleman able and willing to pay any debt he contracts, is charged as owing $240.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). Does he do business with you?

Mr. TAYLOR. Certainly; I am speaking of men with whom we do business. There are a number of men in that list whom I know to be men of means. And yet they are reported to be worthless and in debt to the Government. I may say, for the benefit of my hon. friend who said they were all Tory heelers, that out of ten names on the list eight of them are those of supporters of gentlemen opposite.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is about the proportion among good business men.

An hon. MEMBER. We will take it back about them.

Mr. HALE.

Mr. TAYLOR. You cannot take it back after having published it that these men are in debt to the Government and are unable to pay. Then there is the Shirah Milling Company.

Mr. MONTAGUE. They are Liberals.

Mr. TAYLOR. I have never done business with them, but I had the pleasure of going through their premises. They are men of means, I should fancy, and Liberals I believe. These are the men who are published as Tory heelers who made purchases from the Government and were not able to pay. I might name others, but no doubt other gentlemen are better acquainted with some of those whose names are here than I am. As to the gentlemen I have mentioned, it seemed that as they were customers of ours it was my duty to say what I knew of them. I think there is not a dollar they owe that they are not able and willing to pay.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). I think that when the hon. gentleman comes to do business with these people again he will find that they remember not the statements made in the newspapers but the statements made in "Hansard." I cannot understand how a gentleman can rise in good faith and make the remarks the hon. gentleman has made after having heard the discussion last night. The hon. gentleman said I referred to Messrs. Wood, Vallance & Co., as not having paid this account. I would ask leave to read from "Hansard" on that point:

Now, about Mr. Wood, I am directed to say that so far as he is concerned, he dealt with Connor to the extent of $3,200. He became suspicious of Connor's dealings and wrote to the department to ascertain whether he should pay this money to Connor or to the department. I have got the letter here somewhere, and I find he was informed that he might deal with Connor, and he did deal with him, and the $1,200 the hon. member for Lisgar referred to as being due by Wood, Vallance & Co., has been paid. That is the information I have from the officers of the department, and it is entered in the schedule as still due.

That is what I said in the hearing of the hon. member last night. Let us see as to the other point to which he draws attention. In the first place I did not say that anything was due or not due except in the manner I have indicated. Now the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) spoke on this point, and he said:

Large quantities of this twine, I may inform the House, were advanced to gentlemen all over the Dominion of Canada; and I am credibly informed, and it is my belief, that the men, or the greater portion of the men, who got this twine were political partisans, Conservatives—And that is true.

Mr. TAYLOR. It is not true.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The greater portion of these men are Conservatives. That is true.

Mr. COCHRANE. What difference does that make if they pay their bills?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Allow me to proceed.

—and the amounts owing by them on the twine have not yet been paid.

There is not one word as to their ability to pay.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, there is. Read what the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) said.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am reading what the hon. member for Lisgar said and what I said.

Mr. TAYLOR. I did not refer to you at all.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We have to deal with the transaction between the Government and Connor. This man Connor was indebted to the Government on a contract made with the Government. When, in March last, it was ascertained that he owed a large amount of money he made a contract with the Government under which he transferred to them certain securities as collateral for the payment of his debt and among the securities were accounts which he represented to be due. Up to to-day at 12 o'clock, so far as the Department of Justice was concerned these accounts appeared to be due. So clear was the case that action has been taken by the Department of Justice against Connor and against Connolly to recover the balance due, and in the proceedings it is stated that these accounts were handed over to the Government and represented as unpaid. The information comes to us from the officials of the Department of Justice and was communicated by me to the member for Lisgar and dealt with by him on that assumption. No such statements were made as have been spoken of either by me or by the hon. member for Lisgar to whom I communicated the information.

Mr. GUILLET. Have the parties who are presumed to be indebted been requested to pay?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. As to the methods adopted by the late Government to collect the accounts, I cannot say. As soon as we came in we took up the case and sued the parties concerned.

Mr. GUILLET. All of them?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Connor and Connolly, not the others. I said that up to 12 o'clock to-day, so far as I knew, the department really held claims against these persons under the assignment. I had an amended statement made up to 12 o'clock, because I thought it proper to lay on the Table of the House the statement of the account. That statement goes to show that some of these amounts were really paid.

This afternoon I had the statement, thinking that this subject would come up. But I have not it here now.

Mr. GUILLET. One of the gentlemen named here is Mr. George Thompson, of Cobourg. He is a merchant carrying on an extensive business as head of the Evaporator Company. He has good financial standing. He is not known as a Conservative but as a life-long Reformer. He may have voted Conservative occasionally as he is an independent-minded man.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. When we find this $1,200 alleged to be due by Wood, Vallance & Company is really paid, it leads us to suppose that there are others in the same position.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. member for Lisgar said these amounts were not paid.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) was speaking from information furnished by me and I am responsible for it, not he.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I was not here when the debate took place. But I understand that the statement is that sums are due from certain parties to the Government, and that these people are largely supporters of the Conservative party. That carries with it the meaning that it was through some political pull that these amounts were allowed to be owed.

Now, I know nothing of the general question, I had nothing to do with it, but, of course, am responsible for it as a member of the Government. I only wish to say that there is one gentleman named there who is a resident of my riding. I never knew he had any dealings with Mr. Connor or the Government. He is a very strong Liberal, and consequently it would be through no influence of mine that he got this trade. Further than that, I am doubtful whether Mr. Sherry owes a dollar to the Government, because he is abundantly able to pay his debts.

Mr. CASEY. Do I understand the Solicitor General to say that these accounts had been paid to Connor, or had been handed over by him to the Government?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. When I made the statement to the House, as I only came to the department within a month, I simply repeated what had been told to me by the Tory employees of the Department of Justice. When I asked for the amended statement to-day, I asked for one showing the condition of affairs now, and that will be produced in the House on Monday.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) is trying to make a mountain out of a mole hill. He is trying to fasten on hon. gentlemen on this side the odium of having called certain gentlemen political heelers. The hon. gentleman is just about as accurate in that statement as he is in many others. In the remarks I took occasion to make last night respecting this extraordinary transaction, I had reference to certain matters which my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) mentioned—people living in the North-west to whom large quantities of this twine had been sold, and whom my hon. friend stated to the House were wholly irresponsible. They were not only irresponsible, but he stated, and I assume it to be true, that they were all officials of certain political organizations throughout that country, wholly worthless, and in fact bankrupts, and men apparently to whom no honest sale of goods of this amount could have been made. My hon. friend should not have taken the ground he did in making that statement as a little bit of political capital. No doubt the gentlemen he mentioned as having dealt with his firm, are all honourable gentlemen; if they were not, they would not be dealing with his firm. But the reference I made was to political friends of the late Government, those whom my hon. friend mentioned as living in the North-west country, and men who are totally irresponsible for this or any other debt.

Mr. TAYLOR. Just one word.

The PRIME MINISTER. Order, the hon. gentleman has spoken once.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I must remind the hon. gentleman that this debate was altogether out of order. I permitted it because I understood it was a matter of explanation between the Prime Minister and the hon. gentleman.

Mr. TAYLOR. I just want to say this. The Solicitor General quoted from "Hansard" and he asked me to reply.

The PRIME MINISTER. The Solicitor General said he would bring all the papers here on Monday.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is one word I desire to say myself in view of the statement of the Solicitor General. The whole trouble has arisen from access being allowed to these papers by a member of the House. I was pressed in Committee of Supply for the names of parties owing the department for binder twine, and I relying on the good sense of the members of the House, said that of course if I were pressed, the Government would have to give the fullest information; but that unless there was some serious reason, or serious action was intended, I thought the department, carrying on that business in the nature of a trade, would be greatly embarrassed; that business firms never displayed their accounts, or mention the account outstanding in their books. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) found himself in an awkward position when his name was found in the list with an intimation that he was still owing these accounts. The information was totally inaccurate, but it had been gleaned in the Department of Justice. I would suggest to the Solicitor General that in future, unless there is a demand in Parliament for some serious purpose, and he finds it necessary to give information of this kind, it should be withheld, and on no occasion be brought down unless means are taken to test the accuracy of that information.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. This case shows the wisdom of the rule pointed out by my hon. and learned friend. But I may mention that what I said to the hon. member for Lisgar was that he should produce the information filed in court.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 1 a.m. (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 21st September, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 28) to revive and amend the Act incorporating the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company.—(Mr. Casey.)

IMPORT DUTIES ON LIQUORS.

Mr. DEVLIN (for Mr. Cameron) asked :

What was the total amount of duties collected upon importations of ales, beer or other malt liquors and upon wines and spirituous liquors for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1896 ?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The duties referred to were as follows:—Ale, beer and other malt liquors, $57,966.49; wines of all kinds, $240,477.10; spirituous liquors, $1,942,724.86, making a total of $2,241,168.45.

CAPTAIN ALFRED FAGES.

Mr. DEVLIN (for Mr. Choquette) asked :

Did Captain Alfred Fages, of the Military School at St. Johns, P.Q., obtain leave of absence in order to go and vote at Quebec on 23rd June last? If so, what was the Juration of the said leave ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Captain Fages asked and obtained from the Commandant of the Royal Canadian Infantry at St. John's, three days' leave of absence on the evening of the 22nd June, to go to Quebec on personal affairs.

AGRICULTURIST AT THE EXPERIMENTAL FARM.

Mr. WALLACE (for Mr. Maclean) asked :

How many applications have been received for the position of Agriculturist in connection with the Experimental Farm? Has any appointment been made thereto? If so, to whom?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). One application has been received, that of Mr. Thomas Henderson, of Ottawa. No appointment has been made.

FORTIFICATIONS AT KINGSTON.

Mr. LANDERKIN (for Mr. Britton) asked :

Is the Government aware that the fortifications at and near Kingston are very much out of repair, and rapidly becoming worse? Is it the intention of the Government to provide in the Supplementary Estimates to be brought down this session, for the repair of the fort and towers, or any of them, or any part thereof?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). This matter is now under consideration of the Government. The officers of the department have been asked to make a special report in regard to these fortifications.

REPAIRS OF FORT ANNE.

Mr. MILLS asked :

Does the Government intend to complete the repairs of Fort Anne, in the county of Annapolis? If so, when?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The Government intend to complete the repairs begun at Fort Anne last year, and will do so at the earliest possible moment.

L'ARDOISE BREAKWATER.

Mr. GILLIES asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to provide in the Supplementary Estimates during the present session for the repairs and extension of the L'Ardoise Breakwater, Richmond County, Cape Breton?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I have to inform my hon. friend that this question is now under the consideration of the Government.

LIGHTHOUSE NEAR POINT CLAIRE.

Mr. DIMOCK (for Mr. Monk) asked :

Is the Government aware that one of the lighthouses on Lake St. Louis, near Point Claire, P.Q., has been burned? Is it the intention of the Government to rebuild this lighthouse without delay?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The Government is aware that one of the lighthouses on Lake St. Louis, near Point Claire, has been burned. It is the intention of the Government to rebuild this lighthouse without delay; the plans have been prepared, and immediate steps will be taken to go on with the work.

MR. A. P. LEPINE.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (for Mr. Casgrain) asked :

1. Has Mr. A. P. Lepine, of Quebec, been dismissed from the public service?
2. If so, for what reason?
3. Has any person been appointed in his stead, and if so, who?

THE MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. Mr. Lepine has been notified that his services are no longer required. 2. Because at the time there were no works going on in Quebec on which his services could be utilized. 3. Some time afterwards when work recommenced Mr. Phileas Béland was employed.

LOBSTER FISHERY AND FISHERY PROTECTION.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

Whether the Government have received any petition or memorial from the lobster packers in the province of Prince Edward Island for a change in the lobster fishing regulations? Whether the Government propose to make any change in regard to the fishing season for lobsters in that province, and the nature of the change; and whether the Government propose to make any change in the fishery protection service in that province or in the staff at present employed?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The Government have received a petition such as that referred to. As to change in regard to fishing season for lobsters in Prince Edward Island, I would say that the whole question will be carefully considered and steps will be taken to ascertain the views of those most interested in the industry, before any change is made. In reply to the question respecting change in the fishery protection service in Prince Edward Island or in the staff at present employed, I have to inform the hon. gentleman that the whole question of any necessary changes in the fisheries protection will receive full consideration before any change is made.

COST OF BUILDINGS, EXPERIMENTAL FARM.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What buildings have been built on the Experimental Farm at Ottawa, and what has been the cost of each?

Barn and stables .....	$ 22,124 06
Museum, official and chemical laboratory .....	15,231 45
Greenhouses .....	5,566 40
Poultry buildings .....	5,009 08
Dairy and piggery .....	4,495 95
Implement building .....	4,835 00
Root house .....	1,111 37
Director's house .....	12,500 00
Four houses — Entomologist, Chemist, Horticulturist and Agriculturist .....	22,291 55
Three cottages and stable ....	5,919 71..
Sheep building— Estimated total cost, $5,085.62 Cost to date .....	3,755 62
	$102,840 19

In addition to these figures, I may say that there have been expended the following sums :—

Purchase of lands through De- partment of Agriculture.....	$ 65,438 35
Cost of heating apparatuses through Department of Pub- lic Works .....	6,852 40
Alterations, Clerk of Works, furniture through Depart- ment of Public Works .....	50,590 77
	$122,881 52

Total amount expended to 30th June, 1896, $225,721.71. No portion of the above expenditure went against the sum of $6,000 voted every year for repairing, &c., the experimental farm buildings, except the cost of the sheep building constructed in 1895-96 at an expenditure of $3,755.62. Since the 1st July, 1892, the Department of Public Works has had an annual vote of $6,000, called "New buildings, improvements, repairs, &c.," which covers all the repairs required for all the experimental farms in Canada. Out of that vote of $6,000, the share of the Ottawa experimental farm has been every year since the first vote, as follows :—

For the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1893.	$4,264 84
“ “ “ 1894.	3,234 04
“ “ “ 1895.	3,907 40
“ “ “ 1896.	4,322 76
Total .....	$15,729 04

I may add that it is not possible to apportion the above sum of $15,729.04 to each of the buildings mentioned in the statement of the cost of construction, as the accounts as rendered do not show that distribution. The whole cost is $160,283.36.

FAIR AT THREE RIVERS.

Mr. McDOUGALL (for Mr. Sproule) asked:

How many head of cattle were sent from the Experimental Farm to the fair at Three Rivers? What breeds were they? What was the cost of transport to and from the exhibition? By whom was the expense borne?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No cattle were sent from the experimental farm to the fair at Three Rivers; but, for the Mr. FISHER.

information of the hon. member, I may say that the following exhibit was sent :—Seven hogs, the description of which I have here, but which I do not suppose would interest the hon. member; and coops of seven breeds of chickens. The cost of transport to and from was $36, which expense was borne by the department.

SALE OF BINDER TWINE.

Mr. LANDERKIN (for Mr. McMullen) asked :

Is there still any balance due by the person or persons controlling the sale of binding twine manufactured at Kingston? If so, who are the parties in arrears and what amount is due by each, and how long overdue? What security is held for the amount due, and if considered good and ample? Have the Government given any instructions to collect overdue accounts? If not, why not?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). If the hon. gentleman will be good enough to call at the Department of Railways and the Department of Justice, he will get all the information he requires. There is some information asked for here that I do not think we ought to communicate to the House now, concerning the names of those supposed to be indebted, and the amounts.

REFORMATORY AT ALEXANDRIA.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry) asked :

(a.) On what date was it first settled, by Order in Council, that the Reformatory was to be built at Alexandria, Glengarry?

(b.) At what sessions have amounts for it been placed in the Estimates, and how much?

(c.) Has the land for the site been purchased? What is the date of transfer, and the amount paid?

(d.) On what date has the contract been signed, and for what portion of the building, and the amount of contract?

(e.) When did the work commence, and what is the amount and date of estimate returned, and amount of work done since return of estimate? Is the work still in progress? If discontinued, for what reason?

(f.) Do the Government intend to go on with building and continue to completion on the present site at Alexandria, Glengarry, and how soon do they propose to start it again?

(g.) Has the difficulty between contractor and architect about the plans and specifications of the foundation walls been settled? If so, how?

(h.) Has the clerk appointed at the commencement of the work been dismissed? If so, for what reason?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). (a) This arrangement was made by the Justice Department, but there appears to be no Order in Council in the matter. There is an Order in Council for the purchase of the site selected by the Department of Justice, the date of which is 25th March, 1895. (b) In 1894-95 Parliament voted towards the construction of said reformatory $10,000; in 1895-96, $20,000; 1896-97, $30,000. (c) Yes, the land for the site has been purchased. The transfer is dated 17th April, 1895, and the amount paid $5,000. (d) The contract was signed on the 17th March, 1896, for one cell wing and rotunda (main hall), and the amount of the contract is $95,000. (e) Work commenced shortly after contract was awarded. Only one estimate was rendered since the beginning of the work, and that amounts to $2,490. The work is progressing. (f) The work is progressing, and the contractor has not signified his intention of abandoning his contract. (g) The contractor has been ordered by the Minister to follow plans and specifications, and he has agreed to do so. (h) The services of the clerk of works were dispensed with at the time on account of the slow progress of the work, which did not necessitate a highly-paid supervision.

TRADE WITH AUSTRALIAN COLONIES.

Mr. COPP asked .

What percentage in value of Canadian exports of native products to the Australian Colonies during the years 1893-94, 1894-95 and 1895-96 was carried by the line of steamers receiving a Dominion subsidy? Also, what percentage in value of imports into Canada from the Australian Colonies arrived by the line of steamships receiving a subsidy from the Dominion during the years 1893-94, 1894-95, 1895-96?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The statistical returns furnished by the Customs Department do not show what percentage in value of Canadian exports of native produce to the Australian Colonies, during the years 1893-94, 1894-95 and 1895-96, was carried by the line of steamers receiving a Dominion subsidy, or what percentage in value of imports into Canada from the Australian colonies arrived by the line of steamships receiving a subsidy from the Dominion during the years 1893-94, 1894-95, 1895-96. I am informed that statements would have to be specially compiled at various ports to give this information, requiring a good deal of time. I would ask the hon. gentleman to allow this question to stand as a notice of motion, and the return will be prepared as soon as possible.

Mr. COPP. Then, Mr. Speaker, I would ask that my question stand as a notice of motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question cannot stand in that way as a notice of motion. The hon. gentleman will have to send it in to the Clerk.

CRUISER "LA CANADIENNE."

Mr. LEMIEUX asked :

1. Whether Commander Wakeham has made known to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries the motives which induced him to place the cruiser "La Canadienne" at the disposal of the Conservative candidate in Gaspé, during the late general elections?

2. Who authorized Commander Wakeham to carry the Conservative candidate to the Magdalen Islands?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies.) 1. Yes. The report is in the department, and I will be happy to show it to the hon. gentleman, if he calls there, or to bring it down, if he moves for it. 2. The Hon. Mr. Angers.

T. D. GREENE, D.L.S.

Mr. OLIVER asked :

In what capacity and locality was T. D. Greene, D.L.S., employed by the Department of Indian Affairs, during the month of June last, and how many miles of lines did he survey during that month?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies.) 1. The official record does not show what particular locality Mr. Greene was employed in during the month of June, or how many miles of lines he surveyed during that month. He is now engaged on the St. Peter's Reserve, near West Selkirk, Man., and has been asked to furnish the department with the desired information. 2. Mr. Greene was engaged from the 21st May to the 6th July in Ontario, in retracing the south-east boundary of the Six Nations Reserve, which boundary is in the electoral district of Haldimand, and near to the electoral district of Brant, and in retracing the boundaries of the lands held by the Mount Elgin Institute, on the Indian Reserve in the township of Caradoc, in the electoral district of Middlesex, and in surveying and subdividing some Indian holdings in the same reserve. 3. The returns received from Mr. Greene show that the total length of lines surveyed by him in that time amounts to about 21 miles.

OYSTER FISHING, P.E.I.

Mr. HACKETT asked :

Did fishing oysters, under the authority of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, commence in the East and West Rivers, near Charlottetown, in the province of Prince Edward Island, on the 14th September instant? Was the same privilege allowed in the other rivers and bays of that province? If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies.) 1. Yes. 2. No; because the privileges was not asked for, and was conceded in the east and west rivers to enable the oyster men to supply the provincial exhibition, export being prohibited.

THE SOULANGES CANAL.

Mr. BERGERON asked :

What was the estimated cost of the Soulanges Canal when tenders were asked? Who were the original contractors? What is the amount of money already spent on the canal? What are the names of the different contractors, and the amount of money they have received respectively? Is the work progressing satisfactorily? When is it seriously expected that the work will be finished?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The estimated cost of the Soulanges Canal, when tenders were asked, was $4,750,000. The original contractors' names were: Archibald Stewart, O'Leary Brothers, George Goodwin, Charles Raynor, Randolph MacDonald, Rogers & Taylor, O'Brien & Co., Dominion Bridge Co., Hyde & Co., C. J. De Sola, Bellhouse, Dillon & Co. The amount of money spent on the canal to the 18th September, 1896, is $2,279,977.62. The names of the different contractors are: Archibald Stewart, O'Leary Brothers, George Goodwin, Charles Raynor, Randolph MacDonald, Rogers & Taylor and Poupore, Fraser & Co., Dominion Bridge Co., Hyde & Co., C. J. De Sola, Bellhouse, Dillon & Co. The amount of money they have received respectively is: $409,500, $147,380.30, $276,780, $179,096, $389,390, $188,036.50, $193,430, $10,267, $10,535.28, $31,187.91, $39,234.62.

Mr. BERGERON. The answer to the last part of the question—when is it expected the work will be finished?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. In the opinion of the officials of the department, it will take, at the present rate of progress, probably in the neighbourhood of twenty years.

PORT RICHMOND BREAKWATER, N.S.

Mr. GILLIES asked:

Is it intended by the Government to provide in the Supplementary Estimates, during the present session, for the construction of a breakwater at Port Richmond, Richmond County?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). It is not the intention of the Government.

ESQUIMALT AND NANAIMO RAILWAY BELT.

Mr. McINNES asked:

1. Prior to the grant of land, known as the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway belt, from the province of British Columbia to the Dominion Government in trust for the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company, were any rights acquired by any person by pre-emption or otherwise in any of the land or coal included in said belt?

2. If so, were any reservations made in said grant in favour of such rights, and were such rights recognized by the Dominion Government in executing the said trust?

3. Why were the coal rights pertaining to lands pre-empted prior to January 1st, 1882, and situated in the said belt, not granted to the pre-emptors by the Dominion Government?

4. Has any application been made by the said company to the Dominion Government for a grant of land in lieu of that alienated in the said belt prior to the grant to the said company? If so, for what amount, and does such application ask for the coal rights pertaining to such lands?

5. Is it the intention of the Government to investigate the claims of certain settlers on lands in the said belt who claim that they have been deprived of certain rights guaranteed them, by subsection 5 of section 7 of an Act passed by the Parliament of Canada in 47 Victoria, intitled "An Act respecting the Vancouver Island Railway."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). 1. Yes, to the extent as acknowledged by the government of British Columbia, of 86,346 acres. 2. (a.) Yes. The British Columbia statute, 46 Victoria, chapter 14, section 6, provides that the grant "shall not include any lands now held under Crown grant, lease, agreement for sale, or other alienation by the Crown, nor shall it include Indian reserves or settlements. (b.) It was left to the provincial government to complete all transactions which had been initiated before the transfer of the railway reserve to the Dominion Government in trust. 3. As explained in the answer to question No. 2, pre-emptors prior to the 1st January, 1882, and indeed up to the date when the lands in question were transferred by the province to the Dominion, derived their titles from the local government, the lands for which they had records having been excluded by the statute from the transfer to the Dominion Government in trust. The Government of Canada, therefore, had no responsibility for the form of title. It was a question of the completion by the provincial government of a contract into which they had already entered with the pre-emptors. 4. An application has been made by the company to the Dominion Government for a grant of 86,346 acres to compensate for lands alienated by the provincial government to pre-emptors and others either by Crown grant, lease, agreement for sale, or other alienation, up to the date when the lands in question passed to the Dominion. The application does not mention that it includes the coal rights pertaining to the lands applied for. 5. The Government is now considering the propriety of instituting an inquiry into the claims of the settlers.

VANCOUVER ISLAND RAILWAY.

Mr. McINNES asked:

1. Have any applications been made by or on behalf of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company or the British Pacific Railway Company for the usual subsidy of $3,200 per mile towards railway construction on Vancouver Island? If so, what is the date of such application?

2. Did the late Government, in the proposed Supplementary Estimates of last session, or otherwise, make provision for such subsidies?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Yes, application was made by the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company for the usual subsidy of $3,200 per mile towards railway construction on Vancouver Island. The date of application is 24th February, 1896. No provision was made in the Supplementary Estimates of last session or otherwise for this subsidy.

GEORGE R. SMITH.

Mr. GIBSON asked :

Was Mr. G. R. Smith, of the city of Hamilton, recommended by the late Government for a position in the Government service? If so, what was the nature of the recommendation and the salary attached thereto?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Geo. R. Smith was recommended for appointment as preventive officer in the Customs at Niagara Falls, Ont., under date 29th June, 1896, with $700, but the recommendation was withdrawn.

WM. MCGIRR.

Mr. DOUGLAS asked :

Has Wm. McGirr, of the Indian Department, who was sent up west during the recent general election ostensibly for the purpose of making a report in regard to matters pertaining to the St. Peter's band of Indians, made any such report, and, if so, will the Government submit it to Parliament? As the St. Peter's Indian band is located near Winnipeg, were Mr. McGirr's expenses to the Territories at that time, paid?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). 1. The William McGirr referred to made a report on matters pertaining to the St. Peter's band of Indians when he went to the west on the occasion referred to. 2. The report will be submitted to Parliament if desired. 3. There is no record that Mr. McGirr was paid expenses to the Territories at the time referred to in the inquiry. His expenses were paid to Manitoba.

FISHING BOUNTIES.

Mr. GANONG asked :

Is it the intention of the Government in the distribution of the fishing bounty, to allot any portion among the deep sea weir fishermen, and, if so, what amount?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). It is not the intention of the Government to allot any portion of the fishing bounty grant among weir fishermen. 2. The bounty is intended as a compensation, and limited to vessels and boat fishermen whose fishing was more immediately affected by the terms of the Washington Treaty. It has never been allowed to the class of fishermen referred to.

SEIZURES IN BEHRING SEA.

Mr. McDOUGALL asked :

What progress has been made towards a settlement of the claims of the owners of schooners

"Willie McGowan" and "Ariel," seized by the Russian authorities in the Behring Sea, several years ago and which claims were practically admitted by the Russians?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). There is nothing to add to what has already been communicated to the interested parties, with the sanction of Her Majesty's Government, which was to the effect that some delay has occurred in regard to these claims, owing to the necessity for their detailed examination by the law officers of the Crown. Her Majesty's Government trust, however, that no further considerable delay will take place. This information was communicated to the interested parties in Nova Scotia on the 6th May last.

COMMANDER WAKEHAM.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON asked :

1. Is it the intention of the Government to remove Commander Wakeham from the position he occupies and to replace him by Dr. Lavoie, of L'Islet?

2. If so, is Dr. Lavoie the same person who was dismissed from the public service after an investigation held in relation to an accident which happened to the ss. "Lady Head," of which he was the commander?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). No charge has been preferred against Commander Wakeham, and the question of his removal has not been considered.

FISHING SUPPLY AT MAPLE LAKE, N. W. T.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Whether the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has received the suggestions respecting stocking with fish fry the lakes south of Maple Creek at Four Mile Coulee? Whether the Minister will act on the suggestions?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Yes, he has received them. Owing to the great distance and difficulty of transport, it has been impracticable to send whitefish fry to this locality. These young fish are delicate and they perish if carried to great distances.

WOOD MOUNTAIN SCOUTS.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Whether the attention of the Minister of Militia has been called to the list of the scouts from Wood Mountain who served during the rebellion and to the certificate of Inspector Macdonell? Whether he will take such steps this session as will enable the Government to give scrip to the Wood Mountain scouts for their services during the rebellion?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA (Mr. Borden). My attention has not been called to this matter, but since the question was placed on the paper, I have asked the Deputy Minister to make a report on the subject.

RESTIGOUCHE AND VICTORIA RAILWAY.

Mr. McALISTER asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to ask Parliament during the present session to grant a revote of subsidies granted in 1892 and 1894 to the Restigouche and Victoria Railway, said subsidies having lapsed ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). It is not the intention of the Government to ask Parliament during the present session to grant a revote of subsidies granted in 1892 and 1894 to the Restigouche and Victoria Railway.

HARBOUR SHELTER AT PETIT DE GRAT.

Mr. GILLIES asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to provide in the Supplementary Estimates during the present session the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, or any other amount, for the construction at Petit de Grat, Isle Madame, county of Richmond ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). No.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). I should like to amend my answer to question 12 by stating that the amount I gave as the sum total of the cost of the buildings at the Experimental Farm, Ottawa, amounting to $16,000 odd, by adding $15,229, making the two amounts $176,012.40.

DISMISSALS ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Railways to the return which he laid on the Table of the House on Friday. I think I shall be able to show him that the return is not by any means complete. The return ordered was for :

Copies of any reports or correspondence and the reason for the dismissal of Roderick McLeod and Robert McKay, bridge tenders on the Intercolonial Railway bridge, Pictou, Nova Scotia, and the appointment of Thomas Fraser and A. Thomas in their places and stead.

The Minister of Railways was good enough to inform the committee the other evening that complaint had been made by Mr. McDonald, that these men had been very active partisans in the late election, requesting that they should be removed and two others whose names he gave, should be appointed in their place. The Minister went on to say :

Mr. BORDEN (King's).

I directed him to communicate with Mr. Maxwell ; Mr. Maxwell communicated with Mr. Archibald ; and under general directions touching these two cases which I gave to Mr. Pottinger these men were removed and two persons, Thomas Fraser and A. Thomas were appointed in their stead.

Again the Minister referring to that subject said—

Mr. SPEAKER I am inclined to think that the hon. gentleman is proceeding at too great length. The first part of his reference was in relation to an answer to a question.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It had reference to a return brought down to this House on an order of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is scarcely in order.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that I am perfectly in order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has hardly a right to proceed now with a discussion which may become general.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am perfectly in order, Sir. On the Orders of the Day being called, I am simply calling the attention of the Minister of Railways to an incomplete return, and giving my reasons why I press upon his attention that he should cause to be prepared a supplementary return. I am now merely calling his attention to a statement made in committee. In addition to the statement I have mentioned the hon. Minister said :

Mr. McDonald first wrote to me to say that there were two men employed on the railway who actively intervened in the election, who were exceedingly active and exceedingly offensive. He certainly did describe to me that they were active canvassers in the election.

I pass over a portion of the Minister's remarks because I only wish to refer to this particular part of the communication. The hon. gentleman continued :

I immediately wrote to him saying that I proposed to take a very careful course with regard to Government employees ; that while I could not investigate the matter myself, I desired him to tell me, on his own personal assurance as a gentleman, or something to that effect, implying that I relied on his word of honour as a gentleman, that what he alleged as true ; and on his giving me that assurance, I authorized Mr. Pottinger to permit the displacement of those men.

Now, I desire to say that none of that correspondence appears although the order of the House asks for it. The papers which have been put in the Minister's hands relate to a mere request from Mr. McDonald—without charge or other statement—that two men whom he nominates shall be put in place of these men, and strange to say—and I bring this again to the attention of the Minister—the date of the first communication is the 2nd of July, which was before the late Government had left office and long before the hon. gentleman was Minister of Railways. Mr. Maxwell the trackmaster says in a letter to Mr. Archibald, dated the 2nd of July :

I herewith inclose you a letter from E. M. McDonald.

That letter is not among these papers and it is referred to more than once. That letter is stated here to be a letter asking for a change of men on the draw bridge on Pictou harbour, and it says :

The men who were always on this draw bridge were Roderick McLeod and McKay. Now they want those men changed and others named in their place.

The Minister will see there is no suggestion of a charge in that. On the 13th of July there was another letter from the trackmaster which referred again to this letter.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that it would hardly do to disturb the business of the House by going into a long criticism of this nature.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am not going into any criticism.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is going through a long criticism of a return which has been produced. If the hon. gentleman wishes to ask for a corrected return that is another thing, but I really think his present course would lead to interminable discussion.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I expect no discussion whatever, Mr. Speaker. If, after giving you, Sir, a reference and a precedent for my course, you prefer that I should not address the House at this time, I will certainly obey your ruling. I would like to call your attention to Bourinot, page 423. Referring to this rule 13 and speaking of the calling of orders, after referring to many cases as to the practice of this House, Bourinot goes on to say :

They make these explanations in reference to an inaccuracy in the official record, or in the newspapers, * * * * or in respect to the incompleteness or inaccuracy of certain returns brought down under the order of the House.

I think I can appeal to the Minister of Railways for his support in connection with the observations I have made, when I say that my object now is not at all to raise a discussion but rather to impress upon him the grounds upon which I ask that he shall give orders to his officers to have a complete return prepared. It is obvious from the remarks I have made so far, that this return has been prepared without reference to the many papers that were desired and the existence of which the Minister has proven in this House. I refer to the letters from Mr. E. M. McDonald; the letters upon which the Minister himself says he took action. I am unable of course to make myself perfectly clear as to the value of these papers, unless with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I am permitted to follow this correspondence at a little greater length. I, of course, am subject to your ruling, and if I am not permitted to follow a full statement now, I shall reserve my observations. I think I am in order, Sir, but I shall defer to your opinion.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has raised a point as to the inaccuracy of this return, and if the Minister desires to make any observations on that statement it will be quite in order to do so. But, what I deprecate is, a long statement which will necessarily be argumentative and lead to a discussion.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I shall endeavour to avoid that. As I stated at the outset, and as I again venture to think the Minister of Railways accepted the statement, my desire was not to provoke a debate or to do more than convince the Minister, that there are other documents required to be submitted before this Order of the House will be obeyed. There is again a letter from Mr. McDonald of July 17th, in which he says :

About a week ago I recommended to Mr. Maxwell two names of men for the position of draw men on the bridge at West River. I understood from him that two men were placed there temporarily pending the decision of the recommendation. Would you be kind enough to arrange, if possible, to have the temporary men laid aside and my recommendation acted upon.

Then Mr. Archibald, the engineer, on July 21st, writes referring to this letter, and Mr. Archibald's letter is absent.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What is the date of the letter which is absent ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The date is not given nor is the letter, but it is apparently the letter upon which the whole action is taken, for instance, he calls attention, in this letter of July 21st, to the other letter, in this way :

Two men named Roderick McLeod and Robert McKay have been employed attending to this draw, at the season of the year it requires to be used, since the road was opened, about nine years ago. The draw is used generally from June until December. In addition to attending to the draw, these men do the track work and general repairs to the long trestle bridge on either side of the draw, but they are always within hailing distance in case it is necessary to open the draw. They are paid $1.25 per day, and insurance is kept off them. This year they were put on on the 1st July. On the 2nd instant Trackmaster Maxwell wrote me inclosing a letter from E. M. McDonald, of Pictou, asking that a change of men be made on the draw. I assumed from this letter which you will find herewith, that no men had then been taken on, and instructed the trackmaster to make the section men attend to the draw until further advised, and he referred the papers to you. I learned a day or two afterwards, that the men usually employed, had been taken on on the 1st of July by Trackmaster Maxwell and that he had dropped them upon receiving my instructions, to have the section men attend to the draw until further advised. Upon the receipt of this information, with your approval, I instructed Maxwell to continue the men usually employed until further instructed.

That letter is referred to more than once but is not included in these papers. Then Mr. McDonald writes on July 27th, to Mr. Pottinger :

I have had no word as yet in regard to my recommendation of the men on the draw. As this is not a case of recommending a discharge, I think we should have heard about it before this, and would like to have my recommendation carried out.

Again on August 6th, Mr. McDonald writes :

I trust that the recommendation on the draw should be carried out.

Then, on August 6, Mr. Pottinger writes to Mr. McDonald :

I have heard from the Minister of Railways, and instructions have been given to employ Thomas and Arthur Fraser.

That letter I would ask the Minister also to kindly have brought down unless there is some strong reason to the contrary.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It may have been verbal.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It may have been, but I would ask the Minister's attention to it. On August 6, Mr. Pottinger writes to Mr. Archibald :

I presume the intention of the Minister is that the Frasers should have an allowance for a few days at the end of the season to make up for the time from the 1st of July, during which they were not employed.

If these instructions were not oral, the Minister might have that added. These are the main points. Without them it is impossible really to appreciate any of the grounds upon which these men were dismissed, or the official correspondence upon which the Minister made his statement. He could not have had in mind this particular series of letters, but a series which appears to be absent, and I would ask him to cause his officers to lay before him any further papers that exist relating to the subject.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have no objection whatever to having inquiries made as to whether there are any other letters in the department which could be produced, than those which have already been produced. A portion of the statement which the hon. member read as having been made by me the other day was based upon written and a portion of it upon verbal communication which took place between Mr. McDonald and myself. The verbal communication of course would not be produced. The written correspondence was entirely of a private and confidential character between us, and I think I have stated very frankly and very fully, both what Mr. McDonald stated to me, and what I in reply said to him. I really think that even if the confidential correspondence were produced, it would not shed any more light on the subject or help the hon. gentleman to any better understanding of the question; and as the correspondence between Mr. McDonald and myself was not official and not in the department, I do not feel called upon, at all events without considering the matter, to say at this moment that I would be justified or in duty bound to produce that correspondence. I do not say that I will not do it, but I will consider the matter, and let the hon. member know whether I ought to do so or not.

INQUIRY FOR A RETURN.

Mr. GILLIES. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the Postmaster General, or some of his colleagues on his behalf who may be in a position to answer, whether the papers asked for by me eleven days ago in the matter of the Morrison contract have been brought down?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The Postmaster General is not here this afternoon. I will call his attention to the matter when he comes in.

PAYMENT OF EMPLOYEES.

Mr. McNEILL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Finance if anything has been done towards the payment of those employees in the Printing Bureau. They are very much in need.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). We have not been in a position to do anything, possibly because of the particular point which was given to the criticism of that item in the Governor General's warrant, by hon. gentlemen opposite, including, I believe, the hon. member from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill). It was argued that whatever might be said in justification of other items, that one was open to objection. I have had intimation, however, from hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, that the Estimates would make more rapid progress if we simply proceeded with the general Estimates without taking a vote for a special credit. That intimation being given, I have withdrawn the notice I gave for that purpose, and I hope that by tomorrow evening such progress may be made with the Estimates that I shall be able to get a Bill through, so that those people may be paid.

Mr. McNEILL. While I objected to the Government having taken possession of this money under Governor General's warrants, I thought, as they had the money in hand, and as these men were in great need of money now, though they were not in need of it at all when the money was taken, that some arrangement might be made across the House whereby they might be paid.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman is aware that an assurance was given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) that though that item appeared in the Governor General's warrant, we should not act upon it. In the face of that, we have not felt it proper to make the expenditure.

Mr. McNEILL. I am merely referring to an arrangement made across the floor of the House.

SUPPLY—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair, I wish to say a few words about a matter that concerns the dignity of this House. We can have no doubt that it concerns the dignity of the House, because we have the high authority of the Toronto "Globe," in the conclusion of an article, that the subject of which it calls attention affects the dignity of Parliament. In the Toronto "Globe" of Saturday last there appears an article headed "The Salary Grab." I do not know how it would be possible to use language strong enough to characterize the injustice of that article. It sets out by declaring that now—that is, on the 19th of September—we may give up all hope of concluding this session within 30 days, and it proceeds to say that the session might have been concluded within 30 days. It accuses the Opposition of being at fault. It lays the sin, if sin it be, that the session was not concluded within 30 days, at the door of the Opposition; and feeling that it was in a position somewhat untenable, it then says:

It may be asked, and we have no desire to evade the question, why lay the blame on the Opposition instead of on Parliament as a whole? In the first place, the duration of a session is not one of those matters in which the majority rule prevails.

Well, Sir, it was hardly necessary, with recent experience in men's minds, to have laid that down:

There is no means of applying the cloture in our Parliament, and if 150 men desired a short session, 50 could thwart them.

In the second place, the Government—we speak advisedly and with a knowledge of the exact state of affairs—earnestly desired that the business of the session should be transacted within two weeks. In the third place—

And I call the attention of the House to this, because it contains an admission that vitiates the position taken up by the writer, that destroys the whole force of the article and robs it of all cogency.

In the third place they—

The Government—

—had the assent of the mass of their followers to that course.

It does not say that the Government had the assent of their followers to a man to that course, and in fact it dares make no such statement with the history of this Parliament before it. So far as I myself am concerned I do not feel called upon to defend from any personal point of view Parliament, or any portion of Parliament, against a charge like this. I had an important motion on the Notice paper in regard to the policy of the Government, and, undoubtedly, one of the reasons that I did not propose that motion on going into committee before, was this—that I knew that that sort of criticism is liable to proceed from that sort of critic, and I wanted to be in a position to say that for my part I had not contributed to the prolongation of the session. But, Sir, what is the history of this Parliament so far as this matter is concerned? Without going into the merits of the question at all the sin is more completely at the door of the majority of the members supporting the First Minister than it is at the door of the Opposition. After all the great questions brought before this Parliament had been discussed, after we had discussed the Governor General's warrants, after we had discussed various important questions, there was still time enough to have made progress in committee and to have done what this writer seems to think would have been of enormous value to the country—to have concluded the session within thirty days. But the fear of that arose in the breasts of certain gentlemen opposite that the Opposition, after all, was going to confine its criticism within such bounds as to enable the House to get through its work within four weeks. And what did we see on the floor of this House? When the item for the support of the High Commissioner in London was brought forward, whence did the opposition come, whence did the hot shot pour into the proposal for that vote? It came from the ranks of gentlemen opposite. The member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) spoke and he gave us some of the sweetness and light that comes from the coal oil regions of Canada. That hon. gentleman in his swash-buckler style opposed a vote that the Government of which he was a supporter proposed for the High Commissioner. He actually rose and made a speech attacking the office, and, above all, attacking the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Though he was supporting the vote.

Mr. DAVIN. Of course. We have had several instances of that sort of support that the present Government enjoy. Well, what result could there be but one? I need hardly say that the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition was bound to defend himself, and others were bound to get up and criticise so important a vote and also say something in defence of other hon. gentlemen who were either directly or by implication assailed. Then we had an edifying spectacle. It appears that two leading members of the Government had gone and put their arms around the neck of the hon. member for West Lambton, and had brought him to a repentant frame of mind. I have seen men eat leeks before, but I have never seen one eat so long a leek as that hon. gentleman ate—and with such an edifying air of repentance too. All this took up time. On subsequent occasions we had speeches from hon. gentlemen which put it out of the question that Parliament should conclude its business within the desired time. This writer then goes on to say :

But the end and object of this criticism ought to be the saving of public money ; in the present case it means the waste of public money. There has, in fact, been no pretense of protecting the taxpayer's pocket. The discussions forced by the Opposition have not been carried on with that view at all. Criticism of the Estimates occupied a very small proportion of the month that has now elapsed. The Opposition ranged over the whole field of politics, wanted to know why the policy of the Government on this question and that was not carried out immediately, and wasted the time of the House by reading long newspaper reports of ministerial utterances and asking to have them confirmed.

One of the great functions of Parliament is to protect the public pocket, but it is not its sole function. Parliament is practically the Government of the country and everything connected with the Government—the position of the Government, the character of the Ministers and their utterances on public platforms to the criticism of which this writer objects—all these things concern the public. Take, for instance, one thing that has retarded business, that prevented us bringing forward business of importance to the country—the vacancy in the portfolio of the Interior. There were many things in connection with the North-west, questions of irrigation, questions of reservoirs, questions of administration that we wished to bring forward. But, it was of no use, as those of us who have had experience know, to bring these things forward when you had to deal with an amateur Minister for the time being who could not commit his department to any policy whatever. But, Sir, it was especially necessary in my opinion that questions should be asked and this writer objects to that being done. He objects to questions being asked, forsooth. Here was a new Government come into power, and they come here with a Speech from the Throne in which nothing whatever is offered, and they ask us to give them all the money they want. Why, Sir, the only thing you can compare it to is the tramp who meets you on the highway and demands of you your purse and your silence about the robbery. But, there was a peculiarity about the campaign that made it necessary that we should put these questions in order to have some idea of what was the policy of the Government. Why, Sir, now

The oracles are dumb,
No voice or hideous hum,
Runs through the arched roof—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. What is the "Oh, oh" about. I will repeat the lines :

The oracles are dumb,
No voice or hideous hum
Runs through the arched roof—

Nor through the rest of Canada. What is the "Oh, oh," about? I hear my hon. friend from Burrard (Mr. Maxwell) saying "Oh, oh." I have known gentlemen of his profession who were supposed to have some knowledge of literature, especially of that literature from which this is quoted. But, Sir, he probably will be surprised when I tell him that these lines are from the greatest poem in our language. "The Ode on the Nativity, by Milton." Where does the "Oh, oh," come in?

Mr. LANDERKIN. I think he is sorry the orator is not dumb.

Mr. DAVIN. The oracles are dumb. The only oracle that is not dumb is my hon. friend (Mr. Landerkin) and he is an intermittent fountain that plays occasionally for our edification. But before Parliament met we had statements made by various members of the Government, and especially from the First Minister, year after year, that this country was in a very serious state. In 1893, in this very city, at the Rideau Rink, the First Minister told the greatest meeting of Liberals, as he himself described it, that had ever taken place in Canada, that the ills of Canada were not constitutional but economic. He described Canada as in a very serious position. His own words pronounced the session before that from this desk, were still ringing in his ears, words spoken in supporting a motion of my hon. friend from Simcoe to condemn the Government because they were carrying on an inquiry with a view to tariff reform. In that speech the hon. gentleman said that we should at once do what the member for Simcoe asked. But the hon. First Minister is in no position, and therefore his party, and therefore his organ, are in no position whatever to condemn hon. gentlemen on this side for asking that action should immediately be taken. What did he himself say in this very speech delivered at the Rideau Rink? He was referring to a speech of Sir John Thompson in the beginning of that year, and he complained that two months after Sir John Thompson's speech, the Thompson Government did not carry out the promise made by the head of the Government. If what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, and if the hon. gentleman was in a position to criticise the Government of Sir John Thompson for not carrying out Sir John Thompson's promise made two months previously, surely we are in a position to expect that the hon. gentleman should carry out the promise he has made going over three years. Now, let me read what the hon. gentleman said in that address in the Rideau Rink, on the 20th June :

Look at what took place a few months ago. Sir John Thompson, at the Board of Trade banquet in Toronto, told a large audience that the Government would be prepared next session to lop off some mouldering branches. When we came to the session we were fully prepared to see the Government lop off these mouldering branches; but we found that the Government had changed their view, and what were mouldering branches in January, like the rod of Moses, became flowering boughs in March. They had no alteration to make. Gentlemen, you have nothing to expect from them. Apart from the logics of events, you have the word of Mr. Foster himself, who has declared again and again within the last few weeks that tariff reform would consist in this, that there might be a few changes here and there, but that the principle of protection in the National Policy would be maintained. This simply means that the Government are going to scratch off the paint, and put on a new coat of varnish, and call it tariff reform.

Now, what I want to call attention to is the complaint made by the hon. member for Quebec East in regard to the Thompson Government. He complained that the Thompson Government did not, within two months, implement the promise made by the head of that Government, and he complained that the ex-Minister of Finance had used language that, according to his construction of it, seemed to indicate that the Government would not go as far as Sir John Thompson indicated when he said that the mouldering branches would be taken off. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have had from the hon. gentleman himself statements that sounded as if he was going to do the very thing that he accused the Conservative party of having been urged to do, namely, to put on the clothes of his opponents. Are we not then, with his example before us, doubly justified in coming here and asking for something definite? Are we not justified in coming here and saying: We want to know what is your policy, and if your policy is such as can be carried out this session, we certainly want you to carry it out? Now, Sir, I want to give an instance of how necessary it was to catechise—if I may without impropriety use such a word—to catechise the hon. gentleman; because I put a question on the paper in regard to what he said at Moose Jaw respecting freight rates in the North-west Territories, and the answer the hon. gentleman gave me was that he would so change the tariff that the results would affect freight rates; and he indicated clearly enough this session that he had no intention whatever of bringing in direct legislation dealing with freight rates. Now, Sir, I will give you, and I will give the First Minister, some idea of how completely he was misunderstood at Moose Jaw. Here is an extract from an article from the pen of a gentleman who signed the strongest agreement that could be signed, and who got value for it; who signed an agreement to give his paper for three years as an organ of the Conservative party, and to support me for three years, and he got solid consideration for it. That gentleman, Sir,—inspired by whom? By somebody up there, no doubt; guaranteed by whom? By somebody up there, no doubt; and on the eve of an election, three weeks before the election, he left me without an organ, turned my own guns against me; and this is the way that he speaks on the 30th July, in regard to the First Minister :

The Regina "Leader,"

Thursday, evening, July 30, 1896.

We have a considerable measure of confidence in Mr. Laurier's good intentions towards the west. The attitude of the "Globe," the most authoritative Liberal newspaper, leads us to believe that the new Government is seized of the fact that no Canadian policy will be successful, of which the main feature does not look energetically towards development of Canada's chief inheritance. Of late years the North-west has not been making satisfactory progress. And why? Various causes might be assigned for the unsatisfactory fact, for our lack of advancement has been due to no single cause; but of those causes undoubtedly one of the chief has been the burdensome railway rates. We say advisedly that no satisfactory advancement will be made by these Territories so long as the rates prevail which at present affect all points between Brandon and Vancouver especially. We would like to be able to din it into the ears of the new Government that railway rates amelioration is vital to the well-being of this country. How it may best be accomplished we do not pretend to know. That it can be accomplished, we are prepared to prove out of Mr. Laurier's own mouth. Speaking at Moose Jaw on 28th September, 1894, Hon. Mr. Laurier said:—"I understand the freight rates you have to pay are outrageous. This condition must have a solution. I speak here as an honest man, and any pledge I make to you will be carried out to the letter. There must be competition,—there must be a solution for this unbearable condition; and I promise and pledge myself that at the proper time the solution and remedy shall be applied."

Now, here are oracular words, here are words that would lead any plain man hearing them to conclude that the First Minister would deal by legislation with railway rates if he came into power. That was Mr. Laurier's promise. Here is what a friendly critic says :

The time for fulfilment has come. In those sentences the hon. gentleman put into language a sentiment which the majority of our farmers felt and still feel with intensity, that "there must be a solution for this unbearable condition." Sir Donald Smith is not a man well calculated to assist in applying the solution and remedy.

That is an extract from what is now one of his strongest organs in the North-west Territories. When I asked the hon. gentleman what he meant by those words which were quoted in the North-west as a proof that the railway rates would be dealt with, what was the answer which the hon. gentleman gave me? The answer given me by the hon. gentleman was that he did not mean to legislate in regard to railway rates, but what he would do was to legislate in regard to the tariff, and the result of that legislation would be to lower the freight rates.

I now want to deal with the merits of this question. Sir, it would be a wrong thing wantonly to protract any session, and with the history of the past session and of previous sessions before us, the country will be able to judge whether hon. gentlemen opposite are in a position to criticise hon. members on this side of the House in reference to wantonly protracting any session. But will any man say that it was in the interest of the people of Canada that we should allow millions of money to have been got by Governor General's warrants without discussing them? The only thing that makes it tolerable, that makes it bearable for one minute, that places the Government in a position to hold up its head in the face of Canada is that in this House we are able to criticise the issue of those Governor General's warrants, to point out the danger of that course, and by doing so to take all the steps in our power to prevent its being carried into a precedent. Then take the dismissals of civil servants. What were we doing in criticising the wrongful dismissal of civil servants? Were we simply trying to save a friend here and there? Not at all. We were doing something far more important. We were doing something compared with which the saving of a man or a friend here and there sinks into insignificance. What we were doing was this, we were vindicating the freedom of the franchise to the electors throughout the country, and we were calling public attention and criticism to our aid to prevent hon. gentlemen opposite doing what some of them the moment it was held up before them in this House were ready to proclaim they could not think of doing. We were pointing out that gentlemen having the franchise and possessing as good a right to use that franchise as any elector in the country should, not because they voted and because they behaved as free citizens should behave, be driven out on the streets and deprived of their bread. Sir, the result of that discussion has been most beneficial, because although we had most extraordinary doctrine propounded some nights ago by the Minister of Railways, which however he appeared to retract afterwards in a kind of way, still we had from some other hon. gentlemen the enunciation of the true principle, for instance from the Controller of Inland Revenue and also from—

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman, I am afraid, is referring to a previous debate.

Mr. DAVIN. I only refer to it by way of illustration.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid the hon. gentleman is not in order.

Mr. DAVIN. Then I will pass away from that point. I think, in stating what we had done, I was within the rule enabling me to use that as an illustration. It is impossible to properly treat this question without doing so. Now, I take the school question, in which we in the North-west are very much interested. The editor of the "Globe," who is a most able man, was in this city last week, and he told hon. gentlemen friends of mine—at all events, he told several gentlemen, that the school question was settled, and we have a confirmation of that statement in an article which appeared in the same "Globe." That article declares that the question is settled; and it makes reference to Archbishop Langevin in a way I do not understand. It says:

Archbishop Langevin is a Tory politician. We are told that he has been at Rome and has consulted the Pope, and that the Holy Father justifies his position and that of the bishops of Quebec on the school question. It is not too much to say that Archbishop Langevin and his associates attempted to set up the theocracy in Canada, and that it is this conspiracy against constitutional government that the Archbishop seeks to have approved at Rome. All this meets with no word of censure from the Conservative papers, but the mere hint that some Liberal or some friend of Mr. Laurier's may go to Rome to protest against the exercise of ecclesiastical tyranny in Quebec sends the organs into hysterics. Immediately Mr. Laurier and his followers became "vassals of Rome," the Queen's majesty is outraged, and all across the country there is nothing but ashes and saw-dust.

I want to make a criticism on that statement as bearing on the politics of this country, and as dealing with a question in which we are greatly interested in the North-west. I do not know whether Archbishop Langevin is a Tory politician or not. Whether he is or not is a matter with which the Conservative party is in no way concerned, and I suppose the Conservative party had nothing to do with sending him to Rome. But if the First Minister sent officially a prelate or ecclesiastic to Rome, this House should know something of it. If the hon. gentleman sent an ecclesiastic only to represent him in his private capacity, for instance to tell His Holiness that the Prime Minister had made a settlement with Mr. Sifton which might not meet with the approval of His Holiness, and that he wanted his personal absolution, we have no concern with that. But if he sent anybody to Rome to represent this Government, officially or unofficially, it is a matter which this House is concerned, and it ought to know about it. This very paper states that the school question has been settled. Here is what it says :

We made that statement in good faith ; it was accurate, and it remains accurate. Our contemporaries who are now snarling at the Government and manufacturing deadlocks and crises will probably not have long to wait for convincing evidence of the truth of the "Globe's" statement. There will be no coercion under Laurier.

If that means anything, it means that the school question has been settled, that an arrangement has been entered into with Mr. Sifton, that that agreement is complete ; and if it is complete, is it a proper thing that the editor of a newspaper should be informed of it before this Parliament is made aware of the fact ? If so, it is an important matter that regarding this question, in which the whole of the North-west and Manitoba are interested, is declared to be settled, and this confidence given to the editor of a newspaper, and kept from this Parliament which represents the people ; this is a grave crime and misdemeanour against parliamentary government and constitutional precedent, and it is an act of which we have a right to complain. The idea that Parliament should assemble here, and that a number of gentlemen perfectly new to it should come here and say : we want all this money and we want to muzzle you and put on this Parliament a drag ; we have just come into power, after being eighteen years out, and we have brought a lot of new men into the Government, who have never been in the Dominion Parliament before, but anything we do you must not criticise. That reason given by the "Globe" is a very good reason why we should rather criticise them and try to get out of them what their views are. There appeared in the "Globe" a little more than a week ago a letter entitled : "The new Cabinet in Parliament—a glance to the right and left of the Speaker." And in that letter we had a sketch of the new Ministry. Well, Mr. Speaker, there used to be a time when the hon. First Minister was wont to refer to the Conservative Ministers as the gods upon Olympus. Now, I suppose the hon. gentleman himself and his colleagues are the gods upon Olympus ; but if they are, I do not think we can congratulate them on lighting up with their smiles that peak where no winds blow. Brief as is their elevation to the heights of Olympus, they have some premonition of storms in that placid region. Well, they are all wise and all hon. gentlemen, but this is what their own correspondent, who, I believe, sits up aloft and looks down with scorn on the Opposition as utterly lacking in strength, said about the Ministers, which made it necessary for us to put some questions. He says : "They know how to be silent. That, in fact, promises to be the great characteristic of the Government." No doubt, they consider it best to keep all the information they possibly can from us, but it is our duty, as representing the public, to press for information. The public are entitled to know what is the exact meaning of some of the utterances of those hon. gentlemen. Why, we have had a most extraordinary spectacle exhibited by the First Minister himself. We have had him taking the newspaper reporters into his confidence and declaring to them his policy on most important questions, when this Parliament sought in vain to obtain from him any such information. Therefore, when we are told that the Ministers know how to be silent, it is the more important that we should do our best to learn from them what they are evidently determined to conceal. But the correspondent goes on to say :

It is whispered that, at the Liberal caucus, Sir Oliver Mowat was very warmly received.

That was not, Mr. Speaker, the caucus held on Friday, but the one held a short time before. Now, it is not, Mr. Speaker, a proper thing, in my opinion, to refer of one's own motion, to what took place at a caucus ; but if the members of any party refer to it in order to strengthen themselves, then it is open to anybody to say what has leaked out, and what does so often leak out, of the proceedings in caucus. I heard something of what took place. I believe that Sir Oliver Mowat was very warmly received. He got up and urged the members of the Government party to so act that they would conclude the business of the House in thirty days, and he was warmly received by the rank and file of the party, who told him that they did not want any such advice. Regarding what this writer says concerning the weakness of the Opposition, I may say also that I heard that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who used not to be very complimentary to the poor Tories, told his followers in this caucus that the present Opposition was the strongest that ever existed in Canada, and that the members of the Liberal party would have to be in their seats and support their leaders, or else the Opposition would get away with them. When what takes place in a Liberal caucus is referred to by the Liberal newspapers, we are perfectly free to comment on it. But there is another reason why we are bound to question the Government. I am greatly surprised that the hon. leader of the Government (Mr. Laurier) did not explain to the House the principles on which he formed his Cabinet. That he should have done so, if he followed precedent, is palpable, but there is a reason given by this correspondent why he should have done so. This correspondent says :

Clear away all the members of the Government, and you would yet have on the ministerial benches to-day a stronger lot of men than are to be found in Opposition. To the right of the Speaker there are such men as Mr. Charlton, Mr. Lister, Mr. Cameron, Mr. Fraser, Mr. Lount, Mr. Langelier, Mr. Bain, Mr. McMullen, Mr. Sutherland, Mr. Somerville, Mr. Russell, of Halifax, Mr. Britton, of Kingston, Dr. Landerkin, Mr. McMillan, Dr. McDonald and Mr. Oliver, of Alberta, and men of such solid business worth and weight as Mr. Wood, of Hamilton.

Here are seventeen men that are put forward as great men on the Government side, and most of them were in the last Parliament, and when we have the leading organ of the Government in Toronto telling us of those great men, who are all outside the present Government, and when we find the leader of the Government passing over these men and bringing in four or five men from the outside. I say that he was bound, in justice to the Reform party and to this House and to the whole country, to explain how it was that he ignored the claims of those bright and shining lights, those meteors in the sky of Liberalism, who had so ably held up his standard in this Parliament, and brought in new and untried men from the outside darkness. I think that under the circumstances, now that we have had this instructive letter from Ottawa and that I have brought it to the attention of the First Minister, we should have the long delayed explanation. I cannot refer to any past debate. You, Mr. Speaker, would be a lion in my path if I attempted to comment on anything that has been said previously this session, and consequently I must go to other sessions in times long past. We have it on record from a gentleman whom the present First Minister has often declared to have been one of the noblest and grandest characters that any country ever produced, and I am not going to differ with him in that—I refer to the late Alexander Mackenzie—who made the memorable statement that in order to save the treasury from his own friends, in order to protect it against those spotless Liberals, whom the Hon. Mr. Jones, of Halifax, declared at the Rideau Rink in 1893—I would like to have seen him as he made the statement and can well imagine his winking the other eye as he did so—would invariably leave office rather than sacrifice one of their principles—we had it from the late Hon. Alex. Mackenzie that he had to lie on his arms like a soldier in order to watch and save the treasury from these Liberals when he was in power. Are we to be told that the leopard has so completely changed his spots and the Ethiopian his skin, that there is such a wonderful transformation in the Reform party that the Opposition must not criticise them, without being taunted with the charge that our sole aim was to prolong the session beyond thirty days? For my part, though I refrained from pressing that motion of mine, anticipating such a criticism as this, I say that I would share any responsibility that might attach to extending the session, when I consider that if we were to take the propositions of that article—and what gives them importance is that the Government would fain impress them upon the public mind of Canada—if we were to take the propositions in that article, and if they were allowed to obtain, what condition of things would you have? We do not need to have the light of Mr. Mackenzie's language in our minds at all, because we know it from the history of government. If we were to adopt the principle of that article, if we were to muzzle the watch-dog of Parliament, if we were to stop parliamentary criticism on the actions of the Government, if we were to allow them to get millions of money, as they thought they should get it, while we sat silent and with folded hands; if we did that, we would be untrue to the trust that our constituencies have reposed in us. What signifies three or four hundred thousand dollars; it is lighter than dust in the balance compared with the orgies of corruption we might expect in consequence of the unwatched license which hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches would have. Why, Mr. Speaker, no sooner had the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald was driven—no, never driven from power, for Sir John resigned himself—no sooner had power passed into the hands of the opponents of Sir John A. Macdonald, than the Liberal Government of that day was rotten before it was ripe, and we had the Foster scandal, and dozens of others that the history of Parliament is quite familiar with. All this shows what we might expect, if we did not show these gentlemen opposite that they have an argus eye of criticism on them from this side of the House. And, Sir, I say here, that the people of Canada would be the most mistaken people—ah, there is no danger that they would be so mistaken as that—I say that a sensible people like the people of Canada are not likely to weigh in the balance, as of any consequence whatever, a few hundred thousand dollars, compared with the value of having a Parliament that will search carefully into whatever is done by the Government, and that will apply criticism to whatever is done by the Ministry of the day—I do not care whether it be Tory or whether it be Grit, or Conservative or Liberal. Any expense of Parliament is, I say, lighter than dust, compared with the value of the criticism of which I speak.

Let me say here, in passing, Mr. Speaker, that the language of some of the newspapers at the present time would seem to indicate that hon. gentlemen opposite do not intend to carry out their pledges. I say for myself and for the constituency I represent, that we shall not be content unless some of these pledges are carried out, and we will hold the Government to a strict account in regard to these pledges. We will hold these pledges before them, as a glass, wherein they may see the face they held up to the country. We have been only a little over a month in this House ; we have had no programme whatever from the Ministry, and yet, Sir, in no session that I am acquainted with, since I have been observing politics in Canada, has a Government lost so much ground as this Government has lost. Mr. Speaker, I felt it necessary to bring this matter to the attention of the House. When I came back from the country to-day and saw that paper, I felt astonished that a paper of the standing of the "Globe" should have written such an article, and the only way I can account for it would be this: that already the Government feels that it has lost ground, and it feels compelled, not to justify itself, but to attack the Opposition. As I said at the commencement, for myself, I am in no way concerned—my withers are unwrung—to regard it as a thing to defend myself from, but I am forward to say that I would be ready to take any responsibility in connection with it, though I refused to bring forward my motion in consequence of that being in the air. I say, Sir, that that article is unjust. It is untrue to fact. It is against the dignity of the very Parliament whose dignity it professes to be anxious for, and it reveals the weakness of the Government. It is an article that could not have been allowed to go without protest. So far as its statements regarding the conduct of the business of this session, and as regards the school question are concerned, it seems to me that it places the Government in a position that calls for explanation, and especially so, if the statement made is true, that the school question has been settled and that that confidence has been given away to a private individual, whilst it is withheld from this Parliament.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Customs ..... $899,380

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask my hon. friend if he proposes to have any vote for his department in the Supplementary Estimates ?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Yes. I would like the two items—salaries and travelling expenses of inspectors of courts and travelling expenses of other officers on inspection, $21,150, and Board of Customs and outside special service, $23,000—bracketed, so as to make them one vote.

Mr. FOSTER. What is my hon. friend's reason for that ?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. To give myself a little more latitude.

Mr. FOSTER. They are two quite different items, as my hon. friend will see. The votes are nearly equal, and if they are bracketed, he will have a chance of diverting one or the other. I think my hon. friend ought to estimate fairly closely for each one, and allow the items to go as they have gone in previous years. At any rate I do not see that we can bracket them now, as they have come down to the House in this itemized form.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. I think we can do it if the hon. gentleman assents. My main object is with reference to the second item, which includes the outside special service. I have felt that we ought to have a little closer and more frequent inspection of our ports ; and as these special officers are sometimes not very busy, I thought I might be able to utilize their services at times in doing inspectors' work at different ports. My hon. friend might trust me with this arrangement this year, and if I abuse the trust, then he can call me to account.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose my hon. friend does not mean to use that vote for the appointment of other special officers particularly, besides those at present existing.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. Oh, no.

Mr. FOSTER. Simply to use them on inspection work ?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. Simply in order that the Auditor General may not take exception to the expenditure.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, we will trust the hon. gentleman on the assurance he gives.

Mr. GIBSON. I understand that the $800 given to the Commissioner of Customs as Chairman of the Board of Customs was given to him on the ground that his salary was not large enough. I believe his salary is now $4,000, and I do not see that this $800 should be paid to him any longer as Chairman of the Board.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. There has been no increase so far as I know.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the proposal of the Controller of Customs to put these two votes together is a reasonable proposal, and one which the committee will not very seriously object to ; but I would like to ask him why he takes the votes for the salaries and expenses of all the provinces and puts them in one item, whereas in former years each province was assigned a specific amount for a specific purpose. Why does he take a lump sum for all the provinces and the North-west Territories ? And it is a very large sum, $814,180.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. It is done for the same purpose, to give myself a little more latitude. It would be more convenient, I think. I do not know exactly what reductions may be made, or what expenses may be incurred in the different provinces. While the amount is not increased, I think it will be better for me to have a free hand in that respect. For instance, in British Columbia there is a large development going on; and in the course of the year I may find it necessary, in the interest of the revenue, to increase the expenditure there—I do not know to what extent; while at the same time I may be able to make corresponding savings in some of the other provinces which I could apply towards it. I dare say my hon. friend will recognize that it would have been more convenient for him in the department if he had had the latitude I ask.

Mr. WALLACE. I notice that for 1895-96 the estimate was $874,000. The hon. gentleman has increased that by $25,000; and this increase is very largely in this item. I think the other items are pretty nearly the same.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). That is without the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. WALLACE. When I was Controller, we did not expect that any Supplementaries would be required.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Did the hon. gentleman adhere to that to the end?

Mr. WALLACE. We adhered to it while I was there. I was not there till the end.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. Controller of Customs proposes a very radical departure from the custom that has been followed in voting these Estimates. Hitherto all the provinces have been specified, and the sum to be spent in each is mentioned. The hon. gentleman has suggested to the committee that he may make some reductions, and that in consequence of a reorganization of the staff it may be necessary for him—I do not differ very much from him in that view—to have a free hand. The hon. gentleman must recognize at once that Parliament has an interest in having as many details as possible given in the Estimates and in having the votes given for specific purposes. If we give the hon. gentleman this free hand, the Government cannot take it as a precedent, or else next year, after the reorganization has taken place, we will again be asked to vote lump sums. It is very essential, especially for purposes of criticism, that we should have the sum divided.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. It really is the one service. I will have to make certain increases in British Columbia, and I cannot estimate just now what I shall require, but I desire to be able, out of the savings in some other provinces, to pay any increase that may be required in British Columbia.

Mr. FOSTER. This is going a long way. The whole point of the criticism for several years—and, I think, a perfectly proper criticism—was to induce Ministers to make their estimates with precision, and indicate to Parliament, not only that they intended to spend a certain sum, say for customs, but how much they intended to spend on each branch of the service, and in what sections of the country they proposed to spend it. I did not notice, at first, that my hon. friend had made a total change in the disposal of some $800,000, and left it entirely open as to whether he would spend that in Quebec, or Ontario, or any other province. I am not making the least approach to a charge that my hon. friend intends to do anything wrong; but, if we allow this to my hon. friend, every other Minister might just as well come down and ask the same thing. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries might ask us to vote $900,000, and the Controller of Inland Revenue might ask us to vote half a million dollars, and give us no items at all. My hon. friend has wiped out everything which indicates in what province he proposes to spend the amount he asks, and asks us to vote a lump sum of $800,000. It is a convenient way of making up the Estimates but is opposed to the proper traditions of the House, and no one ought to bear me out more strongly in that position than the hon. gentleman now in the Chair (Mr. Casey), because that was a most persistent criticism of his and also of the ex-member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills).

Mr. TISDALE. Does the only change consist in putting it altogether, instead of by provinces? Are the details given just the same?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. Yes.

Mr. TISDALE. If the details are there, I do not see that that would make such a difference this year; but, of course, if the hon. gentleman had left out the details, it would make an important difference.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. The next page shows all the details. The case is a little different from that of Railways and Canals, because, in the latter, a specific sum would be voted for each object in every branch of the service. But, in this case, it is really the one item, providing for the one service in the different ports, and we must keep the public service going. The Auditor General wishes it done in this way. Otherwise, if there was a saving made in one province, he would not allow it to be used for any other province; but, if I put the amount in bulk and make a saving in the one province, I may apply it to another. I do not think there will be any necessity to do so, except in the case of British Columbia. In that province, owing to the great impetus being given to its development, some expenditure will be required, chiefly in consequence of new ports being opened, for which we cannot at present estimate with any accuracy. I only ask that what I can save in any one province, without impairing the efficiency of the public service in that province, might be expended in another province ; and I put it in this way to get over the objection of the Auditor General, who, if a special sum were stipulated for each province, would not allow that to be exceeded. All the details are given, and the public service cannot suffer in any way.

Mr. WALLACE. I think that the province of British Columbia is one for which the Controller would be justified in asking an increased appropriation, and I am sure that such increased appropriation would be readily granted. I went over these estimates very carefully, and came to the conclusion that the sum of $874,000 was quite sufficient to carry on the affairs of the Customs Department. I went over the items in detail, and found out what reductions could be made, and I made a reduction of $50,000 from the previous year ; and I am convinced that, had I continued in the position the hon. gentleman occupies, we could have cut the expenditure down to the amount voted by Parliament, $874,000, without asking for any Supplementary Estimates. The hon. gentleman is asking for $25,000 more. The only province which would require an increase over last year is British Columbia, but, as years go on and superannuations take place, without the positions vacated being filled, the expenditure of the Customs Department could be decreased, rather than increased.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It appears to me, when I come to look at this, that it is another departure from what has been the tendency of Parliament, especially under the criticism of hon. gentlemen opposite, when they sat on this side. The whole tendency of Parliament, ever since I have had the honour of a seat here, has been towards insisting on the Government being specific in their demands for money. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Estimates of 1897, which were brought down by the late Government, he will find that the way is specified in which every dollar is to be used. What the hon. gentleman does is to ask us to give him a free hand to use this $874,000. I have no doubt he will not attempt to use it improperly, and that is not the point in my criticism at all. My point is, whether we should allow the Government, in so important a matter, to depart from what has been accepted as a well understood principle, namely, that if there are to be any changes in the mode by which money is voted by Parliament, these changes should be rather in the way of giving more specific information than of giving general grants. If we allow this item to go, there is no reason why we should not have the Minister of Inland Revenue coming down and requesting a lump sum, without giving any details ; and, if we grant his request, no doubt we shall have the Minister of Marine coming down with a similar one. He does not indicate whether he is going to spend the money in Nova Scotia, Ontario or any other province. In making the change that is thus suggested, we should actually be recognizing a principle that might cause Parliament to depart entirely from the mode of voting money which was adopted years ago and which has worked so well. Now the hon. gentleman says that probably he may require to spend more money in British Columbia. I would suggest that he should give the amount which he feels it necessary to spend in the several provinces, and, if he cannot for the moment estimate correctly or even approximately what may be required in British Columbia, let him add a clause to the effect that any sum not used in any other province may be used in British Columbia. That will give him practically a free hand, but it does not have exactly the effect of appropriating $814,000 in a lump sum instead of a total amount made up of special sums voted for expenditures in each province.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to point out to the hon. Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson) that this vote may easily be arranged so as to give him all the liberty he requires. He says he does not know what British Columbia may need, that they are opening up there new branches of trade, that new towns are springing up and that probably a number of new officers will have to be appointed. But there is always this to be considered in a case of that kind—the hon. Minister is always at liberty to come down with his supplementary estimates. It would be something like a complete revolution which, between now and the next session of the House would require such expenditures as to absorb the whole vote for the year. Practically, that cannot happen. But anything required to make up for unexpected expenditures can be covered in the Supplementary Estimates—and that is what they are for. If he lumps so large a sum as $800,000 or $900,000, it gives him a tremendous advantage in one respect and puts him at great disadvantage in another. If he estimates closely, as a Minister should, what is required for each province, he avoids one great difficulty. Every Minister knows—the hon. gentleman himself is probably aware by this time—what pressure is brought to bear upon him to make new appointments or increase salaries. But if he has made a fair estimate based upon what he feels he actually requires, he is able to answer these applications by the statement that he has no money available for the purpose and so cannot grant the request. But if he has $900,000 that he can apply as he pleases to the city of Montreal or the city of Toronto, or any other place, he will see that he is making his own position a very difficult one indeed and adding weight to that pressure which is heavy enough upon a Minister even at the best. Another thing I desire to point out. He has brought down a lump sum of $800,000, and he has brought down also some details of what is to be expended in each province. Which is he going to bind himself by the details or the lump sum? He must evidently bind himself by the details. If he is going to be bound by the detailed items, as Ministers have felt themselves to be, that is a reason for giving the details so that Parliament may have a general knowledge of what the expenditures are to be; and it would be going against the implied but real contract with Parliament if he departed from the detailed items of expenditure. So I think the hon. gentleman had better stick to the details as they are here. If he will say that that is his intention, I would have no objection to the lump sum going as it is without reprinting the Estimates. Then my hon. friend at the next session of the House, which will be a few months hence, will have supplementary estimates, and Parliament will meet any fair requirements for British Columbia. I am not saying this in any partisan sense, but simply in the line of our keeping our proceedings in accordance with established usage. If he will take the estimates of the last six years he will see that I have been spreading out the details. That is the case of the Militia and other departments as well so that, as far as possible, Parliament might control the expenditures of the succeeding year.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. The details are there, and they must govern largely.

Mr. FOSTER. They must govern altogether.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. No, not absolutely. Really, Mr. Chairman, this is as it has always been, except that we are endeavouring to do in a legal, open and sanctioned way what has been done as a matter of fact before. It has always been the practice hitherto—and I can be set right if I am wrong—if there was a saving in one province to use it for any requisite expenditure in another province.

Mr. FOSTER. No; that cannot be so.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. That is the information that is given to me.

Mr. FOSTER. That used to be, but it has not been so for the last four or five years. The Auditor General raised that point and we have closely followed the rule.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. That is my information. The Auditor General now insists upon this rule, but he did not insist upon it before and it has not been observed. The report of my officers is that where there has been a saving in one province it has often been used as the public service required, in another province without the sanction of a separate vote. But the Auditor General says that must cease, that if there is a saving in one province he will not allow the saving to be spent in another province. What I want to do, is to do legally and above-board what has been the practice in the past.

Mr. WALLACE. The only item used in that way was an item of $5,000 voted each year to cover unforeseen expenses. The law provides that in cases where an expenditure is unforeseen or unprovided for, it can be met out of this vote, but where they can be foreseen or provided for they must be met out of the separate sums provided by Parliament.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am sure there is no person on this side of the House who has not perfect confidence in the honesty and integrity of my hon. friend the Controller of Customs, and would not be disposed to give him any latitude necessary in the public service. We very cheerfully agreed to lumping the two first items he brought under the notice of the committee because there was an obvious convenience in it. But we have a British parliamentary system, and we endeavour to follow the model as closely as we can; and, as my hon. friend knows, the tendency in England is altogether in the other direction, that is, to have the most specific detail of all the expenditure of public money. In fact, parties who have been obliged to pay attention to this subject, are surprised at the rigour with which this rule is carried out, for the whole Imperial Government cannot change in any shape or form an appropriation from the specific object for which it was designed. I am sure, under these circumstances, that my hon. friend will at once see that granting en bloc an appropriation approaching a million dollars, to be used at discretion, would be entirely at variance with the system we have always pursued, and which, I think, we may with great advantage continue.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is of somewhat unpleasant augury that at this early stage in the history of the new Government a special kind of vote has to be brought down to get over the Auditor General's objections.

Mr. FOSTER. I must ask my hon. friend's consideration to the important suggestion I have made, and I am sorry that he refuses to accept it. Either he proposes to abide by the details, or, if he does not, why does he give us details? Why are details brought down here, saying that so much shall be applied to Ontario and so much to each of the other provinces? Then, is my hon. friend going to go behind Parliament, after he votes these details, and expend it as he pleases? The hon. gentleman cannot do that. Then, if he is not going to do that, he wants a lump sum of $814,000, which he can apply in the various provinces. It is evident that he must modify his resolution so as to say "notwithstanding the details which are hereunto annexed." I would propose to allow him to take this lump vote, adding, after "Territories," the words "ac-ording to details annexed." Then there would be no doubt at all as to the details.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. That would make it worse than it was before.

Mr. FOSTER. That would make it just what it has been. I do not care what the officers of this department say; there is scarcely a department in which there cannot be, and has not been, some expenditure shoved in in some way or other that the most argus eye of the Auditor General cannot always see. But I know precisely the plan of action of the Auditor General for the last five years, and I know we have been keeping strictly to the details, and, on one occasion, where there were no details, and where the Auditor General found, by conversation across the floor on these Estimates, that it was the impression that the expenditure was to be made in such and such a way, he has adhered to that expression of Parliament.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That last observation makes it necessary that I should offer my opinion as to the erroneous view that I think the Auditor General entertains in regard to the Supply Bill. Once or twice, the Auditor General has attached undue importance to observations in committee, and the Controller of Customs has intimated this afternoon the manner in which he proposed to use this vote, if we passed it in the shape now submitted. Well, with all deference, I venture to say that no observations that are made in this House can in any way assist the Auditor General in the interpretation of the Act. The advice ultimately will come from the law department on any question, either between the Auditor General and the Customs, or between him and other departments. I think the suggestion of the member for York would prevent the Controller of Customs from carrying out the plan that he frankly says he has in view in the expenditure of these items, because the details are given here, if they are not altogether dropped in the Supply Bill; and the Supply Bill is framed according to this estimate, giving a lump sum, with the details over the page. His action would be controlled, and he could not transfer a service from one province to another, simply because he had made this observation in Parliament. The Auditor General might not raise an objection, because, as I say, he has assumed, and, I think, improperly, that observations made, either by a Minister or by a private member, may indicate the intention of Parliament. I think the law department would not support that view, and that the guide for that department, as well as ultimately for all the departments, is the Act itself. I rose merely to call the attention of the Controller to the fact that, if the Supply Bill takes the shape of this estimate, and if the detail is given in the Supply Bill as it appears here, he will not have the latitude that he desires. I am informed just now, however, that these details would not appear in the statutes, and that they are here merely for the information of the committee; so that the amendment suggested by the hon. member for York would be necessary to limit that expenditure.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, I suggest to my hon. friend that, in order not to crowd the Supply Bill, he should make his estimate on the lines of the provinces, as it was before; otherwise, we shall have to crowd the Supply Bill with the whole of these pages of details.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. Of course, if hon. gentlemen object, I will have to fall back on the plan of dividing it into provinces. I do not see myself where there is any danger to the public service. The work has to be carried on; is one item, carrying on the work of the Customs. But, if hon. gentlemen insist that we shall just assign a sum to the various provinces, I will consent to do so.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend can just extend that first vote by cutting out the previous estimates for the provinces and making them part of his resolution.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Page 63 of the previous Estimates will give the details.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. Then I propose this substitute to the latter part of the first item in the resolution: In Nova Scotia, $108,285; New Brunswick, $88,545; Prince Edward Island, $17,075; Quebec, $206,250; Ontario, $289,475; Manitoba, $30,400; North-west Territories, $9,050; British Columbia, $64,000.

Mr. CLANCY. I desire to ask the Controller of Customs if the vacancy of the collector at the port of Wallaceburg has been filled?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. It has not been filled yet.

Mr. CLANCY. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will give me the reason. A gentleman by the name of Little was recommended for the position, and an Order in Council for his appointment was passed, but his commission is not yet issued.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. With respect to filling these vacancies, I have not taken the question up during the few weeks I have been in office. During the recess I shall make myself fully acquainted with the department and its details. I am not in a position to say anything further at the present time, than that I believe the work at the port is being carried on by the acting officer, and if I find it absolutely necessary, we will, of course, have to appoint an officer.

Mr. CLANCY. Wallaceburg is an important office, and the work is now being done by a substitute.

Mr. WALLACE. Has an appointment to the collectorship at Berlin been made?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. No; but an appointment will have to be made very soon, because the relieving officer is very anxious to return to his home.

Mr. MONTAGUE. These positions stand on a somewhat different basis from that which the remarks of the hon. gentleman would lead the committee to believe. I think in the case of Wallaceburg and Berlin appointments were recommended by a former Controller of Customs, and an Order in Council was passed approving of those recommendations. It may very fairly be asked, before this vote is passed, how the Government propose to deal with this question. These are not cases of ordinary vacancies. It is not whether the duties are being performed but it is a question of policy. I now ask what the Government propose to do?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I do not exactly understand the question asked by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I thought there was some little difficulty among members of the Government as to what their policy would be; but I understand now from the First Minister that he did not understand my question. The question was raised by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) that a vacancy had taken place in the position of collector of customs at Wallaceburg. Attention was also called to the fact that there was a vacancy in the customs in Berlin, and the Controller of Customs was asked whether appointments had been made to fill these vacancies, and his answer was, no, not yet. What I stated for the information of the committee was this, that to my knowledge appointments had been made, on the recommendation of the previous Controller of Customs, and an Order in Council approving these recommendations had been passed, and I desire to know whether the policy of the Government was to repeal the Orders in Council.

The PRIME MINISTER. I cannot speak specifically as to the position at Berlin or any other port. The hon. gentleman is aware that certain recommendations were made by the late Administration after 23rd June to His Excellency, and he is aware that all those recommendations were approved by His Excellency except three categories; that His Excellency refused to ratify appointments to new offices, or to offices which had been vacant for more than twelve months. If the vacancy at Berlin had not exceeded that time, then the appointment made is permanent and the present Administration has not disturbed it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then if those appointments do not come within those classes specifically stated by the Governor General, they stand?

Mr. CLANCY.

The PRIME MINISTER. Certainly.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Unless the present Government for any reason do not wish to continue them.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Either officer or office?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Either one.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We should like to know who is Premier and who is Finance Minister, who is leader of the Government and in a position to answer?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I shall be delighted to answer both questions if necessary.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I trust the hon. gentleman will not be nearly so impertinent to me as he has been to his leader.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If my leader is to be protected from impertinence, I take it that he is quite able to defend himself. I do not think he will ask the hon. gentleman opposite to protect him.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The leader of the Government, speaking as Premier, has stated that appointments not coming within the categories which the Governor General made an exception, will be continued.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. They stand.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is, that the men appointed will go on with their work?

The PRIME MINISTER. They stand like every other appointee, until removed for cause.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That was not the statement of the Finance Minister. He said, unless members of the Government thought differently.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I say so again.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the hon. gentleman thinks that he is in agreement with his leader, I am perfectly satisfied.

Mr. CLANCY. I am not quite clear in regard to the statement made by the First Minister. There seems to be at least some little misunderstanding. What I want to learn is if any officer performing those duties now, in regard to whom an Order in Council was passed making his appointment some time ago, and it does not come within the limit of twelve months, he is considered to be the officer holding the appointment until some change is made. If that is the case, I shall have to ask another question.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Why have not those gentlemen been notified? It is extraordinary in regard to the announcement made by the leader of the Government that those gentlemen properly appointed by Order in Council, to positions at Wallaceburg and Berlin, have not been notified. There is at present no collector at Wallaceburg, but simply a substitute to do the work.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is a matter very easy to explain. There was a batch of four or five hundred Orders in Council sent to His Excellency, and afterwards, two weeks or so were occupied in making a classification as between those appointed and those not appointed.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman will see by the documents laid on the Table that there were just two classifications; that those were made a long time ago, and that the Governor General signed every one of those Orders which did not come under the first category stated by my hon. friend the leader of the House, in regard to which he withheld his consent. As regards all other officers who did not fall under the first schedule, he signed the Orders in Council embodying the report of the Treasury Board—at least that so appears on the face of the papers brought down. That was done some time ago, because those papers had been some time on the Table, and that act was, of course, done some time before they were brought down. So all the officers who did not fall within that schedule became by the sign manual of the Governor General to the report of Council bona fide officers. Where have they been all the time since this? Have they simply been not notified, and has, therefore, the report of Council and the signature of the Governor General gone for nothing?

The PRIME MINISTER. The thing is very easily understood. On the 7th and 8th of July some 400 or 500 recommendations were sent by the late Administration to His Excellency.

Mr. FOSTER. How many?

The PRIME MINISTER. Some four or five hundred.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Recommendations?

The PRIME MINISTER. I think so.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Oh, no.

Mr. FOSTER. Of appointments?

The PRIME MINISTER. I did not say of appointments. I said the Treasury Board made recommendations of different kinds. I think there were six or seven reports of the Treasury Board.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) will allow me; these general orders do not go to the Treasury Board.

The PRIME MINISTER. I speak of six or seven reports of the Treasury Board embodying, if my memory serves me aright, some four or five hundred.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not over seventy.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Much more than seventy.

The PRIME MINISTER. Well, we will not dispute that. As the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) is aware, some of these recommendations were approved by His Excellency, except those which came within three categories, that is to say: Appointments to new offices were not approved of; all appointments to offices which had been vacant for more than twelve months were not approved of; all superannuations which did not come within certain regulations of the law were not approved of, and the consequent appointments upon these superannuations were not approved of. It took weeks and weeks of labour for the different heads of the departments to come to an understanding and it is only within the last four or five days that we have been able to see which came within the categories mentioned. As to the case referred to we could not say if it came within the category. If it was not a new office; if it was not an office which had been vacant for more than twelve months; if it was not consequent upon a superannuation (which of course this was not), then the office has been approved by His Excellency.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Is it the intention of the Government, now that they have gone over these recommendations and have decided on those which should become effective, to see that the appointments will be promptly made to the offices which do not come within the categories mentioned?

The PRIME MINISTER. It is for the different heads of the departments to do that in the course of their ordinary duties.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I suppose that these offices are not intended to remain vacant after the Government has decided that the appointments are to stand. I suppose that measures will be taken to notify them of their appointments.

The PRIME MINISTER. I would beg my hon. friend to remember that the Government have decided nothing. It was the late Government which decided and His Excellency the Governor General approved. We had nothing to do but the pure ministerial duty of ascertaining whether or not certain offices came within the category laid down by His Excellency. It was a work of arduous labour to ascertain that, and now that the thing is done it will be for the different heads of the departments to act.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Very well.

Mr. WALLACE. Has the Government appointed a successor to Mr. Blackwood as appraiser of hardware?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would ask my hon. friend to allow that to stand, because I believe it is the intention of the Government to move that the committee rise and ask leave to sit again ; in order to go into Supply again at eight o'clock.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

SUPPLY—THE CHANGE OF GOVERNMENT.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I rise, Sir, to endeavour to discharge the most painful duty that has ever fallen to my lot during a somewhat lengthened parliamentary career. I need not tell you, Sir, that in my judgment nothing is so vitally important to Canada as the maintenance of the great privileges which we enjoy under the British constitutional system that has been adopted for this country ; and when I speak of the British constitutional system, I speak of a system which, after a long struggle from time immemorial between the Crown and the people, was adopted in Great Britain, a system which has made that country, I think I may venture safely to say, the envy of nations and the admiration of the world. There is no question, Sir, that under that system of parliamentary government England has attained a position in which she must be admitted to be the grandest and mightiest Empire in the world. I need not remind this House that Robert Baldwin, Lafontaine and other great Reformers of old Canada struggled and fought persistently to obtain that same system of parliamentary government for Canada ; that in 1841 the great and long-continued efforts of the old Reform party were crowned with abundant success ; and that from that time down to the present, I may say, all the provinces of which British North America is composed have enjoyed to the fullest extent the system of parliamentary government that prevails in England. The advantage of that system of government is most striking in one great particular. Under a republican system of government, such as we see in the great republic to the south of us, the executive head of the nation is not looked up to by all classes and all parties as a great and impartial representative of the whole people, but he is the head of a great party from the hour of his election to that high and important position down to the end of the period for which he has been elected. The result is that very often quite one-half of the people of the United States of America are engaged from the hour of his election down to the close of the period for which he is elected in denouncing, decriing, attacking and assailing the executive head. That, Sir, I regard as a great misfortune, and I think that the contrast to that system which England presents is one of the most striking and favourable contrasts it is possible to conceive. There you have the Queen of this great Empire holding her position as the executive head of the nation, and preserving throughout her reign the entire confidence, respect and support of all classes and all parties under her sway. However fiercely the contests may wage between the two great parties in the state, no person ever fails in according to Her Majesty the most profound respect, reverence and continued support. Under our system of parliamentary government, we enjoy—we ought to enjoy—the same advantage. Under that system we stand in precisely the same position as England. The representative of Her Majesty in Canada, as the executive head of the country, enjoys the confidence, the respect and the support of all parties in the state ; and however keen the struggles may be between different parties, all alike are ready to give to the representative of Her Majesty that same respect, confidence and support that Her Majesty herself receives throughout this great Empire, and from all classes and parties in Great Britain.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Now, Sir, I must take for granted that the gentlemen who form the present Government of Canada are necessarily responsible for every act that the Governor General of Canada has committed ; and that relieves me at once from the disagreeable necessity of uttering a single word in disparagement of His Excellency ; because, under the form of government we possess, my hon. friend the First Minister and his colleagues, on assuming office, were necessarily and naturally obliged to assume all responsibility for every act of His Excellency from the time of what I may call the crisis which ensued on the general election. The position that Canada occupies in this respect was very distinctly stated by the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald in the confederation debates. On February 6th, 1865, Attorney General Macdonald said :

In the constitution we propose to continue the system of responsible government, which has existed in this province since 1841, and which has long obtained in the mother country. This is a feature of our constitution as we have it now, and as we shall have it in the federation, in which, I think, we avoid one of the great defects in the constitution of the United States. There the President, during his term of office, is in a great measure a despot, a one-man power, with the command of the naval and military forces—with an immense amount of patronage as head of executive, and with the veto power as a branch of the legislature, perfectly uncontrolled by responsible advisers, his cabinet being departmental officers merely, whom he is not obliged by the constitution to consult with, unless he chooses to do so. With us the Sovereign, or in this country the representative of the Sovereign, can act only on the advice of his Ministers, those Ministers being responsible to the people through Parliament.

Todd, in his "Parliamentary Government in the British Colonies," at page 817, lays down the same principle in the following words :

Upon a change of Ministry it is essential that the gentlemen who may be invited by the Governor to form a new Administration shall be unreservedly informed by him of the circumstances which led to the resignation or dismissal of their predecessors in office ; and that they shall be willing to accept entire responsibility to the local Parliament for any acts of the Governor which have been instrumental in occasioning the resignation or effecting the dismissal of the outgoing Ministry. For it is an undoubted principle of English law, that no prerogative of the Crown can be constitutionally exercised unless some Minister of State is ready to assume responsibility for the same. Hence the authority remains inviolate, however the propriety of its exercise may be questioned, or its use condemned. The authority of the Crown, in the hands of the Queen's representative, must invariably be respected ; and no one subordinate to the Governor should attribute to him personally any act of misgovernment, his Minister being always answerable for his acts to the local Parliament and to the constituent body.

This was further emphasized in a discussion which took place in this House on the 1st of March, 1877, when Sir John Macdonald said :

I concur with the hon. gentleman that he cannot be responsible for the speech of another individual when he does not know of it. He is, however, responsible for every utterance of the Governor General, except when that illustrious individual expressly states that what he states he says as an Imperial officer by Imperial command. It is important that the principle should be laid down if we are to be a free country. If responsible government is to be maintained, this principle should be strictly upheld, and I am surprised to hear an hon. gentleman, occupying the position of Premier of this Dominion, who boasts that not only is the country under responsible government, but that its constitution is moulded after the same plan and on the same line as the British constitution, should aver that he is not responsible for the language of the illustrious individual who so worthily represents the Crown in this country.

I may say that that remark had reference to a statement of Mr. Mackenzie, in the discussion which arose as to the speech made by His Excellency the Governor General in British Columbia. I drew attention to the fact that an obvious error had occurred in the report of that speech, and Mr. Mackenzie said that, of course as it was obvious, he was not responsible for any error of that kind.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Will the hon. gentleman state the date and place from which he takes this quotation ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is a quotation from "Hansard" of 10th March, 1877, page 373. I do not quote the whole of the discussion, but in the debate. I drew the attention of the House to an obvious error that had occurred in the report of His Excellency's Speech, in connection with the point in regard to the creation of a number of senators. He continued :

I remember when the doctrine was propounded long ago by the old Tories of Upper Canada, it was denounced by the whole of the Liberal party of Lower Canada, and it was after a long and severe battle fought by the Baldwin Reformers of those days that constitutional and responsible government was obtained. There have been a great many fights between the old Tory party before it took the name of Conservative, and the Reform party comprising the Liberals of Upper Canada, as to which deserved most merit for very many great reforms and changes ; but there is one question in which the old Tory party has no right to claim any share, viz., the victory won by the Baldwin Reformers over the Crown Colony system. That victory was consummated under Lord Sydenham, in September, 1841, when it was decided that thereafter the Government of Canada was to be a responsible government, and that everything connected with the public welfare, whether legislative or administrative, should be done only on the advice of responsible ministers and advisers. This is the first occasion since 1841 that I have heard this doctrine denied and repudiated by the leader of what was the great Reform party. The representative of the Crown can have no more rights in Canada than the Crown itself, and the Crown could not make any utterances on public affairs for which some minister would not be responsible. Some minister must be responsible for every announcement, every statement, every opinion expressed by the Sovereign, and, if that principle is once abandoned, then we shall return to the old system so much decried and for which the old official party, both in Upper and Lower Canada, were attacked, and properly attacked.

Mr. Mackenzie, after explaining his inability to be responsible for an inaccuracy in reporting the speech of His Excellency the Governor General, assumed responsibility for every word he uttered. He said :

The ministers are responsible for everything that affects the conduct of public affairs just as the hon. member for Kingston was responsible for every despatch he brought down by order of His Excellency. It was the duty of the hon. gentleman to bring the despatches down, and, if he thought they should not be brought down to Parliament, he should have resigned rather than have done so.

I think that puts in a clear and emphatic light the fact that we have a system of parliamentary government, carried out in precisely the same manner and to the same extent as it is in England. Todd again says, in his Government of the Colonies, page 324 :

In the absence of definite instructions, or positive law, it is the duty of a constitutional Governor to be guided upon all questions that may arise, or matters that may be submitted to him in his official capacity, by the usage of the Crown in the mother country ; which he should endeavour to ascertain and to imitate, so far as may be consistent with his position and responsibility as a colonial Governor.

I trouble the House with these extracts because it is important that we should start with correct premises. It is important, in discussing the correspondence which took place between His Excellency the Governor General and myself, that I should be free to make animadversions on what I regard as a departure from the principles of parliamentary government which we enjoy in this country, without being open to the charge of, in the least degree, personally assailing the representative of the Sovereign; and when I make any remarks that may reflect upon the course pursued by His Excellency, I beg the House to understand that I am presenting that as a matter, not in question between His Excellency and myself at present, but between hon. gentlemen opposite, who have accepted full responsibility of all the statements of His Excellency, and who are here to answer any criticism that may be offered with regard to them.

It is known to the House that, shortly after the opening of the last session of Parliament, my hon. friend, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, then Prime Minister of Canada, did me the honour of inviting me to accept the position of Secretary of State and leader of the House of Commons, under his Government. I endeavoured to discharge that duty to the best of my ability; and although I am conscious of a great many shortcomings, as might naturally be expected under such circumstances, I accepted, as you are aware, Sir, that arduous responsibility, in the face of the fact that the great party to which I had the honour to belong, and which that Government represented, were divided in this House upon a very serious and important question, on which they held very strongly antagonistic views. But notwithstanding a large portion of very able and distinguished members of the House of Commons did not agree with the Government on that question, the fact remains that I had the honour of receiving the support of a majority on every occasion. With the single exception to which I have reference, hon. gentlemen opposite know that, during that session, I was at the head of a very large majority of this House.

The House was dissolved; my hon. colleague, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, accepted a very important mission to England and tendered his resignation, as leader of the Government, and His Excellency did me the great honour of calling upon me to form an Administration, which duty I undertook. An Administration was formed, and a general election was held as promptly as it was possible, under the circumstances. The House is also aware that before Parliament prorogued, in answer to a question of my hon. friend who now occupies the position of Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), I stated the date on which Parliament would be called together.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

I gave the date very closely, if not the exact period. The House is also aware that the Government fixed, not only as early a day as they could for the purpose of holding an appeal to the country, but as early a day as possible for this legislature to assemble. Well, the fates of war were against us. After a sharp and short struggle, the result was that the Government were not in a position to claim a majority of supporters in this Parliament. So soon as it was convenient for His Excellency to return from the city of Quebec, where he had some engagements that made it very difficult for him to come for a considerable time, I did myself the honour of waiting on him and conferring with him on the position. What took place on that occasion will be brought to the attention of the House by a memorandum which is on the Table and which I submitted in response to a memorandum received from His Excellency. In this memorandum I said:

So soon as Your Excellency had returned to the capital, the 2nd inst., I had the honour of waiting upon you and discussing the present condition of affairs, caused by the general election which took place on the 23rd June. At that time I submitted a memo. of the precedents indicating the practice followed in England and Canada on the defeat of a government.

I may say, Sir, that the memorandum of His Excellency and my reply thereto being in the hands of hon. members, I shall not feel it necessary to go into this question as I should otherwise be obliged to do. But, Sir, I submit, and I am sure the recollection of every hon. gentleman in the House will sustain me, that perhaps there never has been an occasion in Canada when it was found so difficult for a number of days, for a considerable period, to arrive at anything like accurate conclusions as to who had been and who had not been elected. Many of these constituencies were not easily accessible and, from a variety of causes, as every hon. gentleman knows, in a number of cases the papers printed one day the election of certain gentlemen only to contradict their own statement next day and say that others had been elected. So, while there was not a very large margin, the state of affairs made a very material element of uncertainty as to what had actually taken place. Then, as I have stated before, the question of recounts was one that might, under existing circumstances, affect the relative position of the parties; and His Excellency at once, as I have stated, assented to the reasonableness of awaiting the recounts, and the course of the Ministry to be taken up in the light of the facts as far as it was possible to obtain them. I need not repeat, I have already expressed, the pain and surprise with which I received on the 6th of July a communication from the Governor General dated the 4th, but not placed in my hand until the 6th, involving a grave and most important departure from all parliamentary usage known in England and in Canada. And it is necessary to bear in mind the fact, though bearing date of the 4th, this communication did not reach my hands until the 6th, it has a material bearing upon a number of papers brought down in which the dates appear to be a little conflicting. I may say frankly to the House that the Government in the discharge of what they conceived to be their duty to the country and to the constitutional practice that had prevailed here and in England down to this period, felt it necessary to close all business and make a number of recommendations to His Excellency. But from the moment that paper was placed in my hand, no recommendation whatever was made by the Government of which I had the honour to be the head, because I felt that it was impossible that any gentlemen could read the memorandum His Excellency placed in my hands without arriving at the conclusion that the Government did not possess the confidence of His Excellency; and under these circumstances I felt it would be as derogatory to my colleagues and myself as it would be injurious to the public service to attempt to make any recommendation or ask any consideration of any appointment whatever. I mention this more particularly because the dates are confusing and would lead to a contrary conclusion unless this fact were stated. Now, as I have said, the British parliamentary system has been placed beyond all dispute. And I will draw the attention of the House for a few minutes to the statement with which His Excellency commenced his communication. After referring to the arrangement of the 7th July, he says :

After taking every means in my power to inform myself, it is impossible for me to ignore the probability that, in the event of your decision to meet Parliament the present Administration will fail to secure the confidence of the House of Commons.

I contend that the position taken there is utterly unknown to the British constitution, to the English parliamentary system, and to the system that prevails in Canada. I say there are no means by which His Excellency without violating the constitution of the country, could take to inform himself with reference to the position in which his Government stood. I take the ground, Sir, that under that glorious constitution, that under that system of parliamentary government for which Baldwin and the reformers who stood with him fought so successfully and established as the birthright and inheritance of the people of this country, the Governor General like Her Majesty had no means of informing himself except by his constitutional advisers and the voice of Parliament. "Todd, in his Government in the British Colonies," says in clear and emphatic terms :

In the absence of definite instructions, or positive law, it is the duty of a constitutional Governor to be guided upon all questions that may arise, or matters that may be submitted to him in his official capacity, by the usage of the Crown in the mother country, which he should endeavour to ascertain and to imitate, so far as may be consistent with his position and responsibility as a colonial Governor.

Lord Dufferin, one of the most eminent, most able, and most constitutional Governors General that Canada has had, stated that principle in clear and emphatic words in his address at Halifax on the 8th August, 1873, when he said :

My only guiding star in the conduct and maintenance of my official relations with your public is the Parliament of Canada.

On a very important occasion, as hon. gentlemen opposite know, when a very large minority of the House of Commons memorialized His Excellency and endeavoured to give him advice at a crisis which occurred, His Excellency refused to accept that advice, and acted upon the advice of his constitutional advisers. So high an authority as Mr. Asquith, one of the members of Mr. Gladstone's last Government, and of Lord Rosebery's Government, said, in emphatic terms, as found in the English "Hansard," vol. 7, 1892, 97 :

Parliament renders effective the considered judgment of the country.

And Todd, in his "Parliamentary Government in England," page 1852, says :

Parliament is the voice of the people. The House of Commons is the legitimate organ of the people.

Lord John Russell, in his "Life of Fox," says, as found in Todd's "Parliamentary Government in England," vol. II., page 512 :

The verdict of the country having been pronounced against ministers at a general election, it is nevertheless competent for them to remain in office until a new Parliament has met and given a definitive decision upon the merits, for the House of Commons is the legitimate organ of the people whose opinions cannot be constitutionally ascertained except through their representative in Parliament. It is necessary, however, according to precedents, that under such circumstances the new Parliament should be called together without delay.

I have already reminded the House that that question did not arise, because the day of the assembling of the new Parliament was then fixed, and, under that arrangement, the House was to meet in a few days, so as to place that beyond doubt. Now, in 1852, Lord Derby was called upon to accept office when he was in a minority in the House of Commons. The new Ministers were defeated by 234 to 146, and the House dissolved on 1st July, 1852. They were defeated at the elections, but summoned Parliament in November, and did not resign. They were defeated by 305 to 286 on the Budget. Again, in 1859, Lord Derby dissolved Parliament on 19th April. The Ministers met Parliament on the 31st May, and did not resign until defeated by a majority of 13. In 1892, Lord Salisbury dissolved the House, but the Opposition had previously voted the Estimates for the year to expedite public business—an example which certainly was not followed by hon. gentlemen opposite on a comparatively recent occasion. He was defeated by a majority of 40, but did not resign until he was defeated by a direct vote of want of confidence, 350 to 316. Now, Sir, Mr. Gladstone, who will be accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite, and by parliamentarians all over the world, as a very high authority, gave his opinions with reference to the duty of meeting Parliament after a defeat. Mr. Gladstone, in the English "Hansard," vol. 218, pages 128 and 129, in 1874, says:

It should be known and remembered that in former times it has been the practice of a government that has not succeeded in obtaining a majority at a general election to refer the decision to the arbitrament of Parliament. And I will not disguise from myself that although no practical dangers could happen in the instances which have lately occurred, yet it is conceivable that a government that had been guilty of serious malversation might seek, by the immediate surrender of office, to avoid the judgment or to weaken the force of the judgment which it might have to anticipate from an adverse House of Commons.

After what had happened these were the considerations which led us to the course we adopted, although it is a course which was justified by the circumstances, it is one which ought not to be adopted in the absence of strong justifying circumstances.

Mr. Gladstone, in point of fact, apologized for having established the precedent of resigning without meeting Parliament, when beaten at the polls. Mr. Balfour says, as to the right of the Government, after defeat, to meet Parliament, "Hansard," vol. VIII., 1892, page 220:

In meeting Parliament we are strictly following the best precedent.

The Government of which he was a member, had been defeated, yet they did not resign, but met Parliament and accepted judgment at the hands of Parliament.

We are following strictly the precedents of 1841, for example, and of 1859. We are not following the precedents of 1868-1874, 1880 or 1886. I quite admit that. I have two replies to that objection of the right hon. gentleman. My first reply is that the older precedents are precedents of far longer standing—that the older precedents have behind them a far longer concatenation of authorities to support them, and that the precedent of 1868 is an absolutely novel precedent. I have to remind him, in the second place, that the circumstances of the present time in no way resemble those which prevailed in the years 1868, 1874, or 1880. On these occasions the Opposition was returned by a majority absolutely overwhelming in its character and absolutely homogeneous in its character. The leader of the Opposition in those years came back to this House at the head of a majority on which he could absolutely rely to outvote not merely what is called the regular Opposition, but the regular Opposition in combination, or not in combination with any other section of the House.

I call the attention of the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government to the fact that on that occasion the majority was overwhelming in its character, and absolutely homogeneous. I have said enough to show the eminent English authorities, about which there must be no difference of opinion, in regard to the right of a defeated Government to receive a verdict of the people from the people's representatives on the floor of Parliament; and I will now come down to show that that was affirmed in the most clear and emphatic manner by the Canadian precedent established by the eminent leader of the Liberal Government, whose party was defeated in 1878. On 9th October, 1878, Mr. Mackenzie writes to Lord Dufferin as follows—"Life of Mackenzie," page 529:—

The protectionist principle undoubtedly obtained a victory at the polls. The knowledge of the wonderful success of Great Britain in developing her trade and commerce under the opposite system, and the sad results of the attempt by the United States to carry out a protectionist's policy, as exhibited in the ruinous state of their shipping and manufactures, and the growth of a communistic feeling, were alike disregarded. We felt, however, that it would be unpleasant to remain in office after ascertaining that there was no probability of the policy of the Government being sustained by the new House.

Mark this, Mr. Speaker, just as Mr. Gladstone apologized for having departed from the sound principle of a government receiving the verdict of the people on the floor of Parliament, so Mr. Mackenzie, although beaten by an overwhelming majority, and that of a homogeneous character, apologizes for having surrendered his trust without meeting Parliament. He goes on to say:

The other course would doubtless be the one in accordance with the English practice, but there are two precedents of a recent date in favour of a resignation before the meeting of Parliament, these precedents being made by the leaders of both political parties in England. Feeling that we are justified in pursuing that course, I have resolved, with the concurrence of my colleagues, to close up all business in the departments at the earliest possible moment.

"Close up," mark you, Mr. Speaker, not to abandon the departments by leaving them as they were, but to close up all the business, just as the late Government endeavoured to the best of their ability to close up the business that remained in their departments before resigning their trust.

With the view of enabling our successors to meet Parliament at an early day, with measures for carrying into effect the policy to which they committed themselves at the election.

Now, Sir, I think with the English precedents I have submitted, the overwhelming authorities I have submitted, backed and sustained by so high an authority as the great leader of the then Liberal party in this country, I have established beyond question the right that myself and my colleagues were in a position and fairly entitled to meet Parliament at the early day at which it was called, if we so desired and wished. I do not mean to say that any intimation of that kind was given to His Excellency, I do not mean to say that that course would have been followed, but it would have been open to us to consider whether we might not promote the public business of the country in the condition it then was by meeting Parliament on the day for which it was summoned, and placing hon. gentlemen opposite, who would have had control of the House, in a position to elect a Speaker and to take a vote of credit from Parliament, previous even to the formation, if they desired it, of their Government and to have taken a vote of credit for the purpose of avoiding all the difficulties into which they were plunged by adopting a different course. I can only say that had that course been pursued, those hon. gentlemen would have found that we would not have adopted the very unpatriotic, unparliamentary and almost unconstitutional course of obstruction of which they set an example during the previous session. They would have found that with a desire to promote public business and to give effect at the earliest possible moment to the clearly understood wishes of the people as expressed on the floor of Parliament, that course might have been more eminently satisfactory than the one which was taken.

But I will now, Sir, give another authority almost as high in the estimation of hon. gentlemen opposite, and of the great Liberal party throughout this country as even the English authorities or the authority of Mr. Mackenzie himself, and that is the "Globe" newspaper. The "Globe," in 1878, said :

It has, we are aware, been held by high authority that the vote of Parliament alone should determine the action of the administration officially. It is true, Mr. Mackenzie knows nothing of the strength of the respective parties until that be tested by a division of the House of Commons.

If Mr. Mackenzie knew nothing of the strength of parties when there was a majority of between 80 and 90 in the House of Commons elected opposed to him, I should like to know what His Excellency knew of the strength of parties and the state of parties in the House of Commons after the recent elections, and how he could ascertain the facts. I have already shown from the very highest authorities that His Excellency had no eyes to see, no ears to hear, except what was communicated to him by his responsible advisers or by the voice of Parliament itself. The "Globe" further says :

He has the legal right to hold office until the usual time of the meeting of Parliament, to do all the acts that a ministry in possession of a majority could do.

Mark that, Mr. Speaker. Here is that great authority to which every Liberal in this country looks as a supreme authority in the press, declaring emphatically in the face of a majority of between 80 or 90 elected by the people of Canada in opposition to the Mackenzie Government, that the Government had a legal right to hold office until the usual time for the legislature to assemble, and to do all acts which a Ministry in possession of authority could do, and to disregard absolutely the popular manifestation at the late elections. I give that as an authority which hon. gentlemen opposite generally treat with great respect. The "Globe" still further says :

We feel perfectly sure, too, that in the matter of appointments the Premier will have the fullest regard to the principle which should guide a retiring Cabinet. Any vacancies may properly be filled up, and all such appointments may be fittingly made as are necessary for the uninterrupted progress of the business of Government.

Under these circumstances I placed, for the reasons I have stated, in the hands of His Excellency a list of the precedents, English and Canadian, that bear on the question ; and at the same time and for the reasons I have stated, I intimated that a number of minutes sent to His Excellency had not been returned signed by His Excellency ; and I placed in his hands a statement of the appointments, some 92 in all, if my memory serves me, made by Mr. Mackenzie after this unmistakable verdict of the people so far as could be gathered from the popular voice or from the press, for consideration, and I left the matter open until His Excellency had an opportunity of seeing the papers when we could take up and discuss the position of the Administration in respect to those questions.

I need not detain the House long, I think, on that point, but I draw attention to the next statement in the memorandum from His Excellency the Governor General. He said :

In the first place, the business to be transacted by Parliament, though foreseen—

I call the attention of hon. gentlemen to this :

—And not in character exceptional, is urgent.

What do hon. gentlemen opposite think of going down to His Excellency the Governor General, who had put on record his declaration that the business of granting the supplies was foreseen and was not in character exceptional, and calling on His Excellency to sign a Governor General's warrant on the ground that it was unforeseen and exceptional ? I do not intend, although His Excellency was called upon, in the teeth of the statute, as admitted by hon. members on both sides of the House, to go in direct opposition to his own declaration, that it was foreseen,—although that Act was one of a very strong character. I do not for a moment question the propriety of His Excellency appending his name to those Governor General's warrants. But the responsibility rests on hon. gentlemen opposite to justify the declaration of His Excellency that this absence of supplies was foreseen and was not exceptional, when at the same time they placed before His Excellency a report from the Minister of Justice, which although very halting and very lame, still was found sufficient to satisfy his colleagues that they were warranted in asking the Governor General, in violation of all he had intimated, to take an entirely different course. But His Excellency said :

The supplies for the public service are already entirely exhausted. This contingency was in view when the date of Parliament was fixed.

So it was. His Excellency knew that his Government had fixed the date of the meeting of Parliament at the very earliest day that Parliament could meet, because there was an absence of Supply. He says :

It is in the public interest that Parliament should meet at as early a day as possible, and be able to proceed to business forthwith.

I say that having left with His Excellency these precedents as to the practice in England and Canada ; having left for His Excellency's consideration the course adopted by so eminent and distinguished an authority as one of the most able and distinguished Governors Canada has ever had, Lord Dufferin, who was present on the occasion of two crises—the resignation of Sir John A. Macdonald's Government in 1873, and subsequently the defeat of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie's Government in 1878—having drawn the attention of His Excellency to the course pursued and with the understanding that after he had time to peruse the papers, I would have an early opportunity of discussing these questions with His Excellency again ; what am I to think when hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared to defend the placing in my hands of the declaration to which His Excellency the Governor General has committed himself in this memorandum.

Now, Sir, I will not comment further on that, but shall next draw attention to the following statement which is to be found in His Excellency's memorandum :

The previous Administration (with Sir Mackenzie Bowell as Prime Minister), representing the views of the same political party and having a majority in both chambers, failed to pass its proposed legislation, and on the 25th of April Parliament expired by efflux of time without having granted supplies for the public service beyond the 30th June.

Now, Sir, there is no man unacquainted with the circumstances who could fail to be misled by that statement. The bald statement that Sir Mackenzie Bowell's Government was unable to obtain supplies from this Parliament, made over the signature of His Excellency the Governor General, is, I say, unaccompanied by the knowledge of the facts, calculated to mislead entirely any person who reads it. Why, there is no question as to what it means. When a Government cannot obtain supplies from Parliament, the presumption is that they are powerless to do so because they have no majority. There is nothing that would indicate the impotency of a Government so completely as their not being able to obtain supplies, and yet His Excellency knew, what every gentleman opposite knows, that the Government of Sir Mackenzie Bowell had a large majority in this Parliament ready to vote supplies, and they know, too, that the Opposition were found, for the first time in Canada, unpatriotic enough to abuse the position which they found Parliament in.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, Sir, I say, for the first time in the history of Canada, and I believe I may go further and say, for the first time in the history of any country in which parliamentary government exists, the Opposition, taking advantage of the unusual circumstance of the life of Parliament terminating on a certain day, adopted the unpatriotic course of sacrificing the best interests of the country and involving themselves in the most dire straits and difficulties, from which they were only extricated by following up a series of thoroughly unconstitutional and unparliamentary acts.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That Opposition prevented those supplies being voted, when the Government of the day had a large, aye an overwhelming majority at their backs, ready to give supplies. But for that extraordinary circumstance of the life of Parliament terminating on a certain day, and placing the control of this Parliament in the hands of a few individuals who were ready to prevent supplies being voted ; supplies would have been voted at the last session. I therefore challenge that statement as one that ought not to go forth to the world unexplained, and unaccompanied by a statement of the facts which would relieve the statement itself of that weight which otherwise would attach to it, if it were true that Sir Mackenzie Bowell's Government were in such a position that they were not able to get supplies voted by Parliament, or were overruled by a majority, which would be the only inference to draw from it. Well, Sir, the Governor General further says :

Subsequently when no Parliament was or could be, under the circumstances, in existence, the present Administration was formed. So far, therefore, as these are dependent upon the subsequent approval of Parliament, the acts of the present Administration are in an unusual degree provisional.

I deny that, Sir; I say that there is no warrant for the statement that there was anything of a provisional character in the formation of the Government to which His Excellency alludes. Drawing his information from the only legitimate source from which he could draw it, namely, the voice of Parliament; and having witnessed the position which I held in this House during the last session, His Excellency did me the honour to ask and to invite me to form an Administration. Why, Sir, did he do that? It was because he had the best evidence that it was possible for a Governor General to have that I did enjoy the confidence of a large majority of Parliament, and, so far as His Excellency had any means of knowing, a large majority of the great party which I was invited to lead. I say, therefore, Sir, that there is no foundation for that. But let me call attention to what occurred. I referred to the case of Lord Derby in 1852. Lord Derby was called upon to accept office when he was in a minority in the House. He was in the face of an open and avowed majority against him on the floor of the House. He was beaten by that majority against him in the House. He dissolved the House in April, and he did not call that Parliament together until November 4th. He was beaten at the elections, and yet he called Parliament together on November 4th, and was defeated on the Budget by a vote of 305 to 286. Lord Derby did not resign, but continued from the time he formed that Government, representing a minority in the House of Commons, never having had a majority, being beaten at the polls; he came back and discharged all the duties of Prime Minister of England and the control of this great Empire from the time of the dissolution when his Government was beaten down to November, when he resigned. For four months he performed all the duties in the fullest and most complete manner that any Prime Minister could perform them. Todd says, in the extracts which I have already read, that it is the duty of the Governor General to imitate as closely as he can the parliamentary system in England. And yet, with all this long line and array of parliamentary authorities which I placed in His Excellency's hands, he turned a deaf ear to it all. He addresses this memorandum, pointing out the reasons why he should withdraw his confidence from me and prevent me enjoying, and the Government of which I was at the head enjoying, that confidence which every authority, English and Canadian alike, said I should enjoy—and no man said it more strongly than the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie—sweeping away the illustrious precedents established by so distinguished a man as Lord Dufferin; and looking at this with eyes that I have no hesitation in saying the strongest partisan on the ministerial benches here could not surpass.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am exceedingly reluctant to interfere in any way whatever in this debate, especially when the leader of the Government has frankly avowed entire responsibility for the acts of His Excellency the Governor General; but I am inclined to think that the last observation of the hon. gentleman, practically accusing His Excellency of partisanship, transgresses the rule of this House which prevents any hon. member from speaking disrespectfully of His Excellency the Governor General. I am sure the hon. member does not desire to do so, and he will see that, if he has not infringed, he has very nearly infringed, this rule of this House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I bow with all deference to your decision, and will endeavour to be as careful as possible to avoid anything that can infringe the well-known rule of this House that we must not speak disrespectfully of the Governor General; but I am speaking of his representatives who are here.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have already given you, Sir, the authority; and the Prime Minister has frankly and openly, as he was bound to do, assumed the entire responsibility for every line, every word and every sentiment contained in this document.

The PRIME MINISTER. Speak of the First Minister, then.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, I am afraid the hon. First Minister's shoulders are hardly broad enough to bear the weight of all this. When I refer to that, I do not charge His Excellency with being a partisan; but I say that, if he had been a partisan, if this communication had been directed to the First Minister by the strongest partisan on that side of the House, he could not have expressed it in a stronger or more unjustifiable manner. Now, Sir, I say that, under the circumstances in which His Excellency did me the honour to call upon me to become his adviser, and with a knowledge of the position I occupied in this House and in the party, if His Excellency was not prepared to give me the fullest and most unqualified confidence until I ceased to be His Minister, he had no right to call upon me. Having been called upon, I maintain that I was entitled to the enjoyment of that confidence, and that a more fatal precedent cannot be established in this country than that the executive head of the country can go behind his Ministers and seek outside opinion. From the moment the administration of public affairs by outside opinion exists, a fatal precedent, in my judgment, is established, and one that, if followed up, will deprive Canada of those glorious British institutions which it is our pride and happiness to possess. I, therefore, show that all English and all Canadian parliamentary precedent is diametrically opposed to the course His Excellency pursued. Sir, we have had a long and illustrious line of Governors General in Canada, considering the period during which we have been a confederation. We obtained, as I say, in all its fulness—as stated by the framers of the constitution and by the Imperial Acts which gave to Canada the charter we possess—we obtained, in all its fullness, British parliamentary practice; and the authorities lay it down in clear and emphatic terms, that the Governor General of Canada is bound, in administering the affairs of this country, to follow parliamentary practice. Now, Sir, what do you find in England? You find it stated in Todd's "Parliamentary Government in England," page 513:

For, notwithstanding their resignations, the outgoing Ministers are bound to conduct the ordinary business of Parliament and of the country so long as they retain the seals of office. They continue, moreover, in full possession of their official authority and functions and must meet and incur the full responsibility of all public transactions until their successors have kissed hands upon their acceptance of office.

Do hon. gentlemen opposite, the successors, at a very remote distance, of that great line of Reformers headed by Baldwin and Lafontaine—do these hon. gentlemen intend to rewrite the history of parliamentary government in England? Do they intend to give a new and different version of it? Do they undertake to say that the Governor General is not bound to follow that great illustrious precedent which is our birthright—the system of parliamentary government in England? Is it possible for hon. gentlemen opposite to agree that all these precedents, both in England and in our own country, shall be swept aside, and a new and different doctrine founded for the administration of public affairs in Canada? I cannot believe, Sir, that gentlemen still claiming to be Reformers, however little claim they may have to the title, can ever consent to adopt a course which is, not only fatal to all reform, but which is the first step to a return to a system of personal government, as opposed to that parliamentary government which has made England what she is, and which has hitherto been the birthright, the highly-prized birthright of Canada. Todd again says:

It was always the practice to fill up vacancies. Peerages promised by a Minister's predecessors in office had been granted, though no instrument had been signed or sealed on the subject.

So highly, so completely, and so perfectly, has this system of parliamentary government received the sanction of all these distinguished precedents for so long a period,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

and so clear and so emphatic are these precedents, that they even go the length of establishing that, where a Minister, on retiring from office, has not had time to confer peerages—the highest, the greatest, the most important office in its effects on the individual and on the country—his successors, in that spirit of honour, regard and respect for those great constitutional principles, have been bound to implement and carry out the unfulfilled determination of their predecessors. Well, Sir, these hon. gentlemen will have to look long and far before they will find any ground or any intimation that any Minister, however he had been placed in the position of First Minister, whatever defeats he had encountered, whatever the results of his appeals to the country were—they will search far and long before they will find the slightest precedent, either in that great country which is declared to be our great exemplar, or in Canada itself, for the course that is pursued. Todd further says:

In 1858, Lord Palmerston, after his tender of resignation and before his successor was appointed, allotted three of the highest honours of the Crown—three Garters—which were then unappropriated, to three eminent noblemen, his friends and supporters. And in 1866, upon the dissolution of the second Russell Ministry, an office was filled up by that Government which did not become vacant until two days after their resignation had been tendered to Her Majesty.

Mark this, Mr. Speaker.

The interference of Parliament with the exercise of the prerogative under such circumstances has never taken place, and would only be justifiable under circumstances of a flagrant character.

Now, Sir, I ask hon. gentlemen if the Queen's representative in this country, bound, as the highest authorities tell us he is bound, to imitate the parliamentary practice of England and the course pursued under similar circumstances in that great country. If, I say, Sir, he has evidences so unqualified, so numerous, running over a long series of years, all tending to the same point, and confirmed by the principle adopted by the Governors General of Canada itself, I think these gentlemen will have great difficulty, though they may be able to convince this House of its duty to sustain them, in convincing the intelligent people of this country that they have been faithful to their principles, as guarding these inalienable rights of the people of Canada which were fought for and won by their predecessors in the ranks of reform. Sir Robert Peel took office when in a minority in November, 1834. Parliament was dissolved. His government was defeated at the general elections, and parliament met February 19th, 1835, and his administration governed Great Britain from November, 1834, until after February 19th, 1835, when his government was beaten on the election of Speaker. Here was another case in which a First Minister, who never had a majority at his back, who took office when in a minority, who went to the people and was beaten, discharged all the functions and the duties of administering public affairs, as, according to all these authorities, the right if not the duty of a defeated ministry. Take Lord Melbourne's case. Parliament dissolved June 21st, 1841. Elections were over July 1st. The administration were beaten. Parliament met August 19th, and on August 30th, on a motion of want of confidence, government was beaten by a majority of 91.

The following are some of the appointments made by this Government, after defeat at the general elections and after an adverse vote in the House. Mark you, Mr. Speaker, the general elections had taken place, the Administration were beaten, and Parliament was called on the 19th of August, the elections having taken place on July 1st, resulting in a majority of 91 against the Government, yet during the period that the defeated Government held office after the elections, these are some of the appointments that were made. And some of these appointments were made after the defeat at the general elections in 1841, and others were made after an adverse vote in the House. So that you have, in this instance, a Prime Minister going to the country, being badly beaten, having a large majority against him, calling Parliament together, and yet, during that period he continued to exercise—not only up to the time of meeting the House, but after the House had defeated him by a vote of 91—all the duties of a Prime Minister as completely as any Minister could who had a majority at his back. I will give you a few of the appointments made by that government, some of which were made shortly after the general elections, and some after an adverse vote in the House :

Treasurer of H. M. Household, June 23rd.
 Comptroller of H. M. Household, June 23rd.
 Judge of the Supreme Court of Gibraltar.
 Commissioner for the superintending the sale and settlement of waste Crown lands in the British Colonies, &c., July 19th.
 Colonization Commissioners, July 19th.
 Registrar of Deeds, July 20th.
 Governor and Commander in Chief of certain islands, August 3rd.
 Member of H. M. Privy Council, August 11th.
 Peers, August 11th.
 Chaplain to H. M., August 16th.
 Secretary to a Legation.
 Chief Superintendent of British trade in China.
 British Consuls.
 Consuls General, August 11th.
 Baronets, August 24th.
 Physician to Embassy, August 21st.
 Governor and Commander in Chief over certain islands, August 24th.
 Governor of St. Helena, August 24th.
 Clerk of Exchequer Court in Barbadoes, August 24th.
 Queen's Advocate in Sierra Leone, August 24th.
 Knights Grand Cross of the Bath, August 27th.
 Companion of the Bath, August 27th.

Queen's Advocate at Settlement on the Gambia, August 27th.

Clerk of the Legislative Council of the province of Canada, August 2th.

Deputy Inspector General of Public Accounts in the province of Canada, August 27th.

President of the Committee of the Executive Council in Canada, August 27th.

Surveyor General in Canada, August 27th.

Registrar of the province of Canada, August 27th.

Consuls, Knights, August 27th.

Lord Lieutenant of the Courts of Lincoln.

Chief Justice of British Guiana, August 30th.

Solicitor General, British Guiana, August 30th.

Governor of Sierra Leone, September 13th.

Governor of Gambia, September 13th.

Vice-Chancellor of the United Kingdom, September 20th.

Governor of Newfoundland, October 8th.

Lieutenant and Sheriff Principal of the Shire of Lanark, October 6th.

Knight Grand Cross of the Bath, October 11th.

Privy Councillor, October 16th.

Inspector of Schools, October 16th.

Chief Ranger, Keepers of Park, October 16th.

Treasurer for Island of, October 16th.

Lord Lieutenant for Southampton, November 10th.

These are some of the appointments made by a gentleman defeated in the House of Commons, beaten by a large majority at the polls, and yet continuing to hold office and to make these appointments as completely as he could have done, had he received the support of a large majority in the House.

I will give another and a very high and distinguished authority, that of a gentleman which has paid great attention to this question of constitutional precedence, and who is one of the highest authorities on public life in England—I mean Mr. Disraeli, afterwards Lord Beaconsfield. In the English Hansard, D. vol. 195, of 1889, page 733, I find Lord Beaconsfield, reported as saying :

I entirely deny the position taken up by the hon. gentleman, that because I had tendered my resignation to Her Majesty, and Her Majesty had provisionally accepted it, I had ceased to be the responsible Minister of the Crown. That I believe is a point upon which there is no controversy whatever.

It does not follow that, because a Minister tenders his resignation and the Sovereign accepts it that the Ministry will be changed. Under any circumstances a considerable time may elapse. There is an instance of a not very distant date when six weeks elapsed. During all that time the Minister whose resignation is contemplated is performing the highest duties of the state ; he may be superintending negotiations upon which the peace of Europe may depend ; may be providing for the successful conduct of public expeditions in which the honour of the country is involved ; and when he is obliged to fulfil all these duties and discharge all these functions, could anything more absurd be maintained than that he should not feel himself authorized to recommend to Her Majesty those persons best qualified to represent the Sovereign ? On this point there is no doubt whatever, and there has been no difficulty about it in practice.

There is not a function that a Prime Minister in England is called upon to discharge of a higher character than that of appointing a representative of the sovereign in India, Canada or any of the colonies. I do not know that I have a case under my hand, but I remember very well that the late Lord Mayo was named Governor General of India by a Prime Minister after his defeat, and I think after his resignation, and Lord Mayo went to India and discharged, until his untimely death there, the duties of Governor General.

Mr. Disraeli refers to the case in which three days after Lord Russell's resignation and its acceptance and after an adverse vote in the House, he recommended that a Lieutenant-Governor be appointed and the appointment was made and never questioned. Mr. Disraeli also refers to Lord Palmerston in 1858, when he resigned in consequence of a vote in the House—a vote of want of confidence :

He allotted, and I believe most constitutionally, those three great distinctions (three Garters) to three eminent noblemen, his friends and supporters. Therefore, Sir, in my opinion, as far as the constitutional principle is concerned, there can be no doubt—and I never heard there was a doubt—that until your successor has kissed hands and accepted the responsibility of office, the retiring Ministers must meet and incur the full responsibility of all public transactions. * * * I have had the opportunity of ascertaining the opinion of two most eminent statesmen of the present day, representing the two great parties in the state, and once occupying the highest office, and they told me not only that it was the right of the Ministry to recommend to the Sovereign under such circumstances—of which there is, I believe, no doubt whatever—but that in their opinion it was his duty.

No stronger statement could be made than Lord Beaconsfield, formerly Mr. Disraeli, giving his opinion, which was of the highest value, and fortified with a statement that two eminent gentlemen who had held the office of Prime Minister, declared that, not only was it the undoubted right of a defeated Minister to discharge all the duties, without any qualification, and perform the highest functions that fall to a Minister, down to the period that his successor is appointed, but it was his duty. Well, Mr. Gladstone commented upon this—and this will be the more important, as hon. gentlemen will see, when they have these opinions of Mr. Disraeli endorsed by so eminent authority as Mr. Gladstone. At pages 750 and 751 of 195, Mr. Gladstone says :

Then we come to the third question, which is connected with the conduct of the Government in this matter, and I am bound to say without giving any strong opinion on that point, that the doctrine laid down by the right hon. gentleman with respect to the position of an outgoing Minister requires some qualification, because if we accept it in the terms in which it was delivered, it amounts to this—that during the period which elapses from the time when resignation is tendered to the time when a successor comes into power there is no change in the position of the outgoing Minister. That doctrine, in my opinion, is just as far from the truth as the unlimited proposition on the other side—that there was no capacity at all remaining in an outgoing Minister to transact public business. The truth, in fact, lies between the two statements. Much public business must be transacted by the outgoing Minister or the public interests would suffer ; but we all know that it is a familiar practice of outgoing Ministers to leave behind them a memorandum on this subject or on that, and stating that, on account of the position of the Government, they think it expedient to take no step in the matter, but they leave it to be dealt with by their successors. There is an intermediate region of cases, with respect to which it is in the option of an outgoing Minister to act, and that is in regard to filling up vacancies in offices. This is a matter difficult for the House of Commons to deal with. It must be left to the convictions and feelings of the gentlemen in power, and if there had been in the proceedings of the right hon. gentleman any matter of a flagrant character, that circumstance would have justified parliamentary interference.

But, Sir, such a thing as parliamentary interference with the exercise of the highest functions of the Prime Minister, after his defeat, has never been known down to the present hour. There was the case of the appointment of Mr. E. R. Wetherall as Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, which is a life appointment. The late Government, on the eve of their resignation, accepted the resignation of Sir Thomas Larcom and appointed E. R. Wetherall. Mr. Chichester-Fortescue, speaking for the Government, said :

I think it would have been a wiser course, and one far more advantageous to the public service to have pursued, if the late Government had endeavoured to induce Sir Thomas Larcom to continue in his office a little longer, and had not exposed the new Government to the inevitable disadvantage of coming into office with a new Under Secretary, entirely unversed in the duties of his department. * * * In the first place, the present Government are not responsible for the choice which was made by the late Government, who were, strictly speaking, entitled to fill up a vacancy which they had not created.

So that, even with reference to the appointment of an under-secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, who is practically, you may say, a member of the Administration, this appointment by an outgoing Premier of a gentleman to hold that high and important and confidential position, was absolutely unquestioned in Parliament. On page 755, Colonel Wilson-Patten says :

It is, I believe, an invariable practice that all the vacancies which occur within a reasonable time before the resignation of a Government are filled up by that Government ; and I think that if my right hon. friend will only move for a return of the number of appointments so filled up within the three weeks before the last six or seven Governments have left office, he will find that he cannot support the imputation he has cast upon the late Government—of having acted improperly in filling this appointment. Mr. Gladstone, at page 757, says :

I feel obliged, however, to demur to the pleas offered in justification by my right hon. friend opposite in the present instance. In the first place, he thinks that the objection taken by the Chief Secretary for Ireland is that no Government likely to go out of office ought to make any appointments whatever. My hon. friend did not lay down any proposition so absurd. It may be that it is very proper to make some appointments on the eve of quitting office. It may be that it is an error to make other appointments. The only question is—was this an appointment which it was wise for a Government to make on the very eve of quitting office? It is not any general rule, but it is the speciality of these appointments on which the objection is founded. * * * * *

I think my right hon. friend opposite overlooked this consideration—that in case the late Government had not gone out of office it would not have been any great inconvenience to them to have postponed the appointment for three or four weeks; but in making it as they did, they made themselves the judges of who was a fit person to advise and support the new Lord Lieutenant and the new Chief Secretary; they decided who was to be the prop, stay and adviser of these officers, and that at a time when it was well known that Irish policy was the cardinal point of public affairs, and when, consequently, it was of the utmost importance they should work with those with whom they enjoyed unbroken sympathy. That being the case, I do not think my right hon. friend on this side has overstated the matter—while rendering the freest acknowledgments to the late Government in the most important respects—in venturing to say he considers they have not exercised a sound discretion.

Now, I think I have given a sufficiently long line of illustrious precedents establishing the practice in England regarding this important matter, and I now come down to our own practice. I will quote from the course and opinions of Mr. Mackenzie, and their approval by Lord Dufferin. In the life of Mr. Mackenzie, pages 514 and 515, you will find this letter written to the Governor General, dated 19th September, 1878 :

Dear Lord Dufferin,—The elections are mostly over, and sufficiently so as to be conclusive as to the defeat of the Government. The protection fallacy has taken deeper root than we had thought, especially with the farming community.
* * * * *

I shall endeavour to get my colleagues here as soon as possible to finish up what business we have in hand, after which I propose to wait upon Your Excellency at Quebec to tender you my resignation. I shall not initiate any new business here, but I propose filling a few vacancies which occurred within the last few weeks. I propose also, dealing with several English despatches, which have been unattended to during the heat of the election contest, and were under discussion before.

On 17th September, Mr. Mackenzie wrote to the hon. gentleman who now presides over this House, the Hon. J. D. Edgar :

You advise that we should make no appointments. This, I think, we can hardly accept as sound advice. Ordinary vacancies should be filled up. Of these there are a number, some of them existing for weeks. I do think that we ought not to make any new appointments, or create vacancies by any process, in order to get our friends in offices.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not sorry to hear hon. gentlemen opposite say “hear, hear” to the sound doctrine which Mr. Mackenzie laid down, that vacancies should not be created for the purpose of filling them, because hon. gentlemen will search in vain for any indication of a desire on the part of the late Government to create vacancies for the purpose of filling them. But I draw the attention of the hon. gentleman, who is a little premature, perhaps, in his enthusiastic endorsement of that statement, to the following sentence :—

I do not think we ought to make any new appointments or create vacancies. It is quite constitutional for us to do even that.

Therefore, the hon. gentleman will see that even had we proposed to create offices, or make vacancies by any process, the hon. gentleman sees that we would have had the support of so eminent an authority as the leader of the Liberal Government at that time.

But the ground I took in 1873-74 was that I did not object, even after a motion of no confidence was moved, to the Ministry filling vacancies required in the public interest.

I may say that the reason this return shows a very small number of appointments made by the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald after his resignation, is the fact that a good deal of industry had been exercised, after the vote of want of confidence, in disposing of public business in the various departments. Now, I do not think it is necessary for me to labour that point more fully than I have done; but I may say that a very strong corroboration of this policy, both in England and in Canada, is given by the Colonial Office in regard to what was done by the Governor of New Zealand in 1891, as set forth in the official returns of the Imperial House of Commons, referring to the recommendations of six members to the legislative council. Lord Onslow, a man of high standing, who filled the position of Governor of New Zealand, in a letter to Lord Knutsford, says :

It has, however, long been the practice in England for Ministers even after a vote of censure has been passed on them in Parliament, to advise the Crown to create a limited number of peerages, not only for the purpose of strengthening the Upper House, but admittedly as rewards to those who, being qualified for the position of Peers, have rendered political services to the defeated party.

Lord Knutsford, in replying to that despatch, says :

With regard to the appointments to the legislative council recommended by the late Government, I am of opinion that in accepting the advice tendered to you by Your Lordship's responsible Ministers under the circumstances described in your despatches, you acted strictly in accordance with the constitution of the colony, but I do not desire to be understood to offer any opinion upon the action of your Ministers in tendering that advice.

So that even though Lord Knutsford may have disagreed with the action of the Government in nominating so large a proportion of the legislative council after they had ceased to have the confidence of Parliament, withholding his opinion on that point, he says that the Governor of the colony was acting in accordance with the constitution of the country in giving effect to that advice. Now, in view of these very strong and unqualified precedents to which I have drawn the attention of the House as briefly as I can, I may come to the next point, and that is the question of appointments. I will give what actually occurred. In 1873, as the papers on the Table of the House show, after the resignation of the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, there were eight appointments made, including a judge of a county court. As I have already said, a judge of the Supreme Court, just previous to that resignation being tendered, had been appointed, a Lieutenant-Governor had been appointed, and a number of other important officers had been filled. Well, in 1878, as I have already said, Mr. Mackenzie went to the country; and if I remember correctly the first vote in the House of Commons showed him to be in a minority of 85. He was, therefore, defeated by the overwhelming majority of 80 to 90, yet he claimed the constitutional right, the undoubted right, to close up the business of the departments, and to fill all the vacancies that existed. I will not go over all these appointments, because it would take up too much time, but they are to be found in the papers in the hands of hon. members. By examining those papers they will find that every submission to Lord Dufferin by Mr. Mackenzie, after his overwhelming defeat, was approved by Lord Dufferin. Every submission to Lord Dufferin by the outgoing ministry made after their defeat of the 17th September, and, before the resignation of the Government in October, 1878, was approved by the Governor General. There were 116 appointments to office, and I think 17 promotions. There were ten cases of superannuation, there were cases of increase of salaries, county court judges appointed, a judge appointed to the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, judges appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada, judges appointed to the Superior Court of Quebec, a Deputy Minister of the Interior, and an increase to Governor Laird's salary. I assume there had not been any provision of Parliament for that purpose, but it was a most proper increase. The outgoing Prime Minister felt that his old friend who had accepted the Governorship of the North-west, in connection with the management of Indian Affairs which would devolve upon him, was entitled to an increase of $1,000, and that was properly made. But I draw attention to the fact that every appointment, every nomination, every submission made, of which I think there were 180 in all, on various matters of public business, were approved. Hon. gentlemen will find on running their eyes over the submissions made by me, that scores were of the most insignificant character, but they related to public business which required to be dealt with by Order in Council. A large number of them were merely matters of routine, many of them acknowledgement of despatches and matters of that kind, but, as I shall show directly, no undue proportion of appointments. Now, from the mode in which these returns have been brought down, they are not very clear and distinct, and I have had to seek a good deal of personal information from my hon. friend in order to be able to understand them myself. As they are not very clear, I may not be strictly accurate, but so far as I can make out, between June 23 and July 11, 1896, 92 appointments to office were recommended in all. I do not refer to the appointment of Queen's Counsel, which is not an office but a distinction. I regret to say that the present Minister of Justice has dealt with great severity with the recommendations made by the late Minister, Mr. Dickey, but so far as I was informed a long time has elapsed since there had been a general list, and it was a distinction which barristers are very anxious to secure. There is no comparison at all between Queen's Counsel in this country and in England, as the present Minister of Justice would lead the people to suppose. It is a complete misapprehension to suppose that the slightest comparison can be made between the position of Queen's Counsel here and in England. Why are there so few in England? Here it is considered rather derogatory—I am not a lawyer, but gentleman at the bar will know that such is the case—for a lawyer to seek the office of Queen's Counsel, which is a position they like to have offered to them by the Government of the day as a mark of appreciation of the position they have attained. But in England it is quite the reverse. The office of Queen's Counsel is conferred on persons who seek and press their appointment, and they desire it as a most important step in their position at the bar, and hundreds of men who might otherwise be Queen's Counsel are not so because they cannot afford to take it. Instead of the office of Queen's Counsel being conferred merely as a distinction upon a barrister as is done in this country, in England it disqualifies him from the means of prosecuting certain branches of his profession, and the moment he has taken silk he is unable to go on and discharge the duties in which he had been professionally engaged. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries intimates by his smile that I am getting into deep water in discussing a question of this kind; but the hon. gentleman will confirm my statement no doubt, if he has considered the question, that there are hundreds of men in England who refuse such compliment because they cannot afford it, and because it deprives them of following that branch of the profession in which they are most efficient and in which they desire to continue.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

But apart from this distinction, which it was proposed to confer on a number of gentlemen, I think the appointments recommended between 23rd June and 11th July were 92, and of these recommendations, so far as I can make out, 66 were approved by His Excellency and 26 refused. That in general terms, is the statement. I confess I have been totally unable, giving the subject the closest attention I could, to arrive at the grounds on which the distinction has been drawn. These appointments were confirmed, His Excellency's approval being withheld from all recommendations which involved:

1. The creation of new offices or appointments.
2. The filling of vacancies for which no provision has been made by Parliament and which have existed for more than one clear fiscal year.
3. Superannuations, (and the consequential appointments) for which application has not been received.

So far as superannuations were concerned, it was not desired that any superannuation that had not been called for by the party should be pressed upon His Excellency. The one case in which superannuation was asked was that of the surgeon of the penitentiary at Kingston, and I was not aware when it was submitted to His Excellency that an application had not been received before from the very old and highly respectable gentleman who held the office. My attention having been drawn to that, we found it was not in our power to make it. But so far as the creation of vacancies or anything of that kind is concerned, I am satisfied that hon. gentlemen will search in vain for any except legitimate vacancies which the Government had an undoubted right to fill.

But it is not a question whether these were proper appointments or not. I take the ground, and I take it most emphatically, and I put it to hon. gentlemen opposite, that they will do much to undermine the system of parliamentary government we now enjoy in Canada if they yield the point that a Governor General, in the teeth of all parliamentary precedents in England and in this country, can undertake to dictate to his constitutional advisers what they shall do and what they shall not do. I say there are no means by which such information can be obtained by the executive head of the country that are not entirely at variance with all constitutional doctrine, and it opens the door to that kind of influence to which no government under any circumstances can for a moment submit without yielding and surrendering the very birthright of the people of Canada. Why should the executive head, His Excellency undertake himself, of his own motion, to say to his responsible advisers that this appointment is a suitable and legal one and that is not. Where does he get his information? He has responsible Ministers. In the Ministry there is a Minister of Justice, and if he does what Her Majesty the Queen has always done, accept unquestionably and without hesitation every nomination made by an outgoing Ministry, which is responsible for it—for if a mistake is made Her Majesty is not responsible—no person dreams of raising the question as to whether the act is a proper one or not. It may be an unwise and even an improper act, but it is a part of the constitution of the country; and hon. gentlemen opposite cannot surrender it without giving up the birthright of the people of Canada, and taking a step towards that personal rule, that influence of the Crown in opposition to the people and to the Parliament of the country that led to great struggles not only in the mother country in times far gone by but in Canada down to a period within the recollection of persons within the sound of my voice, when there were bitter struggles, when the great reformers—and they were great reformers—struggled to secure free institutions for this country, and to whom our present free institutions are greatly due. Those institutions would have been obtained no doubt at a later period, but those men hastened the advent of a system of British parliamentary rule under which Canada has enjoyed so much peace, so much happiness and so much prosperity. Under these circumstances I say that any more dangerous principle cannot for a single moment be applied. If the Governor General is to make himself responsible, or to make the successors of his Ministry responsible for the action that he takes, where does he place himself? The Governor General of this country, holding the high and dignified social position that he does, so long as he preserves untarnished the constitution of the country, so long as he imitates the high position which his Sovereign, whom he represents, occupies in the motherland; if he is a man of ability and judgment and tact, he will possess—as every gentleman who has had anything to do with government knows—a very wide, a very broad and a very great influence in the management of the affairs of government. Like unto Her Majesty the Queen, who does not interfere with the advice of her constitutional advisers, the Governor General of Canada, as a great social and executive head, should wield an enormous influence. But, Sir, if the Governor General, instead of listening to his constitutional advisers and to the voice of Parliament, who alone are constitutionally in a position to instruct him; if he undertakes to pass upon these questions himself, he must get his information from outside of his advisers. What does the Governor General know about an appointment to a small office that is brought under his notice? He knows nothing, Sir. If the Governor General adopts the position that he is responsible for the acts to which he signs his name, instead of throwing the responsibility—as he is entitled under the constitution to throw it upon the shoulders of his constitutional advisers, if he takes such a position, he is driven to that which would render good government utterly impracticable in Canada. He must go amongst strangers for his advice if he adopts such a course. He does not know the people, and he has no means of judging of their wants. He must go outside and obtain information from sources that are secret and hidden, and are therefore utterly at variance with the principles of constitutional government.

I will give you an illustration of that in the next point that comes under consideration. I refer to the question of the Senate and the judges of Canada. What does the Governor General know about the Senate? He has the voice of Parliament to guide him, and if he wants to know what the character of the Senate of Canada is, let me invite him to read the able speech (although it contains a slight inaccuracy) delivered a few days ago by Sir Oliver Mowat, the Minister of Justice. Does Sir Oliver Mowat say that the Senate of Canada is a partisan Senate? Does he confirm the statement to which His Excellency has unreservedly committed himself, "that it is said, that I have been told, there are only five Liberals in the Senate of Canada." Sir Oliver Mowat paid a high and a well deserved compliment to the patriotism and high character and impartiality of the Senate of Canada. But while paying them this compliment, he made the mistake of saying that there was no Parliament in the world, he believed, in which there was so great a disproportion between one party and the other. But, Sir Oliver Mowat says, not that there are only five Liberals in the Senate of Canada as the Governor General says he was informed and acts upon that information; but Sir Oliver Mowat estimates the relative proportion as one-fifth and four-fifths. Why, Sir, the informant of His Excellency did not even know how many Senators there are. There are eighty-one Senators, but His Excellency's informant supposed there were only seventy-eight, and that of that number only five were Liberals. Sir Oliver Mowat tells him that there are sixteen Liberals or thereabouts in the Senate to-day. You cannot have a better illustration (except the next one I will give you) of the utter unwisdom of a gentleman in the position of the executive head of this country undertaking to inform himself in reference to public questions otherwise than through the legitimate channels which the constitution of our own country, and the practice of our own country affirms is the only safe channel through which the Governor General should seek advice. Mr. Mowat—Sir Oliver Mowat, I beg his pardon for calling him "Mr." for he wears his title with great credit to himself and with the very hearty approval, I believe, of the people of this country. Sir Oliver Mowat says:

I feel the great difficulty that there may be in dealing with all these questions by a Liberal Government, because the Liberal party has so few followers here. Probably such a state of things never existed in any county before with representative institutions, that four-fifths of the number in one Chamber belong to one party and that the remaining fifth, or less than a fifth belong to the other party. I have felt that difficulty, and every one must have felt it, but I would not have consented to come into this House, I would not have felt it right to avail myself of the honour to have a seat in this House, and I feel it to be an honour, if I did not believe that the House would be found to be workable, even with a Liberal Government.

Now, Sir, that relieves at once the stigma of partisanship placed upon the Senate. I may say, Sir, that when in Quebec we were considering the question of a second chamber, a very remarkable thing occurred. More than thirty representatives of all the provinces of Canada, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, were present on that important occasion. When the question of the constitution of the upper chamber of the Canadian legislature was taken up, as I have said, a very remarkable thing occurred. It is well known that for many years previously Canada enjoyed the representative system in the Upper House, and a number of very able and distinguished men had been elected to the legislative council of old Canada. It must be remembered that the representatives present at the Quebec conference were of both political parties. The Government of Canada was a coalition Government of Liberals and Conservatives. The delegates from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick represented both Liberals and Conservatives, and the same applied to Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. Among the representatives of both these parties from all these provinces, there was not one single voice but was unanimously in favour of a nominated Senate for life, except Sir Oliver Mowat and the Hon. Wm. McDougall. One of the ablest men at that conference, the Hon. George Brown—as will be found by a reference to his subsequent speeches—was one of the strongest supporters of a Senate nominated for life in opposition to an elective Senate. I say that the eulogium passed by Sir Oliver Mowat upon the Canadian Senate is well deserved. I say that from the day it was created, from the day that appointments were made and gentlemen went into that chamber to discharge the duties of an upper chamber for the Parliament of Canada; from that day down to this hour, their conduct has evidenced great ability in dealing with public affairs. They are worthy representatives of the wealth, the intelligence, the intellect and the patriotism of Canada. Many of them are men of great experience who have previously served in the Parliament of their country. I can give no better evidence of this than to remind the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright)—who remembers it well, if the hon. First Minister does not—that the only occasions on which the Senate failed to give that support that was desired by Mr. Mackenzie, during his Administration, were occasions on which several of the foremost men of his own party walked out of this House rather than vote for the measures which the Senate rejected; and I myself heard Mr. Mackenzie say, at a later day, as I have no doubt many others did, admit that on those occasions on which the Senate differed from his Government, the Senate was right, and he was wrong. I say, therefore, so far as the character of that body is concerned, that they certainly are not entitled to be called Liberals and Conservatives, from a party standpoint. They have never exhibited partisanship. I have no hesitation in saying that it would be impossible to find any deliberative legislative assembly in the world that has exhibited through its whole career a more independent and impartial spirit, entirely irrespective of what party was in power. There have been occasions—I confess I did not think the Senate was right at the moment—on which the Liberal-Conservative party, with which I was connected, were treated by the Senate in regard to important measures with the same independent spirit that they exhibited on those two or three occasions during Mr. Mackenzie's régime. Any one who knows that great body, knows that it may be fairly looked upon in the light of a chamber of revision; and its services to this country on many occasions have been of the most important character. Whether the measures have been sent up by Mr. Mackenzie's Government or by Sir John Macdonald's Government, the revision they have undergone in the Senate has been of great value. But, when Sir Oliver Mowat says, as he says here, that he doubts whether any country in the world possesses a similar disparity, what does he say of the House of Lords? The House of Lords consists of 557 members; and it is a well-known fact that Lord Rosebery, when Prime Minister, estimated his entire support in that House at 64, or a little less than one-ninth, instead of one-fifth, the proportion in which the Liberal party is said to be represented in the Senate of Canada. And yet, Sir, with this great disparity, what did Her Majesty say, when Lord Derby, taking office in a minority, went to the country, and being badly beaten and compelled to resign, asked Her Majesty to increase that great disparity? Did she say: "You have got too many Conservatives in this House: the Liberal party have only one-ninth of the whole House, and I cannot accept these nominations"? Her Majesty knew too well what the constitution of the country requires at her hands: and she has ever shown, from the hour she ascended the throne down to this moment, that she has no eyes to see and no ears to be guided by any statement in opposition to that of her constitutional advisers and the Parliament of her country.

Then, Sir, what was the character of these appointments? In the case of Mr. Angers and Mr. Desjardins, the nominations that were submitted to His Excellency, had those gentlemen no claim? Having adorned, as they did for years, seats in this House, they went to the Senate, and they were recognized by every man in that Chamber as worthy of the positions they filled. They were recognized as men of high character, of independence, and of thorough knowledge of the wants of the country, and they never failed in discharging their duty. Why did they leave those positions? Sir, they left them at the invitation of the Crown; and came down and placed themselves in the hands of the people; and, having met with a reverse at the hands of the people, having failed to obtain the support of the country, I say that they had an indefeasible claim to be restored to the positions which, at the invitation of the Crown, they had surrendered. Had those appointments been made, they would have vindicated the choice in the future, as they had vindicated it in the past, and would have shown that they were worthily placed to do their country a service.

I will not detain the House further with that; but I come to the question of the judges. The informant, the adviser of His Excellency, whoever he was, and upon whose advice His Excellency relied, ventured to say, and to convince the Governor General, that there was not one Liberal judge on the bench in Canada. I say that distinctly, that the declaration on which His Excellency rested, was a declaration that there was not a Liberal judge on the bench in Canada. I say so, too. I say there is not a Liberal judge on the bench. I say there is not a Conservative judge on the bench. If there is anything of which this Parliament and this country have reason to be proud, it is the character of the judiciary of Canada. I say, Sir, there is no country in the world—not even the great mother country, England—that presents a judiciary which deservedly commands to a greater extent the confidence of every man, every party and every class of people in the country than does the judiciary of Canada. But, Sir, with regard to the imputation that no man had been a Liberal when he went on the bench, it gave me no trouble—and I have no doubt that I have overlooked a great many cases—to give His Excellency at once, from the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada down to the judges of the Superior Courts and County Courts in all the provinces, the names of no less than thirty judges who, when they went on the bench, were men of avowed Liberal proclivities. I give that as another evidence of the great danger—of the impossibility, Sir—of the government of this country being carried on under a system that enables persons holding no position of responsibility, secretly, unknown to the country, unknown to Parliament, unknown to the Government of the country, to obtain the ear of the Governor General of Canada. In this manner His Excellency placed reliance upon statements that are found, upon the most cursory examination—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid the hon. member is making an imputation against the Governor General.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not the slightest. If you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, I will give you His Excellency's own language on the subject, and you will find that he says he has been told, he has been informed. Not by me—not by a responsible adviser. Therefore, I am commenting, and, in so doing, am not making any reflection upon His Excellency, on the question of responsibility assumed by the Government.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The hon. gentleman spoke all along of the secret informants of His Excellency. He has used that expression three or four times.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can only say that I had no knowledge of His Excellency's informants.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman implies something certainly disrespectful to His Excellency.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. SPEAKER. In my judgment he is, and I am sure he does not want, in the judgment of the Speaker of this House, to be considered disrespectful.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can only say, Sir, that I am afraid, if you will permit me to say so, that the imputation comes from the Chair, because I have not charged any disrespect.

Mr. SPEAKER. I cannot allow that from any hon. member of this House. I cannot allow the hon. gentleman to say that the imputation comes from the Chair. The decisions which I make on questions so exceedingly delicate as this is, may be right or may be wrong. In my judgment, they are right and not unfair to either party of the House, and I am sure both sides of the House desire to maintain the rule which I quoted before, that, in this Chamber, the Governor General must not be spoken of disrespectfully. I quite appreciate the difficulty of making a distinction between His

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Excellency and the responsibility his advisers have assumed, but at the same time I think that can be done without casting any slur upon His Excellency.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I bow with great deference to your ruling, and I am quite certain that it does not arise from the slightest desire to limit my statements on this occasion any further than you feel obliged to do. I fully recognize that, and if I refer to these matters, it is because I want to place before the House the gravity of the position of opening the door to a course of conduct that, in my judgment, will be found fatal to all constitutional government in this country. I am glad to know that my remarks have nearly approached a conclusion, but there are one or two matters here that I scarcely know how to deal with. This communication from His Excellency says :

There is a recommendation of a refund of money which requires the sanction of Parliament. Such recommendations will have to be placed before Parliament by the Ministers of the day, and you may perhaps consider that they may be left to be dealt with by these Ministers.

Will the House believe me when I say that this involved a paltry sum of $400, not a cent of which could be touched until Parliament had voted it, and yet the First Minister of Canada is told by the Governor General, on a question on which nothing can be done except Parliament gives its sanction, that the advice of His Excellency's constitutional advisers must be rejected.

I do not intend to deal with Mr. Payne's case, and I will tell my hon. friends opposite why. I have reason to believe—in fact I should be doing a great injustice to the First Minister if I did not say that I do believe—that under the peculiar circumstances, he will do all he can to consider Mr. Payne's position, and that is a matter of very great importance to him. But I simply draw his attention to this very briefly. Mr. Payne filed the position of private secretary to Sir Mackenzie Bowell, and after Sir Mackenzie Bowell went to England, he became my private secretary, and I can only say that I found him a very faithful and a very able and a very well informed man. In fact, he is a man of very considerable ability. Before Sir Mackenzie Bowell left the Government, the Council, of which he was the head, recommended that Mr. Payne should succeed to the position rendered vacant by Mr. Pope when he became Under Secretary of State, namely, the position of Assistant Clerk of the Privy Council. Well, I can only say that that recommendation was made subject to Mr. Payne's passing the promotion examination. When the time came for that examination, he failed; but although he failed, according to the report of the examiner, I found that he had passed a most excellent examination. I found that in every fair and legitimate test of his ability to fill the position for which he was appointed, instead of getting 70 he obtained over 90 per cent of the marks. Then my attention was drawn to the fact that the questions prepared by the Clerk of the Council were of a very difficult character, to say the least of it, and I think that any hon. gentleman who will take the trouble to peruse these questions, as they are found on the Table, will come to the same conclusion. I am inclined to think that most of the members of this House would have been rejected on an examination of this kind. I have had a good deal to do with public matters myself during forty years, but I would not like to be examined on those questions myself, and certainly would not have liked to have my tenure of office depend on my answering them; but be that as it may, the Governor General in Council are the persons who arrange what the examination shall be. The examination is not held under statute, but under regulations made and altered from time to time by the Governor General in Council, and that being the case, if the Governor in Council believed that the examination had been well passed and that the party was entitled to his promotion under it, and that these questions which were not answered, were all of too technical and far-fetched a character to give a fair chance to the candidate, there was nothing to prevent the Governor General in Council, which has the responsibility of the whole thing in their hand, modifying those regulations in such a way as to apply to that examination. On that ground the Council asked the Governor General to give the promotion on the ground that a thoroughly good and satisfactory examination had been passed by Mr. Payne. The question of legality was raised, but, if I may be allowed to say so, that is not a question for His Excellency, but for the Minister of Justice, and if the Minister of Justice reports, as he did, that it was all legal, and if there was precedent after precedent to be found for exactly that same thing in other departments, I do not see why the advice of the responsible Ministers is to be ignored and set aside.

An hon. MEMBER. What did you do with Mr. Mackenzie's secretary?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I shall answer that frankly. Mr. Buckingham was appointed by virtue of the power that Lord Dufferin permitted Mr. Mackenzie to exercise. Mr. Buckingham had only been a short time in the service, and he was appointed before Mr. Mackenzie went out a Deputy Minister. He had been very rapidly advanced to a very high position, with a large salary, in the Department of Railways and Canals. He was a man, I believe, of great ability, and would no doubt have made a very able Deputy Minister. As is well known to hon. gentlemen familiar with these matters, private secretaries to Prime Ministers are considered entitled to exceptionally favoured treatment, and the outgoing Prime Minister is always anxious, as far as he can, to provide for his private secretary. Mr. Mackenzie was animated by that sentiment, and was only in the exercise of his right when he appointed Mr. Buckingham to the high position of Deputy Minister. But Sir John A. Macdonald was going to be the Minister of that department—the Department of the Interior, and the Governor General approved of the appointment to this high office of a man who had been only a short time in the service and made him a deputy minister. Sir John A. Macdonald did not cancel, but he modified this by relegating Mr. Buckingham back to the Department of Public Works, where he was in receipt of a very good salary for the time he had been in the service. Now, I am dealing with the question whether I may say that had Mr. Payne been appointed to the position, had his appointment been confirmed to the position of assistant in the Privy Council office, I could quite understand that it is just possible that my hon. friend taking the position of the President of the Privy Council—and I had no knowledge at the time that he would take that position, for I preferred the portfolio, as Premier, of Secretary of State—but that is a matter of opinion—might have preferred some person in more confidential relations with himself and translated Mr. Payne to some other position. But we are not dealing with that. I am dealing with the question whether a Governor General in Canada shall undertake to obtain opinion from any outside source and overrule and override the advice given him by his constitutional advisers. That the Governor General is entitled to the fullest and most complete information in regard to everything that comes before him I quite admit. But I believe the proper practice was that the information was sought in a legitimate source of the Prime Minister, and the Governor General discussing with his Prime Minister any point that presented itself for his consideration, the question was solved by considerations presented and a conclusion arrived at satisfactory to both. But I say that under the circumstances I do not intend to go into it further than to give this brief statement of the position, hoping and trusting and sincerely desiring that my hon. friend will take some measure to do justice to the fair and legitimate claims of Mr. Payne. I do not wish to bribe the hon. gentleman, but I can only say that if the time should come when he will have to make a similar appeal to me in regard to his private secretary it will receive my most favourable consideration.

Now I am glad to be able to say that I must conclude these somewhat lengthy and tedious observations. But the point is an important one. We have been very fortunate in the Governors General we have had. Lord Monck, Lord Lisgar, Lord Dufferin, Lord Lorne, Lord Lansdowne, Lord Stanley.

And I never had greater pleasure in my life than I had in attending the banquet which was given to Lord Dufferin. I have said that until Mr. Mackenzie retired from office Lord Dufferin gave him his fullest confidence and fullest support. Mr. Mackenzie was beaten, as I have said, by an overwhelming majority, yet Lord Dufferin accepted every nomination he made, appointing judges of the Supreme Court, judges of the Superior Court, county judges—in fact, accepting every nomination, without hesitation of qualification. And Lord Dufferin left this country, as every person knows, after a very brilliant administration with the hearty approval and affectionate regard of every person regardless of party. He was here on the occasion of two very important political crises. Yet when I had the pleasure of attending the banquet in the city of London given to him when he returned from his Governorship, side by side with me sat Mr. Mackenzie; and it was a great source of pleasure to Lord Dufferin and to his friends to hear from the lips of both Mr. Mackenzie and myself the declaration that Lord Dufferin then enjoyed the hearty confidence and kindly feeling of every inhabitant of Canada of every party and every class. Now, Sir, that has been a condition with regard to every Governor General we have from confederation down to the present hour, and there is no gentlemen on either side of politics but will feel it to be of great importance that that should continue. No greater misfortune could happen to Canada in my opinion than that the time should come when anybody would feel that the Governor General of this great Dominion represented not his sovereign who reigns in the hearts of the whole people but a party in the state. In this we should lose one of the great distinctions that give British institutions, in my opinion, such great superiority over republican institutions. And I can only say, as I said in rising that I have never been called upon to discharge so painful a duty in my life as to animadvert in the slightest degree upon the floor of Parliament upon the executive action of the executive head of the country.

I do not intend to conclude with a motion, and I will tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) frankly why. It is because I felt that it would intensify the difficulty if a majority in this House were to affix, by a solemn vote, their approval to what has taken place. I say I should regret that as intensifying the unpleasant nature of a position which nobody deprecates more than I do. What I have said in relation to this matter has not been tinged with personal feeling. So far as I am personally concerned, I make no complaint. So far as the great party I have the honour to lead in this country is concerned, I make no complaint. But I feel that there are some things above and beyond party, and one of these is the maintenance of these great parliamentary institutions that have enabled England to become what she is and which have been adopted and copied down to the present time by Canada and have enabled all classes and all parties in this country to look to the Executive head of Canada with the same respect and confidence that the people of the whole Empire look to Her Majesty the Queen.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has rested the case which he has drawn to the attention of the House largely upon principles which no one disputes, upon principles which have come to us from men whose names will ever be dear to all shades of Liberals and Reformers. But when it came to the application of these principles, the hon. gentleman once more showed that when an ingrained Tory, if I may so speak of him, or a Liberal-Conservative, as I suppose he would prefer to be called, undertakes to apply Liberal principles, he is always apt to fall into sad and lamentable error. It may not be uninteresting, at the outset of this controversy, to review the facts and the arguments which constitute the head and front of the hon. gentleman's speech, in the light of events which are now matters of history. When, on the 9th July, the telegraphic wires spread the news throughout the country that the Administration of the hon. gentleman had surrendered the seals of office into the hands of His Excellency the Governor General, the impression was general throughout the country that he and his colleagues had at last loyally accepted their defeat, that they were loyally obeying the mandate they had received from the people, commanding them, in no uncertain tones, to vacate their offices and to give them up to men in whom the people had declared their confidence. But this impression, natural as it was, was erroneous; this impression, honourable as it was on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, gave them a measure of credit to which they were not entitled; because we have it to-day from the mouth of the hon. gentleman himself, we have it in these papers which have been laid on the Table of the House for some time, and to-day we have it confirmed by the hon. gentleman himself, that, if they surrendered the seals of office, it was not in obedience to the mandate of the people, but it was because, although they still presumed to offer advice to His Excellency, His Excellency would no longer accept the advice of men whom the people had rejected. If His Excellency had accepted the advice of those hon. gentlemen, defeated though they were, they would have remained to govern the country until, as the hon. gentleman has said himself, they had been kicked once more by the representatives of the people. Now, such is a plain statement of the facts, and under such circumstances the hon. gentleman comes here and has the boldness—I might perhaps use a stronger word—to ask Parliament, impliedly, not actually, to censure His Excellency for the course which he adopted on that occasion. Well, Sir, here is my answer to the hon. gentleman: The Governor General has committed no wrong against the people of Canada. His Excellency has done what he had received a command from Her Majesty the Queen to do, he has made himself the custodian and the champion of the rights of the people of Canada. I do not hesitate to say more: if the conduct of His Excellency the Governor General has been the means of compelling the hon. gentleman and his colleagues to abide by the verdict of the people, which otherwise they would have disobeyed, I say here, that the name of Aberdeen, like the name of Elgin, will ever be revered by the people of this country who cherish constitutional and popular government. There is something, I will not exactly say comical, but verging on the comical, in this sudden, new-born zeal and respect of the hon. gentleman for the constitution. They are not in their element. They are reactionary, and, whenever reactionary people attempt to become Liberal, they are very apt to become revolutionary. It is only two weeks ago since the hon. gentleman who sits beside my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and whom I regret not to see in his seat to-day, the member for York (Mr. Foster)—it is only two weeks ago that he confided to us, in dolorous tones, that, since sitting in the cold shades of Opposition, his poor soul was harrowed with doubts and scruples from which it was quite free when sitting on this side of the House. When sitting on this side, he never hesitated to use and abuse special warrants in order to cover expenditures more or less questionable; but, sitting there, in the cold shades of Opposition, the hon. gentleman confessed to us that his soul was tortured because, forsooth, this Government had used special warrants in order to pay the wages and salaries of men who are giving their daily toil to the service of the country. To-day, we have the hon. gentleman the leader of the Opposition coming here and telling us that the constitution has been outraged because he was not allowed, under the circumstances of the case, to fill the Senate with his followers, and to fill the public service with his creatures. Now, let us look at the case, such as it is, let us examine it closely. What is the line of cleavage between the attitude taken by His Excellency the Governor General and the attitude maintained by the present leader of the Opposition? There was an election on the 23rd of June, as we all know, and that election did not result as the hon. leader of the Opposition had expected. He had indulged a good deal in the line of prophecy. He had told the admiring crowds of office-seekers that he was sure to sweep the country; he was sure to sweep the maritime provinces, he was sure to sweep the western section of Ontario, he was sure to sweep all Canada with the cry of religious passion which his followers were raising. It was expected that the Liberals would be snowed under forever. But, Sir, events did not turn out that way, and, as soon as he found out that the Government had been defeated, my hon. friend and his colleagues were equal to the occasion. They set their hearts and hands at once to the task of filling the public service, from the Senate Chamber to the messengers' room, filling every hole, every nook, and corner, and crevice, with their appointments, so that the new Administration would have been forced to live, if that system had been carried out, in an atmosphere saturated with Toryism; and for years, perhaps, they would have been paralyzed by the conditions imposed upon them. The hon. gentleman, when under the strain of defeat, undertook to advise His Excellency to appoint Senators, to appoint custom-house officers, to appoint inland revenue officers, to appoint messengers and light-house keepers, and to fill the civil service in every grade. But His Excellency took the ground that, under the peculiar circumstances in which the hon. gentlemen were offering their advice, he could not appoint the Senators, neither would he appoint civil servants unless they belonged to a certain category. He would not make life appointments, and appointments involving the creation of new offices, or fill appointments for which no provision had been made by Parliament. Recommendations to that class of appointments His Excellency would not sanction. Now, Sir, here is another grievance of my hon. friend. I think I put the case just as he puts it, when he asked what information had the Governor General of the defeat of the Government. What right had he to make any distinction between one appointment and another? How did he know that the Government were defeated? He could only know that from the Prime Minister. Those were the questions the hon. gentleman put; this was the answer he gave. Again I ask, How could he know whether, on the 23rd of June, the Government was defeated? Who could have told him? How did he know? He knew from his adviser, the Prime Minister, Sir Charles Tupper. He it was who had acquainted His Excellency with that fact. Sir, on the 25th June, two days after the election, there appeared in the Montreal "Gazette," the organ of the hon. gentlemen, the following despatch from Ottawa:—

Ottawa has not yet recovered from the surprise and astonishment caused by the defeat of the Conservative party yesterday. As far as this city is concerned the blow came like thunder from a clear sky, for although it was admitted that owing to the split in the Conservative ranks here one seat and possibly two would be lost in Ottawa, still the greatest confidence was felt that the party would be sustained by a majority throughout the Dominion. As to the causes of the defeat, there are a thousand and one theories, but probably no one comes so near to the real cause as does Sir Charles Tupper in an interview which your correspondent has just had with him. Sir Charles attributes the disaster—

Sir Charles Tupper knew the disaster, then.

—to the fatal mistake which had been made of refusing to dissolve Parliament after the adoption of the remedial order and the calling of a session to deal with the Remedial Bill when the life of Parliament expired on a fixed date.

Sir, from this statement, it is clear that the leader of the Opposition knew quite well, two days after the election, that a disaster had overtaken his party. Then, the following day, the Montreal "Star" had the following despatch from Ottawa:—

It is understood that Sir Charles Tupper has received from London a large number of telegrams extending sympathy on his defeat.

Why, even in London they knew the hon. gentleman was defeated. Telegrams of sympathy were being sent him; and it is only at Rideau Hall where it is supposed that nobody knew.

It was long after five o'clock last evening when the Ministers came out of Council. Sir Charles Tupper came almost last and walked briskly around his room in the Secretary of State's Department talking on the outcome of the elections.

"There is nothing for you to say," he said to a correspondent, "except this, that as soon as Council can conclude the routine business now before it, so soon will the Ministry resign. I can give you no date at present, but probably in a few days."

Not two hours ago the hon. leader of the Opposition asked the House, how could His Excellency know of the defeat of his Government? Will the hon. gentleman pretend here that he would not treat His Excellency with the same respect as he treated the correspondent of a newspaper? Will he pretend here that when he said to a newspaper correspondent that his party had been defeated, that he was prepared to vacate office as soon as the routine business was closed, he would have us believe that he was so disrespectful to His Excellency as not to give him the same advice? Is the hon. gentleman prepared to have this House believe that he had so little respect for his duty and obligation to the representative of the Sovereign not to tell His Excellency the same fact which he had told the newspaper correspondent? Now, what is there left of the case presented by the hon. gentleman, when the whole case is rested on the assumption that His Excellency could not act except upon the advice of his Ministry? There is nothing left of the hon. gentleman's case, because the hon. gentleman cannot come here and tell this House that what he stated to the newspaper correspondent he did not state to His Excellency. What then did the hon. gentleman state to His Excellency? He wrote to Quebec possibly, or when His Excellency came here, he said:

Mr. LAURIER.

My Lord, there is nothing now to do except that as soon as ever Council can conclude the routine business now before it, the Ministry will resign. That is the language which the hon. gentleman must have used to His Excellency—he could not have used any other language. So His Excellency in just two days after the elections learned that his Ministers had been defeated, and from that moment His Excellency was within his right, not only within his right, but within his duty when he kept the hon. gentleman strictly to the advice he had given—that is to say, that he was prepared to resign after he had completed matters of routine, but he would not go beyond that. That is the case as it is at the present time. My hon. friend spoke with his usual vigour on the British constitution, and if we are to believe him in the speech he delivered this evening, he had nothing in view but respect for the British constitution. If I understood him aright, Government is responsible to Parliament but not responsible to the people, and the voice of the people, can only be heard through the voice of Parliament and the voice of the people, as spoken by the people, is not to be taken into consideration. I do not say that there is not something in that argument. But that is not the modern doctrine, which is, that the Government is not only responsible to Parliament but to the people in whose behalf Parliament speaks. The theory propounded by the hon. gentleman is a hundred years old. The hon. gentleman well knows that the British constitution is not a cut and dried instrument. If there is one characteristic which distinguishes the British constitution more than another it is its elasticity. It has been found applicable as statute has followed statute and precedent followed precedent, and it has adapted itself to new eras of development as they have progressed from age to age. It has been applied without effort, wrench or hindrance from the time of the personal absolutism of the early Plantagenet kings down to the Democratic Government of Queen Victoria. Responsible government was the greatest conquest achieved by the British people under the constitution. In early days government was responsible to Parliament. But it could hardly be said that Parliament represented the people—it represented the classes and the privileged classes, but not the people; and the great Reform Bill of 1832, followed as it has been by successive instalments and extensions, brought the Parliament of Great Britain and the Parliament of Canada to be expressions of the direct voice of the people. This is a new doctrine, which is new in operation,—that as soon as the voice of the people has been heard, immediately the Ministers of the Crown shall take advice as to whether they have been supported or not by the people. The first statesman to deal with this question and to take this view was Mr. Disraeli after the great Reform Bill of 1868. Mr. Disraeli appealed to the country. He was defeated, and on being defeated, immediately he sent his resignation to the Crown. It was a novel step, a step not possible in the last century, but a step not only necessary but advisable under the new development of the British constitution. And this is the reason given by Mr. Disraeli for his action :

Although the general election has elicited, in the decision of numerous and vast constituencies, an expression of feeling which, in a remarkable degree, has justified their anticipations, and which in dealing with the question in controversy, no wise statesman would disregard. It is now clear that the present Administration cannot expect to command the confidence of the newly-elected House of Commons. Under these circumstances, Her Majesty's Ministers have felt it due to their own honour, and to the policy they support, not to retain office unnecessarily for a single day.

This is the first precedent. Six years afterwards Mr. Gladstone, who had been in office during that time, went to the country and was defeated, and forthwith he sent in his resignation. That was in 1874. Then Mr. Disraeli came back into power. In 1880 general elections took place, and resulted in the defeat of Mr. Disraeli's Government. Forthwith Mr. Disraeli forwarded his resignation to the Queen. Six years afterwards at the general elections the Government of Mr. Gladstone was defeated, and again on that occasion Mr. Gladstone, without waiting to meet Parliament, sent his resignation to the Queen. At the last elections, 1892, Lord Salisbury was defeated, but instead of sending his resignation to the Queen, he chose to meet Parliament, and to be defeated on the debate on the Address. The reason which induced Lord Salisbury to meet Parliament was that a majority was not apparent, and that the Liberal strength was made up of a heterogeneous combination, including Radicals, Home Rulers and labour representatives, whose opinions could not be obtained except by a vote in the House. We have it clearly set forth that this was the reason why Lord Salisbury did not resign at once. But this argument cannot apply in the present case. We have had the words of the hon. gentleman opposite (Sir Charles Tupper) that two days after the elections he said he knew he had been defeated. Well, Sir, if he knew he had been defeated, in the view of the precedents I have quoted, he had only one course to take, and that was, to discharge all routine business, then take his cane, gloves and hat and walk out and make place for another. This is the only view in my estimation which the question can admit of. This is the view which His Excellency took, and this is the view which the advisers of His Excellency are prepared to maintain not only on the floor of Parliament, but to maintain also with great confidence of success all over the country. It is the view which is in consonance with the rights of the people such as we understand them at the present time. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) made another point. He stated that although defeated the outgoing Administration had the right to appoint Senators, because, as he says, it is acknowledged in England that the outgoing administration has the right to appoint peers. But, Sir, there is a qualification upon this. Does the right of the outgoing Administration in England go so far as the hon. gentleman has stated? Does the rights of the outgoing administration in England go to the extent without qualification of appointing peers? It does not as I understand it. Let me quote an authority upon this subject. Todd says :

The moment it was proved that those peerages had really been agreed to by the outgoing Minister, he having taken the pleasure of the Crown on the point, that moment the Ministers in power agreed to confirm the grant, and thus respected the engagements of their predecessors.

Sir, I can understand that. If the outgoing administration before the election had taken the precaution, or had advised the Crown, of nominating Mr. so and so to the House of Lords, and if the Crown had agreed to that, I could well understand that the honour of the Crown under such circumstances was pledged; and that it was the duty of the new ministry to fulfil these obligations, since the honour of the Crown was pledged to them. But, does the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) pretend that he had obtained the sanction of the Crown to the appointment of Mr. Angers or of Mr. Desjardins or of Mr. Nat White or of Mr. Gooderham. He cannot pretend anything of the kind. If the hon. gentleman had told His Excellency before the election: I have advised Mr. Angers to resign in the Senate, but I warn Your Excellency that if he is defeated by the people, I shall claim the privilege of re-appointing him to the Senate; and if His Excellency had agreed to such an extraordinary bargain as that—because it would be nothing short of a bargain—then I can understand that the hon. gentleman would have some ground to stand upon. But, he pretends nothing of the kind, and his argument therefore is untenable. There is another point of difference, and what is it? I am glad for my part that we should be able to compare the Canadian Senate to the House of Lords, but, Sir, there is an immense difference between them as the hon. gentleman knows. The number of the Senators is limited, and therefore if the Senate is crammed with one party the incoming administration might find it an absolute impossibility to carry on its legislation. On the other hand, the House of Lords is not limited in number and if the outgoing administration were to make appointments which would be embarrassing to the incoming administration, then the incoming administration has the right of suggesting and making other appointments. There is no similar feature in the Senate here.

But there is something more. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) is strong upon the constitution. I charge here against him and against his party, that in so far as the Senate of Canada is concerned, they have all along for the last eighteen years disregarded the constitution of Canada in the nature of the appointments which they made to that branch of the legislature. It was one of the well understood principles at confederation—and the hon. gentleman referred a moment ago to the debates of the Quebec convention—it was one of the well understood principles then, that if the Senate was not elective, and if it was to be appointed by the Crown, then both political parties should be equally represented on the floor of the Senate. The hon. gentleman has forgotten that rule in practice although it cannot have escaped his memory. He quoted a moment ago the opinion of Sir Oliver Mowat who at that early date was against a nominative Senate and in favour of an elective Senate. Certainly, Sir, the practice of late years has shown that at that time as now, Sir Oliver Mowat possessed the same sagacity which has distinguished all his political career. That very same question came up for debate in this House some twenty-two years ago. In 1872, Mr. Mackenzie had made some attack upon the constitution of the Senate (the very point which we have before us at the present time), and Sir John Macdonald who was the leader of the Government resented the attack with great vehemence. This is how Sir John Macdonald spoke :

With regard to the provinces of Upper Canada and Lower Canada, a full selection was made without reference to political principles. In the province of Upper Canada a fair arrangement was made between himself and the Hon. George Brown, then and now the leader of the party of which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) is a member, and although Mr. Brown retired from the Government before the selection was made, he (Sir John) felt that still the arrangement was obligatory, and he asked his hon. friend from North Lanark, and the present Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, the representatives of the Reform party in the Government of the day to sit down with him and select the twenty-four men for the Senate. He (Sir John) wrote a name, choosing from his own party, and they selected their man, and the consequence was twelve Reformers and twelve Conservatives were elected to sit in that Chamber, and no one knew better than his hon. friend that it was a fair understanding that the claims of members of the legislative council of old Canada to seats in the Senate should be considered as vacancies might take place, and that had been faithfully carried out.

This was the pledge which was taken by all the members who sat at the Table to frame the confederation resolutions. Has that pledge been kept by the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) and his party? No, for the hon. gentleman and his friends saw to it that no appointments were made to the Senate but those of their own partisans. The hon. gentleman spoke a moment ago of the high character of the Senate. I have nothing to say derogatory of the character of the

Mr. LAURIER.

Senate. Let it be ever so able a body, does the hon. gentleman pretend that it has that character of fairness which was expected of it when the Senate was created to be nominative and not elective. Sir, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) knows very well that His Excellency had a fair case in hand when he pointed out to the hon. gentleman, that if four new Senators of the Conservative persuasion were appointed it would be a source of embarrassment to the incoming administration. At that time the hon. gentleman was defeated. He knew that he had to resign for he had stated so himself, and he knew there must be a new Liberal Administration. How would the case have stood? There were four vacancies in the Senate including one from the province of Ontario, which the hon. gentleman proposed to fill. It had been stated throughout the whole country during the election campaign that Sir Oliver Mowat was to enter the Administration as leader of the Liberal Government in the Senate, and the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) knew it. If the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) had had his wish; if he had been able to fill the only vacancy which then existed in the province of Ontario, the Liberal Administration, the Government of to-day, would have been placed in a position of almost superhuman difficulty in that respect. Sir, the hon. gentleman, under such circumstances, does not hesitate to blame His Excellency for the course he took. Every man in this House or out of the House who has the instinct of justice in his bosom will approve the course of His Excellency upon that occasion.

Then, Sir, what about the judges? I do not see much importance in discussing the question of the judges upon this occasion, because the matter came up simply hypothetically. But, since the hon. gentleman has alluded to it let me refer to the subject. This is what His Excellency said with regard to the judges, and I submit, Sir, that the statement of the hon. gentleman a moment ago was not only most disrespectful in tone and words, but it was most unfair to His Excellency as well. This was the simple remark made by His Excellency :

In the case of judges, I will only add that, bearing in mind the ordinary length of their tenure of office and also the long political predominance of one political party in the Dominion Parliament, the current deduction as to the complexion of the political opinions represented upon the bench, whether baseless or well founded is not unnatural.

Sir, the hon. gentleman finds fault with that. The hon. gentleman knows the condition of things in this country. I have nothing to say against the bench. I am prepared to admit everything he said in honour of it. But, Sir, judges are men like all other men; and the hon. gentleman knows very well that whatever may have been the practice before 1878, since that time all appointments to the bench have been made not so much for judicial fitness as for the reward of political service. I am sorry to have to speak in that way; but, Sir, I speak the truth as it is known to every man in this country. That there are men whose political services were not ignored when they were appointed to the bench, but who are a credit to the bench, I admit; but suppose every man appointed to the bench were ever so free from partisanship, we have all had sufficient experience of life to know that unconsciously, whether Liberals or Conservatives, we grow into one groove of opinion; and happy is the man who can say that he is never biased by the opinions of his life. Judges on the bench continue to be human. I do not impugn their motives or their good intentions; and fortunately at this moment it is not necessary for me to do so. But, Sir, who can say, when a case arises, especially one of a political nature, that the judge on the bench is not biased by the political opinions he has held during his life? If I went through my own country, I might find instances of that. I prefer not to do it; but let me go to another country; let me go to the republic to the south of us. The Supreme Court of the United States, as is well known, has been long regarded as one of the great judicial tribunals of the world. It has earned the praise of de Tocqueville and other great thinkers; and certainly all praise bestowed upon it was well deserved. But we know that on a famous occasion, after the presidential election of 1876, when the question was referred to a commission in which that great court was represented, whether Mr. Hayes or Mr. Tilden had a majority of the electoral vote, the judges of that court who sat in the commission divided on every question upon party lines. Does the hon. gentleman presume to say that Canada is better than other countries in that respect? Canadian judges are liable to all the passions of mankind; and in view of the fact that every man appointed to the bench for the last eighteen years had been taken from the ranks of the Conservative party, it was not unnatural for His Excellency to think that perhaps it would be in the interest of the country if judges were now taken from the other side of politics. Not, Sir, I am sure, that His Excellency wanted to convey the impression that judges carried their politics with them on the bench; but simply because His Excellency could not be blind to the fact that judges are weak and human like all other mortals.

As to the case of Mr. Payne I do not care to say much, and I would not have referred to it had the hon. gentleman not introduced it. I think it is a very small thing to be brought into this debate. Mr. Payne was the private secretary of the hon. gentleman, and my hon. friend before he left office wanted to have him appointed to one of the most important offices in the civil service, that of deputy clerk of the Privy Council.

Mr. Payne, in order to qualify for that position, had to pass an examination. He passed the general examination creditably, but he failed in the technical examination. The hon. gentleman a few days ago—I hope I shall be pardoned if I refer to it—was most unfair to Mr. McGee when he stated that he could not obtain the questions from Mr. McGee. Why should Mr. McGee have concealed those questions? Mr. McGee has assured me that the hon. gentleman in this respect must have been in error, because he was not conscious of having refused those questions. But why, in the name of common sense, should Mr. McGee refuse those questions when they were prepared with the sanction of Mr. Angers, then President of the Council, and approved by the Governor in Council? Mr. Payne, having failed in that examination, was not qualified for the office; and when under these circumstances the hon. gentleman advised His Excellency to appoint Mr. Payne to that office, he advised His Excellency to commit an illegality, and under those circumstances His Excellency was not bound to accept the advice of his adviser.

Now, Sir, I come to a reproach which I was not a little astonished to find in the mouth of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman quoted from a state paper of His Excellency the following sentence, in which His Excellency deals with what took place here during last session:

The previous Administration (with Sir Mackenzie Bowell as Prime Minister), representing the views of the same political party, and having a majority in both chambers, failed to pass its proposed legislation, and on the 25th April Parliament expired by efflux of time, without having granted supplies for the public service beyond the 30th of June.

The hon. gentleman challenged that statement of His Excellency. He said that there was an innuendo here, which was not borne out by the facts—that His Excellency conveyed thereby the impression that supplies had been refused by Parliament to the then existing Government, which the hon. gentleman characterized in strong and severe language as most unwarrantable, and as conveying a false impression to any man who did not know the exact state of the facts. Sir, I invite the attention of the hon. gentleman to a motion which was moved in this House by his neighbour the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), for which he spoke and for which he voted. Here it is:

That on the 28th of January the House was asked to go into Committee of the Whole for granting supply, and to consider first the appropriations for departmental salaries and contingencies.

That neither then, nor on the several occasions thereafter when the House was asked to grant supply did the Opposition agree thereto.

That appeals were made by the Government setting forth the urgent necessity for making provision for the ordinary and regular expenditures for the approaching fiscal year, or in view of the impending dissolution and of the fact that the new Parliament could not possibly assemble before July 1st and would probably meet shortly thereafter, for a part thereof.

That despite these representations and although the circumstances were well-known and there was ample time at the disposal of the House, supplies for the year 1896-97 were refused and Parliament rose on the 23rd April without these supplies being granted.

Sir, the statement which the hon. gentleman characterized a moment ago as conveying to the public a false impression, is not half so strong as the statement for which he spoke and voted less than two weeks ago. Here we have the statement, not by innuendo but positively made, that Parliament deliberately refused to grant supplies to the outgoing Administration; and, Sir, in the face of that condition of things, when the late Government could not obtain supplies from Parliament, when it was resting under the strongest censure that could be passed by Parliament, the hon. gentleman dares to complain that he was treated with severity. I say, Sir, that he was treated with great leniency, because under such circumstances he had not the right even to appoint a messenger or to spend a single dollar. The hon. gentleman to-day comes before Parliament—for what? To vindicate the constitution? No, Sir. The complaint of my hon. friend is the last wail of the disappointed office-grabber. All this quibbling and equivocating, and pettifogging, and hair-splitting is absolutely meaningless, unless there were behind it some moral wrong. But moral wrong there is none. His Excellency committed no harm to anybody, and conferred a great benefit on this nation, because he showed that, in this nineteenth century, under the British Crown, and by the aid of the British Crown, the people shall have government of the people by the people and for the people, and for this all true Canadians will revere the name of Aberdeen for ever and for ever.

Motion agreed to, and the House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Clothing and necessaries, ordinary vote.. $90,000

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I understand that this item was reserved in order to give an opportunity for general discussion, and I believe the late Minister of Militia wishes to discuss it. As he is not in the House now, I would ask the hon. gentleman to let it stand.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think it was understood that this should stand for the purpose of general discussion. I should like to ask the Minister of Militia if he would kindly lay upon the Table the letter I asked for.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I will lay it on the Table to-morrow.

Mr. LAURIER.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). We will let that item stand.

Tidal service, Tide gauges, instruments and staff.. . . . . $15,000

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Can the hon. gentleman explain this increase of $5,000?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). These Estimates are in exact conformity with those brought down last session. I have not made any alteration whatever. I find that the vote for 1895-96 was $10,000, and the expenditure within a few dollars of that sum. In the Estimates submitted for last year $15,000 was asked, and I assume that it was for some expenses of the service. But Mr. Dawson has not returned from his labours, and I have had no opportunity to consult with him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am glad to see the additional amount here. This service is a very important one, and I have always been afraid that we were going a little too slowly, for the result of the survey in connection with the currents of the St. Lawrence and approaches to it are becoming of greater importance every day. We began on a small scale, and gradually increased.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not wish to mislead the House into believing that I have formed an opinion as to the desirability of expending this extra $5,000. Until I see Mr. Dawson's report, and have an opportunity of consulting with him, I cannot form an opinion.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You will find you need all the money.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I keep an open mind on the subject. So far, I have only adopted the estimate of my predecessor.

Removal of obstruction in navigable rivers .. . . . . $3,000

Mr. CLANCY. If my memory serves me well, some discussion took place in this House last session as to whether the removal of obstructions in rivers should come under the head of Public Works or Marine and Fisheries. Will the hon. gentleman say what service this $3,000 is intended for? Of course, the amount is small.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is largely a nominal vote. Last year the expenditure was only $453. It is only for emergencies.

Winter mail service .. . . . . $6,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Is the hon. Minister able to state what decision the Government have arrived at in connection with the service between Portland and St. John, N.B.? The hon. gentleman is aware that the late Government arrived at the conclusion that it was very important to have a winter port in Canada.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to suggest that that subject could be discussed better on the vote for mail subsidies. This relates to Prince Edward Island alone.

Mr. HACKETT. I see there is a decrease in this vote. Is it the intention to reduce the service, or will the Government keep the steamer "Stauley" and the boats running?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We shall not only keep the steamer "Stauley" and the boats as usual, but I hope to be able to make a proposition for the increased efficiency of the service in the Supplementary Estimates. The vote last year was $5,000, but $7,000 was expended, and the late Ministry proposed the vote as a tentative proposition. I just adopted this, but, if my colleagues approve of it, I hope to submit to my hon. friend (Mr. Hackett) a proposition for improving the service, for which I hope I shall have his support.

Salaries and allowances of lightkeepers.. $205,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What is the reason of the increase in this vote?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The vote last year was $201,600, and the expenditure the same, within a few dollars. There is always an increase in the salaries, and some new lights are to be established.

Maintenance and repair to lights..... $230,000

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think it is only fair to congratulate the department on its ability to keep this item so well in hand. It is remarkable that, notwithstanding new lights established, the maintenance charge is kept almost at the same figure.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. And the department, last year, did not spend quite so much as the House voted.

Construction, &c., of lights .....$ 20,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I suppose the increase is due to the building of new lights.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes—lights at the entrance to Ship's Harbour, Great Bras D'Or Lake, the East Gap of the Toronto Bay, and other places.

Mr. MONK. Is it the intention to rebuild the light near Point Claire, which was burned?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes; I answered the hon. gentleman's question, of which notice was given. It is the intention of the Government to rebuild the light referred to.

Hydrographical survey .....$ 16,000

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Can the hon. gentleman say where these surveys are being carried on?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I cannot say off-hand.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They were at Lake Erie, and I desired to know if they had entered, or were about to enter, other waters.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have been discussing with Colonel Anderson the necessity of extending the surveys. I have not seen the officer in charge. He will not be back until the autumn.

Mr. MONTAGUE. They are still at Lake Erie. They have not completed that work yet.

Salaries and disbursements of fishery overseers and fishery guardians..... $100,000

Mr. TAYLOR. I would like to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if it is his intention to make a wholesale dismissal of the fishery overseers through the province of Ontario simply for having voted at the late election. I am in receipt to-night of a letter from one of the fishery officers, who is drawing a salary, I think, of $30 a year. He writes me that he simply voted in the late election, but he has received a letter from the Minister which reads as follows:

Ottawa, Sept. 18th, 1896.

Sir,—Information has been laid in this department of a very reliable character to the effect that at the late election you were a prominent and active canvasser and worker in favour of Mr. George Taylor, the Conservative candidate for the riding, and that your conduct was that of an open partisan. I have to call upon you to state immediately whether you acknowledge or whether you are prepared to deny having taken a prominent part in the late election on behalf of Mr. Taylor.

I know as a matter of fact that this young man simply voted, took no active part at all in the election, but there is a complaint in. If that is going to be the course pursued by the Minister, and if these officers are all to be dismissed, I do not see any need for this vote.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I can assure the hon. gentleman that I am not going to be as hard as he imagines. I fancy if the facts turn out to be as he states them, his friend will not be in any serious peril; but if the facts turn out to be as the information alleges they were, I should imagine that he would hardly expect him to be retained.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Do I understand that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries really intends to adopt the policy that a fishery officer at $30 a year, is to be prevented from voting and canvassing at an election? That merely having been an active canvasser is going to deprive him of his office? It seems to me that is a frightful doctrine to apply to persons in receipt of $30 a year. I can quite understand that this policy would be adopted toward a man who had been an offensive partisan; but if he merely takes an energetic part in favour of the party he believes to be right, without being offensive, I do not think my hon. friend should dismiss him.

Mr. WALLACE. I think this is small potato business, that a man who is getting a salary of $30 a year is to be precluded from taking an active part in politics. Some years ago the president of the Reform Association for our county, and who was postmaster of a very important village, during an election campaign, took an active part against me, yet no effort was ever made to disturb him, because he had the right, and I recognized he had the right, to do what he did. I never made any complaint. Is the Minister going to adopt the American system of putting new men into every post? That would be straight work, but to adopt the policy of asking a man receiving $30 a year, either to affirm or deny the statement that he had taken an active part in the election, is something that cannot be tolerated.

Mr. SCRIVER. I would like to contrast the conduct which has been pursued by the Minister in this case, with the action taken by friends of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. A few years ago an election took place in my county, in which I was elected. About a week after the election took place, a fishery overseer in my constituency receiving a little more than the friend of the hon. member opposite—I believe he had $50 a year, received a letter from the defeated candidate telling him that in consequence of his active support of my candidature, he would be dismissed. He received no intimation of the purpose of the Government to dismiss him, and was given no opportunity for explanation or defence.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I hope we shall not get into a wrangle over this vexed question. I have taken the step that I thought hon. gentlemen desired should be taken. Charges were made that this fishery officer was an active and prominent canvasser.

Mr. WALLACE. Not that he was taking an offensive part.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We will see when we get the evidence.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The letter does not use the word offensive.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think it is necessary to say offensive, because offensive does not convey a much stronger idea than the language I used. One gentleman will deem it offensive if a fishery officer goes round from house to house canvassing; it depends very much upon the facts of each case. I am not acting in a ruthless way, or hastily. I do not think there has been a fishery officer dismissed in the whole of Ontario. But information having been laid against this man, I thought it was fair to take this step, which the House seemed to think ought to be taken.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. TAYLOR. He says he did nothing but vote.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If he did nothing but vote, he has fallen into very good hands, so far as I am concerned. But I have laid down the rule that every man has an unqualified right to vote for whom he pleases without being called into question. I am the last man in the world to seek to put a limitation upon that right. But I understood we had reached an agreement in the House that neutrality was to be the price of permanency, and that if gentlemen wanted to remain permanently in the civil service, they were to remain neutral so far as offensive and active participation in party politics was concerned. Nothing is farther from my mind than the introduction of the spoils system.

Mr. KAULBACH. I am glad to hear the Minister of Marine and Fisheries say that a man who votes in an election has nothing to fear. I may say when I entered the House in 1878, nearly every official in my county was a Liberal and took an active part in endeavouring to secure my defeat. Some of those men acted very offensively. I made several appeals to the Prime Minister and to the Minister at the head of the department for an examination to be made, and if the parties were guilty of the charge alleged, they should be dismissed. But I was asked to be silent on the matter, and the opinion was expressed that it would be most unfair to deprive men of their liberty of action at the time elections were held. Consequently I had to submit to the inevitable, and allow those parties to remain in their positions. I hope the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will exercise the same discretion, and will follow the example so worthily set by the previous Government.

Mr. CLANCY. I do not wish to detain the committee as this question has been pretty well threshed out; but the Minister must see that it is very difficult to draw the line by which reasonable action can be taken. If any voter is charged with taking an active part in an election only, and is not charged with taking an offensive part, then it is very doubtful if he should be put on the gridiron. An offensive part is not only offensive to a party, but it is against public morals; but if the offence is only one of taking an active part in an election, it is one only against a political party and is not one against public morals or the public interest. I suggest to the hon. Minister, who is a lawyer, that it is a rather singular proceeding to call upon a man to establish his own innocence.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There are difficulties, no doubt.

Mr. TAYLOR. This is the first intimation I have received that this course is to be pursued. If so, I wish the Government to make a clean slate. In my county I could point to a postmaster in particular who was secretary of the Reform Association, who managed the campaign in that part of the constituency, who took the platform and was more than active, even very offensive in his remarks to me on the platform, and at meetings where I was not present as well as at meetings where I was present. If the axe is to be applied to the heads of Conservatives, I want the Government to go through the list and decapitate gentlemen who took the other side as well as those who fought for the Conservative party. I think it is right for every man to advocate the claims of the party to which he belongs, notwithstanding the fact that he holds a paltry office appointment and draws $100, $200, or $300 a year. Here is a case of a fishery officer who draws, I think, $30 a year, who is an innocent man and simply casts his vote.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If that is true, he will come to no harm.

Mr. TAYLOR. He had written asking in regard to his position.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Let him write to the department.

Mr. TAYLOR. He may be treated in the manner indicated by the Minister of Railways and Canals—his head may be cut off without trial.

Building and maintenance of fish breeding establishments and lobster hatcheries ..... $40,000

Mr. GILLIES. Can the Minister of Marine and Fisheries state whether it is proposed to place new fish breeding establishments?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. With the exception of one small establishment, the construction of which the commissioner is contemplating, there will be no new establishments. This amount is for maintenance.

Mr. GILLIES. A very strong application was made to the department last year for the establishment of a lobster hatchery on the Cape Breton coast. The application was strongly pressed by experts in fish breeding, and the then Minister contemplated acting on the application. I wish to press this matter on the attention of the Minister, and if the proposition has merits, I trust he will seek, if possible, to give effect to the wishes of the applicants.

Mr. KAULBACH. I desire to ask the Minister if he does not consider money to be well expended in establishing fish hatcheries on various points in the maritime provinces, more particularly at fishing centres. The county I represent is the largest fishing county on the whole coast. I am repeatedly urged to secure the establishment of hatcheries there, and I ask the Minister to make a note of this matter, and see if the wishes of the people cannot be complied with.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will make a note of it. I think, however, the experiments have reached that stage when no Minister would be justified in stopping the work that is being done, or would be justified in stating that the results are such as to afford positive conclusions on the subject. Commissioner Prince has published a report showing the work that has been done, and what results he thinks have been accomplished. I do not profess to have come to any conclusion on the matter. I have on this and other points an open mind, and it is my intention to give it some attention if I remain in the department.

Fishery protection service..... $100,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is a reduction of $7,392. Is it because it is proposed to decrease the amount afforded for the protection of fisheries?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. $100,000 were voted last year, and a much larger sum was spent owing to $20,000 being transferred from customs on account of the steamer "Constance" acting as a revenue cutter. Last year a new vessel was built, and she was launched four weeks ago at Shelburne harbour, the crew of the "Vigilant" being transferred to her. We have received a letter from Commander Spain, saying she is a good ship.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will ask the attention of the Minister (Mr. Davies) to the matter of the distribution of the fishery bounty. In my time, we adopted a plan that, I think, was best calculated for an expeditious distribution of the bounty. We gave an additional amount to officers in the department, over and above their salaries, to work after hours and prepare all the papers and cheques under the direction of the officer in charge in that branch. The officer in charge selected such officers from the department as he considered efficient, and they managed to have the bounty distributed at the earliest time it had ever been distributed before. I believe that last year they went back to the old plan of employing outside men to do this work. My objection to that is in the interests of the fishermen. No matter how intelligent outside men may be, they cannot possibly do the work as rapidly as trained officers in the department, who have had great experience in the work. The bounty, when it is distributed, is not much to each fisherman, but it is worth twice as much when he gets it promptly, so that I hope the hon. gentleman will consider this.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My attention was called, the other day, to the necessity of commencing this work without delay. They are sending out the papers now and getting in the claims, and about the 1st of November they will prepare the cheques, when the claims are returned. I realize the importance of promptness, and I will consider carefully the suggestion of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DIMOCK. I wish to call the attention of the Minister to the fish-way at Waugh's River, in the county of Colchester, which was built by Messrs. McKay and Matheson. The fishery inspector informed them that the usual one-half the cost would be reimbursed by the Government. Mr. Patterson, the late representative of the county, has written to the department more than once about the matter, but the money has not yet been paid. I would ask the Minister to look into it, and have a cheque sent to these gentlemen.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I shall look into the matter.

Mr. MONTAGUE. While the Minister is doing that, I wish he would also look into a similar case at Caledonia.

Mr. GIBSON. I understand the hon. member (Mr. Montague) wanted the fishery overseer to pay the whole of that, instead of the parties who were getting the benefit of it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would like to know where the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gibson) got his information, because he is speaking quite wide of the mark. These gentlemen are not, in the first place, political friends of mine, but are staunch Liberals and friends of hon. gentlemen opposite. The fishery officer instructed them to build a fish-way, and, as I think the affidavits establish, he informed them that, if they did so, half the expense would be paid by the department. Afterwards the fishery officer said he did not make that statement, and there was a dispute as to whether the department should pay half the expense or not. I think the department should pay half the expense, and I was merely asking the Minister to make a note of it. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) knows nothing about the matter at all.

Mr. GIBSON. I will give the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) the information I speak from, to-morrow.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have stated the facts correctly, and I trust the hon. gentleman will do me the honour of believing that I did so.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will make a note of the case of my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague). With respect to the matter which the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Dimock) speaks of, I understand there was a dispute between the department and the claimants as to the amount, and the department offered $40, which I understand the claimants have agreed to accept. In that case the matter will be disposed of.

Mr. KAULBACH. I have a similar case in my county on the Mush a Mush River. An arrangement was made by the fishery officer with the mill-owner that the Government would defray half the cost of putting up the fish weir. The work was done and representation made to the department, but the mill-owner has never received one cent for his outlay. Will the Minister kindly make a note of the case?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will inquire about that case also.

Resolutions reported.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.15 a.m. (Tuesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 22nd September, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL DEBATES—TRANSLATORS.

Mr. CHOQUETTE moved that the second report of the Debates Committee be concurred in.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask what is the subject-matter of that report?

Mr. CHOQUETTE. The report speaks for itself, it is printed, and is before the House. The report recommends the dismissal of Messrs. Joseph Bouchard, Peter McLeod and J. B. Vanasse from the staff of the translators of the Debates.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to say to the Minister of Finance that if he is anxious, as I understand he is, to do some necessary work in Supply, if this motion gets precedence, it will probably take a day or two to finish it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). If I could have my hon. friend's assurance that nothing else would intervene to prevent us going into Supply, I should join with him and agree to let the matter stand. But I understand the hon. gentleman himself had something to bring up.

Mr. FOSTER. I was informed it was the intention of the hon. gentleman to take concurrence and move a Supply Bill for the Estimates which have already been granted in committee, and which I believe cover the whole civil service.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. What I had in contemplation was that, assuming that to-day would be spent in Supply, we should take concurrence to-morrow. I was not aware until just now that the hon. gentleman had proposed bringing up some other matters this afternoon. I would like him to consider whether that could not be done, and whether we could not take concurrence to-morrow, and only take such items to-day as might be agreed upon, so that the Supply Bill might go through to-morrow without any question.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I do not think there will be any debate on this question.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend the Finance Minister will see that he has the most urgent of his supplies already. I imagine it would disturb our arrangements here to put off for a long time the motion I am going to make. But I should like to expedite in every way possible concurrence in what has passed, and I think we can so arrange as to put through the Supply Bill without delay.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If the motion of the hon. gentleman for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) is going to lead to a protracted debate, I will concur in the suggestion of the hon. member for York.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I do not see why it should cause a debate.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We cannot help it.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I only ask the House to concur in the report, that is all.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend must recollect that he is but one of 213 members, and he can scarcely impose his will on the House.

Mr. DAVIN. The motion of my hon. friend could not possibly be dealt with in less than four or five hours.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I would advise my hon. friend to let his motion stand in order to set a good example, although it is an example, I fear, that is not going to be followed on the other side.

Motion withdrawn.

THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. ROGERS moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 29) to amend the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Explain.

Mr. ROGERS. The Bill is to amend the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons, and I wish the subject could have been handled by some hon. member who is more accustomed to addressing the House than I am. It is quite evident that railway corporations have great powers in this country, and the people feel it. They consider, whether rightly or wrongly, that the mass of the people are under the power of railway corporations to a great extent. Those corporations are far-seeing business-like, bright and shrewd people, and they do not grant any favours to anybody for nothing. I think it impossible that the granting of passes should have any influence directly or indirectly, on hon. members, but I can assure this House that the belief is entertained outside that passes are granted to secure some ends for the railway companies, or they would not be given. We all know there are no corporations possessing so little soul as railway corporations. It is therefore obvious that the people of the country should not be under any compliment to railway corporations for favours. An enormous amount of aid has been given to the building of railways, aggregating in money and lands many millions of dollars. Moreover, enormous sums are received annually by those corporations for carrying the mails. We are aware that under the Election Act almost the slightest illegal act disqualifies a member, whether done directly or indirectly. The payment of even something like 75 cents will disqualify a member. Members of Parliament practically occupy the position of arbitrators between the people and these railway corporations. If in private life there is a matter in dispute and a man acts as arbitrator, and receives passes from a railway corporation which is one of the parties, the opinion would be expressed that he was violating his obligation. I have said that a strong feeling prevails throughout the country on this subject; I may add that there is no question before the country on which the press of both sides is so unanimous. It is held that Parliament should take some action on this matter. What action this Government should take, I leave for the members of the Government to decide; but I hold that there is no reason why the members of this House should receive mileage and at the same time hold free passes. I hope action will be taken on this line, and I have introduced this Bill in order to obtain the views of the Government, and

I trust in their own interest they will take such action as will satisfy the people.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

A. E. FORGET.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask my hon. friend who represents the Department of the Interior in this House whether he is aware that A. E. Forget, Commissioner of Indian Affairs at Regina, has sent around to all agents under his control a circular telling them only to deal with friends of the Government; and whether, if he has heard this report, this act has been taken by direction of the Government.

Mr. DOBELL. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say that I have not received any information from the agent to whom the hon. gentleman has alluded.

FAST LINE OF STEAMERS.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I should like to call the attention of the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) to a telegram which appeared in a rather long article, which I will not trouble the House with reading, in the "Citizen" this morning. The article animadverts to a great extent on the change of opinion manifested by the hon. member for Quebec West, more especially as regards the question of the fast line. This is a question, which, as the Government are aware, is attracting public attention.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Order. The hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot make an argument. He can ask a question bringing up a subject of public importance, and the Government may reply to it.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I merely wish to read a telegram that seems to have been sent to "L'Electeur" by the hon. member for Quebec West, as follows:—

Ottawa, Sept. 18th.—You can assure my friends that fast line will be all right and that both Quebec and the country will gain by delay I am advising.—R. R. Dobell.

I wish to ask whether the telegram which I have just read was sent by the hon. gentleman, and whether it refers to a 17 or 20-knot line? After the hon. gentleman has given his answer, I shall ask the Government whether they will assume a policy following in the lines adopted by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DOBELL. I had no knowledge whatever of the telegram till I saw it in the papers.

Mr. ROGERS.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA (Mr. Borden). I beg to lay on the Table the letter asked for by the leader of the Opposition to be added to the papers on the Table relating to the Military College—a letter from General Cameron to myself, and my letter in reply thereto.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

Resolutions reported from Committee of Supply, September 3, 8, 10, 11, 15, 17, 18, 21, were read the second time and concurred in.

SUPPLY—TARIFF LEGISLATION.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to ask the attention of the House for a short time, while I bring within its purview a matter of very considerable importance at any time, but a matter which, at the present time, seems to take on a greater degree of importance than usual. I refer to the tariff question, or the legislation with reference to the tariff question which, under a notice which has been given to the House and the country by the leader of the Government, is to be postponed until next year—that is, at least, definite action upon it is to be postponed until next year. I have said that the matter of tariff legislation, either as to the principle upon which it shall proceed, or the plan upon which it shall be worked out, is a most important question, probably one of the most important that can come before any country, and the importance of it is not at all diminished by the fact of the country being, as Canada is, a young, a growing and a developing country. I suppose there is nothing which comes within the range of governmental action, about which the people expect, and rightly expect, greater definiteness and clearness with reference to principle, and, if a change is impending, greater promptitude with reference to that change, than the matter of its tariff legislation. I do not think, if we look over the history of various countries, that we will find anything which will in the least contradict the statement which I have just made. I think it will be found out, from a review of the history of governments in civilized countries of modern date, that there never has been any long period of uncertainty with reference to the position that either party had assumed upon the question of the tariff, that is, that the issues are generally conceded to be sharp, defined and well understood by both parties and by the country who look at the policy of those parties. It is, therefore, what I think is a lack of clearness and of promptitude with reference to the principle on which the tariff should be revised and the time at which it should be revised, that leads me to make some remarks this afternoon. But there is another reason which prompts me to make a review of the situation at the present time, and that is the somewhat widespread, though very quiet epidemic which has been raging amongst hon. gentlemen opposite, and which has particularly attacked, it seems, the heads of the party, the leaders of the Government, and the result of which has been a most extraordinary loss of memory by the leaders of the party and of the Government. Well understood lines of policy, which have been spoken to over and over again, in every section of the country, within the last five or six years, seem, under the influence of this quiet but prevalent epidemic, to have faded entirely from the memories of hon. gentlemen opposite, and it is a duty which I have to perform this afternoon—and probably not an inconsiderable one—to endeavour by historical retrospect to bring out facts and figures which will set forth, as clearly and shortly as possible the position of hon. gentlemen opposite with reference to their tariff policies during the last five or six years.

The first part, then, of the remarks I shall have the pleasure of presenting to the House will be briefly to define what has been the attitude of the Liberal party for the last eighteen years on the tariff question. In the first place whatever we may say as to the positive lines upon which they have based any future action of their own when they should come into power, I think I may take it as fairly well agreed that there has been one line upon which these hon. gentlemen have been fairly consistent, which has for the last eighteen or for the last twenty-four years been continually running through their utterances and through their platforms and through their resolutions defining one phase of their attitude towards the fiscal policy of the country, and that line has been the line of consistent and uncompromising hostility to the principle and practice of protection as applied to the tariff and fiscal matters of the country. It is shown in the history of the party from 1874 to 1879, during which period it administered the affairs of this country. As soon as Sir John Macdonald and the party which he was leading put into shape and declared in resolutions their adherence to the principle of protection and their determination, if they gained power to put that principle into practice in relation to the fiscal affairs of the country—from that time forward there was developed a strain of consistent and uniform opposition on the part of gentlemen opposite to the principle and the practice of protection. It is, of course, true that, for a series of years at the first, certain recalcitrant members of their party had to be brought into line. It is true that the hon. leader of the Government of the present time, in the sessions of 1875, 1876 and 1877, avowed himself outside of this House, and avowed himself in this House as well, as a believer in the principle and in the practice of protection. It is true also that the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and the present member for North Grey (Mr. Paterson)—not at that time the member for North Grey—held very strong views with reference to the principle of protection as applied to the tariff of the country, and that in their places on the floor of this House they repeatedly gave it their adhesion and made appeal to what was then their own government for a heightened tariff and for adopting to a large extent the principle of protection as applied to the industries of this country. Going no further, though that does not exhaust the list of those who, at that time, giving adhesion to the Liberal party, were in favour of protection, we find that party with its softening influence and the pressure of its moulding hand has had the effect of reducing these hon. gentlemen, including the present leader of the Government, from strong and ardent protectionists into believers that their early principles had been wrongly imbibed and that they must take the opposite view. But this is the view they adopted, and within a very few years after expression of their faith publicly on the floor of this House these gentlemen were found amongst the strongest and most rabid opponents of the principle of protection. From that time forward during the remainder of the Mackenzie administration, and during the early years of Sir John Macdonald's administration, and during every year from that period up to the present time, these hon. gentlemen and the party as a whole, so far as their action in this House was concerned, and so far as their party action outside this House was concerned, they have uncompromisingly put themselves on record as opposed to the principle of protection and as believers in the opposite doctrine, whatever, for the time being, that doctrine happened to be.

It is unnecessary for me, I think, at this stage to go into any long proof of the fact which I have just stated. I might bring up the resolutions which they moved in this House in 1879, in 1880, in 1881, in 1882 and later, putting in concrete form their opposition to the principle of protection as it had been applied to the tariff by the Liberal-Conservative Government and party. There is, however, a duty I think it necessary to perform at this time, although, as I said on the floor of this House, and in their strictly party or partisan capacity, hon. gentlemen on the other side have been a unit in their expression of uncompromising hostility to protection, yet, I find this phenomenon, viz., that in going through the different sections of the country I frequently meet men who fall in with the party faith and follow the party lead of hon. gentlemen opposite, and who say yet that whatever may be the statements their party has given, yet when they come to frame a tariff, they will not be found to be adverse to the principle of protection. Some of the best adherents of hon. gentlemen opposite in different parts of the country, have gone so far as to state that manufacturers and producers need have nothing to fear, that despite all this formidable array of 24 years of expressed opposition to, and abhorrence of, the principle and practice of protection, when it comes to the revision of the tariff promised for next year, the country will find out that the present governing party of this country will not destroy the principle of protection, and will not eradicate the practice of protection from the statutes of this country. So it becomes necessary, I think, for me to ask the House to listen for a short time to these statements which have been made, not in the older period 24 years ago, not in the comparatively recent period of ten years ago, but which have gone on consistently up to the very present moment—statements so strong, statements so clear, statements so definite, that it is impossible for the country to read them and believe at the same time that they have been honestly made, without coming to the definite belief that whatever these hon. gentlemen may do when they come to revise the tariff, they cannot consistently and they will not allow the principle of protection to be applied in their tariff. Well, Sir, going back, not a very long distance, but keeping this more modern period in sight, we find that Sir Richard Cartwright, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, in 1890, declared :

I say our protective system was a huge mistake in so far as it was honest at all, and in so far as it was not honest, it was a huge scheme of robbery. A small ring and clique of combiners and protected manufacturers who, as I have told you, have been permitted for years past to make a prey and plunder of the people of Canada have held sway.

In 1890, at Meaford, he said :

I stand by the declaration I have made, that protection is nothing more or less than deliberate, legalized and organized robbery ; and more than that, if you do not stamp it out, it is the very high road to political slavery first, and industrial slavery afterwards.

In 1891, a year later, at Chatham, he declared :

This is very largely due to a most vicious system of legislation under which the whole fiscal system of Canada has become an instrument of legalized robbery on a scale and to an extent absolutely unprecedented in the history of any other country as young as our own. The protective system of the new world is a different and much more dangerous thing than the protective system of the old world, and we all, farmers especially, are suffering accordingly. You have to deal with a gang of combines, highly paid and highly drilled mercenaries, who have enslaved you, and who mean to keep you enslaved if fraud and corruption can do it.

Mr. FOSTER.

Later still he declared, speaking for his party :

Our policy from first to last has been to destroy the villainous system of protection by free trade, revenue tariff, or continental free trade.

And again, he says :

They demand our policy. Well, Sir, they shall have our policy, and here I believe I speak for my hon. friends beside me.

That was on the floor of this House.

Our policy is death to protection, and war to the knife to corruption. Sir, we strike and we will strike for liberty and freedom from this system of protective taxation ; and I tell hon. gentlemen that we will not rest until the slavery that has been imposed upon us has become a thing of the past, and until Canadians are as free as Canadians ought to be free, to make the most they can of the opportunity God has given them.

Coming down to 1883, in the House of Commons, Sir Richard Cartwright declared :

Our policy from first to last has been to destroy this villainous system of protection which has been grinding out the vitals of this country.

Well, Sir, the plank of the Liberal platform adopted by the convention held here in the city of Ottawa, in 1893, gave the collective idea of the party at that time with reference to this principle of protection, and what did that say :

We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound and unjust to the masses of the people, and we declare our convictions that any tariff changes based on that principle, must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours. This issue we unhesitatingly accept, and upon it we await, with the fullest confidence the verdict of the electorate of Canada.

The leader of the Government at the present time, and then the leader of the Opposition, immediately proceeded on a tour through this country, expatiating upon, and expounding, the Liberal platform of 1893. At Newmarket, in the month of September, 1893, he declared :

I will not be satisfied until the last vestige of protection has been removed from the soil of Canada. Our great reform is to put away from the soil of Canada the last vestige of protection.

In Victoria, B.C., in 1894, he said :

If the Liberals were successful, they would cut off the head of protection at once, and trample on its body.

The present Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) at a later date, in this Parliament, declared :

We have been attacking this policy year by year. This is an accursed system, a system accursed of God and man.

In 1895, at the city of Toronto, the present leader of the Government, declared :

Call it protection, call it feudalism, call it slavery—I care not, it is the same thing. It differs only in degree, it is bondage.

And at Montreal, in the same year, he declared :

The system of protection has been the bane and the curse of Canada—the bane and the curse of Canada, I repeat.

And Sir Richard Cartwright, speaking at the city of Toronto, in 1895, after he had set forth the uncompromising opposition of the Liberal party in the past to the principles of protection, throws out a hint and a threat to his party at the same time. Drawing for example upon what he considered the unfortunate lack of the Democratic party in the United States, he declared :

There are two lessons which I think the Reformers of Canada should learn. One is presented for our example and warning in the fate that has befallen the Democratic party in the United States. It shows to all who chose to read the signs of the times that when a party places itself at the head of a great popular movement, if that party tenders the people a stone instead of bread, it is half-hearted in the prosecution of the great aim it sets before it, and will be deservedly swept out of power by the very people who have sustained and advanced it.

Sir, I think I need not go any further in bringing you down to the last year of grace 1895-96, in which these hon. gentlemen were putting forth the propaganda of their policy, by reading to the House these few selections from the multitude of strong statements made by their leaders and by the rank and file all through this country. I think I need go no further to maintain the fact I stated at first, namely, that from 1874 down to the present time, the Liberal party is on record, through the mouthpieces of its leaders, of its principal men, and of its convention, as determinedly opposed to the principle and the practice of protection. Now, Sir, it is not until 1887 that we first see signs in the Liberal party of a change with respect to their attitude in this matter. Mr. Edward Blake—undoubtedly an able man—was at that time leader of that party. Mr. Blake perceived in 1882, and gave voice to his perceptions, that when after a lengthened period of debate and discussion the country had accepted a great fiscal policy and had gone on to work out that policy in the business interests of the country, that after they had for years worked out the business interests of the country on the basis of that policy, it became the duty of an Opposition to consider very fully and very carefully whether or not it should not accept the will of the people as shown, accept the full force of the circumstances that had intervened in the aggregation of business and capital about the accepted policy, and should not, while attempting to improve and perhaps mitigate it, give its adherence to the wish and will of the people as embodied by the electoral vote and in the policy which supervened upon it, and not carry on from year to year and as it were from age to age an unreasoning and blind opposition to what the will of the people had set up as the fiscal policy of this country. And so in 1882, Mr. Blake, as is shown by his speeches in that campaign, rather tended towards a mitigation and reduction in certain points of what he considered to be the more extreme parts of the policy of protection than the abnegation and denial of the principle of protection entirely; and his voice so carried his convictions to the country. But it was not until 1887, after the electoral vote of 1882 had supervened and had by the large and overwhelming voice of the people again substantiated the principle of protection as the basis of the fiscal policy of the country, that Mr. Blake's convictions took strong shape, and in his Malvern speech of 1887 he laid down, first his doubts of 1882, and what he thought might have been conceded by his party at that time to the principle of protection. He further said: Since 1882 five years have supervened; the voice of the electorate has spoken the second time; the aggregations of capital and trade have increased during the succeeding five years, and it is my steady conviction, which I share with my party—and he named, in order to show he was supported by the party's strength, Sir Richard Cartwright himself—that it is our duty not so much to press for free trade, which is impossible in this country, but to accept the principle of protection and to press for limited amendments at this later date, and propose to set aside or mitigate or soften what we consider are the points that bear most heavily under that tariff. That I may substantiate my statement by what Mr. Blake himself said, let me say that in 1882, supervening upon the resolution which had been framed and tried to be passed by the Opposition in this House, what Mr. Blake chiefly aimed was to have fuel and breadstuffs made free, to have the sugar duties adjusted so as to bear less heavily, as he said, upon the people, and to have a reduction of the duties on the lower grade of cotton and woollen goods, and on the large and varied articles of iron work. In 1882 he thought this might well have been done; but in 1887 he declared that could no longer be done; and in the end he reduced his criticism of the National Policy to simply this—reduction of duties upon wheat and coal and wheat flour, and to make free corn flour. What did he say in 1887? Let me quote:

We have no longer a large surplus to dispose of—we have a large deficit and a greatly increased scale of expenditure to meet. And it is clearer than ever that a very huge scale of taxation must be retained, and that manufacturers have nothing to fear. I then declared that any readjustments should be effected with due regard to the legitimate interests of all concerned. In that phrase, "all concerned," I hope no one will object to my including as I do the general public. In any readjustment I maintain that we should look especially to such reduction of expenditure as may allow of a reduction of taxation, to the lightening of sectional taxes, to the lightening of taxes upon the prime necessities of life, and upon the raw materials of manufacture, to a more equitable arrangement of the taxes which now bear unfairly upon the poor as compared with the rich, to a taxation of luxuries just so high as will not thwart our object by greatly checking consumption, to the curbing of monopolies of protection in cases where by combination or otherwise the tariff allows an undue and exorbitant profit to be exacted from consumers, and to the effort—a most important point—to promote reciprocal trade with our neighbours to the south.

Later on he speaks as follows:—

For my part I have always declined to ignore existing facts. I freely acknowledge that the situation has been changed even by 1882; and I have as freely acknowledged that it has been changed far more since 1882; that many things then possible are now absolutely impossible and that a more permanent structure has been raised. Some may think it good; some may think it evil, but so it is. To deny it will not subvert it, and we must face the facts as they are.

Later on he declares:

I have only to repeat in the most emphatic language my declaration that there is in my judgment no possibility of a change in that system of taxation which I have described the necessary effects of which is to give a large and ample advantage to the home manufacturer over his competitor abroad. Some may rejoice at this condition; some may regret it; but all candid and reasonable public men must admit that, after all, it is a condition and this is the vital question. Such being the condition, we have repeatedly declared that the real issue is on some of the details of the tariff, whether it be perfect, or defective and unjust. Such being the condition the aim of every man ought to be to make the best of the situation and to see that the tariff does as little harm or as much good as possible, is, as far as may be, fair and just, regards as little, or promotes as much as possible the general welfare.

Sir, I do not think it is necessary for me to read more from the speech of the leader of the party then in Opposition in 1887 to prove that what the leader had in view was—as he said, with the expressed concurrence of the leaders of his party including Sir Richard Cartwright—to accept the situation as it was so far as protection was concerned, and simply to attempt minor mitigations of the tariff in some particular points in which he thought it bore unduly heavily on certain articles and certain portions of the country. Sir, the fight of 1887 was taken on that modified protection ground. But the people of the country thought it wiser to leave this matter in the hands of those who had been the true friends and supporters of this policy rather than in the hands of a party which had been for ten or twelve years determinedly opposed to it, but which in 1887 had apparently come to the determination to make the best of it. So hon. gentlemen opposite in the campaign of 1887 had to submit to a third condemnation of their public views with respect to the principle of protection, and the tariff policy of protection, and an endorsement of the view of 1878 and of the view of 1882. Sir, almost immediately after the defeat in 1887 and during the next succeeding years, the Liberal party commenced working out on a line to which they had been utter strangers from 1874 to 1887. They were no longer agreed to simply obstruct the principle and the policy of protection. They were no longer agreed simply to lead the Opposition against a certain policy in a negative sort of way, but they came to the conclusion that it was absolutely necessary that they should get some positive policy of their own, which they could pit against the policy and practice of protection, in order to gain the popular view and to overthrow the system to which they had been so long and so consistently opposed. The divergence which was made by Mr. Blake himself, had, in a statesmanlike point of view, that same matter in regard, but he took the wiser course of bowing himself to the oft-expressed wish of the electorate, and making a necessity of what the majority of the people had decreed should be the policy in fiscal matters which should rule in this country. But, after 1887, the lesser leaders of the party taking the bit in their teeth, determined that they should have catch names, something brand new, which as a positive policy urged on their part would tend to make an instrument in their hands for breaking down the policy which they had so long opposed, and hereupon commenced that devious and winding search for theoretical policies, for names which would be attractive and for policies which would be catching, which they could put forward with an air of positive statement as an antidote, or as a substitute for the National Policy as embodied in the tariff of 1879. What were these substitute policies which hon. gentlemen opposite, from time to time, took up?

First, there was the policy of commercial union with the United States. Now, it has been stated—and by some leading gentlemen on the other side—that the Liberal party as a party never took up the policy of commercial union, and that when we make that statement we are speaking beside the book. They are partly right and they are partly wrong. If it be true that a policy is not taken up by a party at all,—which probably is the case in the technical sense of the term—until by a convention or a resolution in Parliament the party bind themselves to it; then I grant you that the party never took up the principle or the policy of commercial union. But, if it be the fact that the direction of the chief organs of a party, of a number of the principal men of a party and of a large proportion of the rank and file of a party, for month after month, upon a certain line of policy; if it be true that that is an indication as to the searching of the party mind for a policy that they might substitute for the one to which they are opposed, then the evidence is found on the page of almost every Liberal newspaper in Canada, and in the expressions of dozens of the principal men of the Liberal party; that commercial union for a period of six or eight months was looked upon as a panacea for the ills of Canada, and as a substitute for the National Policy. Almost before the election contest of 1887 was cold, Mr. Wiman had launched his propoganda in the United States and had followed it up by a series of meetings and conferences in different parts of Canada, for the application of the principle of commercial union to the fiscal and business affairs of this country. That policy of commercial union was adhered to by numbers of influential organs and of influential men in the Liberal party. In October, 1878, Sir Richard Cartwright, speaking at Ingersoll, used these words:

We have greatly misused our advantages. We have been foolish in our expenditures. We have no means of satisfying the just demand of large portions of the Dominion, except through such an arrangement as commercial union.

The London "Advertiser" declared:

Commercial union lies within the range of practical politics. In our opinion unrestricted reciprocity does not.

That is but a sample of many utterances in the London "Advertiser," the great exponent of the Liberal party in western Canada. The Halifax "Morning Chronicle," which is the exponent of the Liberal party in the province of Nova Scotia, declared:

That it received the news with great joy and with great delight. It is the most important movement made upon the political chess board since Confederation and is likely to revolutionize political controversy in this country. This is the first time that commercial union has been adopted by either of the great political parties. Henceforward it becomes the burning question of the day.

I ask hon. gentlemen to take the files of the "Globe" newspaper from April, 1887, until December of the same year, and scan the number of editorials strongly written in favour of commercial union as contrasted with unrestricted reciprocity or free trade. I will read one or two of these of August 1, 1887:

We cannot obtain the inestimable boon of free access to the States for our produce without accepting the closest approximation to the commercial position of a State of the Union. They will not favour us more than one another. Wise people do not refuse a good thing simply because it is not the best thing they can conceive of; they take all they can get. Unrestricted reciprocity without a customs union, is an unattainable boon; with a customs union, it would be very good and that we can probably obtain.

Sir, the leader of the Opposition at that time, so far as I can gather from his speeches as I find them in the papers, did not actually pronounce in favour of commercial union, but he was on the neutral ground between the two as to which was the better commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity. He saw objections to both. He would not say that they were insuperable in the case of commercial union, but so far as I can find out, he never gave in his actual adhesion to the policy of commercial union. But, I find that the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) speaking at a pic-nic at Cape Traverse, is reported as follows, in the Charlottetown "Patriot," the organ of the Liberal party in the province of Prince Edward Island of August 24, 1887:

The difference between reciprocity and commercial union is that the latter would do away with all customs-houses between the two countries, and they would have a uniform tariff against the rest of the world. Some have said that the United States tariff is double the Canadian. It is only 8 or 10 per cent higher.

Commercial union does not necessarily involve an increase of our tariff; on the contrary, it may lower it. In 1883 they decreased their tariff largely and will probably do so again. There is no annexation involved in the matter. Commercial union would settle the nasty questions arising respecting our fisheries.

And that word is a perfect seal to my mind, that these were really the words used by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies).

Commercial union would also settle the nasty questions arising respecting our fisheries. * * * The idea that we would be disloyal to the British flag under commercial union was humbug. He wanted to live under the flag as well as any one, but he wanted a flag under which he could live. The keynote should be struck in the banner province. Commercial union means a uniform tax from the North Pole to the Gulf of Mexico. The Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 he was prepared to accept, but he was afraid the Americans were unwilling to concede it. As commercial union seemed to be more easily attainable, he was prepared to support it, because he believed it would secure to us wealth, peace and happiness.

So far had the opinion prevailed that commercial union would be the policy that would be adopted by the party in 1888, when it formulated its resolutions in this House, that one of the then members (Mr. Armstrong) of the Opposition had not only prepared his resolution, but had given notice of it, and it reads as follows:—

That in the opinion of this House commercial union with the United States would be mutually advantageous to both countries, and it is therefore the duty of the Government to use all proper means to secure such union.

But, Sir, difficulties arose, and the present Speaker of the House, the member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) at that time as at present, gave utterance to his opinions in those celebrated letters of his, in which he animadverted upon the unfortunate name that was given to the scheme for closer trade relations with the United States. The word "union," and the discussion which had arisen about it, carried with it two things: one, that there were to be no custom-houses on the border between Canada and the United States; the other and more formidable, that it suggested a union politically, and that the objections against that amongst the loyal people of the country were strong and would militate against the adoption of the policy. These and other counsels in the same line ultimately prevailed; and so the party were driven to take a name a little different, unrestricted reciprocity, and to leave aside the name of commercial union, though at the first their advocacy of unrestricted reciprocity proceeded on exactly the same lines as had the advocacy of commercial union by the organs of the party.

Well, there was another policy, or rather the same policy dignified by another name—I suppose a more aristocratic name—which had a brief period of prominence in the country. That was the name of continental free trade. It was, as I have said, a more aristocratic denomination of the article. It was more theoretical; it caught certain classes of minds, as being a broader and grander thing; it was more high-sounding; it aimed at taking a wider scope, and enlarging the border of the different advantages to the country from a broadening of trade under any such policy; and so that term of continental free trade was very often used. I will, however, quote just a few who were prominent in using it. In 1889, the present leader of the Government, said:

The Liberal party will never cease the agitation until they have finally triumphed and obtained continental freedom of trade. We will not be drawn away by this issue or that issue, and keeping our eyes upon the goal, will work till we accomplish our end. If the reformers of these days can accomplish what they have in view—the great principle of free trade in America—they will have done to their country and to the British race a service of which they will have reason to be proud.

Sir Richard Cartwright, at Oakville, declared:

I desire to see free trade all over this continent.

Mr. Charlton declared, in his address to the Young Men's Liberal Club of Toronto:

We want unrestricted and free access to the whole of North America with our produce and a great increase of wealth would follow; we wanted to pull down all customs barriers, to enjoy absolute free trade, to establish a mighty theatre of commerce extending over a vast continent—from the Gulf of Mexico to the Arctic Ocean.

Mr. Charlton again stated:

We require continental free trade, and without continental free trade, without access to the markets of 60 millions of people to the south of us, we cannot progress satisfactorily. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that our manufacturers, as well as our lumbermen, our farmers, our fishermen and mine owners need the blessings of continental free trade.

Mr. FOSTER.

And the "Globe" newspaper itself, in 1887, was found declaring:

Obviously the Washington Government will not enter into the unrestricted reciprocity which Canadians wish for, unless Canadians will consent to apply to themselves the same commercial conditions as apply to the American states that have unrestricted reciprocity with one another. That is to say, Canadians must recognize that they cannot hope to enjoy continental free trade unless they shall agree to make a customs union with the continent.

Directly after this, in the session of 1888, the party settled down upon the policy of unrestricted reciprocity, and discrimination against all countries except the United States of America. I need but ask the attention of this House to resolutions which were moved in the House, to make that point in my address clear. On the 26th of February, 1889, the present leader of the Government moved:

That steps should be taken, at an early day, by the Government of Canada, for the satisfactory adjustment of such differences (namely, the fishery differences between the United States and Canada), and the securing of unrestricted freedom of the trade relations of the two countries.

That was in a debate on the fisheries treaty. But the formal resolution was moved on the 14th of March, 1888, when it was declared:

That it is highly desirable that the largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse should obtain between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, and that it is expedient that all articles, manufactured in, or the natural products of either of the said countries, should be admitted free of duty into the ports of the other (articles subject to duties of excise or of internal revenue alone excepted).

That it is further expedient that the Government of the Dominion should take steps at an early date to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith.

In the following year, 1889, Sir Richard Cartwright again moved:

In the present condition of affairs, and in view of the recent action of the House of Representatives of the United States, it is expedient that steps should be taken to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith.

It is needless for me to say that the total Liberal vote in this House stood for both of these resolutions. Now, Sir, I want to read another resolution in the same line, of the date of June 23rd, 1891. I want to do that for a purpose which will more clearly appear later; for the 23rd of June, 1891, was after the defeat of the Liberal party upon their canvass on unrestricted reciprocity before the electorate of this country. But notwithstanding that defeat, and against the theory that is some times put forward that the Liberal party have abandoned unrestricted reciprocity, on the 23rd June, 1891, the following resolution was moved :—

Resolved, that the situation of the country requires that the Government should forthwith reduce all duties on articles of prime necessity and more particularly on those most generally consumed by artisans, miners, fishermen and farmers.

And further, that the negotiations which the House has been informed are to open at Washington in October next, should be conducted on the basis of the most extended reciprocal freedom of trade between Canada and the United States in manufactured as well as natural products.

That received the full vote of the Liberal party in this House, and that was, on the 23rd June, 1891, a deliberate assertion by the party that, notwithstanding they had gone to the country, in the early part of the year, on the sole issue of unrestricted reciprocity and had been defeated upon that issue, it was yet an article of belief and an article of faith in the Liberal party platform.

Well, Sir, outside these official resolutions, let me, for the sake of the record, ask the attention of this House to certain statements of the leaders of hon. gentlemen opposite on this same question, in the five years that have last passed. In the House of Commons, Mr. Davies, now the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, is reported as having said :

Sir, we tender the people a flag of which we are not ashamed, a flag upon which is inscribed Unrestricted Trade with the United States.

In 1891, Sir Richard Cartwright, now Minister of Trade and Commerce, said at Chat-ham :

But what is of even more immediate consequence, we propose to obtain for you the power to trade freely with the rest of this continent ; to have leave to make the best use you can of your great natural advantages, which can only be done by full, free, and unrestricted reciprocity with our kinsmen in the United States.

In November, 1891, mind you, Mr. Speaker, after the elections were over several months he declared at Oakwood :

The fact is plain and clear and simple, the best market for the articles you produce—not by the decree of men but by the decree of the Almighty—lies in the country which extends to the south of you, separated generally by a mere imaginary line along the three thousand miles of our southern border, reaching from that line almost to the equator. There is your market, there is the only market you can hope to hold, there is the market you have the natural advantages to enable you to compete for. I deliberately tell you that the market of the United States is absolutely and exactly worth all the rest of the world to us, situated as we now are.

And at Sarnia, on the 2nd March, 1895, long after the Liberal convention had met and promulgated a platform, Sir Richard Cartwright said :

We must find you a better market, and we do not propose to look for that by preference at the Antipodes. We do propose free trade with all the world as our ultimate goal, but we will be very glad to secure for you free trade with the rest of this continent as an exceedingly comfortable instalment on the way thither.

And after the elections of 1891, the present leader of the Government (Mr. Laurier) is on record, again and again, in favour of unrestricted free trade between this country and the United States, as being almost absolutely necessary. Sir, a few years ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce wrote a characteristic letter to the London "Economist."

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend, I see, has not lost his memory on that point. There is no necessity for a course of ministerial mnemonics in order to keep my hon. friend's memory strong and fresh upon that episode in his career. In that letter he made very strong statements, that were discussed in this House.

An hon. MEMBER. And very true.

Mr. FOSTER. And, it is said, very true. In 1896, we had the pleasure of reviewing that letter, and the hon. gentleman had the pleasure of reading nearly the whole of that letter to this House, and across the floor of the House I put to him the question, again and again : Do you still hold to that ? And the hon. gentleman, in his jaunty and hearty way, declared, "I most certainly do." What did he read among the rest ?

Free trade with the United States is vastly more valuable to Canada than free trade with all the rest of the world would be, with the United States left out.

And it is reported in "Hansard" that Mr. Foster asked : "Do you still hold to that statement ?" and the gallant knight replied : "I most undoubtedly do." That was in the year of grace 1896, on the 28th of January, and that may be taken as an additional instance and proof of what I stated before, namely, that hon. gentlemen opposite have not swerved one iota in their innate determination, if they possibly can, to place this country, as regards the United States, within the bonds of unrestricted reciprocity. In that statement of 1896, written to the "Economist," was this, read by the hon. gentleman himself last year :

It is not merely the policy but the fixed determination of the Liberal party in the Dominion to overthrow this system—

That is, the system of protection.

—at all hazards, and after very full deliberation, they have come to the conclusion that the best and probably the only really available method which presents itself for that purpose is in introducing a system of perfect continental free trade, or unrestricted reciprocity with the United States.

And it is on record in "Hansard" that the hon. gentleman, in 1896, asserted his absolute adhesion to what he had written four or five years previously. But there was the concomitant, that this principle of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States carried with it discrimination against the mother country and against the other countries of the world in a commercial sense. It was the habit of some hon. gentlemen opposite to deny that consequence, in the first stages of the debate on this important question. I remember that it was denied by the present leader of the Government, who declared that it was not necessary that this should follow. I remember the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) declaring that he would never submit, nor would his party, to discrimination against Great Britain, and that such discrimination was not implied in unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. But the discussion had not proceeded a single week in this House before these hon. gentlemen had to admit, and freely admit, that it was an absolutely necessary accompaniment of unrestricted reciprocity, that it should discriminate against Great Britain and the other countries in the world. In order that the country may not forget, in the light of the proofs I have read of the determination of hon. gentlemen opposite still to pursue that line, in order that the country may not forget that discrimination against Great Britain is closely conjoined with unrestricted reciprocity, let me quote what you, Mr. Speaker, then simply member for West Ontario, declared :

It has thus been shown to be fair and reasonable to discriminate in favour of the United States if they discriminate in our favour.

In case the hon. gentleman's memory may also be affected by the frightful epidemic of which I have already made mention, I want to cite my authority in this respect. It is a letter written and signed by himself, on the 23rd of January, 1893. Again, he said :

It is hopeless to expect reciprocity with the United States, which will not involve discrimination against Great Britain.

Sir Richard Cartwright, at Ingersoll, in 1887, declared :

There is no doubt whatever that before we can obtain such a measure of unrestricted reciprocity as the advocates of this system desire, it will be necessary for us to discriminate against the manufacturers of other countries, against those even of Great Britain.

At Oshawa, Ont., on the 8th February, at a meeting which was addressed by Sir Richard Cartwright, he was asked :

Mr. FOSTER.

Does the Liberal party favour discrimination against Great Britain by admitting American manufactures free, and taxing the manufactures of Great Britain ?

Sir Richard Cartwright's answer was short and decisive :

Certainly we do.

The present Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson) declared in this House :

I am satisfied that our manufacturers will not be destroyed by a reciprocal arrangement with the United States.

And again :

It has been argued that this proposition discriminates against Great Britain. Sir, that is one thing I do not just exactly like.

But he schooled himself to like it and subscribed to the policy. The present Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) said :

One hon. gentleman opposite says that this will discriminate against Great Britain. Necessarily it must to some extent, but we cannot help that, in fact we have the right to discriminate.

And again :

I acknowledge that the proposition has on one face of it an element of discrimination.

Well, in this House in 1888, Sir Richard Cartwright, discussing his resolution, declared :

It has been made a grave ground, it has been attempted to set up as an insuperable ground of objection that when you propose to enter into a treaty for unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, you must thereby of necessity discriminate against English manufacturers and the manufacturers of all other countries except the United States. Now, that is true ; I admit that. It is perfectly apparent that we cannot hope to gain free intercourse and unrestricted reciprocity with them without discriminating against the goods of other countries. The thing, I grant, is of the essence of the bargain.

The Toronto "Globe" admitted it over and over again. One single citation will suffice :

If free trade with the United States will be good for us, let us vote for it, though it should involve discrimination against Great Britain twice over.

And the leader of the Government himself declared :

This involves that we should offer to the American nation advantages denied to the rest of the world. So it does, and it is a cause of bitter reproach to us by the Conservative party who charge us with disloyalty to England.

But, Sir, if there was any doubt—as there is not—as to what the leaders of the party understood to be an absolutely necessary accompaniment of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, namely, discrimination against Great Britain and other countries, that was set at rest by the negotiations of 1892 ; for in these negotiations it was distinctly stated by the American commissioners and in communications made to Congress by the President and Secretary of the United States at that time that no unrestricted reciprocity or commercial arrangement with this country could be considered by the United States which did not provide for favoured treatment of the United States in our markets and discrimination against Great Britain and other countries. So much with reference to that line of their policy.

Now, Sir, I admit that commercial union, continental free trade, unrestricted reciprocity, are three sisters of one family. They are, in fact, to state it better, but three names with which one single idea has been christened. The whole kernel of the nut was trade relations with the United States, of a free kind, and these three were simply names given to lines and plans which were necessary in order to bring about that result. There is the family likeness in them all; they are, in fact, one and the same with certain small differences which, when you come to the last analysis, do not amount to much.

But, Sir, that does not exhaust the policies which hon. gentlemen opposite in their career of opposition formulated to the country. The next they took was free trade as practiced in England, plus reciprocity—and I call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the fact that whatever has happened since they took up the fad of commercial union, they have taken up nothing since either at their conventions or in their public advocacy to which they have not added reciprocity of the freest possible kind with the United States of America. Now, Sir, this propaganda of free trade as it is in England has chiefly for its god-father and propounder the present leader of the Government (Mr. Laurier). The present leader of the Government is easily taken with attractive names. He is, I think, essentially a theorist. I am sometimes led to believe that he has a less conviction from well-reasoned out principles and study as to what is best for the country in the matter of the fiscal policy than a desire in an academic way to adopt a striking theory which he may propound to the country to catch the attention of the people, leaving himself afterwards to strand, as he has repeatedly stranded, on the rocks of essential difficulty that he must meet as soon as he puts his little bark into the treacherous waters. And so the hon. gentleman, when he took upon himself the part of a commentator and expounder of a policy of the party as affirmed in 1893, launched out with this determination to put in the foreground and to keep to the front free trade as it is practiced in England. It was in 1893 that he was first attracted by it. He saw at that time a great contest in the United States of America. He read a certain portion of the press of the United States, which declared that the Democrats were a free trade party. He saw that party come into power with a tremendous sweep, and he leaped to the conclusion that the United States was to have free trade. At Hamilton on the 10th January, 1893, at the end of one of his characteristic speeches, he said :

Sir, the day looked forward to by Cobden and Bright is arriving to-day. The principle has been adopted by the second nation of the world, the first-born daughter of England, and, Sir, I venture to assert this night that the third nation to adopt free trade will be the second daughter of England, the Dominion of Canada.

Well, Sir, that is the prophecy of my hon. friend. He had read so superficially as to believe that there was really a party in the United States which faced an electoral contest upon the principle of absolute free trade. And what happened? The Democratic party came in with a rush and a sweep. They undertook to reform the tariff, not on the lines of free trade, and, after wrecking their party in the attempt to reform it, they brought it down just two per cent and left it at 38 per cent, where they found it at 40 or 41 per cent. So much for the hon. gentleman's free trade millenium which had its dawn in 1892 in the United States. Then, Sir, in his tour in 1893, 1894 and 1895, he everywhere calls out for free trade. At Winnipeg he declared :

I come before you to-night to preach to you this new gospel of free trade—I denounce to you the policy of protection as bondage. Yes, bondage, and I refer to bondage in the same manner in which American slavery was bondage. Sir, our policy is freedom of trade such as exists in England, such as is practised in Great Britain.

In Peel he declared :

I propose that we should follow England's example and open our ports to the products of the world.

In the city of Montreal he declared :

The Liberal party believe in free trade on broad lines such as exist in Great Britain, and upon that platform exemplified as I have told you, the Liberal party will fight its next battle.

At Montreal, in 1895, he declared :

The Liberal party believe in free trade on the broad lines, such as exist in Great Britain.

Speaking in the historic city of Quebec, in January, 1895, he declared :

Gentlemen, the only way in which Quebec can recover the old-time prosperity as a maritime city, is by adopting the policy of freedom of trade as it exists in the mother country, old England.

And at Brampton, in the same year, he declared :

I propose that we should follow England's example and open our ports to the products of the world.

And then, joined on that declaration, is this:

If we come to power on that day I promise you we will go to Washington, and if we can get a treaty in natural products and a list of manufactured articles, that treaty will be made. The policy of the Liberal party is to give you a market with the 65 million British men upon this continent.

There, Sir, is free trade as it is practiced in England, and, with that the absurd, and impossible, and inconsistent accompaniment of reciprocity with some other country. First, produce your tariff on the lines of free trade as England has it, then go to another great commercial country and propose to establish a system of reciprocity! But, Sir, my hon. friend had not sailed far on the treacherous waters of Canadian politics in that little barque whose flag at the masthead showed, to all who admired it, "Free trade as it is practiced in England," until he came upon the treacherous quicksands and the hard rocks of opposition and criticism. He was accommodating; my hon. friend always has been accommodating; so when he found the quicksands too many and the rocks too numerous, he said: Well, gentlemen, if you want it that way, I will say free trade as it is in England, but I will put it off for thirty or forty years. And so he was good enough to declare at last, when criticism began to pour down upon him: I am for free trade as it is practiced in England, but, gentleman, I meant to say, thirty or forty years after this date. Well, Sir, what next? The next line of policy upon which the Liberal party made their propaganda in the country, was tariff for revenue, void of protection, coupled with reciprocity. Do I need to read the statement in the platform of the party adopted in 1893? Do I need to read the comments upon it by my hon. friend who at present leads the Government, backed up, as it is, by these strong expressions of unbounded and inconsistent hostility to the principle of protection which has been the watchword of the Liberal party for the last twenty-four years? Surely not. But, lest it may be supposed that I am stating something which does not exist, let me read to you a little further. At Montreal, in 1895, when expounding his policy, he said:

I have told you that our object is to have a customs tariff for revenue only. Upon the question of protection there can be no compromise. We stand here against protection and in favour of a customs tariff based upon the principle of revenue, and nothing else.

In other places he declared that:

He would have a revenue tariff for revenue alone, and which would tax for revenue alone, but not one cent for protection.

And that, too, is coupled with statements made upon the same platform in favour of reciprocity with the United States. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have given you a sketch of the various and diverse positive policies which, from time to time, from 1887 to the present, the Liberal party have propounded. Now, what is their policy at the present time? We know what it has been; we know, to a certain extent, what it should be, if they are true to their statements. But hon. gentlemen opposite have developed so unfortunate a facility for quick and rapid changes, that even to-day there is doubt in the minds of men who believe in them most thoroughly, as to whether they propose to carry out either one of any of these several lines of policy which they have advocated in the past. At present, so far as we can learn from the Government sitting opposite, the only points that are certain are these: that there is to be delay, that there is to be a revision, and that there is to be an attempt to secure unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. That there is to be delay, is proved by the statement of the leader of the Government that no tariff revision will take place this session. That there is to be revision, is his statement that tariff revision will take place next session. That there is to be an attempt for unrestricted reciprocity, is proved by the statement he made the other day, that he was in favour of the policy previously stated, that, when the Liberal party came into power, he would send a commission to Washington and endeavour to bring about unrestricted reciprocity, or the freest possible reciprocity, with the United States of America. Those are things we know at the present time, and the only things we know—delay and revision next year, and the certain fact that the party is wedded to, and will strive to get, reciprocity with the United States of America. Now, I again ask the attention of this House and of the country to that state of things. Is there any one on this side of the House who believes that these gentlemen have thrown aside unrestricted reciprocity entirely, that they have let that go, that it is not now a part of their policy? Here is, in the first place, the policy stated by hon. gentlemen opposite, that when they came into power, they would press for unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. Here is the statement of the leader of the Government, since they have come to power, that, at the first opportune moment, he will send a commission to Washington for that very purpose; and, combined with this, there are the statements made by all these hon. gentlemen, that they know they can get no reciprocity from the United States, except upon two conditions, one that the list of manufactured articles shall be broad and general, and the other, that we shall discriminate against Great Britain and against every other country. So that to-day, out of the mouth of the leader of the Government, and from the statements he has made on the floor of this House within the last week or two, joined to the exigencies of the case, and their own statements with reference to it, one part of their policy we know, and that is that they are bound to have, if they possibly can, unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, accompanied with discrimination against the mother country and against other countries of the world. Is there any doubt that I am right in that statement? If there is, let me read a statement of the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who, speaking in 1893, in the city of Toronto, after the conference, and expounding that conference, in the first place declares that it is impossible that there can be any reciprocity with the United States unless it takes in manufactured goods as well as raw products. He says it is impossible, and that we might as well dismiss it from our minds, that we can get reciprocity in natural products alone. There has to be conjoined to that a liberal and generous list of manufactures. That is the reciprocity which, as one of the planks of their platform of 1893, my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries at the present time was then expounding. And what does he say?

What we have proposed in that platform is a broad and generous measure of reciprocity, embracing natural products and a fair list of manufactured goods.

Mark what follows :

We have proposed the adoption of such a treaty as Mr. Blaine in his official report to Congress says that he was willing to negotiate with the Canadian commissioners.

What was Mr. Blaine willing to negotiate with the Canadian commissioners? A tariff, which had two essentials in it: first, it should embrace a list of manufactured articles; and second, it should be accompanied with favoured treatment for those articles, that we should discriminate against Great Britain and the rest of the world. Do I need to go any further to show that at this particular time, out of all the things we have not, there are three things we have: first, delay; second, promised revision after this delay; third, unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, plus its concomitant, discrimination against Great Britain and every other country. I doubt if in the history of nations there has been an instance recorded where a party has for so long a time conducted so blind a course, full of such patent inconsistency, full of such, I may be excused for using the term, crude and changing conclusions with an utter absence of intelligent comprehension of principles and plans, with an utter absence of what may be called well-reasoned convictions, but with simply one apparent reason, that of catching all the discontents on the one hand and beautifying the cave of Adullam, in which the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) could spread his nets to catch the unwary, former supporters of the Conservative policy and Government. I have stated those were theories, and those theories had to be abandoned from time to time. When? At the very moment the white light of criticism shone upon them, at the very moment they were put before the people where they could be canvassed. Commercial union was more than a high sounding name. It had to meet question and answer; it had to meet the criticism of public opinion, which was well informed, and before which you have to establish a case before you can convince the people of the soundness of the position which you are trying to maintain. What were the obstacles to commercial union? If you are going to have a customs union, what is the tariff going to be? And who is to frame it? There is a rock of difficulty, on which its supporters split. Then there will be a loss of revenue; how are you going to make it up? It is impossible to answer the question. More than all, there is the question of national sentiment, which, in the minds of the great mass of the people, commercial union would have buried in its grave forever, and left us but a part and parcel of the United States of America, or, as the "Globe" declared, a state inside of the United States. And when commercial union, well sounding on the lips of Mr. Wiman and other theorists, came down to be closely scrutinized by the public, met the loyal sentiment of this country, it split upon those rocks and was cast aside. The same took place with unrestricted reciprocity, which in 1891 on these very grounds met its disaster at the polls in this country, as it was thought not to rise again, but it appears now from the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite, it has risen again and is already to the forefront in their tariff platform and programme. Although at this hour hon. gentlemen opposite cannot tell the House exactly when they will revise the tariff, although they cannot state the principle on which they will revise it, although they cannot give a single detail of what the tariff will be, they are able to declare in this House and the country that for one thing they are certainly in favour of reciprocity with the United States, and that at the first favourable moment they will send commissioners there to bring it about. So it was with respect to the policy of free trade as practiced in England. The moment hon. gentlemen opposite got down to the cool, sober judgment of the country and they were asked this question: free trade in England for Canada as it is situated to-day, would not such a policy be madness?—the very moment the cool, keen criticism of the hon. gentleman's own friends was applied, the hon. leader, in an accommodating mood, relegated it to some period in the future, thirty, forty or fifty years from now. So it was with respect to the policy of a tariff for revenue purposes, divested of every vestige of protection, which the hon. gentleman promulgated throughout the country. What does it mean? It means that the Government will not tax anything for the purposes of protection and that whatever is imposed will go into the public revenue. There is, as hon. gentlemen opposite are aware, only one principle on which such a policy can be carried out—that when so much duty is levied on cotton, wool or anything else, inasmuch as that is an import duty which must be paid by the importer, the goods being from abroad, to that extent it is a protection to the manufacturer of the same article at home, unless by an excise revenue the Government place a countervailing inland revenue duty upon it to exactly countervail the possibility of any protective application of that tariff. Yet my hon. friend on almost every platform in this country has held forth loftily and airily about this celebrated policy which has this character: a revenue without one cent of protection, with every vestige of protection out of it. I ask him if when his tariff revision is laid before Parliament, he will be so good as to make his revenue tariff one that will have no protection in it whatever, by the only possible method of an equivalent countervailing excise tax. Those are the rocks upon which, one by one, their fine theories have either entirely collided and wrecked themselves, or are in process of collision and wreckage. Hon. gentlemen opposite will find that sitting on the opposite side of the House, they will have to put words into deeds and go before the House and the country with definite plans of legislation, which is something very different from arguing theories on a platform, and if I am not mistaken hon. gentlemen know to-day, even after their short tenure of office, what will be some of the difficulties that will meet them when they attempt to square their theories of twenty years' standing with the basic facts as they exist to-day, and the circumstances and competition of different interests of trade and commerce, and they will find that the people will not be satisfied with theories but will want honest common sense and statesmanship. What is the result of all these efforts? The result of these 24 years of propagandism by hon. gentlemen opposite, of all this shifting, change and vacillation, of all this present uncertainty as to what hon. gentlemen opposite propose to do is that the country knows: first, that if it is to trust hon. gentlemen at all, there is to be a change; second, that that change is impending; third, but that it is delayed. The axe has been sharpened, the handle has been placed in it, the instrument is upheld; there it remains ready to strike, but no man in the whole of this wide Dominion has the least idea as to where it will strike. There is to be a change; it is impending, but it is delayed, and it brings with it all the disadvantages and troubles which always attend delay and change in a matter of such vital moment as the tariff issue in any country. What else is known? If any reliance at all can be placed upon the statement of hon. gentlemen opposite—and mind you I am not questioning it, for I stand here to-day to say that I implicitly believe that what these hon. gentlemen opposite have been preaching for the last twenty-four years, they will carry out in practice when they come to the revision of their tariff—I must believe, and I do believe in my inmost heart, that when they come to revise the tariff, they are going to take every vestige of protection out of it. For twenty-four years they have declared it, and for twenty-four years they have been building up a public sentiment with reference to it, which they say has at last floated them into power. I cannot believe that public men in this country would so far forget their tenets and their statements and their principles as enunciated for twenty-four years, as not carry them out when they get into power. No party in England could live for a single hour which failed to do so. But if I state that there is an impression abroad that they will not, I say it because of statements that are made by supporters of the Government. There is not a section of the Dominion of Canada to-day in which which you cannot go and pick out gentlemen who either have seats in this House or have largely contributed to giving seats to members in this House by their influence, who will not tell you point-blank: Oh, you simply go home and keep quiet; the Liberal party is not going to disturb the protective basis of the industries of the country. They tell me that, and what am I to think? If I have any scepticism at all, it is because the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite say this. Aye; are there not sitting in these seats before me at this very hour men who have voted for the Government, who are here to support them, and who believe and say that the principle of protection is not going to be taken away from the industries of Canada in the proposed revision of the tariff. I think my eye can rest upon some one, or two, or three, or more, who have made that statement and who believe it in their hearts. Well, we shall see. But I am bound to suppose, and the country is bound to suppose, and it will be the worst page in political history that was ever written in Canada if it is not proven to be true; we are bound to suppose that the Opposition of twenty-four years will, when they come into power, make good the tenets that they held distinctively during those twenty-four years. We are therefore going to have a change, but it is to be delayed. We are going to have the principle of eighteen years eliminated from the tariff. And what else are we going to have? We are going to have just what we have now, accentuated by every week of further delay, we are going to have doubt and uncertainty as to what will happen permeating every branch of the business of this country, and working prejudicially to the progress and advancement of Canada. Why, Sir, a year ago capital became somewhat uneasy and great businesses began to think that a change might take place if the Liberal-Conservative party were ousted. We were approaching the period of the election, and as months passed by and the elections came closer, that feeling of uneasiness, that a generic change would take place in the basis of the tariff policy, began to be more and more felt, until on the 23rd of June last, the coming into power of hon. gentlemen opposite made that uneasiness still greater, because then the business people of this country thought and said: There is to be a generic and absolute change as far as the fiscal policy is concerned; what it will be we do not know; we are involved in doubt and uncertainty. And the longer hon. gentlemen delay the greater will be that uneasiness and the greater will be the demoralization and confusion which will result from that uneasiness. It is morally impossible for my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) if this session passes with nothing done to revise the tariff and put it upon the statute-book, and get it into working order inside of six or seven or eight or nine months from this date. During all that time, and in proportion as the day approaches when there shall be an end of the present and a beginning of the future policy, the uneasiness increases and the demoralization and confusion grow in the same proportion. This delay is most prejudicial to both the present and prospective business interests of this country. They are in what you might call a state of suspended animation. Not knowing what six or eight months hence will be the conditions of sale or manufacture, they simply make from day to day, selling what they can and making nothing more than they can sell every day.

How will the channels of trade flow after this revision of the tariff? Will they flow north and south, as hon. gentlemen have so often declared to be the natural channels of trade in this country. They will, if hon. gentlemen adopt and carry out unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. Or will they flow east and west as well as north and south, as they would if "free trade as it is in England" becomes the policy of the present Government in the six or eight months that is to come. They may flow in one direction or they may flow in another, but no man engaged in business knows how, and consequently every man engaged in business is to that extent in doubt and uncertainty, and paralysed as to his movements. What will be the conditions of purchase or sale? To-day when a man goes out to sell goods to his customers they say to him: We believe there is to be a revision of the tariff. The leader of the present Government has declared that there is going to be "free trade as it is in England"; if there is, imported goods will not have a duty upon them and they will be cheaper. I do not want to buy from you any more than I can just sell out to my customers between this and the time the change takes place. And the customer says to the man from whom he buys: What are you selling at now? And the seller says:

So much. And the buyer says: There is to be a revision of the tariff, and the Hon. Mr. Laurier says that it is to be "free trade as it is in England." I think I will curtail my purchases until the time arrives when there will be no duties on these goods, and I will get them somewhat cheaper. And so the consumer buys less. Here is a man who has to manufacture to-day for a market which he cannot get at until nine or ten months have passed. He must either stop his machinery or he must run the risk that the conditions of sale may be entirely different when his manufactured articles are offered on the market. His whole plant is paralysed, and if the tariff is revised, we will say on iron, and if iron is made free in certain of its forms, all that he manufactures is subject to the loss represented by the duty which is placed upon iron now, or very nearly that amount. Is it fair; is it right? But it goes further than that. The farmer in this country for the last four years has been investing his capital more and more in the raising and manufacture of pork. He says: To-day I have certain prospects of commanding the home market and consequent confidence to go into the business for export, which I have done. But if I lay in my stock now, when they have been fatted and ready for the market, I may find myself in the face of a competition entirely unhindered, from the pork markets of Chicago and the United States, and they can drive me out of our markets. Timidity and shyness and doubt and anxiety are upon every producer in this country of cottons, woollens, pork, manufactures of iron: every one of these. What is the thing which should be done by my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) opposite? He should have had his tariff ready and down, and passed at this present session of Parliament. When he (Mr. Laurier) for nineteen years has been heralding a change on a question of principle, when above all other things he has been declaring for "free trade as it is in England," or for a "revenue tariff without a vestige of protection," it does not take ten days' work to frame a tariff on either of these principles. All he has to do in either case is to settle for himself what revenue are required, then if it is free trade, to pick out the articles on which to put the duty and raise the revenue, and everything else is free; if it is a revenue tariff without a vestige of protection, in just the same way to find out what revenue it is necessary to raise, and raise it by duties on imports with countervailing excise duties on similar articles produced in the country, so as to make the tariff non-protective and to obtain just what is necessary for the services of the country. There is nothing difficult in that; and my hon. friend, if he were honest in his propaganda, and intended to put either of these courses into operation, could have done it in thirty days, as easily as he could deliver an oration on free trade in the city of Quebec. Why the delay? From one of two causes, Sir: party ineptitude or party tactics; but neither party ineptitude nor party tactics is an excuse for delaying, and putting into doubt, uncertainty and demoralization the vast business interests of this country for one single hour. Party ineptitude in that he has not yet, or his party has not yet, settled the principle of his tariff. He settled it before the election in the country? Free trade as it is in England, or a revenue tariff without a vestige of protection—in either case his tariff could have been ready and passed with a minimum of disturbance arising from delay. But if he has not settled the principle, he cannot arrange the details. Or it is party tactics, because there are certain by-elections to come, and, as in the general election he spoke fair words to every class of people, whereby he might sweep as many of them as possible into his net, so in the by-elections which are to come on before the next session of Parliament, he may gather many still within his net by whispering the word of promise into the ear of each section of the manufacturing or producing classes. But that is no excuse for delay.

After Recess.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I was proceeding to state some things with regard to the state of general doubt and uncertainty in which the business and producing interests of the country were placed, owing to the peculiar state of things which has resulted from the long canvas of hon. gentlemen opposite on certain lines, their accession to power, and the delay which by their intimation is threatening the progress and stability of the producing and manufacturing interests of the country. I was proceeding to state that this doubt and uncertainty was felt in various ways. As is well known, business and commercial men have to look far ahead, and lay the lines of their business, make their purchases, prepare their stocks and arrange for their sale; and the period of six or seven months which must necessarily intervene between the present time and the completion of a tariff by hon. gentlemen opposite is not the length of time which completely covers the whole, or indeed a main part, of the great operations of business. At the present time men who are engaged in business and in production, in various lines of industry, looking forward to the time when probably the change will be consummated and the legal enactments made, find it impossible to arrange their business so as to free them from probable and almost certain loss. Looking out upon the few months that intervene between this time and the time when the final enactment will be made, these men, I was stating, are asking. In what direction will the channels of trade flow when our operations just now commenced shall have been completed so far that we shall be able to place our made-up stocks on the market? Hon. gentlemen opposite have for many years contended that the principal and natural channels of trade were from north to south—that the United States market was our natural one; and they have so far reinforced their statements in that respect as to declare—the only declaration which they have made at the present session of Parliament—that their policy in one respect is made up, so far as its principle is concerned, that is, that they intend, if possible, to have a large measure of free trade with the United States of America. Then, if there be a change in tariff regulations—a change consequent upon the adoption of a policy of that kind—there will inevitably take place all the confusion, all the loss, all the demoralization consequent upon changed channels of trade; and, as I said before, the manufacturing and producing interests are at this moment altogether uncertain as to whether this change shall be made or not, and as to the direction in which the channels of trade will run—whether they will cross those that have been the stated channels of trade, in the main, during the past ten or fifteen years, or whether they will run in the same directions. Then I have pointed out what takes place as regards the conditions of purchase and sale. Men who are engaged in any great producing interest, whether they are makers of cottons of woollens, or iron, or refiners of sugar, have to make their purchases six, nine and twelve months in advance. They have to lay in their raw material, they had to determine the prices they pay by the prices they propose to get for their products when finished; and not one of these heavy manufacturers and producers has, at this moment, the least certainty as to whether, if he lays in his stock of raw material to-day, when six, eight or nine months hence those shall have been worked up and ready for the market, the conditions upon which he has to sell them in this market will not be radically changed. In all these respects, the mere statement of fact carries with its own argument and its own conviction that all these great businesses must be almost paralysed, that whatever is done must be done, as it were, from hand to mouth, and that the conditions a few months ahead being entirely unknown, the element of certainty is entirely taken away, and these industries become confused and demoralized. And there is another point which I consider of great importance. Under the system of protection, which we have had in this country for eighteen years, under any system of protection, there is a certain scope and intensity of competition which all producers must meet in the wide fields where they sell their stocks. In a protected country, confining our attention, for the time being, to the home market, there are certain conditions of competition to which the home manufacturers are subject as contrasted against outside competition. There is the compensating power of the protection which surrounds the country, be it great or little, which protects to a large extent against the intense competition of foreign countries. Within the country itself, the home market is largely served by its own producers, so that the competition inside of it is, in the greater measure, confined to those who manufacture in the country itself, and the conditions are as nearly equal as they can be. In the Dominion of Canada, capital ranges about the same for every manufacturer within its domain, the cost of fuel is about the same, the recompense which is paid to labour ranges in the main on about an even scale. For these producing interests, the temperature, the climate, and every one of the conditions flowing from these are about the same, so that the competitors here are placed upon as nearly the same level as possible. They know what they have to meet, and they know the conditions of competition into which they shall engage, and that competition to-day in the Dominion, and for years past, has been so strong and so vigorous on those planes that it has reduced the cost to the consumer, in all cases, to the veriest small profit upon the production, over and above the cost of the raw material and the cost of production. Well, Sir, we have here competition known, stated, experienced for year after year, and our manufacturers may well lay in their stocks, may well lay their plans, may go on with their work. But if you are going to strike down the wall of protection and allow the manufacturer from every country under the sun to compete without any compensating advantages in the way of tariff to our own manufacturers, you enlarge the scope of competition by that much. You introduce new elements into the matter entirely. Capital must cost the manufacturer in this country 6 per cent, but he will then have to compete with the manufacturers of countries where capital can be had at three, three and a half, or two and three-quarters per cent. Coal costs our people a stated amount, but if you open this competition, then you will find our manufacturers competing with rivals who can get their coal at one-half the cost. We know what skilled and unskilled labour costs here. The conditions for our home manufacturer are stated and well known, but if you throw down the wall of protection and open the competition to every European and Asiatic country and every country under the sun, we shall have to compete with a certain scale of wages in this country against the manufacturers of countries where the scale of wages is three-quarters or one-half, or it may be one-fifth or one-tenth of what is here. You have to manufacture in this country under conditions of climate which are known and which bring their difficulties and add to the cost. Throw down the wall of protection, open the range of competition, and you find yourselves competing with the manufacturers of countries where the climate is such that many of the difficulties which add to the cost in this country are not met with there at all. The plan of competition changes entirely, its scope changes, and you have forced on the manufacturers of Canada, under these new conditions, a competition to which they are unused, for which they are unfit, under conditions which make it impossible for them to succeed. It goes without saying that, under those conditions, if you do as my hon. friend the leader of the Government has given his solemn word as a public man he proposes to do, if you take every vestige of protection out from the tariff of the country, if you throw down the wall entirely and invite competition from every country under the sun, with these varying and more advantageous conditions in their favour, you make it perfectly impossible that, in many of the producing industries of this country, our manufacturers can do business at all. These are facts which are known to every man who thinks on the question and the conditions of the industries in this or any other country. What have the manufacturers of this country to go upon—waiting upon the sweet will of my hon. friend who leads the Government, looking up to him who has practically nothing at stake, who gets his salary—

Mr. McMULLEN. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has broken out again, I would advise him to consult a physician. My hon. friend, I say, has no interest particularly in the matter. He leads this Government, he gets his comfortable salary, he floats at the top wave of popularity in his own party and on his own side of the House, but down in this country, from British Columbia to Cape Breton, there are men who toil from early morning to late at night—though my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals has no particular love for that kind of creature at all—there are men who do not know where they are going to get their next day's wages. Are they not interested in this? They look up into the face of the leader of the Government, who says he is a beneficent factor in the government of the country, that he is going to do great things for the benefit of the country, and they say: If these industries which are of interest to us, to the tune of $100,000,000 of wages yearly, and which enable us to keep our families, are to be open to the competition of the wide world, without a vestige of protection, we have something to say in the matter. They look up to him, as leader of the Government, and ask him: Do you think it is fair for you to sit in your place, knowing exactly the principle upon which you propose to reduce the tariff, knowing in the main the details of the tariff you propose to have, to keep capital in suspense and doubt, and thereby strike at the very means by which we get our daily wage, by which we earn our bread and butter and keep our homes and our families? Then, Sir, the farmers are interested in every branch of producing industry in this country. They look up into the face of the leader of the Government, and they say: You profess to be the farmer's friend; you have gone through the length and breadth of this country saying that, if you have to choose between the manufacturers and the farmers, you are going to stay with the farmers. There was no need for making a declaration of that kind. Mr. Blake, who was the former leader of the party of hon. gentlemen opposite, never made a declaration of that kind. In his Malvern speech, he deprecated a declaration of this kind; he deprecated bringing this canvass down to a cleavage between two classes in this country. Sir, the farmer and the industrial producer, so far from having a line of cleavage between them, have twin interests, interests that are indissolubly connected with each other. The farmers of this country, who have had the home market increased to them since 1878 by $40,000,000 or $45,000,000, look up into the face of my hon. friend and say: We want to know whether or not you are going to introduce a policy which will break down the great manufacturing industries of this country, which afford the labouring men and artisans their means of support; we ask you if you are going to break these down, for, if labour is not employed, labour ceases to buy, and, if you break these industries down, we cease to sell what formerly was bought by labouring artisans. Capital has some rights as well, and the $400,000,000 of capital which to-day is invested in manufacturing industries in this country, has a right to ask the hon. gentleman who leads this Government, whether he thinks it is fair to that capital invested—there where they cannot pull it up at a moment's notice; lost, if the business in which it is invested does not bring them in a fair profit—for the purposes of party tactics, to keep them on the ragged edge of suspense for six, eight or nine months longer, to the loss of the capital at present in business, and to the utter negation of the employment of fresh capital in any business of producing, until that uncertainty and doubt are settled. So that my hon. friend will see that he is not now playing at politics. When a man is in the mad rush and fervour of a campaign, he can say and feel that many things are of little importance. But, when a man comes to his sober senses, when a man stands face to face with a monument of industry devised by one of the strongest minds that this country ever saw, laid on strong and broad foundations to the building up of a great Canadian nationality in this country, endorsed by the people, election after election, and in this last election of 1896 most emphatically not decided against by the electorate—I say that, when the mad rush and fervour of the campaign is over and he comes face to face with a monument of industry of that kind, he may well pause and think. And I do not think it is too late, even to-day, although the instrument is ready and although the hand is uplifted, to appeal to him not to strike. But, Sir, at least, if he is not ready with his details, if even at this time, when he has come face to face with the difficulty of the task that is laid upon him, he feels he is not quite ready with the details, he feels that it is a work of greater moment and importance than he had thought, at least the manufacturing and the business interests of this country have one request which they may make, and one question to which they deserve an emphatic, a clear and an immediate answer. If the leader of the Government is not able to-day to lay the details of his tariff before the House and before the country, at least he ought to have no excuse, under these circumstances, for not stating to the House and the country the principle upon which he proposes to revise the tariff. That would lessen the trouble, to some extent. While it would not take away all the difficulty, it would, at least, have this merit, that it would point out the road to be travelled six months from this time, and it would allow those driving on the road to arrange for the direction which the tariff was to take. My hon. friend can do that easily. Here, with all these interests lying before him, here with all this capital in doubt and anxiety, here with all this immense distribution interest which hangs still with uncertainty of doubt upon the next six months of possible action—with all this before him, has not he the duty imposed upon him of coming now frankly before this House and before the country, and, to save these interests as much as he possibly can, at least to make frank and full definition of the principle that he proposes to base his tariff upon? Which will he take? Will he take free trade as it is in England? Then, let him state so; and, although many industries will be dismantled, and although all of them will be thrown into confusion, and although great demoralization and loss will occur—my hon. friend opposite me (Mr. Davies) shakes his head. Does he mean to say that if, after eighteen years of protection, protection is suddenly eliminated from the tariff and free trade as it is in England is suddenly introduced, that the industries and business of this country will not be thrown into confusion? It must be so. It may be his opinion that ultimately the good will far more than balance the evil, but no business man, I undertake to say, will rise in this House and declare that you can make a change from the principle of protection, kept in operation for eighteen years, with all its aggregation of capital and labour, to free trade as it is in England, and not produce the most widespread confusion and demoralization. The whole channel of trade and business must necessarily flow in different ways, and, consequently, all that loss and demoralization consequent upon leaving the old and branching out into the new, must inevitably take place.

Now, Sir, if he is not going to take the principle of free trade, let him at least say so, because surely by this time he must have settled that question. Hon. gentlemen opposite cannot be at variance upon this. Whatever other differences there may be amongst them, however they may differ about lines of policy of less importance, it surely cannot be that men who have been led and marshalled together on the lines of the statements that I have put before this House this afternoon, for ten, twelve or fifteen years, have the least doubt to-day as to the principle upon which they shall revise their tariff. If it is not free trade as it is in England, will the hon. gentlemen state that his principle is to be a revenue tariff without one vestige of protection? Then the producing interests of this country, from one end of it to the other, will know at least what to expect after six or eight, or nine months, and they can make the disposition of their business according to that which is to be the accepted policy after that time. It will not obviate all the loss, nor much of it, it will not obviate all the confusion, but it will at least make a certainty along the line of which they can import, and arrange, and re-arrange their businesses so as to be ready for the inevitable change when it comes. Whatever is the policy, whatever is the principle, if the details are not known, at least let the hon. gentlemen opposite—and I make this appeal again—give to this House and the country a clear and definite statement as to the principle upon which they propose to proceed in the revision of their tariff.

Now, after having called the attention of the House to these matters chiefly in reference to the record of the policies, and the enunciated principles, and to some results that I think would flow from them, of hon. gentlemen and the party opposite, let me ask the attention of this House for a single moment to the contrast which is afforded upon this tariff and business issue, by the history and the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party down to this present time. Whatever hon. gentlemen opposite may say of the Liberal-Conservative policy—

Mr. CAMPBELL. What is it?

Mr. FOSTER. Well, Mr. Speaker, I did not think, at this age, in this day, in this Canadian Parliament, there was a single representative, even on that side of the House, who would look up in my face and ask, What is the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party. The hon. gentleman's case is perfectly hopeless, if he does not know it; and so I will forego all attempts to struggle with him, and will try to impress my views upon others, and I hope more intelligent members of Parliament. Whatever, then, may be said of Liberal-Conservative policies along other lines, there is this statement which cannot be gainsaid, that from the year 1876 down to the present time, as regards the tariff and trade policy of the Liberal-Conservative Government and party, there has been the utmost clearness, there has been the utmost consistency, and no man can substantiate a charge in either case contrary to these two assertions. Sir John A. Macdonald, in 1876 and 1877, by his resolutions, laid the foundation of the policy which has been adopted and pursued by the Liberal-Conservative party from that time to the present. It has been the principle of protection, steadily applied to the tariff and the trade of the country.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). What was the date of their conversion in 1876?

Mr. FOSTER. Whose conversion?

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). The Conservative party's.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I want to answer my hon. friend's question, as I have a perfect right to do, I suppose, by asking another. I want to ask him whether he, having been a protectionist at that time, has met with any argument sufficient to convert him; and if he has not, why does he sit on that side of the House behind a leader who has done nothing for the last ten years but to fulminate against protection, who declares that it is robbery, that it is a wrong system, and has promised that when the Liberal party came into power, it should be entirely blotted out from the statute-book.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Give us the date of the conversion of the Conservative party. I want the date.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman tell me, for my own special information, whether he is to-day a protectionist, as he was in 1877?

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I will give the hon. gentleman the date, if he wants to know it.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, we would like to have all the information you have.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Very well, it was on the 26th February, 1876, when the hon. gentleman's leader came down to this House with a speech specially prepared to pitch into the Government for increasing the taxation of the people. When the then Finance Minister, Sir Richard Cartwright, came down with his Budget Speech, and not a word was said about the tariff, the hon. gentleman's leader looked up at the clock, and asked the Government kindly to call it six o'clock—it was then a quarter past five. At eight o'clock he came back with a tirade against the Government for not taking into consideration the manufacturing interests of the country. Then was the date that the Conservative party was converted, and since that time they have gone on with their protection.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg to state, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg to state that the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh! oh!

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg to state, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) commenced his statement by an assertion that is utterly untrue and foundationless.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have several points satisfactorily settled, we have some points not so satisfactorily settled. The point that is satisfactorily settled is this, according to the testimony of the hon. gentleman who has interrupted me.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You are settled, anyway.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I think I shall have to ask your kind offices against impertinent interruptions. The interruption of my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Wood) was a perfectly pertinent one, and I gave place to it, as I should be glad to give place to any interruption that was conceived in the same spirit. But the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin) has a very bad habit of making impertinent interruptions when hon. gentlemen on this side are speaking; and I think it would be well for the leader of the Government who poses and passes, and rightly so, as a gentleman, to take my hon. friend under his especial and kindly teaching for a little while, and teach him how he ought to behave in a deliberative assembly. I was going on to say that so far as my hon. friend from Hamilton was concerned, we have one thing satisfactorily settled, and it is settled directly in the line of my argument. Does my hon. friend object to conversions?

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Certainly not.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend's testimony was that so far back as 1876 the Liberal-Conservative party were soundly converted to protection, and he himself stated before he sat down, that from 1876 up to the present time we have pursued the even tenor of our way. Now, it might be a pertinent question for me to ask my hon. friend—

Mr. LANDERKIN. Impertinent.

Mr. FOSTER. I am interrupted again, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I must ask the hon. gentleman to keep order.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Well, we will now say quits.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, if my hon. friend will be quiet—

Mr. LANDERKIN. All right, if you will be civil.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, Mr. Speaker, let us go on one step further. I have now the right, having answered the hon. gentleman's question, to ask a question, and it is if in 1876 he was a strong protectionist?

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I beg your pardon.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Never as bad as that.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I do not desire to interrupt the hon. gentleman by stating what I was then. The hon. gentleman is making an eloquent speech, and I am listening to him with great pleasure.

Mr. FOSTER. I thank my hon. friend very much. I have a very distinct recollection of reading statements made by a Mr. Wood, and I think it was my hon. friend opposite who expressed his views, and if I am not mistaken he also submitted a motion in this House, and the purport of the motion was in the same direction, in favour of protecting the industries of this country.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Will the hon. gentleman allow me to correct him? The first motion I ever made in this House was to ask for a committee to investigate the manufacturing industries of the country. The first hon. gentleman who arose to oppose the resolution was the hon. gentleman who sits on the right of the hon. member who now has the floor. His statement was simply this, that this was the thin end of the protectionist wedge, and the committee must not be granted.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I must give a most emphatic contradiction to that statement.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, I really cannot allow these hon. gentlemen to take up the rest of my time. They seem to have misunderstood one another, one stating exactly the opposite of what the other affirms. I desire, however, to call the attention of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) to one matter which is almost implied in the charge made against my colleague and chief, that at that particular time the hon. member opposite was the man accused of putting in the protectionist, not the free trade wedge. Now, after these interchanges of pleasantries between the hon. gentleman and myself, I wish to go on with the remarks I was proceeding to make. Those remarks were to this effect, that from 1876 up to the present time the Liberal-Conservative party, so far as its trade and tariff policy is concerned, has been consistently advocating an adequate and sufficient protection for the industries of this country. I do not think there is any gainsaying that statement. Hon. gentlemen sometimes make the argument that because rates of duty change, at one time being higher and another time lower, there is inconsistency in the policy. But, Sir, if the principle remains always the same, on the one hand the principle of protection, or on the other the principle of free trade, the changes which are made in the items and the application of the principle afford no proof of a change of principle, but rather prove the permanency of principle and precise adherence to it. Even though we were converted in 1876, according to the statement of hon. gentlemen opposite, we have remained steadfast ever since, and are at this date on the very same platform as we occupied in that year. It will be for some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to explain why they are there, and how they can consistently remain behind a Government which is pledged to take every vestige of protection out of the tariff, especially when they represent constituencies vitally interested in the maintenance of protection, and when even they themselves have explicitly stated their views in favour of the protective principle as applied to our industries. Then I would urge this, that if you look at the policy of the Conservative party for the last eighteen or twenty years, you find it a consistent policy in its endeavour to apply the principle of protection to the tariff and business interests of this country. It may be perhaps not too late for me from this side of the House to appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite, notwithstanding all that array of statements which they have made of their antipathy to protection, of their determination to supplant it by some policy which has no vestige of protection in it, that when they to-day stand in front of the great interests of this country, built up and around a period of protection for the last eighteen years, they will consider whether after all it will not be better for them, when they think over the question calmly and seriously, to acknowledge they have made a mistake, and when they come down to the hard work of adopting a policy they will not deem it better to adopt the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party and continue the application of the principle of protection. Iconoclasm is not the noblest of occupations. The man who lifts his axe or implement of destruction in the face of a monument to the consistent and uniform action of a great people, like the people of Canada, for eighteen years, may well pause before he brings that instrument down to the demolition or defacement of a monument which has been erected by the people through so long a period of years. This policy of protection, Sir, was not singly and by itself adopted in this Dominion of Canada. It was part of a grand scheme for the development and building up of this country. Confederation was prior to it—the joining of these different provinces in a union of government by the political cement of our institutions. The joining together of all the different parts of the country by cheap and rapid means of communication was a second element in the progress of the country. The development of the great industrial life of the country, and the development of its matchless resources by the application of industry under those conditions was a third principle laid down for the development of this Dominion. All these three have their places; and I am satisfied, Sir, that if hon. gentlemen opposite could be convinced that free trade, taking every element of protection out of the tariff, would be to the detriment of the development and upbuilding of the great industrial life of Canada they would hesitate before they applied it. Well, Sir, the history, not only of our own country, but contemporary history all around us shows that the principle of protection is applied in almost every modern country in the building up of its great home industries. That it was considered necessary in this country follows from the judgment of the people in 1878, 1882, 1887 and 1891. And here let me state what I implied a moment ago, that I do not consider the elections of 1896 gave hon. gentlemen opposite a mandate to destroy the principle and the application of protection as applied to our business and commercial interests. My belief is that if upon the single issue of tariff policy the two parties had gone to the electors, and there had been no other issue, the electors would have returned the advocates of the National Policy, the principle of protection, triumphantly at the polls. Other questions of less moment in many respects; the accretions that grow around a government of long standing; the difficulties that they meet and are not able in every case to solve to the satisfaction of everybody; these and a thousand side issues entered into in the last contest—and it is for no man in this country to affirm that the verdict of the people in 1896 was given unequivocally against the National Policy, so far as the principle of protection is concerned. So that the first thing that counts for a continuance of this system is the eighteen years of growth and persistence that it has had in Canada, with the repeated endorsement of the electors. But, Sir, there is something else. The environments of this country have to be looked at as well. When we look over the world, what do we find with regard to this principle? We find that protection is almost everywhere. If it is not everywhere at the present time—and the only great country which can be appealed to as not having the system, is Great Britain—the answer is, that Great Britain, in the first place, began to develop her wealth of skill and industrial capital and prominence by a system of the most virtual and most effectual protection. And, having developed it thus for a series of centuries, she at last came to the conclusion that, under her peculiar conditions, it was better for her to make her food free and cheap, and trust to her superiority of position, of skill, of capital, and of commercial supremacy to keep her manufactures in their ascendancy throughout the wide world, and to become, as it were, the great manufacturing shop for the nations. Outside of England, where is the great country that in this commercial war takes down its walls and lets competition come in untrammelled? If my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) carries out his policy to-day, and takes every vestige of protection out of the tariff, what is the position in which Canada will be placed? Sir, when that policy is carried out, our industries, our labour, our enterprise here are all open to the uncompensated competition of every country in the world, and, with the exception of Great Britain, every other country into which we would like to throw our products by way of mutual trade, has its tariff walls of greater or less height raised against us. That may be a brave proceeding for us, but it is not prudent commercial warfare. For this country to open up its industrial enterprises in which labour is so much interested, to the competition of the wide world, without getting from the wide world a corresponding entrance to their market, is not commercial warfare, but, to most of our industries, it would be simple and absolute suicide. It may be brave to say that a Canadian is as good as any other man, and that a Canadian workman is as good as any other workman. That may be all true, and yet, when the Canadian comes to fight against workmen no better than himself, if they are protected in their home markets and fight the Canadian from behind high tariff battlements, then even equal enterprise and equal skill in a non-protected country cannot fight a people like that successfully. What will the agriculturists of this country say, if to-day they are laying their plans for raising their products, and when their products have been raised, eight or nine months hence, they find themselves without entrance into the markets of other great countries? What will they say, if they find, also, that the surplus products of the United States of America are liable to be brought into Canada without any hindrance of tariff, and without any compensation which the tariff now gives them in this competition?

Sir, with reference to the other great industries of the country, the same question might be asked and the same answer given. The manufacturers in every great line, whilst the doors are closed to them in every other great country, either by high protective tariff or by great compensating advantages, as in Great Britain, will find that their home market is thrown open to the competition of the wide world, and that they will be placed on this platform of disadvantage. I was going on to say that the history of every modern country proves the necessity of this principle for the development and upbuilding of its industrial life. England's case I have cited. Take the case of the United States. Does not every student of history know that the United States has come to its present proud position as a manufacturing country by the exercise of the strong power of a protective tariff in its younger and weaker stages and which has been perpetuated up to the very present time? Take Germany. Does not every student of history know that within the last fifteen years Germany has made tremendous strides in its manufacturing life by virtue of the protection that is given to its manufacturers and artisans? To-day, instead of being a country which takes from Great Britain and other manufacturing nations almost the total of their manufactured goods, and offers no competition in return; to-day, Germany, protected in its home market by a tariff wall, goes out over its borders and floods Great Britain herself and floods every civilized, and almost every uncivilized country on the face of the globe, with a keen and constant competition against the products of the manufacturing power of Great Britain. In Asia, in Africa, in South America, everywhere the German manufacturer is successfully pushing his wares. Surely, if this is a principle necessary to be applied in almost every case that history gives us, it is a principle that ought to be applied as well to a young and growing country like ours, with its wealth of natural resources and its comparatively small aggregation of population, of capital, and of skilled labour. More than that, Sir, in the results of this system of protection, which for the last eighteen years has held sway in this country, we have something which ought to be a strong argument, and ought to be well weighed before an attempt is made to strike down protection and to replace it by a fiscal policy which is entirely different.

What, Sir, are the facts of the case? Between 1878 and 1896 there has been an immense growth in the manufacturing industries of this country. Unfortunately, we have no statistics which run for those years; but we have the statistics gathered in the census of the country from the decade of 1881 to 1891.

Mr. DOMVILLE. They are not correct.

Mr. FOSTER. And what do those figures give us as the progress which has been made by the manufacturing industries of this country? Why, Sir, that the number of establishments has increased from 49,000 to 75,000, or 52 per cent; that invested capital has increased from $164,000,000 to $354,000,000, or 114 per cent; that the number of employees has increased from 254,000 to 370,000, or 41 per cent; that the wages paid have increased from $59,000,000 to $100,000,000, or 69 per cent; that the cost of raw material has increased from $179,000,000 to $256,000,000, or 42 per cent; and that the value of products has increased from $309,000,000 to $476,000,000, or 53 per cent. Hon. gentlemen opposite may cavil at the census statistics; they may declare that they are right or that they are wrong.

Mr. FOSTER.

These are the figures obtained on the very same basis of enumeration that existed in preceding decades, and they are as approximately correct as the census figures ever are, for none of which can absolute accuracy be claimed, but all of which are known and taken to be as approximately correct, and worth everything for the purposes of comparison of decade with decade.

But, Sir, if these are to be cavilled at, there is something else that cannot be cavilled at; that is, the increase in the imports of raw material, the staples which are worked up by our manufacturing industries. Let us see what the figures are as to these. From 1878 to 1895 the imports of wool has increased from 6,000,000 pounds to 7,750,000, or 24 per cent; cotton has increased from 7,000,000 pounds to 45,000,000, or 525 per cent; hides have increased from $1,200,000 to $1,900,000, or 61 per cent; gutta percha and rubber have increased 339 per cent; hemp, 277 per cent; lumber, 62 per cent; and raw sugar from 11,000,000 pounds to 345,000,000 pounds, or 2,845 per cent. These back up the statistics of the census as to the great growth that has been made by this country under the application of protection.

But, Sir, there are other ways in which testimony is borne to the good of the system of protection which has been in force. The farmer's home market has been increased. The farmer's home market consists of the dwellers in the cities and towns and villages who do not produce farm products, but who require them for the sustenance of their families. There has been an increase from 1878 to 1895 of more than 150,000 families in that class of population in our country, an increase largely due to the growth of our industries in the towns and villages and cities; and that increase has increased the home market for the farmer's products by from $40,000,000 to $45,000,000 on a fair calculation as to what is consumed by each family. Let us go a little further. The farmers of this country know well what has taken place in the shutting out from the domestic market of meats and that kind of product from the United States, owing to the direct operation of the tariff, by the change of duty which was made in 1890-91, and which in the short period from then to 1895 has enlarged the farmer's home market for those products by more than $1,500,000 in those articles alone; and, Sir, the statistics show that although there has been a falling off in price in certain great agricultural products, yet the exports of the great staples which the farmer raises have increased since 1878 from $15,000,000 to $36,000,000, an increase of nearly 150 per cent. If then, there has been this great increase in capital invested and in wages paid, if there has been this great increase in raw material brought into this country to be made up into staple manufactures, if there has been this great increase in the home market of the farmers of the country owing to the employment given, and if at the same time there has been this notable increase in the foreign market of our farmers, these are proofs that cannot be gainsaid of the value of the system which was introduced in this country in 1879, and which has been worked out on the lines of progress and advancement from that period up to the present time.

Sir, we may go further than that. The trade exports in home products in 1879 under a revenue tariff administration had sunk down to $63,000,000. Last year, Sir, that is, in 1896, the trade exports of home products had risen to $110,000,000, the highest figure since confederation. The imports for home consumption in 1879 were but $80,000,000, having fallen to that figure under the previous regime. This year they total $110,500,000, and the total trade of home products and home consumption has risen from $143,000,000 in 1879 to $220,000,000 in 1896, the highest, with the exception of one year, since confederation.

So, Sir, I might take, as we have often done in this House, as indications of the progress of the country, the savings of the people. I might show that while under the previous regime of tariff for revenue only, the savings of the people actually decreased they have increased from 1878 to 1896 by over $155,000,000. I might show that the credit of the country has constantly improved until to-day it is very nearly 2 per cent better than it was in 1875-76. I might point to the experience of every member sitting around these boards, of the general improvement that has taken place in those years in the whole character of the country and in the whole condition of the people. It is a libel, a calumny upon Canada to say that it has not made staunch and notable progress in those eighteen years; and to my mind that progress has been largely due to the stability which has been imported, to the confidence which has been given, and the sustenance which has been afforded, to the producing interests of this country, from the farmers up to the highest skilled manufactures, by a wise national policy of protection, graduated according to the circumstances of the time and the environments of Canada in the tariffs which surrounded her from year to year. Sir, it seems to me that even at this late date, my hon. friend, before he raises his instrument to destroy this creation of eighteen years, which has been so beneficial to the people of Canada, ought to pause and reconsider well the principles of his action; and if he finds that it is a dangerous proceeding, if he finds that it will be productive of certain loss, if he is not fully convinced that the compensating advantages will be certain, even at this late day, in spite of all his protestations in favour of free trade and against protection, it is better for him to do the best for his country than to try to be consistent with himself.

I am not sure that my plea will have much effect on my hon. friend. Having been for the last ten or twelve years constantly reiterating these statements of a doctrine absolutely opposed to protection, it may be that his convictions run in the same line, and it may further be that ideas of consistency will impel him to carry them thoroughly out. But again, before I take my seat, I ask my hon. friend opposite, for the sake of the wide and immense business interests of this country, if he cannot at this session give us the details of his tariff revision, that he should to-night take the country into his confidence and give us at least the principle upon which he proposes to proceed. That will mitigate some of the difficulty, although it will not take away all of it by any means, but it will be an answer which will be received with gratitude by the great producing interests of this country, in that it will remove all the doubts and uncertainty which to-day paralyses every effort and clouds every hope for their future. I beg to move, seconded by Sir Charles Tupper :

That all the words after the word "That" be left out, and the following added instead thereof :—“since 1879 the Liberal party in Canada has in the main evinced uncompromising hostility to the principle and practice of protection as applied to the producing interests of Canada.

That during this period the leaders and organs of the party have from time to time advocated :

- (a.) Commercial Union with the United States.
- (b.) Continental Free Trade.
- (c.) Unrestricted Reciprocity with the United States, with discrimination against Great Britain and other countries.
- (d.) Free Trade as practised in Great Britain, and
- (e.) Tariff for revenue only in which there should be no vestige of protection.

That the authoritative platform of the Liberal party, adopted in 1893, declared that the customs tariff of the Dominion should be based, not as it is now, upon the protective principle, which it denounced as radically unsound and unjust to the masses of the people, and resolved, as the conviction of the party, that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours.

That the Government, through its leader, has announced its determination not to introduce any measure dealing with the tariff during the present session.

That the platform of the Liberal party and the utterances of the leader of the party and its principal organs and supporters have led the country to believe that a radical change is imminent in the principle upon which the revision of the tariff is to be based.

That the uncertainty and delay consequent upon these announcements will result in great disturbance in business and serious loss to the commercial and producing interests of the country.

That this House, while willing to allow reasonable time to perfect details, is of the opinion that a declaration of the principle upon which the Government propose to base their tariff revision should be at once made.

Mr. FOSTER.

And that, no revision of the Canadian tariff will be wise or satisfactory which does not proceed upon the basis of an adequate and sufficient protection for the producing interests of the country."

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Were my hon. friend a less distinguished apostle and professor of temperance than he is, I would be almost disposed to think that circumstances over which he had no control had compelled him to forget after dinner the statements that he made before, for most assuredly the first half of his speech was in wonderful contrast to the latter half. In the first half, he exhausted all his eloquence in appealing to my hon. friend beside me, over and over again, to bring down at once his tariff, which, he declared, might be composed in ten days, while the latter half was an elaborate argument to show that the utmost caution, care and deliberation are required at our hands before we venture to meddle with the tariff at all. Which is it to be? Are we to be condemned for not having brought a tariff down at once, or for meddling with an institution, as the hon. gentleman puts it, which has grown so long, which has spread its roots so wide and far, that it is only with the utmost caution and care that we can venture to touch it at all. But first let me pay a well-deserved tribute to the eloquence of my hon. friend. He did, before this House took recess, what I think but rarely is accomplished by any orator, however eloquent he may be. Sir, I observed the effect that my hon. friend's speech had on the First Minister and the leader of the Opposition respectively, before recess, and it is eminently to the credit of—what shall I say?—the soporific influence of my hon. friend's declamation that he succeeded, at one and the same moment, in putting both those hon. gentlemen to sleep. It is true that the slumber of my hon. friend beside me was somewhat fitful, but I was happy to observe that my hon. friend opposite slept the sleep of the just during an entire hour while the hon. gentleman held forth. Perhaps there was a reason for it, because I am bound to say that the older members of this House will bear me out when I say that by far the greater part of the hon. gentleman's speech has been delivered time and time again in this House.

The hon. gentleman was specially exercised to find out at what time, and why, and how the Liberal-Conservative party became converted to the doctrine of protection. If my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), whom I do not see in his place, were here, he could throw some light, as well as myself, on that interesting question. I happened to have been exceedingly well acquainted with the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald in his earlier and better days, and this I know that in those earlier and better days there was no single intellectual conviction more fixed in his mind, and more often expressed by him, than the conviction that protection was a fraud and a revenue tariff the only thing satisfactory to Canada, to which conviction he gave effect in the strongest way during the earlier days of his regime after confederation. And no one knows better than the hon. gentleman who sits opposite, that confederation would never have been adopted but for the solemn pledge to the people of the maritime provinces that the tariff would not be increased but would remain as it was when they entered confederation. However, by the way if the hon. gentleman desires to know how, and when, and why the Liberal-Conservative party were converted to the doctrine of protection, I would refer him again to a man who was deep in their counsels at that time, that is my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who was good enough to explain to us that the reason why the Liberal-Conservative party took up the policy of protection in 1876, was because they saw in it the only way to defeat Mr. Mackenzie. There was the genesis, that was the cause, it was the desire for place, the hope to obtain office, that led to the introduction of that policy, and nothing else.

The hon. gentleman, in the early part of his speech, recalled forcibly to my mind another departed Liberal-Conservative, endeared to fame in the old days by the title of "Scrap-book Charlie." I thought the mantle had fallen on another distinguished member of the Opposition, another Charlie, but I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman is not going to allow himself to be surpassed, even in scrap-book quotations, by any man on that side of the House. Sir, I do not blame the hon. gentleman. To my mind the quotations were by far the best part of his speech. I was very glad to see that so many redeeming sentences studied that somewhat dreamy waste of words. Now, Sir, what is the hon. gentleman's charge? Before dinner, his charge was that my hon. friend would not bring down the tariff at ten days' notice. There are certain conditions—and I will explain them to the House and to the hon. gentleman—under which a tariff may be brought down in ten days. When the Finance Minister of any government or party is content to make himself the mouthpiece and speaking trumpet of a number of combinesters scattered over the country, when the Ministers are the paid agents of the men with whose assistance and by whose aid they hope to derive the means by which alone they can hope to remain in office, a tariff can be made in ten days, or even in a much shorter time. But, when the tariff is to be brought down by men who are awake to their responsibility, by men who desire to do their duty by the immense and varied interests of this country, and who have weighed and understand how extensive and how intricate the complications are which are involved in any material change of the tariff, then, Sir, they would not be doing their duty, they would be false and recreant to their duty, if they allow any of this silly badinage—I can call it by no better name—to cause them to depart from their policy or to anticipate by one hour the time when they can lay a well-considered scheme before the Parliament and people of this country. It is hard to know whether the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) is serious in the statements he makes. He has been Finance Minister himself for a number of years, and, if there be one man more than another who knows he is asking an impossibility, in asking what he did in one part of his speech, it is that hon. gentleman. He knows he is asking what no Government ever did. I will go further and say, what no government ought to do. And let me recall to his mind and the minds of my hon. friends opposite that, in asking for this, he is going in the most direct contradiction to his own previous practice and of that of his predecessors. It is a much more difficult and a much more complicated task, as every one who has had the smallest experience in these matters knows, or ought to know, to revise and reduce a tariff, than to add to a tariff. Nevertheless, when hon. gentlemen opposite came into power in 1878 on their protective policy, the House will recollect, and those members who do not recollect, can ascertain it by reference to "Hansard," they took six or seven months before Sir Leonard Tilley was ready to bring down his tariff. We were defeated on the 17th September, and we went out of office, if my memory serves me, in the first week in October. Nevertheless, it was the middle of March, 1879, before Sir Leonard Tilley was able to bring down his tariff, involving, as I said, a number of additions and not reductions. But what was the course of the hon. member for York himself? It is within the recollection of a great many members whom I now address, that, when the hon. gentleman undertook to lop the mouldering branches away, he called to his assistance two or three of his colleagues and sent them all over the country, from one end to the other, to confer with the manufacturers and farmers and the chief producers of the country; and, when he had done all that, after taking a year to do it, what did he effect? He effected changes in the whole tariff to the extent of three-tenths of one per cent. In that respect, I think the hon. gentleman's practice—and it is not often the case that I have to make that statement of him—was decidedly better than his precepts. He found that a revision of the tariff, even to that insignificant extent, took time, required consideration, required a great deal of labour on his own part and on the part of his colleagues, and, when he had prepared his revision, as this House will perfectly well remember, he was obliged, after two or three months of strenuous struggle, to abandon almost every single proposition he had originally laid before the House. I beg to inform the hon. gentleman that the very first conditions are absent, the very first and primary conditions which alone would have justified my hon. friend in bringing down a revision of the tariff of this moment. Why, Sir, what is the very first thing, after all, that the head of the Government and the Minister of Finance must ascertain? First of all, they must ascertain what is the exact sum the needs of the country require them to raise in any particular year. How could they do that, when they had scarcely been sworn into office ten days before this Parliament met? The thing is utterly absurd and preposterous. We have brought down, it is true, the Estimates submitted by the hon. gentleman, but we have brought them down expressly on the ground that we had not time to examine and review in detail these various items, and that we must have time to do so. I say no more, Sir, about the absolute necessity of weighing, and weighing carefully and cautiously the effects of the changes we have to make—that goes without saying: that was admitted and dwelt upon by the hon. gentleman himself in the latter part of his speech. The hon. gentleman took upon himself to reproach my hon. friend the Premier as a mere academic theorist, and he went on to intimate that my hon. friend had no stake in the country. Why, Sir, what is his stake in the country, I should like to know? My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) has this stake in the country, the highest stake any man can have, more perhaps than any other Canadian. He is responsible for the welfare of the people of Canada, and as much as any living Canadian does my hon. friend feel and acknowledge that responsibility. Sir, he calls my hon. friend a theorist, and I would like to know was any more unbusiness-like proposition ever made in any House of Commons than the proposition insisted on by him, that we should bring down to the House of Commons a revision of the tariff at ten days' notice. The hon. gentleman talks about the case of the importers and the trials of the importer. It may relieve his mind to know that during the last three months the importers do not appear to have manifested any great alarm, for I find, on looking at the ten days' return, that we have imported a little more and got a little more revenue than we did in the corresponding period of last year. But let me ask the hon. gentleman, and let me ask those hon. gentlemen who are engaged in the business, what do importers want, what did many importers ask expressly in so many words? Did they ask that the moment the House met the new tariff should be brought down? Not at all: they asked that time should be given to get rid of stocks on hand and a natural and reasonable request it was. They will be about the last men—I speak of the importers—to complain of the fact that my hon. friend is taking time before he brings down any revised tariff. Now, Sir, it is perfectly true, and I know it as well as the hon. gentleman, that business men and manufacturers, as a rule, undoubtedly do desire to see stability, they do desire that the changes made in the tariff and fiscal policy of the country should be carefully and well considered.

But, Sir, we know perfectly well, and if hon. gentlemen don't know it, there are plenty of men in the House besides myself who can point out the facts to him—they know that the so-called National Policy has been a ghastly failure; they know that the so-called National Policy has heaped up taxes on the people of Canada, they know that it has heaped up debt, they know that it has utterly and entirely failed to colonize the magnificent territory we have acquired in the North-west, they know that it has utterly and entirely failed to keep the people of Canada in this country, the most important thing of all, the best test of statesmanship, and the thing of all others in which those hon. gentlemen have most signally and most disastrously failed. What has their National Policy done to increase the population of Canada? Why, Sir, in these ten years to which that hon. gentleman appealed, the records of the census which he dared not quote, show that of our own population at least half a million are missing, and of the 900,000 people who were brought to Canada at our expense, scarcely 150,000 could be found in Canada when we came to count noses in the census of 1891. Sir, I will tell the hon. gentleman what they have been successful in doing, what our annals show only too well they have been successful in doing. They have been successful in breeding the grossest political corruption which this country or perhaps any other country has ever seen. My hon. friend laughs. He thinks it is a trifle that we should have witnessed such scenes as those we witnessed in the session of 1891; he thinks it is a trifle that a Minister of State, standing in the very place I now occupy, should dare to tell the people of Canada that he had spent $112,000 in corrupting, or trying to corrupt, fruitlessly. I am glad to say, in most cases, some twenty constituencies in the province of Quebec, and that he was prepared to do the same thing again. Sir, the hon. gentleman prates to us of the duty of accepting the will of the people. I say let him accept the will of the people as recorded now. I say to him that we would have been ready enough to accept the will of the people if there had been any ground for believing that that will had been honestly or fairly declared. But were we going to accept a verdict such as that recorded in the province of Ontario where fifty-four constituencies were deliberately gerrymandered, prepared for the general election of 1882? Where the franchise Bill had practically disfranchised, in a great many counties, something like the sixth or seventh part of the voters? And when we know, as I have just stated the scandals of 1891 show only too clearly that these things were backed up by an almost unlimited corruption fund in the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite? Sir, I say that since 1878 to 1896 there was no occasion, more particularly in the province of Ontario, where the result of the general elections could be said to have declared the real will of the people, and even in 1896, we were largely handicapped, and we lost many seats that we ought otherwise to have won, by reason of that same Franchise Act and Gerrymander Bill.

Sir, the hon. gentleman is continually sneering at the prospects of obtaining reciprocity. Well, far abler men than the hon. gentleman, leaders of whom the Liberal-Conservative party had good reason to be proud in many respects, acknowledged over their own hand and signature time and again, on the floor of Parliament and in state papers addressed to our friends on the other side of the water, that reciprocity was the very greatest boon that could be bestowed on the Canadian people. In 1876, and in 1877, and in 1878, too, no men were louder than those men in proclaiming that the object of the protectionist movement was to obtain reciprocity with the United States. Will the hon. leader of the Opposition deny that one of the arguments he used in the maritime provinces was that if he were permitted to get the National Policy into operation, he would have reciprocity within two years? No, he does not deny it, to do him justice. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman desires to know what we think about it. Well, we think reciprocity is a most desirable thing to secure, alike in the interests of Canada and in the interests of the British Empire. But we admit that it takes two to make a bargain; and we admit, further, that the failure of the late Parliament in 1888, in 1889, and in 1890, and the worse than failure of the then Ministers of Canada, have done a great deal to raise up barriers, and prevent a fair and honest understanding between ourselves and the people of the United States. Sir, I well believe that these barriers will disappear, and very shortly; I well believe that under a better Government, and an honest Government, when once we show the people of the United States what we ought to have shown them long ago, that we desire a fair and honest treaty with them, I have no doubt we shall obtain a good hearing, and I have no doubt that we shall have a very good prospect of negotiating a satisfactory reciprocity treaty.

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman, above all things, is desirous of knowing what our policy is on this same trade question. For the benefit of those hon. gentlemen who were not here during the late debates on this question, I propose to give the hon. gentleman in detail what our policy was, and what our policy is, on that question, as formulated by the Liberal party in a full convention where all sections of Canada were represented—a thing, let me add, which the Liberal-Conservative party have not shown the least disposition to do. Sir, the hon. gentleman read one sentence or two, and I will give him more. We declared here in formal convention, and by that decision the hon. gentleman has a right to expect we shall be bound—we declared:

That the custom tariff of the Dominion should be based, not as it is now, upon the protective principle, but upon the requirements of the public service;

That the existing tariff, founded upon an un-sound principle, and used, as it has been by the Government, as a corrupting agency wherewith to keep themselves in office, has developed monopolies, trusts and combinations;

It has decreased the value of farm and other landed property;

It has oppressed the masses to the enrichment of a few;

It has checked immigration;

It has caused great loss of population;

It has impeded commerce;

It has discriminated against Great Britain.

As the hon. gentleman knows right well, and as our returns show in the clearest possible manner.

In these and many other ways it has occasioned great public and private injury, all of which evils must continue to grow in intensity as long as the present tariff system remains in force.

That the highest interests of Canada demand a removal of this obstacle to our country's progress, by the adoption of a sound fiscal policy, which, while not doing injustice to any class, will promote domestic and foreign trade, and hasten the return of prosperity to our people;

That to that end, the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical and efficient government;

That it should be so adjusted as to make free, or to bear as lightly as possible upon, the necessities of life, and should be so arranged as to promote freer trade with the whole world, more particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

And, Sir, we wind up by declaring:

That issue we unhesitatingly accept, and upon it we await with the fullest confidence the verdict of the citizens of Canada.

Which was given on the 23rd June, given on that issue as well as on many other issues. There is what the hon. gentleman wanted, a clear and definite enunciation of the principle on which our tariff revision is going to be based. I do not think that he or any of the gentlemen sitting beside him would find it easy, in a mere declaration of principles, without going into details, to add anything to the statement which I have now read.

Mr. FOSTER. I would call my hon. friend's attention to his leader, who was just going to sleep.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I think you will find that my hon. friend is a good deal too wide awake to be influenced by your sophistries, although, after having stood the strain of trying to listen for three hours to the hon. gentleman, human nature might be pardoned for indulging in a few winks. Now, Sir, this Government propose to carry out their policy as there enunciated; this Government proposes to do that carefully and deliberately, so as to redeem to the best of their power their solemn declaration that they would not do any injustice, so far as in them lay, to any class or interest in this country. This Government proposes to weigh the whole situation at home and abroad. We know perfectly well that Canada, whatever great resources she may possess, and her resources are great, must of necessity more or less depend on other countries with whom her commerce is chiefly carried on. We cannot be blamed, we would deserve censure, it would be an imprudent and impolitic act in the highest degree, as my hon. friend has said, to approach the people of the United States for an extension of our trading facilities with them at this time when that country is convulsed by one of the most desperate political struggles ever known in its history. We must have time—and I tell the hon. gentleman we will take time—but the Government know their duty and mean to do it. Moreover, the Government do not propose to be coaxed, bullied or humbugged into taking a step until they have well and maturely considered it. We know, and the hon. gentleman when he sat here realized it in some degree at all events, the very great responsibility resting on those who for the time being are endeavouring to manage the affairs of five millions of their fellow-countrymen in a country like Canada. We admit that, we feel that responsibility, and as I have said, we propose to act in accordance with it. For one moment allow me to pause to review some of the declarations made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) with respect to the proofs, as he alleged, of the unexampled prosperity in Canada as shown by the census of 1891. Sir, that matter has surely been threshed out often enough; surely the so-called facts which the hon. gentleman presented a few moments ago have been dealt with time and time again, not only on the floor of this Parliament, but I venture to say, on every hustings in the country. But if the hon. gentleman—and I apologize to this House and to every member of it for being compelled to go over this ancient history—will force us to go back over these matters, I will call the attention of the House to the value of some of those statistics the hon. gentleman has quoted so glibly. The hon. gentleman was good enough to tell us that five and twenty thousand new industrial establishments had been added in those ten years to the average number of industrial establishments in Canada. But he did not tell the House that in all human probability of those five and twenty thousand establishments added, no less than twenty-two thousand were run by one man and a half on the average. Why, I will give the hon. gentleman an example. I have here the list of manufacturers in the town of Strathroy. Strathroy in 1881 contained 3,000 souls, all told, and it was reported as having 131 industrial establishments—131 industrial establishments to 3,000 souls—and of those 131 establishments no less than 11 employed an average of 10 hands, the remainder about a hand and a half each. I see that in Mount Forest there were 88 industrial establishments to about 2,500 souls, and five of those establishments appeared to have employed ten hands each. My hon. friend who sits behind me (Mr. Flint) will be pleased to know that Yarmouth reported 145 industrial establishments, 125 of those employing one hand and a half each. Owen Sound was reported as having 135 similar industrial establishments; Aylmer, 71; Blenheim, 54, with a population of 1,000 souls; and not to do any injustice to my hon. friend behind me, (Mr. Brown), Caughnawaga is reported as having 60 industrial establishments, mostly occupied in manufacturing birch bark baskets. It is simply folly for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) to seek to ignore those facts, for he is perfectly well aware that those so-called 25,000 industrial establishments simply and solely represent the fact that in their extreme distress hon. gentlemen opposite were obliged, when in power, to pay their census enumerators so much per head for discovering new industries, and their industry in that respect was indeed remarkable. In one county in Nova Scotia they discovered 91 new industries, carried on by 91 old women, earning $15 in the course of the year each. I ask in all seriousness what valuable purpose the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) expects to serve by reiterating for the fiftieth time these oft-exploded fallacies in our ears. If the hon. gentleman and his friends could have pointed to an addition to the population of Canada of two or three millions of people who had come to this country during the eighteen years they held the reins of office, whose presence here could in any shape or form be attributed to their policy. I would say to them: Although your policy may have been expensive, extravagant and even corrupt, still there is something to show for the time you have occupied the Treasury benches. But as every man knows to-day, if there is one fact more than another that strikes attention it is that an enormous mass of our population, the very flower of our population, has gone from amongst us, and until now there has been no reasonable hope of bringing them back or keeping them when they come here. I say that one cause of the exodus—I do not say it is the only cause—is the enormous mass of taxation heaped on our people, and the general loss of prosperity which, so far as my section of the country is concerned, attended the inception of the policy of the hon. gentleman's policy. Does not the hon. gentleman know, and if he does not know, every man who represents an agricultural constituency knows full well, that I am speaking within the mark when I say that in almost every class of agricultural products which the farmer raises there was a shrinkage of more than one-third in price compared with sixteen or seventeen years ago; also that the value of land property in the towns, villages and farms of Canada has shrunk enormously within that period. The hon. gentleman talks of the amount accumulated in the savings banks. I have said often before to the hon. gentleman, and I repeat it now, that I do not appreciate the importance which may be attached here to the value of certain conditions as indications of prosperity; but it is not to my mind a sign of prosperity that to-day in a great many towns and villages in Ontario particularly, and I dare say it is the same in other provinces, you will find in the banks hundreds, thousands of dollars, and yet in the market place you will see half a dozen farms put up at auction—and I have seen it—and no bidder to be found. Sir, the hon. gentleman contends that conditions have changed since 1878. In part it is true—the conditions have changed, for the worse. Then we had only about $24,000,000 to provide; now we have very much nearer $40,000,000 to raise. Then our debt was a mere fraction per head of the debt of the people of the United States; now our debt is double or treble that of the people of the adjacent republic. Sir, the conditions truly have been changed and for the worse, and it is to the great detriment of the progress of the people of Canada, that they should have so changed. It is most true that eighteen years of folly, fraud, and falsehood have left many a deep taint on the national heart and the national conscience, and I do not pretend to say—I never have pretended to say—that the mischief which was done to Canada in these eighteen years can be undone in an afternoon. I know full well that many glorious opportunities have been lost by the folly and incapacity of these hon. gentlemen opposite. In the North-west alone they well nigh fooled a whole Empire away, and without putting enough money in our treasury to pay for the boundary stakes that marked it off. But for all that, I cannot and do not take such a pessimistic view of the subject as my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) does. I believe what he does not believe. I believe in Canadians, and I believe in Canadian enterprise and Canadian energy. I believe that with a fair field Canadian manufacturers and Canadian farmers above all, and Canadian producers of every class can hold their own, and will hold their own, when they are relieved from the crushing burdens of debt and taxation which now rest upon them. I do believe that a better day is dawning upon us, and perhaps not the least evidence of it is, that all this senseless clamour on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, who will not learn to take their medicine quietly; all this senseless clamour has so far failed utterly, and is likely to fail utterly, to produce the slightest impression on the popular mind outside of this House, or in it for that matter. I cannot compliment the hon. gentlemen opposite on their tactics. I like to see the game well played, and I am bound to say that so far—although they may perhaps improve under the wholesome discipline of opposition—so far they have not shown much tactical skill in the grounds selected for attack. I do not think they themselves are disposed to say that the attack on the Governor General's warrants, by the use of which alone we were able to avert grave disaster and confusion from the trade of this country, was a brilliant success. If they do, I think they are entirely single in their opinion. I do not think that even the hon. gentleman who sits opposite to me (Sir Charles Tupper) would be disposed to rise in his place and declare that the attack on His Excellency was altogether a brilliant success. To use a favourite phrase of hon. gentlemen opposite, I am in the judgment of the House whether these various attempts on their part to rebuke my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Blair) for his zeal in purging the civil service from active partisans has resulted in anything except the exposure of their own methods, and the showing of how very completely they had turned great public institutions into partisan machines. So far they have all fallen as flat as ditch water, and I am inclined to think that in spite of the admitted eloquence of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) this most foolish censure of his is going to do the same. Now, I will take him (Mr. Foster) and the House into my confidence. I have not the slightest doubt myself that had we done otherwise, had my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) and his Government come down with their tariff when this House met, had they proposed then and there to inaugurate great fiscal changes, I have not the slightest doubt that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) would have raised his voice in the most emphatic and inveterate denunciation of the reckless, inconsiderate, and mischievous conduct of my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) for presuming to meddle with the tariff at such short notice. He (Mr. Foster) would have pointed out how unjust it was to the importers, to the manufacturers, and to the producers of Canada. He is quite capable of making as lively a turn as was ever made by any man—I won't say as was made by the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) beside him, because his memory and mine are at variance on the facts, and, of course, I am bound to accept his statement. This I will say, that I am perfectly certain that he would, and with much better cause than he has done to-night, that he would have severely condemned our hasty precipitation, if in a matter in which such grave and important interests were involved, we had presumed to act almost before our Cabinet could be got together, and certainly before several of its most important members had had time to become acquainted with the very officers of their departments. He would, I say, have condemned us without stint and without remorse, if we had ventured to introduce the tariff this session.

ST: RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

I will tell the hon. gentleman this further: that apart from the gentlemen on his side of the House who support him and who may find themselves compelled to sustain the position he has taken, I do not believe that he will find half a dozen intelligent and capable business men from one end of this Dominion of Canada to the other, who, whatever else they may say or think about the conduct of the Government, will not admit that it is the duty of Government most assuredly on the present occasion, to think well and to move deliberately and cautiously before they propose any important changes in the fiscal system of this country.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member (Sir Richard Cartwright) who has just taken his seat, did not attempt to reply to the long sustained and masterly argument of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster). It was one of the most able speeches ever delivered in this House by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) although many of his past addresses have been comparable with the best efforts of financial eloquence in any Parliament. Now, Mr. Speaker, the aphasia, the epidemic of want of memory of which my hon. friend the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) has spoken, has fallen on other gentlemen opposite besides those who occupy the Treasury-benches. When the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) interrupted the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) and pitted his memory against the memory of the leader of the Opposition, he (Mr. Wood) forgot that we could send to the library for "Hansard" to substantiate the assertions that were made from this side of the House. Before I proceed to deal with the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) I will ask the House to give me its attention while I point out how inaccurate was the statement, in the form of interruption, that was made by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) declared that in 1876 the Minister of Finance of that day made a speech introducing his budget, that he concluded that speech by a quarter past five o'clock, and that then the Hon. Mr. Tupper, the present hon. member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper) asked that it should be called 6 o'clock. Now, all the business in the shape of questions which usually takes place had been transacted that day, before the then Finance Minister (Sir Richard Cartwright) rose to make his budget speech, and at the conclusion of his speech the "Hansard" says:

The Hon. Mr. Tupper rose to reply, but the hour being six o'clock, the House took recess.

The speech of the Finance Minister (Sir Richard Cartwright) occupies from page 241 to page 262 in "Hansard," and those of us who have had experience of the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) can readily suppose that the minute hand must have been touching near upon the XII twelve, and that the hour hand must have been biting close to VI 6 o'clock when the then Finance Minister (Sir Richard Cartwright) took his seat. But, Sir, the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) was asked a question which he was very unwilling to answer, as to what his own principles were at that time; and here we have a speech made by him in this House on 16th February, 1876, on a motion dealing with the financial depression, and this is what he says:

I think the commercial men of this country have a right to be thankful to the hon. gentleman for the anxiety he is manifesting in their interest. If the hon. gentleman, instead of asking for a committee, would go among the manufacturers of this country, he would get all the information he required before the end of the session. If he goes to the hon. member for South Leeds and asks why his manufactory is closed, he would learn that the country is flooded with American manufactures, which are sold at prices which render competition impossible. If he goes to the hon. member for Cornwall and asks why the cotton factory there is idle, he will find that it is because they cannot compete with American cottons. Is the hon. gentleman aware that the Americans are sending furniture into Hamilton and other Canadian cities and having it auctioned for what it will bring? And this is not confined to furniture, but in almost every class of goods manufactured in the United States, it is the same. I ask the hon. gentleman why it is, if that country has been protected to death, as he says it has, that its manufactures are taking the place of English goods? In 1872 we imported from the United States of cabinet ware or furniture, $122,070; in 1873, $220,457; in 1874, $311,476; and in 1875, $328,536.

And he goes on, making a very able protectionist speech, in the course of which he quotes a paragraph from Horace Greely, which might well be pondered at the present time, in relation to the argument of my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster), in relation especially to the splendid appeal which my hon. friend made for labour in this country, at the close of his speech. Horace Greely points out that in the United States, even as things were, they had enough men looking for employment without introducing a tariff that would strike labour hard. Not merely did the hon. gentleman make that speech, but on a subsequent occasion he also spoke at considerable length in Supply advocating the National Policy. So that the want of memory that has prevailed on the Treasury benches is an aphasia that has extended to some of the subordinate members of the party.

I will ask the attention of the House for a very short time while I point out how completely the hon. member for South Oxford has failed to make any case for the position taken by the Ministry of the day. The hon. member for York reviewed the history of the varied changes of untried being through which the Liberal party had passed. He showed how, from time to time, they had taken up one cry after another, and pointed out how at last, in 1893, they appeared to fix upon a definite policy. He went on to point out that unrestricted reciprocity still seemed to cling to their policy, although the leader of the Government had declared for free trade as it is in England; and he said their policy to-day is delay, unrestricted reciprocity, discrimination against England. Then, he went on to point out that there was the greatest danger to the commercial affairs of this country, to the importer as well as to the manufacturer, to the labourer as well as to the capitalist, in consequence of the suspense that the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite entailed. Well, Sir, what is the answer of the hon. member for South Oxford to that? The answer of the hon. member for South Oxford would be a cogent answer, if the party for which he is the mouthpiece had not proclaimed for some years back, but especially since 1893, that they thoroughly understood the condition of the country and had a policy in their pocket that would cure it of all its ills. To use the figure again and again used by the hon. First Minister when he was leader of the Opposition, he described himself as a doctor and said: "The country is suffering from serious ills; call me in and then I will prescribe." He talked as a doctor who had diagnosed the condition of the patient. He is called in, and what does he do? He wants a commission of inquiry; he wants to have other doctors called in—doctors that he objected to the hon. member for York calling in when he was Finance Minister, but that he thinks he may call in with perfect appropriateness. The hon. member for South Oxford made only one attempt at an answer, because all the rest of his speech was the mere ramfudge of the echo of old speeches. With the exception of one sentence in that speech, there was not a single sentence that was not the stale echo of stale speeches which he has delivered in this House and elsewhere.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say "Oh;" but the country is sufficiently represented here, even though hon. members on that side of the House take flight when I rise up to reply to him. The country is well enough represented, both by the press and otherwise, to hear what I have to say about a Government which in its infancy shows the pallor of death. I have been a student of politics for twenty-five years, and I tell the leader of the Government that never in the history of any government that I have had an opportunity of studying, or any government that I have read of, did a fatal delicacy so rapidly manifest itself as in the Government of the hon. gentleman. Why, before it is well out of the cradle, it has the rickets. Before it is well out of the cradle, a fatal disease has seized on it, and within the last fortnight it has gone rapidly back. So I intend to-night to deal with the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford, and I will deal first with the only sentence in that speech that could be considered as an answer to the speech of my hon. friend. The hon. member says: "We are to deliberate; we are to take plenty of time." That, of course, is all right, if they have not their policy. That is all right, if their policy is not to be revenue tariff. For instance, he takes as an illustration what was done by my hon. friend from York, as Finance Minister. In 1893, when my hon. friend determined to revise the tariff, he and Mr. Angers, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) and my hon. friend from Brockville (Mr. Wood), went through the country to meet the manufacturers; and what, Sir, occurred in this House? Why, when we remember what occurred, it requires unbounded effrontery for the hon. member for South Oxford to make the speech he has made here to-night. We had the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) rising up in this House and making a motion condemning the Government for delay. I have the motion here, and I have not merely the motion, but I have the words of the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government, supporting the motion. That motion condemned the Government of that day because forsooth they took delay to inquire, although it was perfectly right for them to inquire because they were going to revise the tariff on a protectionist basis, and revising it on such a basis meant carefully going into every detail and incident of the finances of the country. But there is no such thing required if you are going to have a revenue tariff. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce says that the Government must first find out how much revenue requires to be raised before taking any other step. That would be all right, if we had not the record of these gentlemen protesting against any such course. I may say, in passing, that the reason of that inconsistency is to be found in the fact that they are a party without principle and a Government without a policy. They are a party that has not thought out any principles. What they have done is, year after year, to throw out any catch-word that they thought might take with the public, just as a fisherman throws out a fly. When he finds that a fly with a red wing is not successful in making the trout rise, he tries a fly with a blue wing ; and so hon. gentlemen opposite have gone on from year to year trying in what way they could best bamboozle the public and get into power. Sir, it is an incongruous party from every point of view, and the position taken by the Government on this very question is a fit expression of what that party is. I have never hesitated to say that I admire the leader of the Government. He stands apart from his party, and when leading the Opposition I sometimes, if I may be allowed to quote Longfellow, thought that some lines of that poet were peculiarly applicable to him as contrasted with his party :

It seems to me a stagnant fen,
Grown o'er with rushes and with reeds,
Where a white lily, now and then,
Blooms in the midst of noxious weeds,
And deadly nightshade on its banks.

Amid the deadly night shade and noxious weeds, the fairest lily blooms, and thus amongst the then Opposition stood their hon. leader. As somebody said of Apollo and his muses :

The leader was fairest,
But all were divine.

But, Mr. Speaker, I could not say all were divine.

With the facts that I am about to bring before the House, it required a boundless audacity on the part of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to make the remark that I have just referred to. In 1893, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) made the following motion :—

That since the introduction of the protective system sufficient time has elapsed for the establishment and development of such manufacturing industries as under existing conditions can be successfully carried on in Canada. Moreover, many manufacturers sheltered behind the rampart thus erected have formed combinations and trusts which prohibit competition and create and maintain monopolies.

That the existing tariff, defensible only as a protective measure has proved in many instances oppressive and burdensome to the great mass of the consuming classes and especially to those engaged in agricultural pursuits ; is unfair and unequal in its incidence and has been productive of discontent verging on disloyalty among those who suffer from its injustice.

That no sufficient reason has been adduced or exists requiring investigation respecting the foregoing facts which are notorious, nor justifying delay in the passage of remedial legislation which is imperative.

That in the opinion of this House, the tariff ought to be at once amended in respect of the matters herein indicated and also by the substantial reduction of customs duties in favour of the United Kingdom.

And so on.

Well that was only the resolution of the hon. member for North Simcoe, and notwithstanding the eulogy that was poured on him to-night by the hon. member for South Oxford, I may say that although I would highly prize any opinion he gave on a point of law, on a matter of economic policy the opinion of the hon. member for North Simcoe would be to me lighter than the dust in the balance. In the course of the speech made by the present leader of the Government on that resolution, he said :

Then, Sir, the conclusion which is asserted by the hon. member for Simcoe, is that in the opinion of this House the tariff ought to be at once amended in respect of the matters herein indicated. What matters ? That is to say, the tariff ought to be amended so as to remove the shelter behind which combines take refuge in order to exact from the people of Canada extortionate profits ; that it should be amended at once in order to remove from the shoulders of the farmers the burden of taxation which they now carry ; that it should be amended at once in order to remove the discontent which is spreading through the land to such an extent as to make the future of this country perhaps doubtful. Now, Sir, for these reasons I am prepared to vote for the motion of the hon. gentleman ; for these reasons, which we have asserted again and again on this side of the House, I am prepared to cast my vote in favour of this motion. The principal proposition which is laid down there seems to me to be true, and the conclusion drawn from it appears to me to be a logical conclusion, and to be based upon the facts herein set forth. While I say emphatically, and without hesitation, and without the slightest equivocation, that I am prepared to vote for the motion of the hon. gentleman for the reasons I have given.

That was from the hon. gentleman leading the Government, and to-day we have one of his colleagues, a subordinate, telling us that they must take plenty of time to decide how and what they are going to do. But there is something more to be said concerning the position of the leader of the Government. This is what he said on the motion condemning the policy of the Government of that day in asking for delay to revise the tariff. The hon. member for South Oxford said that we must find out how much revenue we want. What that means is this that this Government may not be able to take off perhaps anything from the tariff lest they should not raise enough revenue to meet expenses. But the Government cannot take that position. In 1894, August 20th, the leader of the Government thus spoke at Brantford :

There can be no justification for such an expenditure, the great bulk of which is a corrupt expenditure. Moreover, they tell us that if we were in power, we could not retrench and economize. I do not believe that it would be a very difficult task to retrench to the extent of one, two or three millions, and my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) told his constituents a few days ago that it was possible to retrench to the extent of four million dollars a year.

Two years ago, the leader of the Government knew it was possible to retrench to the extent of two or three millions, and one of his then colleagues, a distinguished Reform leader, said four millions ; but now that the hon. gentleman who leads the Government has got into power, he says he must take time to ascertain whether he can make any retrenchment. But surely if the hon. gentleman was in a position two years ago, to say that millions could be taken off the expenditure, the people have something to complain of when, now that he is in power, he hesitates and delays and asks time for inquiry. Again, the same night, speaking at Peel, he said :

And the Conservatives do not shrink from it but swallow it all. If we came into power, we will follow the example of Mr. Mackenzie, and I say that although we may not be able to bring the expenditures to what they were under him, we can reduce the amount from two to three million dollars a year.

Is there any excuse for the leader of the Government, under those circumstances, in not bringing forward a measure of retrenchment? We have his own words depicting the very attitude he takes. I have shown what he said in September, 1893, on the motion of the hon. member for North Simcoe. I have shown that he said that we should at once act. And here is a speech made at that famous convention in the Rideau Park, and here is what he says about the delay of Sir John Thompson in lopping the mouldering branches away. Sir John Thompson had stated in January that he would lop away the mouldering branches. Two months elapsed and he did not take away the mouldering branches, and he sent out a committee of inquiry. The present leader of the Government condemns that step. He says :

Sir John Thompson, at the Board of Trade banquet in Toronto, told a large audience that the Government would be prepared next session to lop off some mouldering branches. When we came to the session we were fully prepared to see the Government lop off these mouldering branches; but we found that the Government had changed their views, and what were mouldering branches in January like the rod of Moses, became flowering boughs in March. They had no alteration to make.

So that when addressing this famous convention, we find him condemning a delay of two months on the part of a Conservative Government, a protectionist Government, in making a revision on protectionist lines, which everybody knows requires careful examination. And now here we have a declaration that this is a revenue tariff Government, and that he is not going, even now, to declare the general principles of his policy. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) says the Government is asked to bring down a tariff at ten days' notice. Ten days' notice! Why, they were proclaiming through the country that they were coming into power, and for more than three years they declared that the country was in a sad state economically, and they should not have spoken in that way unless they were confident that if they were brought into power they could apply the remedy. And I say,

Mr. Speaker, that the people throughout this country understood from their language that if they came into power they would redress the grievances that they declared then existed. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is an excuse made for the position taken by the Government that was not given by the hon. member for South Oxford. It is said that a delay until January is not a long delay; the House will meet in January, and then the revision will take place. What guarantee have we, Sir, that the House will meet in January, or that if it does meet in January, the revision will take place? We heard to-night from the hon. member for South Oxford hesitating words on that subject; and I have here an article from a paper which has become an organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, although up to the time of the Reform party coming into power it was a protectionist paper—that is the "Weekly Sun." That paper, on August 26th, in an article headed "Mr. Fielding's Task," declared that the Finance Minister had a difficult task before him, that there were rocks ahead, and that it was a pity he would have to deal with this matter in January :

Mr. McKinley is almost certain to be elected in November; he will take office in March and will soon know what he and his friends are going to do in the way of tariff legislation, or rather what they can do with the Senate constituted as it is.

Now, Sir, that and the language of the hon. member for South Oxford to-night justify the belief that we have no right whatever to entertain strong hopes that in January this matter will be dealt with. And let me say here in passing what interests the people of the North-west very much who have listened to the language of the hon. gentleman at Moose Jaw, at Regina, and at Winnipeg. All over the west the hon. gentleman declared he was going to bring in free trade as it was in England, and his followers declared they were going to have free implements in the North-west; and I may say that from one end of the North-west to the other, and all over Manitoba, there is the strongest belief among the farmers that they will have their implements in free. Very well, Sir, the people of the North-west say: If you are going to do this, do it so that the farmers can have the advantage of it by next year. You have spoken the word of promise to the ear, do not break it in the act. I must not refer to a previous debate save by way of illustration, but I may say that this was referred to in this House by a member from the North-west supporting the Government, and if the leader of the Government will read the North-west papers, he will find that the Grit papers supporting the hon. gentleman have not supported his follower in some matters regarding which the hon. member had adversely criticised me, but have supported me, and they condemn his follower for the course he took in not supporting me. We are told that we have only to wait until January. Sir, with such a statement as this in the "Sun," and with such a statement as we have had from the hon. member for South Oxford, what guarantee have we that the House will meet in January, what guarantee have we that the suggestion in the "Sun" will not be adopted, and delay take place? The "Sun" goes on to say:

It is preposterous to talk of making Ontario a manufacturing centre while she is cut off by heavy duties.

And further on it points out how difficult it will be to make any changes:

To pull down the whole fabric just now would be to precipitate a financial crash. Mr. Fielding will have to move carefully at first, and those who fought for a sweeping reform must wait till the times are propitious.

Now, Sir, we did not hear from the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) to-night. What we heard to-night was the language of a discarded financial servant; the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) no longer speaks with the authority of the financial leader of the House. It seemed to me that he spoke in a jejune and feeble manner compared with the screaming, eagle-like notes we used to hear from him when he was on this side of the House. But he has been tamed with the taming process that sometimes takes away a man's spirit. My hon. friends from the North-west know that if you break a broncho too quickly and sandbag him into docility, you make him very tame, but he loses his spirit. The hon. gentleman has been sandbagged into docility, and has not the spirit he used to have. If you go into the zoological gardens in London amongst all the sad sights one sees there, the saddest to a well-balanced mind is that of the eagles in one huge cage. They look drooped and spiritless. Their feathers are without beauty and gloss. Their home is in the clouds or on the lofty crag, and they are not to be brought into bondage with impunity. The hon. member for South Oxford has been brought into captivity, and he has been placed in a position where he can do little harm; in fact, he no longer speaks with authority, but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) can repudiate him as easily as he repudiated the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) the other night; and if he should stand up and repudiate the hon. member for South Oxford we should see that we have a Government not only of discordant principles, but still more emphatically of mutual repudiation. Now, there is no hypercriticism on my part in suggesting that we have no right to build on the hopes that in January this matter will be dealt with. Let me speak for a moment about the Reformers throughout the country who have looked forward to free trade being introduced; let me speak for those who have looked forward to promises big with all sorts of glowing hopes that have been held out to them.

Mr. BRITTON. Speak of the returning officers.

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, my hon. friend from Kingston has attempted to make a joke. Well, as some one said of a man who played Romeo in Romeo and Juliet, that he had not the figure for Romeo; and my hon. friend has not the figure for a joker. I think he may leave the monopoly of buffoonery on that side to the hon. member for Grey. I want to show how little foundation we have for building any hope on statements that were made by the leader of the Government. Now, we know very well that anything that gives expression to a great political truth, often strikes the character of a public man, and strikes what is in the public mind. Sir, there is a humorous paper published in Montreal called "Le Canard," that I think may safely be said to be a supporter of the leader of the Government. It refers to something that was very graceful in the course of the canvass of the hon. gentleman who leads the House. In the course of his peripatations throughout the country, nothing was more graceful, nothing was more beautiful than to see a charming little girl come up and present a bouquet to the hon. gentleman, and then receive a delicate osculation. Well, "Le Canard" gives an account of a dialogue between the mother of one of these interesting maidens, and the maiden herself. After having drilled the maiden in the part she was to play, the mother says to her:

Après avoir été embrassée par M. Laurier, tu te marieras comme tu voudras.

ROSE.—Mais pas avec lui, je suppose?

LA MERE.—Non, ma fille; M. Laurier embrasse, mais n'épouse pas.

I will translate that into English. The mother says: "After you have been kissed by Mr. Laurier, you will marry whom you wish." Then says the maiden: "But not with him, I suppose." "No, my child," says the mother, "not with Mr. Laurier. Mr. Laurier kisses, but he does not marry." That is to say he makes promises but he does not fulfil them. "M. Laurier embrasse, mais il n'épouse pas." Now, what I am afraid of is that these people who have trusted to the protestations of the hon. gentleman, will find that he does not intend to implement his promises. That is the way it strikes me at the present time. As I have referred to the North-west, let me finish that reference. When the contest was going on, Mr. Grant, who was one of the candidates of the hon. gentleman in the North-west, ran over the history concerning the advent of the National Policy:

Protection was wrong in principle because it accorded to one man the right to grow rich at the expense of his fellowmen. No man is born with the right to make a serf of his fellowman.

* * * * * If Mr. Laurier goes back on tariff reform, I will go back on Mr. Laurier. I will uphold no Government who will be kind to these individuals at the expense of the people.

In my canvass I argued that the statements made by men supporting a leader who declared for a revenue tariff, were impossible of fulfilment. The statements were made that if the hon. gentleman got into power he would take the duty entirely off implements, and I argued that these statements were without foundation, and would never have any fulfilment. If the hon. gentleman is going to do that, there is no reason why it should not be done now. If the hon. gentleman is going to give us a revenue tariff, there is no reason whatever why the tariff should not have been arranged, not after ten days, but after two or three years of advocacy of that policy.

The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) commenced by saying that the importers were not dissatisfied. Mr. Speaker, that is not the fact, as I find it. I have spoken to some importers, and I have spoken to tradesmen, meaning shopkeepers, and I find the same answer from them as from the manufacturers. The manufacturers tell me that they are now paralyzed by the uncertainty, and the tradesmen tell me that trade is already injured, and they are looking forward to a blue winter. If that be so, and if the manufacturers speak by the book when they say they are paralysed, what is the answer of the hon. member for South Oxford? What is the answer of that experienced financier to my hon. friend? He says the importers actually asked the head of the Government not to make his tariff reform too soon. Now, Sir, I am inclined strongly to doubt that. I do not like to say it is not true, but the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce might have given us some names of importers who asked that his change in the tariff should not be made too soon. He says the importers want to get rid of their goods. What the importers want to do, then, is to lose a whole year of business to void their shelves and get rid of all their stock, and then wait with their hands clasped and their thumbs moving one round the other, until a month after January, or two, or three, or four, or six, or nine, or ten months from now, when the hon. gentleman comes down with his tariff reform, or comes down with his revenue tariff or to say they had not been able to make up their minds. And we may have another year of suspense and another year of delay. Now, the hon. gentleman for York very properly said that in his opinion no mandate had been given by the people of Canada to the present Government to deal with the tariff. Can anybody doubt that? What has Ontario done, the great manufacturing province? We know very well what was the real battle cry in Ontario which greatly affected the constituencies, and notwithstanding that it did, Ontario disappointed everybody who knew Ontario; it disappointed agreeably those of us who know Ontario well. No man who knew Ontario could have expected that with such a question in the forefront and flame of the battle, she would have given such a following to my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper). Nobody could have expected it, and what is the explanation? The only explanation is that Ontario was true to the core to the National Policy. Then look at the other provinces. Now, you must remember that the Government is supported by one pillar, and that pillar rises from the province from whence you yourself (Mr. Deputy Speaker Brodeur) come. That is the sole support, practically, of the Government, and we know well that the tariff had nothing whatever to do with giving the hon. gentleman that support. Why, I may say to you, Mr. Speaker, that a friend of mine was at the Basilica in Quebec, when the mandament of the Bishops was read, which, when first read sounded in the ears of the congregations as if the Bishops wished the people to support my hon. friend the member for Cape Breton. But what did the people say: They called out "Ils peuvent aller au diable"—we will now have a man of our own as Prime Minister. I might as well translate the French literally. It will be: they may go to hell, because we have now a man of our own and we will vote for him.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). Do I understand that he heard that said?

Mr. DAVIN. Yes.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Will the hon. gentleman give the authority?

Mr. DAVIN. Am I bound to do that? I will do nothing of the kind.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Then there must be some reason for it.

Mr. DAVIN. As the hon. gentleman has challenged me, I say that in Winnipeg a friend of mine was at St. Mary's—

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I was asking the hon. gentleman about Quebec.

Mr. DAVIN. But I am going to Winnipeg; and I will come back to Quebec if I like. At Winnipeg a friend of mine went into St. Mary's, and a clergyman at the close of the service called the men to the railing, said to them: There is to be an election in a few days, and what you should do—he spoke in French—is to vote for a Catholic and vote for a Frenchman. My friend, who is a good Catholic, knew what that meant, but he did not act on it. No doubt, however, it had its influence. The Solicitor General can have dozens of names of people who heard similar utterances, if he is deeply interested in the matter. If there was any point in it, I would give the hon. gentleman the name. He does not doubt my word?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). There is no point in it—that is quite enough.

Mr. DAVIN. No point in it! We will now see what "Le Canard" says with respect to this matter. That paper, like other papers of the kind, often hits the public sentiment, and it is a paper which supports the Government. It has a cartoon in which the leader of the Government is represented as holding in his left hand a hoop on which is written "Province of Quebec." In his right hand is a whip, and there are seven dogs, and the Premier cries:

En avant, la musique! Le spectacle va commencer; et si quelqu'un veut regimber, gare au fouet.

The dog Ontario is leaping through the hoop, and New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, North-west Territories, Manitoba, British Columbia and Prince Edward Island are represented as dogs over which he is about to crack the whip sending them through a hoop of triumph labelled "Quebec." That expresses a certain opinion.

Mr. LEMIEUX. "Le Canard" is edited by Mr. Lasalle, one of the translators of the "Hansard," whom the hon. gentleman defended in the committee.

Mr. DAVIN. If he is so, I can easily understand how we found the Liberal members of that committee ready to let Mr. Lasalle off. In looking through the paper I find it is clearly in favour of the leader of the Government.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Excuse me, but the majority of the Liberal members of the committee desired to have him dismissed.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman was one of those who most persistently barked at him. I will accept what the leader of the Government said—I will accept the suggestion made by the hon. and learned Solicitor General. The suggestion is this, that behind such remarks as those reported to me as having been uttered there is no point whatever, and there was nothing whatever in the view expressed by one of the hon. members from Montreal, who said that in his constituency some of the people said they were voting for the hon. gentleman who is now leader of the Government because he was one of themselves. We will say there is no point in this. What, then, is the significance of the large majority given in Quebec except that it is the most pronounced protectionist province in all Canada? There is another explanation, and it is that Quebec must be the province of all the provinces most diametrically opposed to remedial legislation. Or there is another explanation, that it must be a province, as I have been told by very prominent people, the people of which were led to believe that if the hon. member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper) was defeated, and the hon. gentleman now leading the Government came to power, he would do more for them and would go one better than the leader of the late Government. I make the leader of the Government a present of these facts.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not want any present.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman is so rich now that he has become leader of the Government of Canada, he spurns a present from a poor devil like me. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, what does he do? He trotted out that broken-winded, spavined old jade, the exodus. He has been going through this country with that broken-winded Rosinante, the exodus, and he has been stating that the tariff caused the exodus. No sensible man would or could believe it. Now, those chickens will come home to roost. Now, the hon. gentlemen opposite, and especially the Minister of Trade and Commerce, if he should remain long enough in the Government, will be able to ponder what Sydney Smith told the Americans—"beware of superlatives." The hon. gentleman is now a member of the Government, and the speeches of the leader of the Government confront them, and they are in a quandary—they do not know exactly what to do. The Government is a timid organization of self-distrustful gentlemen who really do not know their own minds. I can easily understand the difficulty. The Prime Minister of to-day said, when in Opposition: Once put us into power and we will take off three or four million dollars a year, and now that they are in power, they will find it pretty difficult to do that, as well as to fulfil some other promises they made. Amongst all the charges they made, not one will so completely come back upon them as their statement connecting the exodus with the tariff. If the exodus, as it was called, was great under the tariff, let us have free trade as they have it in England and you will have that exodus trebled, because you will strike a mortal blow at labour in this country. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) again used one of these ridiculous clap-trap arguments, that it is discreditable and humiliating to this country should be used by a man of his eminence—for he is an eminent man. Somewhat gauche, it is true, but it is palpable that, if there had been some divine influence to rough-hew him and shape him to better ends, something might have been made of him. It is quite clear that in him there were the elements of a great man spoiled. There is about him what the French call "manqué;" there is something wanting. I do not wish to say that there is a screw loose: in fact there are several screws loose; so that one screw would do the business. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) used this ridiculous clap-trap argument, and he said: "Canadians are as good as other men; they are not afraid to face other men in competition." Sir, that is no reply to one of the ablest arguments I ever heard in this House. There was not in that closely-reasoned speech of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) an abler argument than that in which he pointed out that it would be a dangerous thing, wantonly and with a light heart to submit the industries of Canada, where we have a climate and conditions that are sui generis; to submit them to competition with the industries of countries where the rate of interest was lower, where wages were lower, and where there were conditions wholly different from those that obtain here. There was never a more statesmanlike argument than that put forward by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster). But how was it answered? It was answered as some foolish stumper or reckless heeler might answer it. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) said that Canadians are not afraid of competition. Are they not? Why, there is the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell), and he wants $500 of a prohibitory tariff on Chinamen coming into Canada, and the leader of the Government has by a telegram in advance endorsed his note. He sent a telegram across the continent, saying that he would endorse the policy of the British Columbia members supporting him, and these members come here and want protection against the competition of the Chinese. Why do they want that protection? It is because Chinamen can live cheaper than Anglo-Saxons can; it is because the Chinese can live many percentages lower than the poorest white man would care to live. The white man, on this account, cannot compete with the Chinaman. If the Chinese were to come here in sufficient numbers and plant themselves as an industrial army, and identify themselves with our institutions, they might overrun the whole country in less than no time. It is easy to understand why our labouring men shrink from that competition. It is the same thing that makes the labouring men of the United States shrink from the competition of poorly paid labour in Belgium, Germany and elsewhere. I will turn the tables on the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright). He says that the Canadian is not afraid of any competition; and I say, that the Canadian is afraid of competition that will lower him in his social, and moral, and material life, and for that reason there is no man in the country so interested in protection as is the labouring man or the mechanic. When the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) made a reply like that, it was simply like an overgrown boy squirting ditch water in reply to cannon, and artillery, and real ammunition. The argument of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) was strong, 'twas cogent, 'twas statesmanlike, and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, in reply, made an argument that would be unworthy of the merest stumper spouting reckless clap trap. Now, Sir, another argument used by the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) was also an old jade of his. He told us his oft-repeated story that the farm lands in Ontario are lowered in value. That is also one of the things that will come home to roost. These hon. gentlemen are now in charge of the Government of Canada, and we will ask them to put up the value of farm lands in Ontario, and, no doubt, they will do it for us. All the leader of the Government will have to do is to wave his magic and eloquent hand, and the value of farm lands in Ontario will be raised instanter, just as all the housewife has to do is to put a little more leaven in her dough, and up it goes. Well, I am afraid that the leaven is not within reach of my hon. friend that will enable him to increase the farm lands in value. Why is it that farm lands in Ontario have gone down in value? It is because more farm lands have been brought into the market. That is what occurred in the eastern states of the Union. The moment their great North-west was opened up, the farm lands in the east went down in value, and the moment that millions and millions of wealth were added to Canada by the opening of our North-west, the price of farm lands in Ontario also went down. But how does that affect the real prosperity of the farmer in Ontario who is not a speculator in farms? It is notorious that the hon. member (Sir Richard Cartwright) has had many a mortgage on many a farm, and the fact that the opening of our North-west has lowered the value of farms in eastern Canada, no doubt comes bitterly home to the farm mortgagee. But it does not affect the real farmer. It does not affect his produce. It does not affect his cultivation of the ground; it does not affect his comfort in his home; and so that argument, of the Minister of Trade and Commerce is worthy of going in pairs with his argument in regard to the exodus.

Reverting for one minute to the argument made by the hon. member for York as to the danger of subjecting Canada to competition with continental countries, he might have gone further than he did. He might have dwelt on the fact that the most thoughtful men in England, who may have been Cobdenites until quite recently, are pointing out that unless England resorts to protection, unless England gives up its fetish of free trade, the results may be disastrous. A very interesting book has recently been published bearing on this subject; and an article by Mr. Low, which appeared in a recent number of the "19th Century," refers to this book; and, with the permission of the House—and I beg your attention—I will read an extract from this article, because it bears on the argument of the hon. member for York, and emphasizes what poor refutation I am making to the wretched argument of the hon. member for South Oxford. Here is what it says :

We have shared in the industrial and commercial activity of an era of astonishing material progress. That is true. But the question which Englishmen ask themselves, with an ever-growing anxiety, is whether we have had our fair share, and whether we are now advancing as fast as our rivals. They know that in the protected period—before Cobdenism was by law established—they had a commanding superiority. Mr. Villiers gives figures to show how small, compared with what it is now, was the foreign trade of Britain in the earlier half of this century. Small—yes ; but how vast compared to that of our rivals. Not in one trade, but in many, we had an unchallenged and, as it appeared, unchallengeable lead. In shipping, in cottons, in metals, in cutlery, in hardware, in machinery, England seemed beyond competition. Great is the change to-day. The competitors who have deliberately rejected what Mr. Villiers calls "the inestimable blessings of freedom of trade" are overtaking us with long strides ; nay, in some vital cases have caught and passed us already. In his striking little book, "Made in Germany," Mr. Ernest Williams, with facts and figures plucked from the official returns, shows how far and fast the process is going. Already Germany is abreast of us in the production of iron and steel. America has long since passed us ; little Belgium is gaining on us rapidly. The German export of iron and steel rose from 957,000 tons in 1890 to 1,439,000 in 1894 ; the English export in the same period fell from 2,700,000 to 1,735,000. Even our carrying trade is menaced. We no longer own the first shipping port in Europe. Liverpool has been passed by Hamburg, and it looks as if it would presently be passed by Antwerp. Here are the figures of the last few years :—

	1885. Tons.	1895. Tons.
Hamburg .....	$ 3,704,312	$ 6,256,000
Antwerp .....	3,422,172	5,340,247
Rotterdam .....	2,120,347	4,038,017
Bremen .....	1,289,399	2,184,274
Total .....	$10,536,230	$17,818,538
Liverpool .....	$ 4,278,881	$ 5,965,959

These are very striking figures, and they justify alarm. They justify those gentlemen who are taking the free traders in England by the throat, and pointing out to them that they have ruined the farmers, and that now they are threatening to ruin the merchants and manufacturers of that country.

Ten years ago Liverpool was the first port in Europe. Now she is the second, soon, apparently, to be the third. And here is the general summary of the situation as given by Mr. Williams :

In 1872 the total declared value of British and Irish produce exported from the United Kingdom was 256,257,347 pounds sterling ; in 1895 it had sunk to 226,169,174 pounds sterling ; and in the meantime the population of Great Britain and Ireland has grown from 31,835,757 to 39,134,166. The market is bigger, the ability to supply the market is greater ; but, whereas the proportion per head of exported British produce was

Mr. DAVIN.

£8 1s. 0d. sterling, in 1872, it had sunk to £5 11s. 3d. sterling in 1894.

That is very striking, and, of course, the argument I am making is not at all new. The argument is that of the hon. member for York ; but I think the House will agree that I have not wasted its time in reading that extract as rounding off the very able argument of the hon. member for York.

Now, Sir, I rather think I have pretty well gone over whatever there was in the way of argument in the speech of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. He spoke of eighteen years of fraud and falsehood. I have no doubt that in the course of eighteen years the Conservative party have committed errors. I have not the least doubt that there have been members of the Conservative party who have not done right in those eighteen years.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes. I am very glad to have those "hear, hears," and I hope I shall have a "hear, hear" for what I am now going to say, because it is not capable of being controverted. I say that in those eighteen years the Conservative party of Canada have made a record that is not surpassed by the record of any other party in any constitutional country. You have only to look at what Canada was eighteen years ago and see what Canada is to-day. You have only to look at the position that Canada has in the world to-day as a great progressive nation, and at its position eighteen years ago. You have only to look at what Canada's credit was eighteen years ago and what it is to-day ; and you have only to take the figures given you by the hon. member for York—the exports and imports, the imports especially of raw materials—as evidence of the great material advancement and more than material advancement of this country. I have been a student of the history of Canada for the last 25 years, and I say that in every thing that can dignify and enrich and ennoble a nation, in these eighteen years Canada has made giant strides of advance. I do not say that all that is due to the Conservative party.

Mr. McMULLEN. Oh, yes, it is.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not say that. My hon. friend from Wellington will not find me making a proposition so absurd, but I can say this, that we can put our fingers on mighty industries due to the Conservative party, on the opening up of greater Canada, the North-west, all due to the Conservative party. With the effrontery which distinguishes the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, he spoke slightly of the policy of the Conservative party with regard to the North-west. Why, he was a member of a Government whose wretched, higgling policy with regard to that country stands in strong contrast with the policy that opened it up and has made it the hope of Canada. Compare the huckstering and wriggling policy with that of the Conservative party, and you will have some idea of the difference between the two, and from what I now see, I am satisfied that the difference is as great to-day as it was eighteen years ago. What I fear is that if the Liberal party remain in power four years, as they did from 1874 to 1878, we shall have the same miserable huckstering, and the sun dial will again be put back, as it was during the Mackenzie regime, when the hon. member for South Oxford was Finance Minister. The hon. gentleman spoke of eighteen years of fraud and corruption, forgetting that in the short time his party was in power, from 1874 to 1878, they piled up scandals.

The hon. member for South Oxford had the folly to refer to the position taken respecting employees of the Government, who had taken part in politics, a position which did not help to raise the Liberal party in my esteem, and he proceeded very unnecessarily to refer to the action taken by the hon. member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper) with regard to Governor General's warrants. Well, however difficult it may be, with regard to a constitutional question, to impress the popular mind, I am perfectly certain that when the sober common sense of the country is devoted to that question, the people will see that never was the time of Parliament more profitably taken up than it was in discussing that question. Then he referred to a matter which I do not think should have been referred to at all. He referred to what he described as the censure of the Governor General. I think that was a most improper reference. There was no desire on either side to extend, still less to reopen, that controversy. I may say here, however, that if they were inclined to extend it, my hon. friend who leads the Government never laid himself so open to a crushing reply as on that very question. I cannot refer to any previous debate, but I say that come whence it may, any aspersion on the judiciary of Canada is without foundation. I do not care from what quarter it comes, I do not care how high he may be or what leading position he may hold, the man who states that the judges of this country have been appointed solely on political grounds, makes a statement that cannot be substantiated.

Mr. DOMVILLE. So they have.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman must know very well that the late Sir John Macdonald appointed strong political opponents to the bench.

Mr. DOMVILLE. He has been dead some time.

Mr. DAVIN. But the men that he appointed are still alive. We had a lecture some time ago in this House from the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) about the zeal of converts. Well, a zeal of that sort, when it is strong and reasoned, and well based, and seriously expressed, is respectable, but the kind of fibberty-jibberty zeal of the hon. member for King's—

Mr. DOMVILLE. I will attend to you presently.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman says he will attend to me presently. In that case I shall be a benefactor to this House, for since the hon. gentleman has been here, we have only heard him sound two notes, and these were the hon. member for York and his references to the time when George and he were schoolboys—infantile reminiscences of that sort constantly repeated. Let me tell a little Italian apologue for the benefit of the hon. gentleman. There was a contest at one time between the nightingale and the cuckoo as to which sang the sweeter, and the decision was referred to a donkey. The nightingale poured forth those notes that have been celebrated time and again ever since man has had any taste for music and song, and then the cuckoo went on to show the donkey what it could do. The donkey turned to the nightingale and said: you have sung very sweetly and your trills are more numerous, and there is a great deal of variety in your songs, but, turning round to the cuckoo, he said—and I think the same thing could be said of the hon. member for King's—I will give you the prize for there is more method in your song. The constant reiteration of the hon. gentleman has method in it, but it is horribly monotonous, so that if I should turn away his attention from the hon. member for York and his schooldays, I would have gained some good for this House. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I paid the hon. gentleman a sufficient compliment. I have done what I had not intended to during whatever time we might be in this House together—I have taken notice of him. I think I have gone far enough; and, if there are any more interruptions, I will ask you to protect me, because I want to make a serious argument. Now, Mr. Speaker, I say that, if any one were to state, no matter how high his position, that the judges of this country were appointed on political grounds, he would make a statement he could not substantiate; and I go further, and say that, if he were to lower the bench in this country to the level of the bench below the line, he would commit, in my opinion, a very grave offence against the fact and against the judiciary of this country. I never knew of an American to speak in the same breath of the judges of our country and those of his own. There has never been a suspicion of the integrity of our judges. And if a speaker, or a writer, while thus maligning our judges, were to use the illustration of the electoral commission appointed to decide whether Mr. Hayes or Mr. Tilden had been elected President of the United States, he would, in my opinion, be guilty of a very grave offence. If you would compare, for instance, the judges of our own Supreme Court with those of the Supreme Court of the United States, you would be doing what would be fair. But, while there were Supreme Court judges upon the Electoral Commission, what were the facts in that case? It was a dodge of Senator Edmonds'. Senator Edmonds had a committee struck, and that committee formed a commission composed of five senators, five members of the House of Representatives and five judges of the Supreme Court. If a man were to make an argument, that because the judges on a commission of that sort, a purely political body, voted according to their political proclivities of the past, therefore, they, as judges of the Supreme Court in the United States would, if they were acting as judges, be influenced by their political predilections, there would be no cogency in the argument. It would be a scandalous argument as regards the judges of the Supreme Court who took part in that commission, and a still more scandalous thing if on that foundation the argument were made, that because the members of this electoral commission are supposed to have been influenced by their political predilections, therefore, the same is true of the judges of Canada sitting in their judicial capacity. So it was a most unfortunate reference on the part of the hon. member (Mr. Laurier) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce was not more happy.

An hon. MEMBER. Carried.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, carried. There is a good deal I might say on the subject, but I think I have entirely replied to the argument of the hon. member for South Oxford. But let me say one word with regard to the position of the North-west in this matter. I have already referred to what the North-west feels. I have already referred to the fact that the hon. leader of the Government came to the North-west. At Winnipeg, he told us that his policy was then cut and dried. Here is what he said.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Dispense.

Mr. DAVIN. No, I will not "dispense." I have a serious duty to perform to the country. I am not come here to play the mountebank; I have come here to represent my constituents; and I have to do it, even under all the difficulties that such hon. gentlemen as the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) may be able to throw in my way. This is what the hon. gentleman said at Winnipeg:

I come to you to-night to preach to you the new gospel of freedom of trade. New, yes; new to this country, new on this continent, new on the other side of the line, in the American Republic, but now new on the other side of the water and in the old land. (Applause.) Not new in the small island that has been the cradle of all freedom and civilization, not new in this land from which we Liberals are proud to derive our inspiration. The Conservatives who pretend to be loyal, and who are hacking up the cry of "God save the Queen," in which they take inspiration. In the American Republic you have the line of cleavage which exists within the Liberal party and the Conservative party, the question of free trade. We stand for freedom, they stand for restriction; they stand for servitude, we stand for freedom. I denounce to you the policy of protection as bondage, yes, bondage, and I refer to bondage in the same manner in which the American slavery was bondage, not in the same degree, perhaps, but in the same manner. The slave in the American confederacy had no freedom. He grew tobacco for his masters; he grew cotton or sugar, working day and night in rain, and in the sun, but he never derived a cent of profit for his labour, the greed of the master would take away from him all freedom, giving him only such a pittance as you give to your horses.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman will feel that he was carried away with enthusiasm in using such extraordinary language.

In the same manner the people of this country, the inhabitants of the city of Winnipeg especially are toiling for a master who takes away not every cent of profit from you, but a very large percentage, a very great portion of your earnings, the earnings for which you toil and sweat. But you have to toil and sweat for privileged masters—you have to toil for those who use protection, which I claim is bondage. But what reason have I to say this? I have the word of the Minister of Finance himself. You know that the Minister of Finance has his moments of weakness as every other man, but he has also his moments of frankness.

Sir, I should like indeed to see any language of the ex-Finance Minister that would have justified this, one of the most contemptible pieces of demagoguery I have ever read in my life.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. Hon. gentlemen may laugh at it. But let them read it. My hon. friend who laughs (Mr. Scriver) is a clever and able member of this House, whom I reverence and honour, a gentleman much more experienced than I am; and, if he will read that, and will say that I have unfairly characterized it, I will apologize to him and his party, and will retract every word of it.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Do it now.

Mr. DAVIN. I cannot do it now, because I do not feel convinced that I was wrong. But this is all taken au sérieux in the North-west. They believe they are in manacles, and they have looked up to him, and up to the present time they have looked to him in vain, and I fear they will ever look in vain to him to liberate them from the slavery which he described. He went to Moose Jaw, and this is what he said:

it was necessary for him to talk much about protection—no one now defended protection. All must admit that it has been a bane and a curse to this North-west Territory. The man who would defend it would be looked upon as a curiosity, a phenomena, a freak of nature. The hope of the Conservative party had been that the Government would reform the tariff. His own confidence in the Government did not weigh upon him—did not overburden him—but he believed the Government sincere in their announcement that the tariff would be reformed. He thought they must surely have some bowels of compassion—they must have a heart in their bosom, but the Government had failed to carry out their intention. * * * * * He believed no more taxes should be levied on the people—

And two years ago he stated in Peel that he could take off two or three millions and give a revenue tariff. What, then, is to prevent him coming down this session, breaking those fetters in which he says industry is bound, giving us the revenue tariff and relieving the country from suspense and anxiety and his party from the extraordinary position in which it is at present, of following a Government without a policy and supporting a Government which was well described in the correspondence of the "Globe" as composed of members who know one thing—and the correspondent seemed to think they knew nothing else—how to keep silent.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. That is something you did not know.

Mr. DAVIN. I am glad to see my hon. friend is making some progress in the study of that art, for he is much more silent than he used to be. In that respect, he is like many others who have gone over there, who used to be very talkative on this side of the House. But now they have been told that their eloquence is likely to embarrass their friends who are in power, and they have grown silent in accordance with the old distich:

As bees on flowers alighting, cease to hum,
So, settling into places, Whigs grow dumb.

And the legitimate descendants of the Whigs in this country are as dumb as the dumb dogs of Jupiter, which could not bark. I had intended to give the genesis of my hon. friend's free trade, but I will defer that. I know the genesis of it, I know who inspired him, and the source whence he got his inspiration is very interesting. But the important thing for us is that there is the promise, and the North-west looks to him for the performance. On the 15th December, 1885, the North-west Council passed the following resolution:—

That the benefits derived from the National Policy to the older provinces of the Dominion do not apply to the North-west Territories, as regards agricultural implements and lumber, and it being necessary to the future development of the country that every encouragement should be extended to the agricultural interests of the North-west, this Council recommends that a rebate should be given to the duty now imposed on agricultural implements and lumber.

That is the resolution passed ten years ago. An hon. gentleman criticised me with regard to the motion I have on the paper, and thought there seemed to be some inconsistency on my part. If he will take the trouble to look at the early files in 1882, 1883 and 1884, of a paper edited and controlled by myself, and published in the North-west Territories, he will find that I advocated taking off the duty from agricultural implements and lumber. During the late contest I stated that I believed that if the party I was supporting got into power they would take the duty off agricultural implements. I made this argument: A revenue tariff Government could not, without the most ridiculous inconsistency, take the duty off agricultural implements; but a protectionist Government, which has an element of paternalism in it, which believes in making exceptions and protecting every interest, if we can convince it that it is necessary for the farmers of the North-west that they should get their implements free, such a Government can say to the rest of the country: We must make this exception for the farmers of the North-west, and we can make it consistently with our policy. It was in response to our action and to our efforts that, in 1894, the member for York took off 15 per cent from these agricultural implements at one stroke; and I say that it was a fair argument on my part that if a Conservative Government had been sustained, and if convinced that it was necessary for our farming interests, that they could do and would do it. But the argument thrown back to me was that a revenue tariff Government would do it too. I pointed out that it was impossible. I venture to say that when the Minister of Finance comes to deal with the tariff, he will not attempt to give us these implements free; but if he does I will thank him for it, and we will sing peans to him, we will elevate him as high as the dythrambic writer in the "Globe," who eulogized the hon. Minister of Finance for keeping silent. This was in the earlier part of the session; but we have heard him speak since, and if it were not impertinent on my part, I would say that nobody can doubt that he is a great accession to this House, in that respect, and in others too. But I will raise him as high as the writer in the "Globe," who said that he was manifesting a powerful personality, and deeply impressing the House; and all the time the hon. gentleman was keeping silent. Although the hon. gentleman has not been quite silent, he has not been very effusive in giving a notion of what he would do when he comes to deal with the tariff. I am afraid he won't carry out the promises made by those who opposed me in the North-west Territories, and give us implements free. Let me say in regard to this motion, that I cannot for the life of me see how the supporters of this Government, who declared that the people in the North-west were in slavery, that they were in bondage like that of the southern slaves, can justify a leader who comes into power, and with a fairly large majority, says: You are in slavery; you are doubly oppressed; there are robbers pulling the money out of your pocket; but I will allow month after month to pass by, I will sit in Parliament and won't lift a finger to help you; I won't lift a finger to break a link of the chain which binds you. My hon. friend spoke of sunny ways. Sir, sunny ways are very nice, but there is a vulgar but expressive proverb which says: "Fine words butter no parsnips." If we have only sunny ways, and the gilded phrases of expedient rhetoric, and no fulfilment of the glowing promises that have been made to us, it will be a sad thing for the country. But it will not be a bad thing for the Conservative party; it will be a good thing for them to have crossed the floor for a short time, because it will be a very good thing for the people of this country to be placed in a position to come to the hon. gentleman and say: Here is note after note that you passed upon us, note after note that you gave us as good and genuine paper. Now, give us the gold of act and fact for these notes of yours. Why, Sir, distrust has already manifested itself in every part of the country in regard to this Government. In Quebec at the present moment the hon. gentleman's followers are in mutiny; the best elements of his party have risen up against the Mephistopheles of the Public Works, to whom the leader plays the part of Faust. He has mesmerized the leader of the Government, whom he has under his tutelage and power.

They have run up against that dark spirit which sits behind the Prime Minister, the Mephistopheles of the Public Works Department, who has hypnotized the First Minister and now does with him as he pleases. The best element of the party has risen against him. Good and life-long Liberals in the province of Quebec and supporters of the Government do not wish to see him in his present position. Let him read an article in "La Libre Parole." It is a very good and eloquent article, and it is written by a good Liberal, by one who has more claim on the First Minister than the Minister of Public Works. The feeling is one that inspired the conspirators at Rome against Cæsar, which Cassius expressed:

He doth bestride the narrow world like a Colossus;
And we petty men walk under his huge legs,
And peep about to find ourselves dishonourable graves.

Leading Liberals have to peep about to find themselves dishonoured while the great legs of this Colossus, who has to go here and there to get a constituency and now lords it over the Public Works Department, rise on stilts, that do not become him, and from which it appears as if he would speedily fall. I repeat that from Halifax to Vancouver there is a feeling of distrust, and the result of the miserable exhibition made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was powerful when in Opposition, is such that we imagine something must be wrong when a man who used to be powerful on his side of the House has become emasculated, and instead of being a Boanerges, a lion roaring in his strength, now coos like a sucking dove. A contrast so great affects the public mind, and from Halifax to Vancouver public opinion has been disturbed. If the sentiment of Parliament in Canada were as sensitive to public opinion as is the Parliament of England, there would be such a reduced Government majority on a division as would almost send the hon. gentleman leading the Government to His Excellency to hand in his portfolio. But our Parliament is not so sensitive, as we all know. A change has occurred, and the change is a striking one. I would echo the advice of "La Libre Parole" to the hon. gentleman: my advice is to get rid of the Minister of Public Works. That would strengthen the Government, and it would tend to restore confidence. At the present time we are in a very difficult and disagreeable position in this country. We have a party in power which for eighteen years has been complaining that all sorts of evils resulted from the policy of the late Government, and yet when those hon. gentlemen come into power they cannot give the country a policy on anything. Not only so, but already there are manifestations of disease. If I were to quote Latin here, which I will not do because hon. gentlemen opposite do not like languages in which they are so highly instructed, I would give the description that Virgil gives of Scylla. The description can be well applied to the Government. It was translated, I believe, by an old poet in this fashion:

Mr. DAVIN.

At top, it shows a gracious face,
The breast replete with human grace,
The rest is all an ugly whale,
With maw of wolf and fish's tail.

We have the gracious presence of the eloquent leader of the Government; we have the maw of the wolf in the person of the Minister of the Public Works Department and some others. In regard to the piscine description, I will not enter into it—but there is a good deal that is fishy about the party. I say once more that we are in this position, that we have now been sitting in this House for over a month and we have had no policy enunciated by the Government, and to-day the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) feels compelled to make a motion in which he lays down this proposition, that if you are going to give a revenue tariff, it should be given at once; that if you are not going to give a revenue tariff but a protective tariff slightly revised, you should state that that is your policy in order to relieve the suspense. If the Government are going to adopt such a tariff as could be dealt with at once, then it should be dealt with at once; but if they are going to adopt the Conservative policy and revise the tariff on protective principles, that principle should be declared for the information of importers and exporters, manufacturers and labourers throughout the country, so that the policy of hesitation may cease to exist, and the country be relieved from the suspense which has already paralyzed industry, created fear, and which, if persevered in, will give starving labourers and clamouring mechanics during the winter.

Mr. MOORE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

WAYS AND MEANS.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee).

Resolved, That towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty, on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending the 30th June, 1897, the sum of $9,728,671.48 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Resolution reported, and read the second time and concurred in.

SUPPLY BILL.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 30) for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money required for defraying certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending 30th June, 1897, and for other purposes relating to the public service.

Bill read the first and second times, considered in committee, reported and read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT—MANITOBA SCHOOLS QUESTION.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the House adjourns I would like again to ask my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) if any progress is being made in regard to the Manitoba schools question. It is a matter which the hon. gentleman knows is of great public interest. I would also ask, at what time it is expected that the writs for Brandon and Saskatchewan will be issued. There seats have been a long time vacant and I think it is only reasonable I should make these inquiries.

The PRIME MINISTER. In regard to the Manitoba school question I have no new information to give to the House, further than what I gave some few days ago. With regard to the writ for Saskatchewan, there is a difficulty which the Government is considering, as to whether a Bill should be introduced in order to dispense with the system of revision which is now going on, or if a new revision is to take place before the election. This is a matter which is under the consideration of the Department of Justice and as to which I hope we shall have an answer in a few days. As to the writ for Brandon we expect to have it issued some time—probably to-day.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.20 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 23rd September, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE ROYAL ASSENT.

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to mention, for the information of the House, that I have received intimation that His Honour the Deputy Governor, about four o'clock, will request the attendance of members of this House in the Senate, when assent will be given, I suppose, to the Supply Bill.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. CHOQUETTE moved:

That the second report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the official report of the Debates of the House during the present session, be concurred in.

Mr. DAVIN. Explain.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I have no intention to go into the subject at length in explaining the reasons why the committee brought in this report.

Mr. FOSTER. I understood that this matter was to be postponed until the present debate was concluded. I think it would be better to bring up this report to-morrow.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. A proposal was made, in which I understood the leader of the House concurred, that the report with respect to the translators should be deferred until the conclusion of this debate.

Mr. BERGERON. That was the understanding yesterday.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I did not so understand it, because it was not mentioned to me. The understanding come to yesterday was that we should resume the debate that was going on and dispose of it, and afterwards finish Supply. I do not see why we should not take up this matter in the course of ordinary routine, and afterwards resume the debate that was adjourned.

Mr. FOSTER. Yesterday we agreed to finish the debate and take a vote to-night. If we are now to enter upon a long discussion on the proposed adoption of this report, it will be impossible to carry out this arrangement.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman will remember that there was no mention of the debate regarding the translators, and I did not think of it for a moment.

Mr. FOSTER. Would it not be better to defer the matter?

The PRIME MINISTER. Defer it—why?

Mr. FOSTER. Then the hon. gentleman cannot expect the adjourned debate to close to-night if he intervenes with a discussion that will occupy five or six hours.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am very sorry, but we must take things as they come.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think it would be much better not to intervene with this matter of the translators in the middle of the debate, especially when there has been an understanding arrived at that the debate would close to-day. I would suggest that it would be much more convenient to close this debate, and let the other matter come up subsequently.

The PRIME MINISTER. As I understood from the hon. gentleman yesterday, his intention was to conclude the present debate and afterwards allow the Government to pass the balance of the Estimates.

Mr. FOSTER. By no means. What I proposed was that we should take the vote on the motion that was introduced yesterday. The idea at first was that it would be found almost impossible to complete the debate to-day, but I promised that it should be brought to a close to-night. After the vote has been taken, I may tell hon. gentlemen opposite that we have no disposition to obstruct the passing of the Estimates in any way, as indeed there has been no obstruction manifested.

The PRIME MINISTER. So I will ask my hon. friend to postpone the matter and bring up the consideration of the report to-morrow.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I hope it will be for the last time.

Motion withdrawn.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 31) respecting the St. Catharines and Niagara Central Railway Company.—(Mr. Lount.)

DAIRY PRODUCTS.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher) moved for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Dairy Products Act, 1893. He said: Mr. Speaker, in relation to this matter, I would say that I have been requested by the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) to assume the responsibility of putting the Bill which he introduced early in the session, on Government Orders.

Mr. SPEAKER. This is a public Bill, and notice will have to be given for to-morrow.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Very well, Sir, I give notice.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 32) respecting the South Shore Railway Company.—(Mr. Charlton.)

SUPPLY—TARIFF LEGISLATION.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding: That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply, and the motion of Mr. Foster in amendment thereto.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, in rising to place my views before the hon. members of this House, I do so with no little embarrassment, realizing, as I do, when brought face to face with the discussion of the great questions of parliamentary and public interest, the almost hopelessness of the task of presenting in any new or interesting manner a subject which has been so carefully analysed and so forcibly presented by hon. gentlemen of long experience, great abilities, and undoubted eloquence. I am, therefore, under the necessity of invoking the kind indulgence of hon. gentlemen on both sides, an indulgence which, I understand, they usually accord to new members who venture to address the House upon the important questions which it may have under consideration.

The present discussion involves the investigation of questions of public policy of the utmost importance to the welfare and prosperity of Canada. It is a matter of no great consequence to the country who the 213 members of the House of Commons are; but it is of vital importance what policy these hon. gentlemen adopt, for upon the adoption and execution of a proper and wise fiscal policy depend and rest the progress and the well-being of the country in which we live. It may be assumed that every wise and patriotic citizen desires that course to be pursued which will promote and develop to the greatest extent and which will advance most rapidly and satisfactorily all our great national interests. Much has been said, and I believe much depends upon our loyalty and devotion to Canadian institutions and Canadian interests. And, although we may hold different views regarding the mode in which the results we seek are to be brought about, yet all ought to be united in the desire and in the determination to make Canada what her position, her natural resources and her undeveloped wealth has destined her to become. We may, therefore, conclude that we are all agreed in desiring the greatest possible success for the country, but, unfortunately, we disagree as to the methods to be pursued and the best course to take to produce the desired results. We have now come to the parting of the ways. The Liberal party, through its honourable and distinguished leaders, have recommended to the electors of Canada on different occasions the various policies which they claimed were calculated to attain the end and to bring about the desired and wished for results. Amongst the systems submitted to the electorate, were free trade, tariff for revenue, commercial union, unrestricted reciprocity, free trade as it is in England, and protection. For many years these policies were discussed, and all in turn, with the exception of the National Policy, the policy of protection, were rejected by the people at the polls. The Liberal-Conservative leaders prepared, proposed and favoured a policy which they claimed would foster and encourage Canadian industries, by giving to the Canadian producers control of the Canadian markets. This method was devised, formulated and crystallized into the system known and designated as the National Policy. It was proposed by Sir John Macdonald in this House in 1876, also in 1877, and it was adopted by the people of Canada at the elections of 1878 by a very large majority. I wish here, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of the House to the name which has been attached to this protective system. It is called the National Policy, and it may not be known to all the gentlemen of this House that that word was coined and that policy was so christened by the former member for the county of Stanstead, the Hon. C. C. Colby, who was a member of Parliament for some twenty-five years. It was he who gave the name; it was he who christened that policy and that fiscal system which has been of such incalculable benefit to the people of this country. The speech of that hon. gentleman (Mr. Colby), which went throughout this country, travelled across the water and was circulated all over Europe, will carry his name down to posterity, and will cause it ever to be remembered with respect and honour by those who follow him. That policy was submitted to the public in 1882, in 1886, and also in 1891; and on these occasions it was confirmed by the overwhelming majority of the electorate. Last election was decided on other and unfortunate issues, and cannot fairly be claimed as a condemnation of the National Policy. The present Government, therefore, have no real justification in concluding that they have a mandate from the electorate of Canada to "remove every vestige of protection from the tariff."

The National Policy has been a friend to Canada. It has been the great prop upon which the struggling industries in their infancy rested for support, and fostering care; and the hand that strikes an unfriendly blow, the hand that strikes down the protection to Canadian industries, is not a hand friendly to the prosperity of the people of Canada. The Liberal-Conservative party, twenty years ago expressed their convictions, owing to the changed conditions of trade and commerce between us and the United States, "That the welfare of Canada required the adoption of a National Policy, which by a judicious readjustment of the tariff would benefit and foster (amongst others) the agricultural interests."

Before comparing protection and free trade and tariff for revenue, I desire to consider for a short time some of the assertions which were made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) regarding the National Policy, and the acts of the late Administration. I hope that it may not be considered presumptive in so new a member to discuss important issues with such an experienced and eloquent parliamentarian and such a political oratorical gladiator—as is the hon. member for South Oxford. And while I shall not try to make any display of oratory, or enter into any declamatory denunciations of the Liberal party, or any members of that party, I desire to have a little talk in a business way upon the great financial question which has been a burning theme of contention for a score of years. The member for South Oxford condemned in the most emphatic manner the National Policy, and said it had been the cause of the great debt being "heaped up on the country." Perhaps I may be in error, but I certainly have not been under the impression that we can charge the large public debt to the National Policy; and I was inclined to the opinion when that statement was made in this House that the facts did not warrant the hon. gentleman in putting the charge quite so strongly.

The net public debt of Canada to-day is $253,074,927. Now, how was this created? The provincial debts assumed at confederation and afterwards amounted to $109,430,148. That portion of the debt certainly cannot be assumed to have been caused by the National Policy, because it was incurred several years before the National Policy was adopted. There is left, then, to be accounted for $143,644,779. If we had nothing to show for this great balance of debt, possibly we might be open to the accusation which was hurled across the floor of the House last night, that the Conservative party was a party of boodlers and corruptionists. But, Sir, I hold in my hand a paper which shows the manner in which the public funds of this country have been used. In the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in the canals, in the Intercolonial and connecting railways, in the North-west Territories, in Dominion lands, in public buildings at Ottawa, in the Prince Edward Island Railway, and in other public works, we have expended the sum of $200,143,171. Is there a man in this House who can claim that our investment of $62,653,745 in the great trans-continental railway that traverses this country from the east to the west, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, opening up to colonization and settlement the great fertile lands of the North-west and British Columbia, was money badly laid out for this country? Gentlemen from the North-west and British Columbia tell us very encouraging and enthusiastic stories in regard to the great wealth of that western country; and I am sure that no man to-day, looking at that country in its present condition of development, will say that $1,500,000 was a high price to pay for all that great North-west, including British Columbia, with its immense stores of wealth. I am sure that there is not one item of those I have mentioned in regard to which hon. gentlemen opposite can say that the money was badly laid out, or that represents institutions which we could do without. Our expenditures on these public works of great benefit to the country amount to $200,143,171; the increase of the debt since confederation, exclusive of provincial debts, amounts to $143,644,779; so that we have expended upon them the sum of $56,498,392 in excess of the entire public debt of this country.

There is another point to which I would like to call the attention of this House, that is, that the public records show that during five years of Liberal rule, when the hon. member for South Oxford was the financial manager of the country, there was expended $40,513,607, or a yearly increase of the public debt of $8,102,721. That is a portion of the debt which he says the National Policy imposed on the people of this country. Now, the Conservative party have been in power, since confederation, twenty-three years, and during that time they increased the public debt by $103,131,172, or an average of $4,049,181 a year, or about one-half of the increase under the financial administration of the hon. member for South Oxford. Therefore, I think I have conclusively shown to the hon. members of this House that that hon. gentleman's statement that the National Policy had heaped up this great public debt on the people of this country was a little too strong a statement to be borne out by the record. In 1878, at the conclusion of the period during which the hon. member for South Oxford was Finance Minister of this country, the debt per head amounted to $3.68. And in 1894, after many years of this Liberal corrupt Conservative administration that had declined to $2.91 per head.

We have other sources of comparison by which we can determine which Administration dealt with the affairs of the country in the most economic manner. Take the Customs. We find that the collection of revenue in 1878 cost $5.18½ per head, while under the Liberal-Conservative Administration, during the same length of time, it only cost $5.13.

We have heard a great deal about the population of Canada. We have had calamity howlers all over this country, who seem to be opposed to the prosperity of the country and to feel bad when anything develops that shows the bright side of the picture, and who have all taken great pleasure in quoting the United States of America to show how much more progressive that country is and how much faster it goes ahead than Canada. I have only a word to say with regard to the population question. Take the increases of population in the United States. Up to 1890 it had increased eighteen times. Take the increase in the population of Canada up to 1891, and I find it had increased forty-two times. The increase in each province of the Dominion, according to the census of 1891, was as follows:—

Ontario .....	9.73
Quebec .....	9.53
Nova Scotia .....	2.23
New Brunswick .....	0.00
Manitoba .....	144.95
British Columbia .....	98.49
Prince Edward Island .....	0.17
North-west Territories .....	75.33

Total increase ..... 11.76

Therefore, there has been some increase in the population of the Dominion.

Then take the value of settlers' effects. From 1874 to 1878, both inclusive, their value was $2,665,100, or a yearly average of $666,280. From 1878 to 1882, the value was $9,808,603, or a yearly average of $2,452,126. Thus the increase under the Liberal Administration was $666,280 per year, as compared with $2,452,126 in four years of Conservative administration.

We have had something said with regard to the cost of immigration. The late Government was charged with not paying due attention to this question. I believe it to be one of the most important questions with which the Government have to deal. We have a great territory and a great many broad acres that are not under cultivation, a territory sufficient to keep in comfort and happiness fifty to seventy-five million people. I think that money well laid out to induce the right kind of immigrants to come and settle here would be expended in the interests of the people and should not meet with any objection. The cost of immigrants to Canada during the years when the Mackenzie Government held power was $13.80, and the cost during the same number of years under the late Conservative Administration was $5.72 per head.

The next point I have to deal with is to be found in the argument of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) that farm property in this country had greatly reduced in value. Unfortunately, we have not statistics in all the provinces of the Dominion by which we could ascertain the increase and decrease. But in Ontario the statistical bureau keeps a record, and this record shows that there has been at least some mistake made with regard to the decrease of farm property in that magnificent province by the hon. gentleman. Farm lands, buildings, implements and live stock in Ontario were valued in 1884 at $949,873,170, and in 1894 that value had increased to $954,355,507. Therefore, instead of there being a decrease in the value of farm property, we find that there has been in Ontario a very substantial increase, especially in buildings and implements and live stock. There have been decreases in some portions of Ontario in the value of land, but that has not been caused by the National Policy, but by the opening up of Manitoba and the North-west Territories lands, to be sold cheaper to agriculturists, and by the low price of produce which has existed during the past eighteen years. We were told, too, that the National Policy had caused the farm prices to fall to about one-third of what they were. I have here a list of quotations from a newspaper published in Canada giving the prices on November 7th, 1878, and also on November 7th, 1895. While the list is too long to read in detail, I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. members of this House that there is very little variation in prices considered in the aggregate, and that such difference as there is is quite favourable to the prices of 1895. If any hon. gentleman desires to know these prices, I will read them, but it is tedious to read such a long list of figures. This is taken from the "Globe" newspaper, and hon. gentlemen on the other side will not object to that authority.

There is another very important matter in connection with this. While depression exists to a great extent in Canada among the agriculturists as well as among all other classes of the people, there is one fact patent to every man, and that is that a dollar to-day will buy as much as two dollars would buy in 1878. In answer to those who speak depreciatingly of Canadian industries and immigration and the population of this country, I may be permitted to refer to some matters within my own knowledge. We have in Magog the Dominion Cotton Mills Company's works. In the census of 1891 we find a record of the increase of the population of that little manufacturing town. Between 1881 and 1891 the population of Magog increased 173.4 per cent; and between 1891 and the present year it was increased 125 per cent. The valuation of the township in 1878 was $175,000. The valuation of the town to-day is over $1,000,000. The number of hands employed in the Dominion Cotton Mills Company's mills at Magog is 800, and the wages paid to these men per year amount to $230,000. If you were to go into my constituency as a free trader and say to the people that they do not want protection, that you will take away protection and close the doors of this factory, and offer yourself as a candidate on that policy, I am sure that instead of having 500 majority as I had in the last election, I would receive 2,000 majority. There is no question, Sir, that this industry has been of great importance to the people of that country, that it has given employment to a large number of operatives, who furnish a market for the farmers of the surrounding country that is highly appreciated.

There is another matter to which, perhaps I may not be excused for calling attention, being a young member. But somehow, not being accustomed to political life, when I have heard accusations and criminations and recriminations hurled across the floor of this House repeatedly and upon the most trivial question, I have felt that if strangers were here they would say that if we were telling the truth about each other in this House we would be unworthy of the positions which we hold as representatives of the people. I came here as a business man to do business. I have listened quietly to the speeches that have been made, and I have been surprised to hear the hard talk hurled across the floor of this House by hon. members upon either side. I believe, Sir, that my constituents and your constituents did not send us here for the purpose of cursing and calling each other hard names; and when the Liberal-Conservative party here last night were told that they were corruptionists—

THE ROYAL ASSENT.

A Message from His Honour the Deputy Governor by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod :

Mr. Speaker,

His Honour the Deputy Governor desires the immediate attendance of this House in the Senate Chamber.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, with the House, went to the Senate Chamber.

(In the Senate Chamber.)

His Honour the Deputy Governor was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following Bill :—

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money required for defraying certain expenses of the Public Service for the financial year ending the 30th June, 1897, and for other purposes relating to the public service.

SUPPLY—TARIFF LEGISLATION.

Mr. MOORE. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, before I took my seat, I was trenching a little too much upon the prerogative of older members, and might be thought to be reading them a lecture upon decorum in this House. But that was not my intention. Perhaps I may not be made of quite the same stuff as other men are. It seems to me that a Liberal is as good as a Conservative if he behaves himself and I see no reason why we should not treat each other with that respect and courtesy due to gentlemen outside of this House. There is no man I appreciate more than the leader of the Government, and that for his courtesy, but I think we have men on this side of the House who are worthy of respect also ; and I do not think the evidence that has been given here should be taken and a verdict rendered upon it by the people of this country. I have an article placed in my hand of which I will read one paragraph. It is from the "Week," and is on the subject of dignity of Parliament :

The prerogatives of Parliament are preserved by immemorial custom and protected by positive law ; the dignity of Parliament must be maintained by its own members in their personal relations. If, while they call each other "honourable gentlemen," they abuse each other like pickpockets on the floor of the House, they cannot fairly expect the general public to hold either Parliament or its members in high esteem.

And I may say that, not being an experienced parliamentarian, I was not a little surprised to hear a gentleman of the great ability and great reputation of the hon. member for South Oxford call the Liberal-Conservative party a party of corruptionists and boodlers and all that was bad. Sir, I belong to the Liberal-Conservative party : I have belonged to the Liberal-Conservative party for the last twenty-five years, and while I do not profess to be any better than other men, I do not believe that I am guilty personally upon this charge that was hurled across the floor of the House, and I do not believe other gentlemen who are associate with me are open to such a charge. But, Sir, if I were willing to retaliate, I might remind the hon. gentleman that those who live in glass houses should not throw stones. I think, Sir, that according to the court records of this country between 1874 and

Mr. MOORE.

1895, there were eighty-eight Liberals unseated for corrupt practices in elections, and eight personally disqualified for seven years, while there were only forty-eight Conservatives unseated and only one disqualified. After listening attentively to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), I appreciated more fully a story that was told of an old Presbyterian minister. He was located in a place, but went away to preach one Sunday, and another man filled his pulpit. When he came back he asked his beadle what he thought of the new minister. The beadle replied that he did not like the new minister very well, that he had made all his points clear. "I do not like him as well as I do you," said the beadle ; "because you have the faculty of confusing the understanding and tangling up the judgment in a way that is very amusing indeed." I thought when listening to the speech of the hon. gentleman that he had the same qualification as the minister—he had the faculty of confusing the understanding and tangling up the judgment. I would like to compare the protective tariff in force for eighteen years with the free trade and tariff-for-revenue-only policy which the leaders of the Liberal party have undertaken to force upon the people of this country.

Unrestricted reciprocity and commercial union, under the emphatic condemnation of the people, may be considered dead and buried. Therefore, we may conclude that free trade, and tariff for revenue, and free trade as it is in England, are the only policies which the Liberal party have to replace the protective tariff of the late Government. I will now undertake to show by figures which I have in my hand, the effect of a free trade tariff in Canada, and I will make a comparison between a free trade tariff and the protective tariff of the late Government. Let me take the article of breadstuffs, and give the importations into Canada in 1878, just those articles which the farmers of this country can raise, if they can raise anything, consisting of barley, oats, peas and beans, rye, corn, wheat, wheat flour, rye flour, meal and oatmeal. The importations of these articles amounted in value to $13,446,960, in 1878, under a free trade policy. They came in here freely in competition with the home-grown grain of the farmers of this country. In 1878 the Liberal-Conservative party imposed a protective tariff upon these articles of breadstuffs which I have enumerated ; and in 1894 we imported only $1,000,862 worth, showing a decline of $12,446,098 per year, which, in eighteen years, would amount to the enormous sum of $224,049,764 in favour of the National Policy over the free trade tariff that was in operation up to 1878. That is the encouragement which the Conservative Government gave to the farmers of this country, stimulating them to raise enough for themselves and also for export. That is the comparison which I make between free trade and a protective tariff, because that was a free trade tariff, and ours has been a protection tariff.

I will now compare the results between a revenue tariff and the protective tariff that has been in operation for the last eighteen years, taking the line of meats, including pork, lard, bacon and hams. Of these articles we imported into Canada, in 1890, $1,458,286 worth. The farmers of this country were not satisfied with the protection they were getting under a tariff for revenue upon meats, and they went to the Government and asked them to increase the tariff, and it was accordingly made a protective tariff. In 1895 the importation of meats, in the articles mentioned, declined to $309,436, or a difference of $1,148,850 in one year. We also exported a very large amount of meat in consequence of the stimulating effect of a protective policy, and that, added to the decrease in importations, made a difference of $4,443,365 under a protective tariff over a tariff for revenue only. Sir, under the protecting care of this policy that has effected such wonders in the development of the agricultural interests, we, in 1878, exported of animals, meats, dairy products, fruit, poultry and game, eggs, hides, hams and skins, under a tariff for revenue, $29,922,145 worth. In 1894, under a protective policy, we exported $47,802,859, being an increase of $17,886,714. Taking breadstuffs and the increase of such exports as I have mentioned above, and we have a difference of $30,000,000 a year in favour of the National Policy over the policies which the people of this country have declared they do not want.

Now, Sir, we have heard something about reciprocity with the United States. I am of opinion that we cannot get, on any terms, reciprocity with the United States which would be advantageous to Canada. We never can expect to renew a reciprocity treaty on the lines of that which existed in 1854; and, Sir, I have no doubt in my mind that a renewal of that treaty of 1854 would be a great injury to the agricultural interests of Canada. The United States are competitors with us, instead of being consumers of our farm products. Not very long ago I had occasion to go along the frontier, and found that a merchant was buying dressed hogs upon this side of the line and paying 4½ cents a pound for them. On the other side of the line another merchant was buying from the Vermont farmers and paying them only 2¾ cents a pound. The pork raisers of Vermont sent a delegation to the custom-house officer upon this side of the line and offered to give him a cent a pound if he would permit the introduction into Canada of dead hogs. Of course he told their delegate that he could not change the tariff, that he would have to pay three cents instead of one; and he said then, of course, that would rule them out and they would not be able to come into Canada. There is a fair illustration of the effect that reciprocity would have in pork and many other articles, if free trade were to take place between Canada and the United States. Another gentleman was buying wool on the frontier. On our side of the line he was paying 15 cents a pound, while on the other side he was paying only 13 cents. Now, I do not believe the farmers of Canada want to renew negotiations with the United States for a treaty under which they would get two cents a pound less for their wool and two cents a pound less for their fresh hogs. I had occasion to travel through portions of the states of Vermont and New Hampshire last summer, and I tell you as a positive fact, incredible though it may seem, that within 15 miles of the town of Wells River, I saw many abandoned farms; and I travelled through three abandoned villages, and saw only one house inhabited in each. Now, Mr. Speaker, if we wish for a treaty with the United States that would permit the free introduction of farm products into this country in exchange for ours going into that country, and if such a policy is going to reduce the prices of farm products to the people of Canada, I am sure that the farmers of this country would not derive any advantage from such a treaty. In a city not very far from where I live, there is a gentleman who has an interest in a ranch in the western states. He imported several car-loads of horses into Sherbrooke, and sold them out to the people of the Eastern Townships, after paying the duty, at a less price than the farmers of this country ask for horses of the same class. Therefore, we may say that so far as horses are concerned, there would be no benefit from a reciprocity treaty on the lines of 1854, when the people can import horses from the United States, and pay duty on them, and sell them in competition with horses raised in this country. The Americans raise dairy products, and have a surplus, as we have; they find a market in England, as we do, and there is no object in removing the duty from dairy products entering the United States. So far as our farm products are concerned, with the possible exception of some not very important articles, it would be disadvantageous to our farmers to enter into a treaty of reciprocity with the United States, even if its terms were as liberal as those of the treaty of 1854. In my opinion, it would be more useful and profitable for our people to turn their attention to London, instead of looking to Washington. The American market is practically closed to us. We cannot compete either with the farmers or manufacturers of that country in their own market. But England admits free into her markets products of the Canadian farms. The population of the United Kingdom is 40,000,000, in round numbers. They raise food for only 18,000,000 of their population, and so it is the equivalent of a nation of 22,000,000 which has to be supplied from other countries. According to the statistics, we find that she imports among food products from other countries the following:—

Dressed meat .....	$115,678,905
Butter .....	69,326,785
Cheese .....	22,747,681
Eggs .....	19,483,408
Fruit (raw) .....	23,680,347
Lard .....	14,317,446
Condensed milk .....	5,258,720
Poultry and game .....	2,945,141

$273,438,435

These products are what we can supply profitably if transportation is furnished with cold storage. When the appropriation for $20,000 was brought down by the Minister of Agriculture, I ventured to suggest that it would be rather unfair to limit the aid to creamery butter, and I asked the hon. gentleman if the privilege could not be extended to dairy butter. The best qualities of dairy butter and factory cheese are produced around Lake Memphremagog, in the county represented by the hon. member for Brome, and also in the county of Stanstead which I represent. When we come to consider the subject of the dairy and the claims of the women engaged in butter-making, and consider that they will have to pay transportation and cold storage expenses on their butter sent to England, and creamery butter at the same time, being aided by the Government in being placed in cold storage and delivered in good condition in the English market; under these circumstances, I am afraid that the regular dairy-butter makers will not feel that the Minister of Agriculture has fully appreciated their claims. I suggest, in view of the fact that our agricultural products are available towards supplying this value of $273,438,435, the Government should provide cold storage for dressed meat, butter, eggs, condensed milk and poultry. I know the Minister of Agriculture possesses ability for his present position, and that he will conscientiously do what he can in the direction of assisting our farmers to place their dairy and other perishable products on the English market and open up a great trade with the mother country. When we come to the subject of butter, we find the imports of Great Britain in 1895 were as follows:—

Canada .....	$ 746,552
Australasia .....	6,932,980
United States .....	1,322,643
Sweden .....	8,001,340
Denmark .....	28,946,186
Germany .....	2,750,119
Holland .....	4,571,387
France .....	11,897,705
Other countries .....	4,154,874

$69,326,786

It will thus be seen that, while Australia sent butter to the value of $6,932,000; Denmark, $28,946,000; France, $11,897,000; Canada, although it is admitted we have as good pasturage and water as any of the countries enumerated, only shipped butter to the value of a little over $700,000. It is not creditable to the intelligence and enterprise of Canadians that our farmers should be able to place on the English market only a little over half a million dollars' worth of butter, when Denmark places there this article to the value of almost $29,000,000. I am sure that, if cold storage is provided, so that all our dairy products, and especially butter, can be placed on the English market in good condition, the trade will be largely developed. While I profess to be a loyal subject, a patriotic son of this country, it seems to me—although I do not wish to criticise the actions of hon. gentlemen on either side of the House—that, if we took a little of the money appropriated to the Minister of Militia and placed it in the hands of the Minister of Agriculture, it would be very much better for the people. England is represented to us as a nation whose example we should follow. I am proud of old England; I am proud of Canada. I am proud of the achievements of this Dominion to which I belong, for this country is one of the brightest jewels, and perhaps the brightest jewel, in the Crown of our noble Queen, and I would hesitate to allow anything done that would tend to restrict the commercial relations between the mother country and Canada. But, if we were to enter on a free trade policy as it is in England to-day, no doubt similar results would follow here, as in the mother country. A recent statement made by Lord Salisbury, as put upon the bulletin boards of Montreal, was that free trade has wrecked agriculture in England, as it has in every other country where it has been tried. We can, however, understand the reason why England has adopted a free trade policy. The farming class form a comparatively small percentage of the population, and, I suppose, Lord Salisbury and those who hold his views, are of the opinion, as expressed by him in regard to the introduction of German sugar into the United Kingdom, that it was a question of securing the greatest good to the greatest number, and that the Government could do nothing to relieve the English refiners. That is the position taken, I understand, by the free trade party in England. Undoubtedly, while this system, from their point of view, may destroy agricultural interests, it may benefit the great majority of the population. But it has brought distress on the farmers to such an extent that there was introduced into the Imperial Parliament, last session, a Bill entitled the Farmers' Rating Bill, by which $10,000,000 a year was to be contributed to relieve the distressed condition of the farmers. England has adopted a free trade policy. It came in force in 1846, and, on looking over the returns between England and every other importing country, we find the balance of trade has been largely against England, until last year it amounted, according to the "Statesmen's Year-book," to $960,000,000. She is the only country that has adopted a free trade policy: all the countries with which she is trading, have adopted the opposite policy, or are advancing in the direction of protection, instead of free trade. We are told that she has investments all over the world that recoup her, but I can only find an annual return of $470,000,000 upon investments outside of the United Kingdom, which leaves $490,000,000 to account for. If that drain continues from old England, in the balance of trade with other countries, the time will come when the eyes of the people will be opened to the fact, that as Lord Salisbury said: It may be a nice thing in sentiment to allow other nations to come in freely and compete with our own manufacturers and producers, but it is not a matter of business.

I have already taken up the time of the House longer than I intended to, but I have a few more figures which may prove interesting and instructive to hon. gentlemen opposite. Let me refer for a moment to the taxation and the expenditure per capita in Canada. The Liberal-Conservative party have been accused by gentlemen opposite of being extravagant and corrupt; and they have been charged with the maladministration of the affairs of the country. I hold in my hand figures, taken from authoritative sources, which give the expenditure per head of the various countries in the world. Europe, which includes Austro-Hungary, France, the German Empire, Netherlands, Portugal, Belgium, Denmark, Greece, Italy, Norway, Roumania, Russia in Europe, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland and Turkey, the average expenditure is $8.62 per head of the population. On the continent of America, including the Argentine Republic, Brazil, Mexico, Peru, United States, Uruguay, Chili and Venezuela, the average expenditure is $10.17. Australasia, including New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Western Australia, Queensland, Tasmania, New Zealand, the South Seas, Fiji and the Falkland Islands, the average expenditure is $30.44 per head. Now, Sir, in Canada which has been ruled for the last eighteen years, as we have been told (by hon. gentlemen opposite and their Liberal friends in the country), by a corrupt and boodling administration, the Liberal-Conservative party has carried on the affairs of this country for an expenditure of $7.50 per capita of the population. In view of such a record as that, it is unfair and unjust to characterize the Liberal-Conservative Government as boodlers, thieves, and corruptionists. I regret that hon. gentlemen opposite should resort to such unfair denunciation. For my part, I would be sorry indeed to hurl such accusations against these gentlemen on the other side of the House. I entertain great respect for those of them whom I know, and later on when I may become acquainted with the others I hope that my respect for them will increase as my acquaintance with them increases. I will close, Mr. Speaker, by repeating a few lines which were written a great many years ago by a patriotic citizen of the United States, for it occurs to me that they are as applicable to Canada now.

as they were to the American republic when written:

Our country 'tis a glorious land,
With broad arms stretched from shore to shore;

The proud Pacific chafes her strand,
She hears the dark Atlantic roar.

And nurtured on her ample breast,
How many a goodly prospect lies;
In nature's wildest grandeur drest,
Enamelled with her loveliest dyes.

Rich prairies decked with flowers of gold
Like sunlit oceans roll afar,
Broad lakes her azure eyes behold
That bright reflects the polar star.

And mighty rivers mountain born,
Go sweeping onward dark and deep
Through forests where the bounding fawn
Beneath her sheltering branches leap.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, I have very great pleasure in complimenting my hon. friend the member for Stanstead (Mr. Moore) upon his very successful maiden effort in the Canadian House of Commons. I have listened to his speech with much pleasure. It is a speech upon which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Moore) has evidently bestowed a great deal of time, and he has compiled and presented to this House a vast amount of information; some of it bearing upon the question before us, and some of it useful mainly for the reason that it is interesting, although not particularly applicable to the subject under consideration. I can unite very heartily with that hon. member (Mr. Moore) in the desire he expresses, that the intercourse of the members of this House shall be of a kindly and gentlemanly character, and I have no doubt that further on in his parliamentary career, which I trust will be a satisfactory one to himself, the hon. gentleman will be able to live up to the standard he now places before the House as a desirable one to aim at. Should he remain in the House of Commons for fifteen or twenty years, and pass through some of the struggles that have characterized our contentions here in years past; should he be called upon to resist some of the acts of usurpation of the Government, similar to the Franchise Act, the Gerry-mander Act, and others that I could mention; he might possibly, Mr. Speaker, have the gloss of his etiquette slightly rubbed off. We sometimes here meet in contests over great political principles. The Opposition in this House has at times resisted gross impositions and outrages upon the people, and on such occasions men are apt, perhaps, to forget their manners in their earnestness. If the hon. gentleman should happen to see anything of that kind in the future, I hope he will be able to make due allowances for the intensity of purpose which may characterize members in their mode of urging their views. I do not know that I shall bestow much time on the points my hon. friend (Mr. Moore) has raised, but I will refer to a few of them.

My hon. friend (Mr. Moore) evidently has the idea that the administration of the financial affairs of Canada from 1874 to 1878, under the leadership of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was not a commendable one, and he informs us that after all the talk about the increase of debt, and that after all the denunciation against the Conservative Government for recklessness in this respect, yet, that the Government of Mr. Mackenzie increased the public debt by forty millions dollars during its term of office. My hon. friend (Mr. Moore) is a young member, and when he will look a little further into this thing, and when he will inquire into the reasons for that increase of debt, he will be able to judge more properly of the character of the financial record of the Mackenzie Administration. I desire to call the attention of my hon. friend (Mr. Moore) to the fact that when the Mackenzie Government assumed charge of the public affairs of Canada, they found certain obligations resting upon the country, which as the successors of the previous Government they were called upon to discharge. The honour of the country was placed in their hands; the interest upon the public debt must be provided for by them; the contracts entered into by their predecessors must be carried out by them, and when they came into office they found obligations to discharge, contracts entered into, and expenditures incurred which it was necessary for them to meet. They found that the preceding Government had a railway under construction called the Intercolonial Railway. The road was partially built, but the balance of the line was under construction, and the Mackenzie Government were under the necessity of completing this work which the Macdonald Administration had commenced. They found that the Welland Canal and other canals were in process of enlargement, and that very large sums of money were necessary to carry out obligations in this respect which the preceding Government had entered into. They also found that the previous Government had incurred certain obligations with regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway scheme, and that contracts were in progress at Ottawa in respect to the erection and enlargement of public buildings. And the Mackenzie Administration, for carrying out these contracts which were entered into by their predecessors, incurred the entire amount of the public debt added during their term of office. So I desire my hon. friend to take notice of the fact, not only that was the debt increased by $40,000,000, but that the Administration preceding the Mackenzie Administration was responsible for every dollar of that increase. A half truth is often worse than a whole falsehood; and if the hon. gentleman will hereafter tell the whole truth, he will not be designedly or undesignedly misleading the people of this country.

Mr. CHARLTON.

The hon. gentleman remarked that access to the markets of the United States is of very small consequence to the people of Canada. He has travelled in the state of Vermont, and the extent of his travels in that state enables him to give us information with regard to all the states of the union. He has found in Vermont some deserted farms and two or three deserted villages, and he has found that pork in Vermont is actually cheaper than it is in Stanstead. The trade returns, however, show that we do find a market in the United States, even under the trade restrictions at present against us. We find a market in the United States for various food products of our country. The hon. gentleman acknowledges that we find a market there for barley; but we also sell lambs, horses, swine, tallow, wool, flax, beans, hay and a great number of other articles. Our trade with the United States is a very large one, and those in favour of a reciprocity of trade simply maintain that if the barriers between these two countries were removed, the great cities on the seaboard, the great centres of population quite contiguous to our territory, would furnish us with a very large and very important market for the productions of our soil.

I desire to-day, as I do not want to consume very much of the time of the House, to refer to some points made by my hon. friend the member for York (Mr. Foster) last night, who I am sorry to see is absent from his seat. I may say at the outset that I consider the policy of attack upon the Government at the present time with reference to their trade policy a most absurd thing. The trade policy of the Government has not been formulated. The time for the criticising of that policy has not arrived. When that policy is formulated, my hon. friend from York may disagree with it; I make bold to suppose that in all human probability he will disagree with it; but until that policy is formulated, the hon. gentleman is not able to say what he is striking at. He does not know what to strike at. He does not know what he is condemning. He is only condemning in advance what he supposes the Government policy may be; and I repeat that the motion made by the hon. gentleman, and every position taken by him in reference to this matter, is entirely premature, and that it is a useless consumption of the time of this House to place this motion before it and to invite the discussion which must necessarily follow. But the hon. gentleman may say we ought to have known what the fiscal policy of the Government would be before Parliament was called together—that if we are not aware what that policy is, if we are not in a position to discuss the details of it, the Government is at fault for having convened Parliament without being able to place before Parliament their policy with reference to this matter. Well, Mr. Speaker, the conditions under which the Government have called this House together are of a very peculiar character. Under ordinary circumstances the newly-formed Government might have waited, and probably would have waited, until time enough had been taken by them to consider and mature their policy with regard to the tariff; but under the circumstances, it is well known to every intelligent gentleman in this House that this course could not be followed, that the exigencies of the public service demanded the immediate convening of Parliament for the granting of the supplies necessary for the public service. If the present Government had been responsible for that position of matters, then criticism would have properly lain at their door for having called Parliament together before they had matured their tariff policy and were ready to formulate it. But the circumstances were not of their own making. The exigency did not arise through their own misconduct or through their own failure to apprehend what they should do. But the situation was entirely due, not partially, but entirely, to their predecessors. Their predecessors remained in office until the term of the last Parliament had expired by effluxion of time. They kept Parliament together until the last day it could sit as a Parliament, without securing the voting of supplies. They wasted the time of that session in a useless attempt to pass a measure which was fore-ordained to defeat, and which they must have known could not be forced through this House; and when the last Parliament passed out of existence on the 24th day of April, these hon. gentlemen, instead of immediately issuing writs for an election and having a new Parliament convened in time to vote the supplies before the expiration of the then current fiscal year, delayed the issuing of the writs, and did not hold the general election till the 23rd day of June. The election was held, the Government were defeated, but they did not resign their portfolios until after the expiration of the fiscal year, 1895-96. When they did resign, and His Excellency called in his new advisers, those advisers had no time to develop a policy, no time to decide what they were to do about the tariff, no time to decide what they were to do about any of the public questions of the day. They had to provide for the exigencies of the public service, and we all know that they were obliged to tide over the difficulty by resorting to Governor General's warrants. We all know that this was a temporary expedient. It was condemned by the hon. gentlemen now in Opposition; and if their condemnation of this expedient was well-founded, it follows as a matter of course that they must approve of the calling of Parliament at an early day to obviate the necessity of issuing Governor General's warrants beyond the most limited extent. Well, the House was called to meet within forty days of the time the new Government was formed.

And during those forty days His Excellency had to choose his advisers, and the preliminaries of the organization and formation of the Cabinet had to be gone through, and these advisers had to go to the country to be re-elected, and a session was held at the earliest possible day, and it was convened avowedly for the sole purpose of tiding over the difficulties that existed through the failure of the late Government to provide supplies. We are here in session for that purpose. The Government avowed, when this House met, that its sole purpose was to get supplies. They informed us that they had not had time to formulate a tariff policy and consider the provisions of that policy, and address themselves in earnestness to that task, until this exigency of the service had been overcome, and the supplies being granted, they would be enabled to proceed with public business. What we should properly do now, is to give the Government their supplies. We should say to them: Now, gentlemen, you have the money you require to carry on the affairs of the country, get ready your policy, ascertain what you intend to do, and, when you are ready to submit that policy, call us at the earliest day. That is what it is reasonable to ask the Government to do, but that is not what the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) thinks ought to be done. He rose in his place and gravely presented a resolution, censuring the Government for not having during the forty days within which the House was to meet after the Government was formed, made a tariff policy, to make which properly must require ample and careful consideration and judicious and thorough investigation into the diverse wants of the country and the state of its business. Reference was made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to the delay in formulating the tariff when the National Policy was adopted in 1878, and when the verdict of the people was given that it should be adopted. The Mackenzie Government resigned in October, and the new Conservative Ministry was formed. Were they ready to submit their tariff to the country in forty days? Were they ready to do it in eighty days? The House was assembled, and the tariff policy of the new Ministers was presented to the House the following March, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite, who approve of the course adopted then, are now impatient because the same work has not been done by this Government inside of forty days. The difficulty in dealing with the tariff question, the fact that time is required to study it properly, is strikingly exemplified by the experience of the United States, when the last revision of the tariff was made there. The presidential election was held in 1892, the issue of that election was the tariff. The Democratic party had carried the country upon a platform of tariff reform, calling for large reductions in the amounts of duties imposed. Now, one would suppose that, with a solemn verdict of the people in favour of that policy, the carrying of that verdict into effect would not have been a work requiring a very great time. But what were the facts? President Cleveland was elected in November, 1892. He was inaugurated the 4th March, 1893. A special session was called in the following September, two or three months in advance of the regular time, for the purpose of dealing with the tariff question, on which the people had passed their verdict. How soon did they get the tariff passed? The House of Representatives sat, for that purpose, from September until February, preparing a tariff measure, which went to the Senate. And the Wilson Bill never became law until August, 1894. It required from September, 1893, to August, 1894, for Congress to put in shape their Tariff Bill, and yet the Government of Canada are expected to deal with a question of this magnitude in forty days, and at the same time form a Government and go back to the people for re-election, and go through all the confusion and excitement and uncertainty which are necessary incidents to the formation of a Government. The idea is preposterous. Hasty, immature action in this matter would have been wrong. The Government, had they adopted such a policy, would have been likely to make serious mistakes, the consequences of which could scarcely be retrieved, and the Government are worthy of all commendation for having decided to take up this matter cautiously, to proceed prudently, to study their ground thoroughly, ascertain what the wants of the country are and what are the conditions of trade and of manufacturing enterprises, and what the wants of the agricultural classes are—in fact, to master the situation as much as they possibly can, in order that they may formulate a tariff policy in accordance with the wants, desires and interests of the people.

It was said by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) that there is commercial distress and business derangement in the country in consequence of this delay in bringing down the tariff. I deny the assertion in toto. There is of course, to some extent, business derangement in the country. There is a feeling of disquietude in business circles with regard to certain matters; but this derangement, this feeling of disquietude, has no connection whatever with the tariff issues. It proceeds from other causes. We have to the south of us a condition of things which reacts upon Canada. Nothing can affect the commercial interests of that country, without having its influence upon the commercial interests of this country, and it is in consequence of the state of trade in that country. It is in consequence of the unrest and the uncertainty that exists in that country to-day, as to the very foundation of all the financial operations in the United States as to what the basis of its circulating medium will be, that there is commercial distress and business derangement in Canada. I think it is safe to say that the manufacturers, the importers and the business classes generally of this country are, so far as this Government is concerned, in a hopeful mood. I believe that all these classes expect that this Government will do what is right. They expect that the Government will proceed cautiously, and that the measure the Government formulates will be of a character calculated to secure the best interests of the country. These classes understand perfectly well that the Government proposes to carefully examine the situation, to consider the interests of all, to avoid class legislation, and, so far as it possibly can to conserve the interests of every great business in Canada, whether manufacturing, commercial, agriculturing, mining or lumbering. This being the belief—and I think I am warranted in saying that this is the belief which exists among business men—the people of Canada intend to wait patiently until the Government has formulated its policy, entertaining the belief that that policy will be in the best interests of Canada, and I am confident that the people will not be disappointed in their expectations.

The hon. leader of the Government, in his speech the other night, gave the keynote of the policy of his Government, when he said, quoting the immortal words of the late President Lincoln, that this was intended to be a government of the people, by the people, for the people. The intention of the Government, he said, is to consult the interests of the people, and there is no element of the population that will be considered too insignificant to receive from the Government fair consideration. I do not suppose that my hon. friend from York desires to create a panic. I do not suppose that he desires to see a condition of things created here which would enable him to say: You see the results of Grit rule in this country: you see what condition of things results from putting these Grits into office. I do not suppose the hon. gentleman has any feeling of that kind; but I will say that, whether unintentionally or intentionally, his remarks were calculated to produce such a result; and, had he desired to produce a panic and throw the discredit on the present Government, he could not have adopted a line better calculated to produce that result, and, if his remarks do not produce that result, that simply proves that the people have too much sense to be misled by any such representations as the hon. gentleman made.

As to the character of his speech, it was rather a curious conglomeration. It reminded me of the story told of an individual who went to a restaurant in New York. The waiter asked him what he would have, and he said he would take a little of everything, and the waiter shouted down to the cook: "A plate of hash for one." The hon. gentleman's speech was a plate of hash, containing a little of everything. He went over a great deal of ground, and, so far as I could see, scarcely dealt with any issues now before the House. There is one point in the hon. gentleman's speech to which I feel bound to devote some attention. He made a set attack upon different members of the Government and other members on the Government side of the House, regarding their position upon the reciprocity question. He took particular pains to ring the changes upon the assertion that reciprocity with the United States meant discrimination against England. He was specially particular to impress upon the House that the adoption of this policy would be disloyal in the extreme, because it meant unjust, undue and disloyal discrimination against the mother land. Well, perhaps this charge, coming from the leading advocate of a policy that discriminates against England, coming from a leading advocate of a party whose aim is to exclude English goods from this country altogether, and, if not possible altogether, then to as great an extent as possible. I imagine that the formulating of such a charge of discrimination against England by a party which has been doing this for the last eighteen years, is slightly inconsistent. The hon. gentleman asserted that the truth of the charge had been admitted by the leader of the Government and the Minister of Trade and Commerce and other members of the Government, including myself.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, it would be well, in considering this question, to look at it fairly. When the charge is brought against the party favourable to reciprocity of discrimination against England, it must not be forgotten that, in approaching the United States and asking for concessions, for trade modifications that must necessarily be made by that country if we do secure reciprocity, we are asking the United States to discriminate against other countries in our behalf. If we approach the United States with an offer of a reciprocity treaty, if we ask of the United States free admission into their markets for our natural products, free admission into their markets for such articles of manufacture as are placed on the list for mutual free exchange, we are asking for discrimination on the part of the Government of the United States against the world in our favour. There can be no doubt about that. And if a treaty is granted, the United States places us, so far as the different articles covered by the treaty are concerned, upon a vantage ground in a position where we have exceptional advantages, and are discriminated in favour of as against other countries having trade with the United States. And if it is true that we ask the United States to discriminate in our favour, certainly it is not unreasonable that the United States should ask us to discriminate in their favour to a corresponding extent; and if we decline to do this, why we are not ready and willing to make the reciprocal concessions upon our side for what we ask from them. We say to the people of that country: We ask you to admit the products of our farms, to admit the products of our forests, our mines and our fisheries free of duty; we ask you to do this for us, not for the world, but for us; we ask this special favour; we ask, to this extent, to be discriminated in favour of as against all other countries in the world with which you trade. And when the United States says: Very well, we will meet you upon that ground, and we ask you to discriminate in our favour to a certain extent that is to be agreed upon in the admission of a list of manufactures into your country, why it is simply a reciprocal discrimination that is asked for. Now, it is true that discrimination to the extent that may be absolutely necessary is, in my opinion, justifiable; and, in my opinion, it will be considered justifiable by the Colonial Office.

But, Sir, there is a large amount of misapprehension as well as of misrepresentation with regard to the question of discrimination. The truth is, Sir, that in agreeing upon a list of manufactured articles to be imported into this country from the United States free, it will not be necessary to discriminate against the English people to any considerable extent and it may not be necessary to discriminate against them to any appreciable extent even. I wish to draw attention to one peculiar feature of the trade between this country and the United States, and that between this country and England. I wish to point out that our dutiable imports from England are almost distinct in character from our dutiable imports from the United States. For instance, Sir, we imported last year of dutiable articles from the United States $25,795,000 worth. Now, there were 182 selected classes out of this list of which the importation from the United States was $14,716,000, and the importation from Great Britain of the same classes was $1,933,000. Or, if we extend the list and add 210 selected classes further, we find that of these we imported from the United States $21,796,000, and from England $3,094,000, or in this list embracing dutiable importations of $22,000,000 in round numbers, we imported from England but 14 per cent of the amount we imported from the United States. Now, if all these articles were placed upon the free list, our discrimination against England would amount to but 14 per cent of the total. But we can make a selection, Mr. Speaker, that will be even less objectionable than this. A great many of the minor articles that pay duty, we import almost exclusively from the United States; and I have a list in my hand which embraces articles to an extent fully as great, in my opinion, as it would be necessary to give in selecting the list of manufactures for reciprocity, in which the discrimination against England would be practically nil. The importation from the United States of the articles on this list amounted to $5,390,000, while the importations of these articles from England amounted to $172,000, or 3½ per cent of the amount we imported from the United States. Now, if we were negotiating a treaty at Washington, and if we had agreed upon a list of manufactures for free mutual interchange made up of this list I hold in my hand, we would strike England's importations into this country to the extent of $170,000. This is a mere bagatelle. The English people would not oppose it, they would not even consider it. They would say: If this does you any good, go on without considering this paltry 3½ per cent that you import from England. This is the list:

If we were to offer the United States that list as a compensation for the discrimination we ask them to make in our favour in the free admission of our natural products into their markets, England would not for a moment object, and that very list embraces a number of articles which I believe our own manufacturers can produce as cheaply, or more cheaply than they can be produced in the United States; and if such is the case the arrangement would simply open to them an extension of a market embracing seventy millions of people, in addition to the five million they now supply. I believe there would be a surprise in store for the people of this country and for the people of the United States if a free list for manufactured articles was arranged between the two countries, in the fact that Canada would be able to a large extent to avail herself of the reciprocal conditions and export largely in those lines. Now, Mr. Speaker, if this is true, then the argument of my hon. friend from York about discrimination is simply a bogey; it is nothing more or less. The hon. gentleman has not examined into this question, he has not made himself aware of the fact that the importations from the United States into this country paying duty, are, as a rule, totally distinct in their nature from the importations coming to this country from England, and that the framing of a reciprocity tariff embracing an agreed list of manufactures, does not involve the necessity of discrimination against England. I assert that this is the case. When the Brown draft treaty was negotiated in 1874, that treaty placed upon the free list articles of natural produce sixty-one in number, the classifications embraced sixty-one kinds. It placed upon the list thirty-nine manufactured articles in the line of implements, and it placed upon the list thirty-nine classifications in the line of general manufactures. It was universally conceded that the Brown draft treaty would have been highly advantageous to Canada if we could have secured its ratification by the United States Senate; and I assert here to-day that the Brown draft treaty made greater concessions, in all human probability, in the line of placing manufactures upon the free list, than it would be necessary to make to-day. I assert that in all human probability a reciprocity treaty can be negotiated at Washington in the event of the McKinley party coming into power, that will be more favourable to Canada as regards the free list of manufactures, than was the Brown draft treaty of 1874 which we were so anxious to obtain. There are many things we can offer to the United States. We concede freely to that country, of course, that the free admission of our natural products would be of great advantage to this country, and an advantage so great that it would be proper to make some concessions in other directions to compensate for it. And we have other things to offer. We have our fisheries. The opening of our fisheries to the United States would be a make-weight way of very great importance, and could be made to tell very greatly in our favour. Then we have the fact that we can partly compensate the United States for refraining from imposing a duty upon lumber, by refraining, on our part, from imposing an export duty upon logs. Sir, I am thoroughly impressed with the belief that if representatives of the Canadian Government go to Washington with a sincere desire to negotiate a reciprocity treaty upon lines mutually advantageous and mutually fair, such a treaty can be negotiated without difficulty, and upon lines that will be acceptable to the English Government, and acceptable to the people of Canada.

My hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) in the course of his speech, charges various sins against members upon his side of the House. He says that in addition to being in favour of reciprocity, we have been in favour of commercial union, we have been in favour of continental free trade, we have been in favour of unrestricted reciprocity, and of straight reciprocity, and of free trade as they have it in England. I have not a list of all his grievances, but there are several more. Now, no doubt, when the question of reciprocity engaged the attention of our public men in Canada, as it did for a number of years, and when discussions were in order as to the proper methods of securing reciprocity in trade with the United States, many individual opinions were held and were expressed. I have no doubt that in the latitude that was allowable for the expression of opinion, many members of the Liberal party expressed opinions with regard to this matter that the party as a whole would never have accepted. I know that some expressed themselves in favour of commercial union, others in favour of unrestricted reciprocity, others in favour of a restricted measure of reciprocity. But whatever may have been the divergence of views existing among members of the party, whether prominent or not, a full discussion of the question and the presentation of those views were necessary in order to fuse the sentiment that existed in the party; and when that fusing of sentiment took place, we then came down to the basis upon which the party as a whole could agree. That basis was not commercial union, although many members of the party had advocated it; it was not unrestricted reciprocity, though many members of the party had advocated that; but the fusing of those sentiments and the basis agreed upon, was the plank that exists in the Liberal platform adopted by the great Liberal convention at Ottawa, in June, 1893. And if any hon. gentleman on the Opposition side wants to know what the policy of the Liberal party is, let him turn, not to isolated expressions of sentiment prior to the adoption of that policy by the party, not to speeches made by individuals here and there, not to expressions of opinion which may have been wild or visionary, sound or unsound, and which were not accepted by the party, but let him turn to the policy formulated as the party's platform in its great convention and adopted, and upon which the party stands to-day. That is what any hon. gentleman should do; he should not deal with my sentiments prior to the adoption of that party platform, nor to the sentiments of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), nor even those of the leader of the party. Those sentiments have nothing to do with the case. Any remarks delivered at that time were only the expressions of opinion held by certain gentlemen, not the opinions accepted by the party, but we have now modified opinions adopted because those views were too visionary or too extreme. There was, of course, a great deal of discussion about this matter, and I am bound to say that so far as the views I presented, I have already declared that the party is not responsible for them and that I advocate them no longer, because the party has decided on a policy which does not go so far. Let me say that in considering this question as an abstract question, there were reasons to be urged in favour of all those phases that were presented. There were reasons to be urged in favour of commercial union.

Mr. MACLEAN. Was political union one of those phases?

Mr. CHARLTON. No. No one talked of political union except a few cranks, like the editor of a Sunday newspaper which is published in Toronto, by a man who talks about Yankees. The reasons urged by those who are in favour of commercial union, and it is only fair they should be placed before the House in order that the reasons presented may be understood, I will indicate. No man in Canada, I believe, advocated a scheme of commercial union where the tariff would not be arranged with our consent, where the tariff would not be arranged by the common consent of both countries. That was a sine qua non. No man advocated a system of commercial union or contemplated the possibility of effecting changes in a joint tariff without the concurrence of both parties to the arrangement. So the charge made that the policy was one favouring a tariff which would be framed by the Yankees, or changed by the Yankees at their pleasure, was destitute of foundation. One of the other arguments advanced in favour of the scheme was that it would effect a large saving in expense by dispensing with the interior custom-houses. But the most potent point, and the one which had the greatest weight with those who favoured this policy, was that it would remove the revenue difficulty. That was a difficulty which stared us in the face in the case of negotiating a reciprocity treaty. Whatever goods may be placed on the free list there is that much reduction in the revenue, and the great argument in favour of commercial union was the fact that it would dispose of the revenue difficulty. How? The proposition was to have a common fund. The moneys collected in the custom-houses of both countries were to go into that fund. That fund would be distributed per capita, each nation drawing from the consolidated fund according to its population. If this scheme went into operation, and there were placed on the free list goods on which we had formerly collected $7,000,000 annually, and there were also placed on the free list goods on which the United States had collected an equal sum on those imports from Canada, we would lose, if we were shouldering the loss ourselves, $7,000,000, and the United States would, if shouldering the loss itself, lose $7,000,000; but under this arrangement the loss would be $14,000,000, taken from the whole population of both countries, and the United States would pay $13,000,000 out of the $14,000,000, and Canada $1,000,000; and the effect of this arrangement and readjustment would be the removal of the revenue difficulty and the saving of $6,000,000 to Canada. I must confess that at the time I looked favourably on this view of the case. That consideration alone had great weight with me. I recognized the difficulty confronting this country in placing a long list of articles on the free list and sacrificing a large amount of revenue, which would have to be made up in some other way; and I believed that if that arrangement could be obtained by which the United States would shoulder six-sevenths of our loss, it would be the best way of arriving at a satisfactory conclusion. But these things are neither here nor there; these individual opinions expressed prior to the adoption of the party's platform have no bearing on the case whatever. Further than that individual members may be convinced that they were wrong, that they advocated some view not accepted by the party, these criticisms are useless; they do not compromise the position of the party and have nothing to do with its position or with the question as to whether the policy of the party on this subject is a prudent and judicious policy or not.

So much for that branch of the hon. gentleman's case. Then the hon. member for

Mr. CHARLTON.

York (Mr. Foster) proceeded to say: Of one thing now we are sure—this Government is in favour of unrestricted reciprocity. Well, the hon. gentleman is not sure of that; the hon. gentleman if he makes that statement, is mistaken. This party is not advocating unrestricted reciprocity, quite the contrary; the party is advocating a reciprocity treaty, which will leave large discretion with the Government which advocates it and which will impose on the same Government the necessity of very carefully guarding the interests of Canada, and indeed every section of Canadian interests. It may be asked here: What kind of a treaty would the Liberal party, now that it is in power—I am only giving my individual opinion—be likely to seek to obtain if possible at Washington? My answer is that, in my opinion, the Liberal party would proceed as cautiously and carefully as may be, in the matter of making concessions; that we would insist to the full extent on the great value of what we have to offer, the enormous value of our fisheries, the value of our refraining from imposing an export duty, and various other advantages we have to offer. We could point out that the importations into the United States of our goods now paying duty was inconsiderable, and we would endeavour to secure reciprocity with as limited a list of manufactured articles on the free list as possible; and I assert in a general way, and as to what should govern the action of the party in this country, that we would never consent to negotiating or consummating a treaty with the United States that was not advantageous to Canada; and if it were found that the demands of the United States were too onerous, that their expectations as regards concessions to be made by this Dominion were too great, we would simply abandon the attempt, because unless the treaty were obtained upon terms advantageous to Canada and was thoroughly fair and reciprocal, I, for one, would hold that we should reject the treaty. I do not expect that we shall ever frame a treaty except one that will be satisfactory to the people and to the interests of this country. So much for this branch of the question.

Now, the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) tells us that the leader of the Government is pledged to go to Washington. Well, Mr. Foster went once, and my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition went once, and I suppose in the light of their example it would not be a heinous sin for Mr. Laurier or a representative of the present Government to go also. I hope that if we ever send a representative to Washington, he will not find it necessary or convenient to leave that city on the day of his arrival, and that after the failure of his attempt, (if there should be a failure which I do not think there should be) we shall not find it necessary to make use of the good offices of the British Minister at Washington to implore the state department there, to have the kindness to grant our commissioners an interview.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) allow me to interrupt him for one moment to say, that there is not a word of truth in that statement. There is no foundation in truth for the statement. I was received in Washington in the most courteous manner possible by Mr. Blaine, and there was never any possible ground for any such statement as has been made now.

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, Mr. Speaker, of course I do not know that we could find in the official correspondence—in Mr. Blaine's return to the Senate, or in President Harrison's message transmitting Mr. Blaine's return to the Senate—I do not suppose we could find a reference made to that matter. There are a good many things that are matters of gossip in a city like Washington which you hear in diplomatic and congressional circles—

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. member (Mr. Charlton) should accept the statement of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) unreservedly.

Mr. CHARLTON. Certainly, I am accepting it fully. I am just reminding the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), that it was a matter of common report in Washington by senators and representatives, that the British Minister felt deeply chagrined at the failure on the first occasion to secure an interview.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not a word of truth in it.

Mr. CHARLTON. The manner in which President Harrison received, or rather, refused to receive the delegation, and the indignation of President Harrison at the confidence game played by the Canadian Government in making the United States a cats-paw in the elections, and assuming to themselves the credit of being the Simon Pure advocates of reciprocity; all this was a matter of common report. It was stated that these things had made President Harrison most indignant and had produced a most unfavourable impression at Washington. I say, Sir, that it was the common talk in congressional circles that Sir Julian Pauncefote had used his influence with Mr. Blaine and with President Harrison to get these gentlemen—of course that is something my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) would not know anything about necessarily—to get these gentlemen to accord to the Canadian commissioners an interview. And the report—which my hon. friend apparently is perfectly ignorant of, whether true or false—the report amongst congressmen and senators in Washington was, 'hat the result of Sir Julian Pauncefote's intercession and representations to the American Secretary of State, was the securing of that interview so barren of results, which took place in February, 1892.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Would the hon. gentleman allow me briefly to state just what took place?

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not know that it is necessary. I have the statement of Mr. Blaine, the Secretary of State, in my desk. All I am saying is, that the matter—which is not a matter of official correspondence—which was one of the incidents of this affair, or one of the episodes in the history of the Government with which my hon. friend was connected, was talked of in Washington, and was a matter of gossip in the corridors of the Senate and of the House of Representatives. I know myself that much indignation was felt in that city in regard to the management of the general elections of 1891 by the Conservative Government, in connection with the reciprocity matter.

Mr. MACLEAN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHARLTON. I will not be interrupted. I know that when Parliament was dissolved on February 3rd, 1891, and when the official reason was given for that dissolution in the "Empire" and in the Montreal "Gazette," which was that reciprocity negotiations were pending at Washington and that the Government dissolved Parliament because they were about to consummate a treaty, and because they did not desire to refer that treaty to a moribund House; I know, Sir, that when that declaration was made, five days after Secretary Blaine declared in a letter to Charles S. Baker, member of Congress from Rochester, that no negotiations whatever were pending, that the United States would never grant reciprocity upon the conditions that it was asserted this country was about to secure, that there was no foundation whatever for the assertion made by the Canadian Government as a reason for dissolution, and that the whole thing was utterly false.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say, that it had not been arranged between Mr. Blaine representing the government of the United States, and the Government of Canada, that on the 4th of March or on a particular day, a meeting was to be held between the representatives of Canada and the representatives of the United States for the purpose of considering the question of reciprocity?

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Bond of Newfoundland had been prosecuting negotiations with the state department at Washington with regard to a reciprocity treaty between that Island and the United States. The treaty was nearly consummated when the Canadian Government interposed, secured the intervention of the British Minister, and the setting aside of the negotiations, and the Canadian Government expressed its desire to be made a party to any such convention or arrangement between Newfoundland and the United States. Now, Sir, Mr. Blaine, I presume made no objection to the reception of the Canadian delegate or the consideration of Canada's claim or desire for a reciprocity treaty in connection with Newfoundland.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. But such negotiations were not in progress. The point had not been reached when the Canadian commissioners and the British Minister, in conjunction with Mr. Bond of Newfoundland, had appeared upon the scene at Washington to negotiate a treaty which should embrace the interests of Newfoundland and Canada. The representations made in the press supporting the hon. gentleman's party, prior to the dissolution of the House in 1891, were evidently coached, and were designed, and were untruthful. We saw in the "Empire" and we saw in the "Gazette" in the month of December, intimation that reciprocity negotiations were in progress at Washington. It was these representations made in the Canadian press, that attracted the attention of Charles S. Baker, member of Congress for Rochester, and which led Mr. Baker to address this letter to Secretary Blaine :

Washington, D.C., 29th Jan., 1891.

Hon. James G. Blaine,
Secretary of State.

My dear Mr. Blaine,—

It is reported in the newspapers of Canada and along the northern border of my state, where my constituents are deeply interested in the subject, that negotiations are going on between this country and Great Britain with a view of partial reciprocity with Canada, including natural products only and not manufactures, and it is stated that Sir Charles Tupper is on his way here as commissioner to negotiate for such modification to our tariff. I would be very glad if you would enable me to answer my constituents.

Very truly yours,
(Sgd.) CHAS. S. BAKER.

Now, this letter from Mr. Baker had been called forth by the fact that Mr. Baker had noted these representations in the Canadian Tory press which led him to believe that possibly there might be some truth in it, that possibly negotiations might be in progress upon the basis mentioned; and believing and fearing that this was the case, Mr. Baker, representing a border constituency resting upon Lake Ontario, naturally felt anxious to know whether this statement was true, and in order to ascertain definitely the truth or falsehood of the statement he applied to the Secretary of State of the United States from whom he could get an authoritative answer. Now, what did Mr. Blaine reply? His reply was as follows:—

Washington, D.C., 29th Jan., 1891.

My dear Mr. Baker,—

I authorize you to contradict the rumours you refer to. There are no negotiations whatever on foot for a reciprocity treaty with Canada, and you may be assured that no scheme for reciprocity with the Dominion confined to natural products will be entertained by this Government. We know nothing of Sir Charles Tupper's coming to Washington.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Very truly yours,
(Sgd.) JAMES G. BLAINE.

That is the reply of the American Secretary of State to the inquiry of Mr. Baker, an American congressman, made on the 29th day of January, 1891; and on the 3rd day of February, five days later, the Parliament of Canada was dissolved for the reason assigned, that the Government were negotiating a reciprocity treaty at Washington, that the consummation of the treaty was in sight, and that they did not desire to refer that treaty to a moribund House, but wanted a Parliament fresh from the people. Well, the House can decide for itself as to the character of these tactics. The House can decide for itself as to the truth of the statement that reciprocity negotiations were in progress; but my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition may come into collision on a question of veracity with the Hon. James G. Blaine, the American Secretary of State, who denied that negotiations were in progress.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not the slightest in the world.

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, our friends went to Washington.

Mr. MACLEAN. So did you.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, so did I, and I came back with something tangible, and our friends did not. The only trade concession we secured from the United States was free lumber. The Government gladly accepted it, and we have it yet; and, if I went to Washington and obtained that, I would rather have my record than the record of the hon. gentleman. Well, I must do our friends on the opposite side the credit of having managed matters with great astuteness and skill during the time they have been dealing with this question of trade with the United States. They have deceived or at least misled the people of this country time and again. They misled the people in 1891. Their success in that election was due, not to the National Policy, not to their general policy, but to the fact that they induced the people of Canada to believe that they were about to secure a reciprocity treaty with the United States.

In addition to the course they have pursued in this matter, they have amused the people very skilfully in various ways with proposals, which they asserted would give good substitutes for reciprocity with the United States. Among other things, they have always been harping upon the great advantages to be derived from trade with Australia, British Africa, and the West Indies, from Imperial Federation, and from differential duties between different parts of the Empire. All these schemes have been used by hon. gentlemen, who now, for the good of the country, are sitting in Opposition, where the good of the country will require them to sit long; and in these ways the people have been diverted from a true knowledge of the position of affairs.

Mr. McNEILL. The true thing would be political annexation with the United States.

Mr. CHARLTON. No, not at all.

Mr. McNEILL. It would suit you.

Mr. CHARLTON. This country does not want annexation with the United States.

Mr. MACLEAN. You want it.

Mr. CHARLTON. This country wants one thing—it wants a lot of cranks to come down to a position where they can give credit to men who are just as loyal as themselves. Now, if my hon. friend with the bee of Imperial Federation in his bonnet will allow me to proceed, it will be well enough to look at the magnitude of this trade which was offered to the country as a substitute for the advantages of reciprocal trade with the United States. In 1895 our exports of animals and their products to the West Indies were $75,487; to Australia they were $5; to British Africa they lacked ten mills of being one cent, and to the United States they were $3,713,000. The agricultural exports of this country for the same period were: to the British West Indies, $267,389; to Australia, $5,804; to British Africa, the same as the exports of animals and their products, nothing, and to the United States, $3,710,000. This paltry and miserable little fragment of trade, promoted by large subsidies to steamship lines, was offered as a substitute for the market of 70,000,000 people right at our doors, the magnitude of which is indicated by their immense internal commerce, in which we could share, if this Government would seek, by means of a reciprocity treaty, to obtain it.

The next question I shall answer is, why should the Liberal leader desire to go to Washington? What reason has he for going? What justification can he offer to the country for doing what I acknowledge the hon. member for York is right in asserting he intends to do—going to Washington to seek for a reciprocity treaty; and, perhaps, before I enter upon this branch of the subject, you would be kind enough to call it Six o'clock.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THE MATHER BRIDGE AND POWER COMPANY.

The House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 14) to incorporate the Mather Bridge and Power Company.—(Mr. Lount.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 14,

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not intend to offer any opposition to this Bill, but I wish to suggest an amendment to the fourteenth clause, which, I think, will meet with the approval of the promoter of the Bill. The probability is that the work, the authority for erecting which is asked, will at first be confined to the erection of two piers—one at the Canadian shore and one at 150 to 200 feet into the river from that shore, for the purpose of an under undershot wheel. This undershot wheel will be chiefly dangerous to small boats, and I wish to suggest that the company be required to place a glance boom there to guard against loss of life. I suggest this amendment to section 14:

And the company shall maintain a glance boom of timber from the shore 300 feet above the west shore pier to the second pier from the Canadian shore.

It will be comparatively inexpensive, and this provision would reconcile me to the passage of the Bill.

Mr. LOUNT. There is a clause in the Bill providing that the Governor General in Council may make provisions for all matters of that kind. I have no objection to this amendment, but it seems to me that the Governor General in Council will be able to deal with it in the interests of the public.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The judgment of the committee was to leave it to the Governor General in Council entirely to guard the rights of navigation in that particular part of the river. This amendment will take away the power of the Governor General in Council for this particular purpose.

Mr. CHARLTON. No; this merely provides as to the immediate construction.

Mr. McCREARY. Is the hon. gentleman sure that this dam will not obstruct a considerable part of the shore on the Canadian side? I should think it would be an impediment rather than a help, besides the Governor General in Council are to have control of these matters by this Bill, and they ought to be left to them.

Mr. WALLACE. I think that the proposition that the Governor General in Council should attend to all the details is not the proper course for Parliament to take. The Governor in Council, when these matters are carefully threshed out in the Railway Committee, and still further investigated by Parliament, would naturally conclude that all the safeguards considered necessary have been thrown around this charter. They will, therefore, perform any further duties in a very perfunctory manner. I think it is of the utmost importance that this committee should provide, after we have investigated—and we have investigated very closely—by specific enactments what we propose that company shall do and the safeguards that shall be thrown around for the protection of the interests of the people and the navigation as well. It has been proved before the Committee of Railways that this bridge—I do not suppose we should call it a bridge, because, although the charter asked for a bridge, it has now become apparent that it is not for a bridge at all; but for the purpose of taking advantage of the water power there and having a valuable water power franchise transferred to the company they, in the first place, proposed to build a bridge, and now it is not proposed to build a bridge at all. I think, Mr. Chairman, that this clause, as proposed by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), should be incorporated in the Bill and that we should have other precautionary clauses in the Bill too, in order to give proper assurance that the interests of the people are protected and that the company will be compelled to pay a proper amount of compensation to the people of Canada for the transfer of such a valuable franchise.

Mr. TISDALE. As to the safeguards which we are discussing, I have just appealed to the hon. member for North Norfolk, who moved this—

Mr. FRASER. He has withdrawn it.

Mr. TISDALE. Has the hon. gentleman withdrawn it?

Mr. CHARLTON. I have no objection; it is in the hands of the committee.

Amendment withdrawn. Bill reported and read the third time and passed.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, a few moments before recess, reference was made to the reciprocity negotiations, or rather to the lack of reciprocity negotiations at Washington, and I wish to refer to that question again for a moment before proceeding to discuss the reasons that I think may warrant the leader of the Government in attempting to re-open those negotiations and to send representatives of the Canadian Government to Washington again. I made the statement that prominent members of the Government had represented on the stump and prior to the dissolution of Parliament in 1891, that reciprocity negotiations were in progress and that the consummation of a reciprocity treaty was in the highest degree probable, so probable, indeed, that it was necessary in the estimation of the Government to dissolve Parliament, to hold an election, and to summon a Parliament fresh from the people to deal with this reciprocity treaty about to be consummated, and not to leave the consideration of that important measure to a moribund House. I find in an extract from a speech made by the Hon. Sir John Thompson in Toronto, on the 7th February, four days after the dissolution of Parliament, this statement, after he had been dealing with the question of negotiations between the United States and Newfoundland:

We indicated at the same time that the proposed treaty with regard to Newfoundland did not seem to be upon lines so extensive as would suit the wants and interests of Canada, and that it might be better to avail ourselves at the same time of entering upon separate negotiations on behalf of Canada. Well, Sir, that intimation was promptly conveyed by Her Majesty's Government to Washington, and the answer made by Mr. Blaine was an overture with regard to reciprocity.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. We will see what Mr. Blaine says about this matter. Mr. Blaine had had his attention called, probably, to the statement made by Sir John Thompson, and to similar statements made by leading politicians and members of the Government, and the matter was deemed by Mr. Blaine of sufficient importance to warrant him in sending a communication to the British Minister at Washington in regard to it. I have here the communication sent by Mr. Blaine to Sir Julian Pauncefote, on the 1st day of April following the election held in Canada. The letter is somewhat long, and I do not know that I will trouble the House with the whole of it, unless it is required. Mr. Blaine refers to the fact that a copy of a basis of negotiations was placed in his hands by Sir Julian on the 22nd December, and he says:

You told me, if my memory is not in error, that you were instructed by Lord Salisbury to propose topics to the United States for discussion and, if possible, for agreement.

The overture, it would seem from this, did not come from Mr. Blaine but came from the British Minister.

I answered that I felt sure that the President would be unwilling to appoint a commission to consider the propositions as they were stated, and, furthermore, that I should be unwilling to submit them to the President.

After some further conversation, in which you repeated that the propositions were merely the basis upon which a discussion might be instituted, I replied that in any event I had not a moment to give to the subject until after the adjournment of Congress in March, but that after that date I would be willing to respond to your request "to have a full but private conference with the British Minister and one or more agents from Canada, and go over every point of difference, and consider every subject upon which a mutual interest could be founded."

This was an overture, not from Mr. Blaine, but from the British Government, through the British Minister. Mr. Blaine continues:

If an agreement is reached, all well; if not, no official mention is to be made of the effort.

"Above all things, it is important to avoid public reference to the matter.

"This the President will insist upon."

While no notes were exchanged between us I carefully minuted my modification of the paper you left with me containing Lord Salisbury's proposition, and did so immediately after you left the department. You will observe the private character which I wished to impart to the conference is recognized by you a month later in your note of 27th January, when you called the correspondence "confidential."

In view of the fact that you had come to the State Department with the proposals, and that the subject was then for the first time mentioned between us—

Not a proposition from Mr. Blaine, but Sir Julian Pauncefote had come to the State Department with the proposal, and the subject was then for the first time mentioned between them.

—and in view of the further fact that I agreed to a private conference as explained in my minute. I confess that it was a surprise to me when several weeks later during the Canadian canvass, Sir John Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper both stated before public assemblages that an informal discussion of a reciprocity would take place at Washington after the 4th of March, by the initiation of the Secretary of State.

Now, is that correct? If it is not, the leader of the Opposition will inform me.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The language in the paper was that I insisted that the negotiations originated with the United States. I may say to the hon. gentleman that I was not in the country at the date at which this took place. When I arrived in Canada, if I remember aright, the dissolution had taken place, and the election was going on; therefore, I could be no party to anything that had occurred, nor was I informed of what had occurred up to that time. The hon. gentleman seems to attach great importance to the word "overture," but Sir John Thompson seems to have correctly stated, as read by the hon. gentleman, that the proposed arrangement with Newfoundland was of a reciprocal trade character, to which Canada objected. That is quite right, and Canada had requested to be allowed to take part, if that negotiation went on, and to present her views. That was assented to by the United States, and Mr. Blaine, speaking on behalf of the United States, appears to have said that he would be prepared to take that question up with Her Majesty's Minister at Washington, and a gentleman named by Canada to assist in those negotiations, some time, I think, after the 4th of March. That was the position. As I say, I had no knowledge of what the previous correspondence had been, but I do not think I stated at any time that this matter was initiated by the United States. I have no recollection of it.

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Blaine, the Secretary of State, seems, by the communication, to have attached great importance to the fact that he had not initiated the negotiations.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He was quite right in that.

Mr. CHARLTON. And he also states in that letter that he had seen with surprise the statements made with regard to this matter by Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper, and I have quoted a statement made in the same line by Sir John Thompson. The memory of the leader of the Opposition seems to be somewhat at fault. I am aware he was not in the country during all these transactions. He was, however, in Washington, I think, on the 11th April, 1891, for in a letter to Sir Julian Pauncefote his attention was called to it, and he makes reference in that letter to an official communication, which is found in the Sessional Papers for 1891, vol. 24, No. 38, page 67. In this communication he said:

I told Mr. Blaine in reference to these charges that I wished at the outset to recognize the accuracy of the statements contained in his letter to Sir Julian Pauncefote and which I had sent in reference to the initiation of the negotiations regarding the reciprocity arrangements between the two countries.

He acknowledges in the communication to Sir John A. Macdonald that the statement made by Mr. Blaine in his letter to Sir Julian Pauncefote was correct; and if that statement was correct, then Mr. James G. Blaine, who stated that this assertion had been made by my hon. friend and by Sir John A. Macdonald, was correct.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me, as this is a matter of some importance, to state my recollection of what occurred. I was commissioned by His Excellency the Governor General and by the Canadian Government to go to Washington on this mission. I went to Sir Julian Pauncefote, who very kindly invited me to stay at his house during my residence there. Sir Julian wrote a note to Mr. Blaine to say I had arrived and would be glad to know when it would be convenient to receive me. Sir Julian received an immediate answer from Mr. Blaine to say he would be most happy to receive us at eleven or twelve o'clock that day, and he mentioned incidentally, if my memory serves me. that the proceedings had not been initiated by him, but by the Government of Canada, and, as is correctly stated there, that is my judgment. That was the letter to which I was referring, for at that time I had no knowledge of the letter referred to signed by Mr. Blaine. I was referring to the letter in which he stated that he was entirely ready to receive me ; and I was received accordingly. Mr. Blaine at once accepted my statement as to the accuracy of his statement that he had not initiated the proceedings, because, as Sir John Thompson detailed in that speech, the initiation was made by Canada, and not by Mr. Blaine. I may say that Mr. Blaine, then and there fixed a time at which he would be prepared to take up with myself and my colleagues who would join me on the mission, the consideration of this question. The day was fixed, I think the following Monday. On that day, if my memory serves me, Sir John Thompson, the then Finance Minister, Mr. Foster, and myself waited on Mr. Blaine, who had in the meantime sent a telegram to Ottawa, which passed us on the road, informing us that he deeply regretted to find that the President, who was most anxious to be in Washington at the time of the negotiations, could not be there at that time, and he would be exceedingly glad if the meeting could be postponed until October. This communication had passed us, as I have stated. Mr. Blaine made this explanation, and the adjournment of the proceedings took place accordingly. That, so far as I can remember, is the exact position of the whole affair.

Mr. CHARLTON. There seems to be, although there may not be, a conflict with respect to dates. This letter is dated 1st April. It seems the commissioners arrived on the 11th April and left Washington on that day, and whatever there may be said with respect to that matter, the salient points here are that the members of the Canadian Government in 1891 asserted, and led the people of Canada to believe, that at the suggestion of Mr. Blaine reciprocity negotiations were in progress, that Mr. Blaine had made overtures leading up to reciprocity, that the United States were initiating proceedings with respect to this question. The position I take is that such statement was incorrect ; that the people of Canada were deceived, that the reasons assigned for the dissolution on 3rd February were not valid, that no reciprocity negotiations were in progress, that no immediate confirmation of the report that reciprocity negotiations were in progress could then be given, or has since been given and that there was no prospect that the House would be called on to pass upon a reciprocity treaty, whether the Parliament was fresh from the people or whether it was a moribund Parliament, that the whole thing was a political game of deception, which saved the Government and gave them a majority. If this question had been dealt with fairly, if the Government had not attempted to make the people think they were acting in a way they were not acting, if they had not made those assertions and representations, the result of the elections of 1891 would have been different from the results that were achieved. So much for this question.

Now, Sir, we have arrived at a point where we are confronted with this question again. The Government of 1891 did not deny that reciprocity would be advantageous to Canada ; they recognized the demand on the part of the people, that an attempt to negotiate a treaty should be made at Washington. They played on the susceptibility and credulity of the people by representing that they were taking that action in furtherance of the public interest by seeking to obtain a reciprocity treaty while in reality they were making no such attempt, and the professed desire to have a House fresh from the people, rather than a moribund House, to deal with this question was a deception. These are facts beyond controversy. I do not ask the hon. gentleman opposite (Sir Charles Tupper) to vindicate his course or approve the conduct of the Government at that time, but I compliment him on the great success of the unscrupulous policy adopted, although I can say very little with regard to its honesty. We are confronted, I say, with the same question again. A new Government is in power: this Government has to look after the interests of the people of Canada, and the question which confronts this Government is this : shall a new attempt be made to secure that great boon which the late Government pretended to wish to secure ? Shall that attempt be insincere and a mere political dodge, or shall a truthful, honest and sincere attempt be put forward to secure reciprocity, with the determination of using every proper effort to obtain it ? The Government of Canada has decided that this is a matter of sufficient importance to engage their attention. They have decided in the interest of the people of the country, to make an earnest and honest effort to obtain such a treaty, and if that earnest and honest effort fails, if we cannot obtain an advantageous treaty, if we cannot obtain a treaty that is truly reciprocal, if we have to give too much for the privilege of entering the American market, the Government will then have done its duty, and can go no further, and they will refuse to accept any treaty that will not be advantageous, or, at least, they should do so. So it is reasonable to inquire, as the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) has dealt with the question so fully, and made it so prominent a part of his address delivered yesterday, whether in reality there are sufficient reasons for the course which the Government propose to pursue in regard to this matter. Is the attainment of a reciprocity treaty a matter of importance, or is it a trifling matter, one of the minor issues that confront the Government? I claim it is a matter of importance. I claim that no other issue will confront the Government exceeding in importance this one regarding the attaining of better trade relations with the United States of America.

We are not under the necessity of theorizing as to what the probable result of such a treaty will be; we have had experience drawn from the results of a reciprocity treaty with that country extended over a period of twelve years, from 1854 to 1866. Those hon. members who have examined the trade relations of the two countries during that period, know that the influence of the treaty on Canada was a most salutary one. The truth is that our exports to the United States during the continuance of the treaty increased nearly 400 per cent. For the first year of the treaty our exports were of the value of $10,500,000; in 1886 they were of the value of $39,950,000. If the result of that treaty was to quadruple our trade with the United States in the brief period of twelve years, unquestionably no further proof is necessary to show that the operation of the treaty was a beneficial one. When that treaty was abrogated, when the policy of repression was resumed and the United States again imposed duties, our trade was brought to a standstill, and our exports in 1895 were but of the value of $41,297,000, being $1,347,000 more than twenty-nine years previous, or an increase during those twenty-nine years of 3½ per cent, while under reciprocity our exports increased during the twelve years nearly 400 per cent. These few facts laid before the people are sufficient to prove to any candid mind that reciprocity is desirable. Many facts may be cited to illustrate the deleterious influence of duties on trade between the two countries. From 1866 a repressive policy was pursued by the United States. In 1890 the character of that policy was intensified by the McKinley Bill, and, to show the particular influence of the intensification of a repressive policy, I have but to quote the figures showing the exports to the United States of certain leading articles for the year before the McKinley Bill went into operation and last year. The figures are as follows, as regards the articles of cattle, sheep, poultry, eggs, fruit, potatoes, malt, horses. The value of these exports in 1890 was $9,572,205; in 1895, $1,911,362. If we omit horses, the exports in 1890 were of the value of $7,684,895, as compared with $1,400,597 last year. The particulars are as follows:—

Those duties, under the conditions of trade that exist between the two countries, diminished the prices received by the Canadian farmers to the extent of the duties, and the boon that would be conferred on the agricultural interest of Canada would be great indeed, if those duties were removed. The natural tendency between these two countries is to have an enormous trade. The two countries lie side by side, across the continent. The barriers that separate these two countries, the lakes and rivers, are means of communication that invite intercommunication and trade, and our list of exports to the United States, which is already large, would be vastly increased, if those trade restrictions were removed, and the leader of the Liberal party realizes full well how great is the importance of removing those restrictions. It is often stated by hon. gentlemen opposite that the markets of the United States are really of no very great importance to us; that our trade with that country is inconsiderable, that it does not matter in regard to that trade whether we have free trade or not. If we compare the volume of the trade between Canada and the United States, the amount of exports to that country in certain lines, in excess of our exports of the same articles to all the rest of the world, this view of the case will illustrate the great importance of this trade. I have in my hand a table which shows the extent of our exports to the United States, in excess of our exports to Great Britain, and in excess of our exports to Great Britain and all the rest of the world in the lines covered by it, which table is a very suggestive one, and is as follows :—

When these figures are summarized, we find that the aggregate value of the export of these articles to the United States was

Mr. CHARLTON.

$25,000,000, to England $11,516,000, and to all the world, including Great Britain, $12,862,000, or, in these articles our exports to the United States were more than twice as great as our exports to all the rest of the world. Remember, Sir, this trade with the United States is secured under the operation of high duties which were intended to operate as a bar to trade at all. If we are exporting to the United States in various lines $25,000,000 worth, and to all the rest of the world a little over $12,000,000, does it not suggest to a person conversant with business that the removal of the fetters upon trade would have the effect of vastly increasing the volume of trade between Canada and the United States, and would be productive of excellent results so far as Canada is concerned ?

Now, the Liberal party have a desire to increase the volume of this trade, and they have that desire for the reason that they believe it would be conducive to the interests of Canada to do so. We have besides the articles which we export, many lines in which a vast business might be built up and in which scarcely any business at all is done at the present time. Take, for instance, the article of iron ore. One-third of the trade of the upper lakes is in iron ore, and on an average over 8,000,000 tons of iron ore are transported from the mines of the Lake Superior region to Lake Erie to be smelted in the furnaces in that section. We scarcely participate in that trade at all now. We have the iron mines. We have in the disputed territory which fell to the share of Ontario probably a finer iron supply than is to be found in Michigan and Minnesota, and yet our export of iron ore last year to the States was the paltry amount of 4,729 tons, and 2,414 tons of that was chromic iron ore. The value of that trade in the lake region is over 8,000,000 tons a year, equal to at least $30,000,000. With duties removed from iron ore, there is no reason why we should not share it with them. There is no reason why, out of that 8,000,000 tons of iron, we might not supply three or four million tons, and yet at the present day we have practically no trade in that line at all. Then, with regard to structural material, $25,000,000 worth of quarry products are used in the States annually, and yet we furnish of that supply only $44,502 worth. We have on the shores of our great lakes, and especially on the north shore of Lake Superior, quarries of all kinds; unlimited quantities of freestone, granite, sandstone and marble, right alongside the deep water where the products of these quarries could be loaded on vessels and transported to Chicago, Milwaukee and Cleveland, and to Buffalo, to be there transhipped and sent by the Erie Canal to New York. In that alone we could build up a trade of millions of dollars. And nearly the entire amount of the value of the trade in these two lines—iron ore and quarry products—would be represented in labour and in farmers' supplies to keep that labour. Nothing could be imagined which would add more greatly to the prosperity of this country than to secure an arrangement by which 4,000,000 tons of our iron ore and a corresponding amount of our structural materials would be sent to the United States. We scarcely appreciate that we have these opportunities in our grasp. We do not know to what extent our resources might be developed, and our wealth and prosperity increased.

There is one leading business interest of Canada that has felt the beneficial effects of free trade; I refer to the lumber interest. The duty on lumber was removed when the Wilson Bill went into operation in August, 1894. Almost immediately afterwards came a depression in the lumber trade of the United States; and if the lumber interest of Canada had continued to pay a duty of $2 a thousand on the lumber exported to the United States in the latter part of 1894, in 1895, and during the season of 1896, every practical lumberman will tell you that the effect would have been simply ruinous. The lumber interest of Canada has been saved from ruin by the removal of the American duties on lumber under the Wilson Bill, and the full effect of the removal of those duties will be felt by Canadian lumbermen when the time comes for a revival of the lumber trade in the United States, and when the business is again on a prosperous basis.

It is said, Mr. Speaker, that our farmers do not need reciprocity, that they are as prosperous as the farmers of the United States, and will gain nothing by access to the American market. Away out in central Illinois, 150 miles from Chicago, the ordinary price of farms is $100 per acre. Across the Mississippi, throughout the state of Iowa the ordinary price of farms is from $50 to $75 per acre. The fact that our population is leaving us, and that those who leave us do not return, militates considerably against the doctrine that the American farmer is no more prosperous than ours, and that our farmer has nothing to gain by free access to that market, where there are 6,000,000 people in the centres of population within easy reach of the farmers of Ontario and Quebec. The census revelations do not agree with the statement made by our hon. friends. The census revelations contradict the statement that this country has been prosperous under the policy which our hon. friends have pursued. In the decade from 1871 to 1881 we had an increase of population amounting to 18·97 per cent while in the decade from 1881 to 1891 we had an increase of only 11·76 per cent. This is not a satisfactory increase of population, especially under the circumstances, as we had been at the same time receiving large numbers of immigrants. The census returns of the United States show that from 1790 to 1850, when the conditions of that country were similar to our own, with an ample supply of public lands and ample room, and when it was an easy matter to obtain farms—that during that period of sixty years the increase in population in the United States for each decade averaged 31·5, exclusive of immigration; and we had an increase in the last decade of only 11·76 per cent. If we had retained our native population, increased by the excess of the birth rate over the death rate, the natural increase in Canada would be 25 per cent in each decade; and if this is a correct basis on which to make the calculation, our census returns for 1891 should have shown this. We started in 1881 with a population 4,324,000. A 25 per cent increase for ten years, representing the excess of the birth rate over the death rate, would have given us an addition of 1,131,000 souls. We received 915,000 immigrant settlers from 1881 to 1890 inclusive. Adding these figures together, we should have had in 1891 a population of 6,370,000. We had, in fact, a population of 4,833,000. We fell 1,537,000 short of the number we should have had with a natural increase of 25 per cent for the ten years and the retention of the immigrant settlers who came to our shores. And yet gentlemen will stand up in the face of this astounding revelation and contend that the condition of business in this country is satisfactory, that the country is prosperous, that we have been blessed with a policy better than the one the Liberal party propose to substitute for it, that the condition of things cannot be improved. Why, Mr. Speaker, it is a stupendous piece of cheek to assert anything of the kind. The census returns are unanswerable. They show that something is wrong, that something needs to be done, that the old policy is an utter, blank failure, and that it is time something else should be tried; and these men who cling to the old policy, who retail the old platitudes about the National Policy and about protection are trifling with the people. They are clinging to the old discarded, worn-out, senseless policy which had inflicted on this country nameless evils during the last eighteen years.

Now, the leaders of the Liberal party, I think I may say, realize the propriety, the necessity, of striving to secure for this country prosperity. Canada is a vast country, a country with vast resources, as fine a country as is found in the world, stretching from ocean to ocean, with room for fifty million people, with prairies unsettled and uncultivated, with mineral resources undeveloped, with timber resources undeveloped. With all these potential resources which are awaiting development, this country ought to be increasing more rapidly in population than any other country on the face of the globe. The United States is further advanced towards the limit of its growth; its public lands are well nigh exhausted; there is a plethora of people in its centres of population. Canada possesses millions of acres of unoccupied lands; and yet in the decade from 1881 to 1891 it presents the beggarly return of less than 12 per cent increase of population, with 915,000 immigrants landing during that time, or 400,000 more immigrants than the total increase of population—such a blank and utter failure that any man with a sense of decency ought to hide his head before he attempts to justify the policy under which these results have been obtained.

There is another consideration in connection with the policy which the Liberal party proposes to inaugurate which is by no means the least important of the numerous reasons for seeking to secure more extended trade relations with the American people. That consideration is the probable effect that the inauguration of this policy would have on international relations between Great Britain and the United States. Every man must realize the great importance of having these two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon family living together on terms of peace and unity. Every man must realize how great would be the gain to humanity if these two great nations would act in concert. If these two nations, Mr. Speaker, were to act in concert, that dismal, horrible record of murder and rapine and rape, and every imaginable and nameless horror that has been enacted by Turk and by Kurd upon the Christian population of Armenia, would not have been permitted to continue to blot the annals of civilization. But the two nations cannot unite. Jealousies and mutual distrusts keep them apart, and so the Turk plunders and murders at pleasure, and the unhappy Armenians are harried by these demons month after month. And if Canada could be instrumental in bringing about relations between these two countries that might lead to concerted action, would that not be something worthy of the ambition of the public men of Canada? Is not that something that every good citizen of Canada should pray for and hope for? And where, as a rule, do the difficulties that lead to friction and trouble between these two great nations originate? Almost invariably in Canada. If we can arrange our relation with the United States so as to live on good terms, on terms of amity and friendship, with these people, the potency of that fact in the relations that may be established and continued between the two great nations themselves can be scarcely over-estimated. This branch of the subject should present sufficient incentive to the leader of the Government of Canada to make the utmost effort to secure the consummation of such a treaty as we hope for, with the great republic to the south. I do not know that I have anything more to say on the reciprocity branch of this subject.

Mr. CHARLTON.

The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) last night entered into a general disquisition of many matters. He covered almost all branches of public questions, whether pertaining to the probable future tariff policy of the Government or not. He gave us something about protection, competition, economic conditions, capital, raw material, labour and wages. He made one almost dizzy by the many divergencies in the course of his speech. He went over the commercial, financial and political world, and laid before us the stale remnants of a hundred speeches made on the stump and asked us to feast on them.

The hon. gentleman, in the course of his speech, pointed us to the United States. It is disloyal on this side to illustrate anything by reference to the United States, but it is the privilege of the hon. gentleman to do it. He said that the United States came to their present proud position through protection. These were his exact words. Now, I do not know that my hon. friend is aware that the golden age in the fiscal history of the United States was that period between the years 1846 and 1861, which was a revenue tariff period. During that period, the progress in manufactures was so rapid, the increase in the wealth and population of the country was so rapid, that the foundations of the future prosperity were being laid broadly and securely, and at no period was the United States so happy and prosperous as during that revenue tariff period. It is true the United States, as it exists to-day, has been built up by protection. But what is the result? Why, we find there monopolies upon the most gigantic scale that ever existed in the world. We find trusts and combines, we find that the business of the United States is controlled by these trusts, we find that one-half the property in the United States is owned by 25,000 men, and that one-fourth of the property in that country is owned by 500 men. We find that the result of protection has been to create vast fortunes and those inequalities in the conditions of the citizens of that country, which have led to the condition of things in which they are. What is the condition of things there? The Populist party, the Socialist party, the Anarchist party, the Free Silver repudiation party—all these discordant, unwholesome, dangerous elements called into existence by inequality created by the system of protection. These enormous fortunes, this inequality of conditions has thrown influence and power in the United States into the hands of very few men. The Senate has become a club of millionaires, the Supreme Court is accused of having annulled the income law two years ago because it was controlled by men who would have to pay the income tax, that country is drifting on to serious difficulties which must be settled within the near future, and that result has been produced by a policy of extremely high protection. We do not want to copy that policy.

we do not want to place Canada in the same category as the United States, as regards the fiscal policies of the two countries. What has been the effect of protection in that country? Are the interests in that country that are highly protected really in need of protection? Last spring the Bethlehem Ironworks, belonging to Mr. Carnegie, took a contract to supply ten thousand tons of steel rails to Japan at $21.40 free on board. They supplied these at nearly a dollar less than their English competitors could supply them at. And at the moment they were supplying steel rails at that rate to Japan, the price to the consumers in Chicago was $29, and at Bethlehem $28. And yet the makers of steel rails, possessing the ability to undersell England in the open markets of the world, are protected by a duty of $6 per ton, to enable them to charge a higher price for the steel rails they produce to the home consumer, and rob him to the extent of the difference between the two rates.

Take the article of cotton bands. These are protected by a duty of $1.35 per 100 pounds. The American producers of cotton bands in Cleveland are supplying Japan, India, Egypt, and other markets of the world wherever cotton bands were required in competition against outside manufacturers, and yet a duty of $1.35 per 100 pounds enables them to sell to the American consumer at over a dollar per 100 pounds more than they are charging the foreign consumer.

Now, these are illustrations of the practical operation of protection. We have not reached that point of activity of development, but in the United States protection is not needed. In the United States the existence of protective duties, in nine cases out of ten, simply enables the manufacturer to add that amount to the price of the articles which he can sell in the open markets of the world without protection at all. And when the Government, now in power in Canada, comes to deal with that question, they want to deal with it, not in forty days, as my hon. friend from York requires of them, but with caution. They want to proceed with care, they want to examine all the circumstances, they want to consider every interest in the country, they want to do justice, they intend to do it, and in order to do it they want time and information. They must have it, and they will have it, and when they do have it, when they have examined into the conditions of trade, then they will be ready to present a measure for the criticism of the Opposition.

My hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) was guilty of an unfairness, which has characterized almost all the speakers on that side, in giving quotations made from speeches delivered by the leader of the Government. Now the garbled extract, Mr. Speaker, the extract which goes just so far but does not go far enough to take in the defining part of the speech, which does not take in enough to show exactly what is meant—such an extract is more than unfair, it is dishonest. He made an extract from the speech of the leader of the Government about our aim being to have free trade as they have it in England. Up and down throughout this country, from every rostrum, from every stump, the attempt has been made to impress the people of Canada with the belief that the leader of the Liberal Government proposes to establish at once the fiscal system that exists in England. Why, every man who makes the assertion knows that it is unfair, knows that the extract is garbled, knows that the statement is essentially untrue. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) did say something about free trade as it exists in England, he set that before him far in the future as something to be sought, something to be reached, a consummation to be desired when the thing could be done. When the people of Canada could be relieved from the burdens that now press upon them, when we can, step by step, inaugurate a better system of fiscal legislation, when we can, item by item, drop the burdens that rest upon the people, when we can at last dispense with the system that exists now and adopt that system which has produced such beneficent results in England and made that country the first commercial nation, the great manufacturing nation, the centre of the potential resources of humanity—when we can reach that goal he proposed that we make this change complete. But he did not present that as something that could be done now, as something that was to be the immediate result of the Liberal policy, but only presented it as something that we might hope for in the time to come. Well, Sir, to go about the country and repeat that the hon. gentleman proposed at once to adopt the English system is a prevarication of the facts, is inconsistent with his statement and is essentially untrue; and the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) if he is a man of ordinary intelligence must have been aware that that was the case.

I suppose that the Government, when all the facts are sought for that are to govern its action in the formation of a new tariff, will probably consider the interests of the farmer to some extent. The great mass of the people of this country are farmers. Now, the farmer is a manufacturer. It may not strike people that such is the case at first sight, but not the less the farmer is a manufacturer. He has his capital, he has his raw material and his finished product; and his manufacturing operations are the most important that are carried on by any class. His capital is his investment in farm and stock and plant; his raw material is the seed he casts into the earth, the food that he eats the goods that he requires to buy for the transaction of his business, everything that is necessary for his use in order to transact his business. He calls into operation processes, not the processes of the manufacturer, not the throwing of the shuttle and the operation of the loom, not the operation of the spinning jenny—he uses the processes of nature. He casts the seed into the ground and waits for nature to cause that food to germinate. And in time it appears, first the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear and when this process which a beneficent Maker puts into operation is completed, the farmer presents to us his finished products. His finished products are waving fields of golden grain, cattle in the stall, flocks in the fold, all the fruits of the earth. All things that contribute to the sustenance and maintenance of human life are the products of the farmer. Now that manufacturer deserves consideration. He is selling his products in the open markets of the world; he is selling his products where he meets the competition of all races and all nations, and he has a right to ask and he does ask this Government that the cost of the raw material for his business shall be minimized so far as the Government can adopt a policy that will lead to that result. As he has to sell cheap, he asks that he may be enabled to buy cheap; and the Government is bound, not to give him all he asks, perhaps, but to take his interests into account and give to him the same consideration it gives to other interests in Canada.

My hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) had something to say about the manufacturing industries of this country and the protection afforded them. He said that the $350,000,000 invested in manufacturing operations in Canada would be lost capital when the policy of my hon. friend the leader of the Government was brought down. This indicates a singular oblivion on the part of hon. gentlemen to facts. Does the hon. gentleman claim that the protective policy created the manufacturing industries of Canada? Does he claim that until the inauguration of this policy in 1879 this country was destitute of manufacturing industries? One would imagine so from his statement that when the policy of my hon. friend is brought down this vast sum of money will be lost money. But what are the facts of the case? Did we have manufactures at the inception of the protective system, or did we not? I answer, We did. We produced in 1871, $221,000,000 of manufactured goods. We produced in 1881, $309,000,000 worth. In 1891, according to the census returns we produced $476,000,000 worth. Now the production of these $221,000,000 was under a revenue tariff policy, and the increase of production of 1881 was 41 per cent. Under the protective policy, the increase from 1881 to 1891 was 54 per cent. But bear in mind that the apparent increase is not a real one. Bear in mind the peculiar manipulation of the census returns of 1891. Bear in mind the fact that branches of business were returned as manufacturing industries in 1891 that were not so treated in 1881, that thousands and tens of thousands of nominal manufacturing concerns were coopers and dressmakers and blacksmiths, who were employing, each one or one and a half hands, and who were not included as manufacturers in the census of 1881. And when that stuffing of the returns is eliminated, I doubt whether the percentage of increase from 1881 to 1891 was greater than that from 1871 to 1881. There is naturally a tendency to increase under any policy, and I fully believe that the increase in manufacturing operations in Canada are not in any large degree attributable to the system of protection, but that, as from 1871 to 1881, a large steady, healthy growth and increase in the manufacturing industries of this country took place, so it would have continued to be with a revenue tariff.

Then the hon. member for York, in lauding this policy of protection, says that it has been accepted by the country in election after election, that the electors of Canada time and time again have endorsed this policy and returned the exponents of it to power. And he says that but for side issues this policy would have triumphed again in the elections of this year. Well, Sir, in reply to this I have to say that the National Policy did not carry the election in 1891, any more than it did in 1896. The election in 1891 was attributable largely, as I have said, to the stealing on the part of the Government of the reciprocity issue which properly belongs to the Liberal party. But for that piece of political chicanery, I verily believe that the Liberal party would have scored a success in 1891. But there are some other influences that have been at work besides the National Policy. The Government relied for success in 1882, in 1887, in 1891, and in 1896, upon that triune list of political infamies, the gerrymander, the Franchise Bill, and boodling. These are the trinity of infamies upon which the Government has planted itself, by which the Government has sustained itself, to which the Government owed its success in these various elections. The Gerrymander Act gave to the Government at least sixteen seats. The Franchise Act, manipulated as it has been by the Government, was equivalent to fifteen seats more; and the money derived from Quebec harbour contracts, from sweating contracts of various kinds, from tolling railway subsidies, and from various improper methods of securing money—I say the money secured in this way has enabled the Government, with the aid of the gerrymander and with the aid of the Franchise Act, to score victories which they never could have scored in this country, resting upon the character of their policy and the true, unbiassed wishes of the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I have much to say about this issue. I wish I could compliment my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and those associated with him, upon their skill in leading an Opposition. But evidently they are new to the work. They would be called, in vulgar parlance, greenhorns at the job. When they remain there eighteen years, as I hope they may, they will know more about it, probably, but they have given very little evidence of their skill so far this session. I hope they will improve, I think very likely they will. There is no lack of talent, no lack of ability there, but there is lack of experience in that particular line of work. They have already made several messes in the management of affairs this session. It was a very bad mess they made of things when they attacked Governor General's warrants. They got the country into a scrape, they got the country into difficulties, from which to extricate it a certain line of conduct had to be taken. The Government of the day took that line of conduct; and these gentlemen, oblivious of the fact that they were responsible for the condition of things, that they caused it, and ought to have hidden their heads and kept as quiet as possible, attacked the Government for doing the very thing, and the only thing the Government could do, to extricate itself from the difficulties into which these hon. gentlemen had plunged it. That was mistake No. 1. Then they made a second mistake when they made that attack upon the Governor General for adding another course to the edifice of British liberty, for having decided that a moribund Government, a worse than moribund Government, that had been rejected by the people, that had ceased to have a right to exist as a Government, or to exercise the functions of a Government, should not be allowed to perform certain acts. When the Governor General decided that such a Government should not make certain classes of appointments, he was setting a precedent that will live in history, he was setting a precedent that will be right in the lines of that advance that has been made since the days of Magna Charta in 1215, since, step by step, the structure of British liberty has been erected by one thing after another, being wrung from the hand of arbitrary power. The last and not the least of these great triumphs in the line of building up the structure of British liberty, was the action of the Governor General of Canada when he decided that a boodling Government which had ceased to deserve the confidence of the people of Canada, and which was under the ban of the people of Canada, should cease to usurp the functions of a Government, and fill offices to the embarrassment of their successors. All praise to the representative of Her Majesty who set that wholesome, healthy and honest precedent. But it is certainly a striking illustration of the bungling incapacity of an Opposition that attacked the Governor General for the exercise of such salutary principles and prerogatives. Then we have this last evidence furnished by the resolution before the House. My hon. friend from York and his colleagues put me in mind of that passage in the Apocalypse where the great red dragon with seven heads and ten horns, is standing ready to devour the woman's child when it is born. This child that they are making a movement against, is not born yet. They are not content with waiting to devour the child when it is born, but they are making an attack upon it in advance. My hon. friend from York has formulated his resolution against a policy that is not yet formulated; he has brought a resolution against the Government for a policy when he does not know what the policy of the Government is. Why, it is the most astounding piece of humbuggery and foolery I have ever seen in this House.

I conclude by advising my hon. friends opposite to keep cool for a while. It is quite possible that mistakes will be made after a time that will enable them to criticise freely, but that time has not come yet. They have been a little premature. In the course they have taken in this regard, they have certainly succeeded in making the task of the Government now upon the Treasury benches, a very difficult one. No person underrates these difficulties upon this side of the House, all realize them. We have had eighteen years of misrule, we have had extravagance, we have got the affairs of this Government in a sad muddle indeed; we are loaded with responsibilities and burdens that are very serious ones; and the Government is confronting difficulties of the most gigantic character, difficulties they are not responsible for, difficulties that they never created. The Government must have some consideration in grappling with these difficulties. They have a herculean task to perform, and it would be more in consonance with representative government and fair-play if the Opposition were just to keep quiet for a while, and see whether the Government were able to grapple with the great problems placed before them. I hope to be able to assist them somewhat in doing the work that lies before them, and I certainly shall look with displeasure, I shall look with aversion, upon that class of tactics pursued by the Opposition during this session in the course they have seen fit to take with regard to a Government that met this House when they had been only forty days in office, met this House under emergencies that compelled them to call the House together for the purpose of securing the money to pay the bread of the officials of the Government, for the purpose of extricating the country from the difficulties in which their incompetent predecessors had placed them. I venture to think that the Government will strive to do the best they can. I can venture to say that their methods will be good, that their desires will be good, that their aims will be high, that, in the language of my hon. friend the leader of the Government, they will seek to make this a Government of the people, for the people and by the people. Believing that to be the case, I conclude by saying that the resolution of my hon. friend the member for York is most inopportune, and is entirely unworthy of the reputation that hon. gentleman has as a statesman, as a politician, and as a tactician.

Mr. KLOEPFER. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to detain the House very long, but I desire to say a few words upon this question. In my opinion the Government should have been prepared to deal with the tariff this session, or at least should have been prepared to state the course they intended to pursue with regard to their tariff policy. By delaying to announce their policy, the trade of this country is being seriously injured. Now, I believe that the Government could have brought their tariff down very easily at this session. They had been discussing the matter for eighteen years, and surely by this time must have made up their minds as to what policy they are going to pursue. I think I am able to explain why the Government did not bring down their tariff policy this session. In the beginning of the election contest in my county, my opponents started out stating that their policy was "free trade as it is in England." But when that was threshed out and the fallacy of it was shown up, they denied that policy, and they made an outcry for a tariff for revenue only. They did not succeed apparently with the electors, and so a few days afterwards, when speaking in the city, the Liberal campaigners stated, that they would take the tariff the same as it was under the Conservative Government, and they would only revise it a little. That was all very well in the city, but when they went in the rural districts to the farmers they said: Now, gentlemen, the manufacturers are robbing you, their tariff is altogether exorbitant, and they have had it their own way long enough. I do not believe, Sir, it is a patriotic thing for the members of any political party to go to the country and endeavour to array the farmers against the inhabitants of the city. Living in the same country, the citizens and the farmers have the same interests, and they should be taught to work harmoniously together, rather than to be antagonistic to each other. Let me ask, are the manufacturers better protected than the farmers of Canada? It is my contention that the farmers are better protected under our National Policy than are our manufacturers. Take oats at 10 cents a bushel, peas at 10 cents a bushel, wheat at 15 cents a bushel and barley at 30 per cent, which is the protection accorded to the farmer in these lines. Take the import duty on lamb and mutton at 35 per cent, and pork and beef at 3 cents a pound, and figure these out, and I think you will find that the farmers have a better tariff than the manufacturers have. But when the Liberal orators in the last campaign came into a city constituency they told the people that they were not going to interfere with the tariff, while at the same time they were telling the farmers that the tariff was too high, and it appears to me that these two statements do not at all coincide. I have already said that the manufacturers are not so well protected as the farmers, and I state now that under our present tariff the manufacturers have hardly enough protection.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. KLOEPFER. Yes, I make that assertion and I can prove it to hon. gentlemen opposite if they wish to be convinced. Take for instance the duties in the carriage hardware line, and I say that the manufacturers in this industry are not protected enough. Before 1894, on carriage hardware there was a duty of 35 per cent, but they reduced that in 1894 to 32½ per cent. Instead of taking off 2½ they should have added it and made the duty 37½ per cent. Take also the duties on sewing machines. It used to be $3 specific and 20 per cent ad valorem, but it was reduced to 30 per cent, and that, I contend, is not sufficient protection. In the manufacture of sewing machines, the japans, the castings, and a special kind of pig iron, have to be imported into Canada. It does not pay to manufacture the attachments in this country because our population is not very large, and consequently the demand is not so great as in populous countries. Duty has to be paid on these attachments which are the raw material of the trade. The duty on sewing machines was lessened and it does not keep out machines from the other side. Now, there are only two manufacturers of sewing machines in Canada. There are imported into this country $108,000 worth of sewing machines every year. If the machines were kept out, and if the Canadian sewing machine factories could manufacture this $108,000 worth, they would run to their full capacity, turn out a larger quantity, and consequently produce and sell their machines at a much lower price. If the tariff were left as it was on sewing machines, the Canadian factories would be running all the time, and the Canadian user of sewing machines would get the article cheaper than he does now. I can assure hon. gentlemen opposite that if the duty on sewing machines is increased, our Canadian manufacturers even under that high duty could sell their sewing machines cheaper than they do at present, and cheaper than the American machines are sold. Let me again refer to carriage hardware. About one-third of the carriage hardware is imported into Canada, and would it not be better that the duty should be higher so as to keep out this importation and give the work to Canadians in Canadian factories? More hands would be employed; our people would be kept in this country, and our money would be kept to be spent in this country, instead of being sent to a foreign country. I can assure hon. gentlemen that when we send our money out of the country to the United States it is gone from us for ever. The more people you employ in this country, the more people you have to consume the products of the farm, and the better is the market for the farmer.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, sit down.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is the first time I ever heard a gentleman addressing this House for the first time, attempted to be interrupted by anybody.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I do not wish to interrupt, I merely wish to ask a question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. KLOEPFER. What is the question ?

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). The question is this. How many sewing machine factories were there in Canada when the National Policy commenced and how many are there to-day ?

Mr. KLOEPFER. Well, I can answer that question easily, but I thought any intelligent man would know it. At that time the sewing machine industry was a new enterprise, and there were few machines in the households of the country. But every one has a sewing machine to-day, and it is only here and there you can sell a machine to replace the old ones when they get worn out.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). That is not an answer.

Mr. KLOEPFER. It is a very good answer. Hon. gentlemen opposite have stated that if the tariff was taken off, prices would be lower and the people could live cheaper. Well, I can assure hon. gentlemen that competition will regulate prices and will reduce them, for if a factory in Canada is making a large profit there is sure to be another one started up, and so the competition will settle the price. Common sense will tell any man that we should not have a lower tariff than our neighbours to the south of us have. Canada has only 5,000,000 people and the United States has from 65,000,000 to 70,000,000. Do not we want as high tariff as they do ? In the United States the average tariff is 40 per cent while our tariff hardly averages 30 per cent. Their tariff, according to the population of the countries, should be less than that of Canada. We must be a very intelligent and thrifty people to be able to compete with a nation having the population of the United States, and with a lower tariff than theirs, to keep their goods out of our market. I hope the Government will not meddle with the tariff, for undoubtedly their action will come back on them. In my constituency the statement is constantly made that the Government are not going to touch the tariff, but, at all events, their supporters do not like to hear about the National Policy. Hon.

gentlemen opposite, no doubt, will find that their best course to follow is to borrow our tariff policy and label it with another name. I desire now to offer a few remarks in reply to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). That hon. gentleman has stated that a long time was required to revise the tariff. I think this should not be the case, because hon. gentlemen opposite professed to know all about it when the elections were in progress. One would imagine they could bring it down at once, for they told the people everything they were going to do. The hon. member also said that it took the Democrats in the United States a long time to change their tariff. I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will not occupy so long a time, for I believe the Democrats were occupied in this work during eighteen months, and the result was that the manufacturers were afraid to proceed with their operations, wholesale men would not lay in stocks, every one was waiting until the tariff was settled, and thus ruin was brought on the manufacturing industries, hundreds of manufacturers and wholesalers failed, and we all know the number of bank failures reported. The practice followed by the American manufacturers during slack times is to turn out special lots of goods and send them to Canada, where they dispose of them at very much less than the usual wholesale prices. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood), who is in the same line of business as I follow, knows it well.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I know a good deal better than that.

Mr. KLOEPFER. American manufacturers are selling sewing-machines to wholesale agents in Canada $4 or $5 less than they are selling them to their own agents in the United States. The reason is that they do not want to lose the wholesale price in their own markets, because they feel they would be unable to raise the price afterwards, but they are willing to send machines over to Canada and cut the price here. It has been urged that, if the Canadian Government would reduce the tariff on agricultural implements, the Americans would follow a like policy. Why have they not done so already ? The duty on agricultural implements in the United States is 45 per cent, as compared with 20 per cent in this country. If a reduction of 20 per cent were made, implements would be free here, but there would still remain a duty of 25 per cent on the other side. I do not believe the people of the Dominion desire such a reduction. When we look across the boundary line, we see that the Republicans have chosen the strongest protectionist for their presidential candidate, Mr. McKinley. The Democrats have taken up Mr. Bryan, and he is worse than a protectionist. Why, there is no nation in the world which can keep on selling goods and pay for them at the rate of 52½ cents on the dollar. I thank hon. members for the attention they have given me, and I resume my seat.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker. I rise for the first time since I entered Parliament, and I, therefore, ask the indulgence of hon. members on both sides while I say a few words in connection with this important matter now under consideration. I have listened to the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, who have replied to the very able and exhaustive address of the late Finance Minister (Mr. Foster), and I am free to say that, although I have not been in Parliament before, as have been some hon. members, in my opinion, the hon. member for York had far the best of the argument, and no reply was made to the powerful argument he made on the floor of this House. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), an old, experienced member, and a very able speaker, whose leanings for many years have been more friendly to the United States than to our own land, has taken up the time of this House in delivering an admirable essay on the great benefits that would arise, if we had closer relations with the United States. He charged the hon. member for York with wasting the time of this House in discussing matters foreign to the amendment which he moved. I submit, Mr. Speaker, to hon. members on both sides, that, if the hon. member for York did stick very closely to the matter in hand, as he always does, the hon. member for North Norfolk, in replying, wandered all over the United States, and said very little in connection with the tariff of this Dominion. He was not satisfied with rebuking members on this side of the House for all their alleged shortcomings during many years, but he said the way in which our party was led by the leader of the Opposition was very unfortunate. Well, all I can say is that it will be a long time before hon. members on this side will ask that hon. gentleman to assist us in any way, shape or form. It contained a little reflection on his own intelligence. I think, for this old campaigner and very old debater, and a man of very great intelligence, to find fault with the way in which the Opposition is led. Let me say to him that we are a unit on this side of the House, and that we intend to stand by our leader, whether he sits on that side of the House or on this side.

The hon. member for North Norfolk was not satisfied with finding fault with the Government of Canada; but he thought that if the United States of America and the Dominion of Canada united, they could put a stop to the Turkish troubles and the destruction of the Armenians. He has a very exalted opinion of his power, and I have no hesitation in saying that if the United States and Canada negotiated a treaty, the hon. gentleman would be quite willing, if appointed ambassador to undertake to put a stop to those atrocities which are regretted by every civilized country in the world. But if Great Britain, Russia, France, Italy, and Germany, with all their armed forces, if the skilled diplomats and the trained statesmen of Great Britain, are unable to cope with that difficulty, I fear it would be a long time before it would be settled if left to my hon. friend from North Norfolk.

Then, the hon. gentleman, not satisfied with saying very unpleasant things about the living on this side of the House, had to attack the memory of the dead. In connection with the reciprocity negotiations of 1891, which he dealt with at such length, he preferred to believe the Hon. James Blaine, of American fame, a gentleman of great ability, and no doubt a very truthful man, and some gentleman of the name of Baker—he preferred to believe their statements to the statements of Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper. We on this side believe that the majority of men on both sides of this House would rather trust the statements of our own leaders and our own statesmen than the statements of those gentlemen in Washington, much as we respect them; and I may say in passing that the hon. member for North Norfolk has always used very strong language against the late Sir John A. Macdonald. In season and out of season, on the floor of this House and on the hustings, he has charged corruption and boodling against Sir John A. Macdonald and those associated with him; but he has never yet proved a single case against those gentlemen, and it ill becomes a gentleman with the leanings of the hon. member for North Norfolk, a gentleman whom I respect, to take up the time of this House for an hour or two in advocating American institutions and the advanced views of American statesmen, and in decrying the greatest statesman that this country ever produced, the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald. There is one thing to be said of Sir John A. Macdonald, that he was always true to the interests of Canada; and he and those associated with him in the negotiations with the government at Washington, did more to guard the interests of Canada and the interests of the Canadian people than the Reform leaders have ever done during the whole period since confederation.

The hon. member for North Norfolk blamed the late Government for staying in power to the very last day that they could remain in power under the law, and he also tried to blame them for introducing a Bill which could not be carried. I can only say, so far as that is concerned, that if the hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches had been as careful to husband the resources of this country as those on this side of the House, they would have given away to the very reasonable request of the leader of the late Government, and granted the supplies, and thus spared the expense to this country of this session of Parliament. It has been said by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) that they knew better than to pass the supplies, for they could not trust the leaders of the Conservative party with the expenditure of the public money. I regard that, Mr. Speaker, as an insult to the intelligence of this House and an insult to the people of this country, because the moneys voted by Parliament were just as safely guarded in the hands of gentlemen on this side of the House as they will be guarded by the gentlemen on the opposite side.

Now, with regard to the Remedial Bill, the House was kept in session with the view of passing that Bill, if at all possible. I think it rather unfortunate that the hon. gentleman should have referred to that question at all. During this session the taunt has been thrown across the floor of the House that Sir Charles Tupper and those associated with him in leading the party on this side have endeavoured to fan the flames of religious strife in this country. We assert the very opposite. We say that the party of hon. gentlemen opposite, in 1891, through Premier Greenway and Attorney General Martin, took away the rights of the minority in the province of Manitoba for the purpose of making political capital, and those gentlemen have kept that question in the field ever since, not for the good of the country, but for the sake of serving the interest of themselves and their party. I do not desire to dwell on that question. It is a question on which men on both sides differ. All honour to the men who did differ on it. I hope the Conservative party will never be such a unit but that on great questions, such as those affecting the state or the church, there will be found some independent men ready to do what is best for the country. If the Conservative party were divided on that question, some on the other side were divided also. But they were not divided in the province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman at the head of the Government preached one doctrine in the province of Ontario and another in the province of Quebec; and all I can say is that when the history of that question is written, the Conservative party will appear to much greater advantage than hon. gentlemen opposite. For my part, in the campaign I supported the Remedial Bill; I did so conscientiously, and I will do so again, because I believe the rights of the minority were trampled under foot by hon. gentlemen opposite. At the same time, I respect those gentlemen on either side of the House who differ with me on that question.

My hon. friend from North Norfolk found fault with the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) for charging the Government with some short comings in connection with their tariff policy. As I understood the speech of the hon. member for York, he made no charge against their policy, because they have no policy. He simply laid down the principle that inasmuch as the mercantile and manufacturing interests of this country were disturbed because of the change of Government, if hon. gentlemen opposite were not able to bring down the details of their policy, they should at least take the House into their confidence so far as to let them know what great principle they intended adopting in connection with this important question. The hon. gentleman further said that it took a long time for the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald to frame their policy. It is true it took them some months; but it was said in connection with the elections of 1878 that Sir John A. Macdonald, and those associated with him, were trying to draw wool over the eyes of the people, and had no intention of bringing in a National Policy. But as soon as they got into power, they applied themselves, with all their energy and ability, to bringing in a National Policy, and they established it against the opposition of hon. gentlemen opposite; and for eighteen years that policy has done for Canada what no other policy had ever done. But, Sir, the case is very different now. That was a new policy; it had to be carefully gone into, and the greatest precautions had to be taken. It is not so with hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. First Minister, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and those who have been associated with them in Parliament had been proclaiming for eighteen years to the people of this country, on every hustings and platform, that they knew what the wants of this country were, and that if the people would only place their trust in them, they would give them a policy which would be far better for the country than the Conservative policy. Were they deceiving the people then, or are they deceiving the people now? They are not deceiving the people now, because they will not say what their policy is.

I look upon the hon. member for North Leeds (Mr. Frost) as a gentleman whom both sides of the House respect. But when he heard the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce last night say pointedly, with all his warmth, zeal and old time eloquence, which he has used for the last seventeen years, say he was death to protection, we could see the change on the countenance of the hon. member for North Leeds. As a matter of fact, what have these hon. gentlemen being doing? They know that the manufacturers are in favour of protection; and yet the only gleam of hope that has come into this House came from the hon. member for North Leeds (Mr. Frost), who was bold enough to declare that the policy of the Government is protection to manufacturers. How did he get the information? Was it whispered into his ear, as it has been to other manufacturers throughout the Dominion? It seems to me that it would be more statesmanlike on the part of hon. gentlemen in office to take the people into their confidence and proclaim their policy in this House and not whisper it in the ears of their friends throughout the country.

Let me refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). The United States will be very much pleased to hear of another great effort to boom that country, made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), but, in his closing utterances, he was not so friendly as he was at the opening of his remarks. He condemned their system of protection, he said that the whole wealth of the country was in a few hands, and one would think he was the greatest enemy they have. But he is not their enemy, he is their friend, and has had correspondence with secretary Carlisle, in the interests of the United States, against the interests of Canada. If I may be permitted, let me turn my attention to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who went through this country proclaiming that, as in the Mackenzie Administration, he would have to set himself in this House to the difficult task of Minister of Finance. Now, we find that he has not attained the height of his ambition. We can readily imagine, in the Privy Council Chamber, that there might have been some little feeling about the matter, and that the First Minister plainly said to the hon. gentleman: you have not been a success in the past, we had better have a new and untried man and a premier of one of the provinces, and we will not allow the hon. member to speak on the trade question, but will give you all the honour and glory of criticising the late Finance Minister. Of course, I do not say that that is the case but it points that way, and I think that the Privy Council acted wisely in compromising the difficulty by allowing the gentleman that wanted to be Finance Minister do the work and make the real Finance Minister in name remain silent on financial questions because, judging from what I have heard and seen, the Minister of Trade and Commerce is to-day the ablest man on that side, and I fear the First Minister will be somewhat disappointed with his provincial premiers unless they take up and do the work as the hon. member for South Oxford has done it for years past. That hon. gentleman could not reply to the convincing arguments of my hon. friend from York, and he had to fall back on that old familiar cry, which has resounded for years through the concession lines and streets of our towns and cities—the cry of corruption. I merely say this, that it is not in the interests of the morality of this country to have leading men whose only stock in trade is the cry of corruption, which they are never able to prove. I am one of those who believe that public life should be surrounded with certain safeguards. There are just as honest Reformers as Conservatives, just as honest Conservatives as Reformers; and when this cry of corruption is raised so often and dwelt upon so long, the public pay no heed because they believe it is used for selfish purposes not in the interests of the public at all.

Then the gerrymander came in, of which we have all heard. That took place a long time ago, and we ought to be called on to discuss something new. If they had a trade policy to discuss, the hon. gentleman could have taken up his time with that, but they had none.

The hon. gentleman said it was a very unfortunate thing that the leader of the Opposition, and those associated with him, had touched the question of the civil service. Now, I listened to that discussion with a great deal of interest, and in the hope that good might come from it. I believe that there are civil servants in Ottawa and all over the Dominion who are upright, honourable men and men of great ability, and as long as they do their work properly and exercise their franchise as British subjects, they ought to be retained in their place. But on the other hand, I am free to say that if a civil servant is offensive on a public platform or to any of his fellow men and transgresses the rules of decency, he takes his life into his hands and has no reason to remain longer in the service. Allusion was made to the civil service of the country. I can only say that the province of Ontario, so far as the provincial legislature is concerned, protects them and puts every safeguard round them. Every office it is possible for the Ontario government to fill is filled by their own political supporters; and even the present Minister of Justice in this House has interfered with the administration of justice to achieve party ends. Years ago, in the days of the Hon. John Sandfield Macdonald, you will remember that the ablest men at the bar were retained by him and his cabinet to prosecute public criminals of the country. But since that time, every gentleman belonging to the legal profession, who can speak on the hustings, no matter how imperfectly, is a civil servant in every sense of the word, and is rewarded for his zeal on the hustings by having confided to him the most sacred of all things, the prosecution of public criminals. What has been the result? For some years past public criminals have escaped and the Minister of Justice in this last year went back to the principles of the late John Sandfield Macdonald because more recently he has been appointing the ablest men at the bar of Canada for the prosecution of public criminals.

I was very much astonished to hear, for the first time, the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), a gentleman who is very much respected in his own province, and who has had not only a provincial but a Dominion reputation, promulgate a doctrine such as I have never heard before promulgated by a Minister of the Crown. I say that nothing has done more to injure the position of the Government, than that proclamation of the Minister of Railways, supported as he was by the Ministers and by the hon. gentlemen behind him. When he was asked by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) if he dismissed certain men belonging to the Intercolonial, he said that because a certain gentleman named McDonald, who had been the opponent of the hon. member for Pictou, had requested their dismissal, he had dismissed them. The hon. member for Pictou spoke again and the hon. gentleman the Minister of Railways went a little further.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is going a little too far, he must confine himself to the discussion of the amendment and he cannot refer to a previous debate.

Mr. HENRY. At the same time, I may say, without reference to the Minister of Railways and Canals, without reference to a past debate, that when the principle is laid down by an hon. gentleman in this House, who is placed in a position of trust and responsibility, that, when the opportunity arises, when information has been given him by a defeated candidate or by a member of this House on his own side, he will dismiss the common labourer of this country in connection with the public works, without investigation, I say it is a blot upon the fame of this country to have such a proposition made.

Now, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) intimated in this debate that the reason the tariff was not brought down was to satisfy the importer, and that the importers urged that no action be taken on the tariff or the new tariff be brought down until their stocks of goods were exhausted. What does that mean? Does it mean that the importers had a consultation with the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Government, and that they are going to remove these duties from imported goods? It looks much like it, because I do not see why the importers should ask that the tariff be not interfered with until they had disposed of their stocks, unless the duties are to be taken off, and they do not wish to have stocks on hand that have paid the duty. I hope that that is not the case. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has proclaimed everywhere throughout this country that he is in favour of doing away with the National Policy. He has proclaimed on every hustings that his policy is death to protection. There is no use wearying the House with reading extracts from his utterances, because they are well known to every hon. member. If he says he is death to protection, he must either retire from the Government of the day or carry with him those who are associated with him, and do away with protection and establish something else. I hope, as the hon. member for York said, at the close of his eloquent speech, that he will change his views and that the tariff will not be disturbed to any extent, and that the National Policy will be carried on with such variations from time to time as may be needed to suit the requirements of the time. But, if they continue the system of protection, what shall we say? I am sure we shall feel disposed to forgive them. While I am not the leader and not authorized to speak for gentlemen on this side, if the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce would come down with a policy on the lines laid down by the late Minister of Finance, I, for one, believe in supporting him, on the ground that his action would be in the best interests of the country. Representing, as I do, the riding of South Brant, and the large manufacturing interests of Brantford and Paris, as well as the agricultural district surrounding, I wish to say that some of the manufacturers of the city of Brantford have every confidence that the tariff now in existence will be maintained. It is evident to me they have faith in what is whispered in their ears by hon. gentlemen opposite, but they have no faith in the public utterances of those gentlemen. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has said that the National Policy was the curse of this country, and that ever since it has been established, it has done a great deal of harm, that it has been a load upon the neck of the people of this country. I will just read a few statistics to show that, instead of going backward, the country has gone forward by leaps and bounds:

In 1878 the Government and post office savings banks' deposits were $8,197,000; in 1895 they were $45,362,244.

In 1878 the public deposits in the chartered banks were $70,856,000; in 1895 they were $184,000,000.

In 1878 the amount of bank notes in circulation was $20,475,000; in 1895 it was $32,774,442.

In 1878 the amount of bank loans to business men was $119,682,659; in 1895 it was $214,000,000.

In 1878 the amount of life assurance written by companies doing business in Canada was $84,751,000; in 1894 it was $398,061,000.

In 1878 Canadian loan companies had a capital of $17,287,538; in 1895 they had a capital of $35,445,252.

In 1878 the amount of fire insurance in force in Canada was $409,899,000; in 1895 it was $836,067,000.

In 1878 Canada shipped from Montreal to Great Britain 15,963 cattle and 31,841 sheep; in 1895 there were shipped 96,564 cattle and 215,508 sheep.

In 1878 Canada shipped to Great Britain less than fifty horses; in 1895 there were shipped from Montreal alone to Great Britain 13,000 horses.

In 1878 Canada shipped to Great Britain cheese, valued at $3,997,521; in 1894 she shipped cheese, valued at $15,488,191.

In 1878 Canada shipped to Great Britain $168,000 worth of apples; in 1894 she shipped $907,297 worth.

In 1873 the value of hog meats exported from Canada was $998,409; in 1894 it was $2,976,501.

In 1878 the total exports from Canada amounted to $79,323,000; in 1894 they amounted to $117,524,949.

In 1878 the total imports into Canada were $93,081,787; in 1894 they had grown to $123,474,940.

In 1878 Canadian railroads carried 6,443,924 passengers; in 1894 they carried 14,462,498 passengers.

In 1878 the length of Canadian railways in operation was 6,143½ miles; in 1894 it was 15,625 miles.

Now, I submit that, if the larger figures applied to 1878 and the smaller figures to 1895, the hon. Minister would have been justified in coming to the conclusion he reached. But the very reverse was the case. In the city of Brantford and the town of Paris, manufacturing industries have largely increased, and the manufacturers themselves admit that, were it not for the National Policy and for the protection afforded by the Conservative Government, they would not have developed to the extent they have. The manufacturing interests of Brantford and Paris are far larger than what they were in 1878. While they give steady employment to mechanics and labour—not quite so steady as we would like to see, they also help the agriculturists in the surrounding country. On every market day in Brantford, Toronto, Hamilton, Chatham, Windsor, and other manufacturing places, you see hundreds of farmers' wagons laden with products which could not be sold were it not for the market afforded by the workmen employed in the manufacturing industries that exist by reason of protection. Notwithstanding what hon. gentlemen opposite may say, if the stove manufacturers, the agricultural implement manufacturers, the engine and boiler manufacturers, the bicycle manufacturers, the plough manufacturers, the woollen and cotton manufacturers, and other manufacturing industries were not protected, there would not be a single manufacturing industry in Brantford or Paris, or anywhere else to speak of, of great magnitude. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the National Policy will be the policy of the party in power. I sincerely hope that nothing will be done to carry out the campaign speeches of the First Minister and of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. If they carry out the policy of the late Administration, the country will have more or less confidence in them, although it will not have much confidence in their promises. I can assure our hon. friends opposite that the Conservative party, and especially the new members of it in this House, are more thoroughly determined to stand to their Conservative principles than they have ever been before. We are true to our leaders, and we will fight for the National Policy, because we believe it to be in the best interests of Canada.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, if this resolution proposed to censure the Government for having a trade policy ready in four weeks, I would cheerfully support it; but as it proposes to censure the Government for not having a trade policy ready in four weeks, I must reluctantly oppose it. I am not now, I never was, and I never shall be, in sympathy with the trade policy of the Liberal party as enunciated in the speeches of its leaders. The Liberal party did not win its election on its trade policy, and I am hopeful that the Government will be mindful of this in framing their tariff changes. At all events, only a Government of fools would undertake to bring down a ready-made tariff policy for a country like this, inside of four or six weeks. I think that the Government, which I expect generally to oppose, is a Government of Canadians. They may think that their campaign promises are important, but more important still are the interests that would be ruined by the hasty and rash fulfilment of these campaign promises. I cannot see myself that a reasonable delay is objectionable. I do not think that the country is taking alarm at the delay. Delay, I think, in this case is a sign of wisdom, and the country would rightly have reason to be alarmed if a new Government, like the present one, undertook to bring down a ready-made tariff policy inside of four weeks. Haste in such a case would, I think, be a sure sign of folly. I represent a constituency in which the industrial interests are large; and I would tell the Government that it is better to be inconsistent than to be unjust. The country does not expect the Government to prove the consistency of its party at the expense of closed factories and unemployed men. The Government are dealing with industries in which millions of dollars are invested, in industries in which thousands of men are employed; and I think the country will overlook the inconsistency which spares these industries rather than it would pardon any inconsistency which might bring ruin to many capitalists, and starvation to others. I may be wrong, but I say again that the Liberal party did not win this last election, in my opinion, on its trade policy; and this House needs no assurance from me to learn that the same people who put the Liberal party in power are competent to put them out of power if they trifle with the industries of Canada. The hon. member for York, in his address yesterday afternoon, was, I think,—and I say this with a great deal of respect for the ex-Finance Minister—was, I think, injudicious in making his complaint concerning the Government bringing down their tariff policy. It occurs to me that in making that speech, he may have forgotten a certain contingency: that the very speech he was making on behalf of certain classes, might produce a feeling of distrust and unrest amongst those very classes. I do not credit the statement that the $400,000,000 of capital alleged to be invested in the industries of this country, are in the state of tremour so graphically depicted in the verbal pyrotechnics of the hon. the ex-Finance Minister. As for his statement about capitalists being kept on a ragged edge for eight or nine months, with consequent loss of business, and his appeal concerning the axe which the First Minister is supposed to brandish in the day time, and to keep under his pillow in the night time, I must say that such talk may be mighty good politics from the regular Opposition standpoint, but, in my humble judgment, and in the interest of the country, it is mighty bad policy. The statement that doubt and unrest in the country are paralysing business and clouding hope, may read all right in "Hansard," but I do not think it will avail in the Dominion of Canada, certainly not in the province of Ontario. I regret exceedingly that I cannot see eye to eye with many of my hon. friends upon this side of the House with whom I am in general sympathy. In considering this resolution, it is my privilege not to forget that I am a Conservative, representing a Conservative constituency; but it is my duty to remember that I represent a constituency which has shown its independence, and expects me to show mine. I know that in speaking as I do, I reflect the views of the leading and prominent Conservatives of East Toronto—not the political machine men that I buried beneath an avalanche of votes on the 23rd June, but the men who compose the bone and sinew of the Liberal-Conservative party, the thinking men of the Conservative party, who have not only the interests of the party at heart, but also the general welfare of the entire country. It is because my conclusions, after listening attentively to this debate, are fixed, that I am thus frank and do not hesitate in expressing my opinion. In this House I hope that my voice will always be heard on the side of right. My hand is free. Above my head I shall never hear the crack of the party whip. My responsibility is lodged, not here, but in another place. To the electors of East Toronto I am responsible, and to them I shall render an account.

Mr. HENRY.

Mr. HENDERSON. I rise to express my hearty approval of the motion which has been made by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster). I fail to read in that motion that the hon. member for York seeks to condemn the Government for not bringing down a tariff in detail within forty days, or in a short time. In fact I think the resolution itself declares that the member for York did not expect, and could not expect, the Government to be prepared at this early date with a tariff in detail, but that it reasonably expected, in the interests of the people of this country, that some declaration of policy should be made so that the people of Canada, from one end to the other, would have some idea of what was to be expected from the Government when they did bring down their tariff policy at a session in the early part of next year. I believe that would be the true policy for the Government to pursue, and for that reason I heartily endorse the motion which has been moved by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster). True, the Minister of Trade and Commerce in reply to the hon. member for York, said:

Sir, the hon. gentleman above all things is desirous of knowing what our policy is on this same trade question. I propose to give the hon. gentleman in detail what our policy was and what our policy is on this question, as formulated by the Liberal party in full convention where all sections of Canada were represented. We do not ask the details of the trade policy of the Government. We simply asked for a declaration of its general principles; but, strange to say, although the Minister of Trade and Commerce declared he was prepared to give even the details, what did he give this House? He immediately launched out into a declaration against the National Policy and what it has done for the country. He said it had decreased the value of farms. But the hon. gentleman did not give one iota of evidence to show that any depression in land values was on account of the National Policy. He next said it had oppressed the masses. But he failed to bring forward any evidence to show that the masses had been oppressed. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce had visited the exhibition at Ottawa, which many hon. members have done, or if he had gone to Toronto exhibition and seen there all classes of the community, he would have found evidence to the contrary. The hon. member next declared that the National Policy had checked immigration. He produced no evidence to show that even a single individual had been prevented from coming into this country by reason of this policy. Then he told the House that we had lost trade through the National Policy. He produced no evidence, and if he examined the returns of his own department he would find they show the reverse. Further, he declared that the National Policy discriminated against trade with Great Britain. But he failed to adduce any evidence of a single instance in which the tariff of this country is higher on goods coming from Great Britain than from the United States or any other country. This is about the gist of the detailed statement with respect to the policy that the Government propose to pursue. But we had a more explicit statement contained in a declaration made by the leader of the Government himself in 1893, when he spoke at the Liberal convention at Ottawa, and made use of these words:

Let it be well understood that from this moment we have a distinct issue with the party in power. Their ideal is protection, our ideal is free trade. Their immediate object is protection; ours a tariff for revenue only. Upon this issue we engage the battle from this moment forward.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has told the House that the issue was decided on 23rd June last. Like my hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Robertson). I question whether that issue was decided then or not. I do not believe for one moment that the National Policy or the trade policy of the Conservative party which had existed for eighteen years was condemned on the 23rd of June by the people. I am satisfied that such is not the case, and no doubt the members of the Administration are well aware of the fact that the issue which brought the Liberal party to power on that occasion was another issue than that of the National Policy. With respect to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), I desire to draw attention to the fact that hon. members opposite are not united on their trade policy. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, being a member of the Government, was supposed to answer for the Administration, and he stated what he considered their policy is. Their policy was formulated by the Liberal party in 1893; but, strange to say, the hon. member for North Norfolk rose in his place and told the House that the trade policy of the Government is not yet formulated. The hon. gentleman is not a member of the Government. True, he stands very near to them, and possibly might have been nearer still had it not been for an important communication sent to the present leader of the Government not many years ago; but these circumstances go to show that hon. gentlemen occupying the Treasury benches at the present time, and their near supporters are not a unit even on the trade question. While the one declared that the trade policy was formulated in 1893, the other told the House that it is not yet formulated. While referring to the hon. member for North Norfolk, I desire to say a few words with regard to his remarks on the question of reciprocity. I confess I was surprised that hon. gentleman occupied so much of the time of the House in discussing that question. That question, to my mind, may be rightly called a dead issue; I do not regard the question of reciprocity as a live issue at the present time. On the other side of the line there is now going on a severe contest. In all probability, Hon. William McKinley will be elected President of the United States, and if he is elected, I have no doubt there will be a McKinley Bill, with a high tariff wall, higher than ever, spiked all along the top so that it will be impossible for us to get over it. I see no possibility in the near future of securing reciprocity with the people of the United States. I therefore dismiss that matter as one of no consideration, and not worthy of discussion. The hon. gentleman, while dealing with this question, brought out an old friend, that I have heard of time and again, and from his frequent reference to the letter written by Congressman Baker to Mr. Secretary Blaine in 1891, and the reply which was sent by Mr. Blaine to Mr. Baker, I am almost led to believe that the hon. gentleman had some very near relations to that letter. I desire to make this statement, and it adds to the evidence I have suggested. I remember years ago meeting a friend from Rochester, who was well acquainted with Congressman Baker—a gentleman who was a near neighbour and in intimate communication with him informed me that the letter from Mr. Baker to Mr. Blaine and the letter from Mr. Blaine in reply were both written and conceived by the hon. member for North Norfolk—or, if they were not written by him, they were written at the suggestion of the hon. member (Mr. Charlton), for the purpose of influencing the elections at that time going on in Canada. He has, to-day, and repeatedly on previous occasions, trotted out these letters in his speeches, and the great care with which he deals with them leads me to believe that the evidence I have received from a gentleman who was a neighbour of Congressman Baker, is true indeed, and that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) had a great deal more to do with these two famous letters than many of us had reason to suppose.

Now, Sir, let us take a look on the other side of the line. We talk about reciprocity with the United States, and we talk about their reducing their tariff in order to meet us. But the experience of the people of the United States in reducing their tariff has not been the most satisfactory. In 1894, the McKinley Bill was in force, but in 1895 they had what was known as the Wilson-Gorman Bill, and it is a fact that during that latter year the importation of goods into the United States from Great Britain was $47,000,000 worth more than under the McKinley Bill in 1894. The people of the United States did not believe that any advantage could accrue to them in reducing their tariff, because, knowing that on that account they lost the manufacture of $47,000,000 worth of goods in 1895, they are not likely to repeat the same mistake. Even if we secured reciprocity with the United States, what advantage would it be to us? Is the home market that we would in consequence lose not of greater advantage to us than all we can expect to get from reciprocity? The estimated value of the farm products of Canada is about $400,000,000, and of these products about $350,000,000 worth are consumed in the Dominion, because only $50,000,000 worth are exported. At that rate, the city of Toronto, with a population of about 200,000, would consume about $14,000,000 worth of the products of our farms, and the city of Montreal, with its great population, would consume about $21,000,000 worth; or, in other words, the market of the city of Toronto is equal to three times the entire export of agricultural products from Canada to the United States, and the home market of the city of Montreal is equal to about four times the entire of this export. Are we, then, going to surrender the valuable market of these large cities for the purpose of accepting such a small return, a return which might prove of no value whatever: I believe it is better for us to retain our own home market and to allow the Americans to do the same. Certainly we are going to have no advantage by surrendering markets like the cities of Toronto and Montreal for the consumption of the products of the farmers of this country, and accept in return something of no value.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will return to the question of the National Policy. Yesterday, the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) raised the question of the origin of the protective system. My recollection is that it did originate about the year 1876, and it originated something in his way. The farmers of this country were the originators of it. They found that they were depressed; they found that the products of the United States were flooding this country, and that they were unable to procure a suitable market for their products. They appealed to the Government then in power. They appealed to the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie and to the then Finance Minister (Sir Richard Cartwright), and it is a matter of history that a petition representing 100,000 of the farmers of the Dominion of Canada, was presented to the Government. The petition reads in the following words:—

Whereas agriculture is a prominent interest of this Dominion, and the prosperity of all classes depends largely upon the success of the farmer, it is desirable to enact such laws as shall insure that success.

As practical farmers we cannot but view with regret our markets filled with the United States produce free of duty, while Canadian produce is heavily taxed when sent to the United States' markets.

Your petitioners respectfully pray for such protection as will secure the home market for the home producer; or that the same rate of duty be levied on all agricultural products coming into the Dominion from foreign countries that is imposed by said foreign countries upon our produce.

This petition, however, was not considered by the Government of the day. At that time the late Sir John Macdonald placed upon the records of Parliament a resolution declaring in favour of the principle of protection. He repeated that resolution in 1877, and in 1878 he went to the country on the same declaration of policy, and the country returned him to power. In 1882 the principle of protection was re-endorsed. In 1887 and in 1891 it was again affirmed, and, like the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Robertson), I hold that in 1896 the people of Canada have not declared against the protective system. If hon. gentlemen opposite did succeed in obtaining power, it was on account of another question, and not on the trade question, and not on a condemnation of the protective principle. I wish to show for a few moments, in support of the resolution of the hon. member for York (Mr.

Foster), why a declaration of the principle on which these hon. gentlemen opposite intend to regulate the tariff ought to be made at the present time. Every class of the community demands it. It is in the interests of the business man, it is in the interests of the manufacturer, it is in the interests of the farmer, it is in the interests of the miller. They should know something of the line along which the Government proposes to go in formulating their policy; whether it is to be free trade, whether it is to be tariff for revenue only, or whether—as has been hinted throughout the country—only a slight change would be made, and that really we shall retain the protective principle, after all. I know that in the county which I have the honour to represent, which is largely an industrial county, it was no uncommon thing for gentlemen opposed to me to hint to the manufacturers that they need not be afraid to support the Liberal party, because the existing protective policy would not be interfered with. I have said that it is in the interest of the millers of this country that a declaration should now be made by the Government. During the elections, I was informed by millers in western Ontario that they were utterly unable to make sales of flour in the east. Their business was paralysed then, and to-day it is in very much the same condition. Where they obtained orders for thousands of barrels of flour before the election, now they are obtaining orders for hundreds. These men were unable to pay the farmers the prices for wheat which they formerly paid. That is a loss to the miller on his business, and a loss to the farmer on the grain he has to sell. For instance, on the 26th of April last, the day after the House rose, the price of wheat in the city of Toronto was 80 cents a bushel, and that same day the price of wheat in Liverpool was 81 cents, only 1 cent higher for No. 1 California wheat, showing the high price relatively that the farmers of this country were obtaining here for their produce. But on the 15th of June the price in the city of Toronto had fallen to 72 cents, and the price in Liverpool had fallen to only 78 cents, a decrease in the price at Liverpool of three cents and in the city of Toronto of eight cents; showing that relatively the price was decreasing. On September 21st, only a day or two ago, in Toronto the same wheat is quoted at 67 cents, whereas at Liverpool it has risen to 85 cents. This is evidence sufficient to satisfy any reasonable mind that the farmers of this country are not realizing to-day the prices they would have realized had there been no change of Government; and had we to-day the assurance from the Government that the same policy of protection would be observed with reference to agricultural products, that the same measure of protection would be afforded to the farmers of this country that has been afforded to them in years past. I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that the price of wheat would take the same level, as compared with the price in Liverpool, that it had on the 26th of April, when the House was dissolved.

The same argument would apply to other articles, for instance, pork. The pork packers at the present time are not prepared to pay the prices they formerly paid. Were they assured that the same protection now given to the pork industry would be continued, I have no doubt they would again pay their former prices. But realizing that in a few months hence the product they are buying may be placed on the free list, and that this country may be flooded with the hog products of the United States, they are not willing to pay the price they would if they had such an assurance. I appeal to the Government on behalf of the great agricultural classes of this country, whom I represent. We do not ask them to give us the details of their policy; we do not ask them to say whether the duty on pork is to be 2 cents, 3 cents or 4 cents per pound; but I do ask them to say whether or not the principle of protection is to be continued, so that the agriculturists of the country will know what to do. This is the season of the year when the farmers are placing their grains on the market. What shall they do with them? Shall they sell them for what they will bring, or shall they, as in past years, feed their course grains to their hogs, and sell their hogs later on? The leader of the Government can now by one word tell the farmers of this country what would put hundreds and thousands of dollars into their pockets. It is certainly desirable that such should be done in the interest of the people of this country.

I hope that before this Parliament rises, at all events, hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches will give us more definite information as to what the policy of the Government shall be, so that the people of this country may know how to direct their course in their business transactions. The tenant farmers throughout this country at the present time, hundreds and thousands of them in every section of the country, are entering into contracts of five or six years tenancy. What are these men going to do? Are they going to enter into such contracts? No, they are going to wait. They want to see what the policy of the Government is going to be. If the policy of the Government is to be the downfall of protection, as we have been told over and over again it was going to be, then these people do not want to rent farms; they do not want to enter into engagements. Consequently, to every class of the community, the agricultural class largely, but the business and manufacturing classes especially, it is important—not that we should have the details of the plan of the Government; we do not ask that; it would not be reasonable to expect hon. gentlemen to give that. But throughout the length and breadth of this country there will be disappointment if the Government decline to make some more definite declaration as to what policy they will pursue in the formation of the tariff which is to be brought down at the next meeting of Parliament.

Having emphasized this matter, I do not wish to detain the House longer. It was not my intention, when I rose, to do so. I have drawn attention to the most pertinent point, and I desire again to express my hope that either during this discussion, before this resolution is voted upon, or before the House rises, some declaration of policy may be made by which the people of the country will be enabled so to direct their affairs that the losses which they may sustain by reason of the uncertainty and disquietude that exists at the present time may be reduced to as small a minimum as possible. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the House for your courteous hearing.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, I do not propose at this hour of the evening or at this stage of the debate to make a lengthy speech; but I feel, as representing a county in which everything depends on a continuance of the policy adopted by the late Government, that I would be recreant to my duty if I did not call the attention of the Government to the fact that in that county at least, the great mining and iron manufacturing industries are in a great state of uncertainty, I may say jeopardy, so long as the Government do not give the country to understand what their policy is likely to be. Great stress has been laid in the course of this discussion on the fact that the Government could not be expected to be prepared to meet the House at this time with a tariff framed in all its details. I have to say that such remarks from speakers on the other side of the House are clearly evasions of the point made by the Opposition, as set forth in the resolution proposed by the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster). That resolution is so worded as to guard carefully against such an impression being taken from it. It sets forth in the various "whereases" in the body of the resolution the fact that the public utterances of the gentlemen who constitute the Government, going back over a number of years, have varied so much, have been so indefinite, have expressed so many different opinions, that at this moment it is impossible for any member of this House or any citizen of this country to form any reasonable conclusion as to what the present opinion of the Government is. That being the case—and that state of affairs was carefully elaborated and brought out in the speech delivered by the hon. member for York—I am sure that no hon. member at this moment can pretend to so misunderstand the nature of that resolution as to think that it calls on the Government at this time to elaborate a tariff. It asks nothing of the kind. It simply asks the Government to do away with the uncertainty in which this country stands, and to let the country know whether their policy is to be free trade or protection. Between these two there is a very wide difference. I think it is not asking the First Minister of Canada too much to ask him to say whether he is a free trader or a protectionist; and if he should go so far as to say he is the one or the other, he would still leave to himself—he would at least, if he said he was a protectionist—a wide room to frame the tariff afterwards. It is true, if he said that the Government were for free trade, then the plea for delay would lose a good deal of its force; then the Government could not ask the House to give much time for the preparation of a tariff measure. It would be a simple matter. It would do away with all tariff duties and provide the revenue from some other source. Now, although this debate has continued for a considerable time, unfortunately the longer speeches have been made by the Opposition, and the Government have not given the information we desire to receive. Even those remarks that have fallen from the Government side of the House have not been satisfactory at all. Why? The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce stated definitely that the policy of the Government was to be found in the resolutions laid down in Ottawa in 1893, which was, as nearly as I can recollect, a tariff for revenue only, but on the other hand, we have had the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who addressed this House at great length, rather contradicting that statement, because he asked this House to believe that all the various opinions which have been made public during the last number of years by the Liberal party were to be held as merely expressions of opinion advanced by various gentlemen attached to the Liberal party, and not to be received as expressing the views of the Liberal party as a whole, so that at this moment we are just in the same position that we stood in when the debate began. Thus after we have been sitting here a month, we are still face to face with the Government occupying the same position of indefiniteness as did their candidates during the late campaign, when you could not tie any one of them to any fixed line of policy. We felt that to be a very serious disadvantage, when discussing public matters throughout the constituencies of Canada, but we did not believe it possible that after Parliament had sat for a month the Government should have managed to evade the direct question to which they should have been prepared to give a straight answer. Their policy, however, is still unknown, and we are still just as much in the dark as when the constituencies were being contested by the contending parties. It may be that that is creditable to the Government, but I am sure that it is exceedingly unsatisfactory to the country, and I do not think it is at all worthy of any hon. gentleman occupying a seat in this House to endeavour to fasten on the Opposition the charge that they are seeking to create uneasiness and a spirit of unrest, and are anxious to disturb business, because they endeavour to obtain information from the Government which it should be most ready to make known. The people's representatives are kept in the dark, and when we ask for light, we are told that we are seeking to create uneasiness and distrust in business circles. That is an exceedingly unfair charge, and a still more absurd one. For if there is one thing more calculated to create uneasiness among business men than another, it is uncertainty as to the trade policy which is to govern the country.

If this House closes in a few days, as we expect it will, I shall go back to Picton where there are millions of dollars invested in mines and other industries, giving employment to thousands of men, women and children, whose living depends on the continuance of these great industries, brought into operation by the National Policy. And when my constituents ask me what guarantee they have that this state of affairs, established by the late Government, is to continue and the prosperity now enjoyed to continue, I am to be compelled to say that, in spite of every effort, made in the most legitimate fashion, after the protracted interview we have had with the Government, we are still in complete ignorance of their purposes and intentions.

It may be considered creditable to the Government to so evade direct replies, and so trifle with the questions before this House as to send away the representatives of the people absolutely in the dark, but they must surely understand that such conduct is most unsatisfactory to the people. I implore them to take the advice given them by the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Robertson), and if they are deterred by the fear of any charge of inconsistency, so far as this side of the House is concerned, if they will continue in the course followed by the late Government during the last eighteen years, and not disturb what is practically a settled issue under which the people have made such steady if not phenomenal progress, we shall give them our support, and there will be no difficulty finding other issues on which we can oppose them in the country. But when a policy has been deliberately adopted by the country and endorsed, over and over again, every few years, and when the country has made rapid progress under that policy, there can be no good reason for disturbing it. Not a reason has been advanced in the course of the debate to show why that policy should be changed. In view of these facts, it would be well for the country if we could agree to adopt and continue the policy of the late Government and accept the principle of protection—that principle which declares that the business of Canada shall belong to Canadians, that we will meet hostile tariffs with hostile tariffs. The country would then be relieved from the uncertainty which now prevails. I do not know that the Government is not going to agree to this. There are indications that they are. For instance, there is the declaration made to us not long ago by a gentleman representing a large manufacturing centre, in which he expressed himself as certain that the Government would do nothing to injure the manufacturers. If that means anything, it means that they are going to continue the National Policy. Why, then, can they not say so? They need not give details, but simply declare that they are going to be protectionists. It would be difficult for us, however, to accept that opinion without a declaration, because we cannot forget that for years past they have been declaring on every platform that they are free traders. I wish to impress this fact on the Government, that if they are prepared to allow us to retain the advantages we have enjoyed under the policy of protection, continuing that policy with only such light modifications as they may think necessary. I am in a position to say that they will obtain the support of many hon. gentlemen on this side.

We have never bound ourselves down, as a party, to any particular tariff. We adopted protection as a system and we have arranged duties so as practically to protect the industries of the country, but we have never bound ourselves to any list of duties. And the great changes made three years ago, by the hon. ex-Minister of Finance, showed that we were perfectly prepared to modify and change the tariff, as the changed circumstances of the country required. In respect of that point, should the Government come down and propose modifications and changes merely, they would be going on in the line pursued by the Liberal-Conservative party, and in such a case the Liberal-Conservative party could not challenge them, and would be bound to support them. But what we ask, and what we have a right to ask, is that the Government should say to us and through us to the country, whether they are free traders or whether they are for protection, or whether they are for free trade as it is in England, or whether they are for some other policy. Let us have some kind of security, some kind of information, some intelligent answer to give to our people when we return to them, and they ask us what the Government is going to do.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) has voted. He is recorded as being paired every evening during the session after ten o'clock with the hon. member for Cornwall and Stormont (Mr. Bergin).

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I may say that the hon. member for Cornwall and Stormont asked to have that pair cancelled, and I thought that was understood by the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor). If there is any fault, it is mine, because I informed the hon. member for Hamilton that it was the wish of the hon. member for Cornwall and Stormont that the pair should be cancelled since last Monday—that is before the hon. member for Cornwall and Stormont was taken sick.

Mr. SPEAKER. I will leave it to the hon. member for Hamilton himself. Was he paired or not?

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I was paired every night after ten o'clock, but I understood from the hon. whip that the gentleman with whom I was paired had requested that the pair be cancelled.

Mr. SPEAKER. The Chair can have nothing to do with pairs. This is a matter for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) himself. Does the hon. gentleman desire to vote?

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). If the pair is off I desire to vote.

Mr. TAYLOR. It is not off. This is a matter between the whips.

Mr. SPEAKER. I know nothing about the whips. The hon. gentleman will have to make his decision, and he can vote or not, as he wishes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. All I can say is that the hon. gentleman requested me to strike it off, and it is struck off.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Did you mention that to the other whip?

Mr. TAYLOR. It is not on the list furnished by the hon. gentleman's clerk to-day. I wish to say—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order, order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think there can be any proper discussion on this question. I must leave it to the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood).

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I may say that I may have omitted, through my clerk, to notify the whip.

Mr. FOSTER. That would leave the whip without an opportunity to arrange for another pair.

Mr. TAYLOR. The pair was declared off for one night only.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. TAYLOR. There was an arrangement made for one night with another hon. member.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must put an end to this irregular discussion. Does the hon. member for Hamilton desire his vote recorded?

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Yes.

Mr. GIBSON. I desire to call attention to the fact that the hon. member for South Grenville (Mr. Reid) voted, although he was not in the House when the motion was put.

Mr. SPEAKER. Did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Reid) hear the whole of the question within the walls of this House?

Mr. REID. In French alone.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman heard the whole question in either language, he is entitled to vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I would call attention to the fact that the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) and the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) did not vote.

Mr. LISTER. This other matter is not settled.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. EDWARDS. I am paired with the hon. member for St. Antoine Division, Montreal (Mr. Roddick). Had I been free to vote, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I was paired with the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Kendry). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. GUAY. The hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin) did not vote.

Mr. FORTIN. I was paired with the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Chauvin). Had I not been paired, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. POUPORE. I was paired with the hon. member for Québec Centre (Mr. Laugelier). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. MACLAREN. I was paired with the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Cowan). Had I been free to vote, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. member for South Grenville (Mr. Reid) did not state that he had heard—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman answered me that he had heard the resolution.

Motion agreed to, and the House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

(Some hon. gentlemen sang the first verse of the National Anthem.)

Mr. TISDALE. I want to know if it is in order to sing and cheer when the Speaker is in the Chair, or when the House is in committee, with the Deputy Speaker in the Chair? I think it is out of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Certainly.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I think there are exceptional reasons why we might be allowed to sing "God Save the Queen" on this day. I propose that we take up item 9:

The Department of the Interior, including $1,800 each to two astronomers, William Ogilvie and Otto J. Klotz, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act..... $104,444

Mr. FOSTER. It is impossible for us to vote supplies when the House is very nearly a mob.

Mr. McMULLEN. I rise to a point of order. I appeal to the Chair if the hon. gentleman has a right to call this House a mob.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that unless you keep order, Mr. Chairman, and unless the Government who, in conjunction with you, certainly have a very large share in that duty, can, when we are in Committee of Supply, assist you in maintaining order, we ought not to be asked to go on with the Estimates. But if we are going to reduce ourselves to order, I want to take the opportunity to object to any item being passed in the Estimates with reference to the Department of the Interior until the Prime Minister has given satisfactory statements to this House as to when that office is to be filled.

Mr. CAMPBELL.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Take your seat, and it will be given now.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I must ask hon. gentlemen to keep order.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask for the protection of the Chair. If an hon. gentleman is to come out in front of the Chair, and is to stand there and order me to take my seat whilst I am on my feet, and doing what I have a perfect right to do as a member of this House, I want to know it. I want to know definitely whether this mob-rule is going to be continued. The Opposition have some rights in this House, and one right is not to be insulted in the presence of the Chair.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). There is no occasion at all for this display of feeling by my hon. friend. He forgets that this is an exceptional day. The exuberance of feeling which is manifested by hon. members, is quite pardonable in view of the fact that to-day Her Majesty has completed the longest reign in the history of England. Now, there will be no trouble at all in getting down to business. The hon. gentleman says that he objects to any item being taken in the Estimates for the Interior Department until he knows what is the policy of the Government with regard to this department. I have to say to the hon. gentleman that for the present, and perhaps, for a few days more, or a few weeks, at most, the Government thinks this department, for good reasons, ought to remain as it is, in abeyance. The position of affairs, as the hon. gentleman knows, is a peculiar one at the present time. It is not at all extraordinary for a Government taking office, to leave a portfolio open for a few days. The hon. gentleman knows that there are good precedents for this course. If the hon. gentleman will look back through the history of his own party, he will remember that in the Administration of Sir John A. Macdonald a most important portfolio, that of Railways, was kept open for ten or twelve months. When the hon. gentleman, the present leader of the Opposition, was appointed High Commissioner, he vacated the portfolio of Railways. He vacated it on the 24th May, 1884. Parliament met on the 29th January, 1885. As every body will remember, that session of 1885 was a most important session, it lasted for nearly six months. It opened on the 29th January and did not conclude, if my memory serves me right, until the 23rd July. During all that time the portfolio of Railways was vacant, and it was not until the following month of September that it was filled by the appointment of the Hon. J. H. Pope. That portfolio of Railways remained vacant under circumstances which were not at all parallel to the present circumstances and were not as favourable. Surely my hon. friend can allow the present Administration to keep this portfolio vacant for a few weeks more.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I remember the case stated by the First Minister, but I think the circumstances are widely different. The committee will remember that when I first assumed the duties of High Commissioner, I retained the position of Minister of Railways and Canals, in 1883, and the committee will remember that the late Mr. Pope was discharging, in my absence, the duties of that office, and that he continued to discharge those duties, being thoroughly familiar with the whole subject, and in a better position to do so than any other member of the Government, or than any person that could be brought into the office. The case, therefore, was entirely different from the present case.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Ha, ha, ha.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman laughs, but I want to ask him if, when statements are made in the press of the country, day after day, that the office is being held open for bargain and sale—I want to know if any such condition of things existed in that day as exists at the present time. I say that in my judgment a more scandalous state of things has never existed in relation to any portfolio. This country has been treated to a discussion in the press throughout the country for months as to the means the Government might be able to adopt by the disposal of this vacant portfolio in order to deal with an important public question. In my parliamentary experience I know of no similar case. There are conferences taking place, delegations rushing down from Winnipeg and the far west to support some gentleman's claim for the position and then other delegations coming to support the claims of some other individual. It is stated that the disposal which the Government of the day wish to make of the office is to enable them to meet the emergency, because one claimant for the office threatens to take the field against them. I have never seen in any country with which I am acquainted where parliamentary government exists such a condition of things as has existed and now exists, and which I have no hesitation in saying is becoming a scandal, one calculated to throw great discredit on the Government in connection with this office. The Government has no right to make a matter of bargain and sale, however great their necessities may be, the appointment to a portfolio. That is the position this question is now assuming in the presence of the people of this country and of this House.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have only to say in answer to the remarks of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman says the Government has no right to make a bargain and sale of this portfolio. The Government has no intention to make it a matter of bargain or sale; but if the hon. gentleman is going to accept press rumours as facts, he will find himself much mistaken. What matters it if delegations come here, what matters it if delegations go there, or the press reports this or that? The Government will be prepared when the portfolio is filled to lay the whole matter before Parliament, and will invite the most severe criticism of friends and foes on this question. The hon. gentleman says he has never seen any such a scandalous matter before. He states that there is a great difference between the position in 1884 and that of to-day. The hon. gentleman says there is no bargain and sale at the present time, I will not say there was then; but everybody knows that there was a vacant portfolio because there was a race between one member and another member for the position. It is well known that if it was not filled at once because the legitimate claims of Mr. Chapleau to fill the office were not acknowledged. I have, therefore, only to say this, that the remarks of the hon. gentleman were entirely uncalled for, that he has no right, no authority and no reason to assume there is anything wrong going on at the present time. There is no right or authority for a single moment which would warrant the statement he made a moment ago that the Government were making the appointment to the vacant portfolio a matter of bargain and sale. At the present time the portfolio is not filled; but so soon as the position is filled and the name given to the House, the Government will be prepared to meet any criticism, and then, and not before, it will be open to the hon. gentleman to offer any criticism which he may think the occasion demands.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not say that the Government were holding out this portfolio as a matter of bargain or sale; but I said the course taken by the Government and the notorious facts, which are patent to the whole country, are creating that impression among the people. I affirm that this action is calculated to be injurious to the system of parliamentary government. I say more, that the House knows that for a long period the constituency of Brandon has been disfranchised. The House knows that with Parliament in session the people of Brandon were entitled to have a prompt decision as to whether the hon. gentleman elected to represent that constituency, decided to elect to sit for that or another constituency, for they were entitled not to be prevented from having a representative in this House. It may suit the convenience of the Government, but the fact that no measures are taken by the Government to give to the electors of two constituencies the representation to which they are entitled under the constitution is an additional reason why this matter should not be interminably kept in a position that I say, causes it to be regarded. It is a matter of public notoriety, taken in connection with the statements in the press and the negotiation going on in reference to this matter and the grounds for those negotiations, all of which have so strong an air of probability, that intelligent people of the country entertain no doubt as to why it is that the portfolio of the Department of the Interior, one of the most important portfolios in the Cabinet, especially at the present, should remain unfilled, and that a constituency, which may furnish a seat at some future day for some person who may be able to secure the position, should be in the meantime kept open. There is another fact, and that is that we have had an authentic statement made by the First Minister in this House that the Manitoba school question was on the eve of settlement. We have had in the press the announcement, made in the most distinct and emphatic terms when it was very useful to the Government to have such a statement made by the leading organ of the Government, that the question was absolutely settled; yet the last time I asked for information on this matter the hon. Prime Minister had no intimation to give except that the matter is now open and unsettled and he could give no further information to the House. When I asked when the constituencies to which I referred would have an opportunity of being represented in this House, the hon. gentleman gave what I think was an answer scarcely to be expected from the First Minister of the Crown, that at some day beyond the present, elections would be held—an answer entirely evasive, containing no information except an intimation that so long as it suited the convenience of the Government and their political purposes they would disfranchise an important constituency and prevent the people having that representation in this House to which they are entitled.

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). Notwithstanding the explanation which has been given by the leader of the Government, I still object to any Estimates being passed for the Interior Department while the portfolio of the Minister of the Interior remains without a holder. My hon. friend has endeavoured to cite a precedent in the case, of the Minister of Railways in the session of 1884-85. I contend that the two cases are not at all parallel. In that case the portfolio was filled by a member of the Government who represented a province which had more than one representative in the Cabinet, whereas in this case, so long as the portfolio remains vacant, the great western portion of this country extending from Lake Superior to the Pacific coast remains without Cabinet representation. And particularly is this the case, when my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) has not seen fit to give any of the representatives of the Pacific province a seat in this Cabinet, so that the great province of British Columbia, as well as the prairie section of the country is at present without a representative. Even, as acting Minister of the Interior, we have a gentleman who does not occupy a seat in this House, and the member of the Cabinet who does act for the Department of the Interior here, and who undertakes to answer any question asked by members respecting matters relating to that department, and who takes up any motions referring to that department, knows nothing whatever of the western country, and I venture to think cares nothing for it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Under these circumstances I believe that I am acting in the interest not only of Canada in general, but of the western section of the country in particular, in asking, that before any money is voted for the service of that department, a Minister should be named. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) cannot say that he has no men to choose from who could competently fill that position. We have representatives in this House supporting him from Manitoba, from the Northwest Territories, and from British Columbia, and from what I know of some of these gentlemen, and from what I have heard of others, I have no doubt that they would fill the position as well as new men could be expected to do, and certainly as well as some of the colleagues of my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) are likely to fill the departments which they at present control. And, if none of the members in the House possess the requirements which the Prime Minister considers necessary for his Minister of the Interior, why should not my late opponent (Mr. Martin) be given that portfolio? He is certainly a gentleman who deserves it, as having fought harder for his party in the west than any man at present living in that part of the country. I believe, from remarks that I have seen quoted as being made by my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier), that he possesses a high opinion of Mr. Martin's ability, and Mr. Martin certainly possesses an intimate knowledge of the wants and requirements of the western country. Besides that, Mr. Martin has a claim on the gratitude of my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier); for had it not been for Mr. Martin's action, my hon. friend and his party would not now be occupying the Treasury benches. Had not Mr. Martin introduced the school question in Manitoba and by so doing excited the feelings of race and creed throughout Canada, the result of the last elections would have been very different from what it was. Unless the sense of gratitude of my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) is like what has been described as a lively sense of favours to come, and unless he considers that Mr. Martin's usefulness is gone, I think that from motives of gratitude alone, he ought not pass over the claims of that gentleman.

But if he does, we have heard mentioned the name of the Hon. Clifford Sifton, the Attorney General of Manitoba. Mr. Sifton also knows the country well, and although I am not advocating his claims as I think they are vastly inferior from a party standpoint to those of Mr. Martin, still he knows the country well, and in his own interests if he were in this House would doubtless look after the interests of the western portion of Canada. But he, too, is left to attend to his duties in a lower sphere, and to act in the future as he has done for some years in the past, as Attorney General for the province of Manitoba. Such being the case, it is hardly fair we should be asked to pass these Estimates; to vote large sums of money to be expended by men who know nothing of the country, know nothing of its needs or requirements, and who must be guided by the advice of men of whom, they being new in office, can know personally very little. I do not wish for one moment to cast any aspersions or to excite any suspicion against the officers of the Department of the Interior or of the Indian Department, over both of which the Minister of the Interior presides. But I know this: that no man stepping newly into office can of necessity have such an intimate knowledge of the qualifications of these gentlemen as to justify him in acting on their advice, when he has no knowledge of his own to show whether that advice leads him in the right line or not. It is, therefore, only fair that we should press my hon. friend the leader of the Government to fill this portfolio before he asks us to vote the very large sum of money required to meet the wants of the Department of the Interior. It is not my intention to occupy the time of the House longer at this late hour of the night, but I trust that my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) will give this matter his immediate attention, and will not press for the adoption of these Estimates until he is ready to tell us who is to have the disposal of them.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall this item be adopted?

Mr. FOSTER. We are not ready to pass the item. The weakness of the case presented to us is this: that my hon. friend the Prime Minister has not intimated one single difficulty which lies in his way to prevent him from filling the portfolio of the Interior. He has simply stated that he has not been able to fill it, and that private and confidential negotiations are going on, but he has not indicated any reason why it is difficult, or why the House should grant him further delay in the matter. Since I have been in Parliament, I recollect that probably no stronger denunciation has been hurled by my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) against the Liberal-Conservative party, than that for a single day while Parliament was in session there should be any constituency in Canada which was not represented on the floor of Parliament. These denunciations arising out of the very principles of Liberalism and constitutional government, were hurled by the hon. gentleman and his friends across the floor of the House. It is the very first principle of well-founded Liberalism and of constitutional government, that the people's representatives shall have an opportunity of making their wants known in the High Court of Parliament. More especially is that the case, when the supplies for the service of the country are being criticised, and when, as in the present instance, we find, geographically speaking, the larger half of the Dominion unrepresented in the Government. In the province of Manitoba and North-west two constituencies have been absolutely unrepresented during this entire Parliament, without the Government making the least motion towards giving the electors a chance of sending their representatives to this House. Now, sometimes a Prime Minister may find a difficulty in choosing a man upon whom his eye falls for a representative position like this; not so much perhaps from choosing his as to secure for the time being a constituency in which he can run and be elected. In this case there is no difficulty of that kind. The constituency of Brandon, a most important constituency, has not been represented in this House during this whole Parliament, and has been confessedly standing open as the probable seat, the Prime Minister thinks, of the gentleman who is to be the Minister of the Interior. So that there is the constituency: it has been kept unrepresented. There is no difficulty, then, in finding the place for the candidate, when he may be selected. There is no difficulty in that. What difficulty is in the way? My hon. friend has not given a single public reason why that office has not been filled, or a reason which should stand as a difficulty in his way or should pave the way for his plea that indefinite delay shall be given; more than that, it was the intention of the Prime Minister himself at the beginning of this session evidently was that no lengthened delay should occur. My hon. friend will recollect that the matter was brought up in the discussion on the Address, and that the question was then raised why a full Cabinet had not met Parliament. No difficulties having been represented by the Prime Minister as standing in the way of the selection of a Minister of the Interior, a short time afterwards, when the Estimates were under review, on the item of Civil Government, I made objection myself to the item being passed without a responsible head for the department; and the objection seemed to be so well taken that my hon. friend assented to it and promised that he would soon be in a position to make his announcement, when the items could be taken up and passed in the regular order. My hon. friend felt at that time that it was a reasonable objection, because he would have it in his power in a short time to take away from the force of that objection, and he actually set the day on one occasion when he should make the announcement. What has happened since? Now, my hon. friend presses that the item shall pass. There is still no Minister. The portfolio is still vacant. What has happened to change my hon. friend's views? You cannot help the conclusion which the country will come to, and is coming to. The country is coming to the conclusion that my hon. friend is holding and dangling the office of Minister of the Interior for party and political purposes. What is the party and political purpose? Is it that he cannot choose a man of sufficient weight and capability to fill the office? Not at all. My hon. friend and late colleague has pointed out two or three whose merits and claims are evidently being canvassed before my hon. friend, who would amply fill that office—one of them a gentleman who has supported my hon. friend, and supported him strongly, to whom he owes in many ways a very great debt of gratitude; and the other a capable man, I am told, and who lies somewhat in the line of the preferments which my hon. friend is showering in other parts of the Dominion. He has rewarded the different friendly provincial governments one by one. He picks out the premier of one province, he picks out the premier of another, and for services well and truly rendered they get their reward. When he cannot find a portfolio with which to reward another, he goes back upon the principle which he has enunciated in this House and in the country, that, when a Government has a strong Minister of Justice and a strong Solicitor General, they have no business feeing lawyers for political purposes and giving them hundreds of thousands of dollars of the people's money, when those two officers are amply sufficient to do the legal work of the country. But the rewards have to be given; and as Prince Edward Island, for services rendered, has not, so far as its local government is concerned, had the proper reward, a very nice, very fat, and very remunerative office, it is said, has been given to the provincial premier; and we have to-day the spectacle in Canada from the hon. gentleman who leads the Government, who with his party thundered on all the high-roads and by-roads of Canada that there should be a complete severance of political dealing between the Dominion Government and the different provincial governments—we have this hon. gentleman going back on his record and the record of his party; and, when he cannot find portfolios with which to reward provincial governments that put their whole force into his contests and rallied the whole force of their civil service employees to his aid, he gives them legal perquisites, bringing the premier of one of the provinces, who has served him well, and placing him where he shall receive large fees for services which ought to be performed by a Minister of Justice who is well able to perform them, and by a Solicitor General who stands second to none, I believe, of the lawyers of Quebec in legal ability. Now, my hon. friend has one more provincial government to look after, that is the provincial government of Manitoba. He has a special reason for regarding with favour that government. That government, as my hon. friend has said, set the ball in motion which has been kicked and tossed, and kicked, for these last five or six years, for party purposes, and for party purposes only—started by the Liberal party and kept up by the Liberal party, until the game is won, and my hon. friend, as he said a while ago, sits there, whilst we sit here. He has good reason to bestow favours upon that government. He has been waiting to settle a great question. Will the hon. gentleman say that he has not filled his portfolio of Minister of the Interior because the Manitoba school question is still unsettled? What other question is there that should cause inconvenience? He has the constituency: it is crying to be represented here. It is a shame that it is not represented here.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. Hon. gentlemen do not think it is now. The spirit of Canadian and English Liberalism no longer animates them. Now that they are on the Treasury benches, they forget all about principles. They are bound together by the cement of office and emolument; principles do not count any longer. But, when they were on this side of the House, the principles of the old English Liberal school were the principles for which they fought, for which they were willing to bleed, for which if need be they were willing to die. These hold no longer. The constituency is still there. It cries to be represented. My hon. friend stops both ears to the cry. But there is a question in view: it is the Manitoba school question. Last year, my hon. friend sat in that seat, and the policy of my hon. friend, the alternative policy to all the other policies, was that before the Manitoba school question was attempted to be settled, information was absolutely necessary for the people of the country, as well as for the Parliament of the country. He said for the people of the country. He declared that you could not force matters. He said he had to rely on the moral sentiment of the people. Ministers might know of this question; but the people had to be informed. How? They could only be informed by a commission, and his policy was to appoint a commission to look into the matter, to get the facts of the case, to spread them, not merely before the Government and Parliament, but before the people; so that, after this gathering of the facts and spreading them, the calmer sense and good feeling of the people might settle this question by moral suasion, and there would be no occasion for bringing it before Parliament. He has not whimpered about a commission since he sat on that side of the House. Does he intend to appoint a commission? The information was absolutely necessary then. My hon. friend who sits behind him

(Mr. Tarte) was also in favour of a commission, but he wanted it to issue and make its findings and its report at the last session before it closed. My hon. friend who leads the Government rose in opposition to that. He wanted a commission, but it was not to report its findings just then, as the elections were intervening. To-day there is no commission and no information needed, and we are justified in supposing that it is the school question which is the trouble now. Is he trying to settle it and square himself with the province at the same time? Is he trying to make everything smooth? Is he trying to get some coin of vantage on which the late member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) may safely be placed, so that when the portfolio is given, it may bring the peace and quietness which will flow from a school question so settled? Is that the difficulty which lies in his path? If that be the line he is pursuing, this country will look upon the settlement as a matter of bargain and sale, and the sooner the hon. gentleman opposite gets his portfolio filled, the sooner he will rid himself of that imputation and the better by far it will be for the country. He has not given one reason why he has revised his opinion of a fortnight ago, when he said that on Thursday of a certain week he would make the announcement. He has given no intimation to the House of what his difficulties are and has not appealed to the House for more delay. Then he comes down and asks us to vote estimates for the Department of the Interior, to be administered by whom? No one in this House that we know of will be responsible for it. There is to be a new policy in that great Northwest, and that policy is not stated in the House and there is no Minister here to state it. But still he asks for the Estimates. I ask him if it is fair that he should call upon us to vote nearly a million of dollars for the expenditure of which there is no Minister responsible, and when there is no one to explain or carry out the new policy about which he spoke so hopefully. But is my hon. friend courting delay for another reason? Can it be possible that the Abbé Proulx has been sent on a mission by him to Rome? And is it because he has not yet made his entry into the Holy City, that we have this delay? And how long is the delay to last? How many more embassies are there to be? How many more people remain to be squared? How many more favours are to be conferred? Does he not see that while he delays in this way he is damaging public interests?

Mr. MACLEAN. I would like to call the attention of the First Minister to an incident which makes his conduct appear as a scandal before the country. The hon. gentleman and those supporting him have charged the bishops of the province of Quebec with undue interference in the recent elections in the matter of the school question. We have been told, in a leading organ, that an embassy has been sent to Rome to discipline those bishops for their conduct in the recent election. If that be the case and the portfolio is to be vacant until that discipline is administered, the Government are committing a scandal. If the bishops have done wrong, and the Government propose to discipline them by appealing to a foreign court, ignoring Canadian law, they are taking a step which is unprecedented and which no free people should stand? If the bishops have done wrong, let them be disciplined here and now. The people are under the impression that one reason why the school question is not settled and the portfolio held open is because the Government are afraid to vindicate Canadian law, and go instead to a foreign country to discipline men who, they say, have done wrong against Canadian law. In that case their conduct is scandalous, and as long as they keep the portfolio vacant they lay themselves open to such imputations.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). No one can possibly object to legitimate criticism on the part of the Opposition when any Estimate of supply is proposed. The line taken by the leader of the Opposition, supported by my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Macdonald), is one to which no objection can be taken. But there is a ludicrous side, and when we hear sane men, respectable gentlemen, leaders of public opinion, editors of newspapers, stand up and broach an utterly absurd theory which no one believes, we can come to no other conclusion but that the debate is being carried on for the mere purpose of postponing Supply. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) took twenty-five minutes by the clock in repeating arguments which were better advanced by his leader and by our gentlemanly friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Macdonald). He dragged in a reference to the employment of leading counsel on behalf of the Behring Sea Claims Commission. Knowing the motives which, I suppose, prompted him when in the Government, he implied that the legal gentleman retained had been bought and was being paid for services rendered. I suppose that was his high idea of public life when a member of the Government. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that the gentleman from Prince Edward Island who was selected as leading counsel on the Behring Sea Claims Commission, was selected for his legal abilities and those only. He is one of the most able and distinguished lawyers in the Dominion, who, I am confident, will acquit himself ably before that distinguished tribunal. The hon. gentleman suggested that the Solicitor General and Attorney General should be employed. I can assure the hon. gentleman that his Government left such a maze of law-suits—I am told they range at present in the neighbourhood of four hundred—behind them, that while the Minister of Justice is precluded practising before the courts the Solicitor General will be employed many a long day trying to get through the arrears of law business which hon. gentlemen opposite, for their own purposes, created. In reply to one or two remarks which fell from the hon. member for Winnipeg, I have no criticism to make, either as to the tone, the manner or the matter of his speech. I acknowledge that if he had been chosen, as a large section of his party desired he should be chosen as leader of his party—and a very creditable leader he would make—and if his party had been in power, he would have had a perfect right to make a selection of a Minister of the Interior. He gave us some intimation of what he would do. He weighed in the balance the gentlemen who had been named, he considered Mr. Clifford Sifton's claims, Mr. Joseph Martin's claims and the claims of other hon. gentlemen, and intimated that if he were premier—as he may be some day—his ideal of a Minister would be Mr. Joseph Martin. But the hon. gentleman is not first Minister, and the time for making a selection has not yet come to him. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) holds that distinguished position, and he tells the House that he is weighing most carefully the circumstances and hopes to be able in a few weeks at most, perhaps in a few days, to take the House into his confidence. What could be more reasonable or more fair. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) said he did not give a reason, and then he went on to give one himself. His reason was: I fear the hon. gentleman is engaging in a diabolical attempt to smooth matters out. He resented it because in this school question, by means of which he sought to creep into power and by means of which he sought to break up this Dominion of Canada and to put class against class and creed against creed, and tramped from one end of the country to the other in his ignoble attempt—he is afraid my hon. friend may settle that question smoothly to the perfect satisfaction of all classes, races and creeds, and he cries out in horror at this attempt of my hon. friend. Let him possess his soul in patience. Sir, I had a good deal of sympathy with my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) to-night. Anybody who saw him when that vote was taken to-night, who saw the patent chagrin and rage expressed in his face, when the announcement of the vote was made and he began to feel that he was indeed utterly and beyond doubt in the cold shades of Opposition—anybody who watched the hon. gentleman could well understand the reason why he got up and, for twenty-five minutes poured out that long stream of words in repeating with amplifications the arguments his leader had put in a very terse way before. He may possess his soul in patience. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) gave the best answer that any Premier could give—that he is weighing all the circumstances, that he is progressing favourably, and that he hopes to make an announcement in a few days, and in doing it hopes to smooth out one of the greatest questions that have been known in this country. As to the vacancy in Brandon, of which the hon. gentleman speaks, the Government did not know and could not know before the House met that that vacancy would take place, and by no means can Brandon be represented here before the House is likely to rise. Of course the Opposition can keep the House here until October, or perhaps until November. But assuming they are going to act as a reasonable opposition would and take up only such time as they ought to take up in reasonable criticism of the propositions of the Government, the House will prorogue in about a week. Brandon could not be represented here within that time. So that the wailing cry which the hon. member for York, alone of all the people of Canada, hears is a figment of his own imagination. Brandon will be represented in proper time. I hope it will be represented by a Liberal, perhaps it will be represented by the Minister of the Interior and, possibly, by one of the gentlemen whose names he has mentioned.

Mr. DAVIN. We have been sitting here for a long time, and some members from the North-west and Manitoba would like to express their views upon this important question. I will, therefore, suggest that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I think that very grave and important reasons have been given already why we should not pass any Estimates for the Interior until a Minister has been appointed. There is a rumour abroad that has not been stated. And it would in my opinion, be more serious than any of the probabilities that have been mentioned, and the closing words of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries would seem to confirm it. That rumour is this—that an arrangement having been made to give the Department of the Interior to Mr. Sifton, the school question has been settled on the basis of the alternative that was proposed by the Manitoba government at the Winnipeg conference, but the Government is afraid to meet Parliament under such circumstances; the Government is afraid to give Mr. Sifton the portfolio of the Interior, and, having surrendered to Mr. Sifton's view on the school question, the Government are afraid of its Quebec following to meet what possibly may take place. That is one of the positions that is placed before us. And if, under these circumstances, the Prime Minister has arranged to give the portfolio to Mr. Sifton, if every arrangement is made and he is keeping back that fact from Parliament he, as a statesman, knows he is guilty of a very grave breach of constitutional decorum. Now, Sir, circumstances have arisen within a few days past that would seem to suggest that rumour is correct, but that difficulties have arisen and pressure is being brought to bear from various quarters. I have heard that the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) has had a conference on this subject with an eminent prelate. If he has had a conference on this subject with an eminent prelate and any arrangement has been come to, Parliament ought to know that too. Now, the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Davies) taxed my hon. friend from York with irrelevancy in referring to the employment of Mr. Peters, the Prime Minister of Prince Edward Island. But, Sir, that was strictly proper on the part of the hon. member for York, and for this reason—he was pointing out that it seemed to be the plan of the Prime Minister, the leader of the Liberal party, to have secured the influence in the various provinces by making an arrangement with the leading men in each province. Mr. Sifton was made one of the vice-presidents of the convention at the Rideau Rink, as Mr. Peters was and as, also, were others, for instance, the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) was one of the vice-presidents and the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) also was one. And, as we have had these vice-presidents brought into important portfolios, and as Mr. Sifton is about to be brought in, there was no room for the other vice-presidents, and so it was perfectly proper for the hon. member for York in making his argument to comment on the fact that this gentleman was also provided for. Now, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) sought to ridicule the position taken by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean). The hon. member for East York, no doubt, speaks by the book as to the sentiment in Ontario at the present time on the subject to which he referred, and if there be such a sentiment, if there be such a feeling in Ontario, it is a very important thing to bring before the House and it is a thing that, I apprehend, the Prime Minister would feel he ought to take notice of. Now, the "Globe" states that the school question has been settled, and if it had been settled, is it right to keep this House from the information that has been given to an eminent journalist? If it has been settled, and if Mr. Sifton is to be the Minister of the Interior, is it right to keep that from the House? What authority has the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to say that it will probably go to one of these two gentlemen?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not say that; I said either one would suit.

Mr. DAVIN. I think the language was that it will probably be one of these two gentlemen. But suppose it might be one of these two gentlemen, and I think there cannot be any doubt that the idea is to give it to Mr. Sifton. Well, the position of Mr. Sifton, we know, is this, that he cannot come in except on the basis of the settlement suggested at the Winnipeg conference, and if he comes in on any other basis, he cannot be elected for any constituency in Manitoba. Now, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries seem to think that it is right that a whole session of Parliament should pass away without a Minister of the Interior being in this House. We have all the vast interest connected with that greater Canada in the North-west, and there should be a Minister here to deal with them. Take the subject I brought before the House yesterday. It is said that Mr. Forget, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, has sent out circulars to all the agents telling them that they must deal only with the friends of the Government. Then we have a letter in the press in regard to another department which shows that the Minister of Public Works has sent out letters in a case where there were two tenders of the same amount for a given work. Well, we have a Minister of Public Works here to give us information on that point, and it is one on precisely the same level with what was done by Mr. Forget in the North-west Territories. If Mr. Forget does that, I need hardly say that it is a most improper thing to do; but we have no Minister here to tell us whether he has done that with the authority of the department, or whether, having done it, he will be called to account. Now, I remember the First Minister saying about a week ago that in a few days, one or two days, and I think he named the day, he would be able to give us the name of the Minister. As he has not done that yet, I think it is not unreasonable that we should expect him to give us the positive reasons why he is unable to name the Minister. I repeat that it does look as if this department was being used as a huckstering machine to effect ends that should be effected in another way: it does look as if the department and its emoluments were being dangled as temptations before certain minds. But I think it also looks as if the hypothesis I first stated was correct, namely, that all arrangements had been made, but that hon. gentlemen are afraid to meet Parliament. For suppose the hon. gentleman has settled the school question on the basis of the alternative suggested at the Winnipeg conference, and if it is settled on that basis, it will have my entire approval. I suggested that basis myself in 1895, before that suggestion ever came from the Greenway government. But if that be so, I am told that the hon. gentleman might be in a very dangerous position in this House, because every man of his large majority of 35 from Quebec, is pledged against that basis, and if the hon. gentleman were to bring Mr. Sifton into this House as Minister of the Interior, and if Mr. Sifton had to state what his position was on that burning question in Manitoba, we might have from behind the hon. gentleman himself a very embarrassing motion that would shear quite away his Quebec following. But if all the arrangements are completed, that is no reason why Parliament should be treated with want of confidence in regard to a matter all the particulars of which the House is entitled to know. Once more I appeal to the hon. leader of the House to let the committee rise, so that other hon. gentlemen who come from the North-west and Manitoba may be able to express their opinions upon this important question under more favourable circumstances than they can do at this hour of the night, when it is nearly two o'clock.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am afraid that I have unwittingly done an injustice to the hon. leader of the Government, and, if so, I am anxious to explain it. The hon. gentleman will remember that I asked him a question as to when the writ for Brandon would issue. I complained just now of the evasiveness of the answer which the hon. gentleman gave me. I confess I did not hear the answer, because it was accompanied by such great laughter on the part of the hon. gentleman's friends, and I asked some of my friends what the answer was, and they stated it as they understood it and as I mentioned it a little while ago. I looked at the newspaper next morning, and I was confirmed in that statement, because the "Citizen" of 23rd September said: "As to the writ for Brandon, we expect to have it issued some time from to-day." I think my hon. friend will consider that I was justified in treating that as a very evasive answer. I found, on looking at "Hansard," for confirmation of that statement, that the answer is not open to my objection. The answer, as reported in "Hansard," is: "As to the writ for Brandon, we expect to have it issued some time—probably to-day." If that was the answer, then I am certainly not in a position to charge my hon. friend with having evaded my question or treated it with such unbecoming levity. I shall be very glad to learn from the hon. gentleman which statement is correct.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not exactly remember the statement I made. The answer in the official report of the debates is not correct.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then, I am afraid I shall not be able to withdraw my comment. We will all agree that there is no desire to protract the work of the session—we are all equally anxious to get through; but the hon. gentleman will see that under the circumstances which I have stated, the House is entitled to obtain from him, as leader of the Government, an intimation whether there is a reasonable prospect that at an early date this matter will be brought to a conclusion and the portfolio of the Interior filled. I hope the hon. gentleman will be able to give the assurance that he will, at all events before Parliament rises, furnish that information.

The PRIME MINISTER. The question is a reasonable one. I am not prepared at this moment to give the hon. gentleman the answer he asks for. What is the position to-day? We are voting the Supplies. I do not see that any of the reasons adduced so far are cogent reasons why we should not proceed with the consideration of Supplies in the committee. When we come to a later stage, and the position taken by the Government is found not to be satisfactory to hon. gentlemen opposite, it will be open to him to move any motion he thinks the circumstances warrant, but, in the meantime, I tell my hon. friend frankly that I cannot give him an answer to the question he has put. Under the circumstances, the committee should proceed with the consideration of Supplies. Moreover, I would remind my hon. friend that it was understood that we would go on with Supply.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is so.

The PRIME MINISTER. Then, I expect the arrangement will be carried out.

Mr. FOSTER. But the hon. gentleman should not endeavour to force that understanding so that it should apply to the estimates of the Department of the Interior, which we have asked to stand for the very reason that the leader of the Government has not made the statement desired. I think the leader of the Government ought to be able to say that before the House rises a satisfactory statement will be given to Parliament. This vote is for Civil Government, and is not the large vote for carrying on the service. Whatever may be said as to the latter vote, I suppose it follows, as a matter of course, that the officials of Ottawa must be paid and must be continued. I would not have any particular objection to this item passing to-night, but with the observation that before we are asked to pass the main estimates of the Interior Department, we must have some more definite statement from the Prime Minister. It is now very late, and my suggestion would be that, if the hon. gentleman could accede to this proposition, and it is only treating Parliament fairly, we should pass this item, and then the committee could rise.

The PRIME MINISTER. I must rely on the agreement I made yesterday. I agreed readily to the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman, to have the debate adjourned until to-day, with the distinct understanding that the balance of the Estimates—those were the words used—would be carried, with such fair criticism as might be warranted.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think the members of the House have some rights in regard to this matter. It appears to me that the leader of the House is not treating it with that respect due in regard to so important a matter as this.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not understand the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the hon. gentleman will allow me to proceed for a few moments, he will no doubt understand my remarks. Of course, I know nothing of the negotiations going on yesterday, to which the hon. gentleman refers, but I am aware that time after time, when the Interior estimates have come up, the leader of the Opposition or the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) has at once taken objection to these items being dealt with until the announcement promised by the leader of the Government as to the portfolio of the Interior had been given to the House. Hon. gentlemen opposite, and none more readily than the Minister of Finance acquiesced most readily. I only speak for myself, but I am sure I express the opinion of hon. members on this side of the House, that we clearly understood that we would not be asked to vote the Interior estimates until it was known in whose hands the department would be placed, or, at least, understood the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to that portfolio. The hon. leader of the Government does not deny that time after time he told the House: "Yes, in a few hours," or "In a few days," or "In a very short time," he would be able to give the information. On one occasion the hon. gentleman fixed the time at Thursday. If the hon. gentleman takes the point that he was not bound to give the committee this information as to the Department of the Interior before he asked a vote for that department, I think he will not deny this, that, having promised time and time again, and having stated specifically on one occasion, at least, the date when he would give that information, he should, in all fairness, tell the House why he has broken his promise.

He has not intentionally done it, I suppose, but why is he unable at this stage of the session to give us the information which he then promised, and which he fully intended to give to the House. Sir, it is a most important question. We have a party on the other side of the House fresh from the people, and as we saw to-night filled with the flush of victory. We have a party there with a majority of 37 at their back to-night—larger of course than the majority which they should have owing to some absentees on this side of the House—but we have a party there with 37 majority to-night, and yet, with 37 majority, with a new Premier, a new leader of the Government in Canada, he is unable, after two months premiership to tell this House whether he is to complete his Government or not. I say it is a question which the country will seriously consider, and a question which this House ought to consider. I leave it to the judgment of the House, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) has given us one single reason to-night why he is not able to fill that department. He has not suggested the shadow of a reason nor has he even said that he has tried to fill the position. And yet, not being in the position to say to the House that he has ever asked any one to take that office, he asks us to vote $1,400,000 for the Department of the Interior when we are absolutely without a declaration of policy, and absolutely without a man to discharge the duties ordinarily devolving upon the Minister of the Interior. I ask my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) what he would have said had the position been reversed? I ask my hon. friend what he would have said, standing upon this side of the House and having before him the Conservative leader of a Conservative Government, unable after two months, after the flush of victory, to fill so important a department, and what is worse still, unable to give a single shadow of a reason why he had not filled the position, or why he was not able to keep his arrangement with the House to give the information with regard to it. It is an extraordinary position. To my mind it is the most extraordinary thing that has occurred in this House for many a year.

Mr. McMULLEN. Oh.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) might as well be respectful.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am not saying anything about him. I am not calling attention to any of the denunciations which he made of the Conservative Government when we deviated from the strict rule in connection with these matters. I say to my hon. friend the Prime Minister that it is a spectacle, that a party with 37 majority to-night is unable after two months' labour to complete its Government. Certainly there must be a reason for it.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). You say there are too many members in the Government now.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) is far away from the question. If there are too many members in the Government, then why not make the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) the Minister of the Interior in reality instead of the Minister of the Interior in shadow. Instead of asking the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell) to come here to answer these questions as the shadow for a Minister who does not exist, make him the real Minister. We won't object to it; we have no right to object to it. But, Sir, out of respect to the House, as well for the hon. gentleman's position as our own, we ought to have the information to-night as to why a Minister of the Interior has not been appointed.

Mr. CLANCY. It does seem to any new member of the House that the First Minister and his colleagues who surround him, ought fairly to be bound by the rule laid down by themselves. Let me call the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) to a question which was raised last session. It was proposed to go on with the supplies, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) opposed it, giving as one reason that Parliament met for a certain purpose which purpose was not carried out, namely, the bringing down of a Bill relating to the very province for which this vote is now being asked. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) took precisely the same ground, that no supplies should be voted until grievances had been redressed. Now, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) says that no pertinent objection has been taken on this occasion. I desire to point out the importance of having a Minister of the Interior representing the province where this difficulty arose, in order that we may have a proper settlement of that question. That we should pass supplies now would be entirely out of accord with the position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite during the last session. They propose now that supplies should be voted for that department, when the same question still remains unsettled, when the same difficulty urged by hon. gentlemen opposite last session remains, and when no reason is given why a Minister is not appointed. We are told that we are not to pay attention to what the newspapers may say. I grant that there is much in that, but when newspapers have been publishing these things, day after day, and month after month, and when hon. gentlemen opposite are unable to do more than to say: well, the newspapers are not quite correct; is the House not entitled to the information as to what is the correct statement that ought to be made? The House has a right to demand some information as to the possibilities of the settlement of that question, and as to why the Department of the Interior has not been filled. If hon. gentlemen opposite are at all to be bound by their conduct in the past it does not lie with them this evening to say that this objection is improperly taken. It is precisely the objection that was taken by them last session with regard to voting supplies. It does seem to me that our objection is a valid one, and that a vote should not be asked for a department, which is unrepresented for the very reason, so far as the House and the country knows, that this very school question stands in the way of the filling of it.

The PRIME MINISTER. What took place on the occasion last year when the House was moved into Committee of Supply?

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman consented to the passage of the bare item for the salary of the secretary of the Governor General, and no more.

Mr. MONTAGUE.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The item is carried.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, that this item is passed, I would suggest that the committee rise.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Are you going to break the agreement?

Mr. FOSTER. Surely the Prime Minister will not say that we should sit up all night to pass these Estimates.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The agreement was to pass all these Estimates to-night.

Mr. FOSTER. Such an arrangement was not made. I appeal to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance and to the leader of the Government, if I made any arrangement by which to-night, after the vote was taken, the rest of the supplies would go through.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman's words were that at to-day's sitting of the House the balance of the Estimates would be passed.

Mr. FOSTER. What is to-day?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We are still in to-day's sitting, but the understanding was that if that discussion took place, then the hon. gentleman should ask his friends to concur in agreeing, at his suggestion, that the balance of the Estimates should go through.

Mr. FOSTER. But my hon. friend has the whole afternoon and the whole evening's sitting. I must distinctly say that my statement was not that the Estimates should be passed directly supervening upon the vote. I said that the Estimates would be allowed to go through with simply fair criticism. My hon. friend surely did not understand me to say that it was all to be done to-night directly after the vote.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Certainly. It had no other meaning.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I did not understand that it was to be done to-night. I understood that it was to be done this afternoon. I did not understand that the debate was to be kept up to a late hour. The hon. gentleman's suggestion was that if we adjourned the debate, it would be closed to-morrow, that is to-day, and that after the vote was taken the balance of the Estimates would be taken at that day's sitting.

Mr. FOSTER. That was a complete misunderstanding. I never did make or intended to make such an arrangement as that. It would be simply absurd. My hon. friend remembers me telling him that several of our side wished to speak. Several did speak but one hon. gentleman on that side spoke for two hours to-day.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I postponed my motion for concurrence in the report of the Debates Committee because it was quite understood that the debate on the motion of the hon. member for York was going to be brought to a conclusion, and that after that the balance of the Estimates would be passed.

Mr. SPROULE. It was well known to the ex-Finance Minister as well as to many other members on this side of the House, that when the House met to-day there were some ten or twelve on this side who expected to speak, and at least half that number on the other side. Under these circumstances, it could not be expected that the debate would close until late in the night, and I believe it was understood that the vote would not be taken until some time in the morning. I did not expect that after that we should continue to sit and pass the remainder of these Estimates. But whatever bargain may have been entered into between the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition, that does not bind the other members of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. SPROULE. If any hon. members of this House think that fair criticism is necessary, it is their right to give that criticism if they see fit; and it would be asking too much of the Opposition to pass the balance of these Estimates to-night without criticism, as they must be passed, if we get through with them to-night. It is now two o'clock in the morning, and it seems a reasonable thing to ask that the committee should rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is quite obvious from the explanations which have been made across the House that a great misunderstanding exists between my hon. friend who sits beside me and my hon. friend opposite. But I suppose there is no doubt to this extent, that the understanding was that if the motion were withdrawn, and the debate went on and was brought to a conclusion, we should facilitate the passage of the Estimates. That, I think, we are all agreed upon, and it is very important that these arrangements made across the House should have effect. But I would suggest to my hon. friends whether under the circumstances, one or two items having been passed, it would not be well to adjourn with the understanding that these Estimates shall be facilitated when we meet again at the next sitting.

The PRIME MINISTER. We made an agreement yesterday, and I have no reason to be satisfied that another would be carried out any better. If we are to make an agreement, I want it to be perfectly clear. I understand that the hon. gentleman asks us to adjourn with a view to the passage of the Estimates at the next sitting. If that is to be the understanding, let it be so understood, and I will be prepared to agree to it. But if we are to have to-morrow a repetition of what we have had to-day, and more wrangling, I cannot agree to that.

Mr. FOSTER. In all conscience it is entirely unreasonable to ask men to sit here after two o'clock. We have had a debate on a most important question, which we have compassed within the short space of a day and a half. When we undertook to bring the matter forward on Tuesday, our proposition to our members was that we should take the vote on Thursday night. Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday would not have been an inordinate time for a debate on one of the most important questions that could occupy the attention of this House. Yesterday, however, we came to the conclusion that if possible we would shorten it, and the understanding certainly with which I came away from my hon. friend was that we should try to get the vote on Wednesday. He wished to have the vote on Tuesday night. I pointed out to him that a good many of our people wished to speak, and it would be impossible to reach the vote without sitting to all hours, that we had no disposition to obstruct the Estimates at all, and that if we finished this debate on Wednesday, the Estimates would go through without any more than a fair criticism. Now, my hon. friend says that he understood from that, that the Estimates were to be passed at the same sitting at which we concluded the debate on the trade question. That was not my understanding, certainly, and I put it to my hon. friend whether it was not an unreasonable interpretation. Suppose that to-night we passed every item here. Supplementary Estimates are not yet down, and if they are brought down to-morrow, a day or two must elapse under the rules of the House before the committee can get at them. Taking all these things into account, cannot my hon. friend see that there is as likely to be a misunderstanding on his part as on my part?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Assuming that there is ground for the opinion that there was a misunderstanding, I have no hesitation in saying that, when the Minister of Finance spoke to me at the time, what he said was so clear and distinct that I cannot understand how a misunderstanding could have arisen. Every facility was to be given for the passing of the Estimates. Has that agreement been kept in the spirit or letter, when only one item is passed? If a considerable portion had been passed, and one or a few were reserved for the purposes of discussion, then we could have no objection to allowing the committee to rise, but certainly, when only one little item has been passed, it cannot be said that every facility was given to pass the items.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. So far as the understanding involved reasonable facilities for the passage of the Estimates, no one would pretend that that did not leave room for fair criticism, and that it did not imply reasonable explanations in connection with any items on the part of the Government. It could not be implied that the Government would be privileged to sit mute and decline to give any information, citing the agreement as an excuse. The Government want supplies, and the Opposition are justified, so far as they can, in compelling the Government to give reasonable explanations connected with any of these items before allowing them to pass, agreement or no agreement.

The PRIME MINISTER. The speech of the hon. member for Pictou is just an evidence of what we will have to-morrow, if we consent to this adjournment. Yesterday we made an agreement, and supposed there was a misunderstanding, what did take place? I am free to say that I do not impute any blame to the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), but certainly, if we did not agree upon the terms within which the supplies would be voted, we agreed that they would be allowed to go through with only fair criticism and without any intention to obstruct. What is the proposition at present? Am I to understand that, if we agree to this adjournment, the supplies will be passed to-morrow with fair criticism, or are we to have another wrangle such as we have had this evening?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Perhaps my hon. friend behind me will agree, as there was a misunderstanding, and as I think it is extremely desirable that the two sides of the House should observe those relations which will enable us to make those agreements, that, if we adjourn after passing this item, we shall be disposed to facilitate the passage of the remaining Estimates with such reasonable criticism as must be reserved to hon. members.

Resolutions reported.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 33) to authorize the appointment of temporary judges of the Supreme Court in certain cases—(from the Senate).—(Mr. Fitzpatrick.)

Bill (No. 35) for the relief of Albert Nordheimer—(from the Senate).—(Mr. Lount.)

ADJOURNMENT.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. DAVIES.

Mr. FOSTER. Before we adjourn I desire to ask when the Supplementary Estimates will be brought down.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Very shortly—to-morrow, or next day at latest.

Mr. FOSTER. We will be getting ahead of you if you do not look out.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is not much indication of it now.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 2.20 a.m. (Thursday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Bill (No. 34) to amend the Railway Act—(from the Senate).—(Mr. Bain.)

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. CHOQUETTE moved that the second report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of the House be concurred in.

Mr. DAVIN. We should have an explanation of this from the Chairman of the committee (Mr. Choquette).

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Mr. Speaker, the matter is very clear and simple, and I do not intend to take up much of the time of the House in explaining it. The report of the committee containing the facts has been printed and placed before every member of this House. At the second sitting of our committee complaints were lodged by the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau), and the hon. member for Napierville (Mr. Monet), against three translators employed by this House, namely, Lucien Lasalle, Peter McLeod and J. B. Vanasse, and at a subsequent sitting of the committee another complaint was lodged against Mr. Joseph Bouchard, also a translator. The complaints against these four gentlemen were to the effect, that while occupying their position as employees of this House, they took an active and prominent part in politics since 1891. No doubt it was the precedent established some years ago by hon. gentlemen opposite, in discharging three translators which led the hon. members to lodge this complaint. On the motion of the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) in the committee, it was agreed that copies of the complaints be sent to each of the above named translators, with the request to attend, if they saw fit, at the next meeting of the committee when an opportunity would be afforded them of making explanations. These four men were accused of having taken an active and offensive part in the elections. Some of them came personally before the committee, and others sent letters of explanation. I may say at the outset that the complaint against Mr. Lasalle was dropped, or at least was not pressed, and no report was made against him because it was proved before the committee that he did not take any part in politics since the revision of the list of 1894. The majority of the committee thought, that as Mr. Lasalle had not taken any part, especially during the last election campaign, that the committee would let him off. As to the three others, two of them, Mr. McLeod and Mr. Vanasse came before the committee and they in fact pleaded guilty to the accusation. It was indeed very hard for them to do otherwise so clear was the proof against them. Mr. Vanasse acknowledged before the committee that he had taken part in the last election, that he wrote articles in the newspapers against the Liberal party, that he went on the hustings, and that while on the hustings he opposed the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau), calling him a "traitor to his race and to his religion," and also calling the esteemed leader of the Liberal party, then leader of the Opposition and now Premier of this Dominion, a "renegade and a traitor to his race and his religion." Mr. Vanasse pleaded guilty and he could not do otherwise. As for Mr. McLeod he acknowledged that during last session of Parliament, and while employed as translator by this House he had written parliamentary letters to the "Trifluvien" under the nom de plume of "E. Liane," and they were not only ridiculous articles but they were offensive articles as well. Those who read the report and who see some of these articles set forth there will see at once that they are most offensive. On the 5th of March, 1896, after having charged Mr. Laurier with nearly every crime in the calendar, Mr. McLeod wrote :

What a moral ruin is the leader of the Liberal party in this country, who calls himself French and Catholic. Then what is left standing in him ; what is left of his national and religious convictions ? What has he done with the national feelings of honour, of patriotic pride, of the ideas of duty and of responsibility which they tried to inculcate on him in one of those humble houses, the character of which he is ready to lay bare, out of complaisance for English surroundings ?

We are lost in conjecture to find the motive of a determination just as silly as shameful. Has he acted by calculation, by interest ? The event will prove that he has very badly worked his plans. Is it irritation against an authority to which he has to obey as the humblest of his followers ? In this case, some diplomatic sense would have made him understand that at least he should have dissembled his dissatisfaction and not provoked such a big influence. Was he pressed by the desire of not losing a command which was threatening to escape him ? But while appearing to rule, he has known, up to the present, but the weight of chains and the livery of servitude. He was only commanding on condition of obeying. Strange situation, if you will, but which is not the less real.

What he has said of the clergy means this : " In politics, there is neither faith nor morality," a word dear to the school of l'Enfant terrible. In politics should we discuss about a question in which the rights of conscience are concerned ? I have as much authority as the Pope and the bishops.

And later on he says :

I do not believe Mr. Laurier capable of putting his threat into execution. He will pocket it as he has pocketed his political honour as a party leader, &c.

During the session, when Mr. McLeod was employed by the House to do his duty rightly for the country, he sent to the press most insulting, most ridiculous and most offensive letters. With regard to these two men, I do not think there is a doubt in the mind of any hon. gentleman that they have been guilty, and ought to be dismissed. An offer was made in the committee to agree to the dismissal of these two men if the majority of the committee were willing that the other two should be retained. So that it now remains only to consider Bouchard's case.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I object to this. I do not think the hon. gentleman has any right to refer to what took place in the committee. Moreover, I deny the allegation altogether.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. If it was not said in the committee, it was said outside of the committee ; but in fact it was said in both places. Everybody knows that. As to Mr. Bouchard, the case against him is perhaps not so strong as that against the others. But he took the stump on behalf of the Tory party, and hon. gentlemen will see in the report of the committee a report of a meeting taken from the Ottawa "Citizen" at which meeting Mr. Bouchard was present, and made a strong speech on behalf of the Tory party and against the Liberal candidates, advocating the policy of the then Government, especially their trade policy and their policy on the school question. Mr. Bouchard came before the committee, and he also addressed a letter to the committee, in which he claimed that he had a right to do as he had done. These are the facts that were placed before the committee, showing that these gentlemen had taken an active and offensive part in the election ; and as these facts are set out in the report now before the House, hon. members will be able to judge the matter for themselves.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. Chairman of the Committee say shortly what was the offensive part taken by Bouchard, in his opinion ?

Mr. CHOQUETTE. He attended several meetings. It was proven conclusively that he had attended three meetings. He admitted it himself, but he said that he had only spoken at one meeting. He was on the platform in the presence of the Tory candidate, and was asked to make a speech. He made a speech, advocating in strong terms the policy of the Tory party, asking the electors to give their votes to the Tory candidates, and denouncing the policy of the Liberal party.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman does not mean, then, by the word "offensive" anything insulting. He merely characterizes the conduct as offensive, because it was active.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Let us say aggressive, if the hon. gentleman prefers the word. At any rate, he was taking an active part in politics; and if we are to be guided by the measure of justice which was given to some Liberal translators in 1887, we must accept this report. At that time complaints were sent by Mr. Chapleau and Mr. Ives to the Speaker in regard to those men, and the Speaker referred the complaints to the Debates Committee, holding that it was the proper place to lodge such complaints. So the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) and the hon. member for Napierville (Mr. Monet) lodged their complaints before the Debates Committee, and we thought it was our duty to take notice of them and inquire into the charges, instead of shirking our duty and sending the charges to the Speaker, as was done in 1887. We thought it was more in accordance with our duty as a committee to take up the complaints, hold an investigation into them, and make a report to the House. Therefore we made this report. The report, after relating the facts, in the same manner that I have done just now, gives the following conclusion:—

In view of the above related facts, which, in the opinion of your committee, convict the said Joseph Bouchard, Peter McLeod and J. B. Vanasse of having improperly interfered in politics, your committee recommend their dismissal from the staff of translators of the debates.

The committee was not divided at all as to the fact that these men had taken an active part in politics. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) made a motion in the committee, not asserting that they were not mixed up in politics or that they were not guilty of being offensive partisans; but his motion was to the following effect:—

That after hearing the charges and the evidence in the cases of Messrs. Vanasse, McLeod and Bouchard, this committee is of the opinion that no charge or complaint having been made against any of the above named officials in regard to the proper and impartial discharge of their duties, as official translators of the debates, during the session, and that the charges brought against them being purely of a political character, and not of such a nature as would justify the interference of this committee, acting impartially, be it resolved that the order be discharged and the business of the committee be proceeded with.

The hon. member for Provencher and his friends on the committee took the position that this was merely a political affair. I deny that entirely. The complaint made against these gentlemen was that they had mixed up in politics, which they had no right to do, especially after the precedent was set some years ago, and of which they knew. They were engaged to take the places of men who had been dismissed by hon. gentleman opposite just because they had taken a part in politics; so they knew what their duty was. The translators who were dismissed in 1887 did not know before that time that they were not to engage in politics; but after that precedent these gentlemen knew very well that they had no right to do so. So they were doubly guilty, and there was no excuse for them. The only excuse offered was that mentioned in the motion of the hon. member for Provencher, that there was no charge against them in regard to their capacity as translators. That was not the accusation; there was no complaint before us as to their capacity, and it was not our duty to inquire as to that. The complaint was that these men had been acting most improperly and offensively, that they had been abusing the Liberal candidates and the Liberal leader on the hustings. It was our duty to inquire into this complaint and make a report to the House. We have done so, and I hope the House will concur in the report. It is not necessary for me to take up more of the time of the House. The report is there, and I move that it be concurred in.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman has hardly stated the case as it commends itself to my memory. I am rather surprised, knowing, as I do, what the sentiments of the committee are, that the name of Bouchard appears in the report as one of those that the House is invited to condemn. Now, the charge made against these gentlemen, including one who no longer appears in the indictment, concluded with these words:

In consequence of the above related facts, the committee, having in view the preservation of the integrity and impartiality of the translation of the debates, recommend the dismissal of Messrs. Joseph Bouchard, Lucien Lasalle, Peter McLeod and J. B. Vanasse from the staff of the official translators of the debates.

That sentence, which concludes the motion of the hon. member for Napierville (Mr. Monet), who moved the adoption of the report, raises the real issue that we have to consider, when these men are charged with improper conduct of such a character that this House should endorse the report advising their dismissal. Now, when we raised the question whether or not these gentlemen had been guilty of partiality, in other words, whether they had failed in their duty as translators of the debates in this House, in consequence of their partisanship, there was no evidence forthcoming, and, when we suggested that the chief translator should be called before us and examined, with the view of giving evidence as to whether this, the sting, the gist, the main portion, the operative part, of the resolution of the hon. member was well founded, the majority of the committee decided that it was not necessary to call the chief translator. Now, the position of these men is such that it seems to me this House, after considering it, will come to the conclusion that not one of them should be dismissed, as recommended by this committee. In 1883, when the late Hon. Thomas White was Chairman of the Debates Committee, the question of the efficiency of the translation was brought up before the Debates Committee, and, in order to secure efficiency, Mr. Béchard and other gentlemen interested in the translation of the debates into French, contended—I may tell you that up to that time the debates had been most inefficiently translated—that those gentlemen who translated the debates and who seemed to have been employed intermittently and at hazard, at that time, by the chief translator, should be made permanent officers of the House, and permanent officers they were made. Things went on very well until, in 1887, the Hon. Mr. Chapleau brought a charge against Mr. Poirier and the two Tremblays, not of inefficiency as translators, not of taking part in elections, or of exercising their right as citizens, but of using violent, insulting language with regard to himself; and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives) also complained that his sentiments, as a man, had been grievously wounded by the conduct of these men. It seemed that there was no doubt whatever that these gentlemen, in the heat and passion of political controversy, had used most insulting language with regard to Mr. Chapleau and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives). And what did Mr. Chapleau say, in my own hearing, from his place in the House? He said that he had been so grievously insulted by those gentlemen that he could not meet them in the passage. They were an offence to him, and it is palpable that they had committed a very much more serious and grievous offence than the offence which was charged in the original indictment of the hon. member who brought the present matter before the committee. Now, we have a great authority to guide us. The present leader of the House took up the case of Tremblay and others and discussed it. What happened was this. The Speaker of the House dismissed the translators. The Debates Committee made no recommendation to have them dismissed, yet the Speaker of the House dismissed them. The matter came before the House, and the leader of this Government pointed out what their position was. He pointed out that they were permanent officers, that they were employed for a specific purpose during the session, and that outside the session they were perfectly free to do what they pleased. Surely it is not possible that, with a high authority such as the present Prime Minister laying down that rule, you are going to condemn men because they took the leader of the Liberal party at his word, as one of these translators said in his defence: I had the opinion of the hon. leader of the Liberal party that I was perfectly free to do what I pleased outside the session. I was, therefore, fighting on velvet, because if the Conservative party remained in power, I was not likely to be disturbed, and if the hon. member for Quebec East came into power, I had his word, the charter of my liberty, because he is a gentleman whose character before the whole Dominion is unblemished. Is the hon. gentleman going to cast that high character, the white flower of a blameless political life, into the gutter, in order to gratify the wolfish instincts of a few hon. gentlemen behind him? Let me call the attention of the House to what the hon. First Minister said. Speaking on the subject, on 10th April, 1888, he said:

In fact, the complaint which was made against them is not in reference to their services as officers of the House, but the charge is that they went out of their proper sphere of action and grossly insulted some members of this House. The charge was brought forward by my hon. friend the Secretary of State in a letter dated the 22nd of May, 1887. In that letter, after naming the officers, he said: "These officials acted with indescribable violence in the last election campaign; both on the hustings and in the press, they wrote and spoke things regarding me so offensive and calumnious that these gentlemen I could neither speak to them nor salute them in the House, and I say sincerely their presence in the precincts of the House is for me a nuisance, to which, it appears to me, no one has a right to subject a member of Parliament."

That was the kind of language used by a kind-hearted man, then the hon. Secretary of State, one of the Ministers of the Crown. He said he had been so insulted that he could not bear to meet these gentlemen. But what was the language used by the leader of this Government:

Now, I must say at once that it seems somewhat singular, and it is, I think, improper that officers of this House should be allowed to engage actively in politics. I have no hesitation at all in making that statement, but if those gentlemen declare that they took an active part in the political campaign, they also declare that in doing so they had the sanction of this House.

That is the very thing that Mr. Vanasse, who did not plead guilty, says he had.

They state that the House had appointed the translators of the debates—I am not speaking of the other officers of the House, but of the translators only—with the understanding that they should be allowed to take part, not only in political campaigns, but in active politics in all circumstances. This matter came up incidentally in 1884. At that time it was stated, without contradiction from any quarter, that the translators of the debates were permitted to be engaged in active journalism and therefore to be engaged in politics.

Without going further, how can this House, and how, above all, can the majority in this House, led by the speaker of those eloquent and true words, condemn those gentlemen? Above all, how can they condemn Bouchard? Bouchard—what is his offence? His evidence was that he went to a political meeting, not to take part, but as an elector. But when the meeting was nearly over and some were going out, a number of persons came up to him and urged him to go up on the platform and say a few words. He said a few words, speaking in French. No report is given us in French of what he said. No French paper published an account of that speech, but we have some account of it in the "Citizen." And when I wanted to have the reporter of the "Citizen" brought in order that I might ask him whether he knew French and was therefore in a position to report what Bouchard said, I was not listened to. Here is the report in the "Citizen" of June 12th, 1896, of that speech made in French. This account of the speech covers only a few lines. And Bouchard is to be hanged on the evidence of that contracted report, although when the hon. gentleman who now leads the Government, was leading the Opposition and some persons have asked him with regard to reports of his speeches that were not verbatim, sometimes in regard to reports of his speeches sent by telegram and very brief, I have heard him scout the idea that he should be held responsible for a single syllable, and very properly. But supposing this report of the "Citizen" was accurate, here is all it says:

Mr. Joseph Bouchard followed in French. He contrasted the policy expounded by Laurier in 1893 on the school question, when he pledged himself to even the Orange lodges, and to proceed to Manitoba to defend the rights of his countrymen before Greenway, and that followed by the same leader in 1896.

Now this is in the oblique case, this is in the historical tense. No man under heaven will be bound, no man under heaven will bind another by a report of that sort:

Mr. Bouchard supported his able argument by an array of quotations and figures which convinced his hearers and drew forth unstinted applause. The talented speaker next touched upon the fiscal policy as affecting the workingmen, demonstrating by incontrovertible evidence that protection was the best safeguard that the toiler could wish, and resumed his chair amidst applause.—Quoted in the "Citizen" of June 12th, 1896.

Why, Sir, supposing that this report is correct, is there anything in that report of his speech to justify this House in saying that this gentleman shall cease to be a permanent officer translating our debates, when we have the dictum given in his place in Parliament of the gentleman who is now at the head of this great country that outside of session these gentlemen were free to act how they pleased? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) in the same speech went on to say:

On that occasion the hon. gentleman, member for North Norfolk, who was a member of the Debates Committee, spoke.

Now, I appeal to the hon. gentleman for North Norfolk. We differ on a great many things; we do not see eye to eye; but I know he is at bottom a man of benevolent nature:

I must say that the matter came up on the question of increasing the salaries of translators, and the hon. member for Norfolk stated that he was opposed to an increase of salaries because the translators were actively engaged as newspaper correspondents.

Now, that is the statement of the hon. gentleman who now leads the House, a recitation of the fact giving it the form of an argument. He said:

I felt myself that there was no justification for granting an advance to the translators, most of whom are here acting as newspaper correspondents, and would be here whether they held translators' situations or not.

This refers to a very important circumstance relating to reporting in this House and the translation of the debates. After "Hausard" had been on the way for some time, the gentlemen engaged on "Hausard" felt, and very properly felt, that for the arduous toil and for the nervous strain they were exposed to, the salary they were then receiving was inadequate, and what was agreed to be done was this, the hon. member for North Norfolk endorsing it—to increase the salary of the reporters and bind them to give their whole time, or at least to be at the call of the Government, when Parliament was not in session as well as during the session, but leaving the translators with their former allowance of $1,000, which is a small wage for a long session, but leaving them free outside of the time they are employed by Parliament to do as they please. Well, now, Sir, further on the same speech the hon. gentleman who now leads the Government said:

It seems to me, under such circumstances, to be beyond doubt that those dismissed officers were led to believe, and had every reason to believe, that they could do on the Liberal side of politics what other translators could do on the Conservative side, and certainly if you are to apply an equal rule you must say that Messrs. Tremblay and Poirier were no more guilty of trespassing against the privileges than were the three translators on the other side of politics who had been retained.

And he (Mr. Laurier) goes on further to say:

The hon. members must remember that the translators of the debates for three or four months of the year do nothing else but translate the debates of the House.

This was to excuse the violent language. He even found excuse for that. Turning aside from the case of Bouchard and speaking of the strong language used by McLeod in the correspondence signed "Liane," when I bring before the attention of the leader of the House what the nature of this correspondence is, he will agree with the view I take. What is it, Sir, but a piece of rhetoric? There is nothing imputed, nothing inherently vicious imputed to any of the politicians he dealt with. Talk about what is said concerning hon. gentlemen, why one hon. gentleman was called a blockhead. If I were to take to heart everything that is said against me by these gentlemen who use the winged words that control us all and that are really more powerful than anything we can do ourselves, I should have been dead long ago :

They become saturated with abusive language, and to expect that they would act differently was to suppose they were different flesh and blood from ourselves. I will say this to the hon. gentlemen opposite, and especially to the Secretary of State and the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), who seemed to have been rather thin-skinned on the question.

That if they find fault with the translators who engage in politics, for having been guilty of abusive language, I call upon the man without offence to throw the first stone, and I do not expect it will come from the other side, at all events, and perhaps not from this side.

Further on, he says :

I think that position would have been a sound one, and a warning would have been given to those officers which would have amply met the justice of the case.

That was an alternative that he suggested in dealing with them. Still further on, in reply to an interruption of Mr. Desjardins, who then used to sit in this House, he says :

The official reporters stand in a completely different position from the official translators, because the reporters have been made permanent officers of the House, and they cannot engage in any other work ; their services are at the disposal of the Government after the session, and their appointment expressly says so ; but the translators are appointed to translate the debates and nothing else, and no one knows better than the hon. gentleman, who is Chairman of the Debates Committee, that it was always understood that during a part of the session they could engage in any work they chose to engage in.

That is to say, that, if they translated their work properly and impartially, this House had nothing whatever to do with any other work. The only question they have to ask is, Have they translated their portion of the debates honestly and impartially? Therefore, there is no parallel, the hon. gentleman says, between the two classes of officials. So that, although those gentlemen—now I petition the attention of the leader of the Government to this argument—although these accused translators have done nothing that, if they were officers employed and paid during the whole year round, would, according to the generous dicta that he himself laid down, justify their decapitation, much stronger is the rule he laid down, when you are dealing with men who, as he says, are only employed for a short time of the year, and even during that time it is well understood, as he emphatically points out, that they could give their time to other matters. Well, this subject came up again, as I find on page 747 of the "Hansard," 11th April. And again the then leader of the Opposition spoke on it, and I will say this now about the remarks of the leader of the Opposition at that time. The position taken by the hon. gentleman was the position, at core, that any legal mind would take ; but, running through his speech on each occasion, there is a generous element, there is a touch of feeling, there is a touch of sympathy, there is a generous disregard of mere technicalities, and a desire that, in the case of men who are earning their daily wage in the way these poor men are, if there was a doubt, they should get the benefit of it ; that, if generosity was to play a part, it should lean towards them, and that the Government of that day, and the friends of the Government of to-day, if they are to lean in the least, should, according to the sentiment, to the temper, to the feeling shown in the hon. gentleman's speech—if there was to be any leaning from the cold pathway of justice, it should be, not to enraged politicians, who are here successful, and now, with M.P. after their names, are flushed with victory and full of self-importance, but to the poor translators on whose necks these gentlemen would fain let fall the axe. Now, as I say, on 7th April, the hon. leader of the Opposition spoke as follows :—

I have just one word to say in answer to the right hon. gentleman. If the same measure of justice is to be applied to all the offenders who have equally offended in this matter, the resolution of my hon. friend does not go far enough, and should include all those who being actually officers of the House, are not only during the elections, but are day after day, writing letters and writing correspondence to their papers upbraiding members of this House. The practice should not be tolerated at all. I have said in my opening remarks, and I repeat it here, that it should not be tolerated that an officer of the House should engage in active politics. I think the principle is a wrong one. I agree with my hon. friend from Oxford, I agree with everybody who has spoken on this side, that if my hon. friend the Secretary of State wants to pose in a magnanimous position, it does not lie in him to dismiss men because they offended him. But let him say, We have been violating the rule, let us make a new rule, let us forget the past, and then we will think it magnanimous.

That is a noble appeal, and I am only sorry, for myself, that the then Secretary of State did not listen to it. Well, I think

I may lay down this proposition, that, if a man out of power, in whose hands there is no sceptre, and on whose brow there is no crown, lays down a rule of magnanimity, when he is crowned and when the sceptre is in his hand, I think he is bound ten-fold by the words, the eloquent words, and the appeal that he made. I am very glad to notice that the hon. leader of the House said "Hear, hear" to the words I quoted.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am very sorry these good words were not accepted in 1888.

Mr. DAVIN. But no new rule was laid down.

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes, quite a different rule laid down there.

Mr. DAVIN. I think my hon. friend is mistaken there.

Notwithstanding what my hon. friend may say, I cannot believe he is actuated unconsciously, perhaps, since he protests with anything but resentment. If he were not actuated by resentment, he would say: I will make it a rule that these men will not in future trespass against the privileges of this House; but the result will now remain, with the connivance of the hon. gentleman who leads this House, that three men will be selected because they have not offended against the majority, and those who offended against the minority will be paid and protected by a majority of this House.

No new rule was laid down, but I say to him, in his own language: Now, lay down a new rule. I will welcome it myself. Let him make a new rule, and let him pursue the magnanimous path that he pointed out to the then Secretary of State. Well, this matter came up again in 1894, and, of course, this shows, as I ventured with great respect to point out to my hon. friend a few moments ago, that he was mistaken in supposing that a new rule was laid down at that time, because, on 3rd July, 1894, the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin) complained of this same Bouchard. I think. The hon. leader of the Opposition at that time—and mind this is nearly a whole septennary of years after he had made this magnanimous appeal to the magnanimity, to the deaf magnanimity, I am sorry to say, of the then Secretary of State; nearly seven years had rolled away, and it is palpable that no rule had been made at the time, for this is what the hon. gentleman says, generously again coming forward against one of his own followers at the time, again standing on the side of justice, to defend a helpless translator of the debates. He said:

This is a new departure from the rules which were well understood when the French translators were appointed. Some years ago, in 1882 or 1883, when the late Minister of the Interior—the late Hon. Thomas White—was Chairman of the Committee, a report was adopted by this House, and at that time it was understood that the shorthand writers should receive $2,000 a year, and that their services might be taken advantage of by the Government at any time during the recess, and the translators were to receive $1,000, and were to be free to take up any occupation they liked during the recess. * * After the session they are free to go into journalism or anything else they like. * * The rule has always been that during the session they are to devote their whole time to the work for which they are paid by this House; outside the session they can do what they please.

Suppose they edited a newspaper. Why, there is no part of this country where you could run a purely independent paper. Take Montreal or Toronto, the two big cities—the genius of the greatest journalists that ever wrote, and the wealth of a Rothschild, would not enable you to run a purely independent paper in those great centres. In those little places where those gentlemen were editing papers, it is absurd to suppose you could have a clientèle sufficient to support an independent newspaper. In Canada you must write on one side or the other, either Liberal or Conservative. Here is what in the course of the same debate, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) said—as will be found at page 5227 of the Debates:

The rule has always been that during the session they are to devote their whole time to the work for which they are paid by this House; outside of the session they can do what they please.

I say, with that statement before us, it is not possible, in my opinion, without self-stultification, that the Government, at the head of which stands the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), could accept or endorse the report presented by my hon. friend the Chairman of the Debates Committee. Let me say of all these gentlemen that from the point of view of justice, they were prima facie in the same position as Lasalle.—I say that prima facie they were all guiltless. Take the case of Lasalle. There was a modern inquisition on a small scale held in regard to Lasalle, but zealously conducted as it was, it failed in its object, so much so that one of the most authoritative members of the committee on the other side of the House, the hon. member for Huntington (Mr. Scriver) moved as an amendment to a motion of mine, that the name of Lasalle be omitted. I want to call the attention of the House to what, on the face of these documents, occurred:

Mr. Davin moved in amendment, That the said motion be not ordered to be reported to the House, but that it be printed, and another meeting called to consider the same. And a debate arising thereupon; and the question on the amendment being proposed; Mr. Scriver moved, in amendment to the said proposed amendment, That the report be amended by striking out therefrom the name of Lucien Lasalle, and all that relates to him, appearing in the said report.

And the question being put on the amendment, the committee divided, and the names being called for, they were taken down as follows:

Yeas: Messrs. Bergeron, Craig, Davin, Earle, LaRivière, Scriver and Taylor (7).

Nays : Messrs. Beausoleil, Charlton, Ellis, Haley, Monet, Richardson and Somerville (7).

Mr. Monet, the prosecutor, voted for his own prosecuting motion. So the votes were equal. What occurred then? The Chairman of the committee, who moves this motion to-day and asks this House to endorse this report, gave his casting vote,—how? Giving these translators the benefit of the doubt, as Lasalle had been given—whose name afterwards in sheer shame the committee had to omit and exclude.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. The casting vote was given against those men by the Chairman of the committee. The record continues :

And the question being put on the amendment, the committee divided as follows :—

Yeas : Messrs. Bergeron, Craig, Davin, Earle, LaRiviere and Taylor (6).

Nays : Messrs. Beausoleil, Charlton, Ellis, Haley, Monet, Richardson, Scriver and Somerville (3).

Again Mr. Monet voted. Under these circumstances, Sir, I lay down this proposition again, that prima facie every one of those translators was guiltless. What had to be done? They were brought there, and stating it mildly, they were put on the rack. They were cross-examined. Mr. Lasalle was asked this and that, and after inquiry he had to be let go. Mr. Bouchard came, and he was asked about the report of a meeting. He acknowledged to have been at the meeting and explained how he happened to be there, and he told what took place, as published in the Ottawa "Citizen," and that was the only charge against Bouchard. Some hon. members on the other side of the House and some hon. members on this side who had taken an interest in the accusations would have been willing to adopt a report if it were limited to dismissing two of these men, Vanasse and McLeod, Bouchard being allowed to go free. I felt, as did my hon. friend the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) and other hon. gentlemen, that there was no case established against Lasalle or Vanasse, and that we would not be justified, even for the sake of saving Bouchard, in deserting them, and therefore we determined to let Bouchard take his chance with the other two rather than be guilty of the injustice of abandoning those two men. Although I had no conversation with Bouchard, I venture to say that he would have preferred such a course rather than the abandonment of his two confederates. In regard to McLeod, what took place? He was brought before the committee and was asked whether he wrote a letter to the "Le Trifluvien" over the nom de plume of "E. Liane." He said he did. Passages from that letter are extracted, no doubt the worst passages, passages in which rhetorical phraseology is used, as we find used by my colleague on the press. We all have a tendency, especially when writing on politics, to resort at times to the large language of the earlier gods, and those gentlemen, no doubt, fell back on those broad utterances that used to vibrate through the atmosphere when earth was young. And what does it amount to? Here is the parliamentary letter set forth at page 12 of this report, and here is the head and front of the offending of McLeod :

To this, what has Mr. Laurier answered? My God! what a pity to see a man well gifted, a leader of a party supposed to be deeply impressed with the feeling of his responsibility and even making a show of it, a compatriot in a word, trying to endanger, in one hour, six years struggle and of unspeakable sacrifices, to strive miserably in some evident contradictions, to defy the religious authority which has been of all times, for our French Canadians, the supreme bulwark of the nationality, to kill himself and his party for twenty years to come!

Why, Sir, what he accuses the hon. leader of the House in these words, is that for which his (Mr. Laurier's) followers in the west wished us to throw up our hats and handkerchiefs about and sing paean. He was represented in the west as like Ajax, defying the lightning and throwing down his gage of battle to the Roman Catholic hierarchy. This writer goes on:

He found the means of committing in a one hour speech enough of cowardice, of treachery, of infamy, to deserve on the part of Dalton McCarthy, the man from whose shoulders has fallen the mantle of George Brown, the man that the withheld angers of ours are pursuing since years; the man who, since years, wages against us a war of privateer which has kept him a place apart in the maledictions with which we overwhelm the inveterate and irreconcilable enemy of our language, of our institutions, of our laws, and, above all, of our religious convictions; to deserve, I say, on the part of Dalton McCarthy, this word, at the same time, cruel and vindictive: "He has not only robbed me of my motion, he has taken away from me the title of champion of Protestants." And the word is true. What a moral ruin is the leader of the Liberal party in this country, who calls himself French and Catholic? Then what is left standing in him; what is left of his national and religious convictions? What has he done with the national feelings of honour, of patriotic pride, of the ideas of duty and of responsibility which they tried to inculcate on him in one of those humble houses, the character of which he is ready to lay bare, out of complaisance for English surroundings?

This is very strong, but, Sir, we have it on the authority of the leader of the Government himself, that even during the session these gentlemen may engage in other occupations. Who could know—and on this point I appeal to the magnanimity of the leader of the House—who could know that Mr. McLeod was the writer of these articles if he himself had not opened his mouth, which it was not necessary for him to do. You have a man writing for a Conservative journal, and what does he do? Why, he does the same thing as the leader of one party does when he speaks of the leader of another party: he paints in colours of eclipse and ruin the policy of the opposite party. Could any language be more violent than that which the leader of the Government has applied to the policy adopted, and still adopted by gentlemen on this side of the House? To quote his own language, the leader of the Government, in 1888, appealed to Mr. Chapleau and said: "You are accustomed in this House to use violent and vigorous language; these gentlemen are translating your words, and are you going to condemn them for doing the same thing?" There is no attempt to conceal that McLeod wrote both those letters, but I do say that these three or four extracts in the report are extracts from a series of letters eloquent, striking, and, on the whole, moderate. Everybody knows, and no one better than the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier), who is a lawyer, that you may take extracts from the writings of any one, and by selecting a passage here and a passage there, you wrongfully may make the writer out to be an atheist, or a scoundrel, or a repudiator of the most cherished convictions of the people of the country where he lived. I, therefore, say there is nothing that would justify interfering with Mr. McLeod, who it turns out is one of the most capable translators we have.

Now, Sir, about Vanasse. The charge against Vanasse is that he admitted that he took part in politics. As I remember it, Mr. Vanasse admitted nothing of the kind. Mr. Vanasse came before the committee and he told us what I have read out to this House: that he had in his mind the position that he held, as described by the leader of the Opposition at that time, now the Prime Minister of Canada, and he felt perfectly free to take the course he did. He submitted this document to the committee, which I am bound to place before this House in order that they shall have before them the case of Vanasse:

Official Debates Office,
September 10th, 1896.

To the Chairman and Members of the Debates Committee, House of Commons.

Dear Sirs,—If the committee will kindly allow me, I wish to add a few remarks to the verbal explanations I have already given to your committee at its last meeting, as regards my conduct in the late Dominion election.

1. During that contest I have taken part in no political meeting outside the county of Richelieu, where I live, although strongly urged to do so.

2. I have not written a single line in any newspaper for several years past.

3. As I stated to your committee last week, I took the course I did in June last because I thought my right to do so had been clearly acknowledged in the House of Commons, as shown by the following quotations from speeches delivered by several members. In 1884, Mr. Charlton, then a member of your committee, made this statement:—"I felt myself that there was no justification for granting an advance to the translators, most of whom are here acting as newspaper correspondents, and would be here whether they held translators' situations or not."

In April, 1888, the Hon. Laurier spoke as follows:—

It may probably be said that there is no fault found with their taking part in politics if they chose to do so, but they must use polite language. Well, Mr. Speaker, it was the House of Commons which gave the translators permission to engage in politics, but the House could scarcely be expected to hope that they never would be guilty of using abusive language. Hon. members must remember that the translators of the debates, for three or four months of the year, do nothing else but translate the debates of the House; they become saturated with abusive language, and to expect that they would act differently was to suppose they were different flesh and blood from ourselves.

* * * * *

The translators are appointed to translate the debates and nothing else, and no one knows better than the hon. gentleman, who is Chairman of the Debates Committee, that it was always understood that during a part of the session they could engage in any other work they chose to engage in.

Mr. Mills (Bothwell) is also quoted by Vanasse in this apology which he makes, and Mr. Mills used the following language:—

Mr. Mills (Bothwell) used the following language:—

* * * * *

So far as those translators are concerned, it was said at the time of their appointment that the House gave employment to them but for a very small portion of the year, and that their salaries were less than the ordinary reporters upon the Official Debates, and that they were to be at liberty to engage in ordinary avocations whenever they were not employed here. It was well known at the time they were appointed that some of them were on the political press of one side and some on the political press on the other side, and it was expressly stated by the committee at whose instance they were appointed that they were not to be interfered with in their political freedom or independence.

Well, Sir, that learned voice is silent in this House. We no longer have that hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills of Bothwell) to give us learned lubrications upon constitutional questions, but happily we have his words and his authority recorded here to-day. We have that authority as high almost as the authority of the hon. gentleman who leads the House, and the dictum of Mr. Mills is that we have no right whatever to interfere with the political freedom and independence of these gentlemen. This is what Mr. Vanasse himself said:

In conclusion, I beg to submit to your committee that the above quotations show clearly that the translators of the debates are not to be considered as members of the civil service; that their right to engage in any pursuit they choose between the sessions, when not employed in translating the debates, has been repeatedly acknowledged in the House of Commons; and that in taking a certain part in the late election I was violating no rule to which I might be subjected. But should your committee declare that in the future we are not to interfere in any way in politics, I am quite willing to abide by that decision, doing my work faithfully as I have done for the past thirteen years.

Is not that the very position taken by the hon. leader of the Government himself? Is not that the position taken by him, not once or twice, but three times? Under these circumstances, surely that humble man, Mr. Vanasse will not appeal to the hon. leader of the Government or to this House in vain. Sir, we have come to a time when we ought to lay down rules that shall be strictly enforced, and about which there shall be no doubt—rules in regard to such questions as this to which public officers shall be amenable. In this connection, I would call the attention of the hon. leader of the Government to an article in the "Evening Journal" of Ottawa, which has been for some time, I believe, giving him an independent support; and if I were in his position there is no support in this country which I would prefer to that, because it is a generous and effective support. That paper has had several articles urging the Liberal party to rise to the standard of its best minds. I remember a few weeks ago an eloquent article in that paper, putting the matter in this way. Suppose there are a number of men in the Liberal ranks throughout the country who are clamouring for places, and who say, "We have been working for eighteen years, and we want to get these positions." The "Journal" asks, are these the kind of men the Liberal party has come into power to serve—men who turn away from the rough-and-tumble field of active life to cowardly bury their independence and their possibilities in the grave of a civil service position? Are these the men for whom the Liberal party and the Government of the Liberal party should thus early degrade its scutcheon, and soil its banner? Here is what the writer in the "Evening Journal" said only two days ago:

HON. MR. BLAIR'S IDEA.

The "Journal" yesterday received the following letter, with a note from the author saying that he had written it before the "Journal's" article of Monday appeared, but that perhaps no harm would be done by still publishing it. The "Journal" is sure that no harm can be done by hammering at the subject until there ceases to be danger that Mr. Blair's idea will spread much, and we publish with pleasure the letter, which is written by a man of Liberal leanings whose name would carry much weight if it were known.

I believe that the gentleman who edits the "Journal" is the same gentleman who edited it a year or so ago; and if so, I have the honour of knowing him personally, and whatever he would give his word for, I would take; and I have as little doubt that this letter was written by a Liberal whose name would give additional weight to what he said, as I have of the authority of holy writ. Here is the letter:

As one who viewed with no little sympathy the advent to power of the present Liberal Government, I write to express the strong feelings of disapproval and apprehension with which I regard the recent declaration of the Minister of Railways as to the method he proposes to adopt in dealing with cases of alleged political activity in the Conservative interest on the part of employees of the Government railways. I venture to say that if Hon. Mr. Blair acts in any systematic manner on the principles he enunciated he will do his party more harm than he will ever have it in his power to undo. Is it to witness such an exhibition of tyranny and small-mindedness as this that the country has waited so long? Are these the Liberal principles that are going to lift Canada to a higher political plane? Mr. Laurier had better see to it and that quickly, or he will find that the popular sympathies that carried him into power were not given in expectation that such would be the principles of his Government, and that they are not to be retained by such means.

Surely Mr. Blair might have sufficient magnanimity to recognize that many of the poor labourers to whom he referred—it is particularly this class of employees towards whom he proposes to exercise the most summary severity—so far as they took any part in politics beyond simply voting, did so more or less under compulsion, real or imaginary, and through dread of losing their humble positions.

And the letter of "Liberalis" goes on to try to raise the thoughts of the leaders of the Liberal party and the standard of the Liberal party up to the height of the best minds of that party, which is the standard of the best minds of both parties, and therefore the standard of the best mind and the best conscience in the whole Dominion of Canada. This is the way the writer concludes his article:

It is to be hoped that the writer of the above represents the sentiments of a great number of moderate Liberals. It is to be hoped that moderate men of all parties are anxious now to put this country upon a higher political plane than hitherto. There is an opportunity to do so that may not occur again in a lifetime. A party so long in power that few of its opponents have had a chance to make mistakes has been put out of power, and these opponents with their blank record have been put in power with a strong majority, unhampered by bad records or political sins, with a clean sheet on which to write history. What shall be inscribed on that white page? Cabinet management of the caucus order for the sake of party and political office? For the sake of salaries and contracts? For the sake of personal self-seeking and vanity? Or government for the best good of this country of ours, for the good of its future, for the encouragement of public and private honesty, magnanimity and high principle? Look to it that your country shall receive better from your party rather than worse, you among the Liberals who believe that the same honour and heart and self-respect should characterize the conduct of men entrusted by their fellow citizens with public administration as should characterize the gentleman and the honest man in private life.

One sentence could be added to that. Are they going to commence their history by giving effect and endorsement to the vengeful feelings of a few supporters, who, because they think they had some reason to be aggrieved, or merely because they find men occupying certain positions which they want for others, trump up charges against them? We had before us one man who said he was expecting a situation, and I suppose there are three persons waiting to take the places of these men the moment they are decapitated, if it should be so.

An hon. MEMBER. Twenty.

Mr. DAVIN. I am told there are twenty. Well, they are like the young birds that I used to disturb in their nests when a boy, and saw a number of red mouths wide open which evinced the avidity of hunger. Against Bouchard there is no case whatever; and so far as he is concerned I say that this report cannot be accepted without creating a scandal. In regard to Vanasse, what did he say? I had a charter, the words of the leader of the Government, whom I believe to be a man of honour. Will the hon. gentleman put him in the position of being able in a few days from now to take up the report of "Hansard" and say: Here are your words; I relied on them; I believed you to be a man of honour; I believe those words were the aegis that would protect me against all the malice of petty politicians; but since you, too, have adopted the narrow rule which you stigmatized properly in 1888 and 1894. I find that I relied on you in vain. I do not know the hon. gentleman except through sitting with him here during the past ten years, and no one could do that without conceiving the highest opinion of him, and therefore I appeal to him with confidence. With regard to Mr. McLeod, I make this appeal. The only charge against him is one in which the hon. member for Richelieu and the leader of the House are concerned. There is no charge that Mr. McLeod said anything personal against any member of this House except my hon. friend from Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau). What he said, I think, was that the hon. gentleman was a blockhead or something to that effect. Why, what signifies that? Nobody believes that the hon. gentleman is a blockhead. The hon. gentleman, I believe, is one of the most brilliant supporters of the leader of the Government, and when you call a man like the hon. member for Richelieu a blockhead, you only provide a foil by which the public can the better see his brilliancy set off. It is an advantage to a man of ability to be thus stigmatized, because it gives a dark background on which his shining qualities can be emphasized more thoroughly. I grant that in those letters signed "E. Liane," Mr. McLeod used strong language in regard to the leader of the Government, but I have read through the letters in French, from which these extracts are made, and I do not find in them one expression that can be described as a personal aspersion on the hon. gentleman. Nobody knows better than the hon. gentleman himself, who is an accomplished critic, that it would be the grossest literary injustice, the grossest moral wrong, when this man's bread and butter is dependent on it, to judge him by the rhetorical expressions he used when writing a letter to a little paltry paper down in Three Rivers. No one knows better than the hon. gentleman how unjust it would be for him to say: Because you gave utterance to some strong opinions about me, as a public man, I am going, now that I am in power, to send you to the rightabout. That would be unlike the hon. gentleman and I cannot believe that he will stoop to it. Although he appealed in vain to Mr. Chapleau, I do not believe that my appeal to him will be in vain. Mr. Chapleau is a friend of mine. I place him high as a statesman, as a leader of men, and as a man. He is one of the most delightful companions, and one of the tenderest hearted men. But the leader of the House has an opportunity to place himself higher in tenderness of heart and chivalric feeling. I believe that the appeal which he made in language whose eloquence I wish I could emulate, and made in vain, to Mr. Chapleau, I shall not make to him in vain.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like, as a young member of the committee, to say a few words on the subject, and must apologize if I venture to speak so early in the debate. I feel impelled to do so, however, as I shall be obliged shortly to leave the Chamber, and do not wish to lose the opportunity of expressing my views on this question, in which, as a member of the committee, I took some part. It seems to me that this is not a subject for such mock heroics and farcical imitations of Demosthenes and other ancient orators to which we have been treated this afternoon by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) to be indulged in. For my part, I promise you, Mr. Speaker, that my remarks will be brief, and, I hope, to the point. The hon. gentleman to whom we have just listened, and who has taken up such a vast amount of time during this session, waxed very eloquent upon this, as he does upon most other subjects. No doubt he feels that this session is the last opportunity he will have to address Parliament, and is in consequence most anxious to make the best of his opportunities. I was greatly surprised indeed to find the hon. gentleman referring, in the terms he did, to the conduct of the Chairman of the Debates Committee in giving a casting vote on motions brought before that Committee. I am sure that the hon. member for West Assiniboia ought to have the very highest opinion of casting votes, for were it not for the casting vote of the returning officer, the hon. gentleman would not be sitting in this House at present, and I may say that this House will not feel under any deep obligations to that returning officer for having given his casting vote in the way he did, because we must admit that a great deal of the time of this House has been wasted by the long speeches of the hon. gentleman. Let me refer very briefly to the cases under consideration. I have followed them very closely, I have read the evidence very carefully, and, as I have said, I do not think that these cases call for any mock heroics. They are just cases where any men of ordinary common sense could see the facts for themselves and come to an intelligent judgment. Let me, at the outset, read a brief extract from Todd, which will enable the House to see upon what lines the civil service shall be conducted. He said :

Doubtless, active interference in politics on the part of a non-political office-holder would be a case of misconduct sufficient to justify his dismissal. It is a well understood rule of constitutional government that all such functionaries should abstain from taking an active part in political contests, and observe a strict neutrality therein.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Does that refer to members of the civil service ?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It refers to permanent officers.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Of the Government ?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Officers of the permanent civil service, I presume. I do not see that we should draw any fine distinctions in this matter. These translators are officers of this House and are civil servants, receiving their salary from this Parliament. According to Todd, they should observe strict neutrality. On that basis, let us judge the conduct of these men. Mr. Vanasse came before the committee and frankly admitted that he had appeared on a public platform and made speeches and used strong language. He made no bones about the matter, and it was only after the committee had adjourned on that day and had met about a week later, that he came before it and presented the views embodied in the letter which the hon. member for Assiniboia read to this House. So that it was not spontaneous on his part. He brought up these excuses a week later. No doubt he had been prompted to do so by some one friendly to him. Now, Vanasse used offensive language and took an active part in the political contest. Surely it is not necessary to appeal to hon. gentlemen in this House to concur in the report with regard to Mr. Vanasse. I do not now recollect exactly what language he did use, but my recollection of it is that it was very strong. He was clearly an active and offensive partisan. I do not apprehend that the word "offensive" in this sense has the meaning sometimes attributed to it. There are the words "offensive" and "defensive." In interpreting the term for application in such cases as these under discussion I take it that "offensive" means the antithesis of "defensive."

Mr. DAVIN. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DAVIN. I am sure the hon. gentleman will allow me. He is stating what took place, and has spoken of words brought before us as having been used by Mr. Vanasse. My recollection is that it was stated that he took part in public meetings, but we did not get his words.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. He spoke of the leader of the House as a renegade.

Mr. RICHARDSON. My recollection is, and I am glad that the Chairman of the Committee bears me out, that Mr. Vanasse used the words "traitor" and "renegade," as applied to the leader of this House. Surely, Mr. Speaker, these are offensive words. I come now to the case of McLeod. I have no doubt that he is an efficient translator. That is a subject with which the committee, in this inquiry, had nothing whatever to do. The committee were there to pass upon the evidence which was submitted to them. McLeod was accused of having written a series of letters to the press. Mark you, these letters were written during the last session of Parliament. Some excuse might be offered, though I am not prepared to say I would agree with it, if he had undertaken to do this work during the recess. But these letters were written by Mr. McLeod during the last session of Parliament, while he would be presumed to be attending to his duties as translator of the debates. In these letters he referred to one hon. member of this House as a young blockhead, and used very offensive language toward the hon. leader of this House. He admitted the charge quite frankly, when the question was put to him, and the House will surely agree that, in writing this series of letters, at least in writing them during the session of Parliament, he was guilty of conduct which the House could not afford to overlook. Then, as to the case of Bouchard, I frankly confess that I felt deep regret in being obliged to concur in the report upon his case, because it was represented to me that he was a needy man. But I saw before me a duty. For I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is a duty the committee owed to this House and to the country to see to it that no active partisan should occupy the position of translator of the debates, on the principle that no members of the civil service should be allowed to participate in active politics. It is because I felt it to be my duty to concur in that report, that I did so concur in it. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) dwelt with great pathos upon this case ; in fact, I looked around, during his remarks, to see if any hon. members were using their handkerchiefs. But Mr. Bouchard himself came before the committee and freely admitted that he attended three political meetings during the last contest, and at one of these political meetings he took the platform and made a speech of considerable length, a speech which the "Daily Citizen," of this city, lauded very highly. Now, the reports of that speech, as contained in the "Citizen," but which Bouchard said was exaggerated, stated that he strongly supported the late Government, which was the then existing Government, and endorsed its policy on the school question and its trade policy. Now, Bouchard himself said that his speech was brief and that he made that speech just as the meeting was about to close. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that that speech was made, not at the close of the meeting, because I saw by a report in one of the papers, that a Mr. Baskerville spoke after Mr. Bouchard had concluded his speech. However, we will not split hairs upon that point. If Mr. Bouchard went upon a public platform and participated in the public discussions during an election, I contend that he was guilty of active and offensive partisanship in the late contest, the word "offensive" having the meaning I attributed to it a few moments ago. Therefore, it seems to me clear that these three gentlemen, applying the rule laid down by the members of the Government since this session opened, were clearly guilty of taking part in politics; and, however harsh it may appear, and however much hon. members may regret to concur in that report, it seems to me quite clear that these gentlemen should be dismissed. Now, in connection with the dismissal of civil servants for active and offensive partisanship, it seems to me that there are two points that hon. members should keep steadily in view. One point is with regard to the civil service itself. Is it most desirable, in the interests of the service, that its members should cease to take part in political affairs? I think the time has come, and it has come none too soon, when this Parliament should declare, and it should be clearly understood throughout the country, that no civil servant, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, should participate in active politics. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen to bring up the experience in Ontario, as has been done in the past; but I would remind hon. gentlemen that two blacks do not make one white. If a wrong is done in Ontario, that is no reason why a wrong should be done by this Parliament. I remember that in Manitoba there were cases in which the accusation was made that civil servants participated in politics; and I, as the editor of a paper there, took occasion to denounce the practice. I think that practice should be denounced. I think that, in the interests of the civil servants themselves, they should be debarred from interfering in active politics. We have heard hon. gentlemen speaking here, seeking to draw fine lines as to whether civil servants should vote, or how far they should go in participating in politics. But it seems to me there is very little difficulty in drawing a line beyond which they should not go. I think the members of the civil service should have a vote and that they should be entitled to hold their own opinions and express them inoffensively and in private. But there is a vast difference between active electioneering and a private expression of opinion. We do not seek to deprive the civil servant of his vote, but we do seek, in his own interest and in the country's interest, to deprive him of the liberty of taking an active part on the hustings and in any public way in political contests. These are my views upon the question, and I would urge upon hon. members the most careful consideration of this report, in order that they may vote intelligently. The members of the committee did not, as the hon. member for West Assiniboia alleged, display any "wolf-like passion." I attended the meetings of the committee day after day, and I saw no manifestations of "wolf-like passion." In fact, I saw very considerable and very deep regret expressed upon many faces there that it should be found necessary to present such a report. The idea was not one of revenge; the idea was that, as a committee, we should do our duty to this House and to this country. And, in doing our duty, Mr. Speaker, we found it necessary and desirable to recommend that these gentlemen be dismissed.

Mr. CRAIG. I would not take any part in this debate were it not that I am a member of the Debates Committee, and being familiar with the evidence, I wish to place my views of the situation before the House. I shall endeavour to approach this subject in an impartial spirit. I do not think this is a party question at all. There are party questions, I do not consider this is one, and I shall not approach it with any party spirit at all. I trust that members on both sides of the House will endeavour to look at this, leaving party out of the question. We are to consider the case of three men who have risked their situations, and we are to pronounce on their case to-day. I wish to show that there are mitigating circumstances in the case of these men, and I have no doubt that what I shall say will have the consideration of all the members of this House. I agree with the hon. member who last spoke in assuming that every member will give this matter careful consideration, that we shall not come to this matter with our minds made up. We might do that on some questions, but on this question I hold that we should not do so. We should come here to-day to discuss this question with an open mind, ready to form our conclusion on the evidence placed before us. I suppose it is natural that we might look at the matter from different points of view. I have no fault to find with the action of the committee in this matter, so far as concerns the proceedings which took place at the meetings I attended. I believe that all intended to do what they thought right, and I have no doubt they wish to do that to-day. Now, I want to say that I consider there is a difference between the conduct of some of these men. I hold that Mr.

Bouchard stands in an entirely different position from Vanasse and McLeod. In my mind there is no doubt that the language used in the letter of McLeod and the language used in the address of Vanasse, may be called offensive. I am sure that if it was used against me, I would feel that it was offensive—that is, politically. I do not know that in most of the language used there is anything personally offensive, although I could not justify for one moment the expression used by Mr. McLeod with reference to the member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) where he called him a young blockhead. I think that is getting down rather low in political discussion, and I have no doubt the member for Richelieu looked upon that as very offensive indeed, and I think I would be disposed to do so myself. So I am not defending McLeod and Vanasse from the charge of having used offensive language in their letters and speeches. I say further that if these men are to be treated as members of the civil service, then I have no doubt they will come under the conditions laid down by the Premier within the last few days, and no doubt they will have to go if we class them as civil servants. But I hold they are not civil servants, and I wish to call the attention of the House to this fact. They did make the excuse that they thought they were acting strictly within their rights, because they took what had been said in previous years by the present Prime Minister, then leader of the Opposition, and by other members on that side of the House. Well, whether they were justified in doing that, I am not going to say, but there is no doubt they did justify themselves by referring to the language used by the Premier, and by other members of the Opposition, and by another member of the Government, as I shall show in a moment. Now, I do not intend to speak more than a few minutes, but this is so important a question that I shall have to trouble the House with reading again part of what has already been read by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) who preceded me. I am going to read from a speech made on April 10th, 1888, found in "Hansard," page 713, a speech made by the then leader of the Opposition and the present Prime Minister. Speaking about the dismissal of Mr. Tremblay, he said:

Now, I must say at once that it seems somewhat singular, and it is, I think, improper, that officers of this House should be allowed to engage actively in politics. I have no hesitation at all in making that statement, but if these gentlemen declare that they took an active part in the political campaign, they also declare that in doing so, they had the sanction of this House.

Now, that is just the case of the gentlemen about whom I am speaking. Vanasse and McLeod admitted that they took an active part in the political campaign, but they say that in doing so they had the sanction of this House—just exactly the plea that was used by the gentlemen who were under discussion at that time:

They state that the House had appointed the translators of the debates—I am not yet speaking of the other officers of the House, but of the translators only—with the understanding that they should be allowed to take part not only in political campaigns, but in active politics in all circumstances. This matter came up incidentally in 1884. At that time it was stated, without contradiction from any quarter, that the translators of the debates were permitted to be engaged in active journalism, and therefore to engage in politics. On that occasion the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who was a member of the Debates Committee, spoke. I must say that the matter came up upon the question of increasing the salaries of the translators, and the hon. member for North Norfolk stated that he was opposed to an increase of salaries because the translators were actively engaged as newspaper correspondents. He said:

I felt myself that there was no justification for granting an advance to the translators, most of whom are here acting as newspaper correspondents, and would be here whether they held translators' situations or not.

The leader of the Opposition at that time goes on to say:

So it was openly stated on the floor of the House, in 1884, that the translators of the debates, while being officers of this House, were at the same time actively engaged in political work, and writing for the newspapers with which they were connected.

And so arguing in the same direction that these men had been permitted by the House to take part in politics, that the statement had been made that they were permitted to do so without contradiction from any member of the House. I have another quotation to read. The hon. the Prime Minister, at that time leader of the Opposition, discussing the same matter, goes on to say that the practice allowing officials to engage in politics, should not be allowed. He says:

The practice should not be tolerated at all. I have said in my opening remarks, and I repeat it here, that it should not be tolerated that an officer of this House should engage in active politics. I think the principle is a wrong one. I agree with my friend from Oxford. I agree with everybody who has spoken on this side that if my friend the Secretary of State wants to pose in a magnanimous position, it does not lie in him to dismiss men because they offended him, but let him say—

And this is an argument I intend to use to the Prime Minister to-day, an argument used by himself at that time. In speaking of the Secretary of State at that time, the Prime Minister said:

—let him say, We have been violating the rule, let us make a new rule, and let us forget the past, and then we will think it magnanimous. Notwithstanding what my friend may say, I cannot believe he is actuated, unconsciously perhaps, since he protests, with anything but resentment. If he were not actuated by resentment he would say: I will make it a rule that these men will not in future trespass against the privileges of this House.

So that the Prime Minister, who was at that time leading the Opposition, said: Let us make a new rule, we wish to have that rule, let us lay down a rule now for the future, but don't let us judge these men by the past—and I use the same argument to him to-day. I think it is a good argument to apply to the present case.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Why did you not accept it then?

Mr. CRAIG. Well, I was not here, or I might. With regard to the contention that if these men were civil servants, they would properly come under the condemnation of the House, I say that if such was the position I would not object to their dismissal. But I hold that they are not civil servants. On April 11th, 1888, I find the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) said:

However that may be, my own impression about the position of the civil servant is this: I do not approve of a civil servant taking an active part in politics. I do not approve of the language used in this particular case, such language as I see in the records in the Votes and Proceedings—I do not think any reasonable person will approve of that course, but I hold that there is a great difference to be drawn between the case of a civil servant whose whole time is given to the Government and that of a person employed temporarily who receives only a partial remuneration, not sufficient to enable him to live except by making exertions outside. When owing to the limited employment obtained here, a person is compelled to seek employment elsewhere, you thereby relegate him to the full status of an ordinary citizen, untrammelled by his temporary or partial employment in this House.

No language could be plainer than that, and I commend it to the careful consideration of the Prime Minister. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) was right in laying down that rule, and stating that the translators are not properly civil servants. No doubt, whether they acted rightly or wrongly, those men had a perfect right to take it for granted, from the language used by the then leader of the Opposition, now the Prime Minister, and from the language used by the present Postmaster General, then a leading member of the Opposition, that this position was taken by the Opposition as a whole, and if it was the position taken by them then, I hold it is the position they should take to-day. If they wish to class these translators with civil servants, if they wish to affirm that they should not take part in politics, let them say so, and I shall have no fault to find. If they transgressed, they would then know the consequences; but I hold that these men have a right to offer as an excuse the excuse they have offered, namely, that they thought they had a perfect right to act as they did. Mr. McLeod acted as correspondent of a newspaper. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has stated that the salaries of the translators were not increased because they were correspondents, and in that way earned an additional amount during the session. Mr. McLeod said he understood he had a perfect right to do so. But Mr. Vanasse did what he did after the session was over, when, according to the language used in this House regarding the translators, he had a perfect right to so act and no one could find fault. The translators frankly admitted that they did what they were charged with doing, but declared they had a perfect right to do so in view of the statements made in this House without contradiction. So far, with respect to the cases of McLeod and Vanasse. But I hold that the Bouchard case is quite different. Bouchard did not use offensive language. It has been laid down that a civil servant using offensive language should be dismissed. It cannot be shown that any offensive language was used by Bouchard. If hon. members will look at the report in the "Citizen" of the meeting referred to, which report he says is exaggerated, they will fail to find any offensive remarks; and as no charge for using offensive language can be sustained against Bouchard, he must be acquitted. What did he do? He admits having attended three political meetings, which he says he attended as an elector. Then he admits speaking at one meeting, but he says he had no intention when he went there of speaking or taking any active part in it, but towards the close some of his friends induced him to sit on the platform, and before he was aware of it the chairman called on him to make a few remarks, which he did. He admits frankly having done so; but he said nothing offensive and did not take an active part in politics, and did nothing else but attend the meetings, and went to one meeting without the slightest intention of making a speech, but was dragged into offering a few remarks. His case stands entirely apart from the cases of Vanasse and McLeod. I therefore move the following amendment:

That the report be amended by adding the words: "with the exception of the part relating to Joseph Bouchard."

I do not intend to offer any further remarks in support of the amendment. I think I have said quite sufficient to show that this case is entirely different from the other cases. The other men admitted they had used language which perhaps was offensive, but of which the House could judge. I hold, however, they are justified in the excuse they offer by the speech delivered by the Prime Minister. But I hold that Bouchard's case is entirely different. He used no offensive language, he took no active part in politics, he only attended three political meetings as an elector, speaking for a few minutes at one meeting, which he had no intention of doing when he went there; and I hold, under these circumstances, that whatever conclusion we may arrive at with respect to Vanasse and McLeod, the House should accept the amendment and allow Bouchard to continue in his position. I appeal in this case for generous treatment to be extended to these men. I do not think we should judge them too harshly if they have transgressed, and I ask the Prime Minister that the fullest weight be given to the excuse made. They thought they were right in doing what they did.

The PRIME MINISTER. How is that?

Mr. CRAIG. They thought so from the remarks made in this House, which were allowed to pass without contradiction.

The PRIME MINISTER. Does the hon. gentleman not know that the motion I made at that time was defeated?

Mr. CRAIG. I hold that that fact does not change the opinion of the hon. gentleman.

The PRIME MINISTER. Does it change the opinion of the other side?

Mr. CRAIG. I think we may say this, that if the hon. gentleman held those views at that time, he holds them to-day. The views held by the hon. gentleman in office now and those he held in opposition cannot change on this important question. Certainly the Conservatives rejected the motion, and I think they made a mistake in doing so. But because the Conservatives objected to the motion of the then leader of the Opposition, now the Prime Minister, I do not think that fact should change his views to-day, and in my opinion it does not.

The PRIME MINISTER. But it changes the views of the other side. These men had no right to interfere in politics in 1887; hon. gentlemen opposite think they had a right to interfere recently.

Mr. CRAIG. No.

The PRIME MINISTER. The Conservatives in 1887 were in favour of punishing men for interfering in politics; now they do not wish men to be punished for interfering in politics. They have changed their ground entirely.

Mr. CRAIG. I wish to reply to that argument for a few moments. It is an argument which should never be used by hon. gentlemen opposite. It is what is called the "tu quoque" argument—you did so and so, and we are going to do so and so. I hold that is no justifiable argument. Certainly it is an argument, but it is a poor one for hon. gentlemen opposite to use—I think you should have done so and so, but as you did not do so, I will not do what I thought was right at that time; I thought it right at that time that the men should not be punished, but a new rule should be laid down, although those men thought they had a perfect right to do what they did. They thought they had a perfect right to take part in politics because of what had been said on the floor of this House. Then the hon. gentleman said: Let us not dismiss them, but if you do not wish them to take part in politics, lay down that rule for them. Well, I hold that the same thing applies to-day. Is it the fault of Vanasse and McLeod that the rule was not laid down then?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The rule was laid down by the declaration of the House.

Mr. CRAIG. I hold that there was no rule laid down. In fact a distinctly opposite rule was laid down by the present leader of the Government (Mr. Laurier), and he asked that the rule should be laid down but it was not. If the House wishes to lay down a new rule let them do so now, but do not let us judge of the past actions of men by a new rule which is to be inaugurated for the first time now. It is a most unfortunate thing that the Liberal party, coming into power with great professions—and they have a perfect right to make professions if they intend to carry them out—it is an unfortunate thing that when they come into power with great professions of what they intend to do, and that when they do something wrong and we charge them with it, their answer is: Well, you did the same thing. I say that this is no argument at all, and I hold that the Liberal party will make a great mistake if they adopt this report, and dismiss these men. I just wish to say one word before I close, and I would not say it at all were it not for the remarks of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson). He said, that we talk about Ontario, and he told us that two blacks do not make a white. That is perfectly true, but my answer is: that the principle of the Liberal party as laid down is that civil servants shall not take part in politics, but nobody would ever recognize that as a Liberal party principle judging by the conduct of the Liberals in Ontario. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to prolong this debate. I have said all that I can say, and the matter is before the House. I ask particularly that the case of Bouchard shall be considered entirely different from the others. I have no doubt, that hon. gentlemen who consider the matter without reference to party, will agree that his case does stand entirely distinct. I shall now conclude, and I venture to believe, that all I have said on the matter can be fully substantiated by the records of the House.

Mr. CASEY. It appears from the motion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig) that the Opposition have abandoned the case of two of the translators.

Mr. CRAIG. I made no motion.

Mr. CASEY. Then the hon. gentleman has allowed his amendment to drop. The hon.

member (Mr. Craig) has entered into the whole subject of dismissals and he has reiterated, in a manner that I am astonished to hear from a gentleman of his experience, that, if the rule had been made at the time when the Tremblays and Poirier were dismissed, that translators should not interfere in politics; then it would be quite fair now to turn out these men for interfering in politics. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig) must remember, for the fact has been called to his attention by the Chairman of the committee (Mr. Choquette), that such a rule was laid down at that time, laid down in opposition to urgency from our side of the House, and that these men whom it is now sought to dismiss took the places of men who were turned out of office simply because they did interfere in politics. Therefore, Messrs. Vanasse, McLeod and Bouchard knew perfectly well that they took office as translators subject to the condition that they should not interfere in politics. They cannot grumble, and no man in the House can complain, if the rule under which they took office is applied to themselves.

Mr. FOSTER. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CASEY. Perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) had better ask the question when I have finished.

Mr. FOSTER. I will not ask it if my hon. friend dissents.

Mr. CASEY. I do not wish to break the line of my argument. These translators not only took office under that well understood rule, but they took the places of those who had been dismissed for interfering in politics. Surely neither they nor their friends can complain of the rule being applied to them. Let me remind the House that these gentlemen are not civil servants in the ordinary sense of the word; they are not men responsible directly to the Government, nor to the head of a department, nor even to Mr. Speaker. The rule was established by this House that these men were responsible to the Debates Committee and to this House. These men are the servants of the whole House. It is especially incumbent upon men who are the servants of the House not to be guilty of any interference in politics; I will not merely say offensive interference, but of such active partisanship as would make their impartiality as translators doubtful. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) made a great deal of the point that the chief translator was not called upon to prove that there had been any partiality in the translation done by these men. Well, that might be impossible to prove. Nobody is going to read over the whole of the matter which they have translated and compare it with the original, in order to establish that. But can any one believe that men who were so bitter in their political feelings as these men have shown themselves to be, are to be trusted as the impartial translators of what passes in this House. I, for one, as a member of this House cannot.

Again, two of these men, McLeod and Vanasse, are proven on their own admission to be guilty of using offensive language against the leader of one side of the House. They are perhaps to be pitied for the fact that they have been led into this error by the leader of the party to which they belong. I understand that one of them used the term, that the present Premier of Canada was "a traitor to his race and religion." In a moral sense perhaps we can hardly blame the man for using that phrase, for he got it from a speech delivered in this House by the leader of the Opposition who was then the leader of this House for the Government. The present leader of the Opposition told our Premier that he was "a traitor to his race and religion," and this poor party heeler, who was drummed out—in virtue of the salary he received, not from the Government, or from a party, but as a servant of this House—this poor party heeler who was drummed out to serve during this campaign echoed like a parrot the words of his leader. That leader insulted the present leader of the Government of Canada. He not only insulted him and the party which he leads, but he insulted the race and religion of the hon. gentleman, and the race and religion resented the insult, and it is from that race and from that religion more particularly that the reply has come. It is a case of like master like man. The master was abusive on the floor of this House and the man was abusive outside the House. He who was abusive in the House has fallen in consequence of the abuse; the master has gone and let the man who made himself the servant of that master go with him. Any hon. gentleman who respects this House, or his own position as a member of it, cannot do otherwise than vote for the dismissal of one of our servants who has been guilty of such conduct. As to Bouchard who has been guilty merely of active partisanship, and who has not been charged with being offensive, the precedent is fully established by what has been already done in this House.

The line taken at that time, as the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and all the old members will recollect, was this, that the Liberals who were dismissed from the translating staff, had only done what the Conservatives on the staff had done, but in the opposite direction. The Conservatives on the staff had been encouraged to work for the Conservative party, and had done so without blame; but, when the Liberals on the staff had used the same liberty as the Conservatives, they had been dismissed, and dismissed with contumely. It was our contention then, not that these gentlemen should be allowed to engage in politics, but that the two parties on the staff were not treated with fairness—that the Conservatives were allowed to meddle in politics, while the Liberals were dismissed for meddling.

Mr. DAVIN. Not by the committee, but by the House.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. member for Assiniboia, this afternoon, read that very point from the speech of the present leader of the Government. Now, Sir, on the ground of the dignity of this House, on the ground of the necessity of having impartial men to translate our debates for transmission to other parts of the country, on the ground of the precedent set by hon. gentlemen opposite, I have no hesitation in saying that the self-respecting members of this House must vote for carrying out the principle in this case. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, and the gander must submit to it.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I do not feel, Sir, that I can endorse some of the remarks fallen from the hon. gentlemen opposite in connection with the official report of the debates now under discussion in this House. I venture to say that if the officials in the service of this House, or belonging to the civil service are going to be treated at the hands of this House or of the committees of the House in the way in which they are now being treated, the civil service, I say, will be degraded into a school of hypocrisy. The officials of this House and the civil service employees are threatened with being made a target for persecution, whenever a new party comes into power. When the Conservative party were in power, in 1888, we heard the hon. the First Minister (Mr. Laurier) and his friends emphatically protesting against what they called actual persecution, in the case of some translators of the Debates. As the hon. gentlemen know, three translators of the Debates were dismissed in 1888. I do not hesitate to say that, in my opinion, the translators who were turned out, were not accorded as fair a treatment as should have been meted out to them at our hands. I believe that the precedent then set up by the House should not be adhered to in this case. I hold, on the contrary, that it is high time that those dismissals should be put a stop to, as every change of government would be likely to bring about the recurrence of such reprisals and would result in making slaves of the officials of this House, and causing the civil service, as I said a little while ago, to be degraded into a school of hypocrisy. Whenever the officials of this House think it fit to write their minds about the political men of the day and the course pursued by them, should the House prove unduly severe, they will not be at a loss, while remaining anonymous, how to give utterance to their opinions in even stronger terms than those for which the translators are upbraided for indulging in. Now, the translators under trial, are charged with having taken an active part in politics during the late contest and with having contributed to the press offensive articles against the hon. gentlemen opposite, and therefore it is urged that they should be dismissed. Such is the charge brought against them. But, Sir, who are the men that are going to take the places of those translators, the moment they are decapitated, if it should so happen? Are not the Government prepared to fill the vacancies to be created by appointing to the staff their own supporters who have taken an active part in the late contest? The Government, through their majority in the Debates Committee, are going to appoint to the translators' staff, in the place of the actual translators, men who have taken a prominent part in the late electoral contest, in the interest of the party now in power, men, I say, who have interfered in politics with perhaps more vigour, and made themselves more offensive than those it is now sought to dismiss. But, I ask, Sir, what will happen during the next electoral contest? My hon. friend the First Minister (Mr. Laurier) and his friends are not sure in what way the people are going to declare their verdict. Now, those translators or other Government officials, whose active services the hon. gentlemen opposite may perhaps appeal to during the next electoral contest, those employees, I say, urged by their political leaders to act up to their convictions and to give utterance to their views in public are very likely to tread in the footsteps of the translators who are now under trial before this House. They may, no doubt, take part in the political campaign, wearing the mask of hypocrisy, and may, perhaps, under the cover of a nom de plume contribute to the press slanderous articles, or, at any rate, as strong editorials as those which the translators are now charged with having contributed to the press. With the precedent which it is now sought to establish in this case, the result will be that the party, now in Opposition will resent the action taken by the hon. gentlemen opposite and that, yielding to the pressure of public opinion, as expressed through the House, they may be constrained to do by the employees who are going to take the places of those now threatened with decapitation, as the hon. gentlemen are now doing by the latter. And then, no doubt, the hon. leader of the House (Mr. Laurier) veering again, will wax eloquent, as he did in 1888, while arraigning the arbitrary action of the Cabinet that is to be, and crying mercy for his friends who will have to stand trial upon charges like those now laid against the translators.

The FIRST MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). (Translation.) We have no friends among the translators.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) You have no friends now, but you will have some by that time who will have taken an active part in the electoral contest, and done their utmost to maintain my hon. friend in the position he now occupies. Now, it is in the interest of the translating staff of the Debates, and of his own supporters who may be appointed to that staff, that I do now urge the First Minister to deal fairly by the officials who are now members of that staff. I venture to say, Sir, that some hon. gentlemen opposite have taken too active a part and displayed too much animus against the present translators. The hon. gentlemen who have charged those translators with having used offensive language in discussing political issues, with reference to the hon. leader of this House and some of his friends; the hon. gentlemen, I say, who have taken that action are undoubtedly the very men who have used, with regard to the leader of the Opposition in this House and the supporters of the Conservative party, far more abusive and offensive language than that which the translators now threatened with dismissal have ever indulged in. I may say that during the late contest, I heard the hon. gentlemen opposite use such abusive language. Now, I ask, wherefore do the hon. gentlemen who made use of such violent and abusive language against us, on this side of the House, so loudly clamour for the beheading of officials of this House who are not permanent, but are employed only during the session? No doubt, the hon. gentlemen are afraid of having too vivid a light cast upon their political course. I fail to see that these hon. gentlemen who now persecute the translators of the Debates, evince anything like liberality or largeness of mind in their conduct. I see nothing but arbitrary in the course now pursued by the hon. gentlemen. The French translators of the Debates, should no more than the rest of the Government officers, be degraded into mere slaves. I fail to see how the dignity of this House will be added to, in allowing its officials to be thus degraded in the eyes of the people. I believe that our officials should be given free scope and full freedom, provided they do the work they are paid for by the House. I hold that, during recess, they should be perfectly free to do what they please, and to engage actively in politics, if they so chose to do, provided that the language they use be devoid of any violence or abuse, such as some hon. gentlemen have resorted to, when speaking of their opponents. Judging from the report now before this House, I hold that many hon. gentlemen, on both sides of this House, have used in reference to their opponents much more violent and offensive language than that which these translators are charged with having indulged in.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, the case of these translators, it seems to me, is somewhat different from that of the permanent civil service official who oversteps the fence-line of discretion, and goes upon the political platform and talks for his party. Civil servants who are in the permanent service, are, I understand, prohibited from doing any outside work. Now, are these men, who are only sessional employees, although at liberty to follow their personal professions during the recess, under the same restrictions as the permanent staff? I do not think they are, inasmuch as they may follow their legitimate professions during the recess; but, as they receive a goodly, yes, a substantial part of their income from the country, I think they should have better sense than to go upon the political platform and shake their tongues, and, forsooth, play the part of Sir Oracle, and cut and slash at political leaders whose policy does not agree with their own. The question, it seems to me, resolves itself into a conflict between two principles. The majority of the committee, by dismissing these translators, would indirectly assert the principle that to the victors belong the spoils. The minority of the committee, by retaining them, would assert the no less evil principle that the servant of the whole country has a right to be the soldier of one party. There are men in office in the country, such as issuers of marriage licenses and postmasters, who receive a ten-dollar bill from the Dominion every year as salary, who are entitled to the fullest rights of citizenship. But these translators do not belong to any such class. Their work is hard, and they do it well; and the thousand dollars they receive per session is certainly a substantial addition to their income, any how, it goes a long way to keep them from that avidity of hunger which my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) spoke of about half an hour ago. Any assertion of the principle that a man in receipt of substantial public pay, has a right to be an active politician, is simply another way of saying that a party has a right to billet its warriors on the country. I think the House should condemn the principle invoked to justify the retention of these men; it should also condemn the principle invoked to justify their dismissal; and it should adopt the new and better principle that would keep all civil servants out of active politics. Some talk of the freedom of citizens in this country. Why, Mr. Speaker, there are many citizens in this country who would be only too glad to exchange their freedom for the salaries which these translators get. Some gentlemen talk as if the freedom of the subject were endangered. There could be no greater mistake. There is lots of freedom outside of the civil service. There is always a good crop of freedom in this country; but, as my hon. friends on the Liberal side of the House can testify, from their correspondence, there is sometimes a short crop of salaries. I find myself at war with both sides on this important question. An appeal on behalf of these translators to the justice of Parliament might be disallowed. I hope that an appeal on their behalf to the mercy of Parliament will not be disallowed. These men have been brought face to face with their own wrong-doing. They have been in a sort of lingering pickle for over a month, and, in addition, they have been stewed in the stock-pot of the committee. They are only bits of moistened clay like ourselves, Mr. Speaker, and surely it is better to forgive than to have revenge. We have listened this afternoon to the arguments on both sides in connection with this report; and, as we are the jurors in the case, I think that, as jurors, we should unite upon the Hibernian verdict of "Not guilty; but don't do it again."

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. When you left the Chair, Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock, I was about to express my surprise that the hon. gentlemen who are responsible for bringing this question before Parliament did not rise in their places to support the charges which they thought fit to make in the Debates Committee against the French translators of the debates, whose dismissal is asked for by the report of that committee now submitted for our consideration. In looking over the report of the committee, I find a letter written by the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet) which reads as follows:—

House of Commons, 28th Aug., 1896.

To the Committee of the "Debates."

I beg to make the following statement:—

That I have been informed on reliable authority:—

Jean Baptiste Vanasse, Peter McLeod and Lucien Lasalle, three translators of the "Debates" of the House of Commons of Canada, have taken a prominent part in organizing political strife since 1891, when in office.

An opportunity to prove the statement is humbly requested.

D. MONET.

I also find another document, which, translated, reads as follows:—

House of Commons,
Ottawa, 27th Aug., 1896.

P. A. Choquette, Esq., M.P., Chairman Debates Committee.

My dear colleague,—

I desire to direct your attention to the active part taken in the last general election by Mr. J. B. Vanasse, of Sorel, a member of the staff of translators of the "Debates." His interference in politics has been so public and notorious that he could not disprove the charge. You may, by way of convincing yourself as to the correctness of the statement I make, refer to the newspaper "Le Sorelois," containing his speeches, denouncing the Hon. Mr. Laurier and your humble servant as traitors to their faith and their nationality. I also inclose you an affidavit substantiating said charge, which being true, I cannot see why Mr. Vanasse should not receive the same treatment as was meted out to Messrs. Poirier and Tremblay, who were dismissed for having meddled in politics. Mr. Vanasse certainly deserves it for many more reasons than one, and his dismissal will satisfy the people of the district of Richelieu.

Yours truly,

A. A. BRUNEAU.

At a subsequent meeting of the committee another charge was put on record:

House of Commons,
Ottawa, 2nd Sept., 1896.

To the Committee of the Debates.

I beg to make the following statement:—

That I am informed on reliable authority that Joseph Bouchard, one of the translators of the "Debates" of the House of Commons of Canada, has taken a prominent part in organizing political strife and making stump speeches during the last contest in 1896 in the Dominion, when in office since 1891.

An opportunity to prove the statement is humbly requested.

D. MONET, M.P.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these two gentlemen, who have seats in this House, thought fit to bring charges against officials of this House and pressed them before the Debates Committee. One of these hon. gentlemen is a member of that committee, and acted the part of accuser and of judge at the same time, voting in one of two instances on questions that were raised in connection with the case. Yet now, when the House is seized of this matter, neither of those two gentlemen has dared to come forward and express his opinion. This is a personal matter with them that should never have been brought to our consideration. Here is the member sitting for the county of Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) formulating a complaint against another gentleman who resides and has a vote in that county, who has the right to exercise his franchise, who voted at the election, who thought fit to express publicly his opinions on the topics of the day, and who was perfectly right in so doing, because, at the time, he was not acting as an official of the House, that is to say, he was not on duty. As has been ably explained by my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), these official translators are not members of the civil service. They do not, in the proper sense, come under the laws which govern the civil service, and my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) is altogether astray when he seeks to apply what Todd says with regard to the civil service in these cases. It has been not only asserted but proven that when these officials were appointed, the understanding was that their services would be required only during sessions, and that during recess they were at perfect liberty to do as they pleased and what they pleased. So much was that the case that, on a former occasion, when officials occupying a very similar position, in fact the very same position, were dismissed—not by the House, not by the Debates Committee, but by a gentleman who, Mr. Speaker, sat in the very Chair you occupy to-day—their dismissal was condemned by my hon. friends from the opposite side of the House, because then, it appears, these gentlemen held that opinion simply because the victims happened to be their political friends. To-day, because the three victims whose heads we are called upon to cut off happen to belong to the other creed in politics, they stultify themselves and take back all the good they said on a former occasion in order to achieve the end which has been contemplated by the two members who are more directly interested in this case. I would not like to be charged with taking up too much time of the House by reading, perhaps repeating, some of the quotations that have been made from debates that have taken place on former occasions under similar circumstances. At the same time, I hope I may be allowed to refer to the opinion expressed by Mr. David Mills. Speaking on the occasion of the dismissal of Messrs. Poirier and Tremblay, he said :

So far as these translators are concerned, it was said at the time of their appointment that the House gave employment to them but for a very small portion of the year, and that their salaries were less than the ordinary reporters upon the Official Debates, and that they were to be at liberty to engage in ordinary avocations when they were not employed here. It was well known at the time they were appointed that some of them were on the political press on one side and some of them on the political press on the other side, and it was expressly stated by the committee at whose instance they were appointed that they were not to be interfered with in their political freedom and independence.

This is the opinion expressed at that time when the very question that we are discussing to-day was raised in this House, and the hon. gentleman on the other side who then sat in this House and supported that opinion and condemned the dismissal of the three gentlemen who were turned out for having interfered in politics, or, perhaps I might better say, for having used language that was found to be objectionable by some hon. gentlemen then sitting in this House. To-day, because the position is reversed, because those who are offended are sitting on that side of the House and those who have offended belong to the same political creed as we on this side of the House, hon. gentlemen opposite now state that these men have acted wrongly and that their heads must be cut off. Well, I say again, if they persist in that position, they will simply stultify themselves and they will have to take back what they have said on former occasions. I am more surprised at the attitude of the hon. leader of this House (Mr. Laurier) than at that of any other hon. member. The leadership of a party must certainly add some obligations to the one who occupies such a high position and he should be above all suspicion—he who has command not only of the House but of the whole country. Now, as has been already mentioned in this House, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) referring to the dismissal of Messrs. Poirier and Tremblay, said :

It may probably be said that there is no fault found with their taking part in politics if they chose to do so, but they must use polite language. Well, Mr. Speaker, it was the House of Commons which gave the translators permission to engage in politics, but the House could scarcely be expected to hope that they would never be guilty of abusive language. Hon. members must remember that the translators of the debates for three or four months of the year do nothing else but translate the debates of the House ; they become saturated with abusive language, and to expect that they would act differently was to suppose they were different flesh and blood from ourselves.

This was the opinion expressed by the hon. gentleman on that occasion. And he adds :

The translators were appointed to translate the debates and nothing else, and no one knows better than the hon. gentleman, who is Chairman of the Debates Committee, that it was always understood that during a part of the session they could engage in any other work they chose to engage in.

That is to say, not only did the hon. gentleman admit that the translators of the debates were not bound to devote all their time to the work that was entrusted to them, but during their leisure, even while the session was in progress they had a perfect right to do work outside for other concerns. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman said this afternoon in a short passage of words with my hon. friend here (Mr. Davin) that this position had been reversed, that is to say that this question had been settled and that a majority of this House had decided that the translators were no more at liberty to act as they had been allowed to do before. But, Sir, I find that in July, 1894, the hon. gentleman was still of the same opinion as in 1888. In 1894 a charge was brought against one of the translators whose head we are asked to cut off to-day, that he had interfered in politics by writing political articles in one of the newspapers. In defence of the position of that gentleman, the hon. leader of the House, who at that time was the head of the Opposition in this House, said :

Some years ago, in 1882 or 1883, when the late Minister of the Interior—the late Hon. Thomas White—was chairman of the committee, a report was adopted by this House, and at that time it was understood that the shorthand writers should receive $2,000 a year and that their services might be taken advantage of at any time during recess, and the translators were to receive $1,000 a year and were to be free to take up any occupation they liked during the recess. After session they were to be free to go into journalism or anything else they liked.

The rule has always been that during sessions they are to devote their whole time to the work for which they are paid by this House. Outside of the session they can do what they please.

So that even the leader of the Government never understood that what took place in 1888 would be the rule, and that thereafter no member of that staff would be allowed to devote any time to politics, or would be allowed to take part in the political considerations of the country. Now, what has been the position upon this question of the committee of this House appointed to supervise the printing of the debates? Those translators of the debates, I maintain, are not under the jurisdiction of the Government, they are officials of this House, and, therefore, they are not supposed to be put in office, and are not put in office, on account of their political views or antecedents. As a proof of this, I may mention that, during the time I had the honour of being a member of the Debates Committee, I well remember that, whenever a vacancy occurred, the political views or the political creed of a candidate for that position were never taken into consideration. I may say that though, during the last Parliament, a majority of the committee was composed of members belonging to the Conservative side, appointments have been made of gentlemen belonging to the Liberal side in politics, as against applicants well qualified belonging to the Conservative side, because there were reasons for such appointments. I may mention one instance. A gentleman by the name of Richardson, a Roman Catholic and a Conservative, died while he was a member of the reporting staff. Having the honour of being the chairman of the committee at that time, I spoke to some friends, and a gentleman by the name of Campbell was recommended to me, not on account of his political creed, but on account of his ability, on account of the good services that he could render to the staff by joining the body of good men we already had there. This gentleman had been for a long time a reporter on the "Globe," and admitted that he was a Liberal in politics. On the other hand, a gentleman on the reporting staff of the "Empire," also well qualified, but who was not, perhaps, as well known to the committee as Mr. Campbell, made an application, and he was strongly recommended by every member of the Government of the day. But this Mr. Campbell had already temporarily filled the position after the death of Mr. Richardson, and he had a claim to the position, and we did not wish to do an injustice to him by preferring a political friend, and so we decided to keep Mr. Campbell, though he was a Liberal, opposed to us in politics. But we kept him in office because he was a first-class officer, and we knew very well that he would discharge his duty impartially and faithfully, as he has since done. Well, when we are charged with making political capital with this question, I think the charge does not become those hon. gentlemen who have never sat on that committee, and who are not aware of what has taken place in that committee in the past. I must admit with regret that we have never seen such disgraceful proceedings in that committee as we have had since the opening of this session.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must know that he is out of order in referring to what took place in committee, beyond what is shown in the report now before the House.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I only expressed regret. Well, after several meetings such as I have described, we came to the conclusion that we must deal with the subject in the fairest way possible. On the 17th September, when the committee met at ten o'clock in the morning, after the minutes of the former meeting had been read, and the order of the day had been called, I made the following proposition:—

That after hearing the charges and the evidence in the cases of Messrs. Vanasse, McLeol, Lasalle and Bouchard, this committee is of the opinion that no charge or complaint having been made against any of the above named officials in regard to the proper and impartial discharge of their duties, as official translators of the debates, during the session, and that the charges brought against them being purely of a political character, and not of such a nature as would justify the interference of this committee, acting impartially, be it resolved that the order be discharged and the business of the committee be proceeded with.

Well, Sir, on that occasion I thought I was justified in making such a motion, because the question was a political question, and one that never should have been brought up before a committee of this House, because, in the work of that committee and in the discharge of our duties as members of that committee, we should never be actuated by political feelings, we should deal with matters coming before us in an impartial and liberal manner, and it was with that object that I made the motion I have just read. But, Sir, the accusers were persistent, and nothing less than the heads of those very men we are now asked to discharge from the service of this House, would satisfy them. Why, Sir, while we were dealing with that case, we were canvassed by a lot of men seeking the positions of those very men we were asked to discharge, and we were called upon to support this or that candidate in the face of these poor men, whose cases have not yet been tried. More than that, Sir, I saw on one occasion a document containing charges against one of those who were accused, and behind that document was the application of the very party who wanted to get his place. When one sees things of that sort, under such circumstances, I think, we are justified in asking this House not to be in too great a hurry to ruin fathers of families who have held these positions for years, who have discharged their duties so far as the work is concerned to the satisfaction of the House and the public at large, men who never for a moment thought that while they were allowed to go and vote at elections they were not allowed to express freely their opinions on the political topics of the day. Why allow these men to give their votes as citizens if you want to deprive them of the right to speak their minds as to the way they intend to vote or have voted. I am not in favour of suppressing the vote of the civil servants, because this is a free country, and whether a man belongs to the civil service or works for a manufacturer or a farmer, or is employed in the public service he has the same right as any other citizen of the country to express his political opinions. I am more sorry for this occurrence because this matter is brought up by members who are personally interested in the matter, and have probably friends to put in the very places of those men whom we are called upon to dismiss to-day.

Mr. SCRIVER. How do you know that?

Mr. LaRIVIERE. You are not one, I am glad to say.

Mr. SCRIVER. I ask the hon. gentleman how he knows that.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I am not allowed to state what transpired in the committee.

Mr. SCRIVER. The hon. gentleman will excuse me, but I think he is not warranted by anything said in the committee in making the assertion he has made with respect to personal interest.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Are you referring to what took place in the committee?

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. It is about time we had good order, and in order to have good order we will vote against the dismissal of those men we are called upon to discharge to-day.

Mr. BRITTON. I think there ought to be a rule laid down, after so much discussion as we have had in this House on this matter and very similar matters during the last few days they have been under consideration. I supposed there had been a rule almost agreed upon, if not quite agreed upon, between the members on the Government side of the House and hon. gentlemen opposite. I thought it was quite well understood, at all events by the majority on the other side, that if a person who held an office in the civil service or in the employ of the Government took an active and offensive part in election matters, he should be asked to resign his situation or he should be dismissed. I am quite aware that in the discussion of the matter the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) did not go so far in that direction as the leader of the Opposition, but he went, as it seems to me, quite far enough to warrant the course that is proposed to be taken by the members of the committee in their report on this matter. If that is so, then the passing of the report, at all events so far as two of the persons charged is concerned, would only be the logical and natural conclusion and simply following the rule agreed upon by the parties. I confess that there is to my mind a considerable distinction between the cases of the three persons. I think on the evidence before me, and which I have read this afternoon, that the case of Bouchard is very much less aggravated than the cases of the other two individuals, and I will go so far as to say this, that if I had been on the committee and dealing with this matter, I would have given Bouchard the benefit of the doubt and have not executed the penalty sought to be enforced against him. But while it is one thing to deal with the matter as a member of the committee, it is quite a different matter to deal with the report presented by the committee for our consideration. This is a judicial deliverance on the part of this committee. They have given a much more full consideration to all matters that came before them than any one can possibly do by looking at the evidence and dealing with the matter here, and while I would have been willing to give the benefit of the doubt to Bouchard, so far as I am advised at present and I am able to form an opinion from the record of the committee, yet a different rule should be observed in dealing with the matter in this House. As this is a judicial report carefully prepared by the committee and presented to the House, we should hesitate before we go against the report; so while Bouchard might have been entitled to the benefit of the doubt there, he is hardly authorized to receive that benefit here, and it can hardly be expected that we will deal differently with his case when it is embodied in the report from the way we will deal with the cases of the other two translators. I cannot see the difference sought to be drawn between these translators and employees of the House and members of the civil service. Technically there may be a difference, really there is no difference. The former are in the employ of the Government just as much as are regular civil servants, and, therefore, they should be subject to precisely the same rule. Surely it is not a matter of very great importance if they regard their situation as in any degree permanent and kept on year after year that they should have some time between sessions when they had not any work to do. If we were to draw a comparison we might find that to be the case with judicial officers. County court judges, who are entirely apart from politics, have not their time fully occupied, and the Government allow them when they are not occupied in trying cases or attending court, to take arbitrations and do work for their own benefit, which is entirely different from the judicial work, yet they are judged to be in the employ of the Government all the time, and it would be unseemly in them to take part in political matters. What is true in their case is only true in a lesser degree in the case of these gentlemen who have for several years past been receiving the money of all classes and political creeds in the country. So that the distinction sought to be drawn between them and civil service employees proper is imaginary—there is no distinction that really can be made to apply to one and not to the other. I do not desire to go over the printed evidence and comment upon it, for it has been reviewed by some hon. gentlemen who have preceded me; but I rose more particularly to call attention to one point which is made apparent in the printed copy before me. Light is shed on the way certain matters are managed by this little piece of evidence which comes accidentally before the House. We have complained and have desired some rule laid down in regard to Government employees. We on this side of the House have complained that whenever there was an election the Conservative party has always had, first, their committees ready; second, they have had their committee rooms lighted and heated for them; they have had their men ready at a moment's warning, at the bugle call, to take part in the election. The custom-houses, post offices, inland revenue offices, offices of weights and measures and steamboat inspection have been committee rooms heated and warmed, and these officials were the men ready to go into the field and oppose the Liberal party. I find that one of these letters signed by one of the translators who were acquitted in this matter, is dated from the "Conservative Association, Montreal, Post Office, first story, Room No. 1." That is proof conclusive, if proof were needed, that the statements which we have made from this side of the House, that the public buildings, the post offices, &c., throughout the country were used for the Conservative Association headquarters, and as a rallying ground for Dominion officials to send out such political literature as I find here, and which I dare say every one has read. It only requires to be read in order to show the unfair advantage which the signers of that letter asked persons to take in promoting Conservative work throughout the country. Knowing what the Liberal party have had to contend with from first to last, the wonder is that we are on this side of the House tonight, instead of on the other. We have had difficulties to contend with beyond all reason in our election campaigns. I would ask my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) in the light of what he knows in reference to what has been done by officials from time to time, if he does not think it right to take back the expression he used in reference to the Liberals, when he said they were sitting around with a wolf-like hunger upon them, ready for the offices that might become vacant by the dismissal of persons guilty of offences of this kind.

Mr. DAVIN. That was only a metaphor, and if the hon. gentleman feels greatly aggrieved, I will abolish the metaphor.

Mr. BRITTON. The difficulty about my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) is that he is all metaphor. I sympathize as strongly as any gentleman on the opposite side can with these gentlemen in the position in which they find themselves. My desire would be to continue them there as bread-winners for their families, but surely a principle is involved, and if we are to have a rule laid down that officials shall not use their undue influence against the political party in opposition, then there can be no better time than the present to lay down the rule. But, Sir, we ought to see that justice is now done no matter who happens to be hurt.

Mr. BERGERON. Although I am a member of the Debates Committee, I would not have taken part in this discussion were it not for a remark made by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey). That hon. gentleman said, that Mr. Vanasse had been appointed to replace one of the translators who had been dismissed in 1888. It would be an injustice to Mr. Vanasse if that statement were not corrected. As a matter of fact it is not so. Mr. Vanasse was appointed when the "Hansard" translators were first named, in the same way as Mr. Beaulieu and Mr. Lasalle. This is a matter which looks to be of small importance, but as this case goes before the country as being a little piece of political vengeance it is just as well that it should be set right. I am afraid that we have occupied too much of the time of Parliament by this discussion. The people of the country think that we have more important business to transact than to occupy our time in trying to knock the heads off three poor translators. This is nothing else but a piece of political patronage. A great deal of allusion has been made to those who were dismissed in 1888, at the instance of my old friend Sir Adolphe Chapleau. I remember that the Premier said at that time that these men should not be dismissed, and I entirely agreed with him then. I was tempted to vote against the motion of the then Secretary of State, Sir Adolphe Chapleau, but anybody knowing the relations which existed between that hon. gentleman and myself, will understand very well that I yielded to his request, and the result was that I did not vote at all. I feel the same objections to-day to vote for this report of the Debates Committee. These men being paid only $1,000 a year were under the impression that they could mix in politics and do something else for a living outside of the session. They believed that being voters they could speak on the platform and write in the newspapers. They might have used strong language it is true, but that is only a question of degree. We all know very well that if they were told to-day that they should not write any more political articles, or speak any more on political platforms, they would avoid doing so in the future. And after all, Sir, if these men are dismissed by whom are they to be replaced? They are to be replaced by political partisans and friends of hon. gentlemen opposite. They will be replaced by men who must have been mixed up in politics before, either in the press or on the platform. Every member who has had experience in this House knows that it is a very difficult thing to secure good translators, because it is one thing to be a translator and another thing to be a good translator. To be good translators they must be men who have been employed in journalism, and men of good education. Consequently on their very profession they have been politicians more or less on one side of politics or the other. If we dismiss these men for political reasons and appoint in their places political friends of gentlemen opposite, we will be exposing ourselves to a repetition of what has taken place, and we will expose these gentlemen to the fate of those whom it is sought to dismiss now. We know very well that the half of the gentlemen who are writing on "Hansard" are political friends of gentlemen opposite, but there was never a question of that when they were appointed, because we were looking for the men who could do their work best. There were also some translators appointed who were Liberals, but nobody said anything about it, and had it not been for the unfortunate occurrence of 1888 they would be in their positions still. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) expressed himself as feeling lenient towards Mr. Bouchard. It is true that Mr. Bouchard did not take any part further than to speak at one meeting. He was a voter, he did not use any strong language, but simply said in public what any elector has a right to say in conversation. If we give these gentlemen the right to vote, we must necessarily give them the right to express their opinions. This is after all purely and simply a question of political patronage, and it will go to the country that the House of Commons assembled to pass important laws and discharge important business for the country has spent a whole afternoon trying to dismiss three employees so as to replace them by the political friends of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Now, one word just to set my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Britton) right about a matter which, if not answered, might give hon. gentlemen a false idea of the real facts in regard to that office in the post office at Montreal. The Minister of Public Works was here a moment ago, and he might prove what I am saying. There is an office in Montreal for the Government. The Ottawa Ministers, when they went to Montreal formerly, had no place where they could receive their friends or the public, except at hotels. It was considered better to have a room in one of the public buildings, and a room was obtained in the post office. As has been said in another place, the Conservative Association was disbanded after the election of 1891. There was no more organization, unfortunately for the party, of which we had proof in the election of 1896. Therefore, there was no longer a president or a secretary of the Conservative Association. If Mr. Lasalle signed that letter as secretary, he did so, not at the instigation of the party, but at the instigation of the late Minister of Public Works, who, knowing that Mr. Lasalle had formerly been secretary of the association and had acted with the president in connection with the revision of the lists, asked him to act as secretary. As a matter of fact, there was no Conservative Association, and there was no room in the post office of Montreal for that purpose; but there was a private office attached to the office of the Ministers, and it was there that the gentleman who called himself secretary, worked with Mr. Benoit for a few days—and he was there only a few days, for the two gentlemen quarrelled and separated. Now, there are not many of the gentlemen on the other side of the House who made the accusations against these men, to stand up in the House and make their accusations good. My hon. friend from Napierville (Mr. Monet) has not one word to say in justification of his demand for the dismissal of these men.

Now, when I heard my hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Robertson) this afternoon, I felt that he was expressing the sentiments of the great mass of the people outside who are not biassed by political feeling. The position he took was that we should not dismiss these men, but, at the same time, we should not sanction their going on the platform to speak or their writing in the press on political questions. Taking that as the idea that ought to prevail, I beg leave to move, in amendment to the motion made by my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. Choquette)

That all the words after "That" in the main motion be struck out, and the following inserted instead thereof: "In the opinion of this House, the translators of the Debates of the House of Commons be notified that in the future they will not be allowed to speak on political platforms or write political articles."

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Mr. Speaker, the report of the Committee on the Debates, which we have now before us, is the application of the rule which was adopted by this House in 1888. The motion of my hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) has no application whatever, because the very rule which he wants the House to adopt, was adopted in 1888.

Mr. BERGERON. Not with the assent of my hon. friend.

The PRIME MINISTER. Against my protest, my loud protest. I fought, and fought in vain, against the action of the committee and the action of the House at that time. I fought, and fought in vain, to have the three translators who were then dismissed, retained in the service. The majority of that House would not have that. The majority of that House proclaimed the principle that the translators of the debates, like all civil servants, should not interfere in politics, and that, if they did, they would incur the penalty that is visited on every civil servant who interferes in politics. I fought against that principle, and the argument I urged then I would be prepared to repeat now, if the question had not been placed in the position in which it now is by the action of the House at that time. I thought then that sessional clerks should not be placed on the same footing as the civil service generally, and the reason I gave was that, as these men were not required by their office to give the whole of their time to the service of the country, but were only required to give their time during the session, they should be allowed outside of the session to follow any avocation they saw fit, journalism or anything else. Moreover, there was another reason at that time why this argument should be maintained. It was well understood, when the service of the debates was organized in 1883, at the instance of the late Mr. Thomas White, that both the translators and the reporters would be allowed a great deal of liberty outside of the session. So far as the reporters were concerned, it was understood that they should be allowed to take part in journalism, if they saw fit; and the rule was acted upon—and my hon. friend from Beauharnois has recalled it—that on the staff of the translators the two parties should be represented. But my hon. friend knows that this rule was violated in 1888.

Mr. BERGERON. I did not do it.

The PRIME MINISTER. No one at the present time did it. It was very well to apply the rule when friends of ours were the offenders, but now, when other people are the offenders, our hon. friends opposite say: "Oh, be generous and magnanimous; do not apply to our friends the same rule that we applied to your friends." In the name of reason or justice, what have they to complain of, if we apply to their friends the same rule that they applied to our friends? Injustice always recoils upon the perpetrators, and the majority abused their power in 1888, when they dismissed Mr. Poirier and the two Tremblays; they applied the rule which to-day they object to. We are simply doing by them what they did by us, and who will say that there is injustice in that? In 1888 the case was much stronger than it is at the present time, because then it was understood that the translators would be allowed to go into journalism, and, if so, they were to be allowed all the privileges which the pursuit of that profession involved—the privilege to speak or write their minds as they saw fit. One Mr. Tremblay wrote in the press; the other wrote a pamphlet; Mr. Poirier spoke on the platform. For these things they were dismissed. I argued that they were not in the same position as regular civil servants, but that after the session they should be allowed the privilege of engaging in other avocations. My appeals to the House were in vain. There and then, by a large majority, the House proclaimed the principle that the translators of the debates should be treated as civil servants, and should not be allowed to take part in politics. Not only was the rule affirmed but it was applied immediately, and three translators, for no other crime but that which is here reported against these gentlemen, were dismissed. Again, I repeat, if the rule was adopted at that time, what are we going to do at present? What can we do but apply the rule then laid down by the House. Of the three translators who came before the committee, two said they relied on the statements made by myself and some other members of the Opposition to the effect that they should be given the privilege of engaging in journalism. True it is that I gave this opinion on the floor of the House, but hon. gentlemen know very well that the House adopted the contrary opinion. It adopted the opinion that these translators should act as civil servants, that is to say, that they should not engage in politics. There is more than that. When the three translators were dismissed in 1888 for having taken part in politics, these gentlemen, who were put in their shoes, knew that if they were appointed on the staff of translators, it was because their predecessors had violated a law which the House declared it would not allow to be violated. Therefore, they had all the less reason to interfere in politics, for they knew what they were doing. Therefore, if they were to rely on any authority for doing what they did, it was not upon the authority of myself and friends, whose opinions were refused by the House, but they should have considered themselves bound to act by the rule of the majority. Here we are coming into office at present, and we find the rule established that these translators have violated. We find that they have violated the very rule upon which they came into the service. Again, I ask, where is the injustice done to them when they are treated exactly as the previous translators, whose places they filled, were? If another rule is to be established, I am quite willing to accept it, but only after the present rule is applied.

Mr. BERGERON. It is a matter of revenge.

The PRIME MINISTER. No, it is a matter of justice. My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) appealed to my generous heart, as he was pleased to call it, to my magnanimity, as he was pleased to call it. I want to be as generous as any man. I do not like this motion. I would prefer not to vote for it, but since there is a law in the matter, I do not want to have that law applied to my friends and not to my opponents. If it be applied at all, let it be applied all round. But let there be equal justice and equal rights to all. When we are in Opposition, let us be treated as hon. gentlemen wanted to be treated themselves. They find this rule galling, no doubt. I found it very galling at that time, and I had more reason to find it galling then, because the rule was adopted in violation of an undertaking by the House. The hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) said a moment ago that when the office was reorganized in 1883, it was understood that the two political parties were to be represented on that staff. That rule was applied in 1883, and three Conservatives and three Liberals were appointed. The three Liberals appointed were Messrs. Ernest and Rémi Tremblay and Mr. Eudore Poirier. When they were dismissed, were they replaced by Liberals? No, they were replaced by three of the strongest political partisans of the Government. In a double manner, the party which was then in a minority was unjust to the minority. They have chosen their own bed, they have made their own laws, and they cannot say that we are committing any injustice when we apply to them the very same law and rule which they themselves thought fit to establish.

Amendment (Mr. Bergeron) negatived.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is on the main motion.

Mr. FOSTER. Before you put that motion, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word in justification of my vote. I have not taken any part in the discussion on the merits of the case, nor did I intend to, but I cannot find it is in heart to vote for the deposition of Mr. Bouchard, who is one of the three translators reported by the committee for dismissal. I do not think that Mr. Bouchard, considering the circumstances of his engagement, his political employment, and its being a well understood fact that he and the others had a perfect right to earn the rest of their living outside of the sessions of Parliament as they pleased, should be dismissed. He did nothing that was discourteous, nothing that was violent or offensive, there is not the first syllable of any allegation of that kind made or proved, and I certainly think it is an outrage to dismiss him, under these circumstances. With reference to the others, I have simply to say that I will vote against the whole report. I had rather they had used less strong language, but, at the same time, the circumstances of their employment are entirely exceptional, and I take that ground.

Mr. LAURIER.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The only explanation I can give of the speech which the hon. gentleman has delivered is that he was not in his place a few moments ago, when the facts were stated by the leader of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I am going by the report and the evidence.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman may mislead himself, but he will perhaps permit me to say shortly what the facts of the case mainly are. If it were a matter coming for the first time before the House, there would be a good deal in what the hon. gentleman has said. But, in 1883, when the late Mr. White became chairman of the committee, it was understood by both sides that these gentlemen who were appointed should have the privilege of using their spare time during recess in journalism and other pursuits, which necessarily involved their taking part in politics. At that time three Conservatives and three Liberals were appointed. But in 1888, the House adopted the rule, after thorough discussion, that these gentlemen should not be allowed to take any part in politics at all; and acting upon that rule, which was affirmed by a large majority of the House, in spite of a strong protest from the leader of the House, who then led the Opposition, the House determined—

Mr. FOSTER. What rule does the hon. gentleman mean?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That these officials could not take part in politics.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that a rule of the House?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not only was the rule established, but it was acted upon; and the only three Liberal translators on the staff were then and there dismissed and their places filled by strong Conservatives. Well, Sir, under these circumstances, the rule having been established and established in the most effective way, by a vote of the House and the dismissal of the old officers, the new men came into office with the thorough understanding of the rule which the House had established. They have chosen—they had a perfect right to do so—deliberately to break that rule, and I do not think that they have any right to come into this House and ask us to repeal the rule then so clearly laid down.

Mr. FOSTER. What crime has Bouchard been guilty of?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The same crime as Ernest Tremblay.

Mr. BERGERON. Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries has said—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has spoken on this motion.

Mr. BERGERON. I am speaking to the main motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has already spoken on the main motion.

Mr. BERGERON. I spoke on the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member moved the amendment.

Mr. BERGERON. That has been negatived. We are now on the main motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member has spoken on the main motion.

Report concurred in.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 36) to incorporate the Manitoba and Nelson Valley Railway Company.—(Mr. Davin.)

BILLS WITHDRAWN.

Bill (No. 19) respecting the Georgian Bay Ship Canal and Power Aqueduct Company.

Bill (No. 26) to incorporate the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway and Navigation Company.

GRAIN STANDARD BOARD.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to say that through the courtesy of the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière) I have received a list of the grain standard board. But I find that there is not one name on it of either Liberal or Conservative from West Assiniboia, and I would appeal, therefore, to put on the name of one from Western Assiniboia. I will take the opportunity of submitting one or two names. I do not care whether he appoints a Liberal or a Conservative. But I think that there ought to be a name from West Assiniboia on this list.

APPOINTMENT TO THE BENCH IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. PRIOR. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to take up the attention of the House for a few moments to call the attention of the First Minister to some remarks which have appeared in the newspapers on a matter which I think seriously affects British Columbia. I refer to the rumours that have been going the rounds of the press to the effect that it was the intention of the Government to appoint Mr. Joseph Martin to the Supreme Court in British Columbia. Now, Sir, this matter has been discussed in another place and discussed very ably and fully; but I think it is my duty to bring the matter before this House.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman can only ask a question at this stage.

Mr. PRIOR. I will await another opportunity.

SUPPLY—APPOINTMENT TO THE BENCH IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. PRIOR. Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, I think this is a matter of the greatest moment to British Columbia; and I must say that I could not believe that there was any truth in these rumours, I could not believe it possible that the Government would administer such a deliberate snub to the bar of British Columbia on their first taking office. But it is evident that the majority of the lawyers in British Columbia believe it, or that there must be something in this rumour, for I have received to-day a copy of a resolution that was passed by the Bar Association of Victoria on the 10th instant, which I will read to the House:

Whereas, it has been rumoured that there is a possibility that the vacant office of the Puisné Judge of the Supreme Court of British Columbia may be filled by the appointment of a barrister not a member of the Bar of British Columbia, contrary to the practice which has prevailed with respect to such appointment for a period of over twenty years. Be it therefore resolved by the Bar Association of the city of Victoria that any departure from the said practice would be detrimental to the best interests of the public, as well as of the profession in British Columbia. Be it further resolved, that in the opinion of the association this province should be regarded as within the benefit of the provisions of section 97 of the British North America Act, taken together with section 10 of the Terms of Union with respect to such appointments. And be it further resolved, that this association do respectfully protest against the appointment of any person not now a member of the Bar of British Columbia in active practice to be a judge of the said court. And be it further resolved, that it is necessary to the due and effective administration of justice in this province that the said vacancy be filled with as little delay as possible. I am credibly informed that the bar associations of other towns in British Columbia have passed similar resolutions and forwarded them to the Government through other channels. I suppose the members of the Government do not know much about British Columbia. I am aware that the hon. First Minister (Mr. Laurier) visited that province some time ago in company with other gentlemen who have seats in this House, but who, I am sorry to say, are not members of the Government, though when in British Columbia, they expected to be. I believe that very few, if any of the other members of the Government have been in that province, and therefore it is, perhaps, excusable for them not to take much interest in an appointment of this kind. But if they will allow me to tell them, I would like to say that there are plenty of good lawyers, plenty of men who would be ornaments to the bench in British Columbia, without importing one from another province. There are gentlemen of both parties in British Columbia, men of good legal attainments, men who have had large experience in the courts, and whose character or integrity is beyond the suspicion of reproach. I therefore think that the hon. the First Minister might look to some of those gentlemen, be it on his side of politics or on my side of politics, instead of trying to foist a gentleman like Mr. Martin on the bench in British Columbia. Some of us know that gentleman, we have sat in the House with him for years past, and we know that he is a most rabid partisan, we know he is a man given to the most violent language, politically, and I do not think that any of the members from British Columbia could give their consent, if it was asked, to see him elevated to a position on the Supreme Court bench. Now, I would like to say that I myself, with other members from British Columbia, have in the past recommended the appointment of Mr. D. M. Eberts, who is at the present time Attorney General of British Columbia. He is a gentleman who is most popular with all classes, he is a good lawyer; I am no lawyer myself, but I am informed he is, by other lawyers. He holds the position of Attorney General, and I may say, he is a man who has never taken any active part in Dominion politics. I do not remember ever having seen him on a platform, or heard him say one word in favour of one party or the other. I can say that his name was received with great pleasure by the late Government, and that they did everything they possibly could to have him appointed before they went out of office; and I would ask the present Government, if they can see their way to carry out the recommendations that were then made and have Mr. Eberts appointed to fill the vacancy on the Supreme Court bench in British Columbia. It is time that appointment should be made. It is now eight months since Sir Henry Crease received the honour of knighthood, and was superannuated, and therefore left the bench. During the whole of that time the post has remained vacant, and it is very hard on the present judges of British Columbia that this vacancy should continue. They are a hard worked lot of men. The country is a large one, and some of them have to travel enormous distances to perform their duties; and where there are only a small number of them, I think it is four now, one vacancy makes a great deal of difference. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that the present judges on the bench have given the very greatest satisfaction to all classes and to all shades of politics. Three of them, I believe, are old politicians, three of them, in fact, were Premiers of the province of British Columbia; and I am glad to say that since they were raised to the bench, they have kept entirely free from politics of all kinds and descriptions. There are no men to be found in the whole Dominion of Canada who stand higher in the esteem of the people amongst whom they work than the judges who sit on the Supreme Court bench in British Columbia. I may also say that one reason why Mr. Martin should not be sent there—and I trust there is no truth in the rumour,—is that when Sir John Thompson was Premier, he held that although it is not specially stipulated in the terms of union,—on that point I am open to correction—that the Supreme Court judges should be appointed from the bar of that province, still in the terms of union, sections 97 and 98, it is stipulated that in the other provinces they shall be taken from the bar; and Sir John Thompson always believed that that spirit should obtain when any appointments were made in British Columbia, and I think there is no hon. gentleman on the floor of this House but must admit that it is only fair to the lawyers of that province. I will say in conclusion that I hope I have not taken up the time of the House with a matter that hon. gentlemen think worthless of their attention. I sincerely trust that the First Minister and his Government will make the appointment very shortly, and that they will make inquiries and find out if there is not some gentlemen, even on their own side of politics—I certainly would like to see one of my own side appointed, but that is almost too much to expect—but at any rate, I hope they will find some gentleman who is a member of the Bar Association of British Columbia, and appoint him forthwith to the Supreme Court vacancy that is now open. There are other members in this House representing British Columbia, and I would like to hear their opinion as to whether they do not think that it is fair and just to the lawyers of British Columbia, that that seat should be filled from amongst them.

Mr. PRIOR.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). It is the intention of the Government to fill the vacancy on the bench of the Supreme Court of British Columbia at a very early day. The case is indeed more pressing than I supposed. After having heard the remarks of my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Prior), it becomes still more the pressing duty of the Government than I had supposed, to see that this vacancy is filled up very shortly. My hon. friend has just informed us that the present vacancy on the bench has existed for the last eight months. This Government has been in office only six weeks, and if the vacancy has run so long, it is not the fault of this Government, but the fault of the late Administration of which my hon. friend was a member. Therefore since the vacancy has been existing for eight months, there is evidently a still more pressing reason that it should be filled at an early day, and that this Government should not to be so negligent in its duties as the late Government was in that respect. With regard to the appointment of a titular to the office, I am sure my hon. friend is too old a politician now, and has had too much to do with the press, to believe all that he sees in the newspapers. If members of the House generally were to take notice of all that appears in the newspapers, their lives would hardly be worth living. For my part, though I read the newspapers pretty regularly, when a thing is affirmed in the newspapers I am disposed to believe that the reverse is true.

Mr. FOSTER. How long since ?

The PRIME MINISTER. Well, since I have been reading the Conservative papers. With regard to one of the names that has been suggested as a likely occupant of the bench, Mr. Martin, I am surprised to hear my hon. friend speak as he did of Mr. Martin a moment ago. Last evening we had the pleasure of hearing the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Macdonald) speak of Mr. Martin, and certainly from the character which was given him by the member from Winnipeg, nothing is too good for Mr. Martin. He is fitted, not only to be a judge of the Supreme Court, but of any other court, or a member of the Government, or anything else. So I have to refer my hon. friend from Victoria to his colleague from Winnipeg to settle with him as to whether Mr. Martin is qualified.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Department of Indian Affairs, including $300 each to James Kearns and W. Peart, messengers, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act ..... $50,192 70

Mr. FOSTER. What Minister is to be interrogated in regard to this vote ?

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) will supply all the information needed.

Mr. FOSTER. I want the member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) to explain the change made in the vote for civil government under the head of Indian Affairs. I find that in the Estimates, as brought down by myself, there were four chief clerks, including the solicitor, and eight first-class clerks. In the present Estimates one of the chief clerks seems to have been dropped and an addition made to the first-class clerks. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain what has caused this change.

Mr. DOBELL. I am told that there is really no change in the department except the death of one of the clerks. There is a decrease of one clerk, and the statutory increase of $50 per year for 23 clerks, showing a net decrease of $302.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the hon. gentleman must be mistaken. If the hon. gentleman looks at the Estimates submitted, he will find a Deputy Minister, chief clerk and solicitor. In the old Estimates there was a deputy and two chief clerks. One chief clerk appears to have been dropped.

Mr. DOBELL. That was a proposed promotion, which has not been carried out.

Mr. FOSTER. The promotion of a first-class clerk ?

Mr. DOBELL. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the hon. gentleman the name of the officer ?

Mr. DOBELL. William McGirr.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, it is proposed not to promote him. He is a very capable officer, however. There was a question asked the other day, to which I was promised an answer.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The question had reference to one of the clerks employed, as to whether he had reached the maximum in his class. I ascertained he was at the maximum of his class.

Salaries of immigration agents and employees in Canada ..... $21,150

Mr. FOSTER. Do the Government propose to follow out the same plan of immigration agents in Canada as has in the past been carried out, and for which this estimate was prepared ?

Mr. DOBELL. There is no change contemplated for the present.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose not. As there is no Minister, there is no one to contemplate any change.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is a good reason.

Salaries of immigration agents and employees in Great Britain and Ireland... $9,285

Mr. FOSTER. What agents are now employed in Ireland ?

Mr. DOBELL. There is a vacancy in Ireland.

Mr. FOSTER. At what place ?

Mr. DOBELL. At Dublin.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it proposed by the hon. gentleman, or does he know it will be proposed by the person who is to fill the vacant portfolio, to have that office continued in Dublin ?

Mr. DOBELL. That is a question we will have to settle in the future.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman does not know whether the vacancy is to be continued.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The vacancy may be filled.

Immigration expenses ..... $84,315

Mr. FOSTER. We should have some explanation about this. For several years past there has been a more or less vigorous criticism of the methods employed by the late Government, and a great deal has been said by hon. gentlemen now in power, when in Opposition, in reference to useless expenditure on immigration. The method of this expenditure has differed in different years. A quite vigorous policy was carried on by the late Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) in the western and north-western states of the Union, running down as far as Nebraska and the central part of Illinois, taking in the whole range of states between that and the northern border, and going west to Washington Territory. A great many valuable immigrants were brought to Canada from that section; men who in part were Canadians and in part were American farmers, who had all of them done pioneer work, and who, I believe, have made a valuable class of settlers. A large number of these have settled in the Edmonton district, one of the best immigration districts in the North-west. I would like to have my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) state if the Government has at all considered this matter, and whether they propose to carry on operations of that kind. Then again, with reference to the old country. I have seen some rumours in the newspapers that a change is to take place in the headship of the Paris Bureau, and that a more vigorous immigration policy is to be conducted on the continent of Europe, particularly with reference to France and Belgium. I would be very glad to have any information which my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) can give with reference to these matters.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The question to which my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) has just alluded is one which cannot fail to engage the attention of the Government, because there is no question more important to us. I cannot say that the Government has given more serious attention to this matter than to anything else, because in the short period we have been in office, our time has been necessarily taken up with many onerous duties. The question is one which my colleagues and myself have had a pretty clear opinion upon. Though I must say that I am not altogether an admirer of the immigration policy of our predecessors, yet I altogether approve and commend the system which has been—I will not say inaugurated—but attempted to be inaugurated by them, with a view of securing immigrants from the western states. For my part, I am strongly of opinion, and I believe it is the opinion of all those who know something of our western country, that a double event is likely to occur in the near future in connection with the western states and the Canadian North-west. It seems to me pretty evident from the short acquaintance which I have had with that country—and I do not claim my views to be peculiar to myself—it seems to me to be tolerably evident that a large emigration must overflow from the American side to the Canadian North-west. The fertile belt of the American territory is pretty well exhausted, and in order to accommodate more immigrants they must go into a system of vastly expensive irrigation. Before that system can be in operation, it seems to me simply a law of nature that the overflow of population must come to Canadian territory, where the land is ready for settlement; the very best land that it is possible to have, and superior probably to anything that is to be found or that ever was found on the American side. Already this overflow is taking place, not to a very large extent up to the present time, but still enough is manifest to show that there is a steady current coming over from the American to the Canadian side. I believe we will have the support of both sides of the House if we continue the efforts which have been commenced in that line, and which ought to be directed towards having active immigration agents in order to divert the overflow of the American surplus population into our own territory.

What I may call a phenomenon is also, I believe, probably about to take place. I would not wonder, for my part—and perhaps the leader of the Opposition will agree with me in this—that likely, at no distant date the American people may be found to be vast consumers of the surplus wheat products of the North-west Territories. The Americans are, I believe, about exhausting their wheat fields, and the American population which comes over from the American side to the Canadian side will, at no distant date, find a market for their wheat production in the United States. Be this as it may, it is a consideration not for the immediate future. But what is of the immediate future is that we should have the surplus of that valuable immigration which has commenced to cross the border and settle in our country. The Edmonton district and the Red Deer Valley have received already a pretty considerable American population.

Now, with regard to the efforts of the Government to obtain immigration from Belgium and from France. I cannot say that this feature of our policy has received the same consideration, and for my part I have never had—although something is to be done in that respect—I have never had a very great confidence that we could ever have many immigrants from France. The French people do not emigrate, but remain at home. If it were possible to have from France an immigration, not from towns and cities, but from the rural portions of the country, we would certainly have a most valuable class of settlers. I think, however, that a good deal more is to be had from the British Isles themselves. The Government received some time ago a report from Sir Donald Smith in that respect, and if gentlemen opposite think it advantageous, the report might be laid on the Table of the House. It tells us that probably, in the near future, we may look forward to some increase of immigration from the British Isles to Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) has not replied to my suggestion as to the rumour that a little gentle pressure was said to be in process of being placed on Mr. Fabre to induce him to emigrate from Paris to this country. I should hope it was not true.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have not heard of it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Before this vote for immigration passes, I wish to say a few words with reference to it. I would urge upon the Government, in connection with their immigration policy, the desirability of encouraging Icelandic immigrants to settle in our western country. I may say, for the information of hon. gentlemen, that the Icelandic immigrants who have been brought there in large numbers have proved themselves to be one of the best elements in our population. They have a faculty of assimilating with the people: they intermarry with the residents of the country, and when they are only a very short time there they become as good Canadians almost as any class of people we have. They adapt themselves to the conditions of the country. They adopt our school system and our other institutions, and as I say become amongst our most valuable settlers. The other day I received a letter from one of the most influential Icelanders in the west. I have no objection to mention his name, Mr. Christopherson: He has done very valuable service to Canada in inducing large numbers of his fellow-countrymen to immigrate here, and he suggests that the times are now so hard in Iceland, that it would be a most opportune time to induce large numbers of his countrymen to settle in Manitoba. While I think that something, and something very considerable, should be done along this line, still I believe with the hon. the Premier, that the true solution of the settlement of the Canadian North-west lies in receiving the overflow population from the Republic to the south. As one who has lived in the North-west for a considerable number of years, I can say that the natural conditions offered to settlers there, are second to none in any part of the world. I believe that Manitoba and the Territories possess the most fertile soil of any country in the world, and I am thoroughly convinced that if we can render the conditions over which this Parliament has control such as will enable the settlers to purchase their necessary commodities cheaply, we shall go a long way to encourage immigration into that country. I recognize that there will be political differences with regard to the tariff, but I am strongly convinced that the best immigration policy that can be adopted, for Manitoba and the North-west particularly, is to lower the duties on the necessities of life to a minimum, and also to lower, in fact, to wipe out entirely, the duties on agricultural implements. Hon. gentlemen opposite may not agree with me in that regard; but while there may be a difference of opinion on the question of having a tariff, in the eastern provinces there certainly can be no difference of opinion with regard to removing the duties from agricultural implements and farmers' necessities in the North-west, and it is my sincere hope that when the Government propose their tariff changes at the next session, these duties will be removed. Before taking my seat, I would like to ask if an amount is to be provided out of this vote for the Western Immigration Association in Winnipeg, an organization which came into existence about a year and a half ago, and to which, if my memory serves me correctly, the late Premier, during a recent visit to the North-west, promised some public aid—I understand, if they would do their duty politically.

Mr. DOBELL. I may say, in answer to my hon. friend, that there is provision made in the Estimates, in case we think it desirable, to make a grant to this society.

Mr. FOSTER. Is this society the result of the convention that was held there?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The leader of the Opposition might tell my hon friend what the society is.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I may say that there was a convention held in Winnipeg last fall under the auspices of this society. It is a society of considerable influence; among its members being a great many influential people of the country, and it is possible that it might do some good in the way of furthering immigration into the country.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am quite sure the Government cannot turn their attention to a more important question than this question of immigration. There is no doubt that it is the great want of the country. We have a boundless territory, we have inexhaustible resources, we have a fertile soil, we have an admirable climate, we have everything to tempt people to settle in the country, and all that the country requires to give it a great and rapid advance is our being able to induce people to come into the country; and I was very glad to hear the hon. First Minister evince an appreciation of this work and state the determination of the Government to do everything that is possible to promote it. I quite agree with that hon. gentleman that a number of circumstances are now indicating a more favourable prospect and opportunity for Canada than it has had in the past. The very facts to which he has adverted,—the decrease of the wheat-growing lands in the western states, the great competitor we have had, and the greater advantages that Canada now presents for agriculture—must at no distant day tell very strongly in our favour. There is no doubt that the time is not very remote when the enormous population of the United States will tax all the producing power of that country for its supply of food, and will thus give a much greater advantage to the agricultural products of Canada, which has in the past had such very severe competition from the United States. The commissions of agriculturists that have been sent from various states of the union into the North-west of Canada, and have examined the great agricultural resources of that country, have placed on record, on their return to the United States, the declaration that there was no country in the world which presented as great agricultural attractions as Manitoba and the North-west of Canada. Another fact in connection with this matter is that a very large number of Canadians years ago went into the western states, into Dakota and Minnesota; and we have the advantage of bringing to the country persons who are not only the best qualified from experience for prairie farming, but who in a great many instances are Canadians who are glad to take the opportunity of returning to their country. The importance of doing everything that is possible in that direction cannot be overrated. Reference has been made to the Icelandic immigration. I can only say that I believe Iceland presents a most admirable field for development. The Icelanders, being accustomed to a cold climate, and being thus prepared to meet the winter of Manitoba and the North-west, and showing a readiness to avail themselves of the fishing opportunities in connection with the great lakes, have proved to be most suitable settlers for that country. One of the most intelligent Icelanders whom I have met, a gentleman who has had a great deal to do with promoting that immigration, told me that the whole population of Iceland would be only too glad, if they were able to realize the value of their property and holdings in Iceland, to follow the 10,000 of their countrymen who have settled in the North-west of Canada, and have found the change eminently advantageous. At this moment the opportunities for developing that country are exceptionally good. Last year we had a very large crop of a very admirable character. One of the things that has given, and will give when properly known, an enormous advantage to Canada, and promote the immigration of agriculturists to Manitoba and the North-west, is the well-known fact that the further north wheat is grown where it will ripen, the better it is. I had an opportunity of witnessing the triumph of Manitoba wheat in the great agricultural exhibition that was held at Islington, in London, a few years ago, and in which the gold medal was given to the Manitoba exhibit. The five judges, none of them Canadian, agreed in reporting that a sample of wheat from the North-west, which was too late to enter the competition, was better than that of Manitoba, to which the gold medal had been awarded in a competition open to the whole world. It was not only shown that the wheat grown in that country was superior to anything that can be produced in the United Kingdom, but that can be produced in any other country. Under these circumstances, especially considering the very low price to which wheat has fallen, it is of very great advantage to have the best article produced, so that it can command a higher price than that of any other country. The red Fife wheat of Manitoba and the North-west commands a higher price at the great wheat mart in Chicago than any other wheat except that grown immediately alongside the Canadian boundary, because it is required for the purpose of mixing with other grain and giving lasting qualities to the flour. Under these circumstances, I am sure there is no subject to which the Government can turn their attention with greater advantage as regards its progress and prosperity, than this of immigration. I quite agree in what the hon. First Minister has said with regard to immigration from France. I do not think that is very likely to result in any very great development, because the population of France does not increase. It is absolutely stationary, but there is no doubt that immigrants from rural portions of France would be well adapted to succeed in Manitoba and the North-west, if they could be induced to go there. There is a good prospect in Belgium, which is an exceedingly overcrowded country, and also in Norway and Sweden, whose people are well adapted, by the character of their climate, for settlement in Canada, and the direct communication that has now been established between France and Belgium and this country will, no doubt, facilitate a larger amount of immigration from these countries. I only wish again to express my gratification at the determination evinced by the Government to do everything possible to promote that which I regard as one of the first and most important means of the rapid development of Canada.

Mr. DAVIN. I hope the hon. First Minister will ponder what my hon. friend the member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) has suggested. That hon. gentleman very properly suggested that Icelandic immigration would be an advantage to Manitoba, and, for that matter, to the North-west Territories. In that connection, I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that our German immigrants from all parts of Germany and from Southern Russia have proved most successful settlers. We have in Assiniboia several colonies of these settlers, successful, thrifty, careful and prosperous. They, in fact, will solve problems that hardly any other immigrants will solve, owing to their wonderful carefulness and thrift and strong sense of the value of money. What I would specially impress on the hon. First Minister is what my hon. friend from Lisgar has advocated, namely, to throw off the duty on implements and on everything the agriculturists buy, and that I have continually been urging in this House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You have not voted that way.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman is entirely wrong. I would be very sorry to put the House to the trouble, but the only way one can prove a negative in regard to a statement like that is by the exhaustive process. And, if any hon. gentleman dares to persist in the statement, I will come here and, on the motion to go into Supply, bring up every motion, and every speech, and every vote of mine in this House for the last ten years.

The PRIME MINISTER. Oh, it is not true, it is not true; we take it all back.

Mr. DAVIN. Then, I will never hear that again. No doubt, my hon. friend made that statement in good faith, but he is thus echoing a mere newspaper joke; he does not pretend to have gone over my votes, and he stated to me himself in his own office, when I returned from this House, his appreciation of the way I had fought for the North-west in this House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That must have been a joke.

Mr. DAVIN. No, it was on the eve of the election of 1891, and the hon. gentleman explained to me that my career in the House would secure me an overwhelming majority, which it did.

An hon. MEMBER. A majority of one.

Mr. DAVIN. No; I had, in 1891, a majority of 327, and as to the majority of one, we have heard that joke before, and we have heard it applied to the colleague of my hon. friend from Lisgar, the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Macdonnell), who has a majority of one. This joke about majorities, as marking the efficiency of a member of Parliament, shows the grossest possible ignorance of parliamentary representation. The idea, evidently, in the minds of some hon. gentlemen is that the efficiency of the representative in Parliament is in exact ratio to the size of his majority. If that were so, in what a poor condition, considered in his representative capacity, would my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver) be at present. My hon. friend boasts of his big majority, but his predecessor had a majority nearly three times as large, certainly twice as large, and it would be absurd to say that Mr. Davis, who is no longer a member of this House, was a double-barrelled representative, as compared with the present representative of Alberta. Go to the history of England, go to such men as Lord Palmerston and Sir Robert Peel, and what do we find? We find that such men, the most representative men that England ever produced, choosing some little pocket borough, with about 120 electors, to send them to Parliament. The fact is that remarks of that kind are rooted in—well, I was going to use language that my hon. friend might consider a little too strong—but they are certainly not rooted in parliamentary knowledge or parliamentary decorum. I have pressed upon the House and upon the hon. gentleman who now leads the House, the importance, in the interests of the North-west, of admitting free, if possible, or as low as possible, everything the farmer uses.

Mr. MCGREGOR. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. I am very glad to hear that cheer. And I have a motion on the paper to that effect, and, if I could have got one of the independent members of the House to second that motion, I would have moved it before now.

Mr. LAURIER. Why not find a seconder on your own side?

Mr. DAVIN. That would not have the same significance, and besides some of my political friends do not agree with the motion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. That is perfectly true and perfectly frank on my part. But let me say here, Sir, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) has in his Ministry gentlemen who contended that we should have coal oil free. I have at the present time letters from the North-west Territories from influential men there, urging me to press this upon the Government. And, mind, these letters are from supporters of the leader of the Government. Take, for instance, the case of the Medicine Hat "Times." That paper is edited by a Reformer, and several of those who own it, are Reformers—it is owned by a kind of commission. That paper has an article in regard to a motion or speech of mine, I have forgotten which, in which it urges me to press upon the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) to let coal oil in free. There would be no disturbance and, as my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) has pointed out the abolition of this duty would be a powerful means of securing immigration. My hon. friend from Lisgar expresses the hope that next session implements will be admitted free. But, if implements are to be admitted free, I have heard no explanation, and no explanation can be given, and human reason is incapable of finding an excuse, why they should not be let in free this session. Reverting to the question of the duty on coal oil—suppose that duty is to be greatly reduced. I remember that when the present Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) sat here beneath me, and we were pressing certain matters upon the House, the hon. gentleman would call out that coal oil was one of the necessities of life. There, Sir, the hon. leader of the Government has the opinion of his Postmaster General that coal oil is one of the necessities of life; let him admit it free. The hon. member for Lisgar tells him that it would be a powerful means of bringing in immigration to let agricultural implements in free. Very well, then let them in free. An irregular committee, not at all official, therefore there is no impropriety in my referring to it, was formed of gentlemen who are members of this House to make a report that should be submitted to our agriculture committee and that has been published in the papers. That report is signed by gentlemen not one of whom belongs to the Conservative party. They are all Reformers or independents. One of them is the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and another the Patron candidate in this House, while another is my friend and colleague from Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas), the last named being in fact chairman of the committee. And what do they also recommend as well calculated to promote immigration to the North-west? They want the hon. gentleman to have a policy of extended creamery support such as I have, again and again, advocated in this House and in regard to which I advocated action this session; they want also to have the duties lowered or taken off all those things that a farmer consumes; they want to have their freight rates dealt with just as we have urged sometimes also, and they also want a large and grand system of cold storage that, by and by, will be brought before this House. All these things, I grant cannot be done this session. But there are some things that, even at this late period of the session the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) could do, especially as we have the recommendation of the names of the hon. member for North Simcoe, the hon. member for East Assiniboia and the Patron candidate in this House, all of whom support by their votes the leader of this House. They say, with the view to having this done this session they took the somewhat irregular course they did. And one of the things they recommend is what my hon. friend from Lisgar has very properly and very effectively advocated, namely, to admit free into the North-west Territories whatever the farmer buys. So that I would urge on my hon. friend, although late in the session, to give weight to the views expressed by this irregular committee. And I am glad to find that these views are being taken up. I do not care who takes them up; I do not care from which side the propositions I approve come, they will have my support. But sometimes at a previous period it seemed to me that when I was advocating these things I was pouring water upon sand, but it appears now that it was out of a golden pitcher. Now, having the support of hon. gentlemen, and as that support is not confined to one or two, and as the same thing is urged from this side also, I trust he will let coal oil in free and do it this session, and that he will let implements in free and do it this session.

Mr. FRASER. I think it is unfair to the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) that there should be remarks about his inconsistency. We have an example to-night in this speech of his, which is so perfectly consistent with his vote of last night.

Mr. DAVIN. You could not have followed my speech of last night.

Mr. FRASER. I care not for the speech; I look at the vote. I know you cannot decide what the hon. gentleman's speech has been by his vote, nor can you decide what his vote will be by his speech, except upon the principle that they are invariably at variance. But how he can rise, after the vote he gave last night and ask for legislation he speaks of in the abolition of the duty on agricultural implements and coal oil passes my comprehension. How can he pretend to consistency? The truth is a man cannot be a protectionist and a free trader at the same time, and when the hon. gentleman attempts to make one kind of speech for his constituents and then give the other kind of vote in this House, what can be the result except the exhibition we have to-night? One would almost be led to suppose that there must be a protest against him and he fears that the election will be voided, because his was an ad hoc argument so far as the North-west is concerned. He is a good enough logician to understand that it is a good thing for the North-west and a good thing for Canada that these changes should be made in the tariff. But if this is done, what becomes of the fiscal system he has always supported, the system of protection?

Now, the question of immigration to the North-west, and not only to the North-west, but to all the provinces is the most important that can engage the attention of this House. There is no other matter that both parties ought to be agreed upon more than on this, and I am sure that the facts of the case prove that the immigration policy of the late Government was one of the most doleful failures that ever were known in any country. I agree with the hon. gentleman in his description of the class of people that ought to come into this country. But the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite has made that country what it is. They started in by giving to speculative companies immense tracts of land. They gave men to understand that if they went up there they could have large areas of land, and make fortunes, and return again. They forget that the principle underlying emigration ought to be that men should go to a country as their home, there to take up a piece of land, to engage in its culture, and by the accretions of year by year, do what is done in the older provinces adding to their wealth by littles, and thus make a stable population. The effect was the very opposite. I am only speaking for myself, but we must retrace all our steps in this matter, and free every acre of land in the North-west, and give it to the people. For myself I am ready, as a member of this House, although the constituency from which I come is not as much interested in the matter as are others, to vote that it shall be ascertained upon equitable terms what amount of cash all these companies have really put into the lands they own in the North-west, and that this country shall pay it.

Mr. DAVIN. What companies ?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). All the companies, colonization companies, every company that got land up there.

Mr. DAVIN. Will the hon. gentleman name a colonization company that has land in the North-west ?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I mean the whole country.

Mr. DAVIN. Name a single colonization company that has land in either place.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that there is no company in Manitoba or the North-west that has any land there now ?

Mr. DAVIN. I mean to say that you cannot name one.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). And that proves his case, because he may know the names and I may not.

Mr. DAVIN. It proves you are talking about something of which you do not know anything.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). That may be, but the hon. gentleman has sense enough not to say that there are no such companies. I made the statement that there are companies there who hold land, the Canada and North-west Land Company.

Mr. DAVIN. Is that a colonization company ?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). The boldness of the hon. gentleman is the natural outgrowth of the vagaries in which he indulged a little while ago. Although I may not be able when asked to give the names of the companies, that proves nothing. If I had a short time to look up the names, I could find them. But I say it was wrong in principle to bind up the land, and I stated that as a member of the House I was ready to vote to every company, railway company or otherwise, that had any land in the North-west so bound up, the actual money they put into it in order that it might be made free to the people. What else can we do that will make that country great and prosperous except to free the land and open it to settlers ? I would even go further as the best relief, and would assist immigration to that country. I would assist it, not by the miserable methods of the past, but I would even give immigrants supplies for a year or two, and they could pay it back. Aye, more, I would invite Canadians that are now in the United States to come back, and I would give them land up there to settle on, and would see to it, as I think this House ought to see to it, that in place of the land being put in large quantities into the hands of a certain number of men, we should put it into the hands of individual proprietors, individual farmers, as the only mode by which you can bring up that country and make it great. We have been moving in the opposite direction, but I am glad that we have now a tribute to the policy of this side of the House from the hon. gentleman himself. He says that he agrees with the hon. member who has just spoken that the only way to make that country prosperous is to take the duties off these articles. That is nothing new to this side of the House. We have always maintained it.

Mr. COCHRANE. Do you carry it out ?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). We will carry it out, there is no question about it. But does the hon. gentleman who put the question think it is a good thing ? Does he agree with the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) that that would help the settlers in the North-west ? If so, he is bound as a true Canadian to help the land out there. The fact that we may not be able to do all that some may want, on account of the burdens that are laid upon us, is no reason why we should not go in that direction. I believe that the policy of any government in this country for the next ten, fifteen or twenty years, ought to be largely in the line of getting people into this country. Fancy this mighty Dominion with only one acre out of every hundred occupied ! We have been all the time thinking about other things, and neglecting the great truth that if we have men at work upon the land, we are laying the foundations of wealth and greatness. I should be ready to vote any reasonable sum to be wisely applied in bringing people into Canada ; and I rejoice to know the semi-conversion of my hon. friend to the good Liberal doctrine that a reduction in the tariff will help the settlement of that country. I hope that ere long the light may shine more fully upon his mind, and that he will be more fully alive to this question. That great country from which the hon. member comes, Manitoba, the North-west and British Columbia, are the hope of this Dominion, and if they fail, Canada fails. I have no hesitation, after having seen that country, in coming to this conclusion. The efforts of this Government should be directed to see that any one who has any idea of leaving Canada, should go up to the North-west as the best place in which to settle; and that all nations—and here I must of course, in deference to the better judgment of others, make an exception—but that all those who are willing to labour, should be invited to come to this country. One of the ways to attract them is to reduce the tariff. Let us make this country a cheap country to live in, so that any farmer who goes to the North-west shall find there a country in which the conditions of life are much better than to the south of us. Men will always go where they can do best. There may be a whim of going where they have friends, but it may be said that wherever men know that their condition is going to be best, they are going to that place. I congratulate the hon. gentleman on his partial conversion, and hope that he will go in the same direction until he and I work together to free that great land as much as possible of the burdens that are now upon it. But let me suggest to him that when a vote comes on such as that of last night, with a possibility of such a discussion as this, he should consider which side he is going to take, so as not to take both sides.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman has given a speech that would be very proper in a debating society. The fallacy which runs through the first part of the speech, so far as it refers to my opinions, is the assumption that it is a Liberal policy to let agricultural implements in free.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I beg your pardon, I spoke for myself.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman spoke for himself. He talks of my conversion to Liberal views, and it was a mere idea that floated vaguely through his brain. Now, I do not care on what principle any government thinks it is acting, if it gives us implements free, I shall welcome it. I cannot, for the life of me, understand how a Minister preparing a tariff on the principle of a tariff for revenue only could make exceptions such as I want made. But I hold that a protectionist could make those exceptions, for this reason, that he looks at the tariff partly with the view of raising a revenue, but partly also with a view to developing the industries of the country, and, if you convince him that the farmers of the country, or of any section, who are the primal manufacturers, will be benefited, by any exceptional course—and let it be remembered that the proposal made in regard to creameries seems now about to be adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite, all of which proposals are exceptions to the general order of things—a protectionist could consistently make the exceptions, but, if a Minister sits down to frame a tariff for revenue only. I do not see how the exceptions can be made that I want carried out. If the Finance Minister makes them, and I do not care whether they are inconsistent or not, I shall welcome the deed. I should like to inquire where my supposed inconsistency arose. Reference was made to my vote last night. What did the resolution moved by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) ask that was inconsistent in holding the principles of protection or even the principles of a revenue tariff? I do not see how the economic theories necessarily should affect our views in regard to the main provisions of the motion moved by my hon. friend. The gist of that motion was, that, if you are going to make a change in the tariff, and suppose you are going to adopt a revenue tariff four or five months hence, the Government should state the principles on which they would proceed and that they were going to prepare a revenue tariff; if, on the other hand, they resolve to adhere to the present tariff in principle, and make such modifications, they should say so. That was practically the motion submitted by the hon. member for York, and I am in the sense of the House, when I say that a more audacious proposition could not be laid down than that voting for that proposition was inconsistent with the views I take on this subject. I differ, I know well I have always differed, with hon. members of the party with which I act, in respect to my views of what protection should be.

The PRIME MINISTER. Scientific protection.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, I believe in scientific protection. For instance, when Sir Leonard Tilley first brought down his Budget, I at once wrote a letter to the "Mail," pointing out that, in my opinion—and I hold the view still—the only way, and the proper way, to protect iron is by a bonus. I differed from the whole of the party. If I had to protect raw material like iron, I would protect it by a bonus, and I would do so because, while it is of the utmost importance to develop the iron industry of the country, at the same time it is equally important that an article which constitutes the raw material of hundreds of industries and manufactures should come in free. That is a view I stated as far back as 1879. The hon. gentleman who accuses me of inconsistency, speaks as if it was a new idea to pick up the odd sections once more and appropriate them by the Dominion, in fact buying them back again. All the hon. gentleman has to do is to look at the paper I was editing in 1885, before I had the honour of a seat in this House, when I propounded that as a policy in an article written at that time. Afterwards, a paper called the "Call" took it up, and subsequently some hon. members came to think there was something in it. At the present time you could not get either party to take it up, but within a few years it will be taken up and then, as always occurs in these cases, it will be considered a statesmanlike policy.

An hon. MEMBER. Louder.

Mr. DAVIN. If the hon. gentleman who says "Louder," will tell me where he is, I will pitch my voice in his direction. I am glad he is very anxious to catch all the words of wisdom I am endeavouring to utter on his behalf. I ventured to interrupt the hon. gentleman, because he assumed a tone of great authority and talked of the colonization companies and all the land they own in the North-west. Colonization Company is a technical term that applies to a large number of companies which came into existence fourteen or fifteen years ago. The hon. gentleman spoke of those companies having a large quantity of land, but, with the exception of a few, all of those companies have disappeared, and most of the land has gone back into the possession of the Government. I may tell a story here that is historical and sheds some light on the perspicacity and foresight of the illustrious leader of the Conservative party, Sir John Macdonald. When the Bill for the formation of colonization companies was before this House, I happened to have the honour of a conversation with Sir John. I said: "Is not this a serious policy, a grave thing to bring all these companies into existence? Look at the quantity of land that would be locked up." He said: "Have you read the agreement they make with the Government?" I said: "I have looked into it." He said: "Read it again. It is impossible that those gentlemen could make a cent under that agreement. They wish to get land under those conditions. We will give it to them, and they will act as immigration agents; but, in the end, all the land will revert to the Government." Most of it has so reverted. So much for the knowledge on this subject which the hon. gentleman who spoke in the ex-cathedra manner possessed. I do not think he is fully aware of all that has been done in the past in respect to immigration. He spoke of the way he would assist immigrants. The assisting of immigration in the way he seems to indicate—he did not go into details—is a very difficult matter, especially to give immigrants direct assistance. We have had several schemes in the past in regard to that matter, and one after another has been abandoned. The best assistance we can give immigration is to spend what money we can in supplementing the extraordinary capacities of nature in the North-west, in order to make that country an inviting country for immigrants from every part of the world. It is a country of boundless resources, of boundless fertility, as the hon. leader of the Opposition has said; but there are peculiarities in it as there have been in other new countries. And I have no doubt that by the expenditure of money in different parts of those territories, not merely can they be made more attractive to immigrants than they are at the present time, but land, which at the present time is comparatively low in value, can be increased by square and cube multiplications and brought to the utmost limit of fertility and attractiveness, compared with which its advantages in these respects at present are small. I have been waiting for the Minister of the Interior to enter the Cabinet, so that the House might learn what he would propose to do. If the hon. gentleman who takes temporary charge of that department, were Minister, I have no doubt he would be equal to all the needs of the department. I know well from experience that no locum tenens, no temporary Minister can inaugurate any policy. I should like to have had assurances from the Government, that this very year they will take steps in the direction of irrigation, such as during several sessions past I have advocated in this House. If you go west in the Territories, one system of irrigation could be used with ten-fold returns for the money that you spend. The plains between Moose Jaw and Regina are the most fruitful that the eye of man ever rested upon, and the grasses are as rich as the eye of man has seen.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Oh, we are sick and tired of that kind of talk.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman is not a North-west man.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). No, I am not.

Mr. DAVIN. I know he is not. If the hon. gentleman will withdraw to the rookery to which he belongs I shall be very glad.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). You are talking all the time.

Mr. DAVIN. I say, Sir, that there we have the richest possible soil, and yet up to the present time we have not solved the question of finding water. I say that it is the bounden duty of the Department of the Interior to take the money that is due to the North-west Territories by right, if the grant were based on the same calculation as money is given to Manitoba; it is its duty to spend that money on works and improvements in the North-west Territories, which will make the lands there still more productive to the immigrants. Now, Mr. Chairman, I revert to the proposal of my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) and I hope that even this session—I do not care whether it is on Liberal ground or protective ground they do it—the Government will carry out the policy of the present Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) when he was in opposition, and let coal oil and farm implements into the North-west Territories free of duty. I assure the Premier, as my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) has assured him, that if that is done it will contribute to the effectiveness of any immigration scheme he may propose.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I owe the House an apology for having spoken, because I started the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) afresh. All I have to say is, that I was correct in my statement that the land is owned at present to a certain extent by these colonization companies. Perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) is not aware, that while the colonization companies have closed the contracts with the Government, yet they took up large areas of land for the essential part of the settlement and now hold it.

Mr. DAVIN. No.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). The hon. gentleman then does not know very much about the North-west.

Mr. DAVIN. One after another disappeared.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). One after another did not disappear, except on the terms of getting large slices of land.

Mr. DAVIN. No.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). If the hon. gentleman stakes his reputation to that as a member from the North-west I will produce the agreements from the department.

Mr. DAVIN. You can produce an insignificant fraction.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Indeed. I said that they took large areas of land before they gave up, so that it is not as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) said, that the wise statesman, his leader, made companies leave the country.

Mr. DAVIN. He said the land would revert to the Government.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). And therefore the companies must leave the country, because they would have no existence, except as land companies.

Mr. DAVIN. What he meant was that these colonization companies would not succeed.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Then, if they were foredoomed to failure it did not show much statesmanship to give them an existence.

Mr. DAVIN. They did act as an immigration agency.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). The hon. gentleman was wrong and I was correct in what I stated.

Mr. DAVIN. No.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). If the hon. gentleman likes he can go to the department and learn about it.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. DAVIN. I know exactly what has happened and I understand all that.

Mr. BRITTON. It was part of the policy of the late Government to send a person from Canada to the two Dakotas and other western states, to induce some persons who had failed there on account of blizzards and one thing and another, to settle in Manitoba. Amongst those agents they had a Captain Holmes employed. I would like to know if Captain Holmes is still in the employ of the Dominion Government, and if so, on what terms? I find that in the year ending 30th June, 1895, he was paid I think $2,200. I want to say here, that that gentleman had altogether too much versatility of talent, and was a person of too great ubiquity to be employed in the service. He was often found in Ontario doing other work for the late Government than persuading the discontented settlers from the Dakotas to come to Manitoba. It is a matter of importance to hon. gentlemen to know whether he is still in the employ of the Dominion Government.

Mr. DOBELL. Mr. Holmes is no longer in the employ of the Government.

Mr. OLIVER. I wish to say something, Sir, on this question of immigration. It is a matter which interests the whole House, but which probably interests members from Manitoba and the North-west more especially than it does other hon. gentlemen. It is perhaps on the principle that those who know the least are best qualified to speak on certain subjects, that most of the talk in regard to this question to-night has been done by others than members who are particularly interested in it. I shall venture to occupy the time of the House for a few minutes. As to the statement made by the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Davin) in regard to colonization companies, I think he said there was only one of these companies whose land has not reverted to the Crown.

Mr. DAVIN. Only one or two.

Mr. OLIVER. How many then?

Mr. DAVIN. A mere fraction of the colonization companies that were brought into existence.

Mr. OLIVER. I think the hon. gentleman said one. Would he mind mentioning what one that is?

Mr. DAVIN. I can mention it if the hon. gentleman likes. It was the Yorkton Company.

Mr. OLIVER. Well, I can mention another one.

Mr. DAVIN. I dare say you can.

Mr. OLIVER. And I could mention still another one, and a number more could be mentioned also. However, that is not the point just now. I want to draw attention to the condition of affairs resulting from these grants, and to state just exactly how they have affected immigration. One grant was made to the Edmonton and Saskatchewan Land Company, of four townships which were situated exactly in the heart of the settlement that already existed in that country. The town of Edmonton is 20 miles distant from Fort Saskatchewan. The country was more or less settled in the neighbourhood of these towns. Those four townships were immediately between these towns, and each of the four townships was already partially settled. But upon the colonization company taking possession of their lands, notice was issued to the settlers upon those lands that they would have to vacate. That was the first act of that colonization company; and there is a gentleman employed in the offices in these buildings who was connected with that transaction and was present at the time. The duty devolved upon me on that occasion to do what little I could to protect the settlers from this alleged colonization company which, so far from bringing in settlers, in fact ordered those settlers off the land which they had themselves improved. This is one sample of the policy for which the hon. gentleman gave so much credit to the gentleman who led this Government for so many years. This colonization company retained possession of that land for a number of years. They never made the first attempt to put any settlers upon it, and when, as time rolled on, they did not wish to complete their agreement with the Government and make their final payments on the land, so far from that land reverting back to the Crown and becoming available for homestead settlement, the Government made an arrangement with them whereby they were allowed to purchase absolutely and outright as much of that land as the money they had already paid on it and the money they had already expended on improvements on their own behalf, would pay for at the rate of one dollar per acre; while the ordinary homesteader who has not completed his homestead duties is driven off the land if you like, or is deprived of it without compensation, and I will not say but justly so. But the case is very different in dealing with this speculative company, which was not a colonization company at all. The very money which they had laid out to break the land and build and erect buildings for themselves was credited to them in payment for the land at one dollar per acre, when the selling price of the same land at the same time to any body else was two dollars per acre, if not three dollars. That company dissolved as a company; but the men who composed it at that time still hold that land in the heart of the settlement. They hold it at a price which has prevented settlement from that day to this; and there is every evidence that they will continue to hold it, because just as the value of the land rises their prices rise; so that up to date they have practically sold none of it, although it has been saleable at a fair rate. As soon as its value rose to five dollars an acre, they raised their price to six dollars; and to-day that land remains unsettled in one of the most thickly settled districts in Manitoba or the North-west Territories. That is a sample of the immigration policy of the late Government. What was done at Edmonton was done at Red Deer, 100 miles south of Edmonton, by the Saskatchewan Land and Homestead Company, so-called. That company is holding land there to-day, being the absolute owners of it, and thereby preventing settlement upon it, and it is considered by the settlers of that locality to be one of the greatest obstacles to settlement in the district. The gentlemen who have spoken here on the subject of immigration lay rather more stress on the tariff side of it than is absolutely necessary. That is one side of the question, and it is a very important factor in the case, but it is not everything. I am not able to describe to this House in the words in which it should be described, the policy that has been pursued during the past sixteen years by the late Government in regard to the settlement of that country. It is not in one or two or three particulars, but it is in all particulars. The very first proposition which closes from settlement 20 out of the 36 sections in every township of the Territories, leaving only 16 sections available for homestead settlers, is enough for a beginner. You can easily see what a valuable proposition that is to secure settlement. It may be said that this is done to provide land grants for railroads. We will admit that it is, if you grant the land to the railroad when the railroad has earned it; but in every part of those North-west Territories where there is no railroad, and where there is no prospect of there being a railroad, that land is still reserved from settlement to encourage railroads, and to encourage the settlement of the country if you please. You encourage the settlement of the country by keeping more than half of it closed from settlement. That is another feature of the policy pursued by the late Government. Now, it is not only the statutes in regard to the administration of the lands of the Territories that has been objectionable, but the administration itself. I say that Administration—and I can give particulars to the House if the House requires them—has been distinctly against the settler on every pretext. In every case in which a question arose between the settler and any other interest, the decision was against the settler. I can prove that the law has been twisted and defied in order to strike the settlers; and it is the law, and the administration of the law more than the law itself, that has made a change in the representation of those Territories from four Conservatives to practically four Liberals. The House may account for that change in any way it pleases; but I say that it is the administration of the affairs of the North-west in regard to the settlers that has to a great extent brought about the change. Besides the administration of the lands, there is the matter of railroad rates. I say—and I think all the members representing both Manitoba and the Territories will agree with me—that the question of railroad rates is the great question in that country. It is the question that has militated most strongly against its settlement; and any proposition to deal with the country which does not include a proposition to deal with the question of railroad rates is not going to be thoroughly effective. I am not going to deal with figures to-night, because there is not time, but they are available in the records of this House, and should have been printed a year ago. I hope they will be printed before another year, so that everybody may see them for himself. The evidence was put in and it cost the country plenty to get it, and then it was practically suppressed after it was obtained.

There is one condition required in all countries which depend upon railway communication for their trade and commerce, and that is competitive rates. That is the condition of England, and in eastern Canada and in every other civilized country, except the North-west Territories, and the reason why there is no competition there is because it was the settled policy of the late Administration not to allow it. The policy of that Administration was to prevent and not to assist railway competition in the North-west. They accomplished their purpose effectually, and the result is what has been stated. If there is a reason for an acrimonious discussion in this House with regard to immigration, that reason is the policy of railway monopoly in the Territories which has been followed by the late Government. We must have railway competition or we cannot have prosperity, especially in that country, above all other parts of the Dominion, where the railroad haul is so great and where railway freights eat up a greater proportion of the value of farm products than do the railways in any other part of the country. I do not wish to go any further with that side of the question at present, but I am prepared to bring the proofs of the facts I have stated before the House if necessary.

I would ask what proportion of the grant of last year was expended in England, in the United States and in Canada, and on what service?

Mr. DOBELL. I should think about $30,000 in Great Britain and $30,000 in the United States.

Mr. OLIVER. On what services was that amount expended in Great Britain?

Mr. DOBELL. On agents' travelling expenses, delivering lectures, and paying bonuses to the agents of steamship companies. Every steamship agent gets so much per immigrant brought out by his company.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask this House have the results of our immigration agencies in the old country justified that expenditure? Whatever the theory may be, the result has not justified one dollar of it. In my judgment, the system pursued is such that it could not, by any possibility, produce good results. When you simply send agents to the shipping ports of England to secure passengers for a certain line of steamships and pay those agents at so much per head, the only result you obtain is that you help people to come from England to the States through Canada. That is why our immigration returns are not borne out by the results in our population, because what are entered in the returns as immigrants to Canada are really passengers through Canada to the United States, whose expenses are partly paid by the Canadian taxpayer. Such a system is a disgrace. It is simply another means of bonussing the corporation who run the steamships, and is not entitled to be considered as part of an immigration policy. I would ask the hon. gentleman on what services the money spent in the United States was expended?

Mr. DOBELL. Payments of agents entirely.

Mr. OLIVER. No assisted passages?

Mr. DOBELL. No.

Mr. OLIVER. I shall not discuss that matter. Very likely it is a proper policy to have agents in the United States, and while there might be some little difference of opinion as to the policy, I shall not say that it was not a proper policy, and that it has not given certain results. One of the results is that we have got in a good many people who are not very well fixed to stay in after they get here, and as a consequence a good many of them are going out again. However, I do not propose to discuss that feature of the case very much. The point I want to make is this. People who come from the United States to the North-west get a rate of one cent a mile from any part of the United States to any part of Canada. I was under the impression that rate was controlled by the Government and was due partly to Government assistance, but I find I am mistaken, and it is therefore a matter with which the Government have nothing to do. But there is a very strong feeling in the North-west that there is something unfortunate and undesirable in a condition of affairs that assists a man to come from any part of the United States at a cent per mile for transport while the better man from the eastern provinces of Canada, has to pay a rate of three, four or five cents, with the same proportion of difference in the transport of his effects. It is known that people in the eastern provinces of Canada who wish to go to the North-west, have taken passage to points in the United States, and then have secured the cent-a-mile rate to the North-west. Now, that is a very peculiar condition of affairs. If the Government is not responsible for it, we should not hold them responsible; but we think the condition is so peculiar as to call for attention on the part of the Government, in order to remove the discrimination that seems to exist in favour of outsiders against our own people. It has been stated in this House, and it cannot be denied, that there is from year to year an overflow of population from the eastern provinces of Canada. That overflow may be due to one cause, or it may be due to another. I will not argue now what the cause is: I do not know that it is worth while in this connection to argue that out. But the fact is that that overflow of population is by all odds the most desirable immigration that can possibly go to the North-west; these are the people who will do more good to themselves in the North-west than any others, who will do more good to the North-west than any others, and who will do more good to the Dominion by settling in the North-west than any others. That we have this condition of affairs existing, we know, and we know that it has existed for thirty years or more. And, unfortunately, there seems a probability of its continuing to exist. But, if we consider it desirable to settle the North-west, we should consider the desirability of settling it with the overflow of our own people. It is to this feature of the policy of the late Government that I desire to call attention. It is now many years ago that I read in the report of the Department of the Interior the statement that it was not the policy of the Government to encourage the removal of people from one province of the Dominion to another, or from one part of the Dominion to another. I say that as long as the Government of the country sees fit to ignore the loss of population which the country suffers from year to year on one hand, and the desirability of using that population in settling our own country, and the possibility of directing it to our own country on the other hand, we cannot expect success in the settlement of our own country. If we want people there, our own people are the best that we can have; and it is surely better for us, if they are going to leave us, that they should be producers in our own country and assist in enlarging the market of our merchants and manufacturers in the eastern provinces and assist as taxpayers in bearing the burdens of the whole Dominion, than that they should cross the line into the United States, which the greater portion of them do, I fear, where they cease to have any part in bearing the burdens of the Dominion or enlarging the markets for the eastern part of the Dominion. This, I think, was probably the worst feature of the immigration policy of the late Government; and that is a point I would like to press upon the new Government, not merely as a matter simply of immigration, but as a matter of what you might call, I suppose, high politics. That western part of the country is capable of supporting a very much greater population than the eastern part is. It is practically divided from this eastern country by a tract which is not capable of settlement; cut off as it were; it is in another country. Unless that country is settled up by our own people, people who are of the same kin as you, who have the same social ideas, the same political institutions, the same political aspirations—unless that country is settled up by such people, at least in sufficient numbers to control it, then, Mr. Chairman, you cannot control it, and it will not remain always a part of this Dominion. This is a state of things I would like the new Government to take into consideration. It is a matter of the utmost necessity for the binding together and building up of this Dominion that there should be a strong settlement from the eastern provinces of Canada in the North-west, because that is the only guarantee that we have that it shall remain part of Canada, the only means of cementing the eastern and western parts of Canada together. Now, I know how strongly this idea has been resented in these eastern provinces. I know how it has been said that the North-west is ruining the country, not only by reason of the expenditure it causes, but by reason of its being a competitor with the eastern producer. I say you can put this consideration to one side and look at the greater consideration; if you want the help of that country, you have to put in a nucleus of your own people. So far as the competition is concerned, you have the competition of the Western States. It is the competition of those states that has worked whatever injury that has been worked in the matter of your production. It is the fact of our people having gone to the Western States that has caused the loss that has occurred. Therefore, you cannot lose in the matter of competition by sending your people to the North-west, and, on the other hand, you are bound to gain, because every settler who goes to the North-west, by reason of the wider opportunities afforded him there, becomes necessarily of more value to this Dominion than if he had remained in the east. It is a well-known fact that a given number of producers in Manitoba produce a greater amount of wealth if not for themselves for the Dominion than an equal number of producers in any other part of the country. So, I say, the removal of a farmer from Ontario to Manitoba is not a loss to the Dominion on that account; and, when you consider that, if he did not remove from Ontario to Manitoba, he would remove from Ontario to the United States, I ask you to consider the amount of gain as compared with that case. This is the side of the immigration question

I wished to put before the House to-night, and I took this opportunity to do it. I hope hon. members will give this matter the fullest consideration, aside from party politics. I am prepared to argue out the partisan questions that arise as such; but this is not a party, it is a national, question.

Mr. BOSTOCK. I do not wish to detain the House long, but I wish to point out one or two matters in connection with British Columbia which I think should be brought to the attention of the Government, as to the Government's policy in regard to what is known as the railway belt in British Columbia. Although that railway belt has been in the hands of the Dominion for some years, there are large portions, which could be settled by very desirable settlers, but that the land has not been surveyed, as it ought to have been. The settlers going in there are placed at a great disadvantage. They are in this position—they have to go on the land without being able to find out what section they are on, and they do not know, when they start in to improve the land by putting up a house, and so on, but that, when the survey line is run, it will divide one portion of their location from another, and they thus will be obliged to choose between their house and their cultivated land. This has militated against the settlement of the valleys in British Columbia, and it is a very important matter in that country that we should get the valleys settled up and brought into cultivation, so that they may supply the mining camps that are being opened up every day.

I want to impress on the Government the necessity of their examining into the question of the lands through that railway belt at the present time. Another thing that is keeping that country back is the question of town sites in the settled lands that were held in that railway belt. There was a dispute between the provincial government and the Dominion Government that does not even yet seem to be satisfactorily settled, and the people who want to obtain land are not able to do so at present. Now, the policy that will best suit that country and bring immigration into it, will be a policy for the development of the country. The tariff policy does not affect largely the settlers at the present time. We have first to get the settlers in there, and in order to do that we must have a proper survey of the country so that they can take up land. Then when we have opened up the country by means of railways and made it possible for the settlers in the valleys to get their produce to the mines, we shall have no difficulty in getting people to go into that country. At present it is difficult for the settlers to get their produce into the mines and sell it at a reasonable price. I was very much surprised the last time I went down to the Kootenay country to find a large number of farmers going in there from

Mr. OLIVER.

Edmonton and that part of the North-west, and the reason was that they found they could not send their produce into Kootenay at reasonable rates, and consequently they had given up their farms in the Edmonton district and were going down into the mining country. Now, that class of people do not make good miners, but they understand all about farming, and if we can bring these people into communication with the mines so that they can sell their produce, we shall have no difficulty in developing that country.

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). It is not my intention to occupy the time of the House long this evening, because there is no hon. member present who wishes more earnestly than I do that this session should come to a close. But some remarks were made by my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver) which I do not think ought to be allowed to go without, I won't say contradiction, but without reply or explanation. In the first place, I note that he complained very much that certain sections in each township were reserved from settlement. Now, being a western man like himself, I can only say that if, in the judgment of this House, it is possible to throw the whole of the land in the west open for free settlement by homestead entry, no one would be better pleased than myself, and I believe with him, that that would aid in settling that western country, and aid in its development. But unfortunately we have to consider the interests, not only of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, but also those of the older provinces of Canada; and the representatives in this House coming from the older provinces, outnumbering considerably those who represent the prairie section, will, I am afraid, hardly consent to give the whole of the land of the west to the settlers who go in there, and to supply the means which will be required to build railways through that country from the public treasury of Canada. My hon. friend must know, from having lived so long in the west, that it is useless to expect settlers to go into any part of the country which is unprovided with railway communication with the markets of the world, unless they have some reasonable expectation that these railway facilities will be provided in the near future. So far as I have been able to see during the three years I have had the honour of sitting in this House, there is no chance of persuading the representatives from the older provinces to grant subsidies to these railways sufficient to secure their construction, unless those subsidies are also supplemented by grants of land to aid in the construction of those railways, and to a certain extent to secure European or other capital with which to build them. As to the advisability of having all the western lands open, I most heartily agree with him; but I differ with him in the practicability of the scheme which he suggests.

The hon. gentleman went on to say that the administration of the land department in the west was what caused the change in the representation which has undoubtedly taken place in the Territories in the last election, as compared with that which held in 1891.

Mr. OLIVER. I said it was one of the causes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). I thought you said the main cause.

Mr. OLIVER. Well, I will let it go that way. I think the question of railway monopoly in my constituency, at any rate, was the main cause.

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). There is no doubt that as amended, my hon. friend's statement is not so far from the mark. There is no question that in Alberta when I went up there to work against my hon. friend—but very unsuccessfully I am sorry to say, though personally I am glad to see him in the House—that was one of the causes which was urged very strongly in favour of his candidature. But my hon. friend knows possibly better than I do, that the principal cause of his success in Alberta was the division in the Conservative party. He knows perfectly well what took place there in connection with the Conservative candidate. He knows that the division which existed in the convention that nominated a candidate, and the manner in which the convention was called, had more than anything else to do with my hon. friend's success—more than anything else except, possibly, the one point, the main point, on which he won his election, and that was the Manitoba school question. He knows that his stand on that question secured him the vote of hundreds of men who in the past had always voted Conservative, and who, when that question is once removed, whether it is removed by the genius of my hon. friend the leader of the Government, or by the natural course of events, will again fall back into the Conservative ranks.

Mr. OLIVER. Might I ask the hon. gentleman what particular class of people changed their political views on the Manitoba school question?

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). I am not in a position to state what particular class, but I do not hesitate to say that a large class of men who had always voted Conservative in the past, voted for him on this occasion. I mean members of what is known as the P. P. A., and some gentlemen who were strong members of the Orange body, and who, being carried away for the time being by their strong Protestant feelings, and by the belief which they held, unwarrantably, I think, that there was danger of the Church of Rome gaining undue power through the course of the Conservative Government when the last election took place, changed their views, and for their first time, cast their ballots for a Reform candidate.

The PRIME MINISTER. And will return a Conservative Government as soon as that question is settled.

Mr. OLIVER. I was not only indebted to the Orange order for a very good support, I must admit, although the chief did not happen to vote for me, but I also got a majority in the two French and one Scotch Catholic district.

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). I have no doubt, in fact I know, that what the hon. gentleman says is perfectly true. In the French Catholic districts they voted for him as a supporter of the hon. leader of the Government.

The PRIME MINISTER. Everybody was apparently displeased, the P.P.A., Orangemen and others.

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). I am afraid the result shows that everybody was not displeased with the hon. gentleman. My hon. friend's remark was too true. Let us look at other constituencies in the west. In so far as Western Assiniboia was concerned, the representative of that constituency in this House had to face a combination against him such as I believe no man who occupies a seat here had before him when called upon to meet the electors. He was opposed by a Patron candidate, who had support of the Reform party; he had the opposition of a large majority, or at all events, of a very great portion of the Orange body, because in this House my hon. friend voted for the Remedial Bill, and he had the opposition of the French Catholics, who supported my hon. friend the leader of the Government because he was of their race and of their creed, and I say it is not unnatural they did so. I am not finding fault with them, but I am simply giving it as an explanation. As regard Eastern Assiniboia, my hon. friend knows the trouble that arose there, the split in the party. Going to Saskatchewan, where the leader of the Government was a successful candidate, by a majority of 41, if I am not mistaken, the Conservatives had two candidates in the field, supporting the same party, but divided on the question of remedial legislation. The hon. gentleman knows that although the leader of the Government was elected by a majority of 41, an unsuccessful Conservative candidate polled over 200 votes, I think over 250 votes. So I think the reason of the success of the Reform party in the Northwest Territories is not far to seek, and we have not to look at the land laws or their administration for the reason.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What was the reason there were two candidates?

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). One was in favour of remedial legislation and the other was not.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). And opposed to the Government.

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). Opposed to the Government on that measure, but in full sympathy with them on the trade policy and on every other point except remedial legislation, but unalterably opposed to them on that particular subject. The next point my hon. friend took up was the question of freight rates, and he stated that so long as the present rates existed the North-west would either never fill up or would fill up very slowly. There is no question that the high rates of freight which prevail act as a deterrent to settlers going into the country. But we have to face this fact, that Winnipeg, which lies on the extreme eastern border of the prairie section of country and is the limit, lies between fourteen hundred and fifteen hundred miles from the seaboard. If you include the distance between Winnipeg and the Mountains you have to add from 900 to one thousand miles more, and if you go away up to Edmonton, where my hon. friend from Alberta lives, you have to add three hundred or four hundred miles additional. Now, we have to recognize this fact, that neither the Canadian Pacific Railway nor any other railway which now goes or hereafter may go into that country will be conducted on philanthropic principles; they will all be carried on as business enterprises; and the first thing the management of the road has to consider is to get such returns from working the road as will pay interest on its bonds, and then, if possible, leave some dividend to shareholders. I care not what the road is or how many roads you get into the country, they will all be governed by the same principle. In my opinion the only way to reduce freight rates is to construct a line of road to Hudson's Bay. Thereby you can get a short line to the sea. That affords a much shorter route for our agricultural products and cattle—ours is an agricultural country, and there is nothing but agricultural produce to export—and it would prove a much less costly route to the sea on account of the shorter distance. I am sorry to say that up to the present time the projected line of road to Hudson's Bay has received no support from the other side of the House. I hope that now my hon. friend is in power and has to consider the interests of the country as a whole and not merely to find flaws and faults in the policy of the Government, a new era will dawn, and we will find him in the near future an able and energetic supporter of an outlet by means of Hudson's Bay. Until we get that road built, I fear there is no chance of securing any material reduction in freight rates, and my hon. friend is right in saying that the high freight rates tell against immigration to the western country.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman has stated that no railway there would carry on its business on philanthropic principles, that the charges had to be heavy because the trade is not heavy and the distance long. If two roads were constructed, would the trade be heavier, the distance shorter, and the companies getting more returns?

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). If two roads started from the same point and ran to the same point, there would be no reduction in freight rates. We would simply see what we saw when the Northern Pacific was brought into Winnipeg by the province, when they handed over to the company the line built to the boundary. The new company entered into an arrangement with the railway already there, and the result was the adoption of a uniform rate of freight to any given point. History would simply repeat itself if another line were constructed under those conditions.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am asking for information.

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). But a very different state of things would arise if the Government would give support to a railway to Hudson's Bay, which would have a shorter line, and consequently, even though it charged the same rate per mile, would be able to carry the farm produce of the country at a much lower price.

The PRIME MINISTER. I understand the explanation.

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). Then there was another point my hon. friend (Mr. Dobell) alluded to, and I was rather glad to hear him mention, because it is the first time since the beginning of the session that I have seen the hon. gentleman from Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) who in this House represents the shadow of a shade of a Minister of the Interior which we have at the present time, take any real or lively interest in any matter concerning his Department of the Interior, and that was when he referred to the amounts paid to the steamship companies for bringing immigrants to this country. Then for one short moment my hon. friend did evince an interest in this question, and he explained very clearly why the steamship companies should get their bread money. I do not doubt, from the experience which the hon. gentleman from Quebec West has in steamship matters, that he fully appreciates the fact that it is to the advantage of the steamship companies as well as to the advantage of the country, that this money should be paid. I was quite glad to hear him explain to my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver), who seemed to be labouring under some misapprehension, the position of affairs in regard to assisted passages.

Now, my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver) has referred to the question of American settlers. I am glad to say that we have settlers from the other side coming into this country, and I was glad to hear him state that when they do come they form a very valuable class of the community. He stated, however, that many of them, when they came in, went out again. All I can say is, that in the great majority of cases they have gone to the Edmonton district, which he represents, a district which I believe to be one of the best and most fruitful in the west, but which labours under the one disadvantage of being far removed from a market. In all other respects that district possesses every attribute which a settler could desire. I was, however, sorry to hear the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) say, from his local knowledge I take it, that there was something in that country which drove settlers out. I am willing to believe that on this point his tongue carried him a little away, and that he did not mean exactly what he said.

Mr. OLIVER. If I said so I certainly did not mean it, and I beg the hon. gentleman to allow me to retract any such statement if I made it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). I am quite well aware that no man in this House would stand up more for his part of the country than would my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver), and I expect in all matters of immigration, where political feeling does not come in, that he and I will be found working heart and hand for the same cause and with the same object in view. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) then went on to speak of the overflow from Ontario, and he found fault with the late Government or some member of the late Government, for having stated at some time and in some place, I know not where, that he did not desire to disturb the population of Canada by transferring it from one of the older provinces to the newer sections of the country. So far as that goes I heartily agree with the position taken by the late Government. I believe that when men are doing well in the older sections of the country, the best thing they can do is to stay where they are. I believe that no Government would be doing any service to Canada if it endeavoured to unsettle men's minds and to induce them to emigrate from Ontario, or Quebec or the Maritime Provinces, to one of the new provinces of confederation. The hon. gentleman went on to state that this policy of the late Government was the cause of a certain portion of our population flowing into the United States of America. My belief is that this is not the cause why a certain portion of the young men of our country who, having found that they cannot get farms at prices which they could pay in the section of the country where they lived and followed Horace Greely's advice to go west, and have chosen the States instead of Western Canada. In fact, I rather wonder, considering the course which has been followed by the Reform party in the past, that so many of our people have gone to Western Canada at all. I have in my trunk at the Russell House, and I will be very glad to show it to any hon. gentleman who wishes to see it, a pamphlet issued by the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway, as it was at that time, now the Great Northern Railway; I have a pamphlet issued for the purpose of inducing settlers to come to the lands which belong to that railway company, and on the front page of that pamphlet is a photograph of the Hon. Edward Blake, who was at that time the leader of the Reform party. The greater part of that pamphlet is taken up with quotations from the speeches of that hon. gentleman, in which he showed that Dakota in many respects, was a much more desirable field for emigration than our own North-west Territories. I am happy to say that no prominent member of the Conservative party has ever, either in this House or on the public platform delivered speeches which have induced either the American Government or any American railway company or other American corporation, to use his speeches or quotations from his speeches for immigration purposes.

Mr. OLIVER. May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) who founded the St. Paul and Minneapolis Railway which is sued this pamphlet.

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). Mr. James J. Hill, if I am not mistaken, supported by Sir Donald Smith, Lord Mount Stephen, and several others. The railway was incorporated many years ago. It had a grant of lands in the States. These lands were bonded to what are known as the Dutch bondholders, and Mr. James J. Hill and the gentlemen I have mentioned, as well as others, bought out the Dutch bondholders and acquired control of the road. I am not thoroughly conversant with the matter, as I have had nothing to do with the line except to travel over it.

Mr. OLIVER. As a matter of fact the present High Commissioner to London has been the head and front of the St. Paul and Minneapolis Railway, and is now the controlling spirit of the Great Northern.

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). I do not see what that has to do with the immigration question. It is quite possible that my hon. friend's statement is correct, but I am not familiar with the affairs of the road. Mr. Chairman, when I came to the House this evening and found that the immigration estimates were under discussion, I intended to speak on only one point, and, had it not been for the speech of my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver). I would not have occupied the time of the House for nearly so long as I have done. What I intended to say, and what I wish to say now, is this: I would like to call the attention of my hon.

friend the leader of the Government, who I believe is interested in the development of that western country—because I have no doubt in my own mind that he wishes to see Canada prosper, and, however we may differ in our view as to how that prosperity is to be brought about, I believe he has that wish in his heart—I consequently wish to call his attention to the fact, that last year an immigration association was formed in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. That association is altogether apart from politics, and is composed of men who support him to as large an extent—I am not sure of the relative proportions of the members of that association, divided on political lines—but I can say they support him to as large an extent as they do the Conservative party. The object of the association is to see that country filled up with a desirable class of settlers. For the first time, last year this association held a convention in Winnipeg, which was attended by some three or four hundred delegates, embracing the leading men from all sections of Manitoba and the North-west Territories. They formed a permanent organization, with a view of aiding, so far as lay in their power, the immigration of a desirable class of men to the North-west. When I say the North-west, I desire to include Manitoba as well as the Territories, and to speak of the prairie section in general. They were men who had no lands to sell to the incoming settlers. They were men who were willing to give a portion of their time and a portion of their talents to this work; and I would ask the hon. gentleman, in considering the expenditure of money for immigration, to consider whether it would not be desirable to devote a small part of this vote to aid those people in the good work they are doing. During the short time I held the office of Minister of the Interior, which was a very short time—in my opinion, it would have been much better for the interests of Canada, if I had held it longer, but the electors of Canada thought differently, and I bowed gracefully to their judgment—during the short time I held that office, I was able, with the consent of my hon. leader and the other members of the Government, to allow them a small sum to enable them to perfect their organization; and now that it is perfected, I believe they can do a good work for Canada; and, as their interests are not centred in one particular section of the west, but extend from the Red River of the North to the Rocky Mountains, and from the boundary line to the Saskatchewan, they are in a position to give the most valuable advice and assistance to the Government, in telling them what sections of the country suit particular classes of settlers, and what classes of settlers suit particular sections of the country. My only intention now is to ask the hon. leader of the Government to take the trouble, when the session is over and he has a few spare moments on his hands, to look into this matter for himself, to find out what this association is, what its objects are, what work it has done, and what it intends to do; and, if he does that for himself, and does not rely on the information he receives from others, I am sure that he will see his way to give assistance, and very material assistance, to this excellent organization. I would also ask him, as there is no Minister of the Interior in the House to whom I can appeal, to pay attention to immigration from the Scandinavian countries. In Manitoba we possess a climate of which we all feel proud. I know we are often chaffed in the east, and are told that we say you can go round there in gossamer when the thermometer is at 40 degrees below zero. I do not pretend to say anything of that sort. I am here to talk of facts, and not to repeat nonsense; but I will say this, that I doubt if there is any country in the northern hemisphere or on the Continent of America, whether it lies to the north or the south, which possesses a more fruitful soil or a more healthful climate. Still, the winters are undoubtedly severe, and it is of consequence to us to obtain settlers who come from the north, who are not afraid of the cold, and who are able and willing to adapt themselves to our habits and usages. We find these settlers in the Scandinavian countries, and I believe that, if proper attention is given to encouraging immigration from Denmark, Norway and Sweden, as well as from Iceland, we shall get a largely increased immigration from those countries, and an immigration which will add greatly to our prosperity and wealth.

Before sitting down, I wish to allude to a remark which, I believe, my hon. friend the leader of the Government made earlier in the evening, when I was not in the House, when speaking of a proposition which had been made in the newspapers to appoint Mr. Martin to a judgeship in British Columbia. I believe my hon. friend said, and, no doubt, said in all good faith, that, from what I said last night, I would be quite ready to appoint him to that position. I know that my hon. friend did not wish to do me any injustice, when he made that remark, because, from what I said last night, he would see that I knew, at any rate, that he had a high opinion of Mr. Martin, and that I knew that Mr. Martin had a thorough knowledge of the wants of the west. But I wish to state that I do not believe in sending a member of my profession from any province to fill a judgeship in another province, to the bar of which he does not belong. I think it would be just as unfair to send Mr. Martin, or myself, or any other member of the Manitoba bar to fill a judgeship in British Columbia, as it would be to send us to fill one in Ontario or Quebec; and I think my hon. friend will acknowledge that that is what even he, with the majority he has at his back, dare not do. I just wish to make this remark, because although I impressed upon him that, situated as he is towards Mr. Martin, I thought he ought not to overlook the claims of that gentleman to the portfolio of the Interior, I never said that I thought Mr. Martin ought to get a judgeship in British Columbia or in any other province of whose bar he is not a member; nor did I say, as my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) seemed to imply last night, that if I occupied the position which my hon. friend does—a position which I am perfectly conscious I am unequal to fill, and which I may add I have no ambition to fill—I would at once call upon Mr. Martin or Mr. Sifton to hold the portfolio of the Interior. I did not say anything of that sort. Their views on other questions, quite apart from those on matters pertaining to the North-west, differ so much from mine, that I could never think of asking them to join me. But I will say this, that had I accepted the services which my opponent in the last election rendered to my hon. friend the leader of the Government, and were I leader of the Government, I certainly should not overlook those services when there was in my gift a position which he could fill ably and well, and which could be given to him without any trouble, so far as the House is aware.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The question of freight rates having been introduced, I wish to state my position in regard thereto. I intended to state it when I spoke first. After an earnest study of the disabilities under which the North-west has laboured for many years, it is my deep conviction that the question of freight rates is a more serious one even than the question of the tariff, and I would urge upon the Government the desirability of making some arrangement whereby that country can be relieved from the disadvantage of excessive freight rates. A request will doubtless be made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company within a very short time for a large subsidy in connection with the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. I would urge in that connection that the Government make an arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway whereby the Government will control the rates existing in that country. Relief might be afforded by the construction of another railway through that country but after all that would cost a great deal of money and might not result in the permanent benefit we expect. We do not wish to do the Canadian Pacific Railway any injury whatever. The Canadian Pacific Railway is managed with an amount of ability which cannot be overrated. It is, however, the duty of the Government to make some arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway to secure us relief in the matter of freight rates; and when the Canadian Pacific Railway ask for a subsidy to build through to the Crow's Nest Pass would be the proper time to make such an arrangement.

ADJOURNMENT.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. DOBELL. Before the House adjourns, I wish to say a few words of personal explanation with regard to a question which the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) put the night before last. I am sorry to trouble the House at this late hour, but I do not wish to defer the explanation longer in justice to parties upon whom an unjust reflection has been cast, under which I do not desire they should labour any longer. The hon. member asked me if I had sent a telegram which was published in the "L'Electeur," and I replied, without hesitation and without the least mental reservation, that I had seen that telegram in "L'Electeur," but that that was the first time I had seen it and I knew nothing of it. Well, yesterday I received a message that made me look through the replies I had sent to several telegrams which I had received just a week ago, and I found that I had sent a message to a private friend, a week ago, exactly in the terms of the message which appeared in "L'Electeur," but I never expected that message to be published in that newspaper, and I did not send it for that purpose, and did not give my consent in any way to its publication. I think it is due to my hon. friend from Three Rivers that I should make this explanation.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.15 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 25th September, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. CHOQUETTE presented the third report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Official Reports of the Debates, as follows:—

Resolved, that Messrs. J. B. Vanasse, P. McLeod and Joseph Bouchard, whose services as translators of the official report of the debates have been dispensed with, be allowed to continue the work of translation for the remainder of the session, and that they be paid therefor at the usual rate of remuneration.

Mr. CHOQUETTE moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to, and report concurred in.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Bill (No. 22) to amend the Act to incorporate the Eastern Trust Company.

DAIRY PRODUCTS ACT.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 37) to amend the Dairy Products Act, 1893. He said: The House no doubt understands that at this stage of the session I can hardly expect to have this measure carried into law at this session. I was asked by the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) to adopt as a Government measure a Bill which that hon. gentleman introduced and succeeded in having passed to its second reading. I was asked to do so, because it was not likely that a public Bill in the hands of a private member would become law this session. Desiring to meet the views of that hon. gentleman and others who had this matter of the branding of dairy products at heart, I looked into the matter, and I found that I was not quite prepared to adopt that Bill in its entirety as a Government measure. But, having examined into the matter pretty carefully and having consulted Professor Robertson, who has studied it much more exhaustively, I decided to introduce a measure which I thought would perhaps cover the necessities of the case, for the purpose of bringing it before the public, so that in the dairy conventions and other meetings which may be held throughout the country during the fall of this year, the details of the measure may be thoroughly threshed out, and the people interested in the matter may be able to make such representations to the Government and to Parliament as may enable us to put through a perfect measure at the next session of Parliament. The Bill provides that our dairy products shall be branded, not only as they now are, with the word "Canadian," but that they shall also have the name or number of the factory at which they are produced stamped upon them, and also, in the case of cheese, the date of manufacture. This is an innovation which has been a little discussed in the country; but at the same time it is one that seems to have met the desires of the great majority of the dairymen who have expressed their opinion on this question. The principle of the measure is the same as that advocated by the hon. member for Glengarry; but there were some details in his Bill which did not seem to me to quite cover the whole ground, and I thought it was best to put before the House and before the country a little more detail and a little more carefully worded sections. I may say that some time ago, Professor Robertson, in view of the discussion which had arisen on this matter in the country, sent out a circular to the owners and patrons of factories in the country, asking whether they wished to have the branding of the date of manufacture on cheese made compulsory. I have here a summary of the replies. There were, altogether 617 replies received. Of these, 554 answered "Yes," and only 63 answered "No"—a practically unanimous expression of opinion. Under these circumstances, I think I am perfectly safe in saying—and from my own knowledge of the condition of the trade, I agree in the conclusion—that it is the desire of the trade that the date of manufacture shall be branded on cheese. This Bill provides for that in a way which, I think, will be effective, and will in the least possible degree interfere with any liberty of action on the part of the producers or those engaged in the trade. The Bill also provides that the word "Canada" shall be put upon all products of Canadian manufacture. It also provides that with regard to butter, the word "Canada" and the name or number of the factory where produced shall be stamped upon the product, and in the matter of cheese, not only the name of the factory or number but also the date of the manufacture must be stamped. The Bill provides that the date, down to the very day, shall be placed upon the cheese itself, but that upon the box containing the cheese, there shall only be stamped the month of the year of production. The reason of this slight difference in stamping is because the shippers find that it will be very difficult for them to replace the brand, giving the date of manufacture, upon such boxes as may be injured or broken and have to be replaced. I think it is desirable that the month, at any rate, should be put on, and there can be no difficulty in obtaining information to enable the shippers to put the month on, even if they cannot get the date. This being an amendment to the Act of 1893, leaves those sections of that Act which are not amended still in force. It is my desire that this Bill should be printed and brought before the various bodies connected with the dairy interests of the country during this coming fall and winter. This being an amendment to the Act of 1893, leaves the other sections as they are, with the exception of section 7. I wish to state that it is my desire that this Bill should be printed and brought before the various bodies connected with the dairying interests of the country during this coming fall and winter; and if they can show, as is possible, that there may be some details of the Bill which they would wish to have changed, I would be very glad indeed to make such changes in the Act, as may be required in the interests of the general producers and dealers in these products.

Mr. HAGGART. Has the hon. gentleman consulted the Justice Department to find out whether, when these articles are not intended for export, you have jurisdiction to compel the manufacturer of cheese or butter to put upon it the date or month of manufacture?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have not done so, but I take the ground that as we have a law requiring them to be stamped with the word "Canadian," we are authorized to require the date of manufacture to be stamped on them.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). When I introduced this Bill first I also included butter, but the then Minister of Agriculture explained that there was no demand made why butter should be branded, and, at his request, I erased it from my Bill. I have to thank the hon. Minister for bringing this measure before the House, and I must say that he has shown me every courtesy and consideration that could be expected, which I appreciate very much. I am glad that the Bill is in such good hands, and I trust that the hon. Minister will put it through at as early a date as possible. He is carrying out the principles laid down in my Bill and is adding to it by including butter. I wish to draw the hon. Minister's attention to the fact that it will be very dangerous to delay the passing of this Bill. I have memorials from people in England, interested in that trade, complaining that this article is placed on the market in an unfair way and under misrepresentation, some of these documents I have already read in the House. Of the amount of cheese exported from this country, we export over 99½ per cent to Great Britain, a small fraction of 1 per cent being exported to Newfoundland, the United States and the West Indies. It is therefore evident that our sole dependence for our export trade must be upon the British market, and when we find other countries competing in that market against us, and that the United States are legislating to improve their products and get their cheese and butter placed favourably upon the English market again, it behooves us to be awake to our own interests and see that our products are placed upon the British market in a fair and honest way. If they are placed in such a way that doubts are cast upon them, then some of those competing countries will get in the thin end of the wedge and we may lose the market completely. I hope that the policy of locking the stable after the horse is stolen will not be followed by Canada, as it has been by the United States, and that we will thus be saved the necessity of legislating every session of Parliament, as that country is now doing, in order to try and recover lost ground upon the English market. There are very great complaints from Great Britain regarding the methods in which our cheese is placed upon that market. As there are many new members in the House who perhaps are not aware of the complaints made I will read a memorial that has been sent out to Canada, asking us to legislate in such a manner that the English traders will know that they are getting our products as they are represented to them:

HOME AND FOREIGN PRODUCE EXCHANGE (LIMITED).—CHEESE SUB-COMMITTEE.

Hibernia Chambers, London Bridge,
London, E.C., 1895.

To the producers of Canadian Cheese:

It has, no doubt, come to your knowledge that there has been considerable dissatisfaction among the cheese distributors on this side of the Atlantic as to the course of the business during the last two or three years, especially as to buyers, who in many cases alleged that they did not receive the special month's make they had contracted for, which called for frequent arbitration during the season just closed.

The result has been to injure the good reputation of the Canadian product, and to destroy that confidence in dealing which is so essential between seller and buyer.

As the result of a conference representing a great majority of the trade in Great Britain, suggestions have been made to your Government as to the desirability of an Act making it compulsory to brand the date at the time of manufacture upon each cheese. It is fully believed that such protection will be a decided advantage to the factorymen and to the distributors throughout the United Kingdom, as it will at once restore confidence on this side, and effectually prevent any speculative or unscrupulous shipper covering his transactions by substituting one month's make for another. It is earnestly hoped that the factorymen throughout the Dominion will at once commence dating their cheese, especially as the desire is pretty general among the importers to favour those factories adopting this system.

Our interest is as yours, that goods should be sold honestly for what they are, and that the reputation and market price of fine fall makes should not be destroyed by the improper substitution of the earlier summer product.

The shippers all have but one opinion. Here is a memorial from Bristol from the largest importers of Canadian cheese, and they say:

That we, the undersigned importers of Canadian product are strongly of opinion that it would be to the distinct advantage to both producers and distributors of Canadian cheese, if the date and make were legibly and indelibly marked on each cheese before it leaves the factory where made.

Your memorialists therefore pray your Honourable House to pass a law making it compulsory upon all manufacturers of cheese in Canada to so mark each cheese before it leaves the factory where made.

This is signed by sixteen of the most important firms in Bristol. There is a demand in that country to have this done, and there is a demand in this country by the people most interested in the same direction. This subject has been before Parliament for two or three years, and the English people are crying out and complaining that they are being imposed upon by parties in Canada sending out cheese to that country under misrepresentation as to the date of its make. I draw your attention again to the fact that 99½ per cent of the Canadian cheese finds a market in Great Britain. And in these papers that I have read is the best evidence that can be given that those who are interested in this business in the mother country, those who buy our cheese product, strongly desire a measure of this kind. I wish to call attention to another fact which none can dispute, and that is if we lose the confidence of the people of that country, and they refuse to purchase from us we cannot get another such market for this product which is the mainstay of the farmers of this country. Why, Sir, only a small fraction of one per cent of our cheese output finds a market in other countries than Great Britain. I trust the Minister will change his mind, and, if at all possible, put this Bill through this session. If it is necessary to alter the Bill in any way to meet the Minister's views, or if he can suggest any amendment which will make it more acceptable to the people of the country, I am quite willing that that should be done. In the meantime, I must insist upon making this demand that there shall not be a moment lost in placing ourselves, properly on record with the people of the old country, upon whose confidence and good-will we are wholly dependent for success in this most important industry that we have in this country. I have talked over this matter with Prof. Robertson. He suggested certain changes in respect of which I quite agreed with him. There is no dispute between us as to the principle of the Bill or as to the Bill as a whole, and I do not see what should prevent the House from putting it through. I feel confident that it will meet no opposition in this House, for I have no doubt every member is in favour of it. I understood the Minister to say that a second circular had been sent out by Prof. Robertson in addition to the one previously sent out by the then chairman of the Agriculture Committee, and the responses to it showed that the people interested are almost unanimously in favour of having this made law. The farmer who furnishes the milk wants it, the owner of the factory wants it, the people of the country generally want it, the people who are buying the goods from us are making demand almost every month for it, and are complaining that they are not properly treated in the matter, that the goods are misrepresented and that they do not know what they are buying. Is there any member in this House who will undertake to rise in his place and say one word against this measure? Is it not the proper and honest thing to do, to place these goods fairly before the people upon whom we have to depend for our market, or is it proper that parties should be encouraged and allowed to send goods there under misrepresentation, perpetrating a fraud upon the people who buy these goods? And do not forget that not only is Great Britain our sole market, but other countries are competing against us for that market, and are ready to take advantage of the situation. If doubt is cast upon the product of this country, it will be ruinous to the people who are interested in this industry. And I wish to call the attention of the Minister to the fact that if anything happens in the meantime, while this suspense exists, and if we suffer loss thereby, a serious responsibility will rest upon the shoulders of any one who has anything to do with delay in the matter. Therefore, I trust he will see his way clear to press this Bill through Parliament. I do not think that any more evidence is required. And there never was a Bill introduced in this House that has had so fully the sanction of the people interested. If all those who are interested want this measure passed, why not give it to them. It must be admitted that there is no reason why this Bill should not be put through now, and I will deem it a great favour if the hon. Minister will carry it to completion this session. This is not a political issue, nor is it one in which I seek any credit, for I am quite satisfied so long as the Bill is put through and the people are given the advantage they so earnestly desire.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

HER MAJESTY'S LONG REIGN.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to suggest to my hon. friend the First Minister (Mr. Laurier) that as an unparalleled and important event has occurred, it would not be inadvisable that this House should mark its appreciation of that event. I refer to the fact of Her Majesty the Queen having entered upon the sixtieth year of her reign, and I would like to say that if the hon. gentleman would introduce an address, this side of the House will be only too glad to support it.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I would be very glad to confer with my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) privately upon this subject. It occurred to me that it would be proper to propose such an address; but I did not take that step for certain reasons which I would like as well not to mention publicly, but which I will mention to my hon. friend privately, and we will agree upon the action to be taken.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have been only waiting for an opportunity of seeing the First Minister disengaged a moment to mention this matter to him, and it was because the Orders of the Day were called and there was not time to mention it to him personally that I spoke of it as I did.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Militia—Clothing and necessaries, ordinary vote ..... $90,000

Mr. TISDALE. Before the item is adopted, I want to call the attention of the committee and of the Minister of Militia to a matter that I brought briefly before the House on a previous occasion when moving for some papers, which have since been brought down. Even at this stage of the session I must trespass a short time upon the time of the committee, because I consider this matter one of great importance. It is a matter involving an entire change in the method of securing supplies to the Militia Department of clothing, a very large item every year, and one that I hope will grow larger from year to year, because I think that the new arming of the militia is a matter of such importance that the department and the House should take even greater interest than has heretofore been taken in that important organization. I can assure the Minister of Militia that I believe this side of the House will be prepared to back him up in taking all necessary steps and going to all necessary expense in order to put that force in the best possible position. Now, this matter of clothing is one, as I said, of great importance. It is a matter that had the consideration of the member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) some years ago when he was Minister of Militia. About 1886 or 1887 that hon. gentleman, after full consultation with the officials of his department, inaugurated a radical change in the manner and mode of supplying clothing for the militia. Up to that time the clothing had been advertised for, and had largely been purchased in England, and an attempt had been made to purchase it to some extent in Canada. At the time he desired to accomplish two changes. One object was to secure, if possible, that it should be of Canadian material and Canadian make; and in conjunction with that object, he desired if possible to get a cheaper article, an article that would fit better, and he desired a system under which the department might have a more direct control over the manufacture of the clothing. Up to that time it had been very difficult, first, to get the supply, and second, to get better material. Neither the material, nor the make, nor the fit had been satisfactory; and further, when the supplies were furnished by contractors at a distance, it sometimes happened that supplies came in so late that we had to take clothing that was imperfect, either in make, in quality, or in fit. After the fullest consultation and advice with the officials in his department who had charge of this matter, and who have since had charge of it, he took the responsibility of inaugurating two important changes. He wished to accomplish the object I have mentioned, and he resolved upon two things, first, to abolish advertising and to try the experiment of getting tenders for clothing by circular, and secondly, to adopt the system of three-year contracts. Now, he found, and I think probably his officials had pointed out, the difficulties of getting Canadian material, and he had to put the matter in such a shape as would justify manufacturers in this country in purchasing very expensive machinery, and also in investing largely in the proper kind of vats to enable them to get the right sort of colours, because it was a very difficult matter to get fixed colours for the clothing. He made it a condition that the material should be Canadian, and that the make should be Canadian, so as to give Canadian manufacturers and Canadian workmen the benefit of producing the material for our militia. In the next place he made contracts for three year terms. I am quite aware, and no doubt the Minister of Militia and other hon. gentlemen are aware, that there was a difficulty about the three-year contracts; but I will come to that later in the remarks I propose to offer. Having inaugurated this system, he took the plan of issuing a very full circular. I will not trouble the House with reading it, though I have it here; but it gave all the particulars and specifications as to the conditions of the contract, and as to quantity, style and material of the clothing. They required a first-class article in every way. Now, on this point I may say that I quite agree that in acquiring supplies for the public service, the rule should be to advertise for tenders and not to do it by circular; and it is only in a special case that I think a departure from that rule can be justified. Now, the question whether this was a special case, would be settled in the affirmative if the result was satisfactory. Now, this system has been tested for about nine years. The results have proved that the system has been successful beyond a peradventure, and within the last nine years we have caused hundreds of thousands of dollars of material to be manufactured and supplied by our own people and to be made by our own people in our own country. The clothing to-day is better than that we got before, the make is better, the fit is better, and the department have been relieved from a great deal of friction and almost insuperable difficulties in getting the same results by one year's contract and by the old system of advertising, because it has enabled a number of manufacturers in this country to invest capital in making a superior article. One of the great advantages of a three years contract has been this: The department has secured the control of the manufacture to a certain extent so that they can exact the right sort of material in every way. The difficulty in a one-year contract is that Parliament generally rises somewhere about May or June, and if you stick strictly to the technical rule that the Crown ought not to contract until the money is voted, it would be so late in the season before you could get in tenders and have the work commenced, that there would be a continual rush to get it in time. Experience has shown, and I think it would show again if this system was abolished, that there is danger of the material not being of the proper sort. It is not sufficient to say that you can collect damages if the contract is not complied with, because the clothing is already supplied, and you have to use it. That happened under the old system. In the second place, the department being close in touch with the manufacturers, and being able to give the notice plenty of time ahead, the officers of the department have a chance to make samples, and during actual construction to supervise the manufacture, and to see that everything is of the proper material and of a proper fit. In every way therefore, the result has been most satisfactory. In this way the results obtained have been and are most satisfactory. The clothing is better, the fit is better; further, the contracts have resulted in less friction and difficulty, and the whole prices have been reduced under this system. Coming to the subject of letting the present contracts, because this is introductory to them, what happened? The time had arrived when the contracts for a large quantity of supplies expired and it became necessary for new contracts to be entered into. The letting of the contracts was deferred until it was found that money could not be voted even for the first year. At that time the usual plan was resorted to, and tenders were asked by circular. Eleven firms were notified, eight of whom put in tenders for clothing and boots and shoes. Of those eight which put in tenders, seven firms obtained portions of the contracts. These were principally large firms engaged in the business, because the circulars were only sent to those who were directly in the business of making or manufacturers. Under the old system it was found that middlemen intervened, and the result was that while the price might be lessened in some cases, difficulty was liable to arise, even if security was put up. That was the result of the tenders. I would read the names, but the Minister has them under his view and no doubt thoroughly understands the contracts. I now propose to allude to charges made in the newspapers, published before the election took place, that because these contracts were let at about the time when the election contest was going on, there was something improper or unfair taking place, and indeed it was alleged that there was some corrupt motive in letting contracts at that particular time. All I have to say in regard to this matter is that this year no new rule has been adopted. For nine years the present system has been in force. Except as regards Sanford & Co., of Hamilton, I had not the pleasure of knowing the gentlemen who sent in tenders or to whom contracts were awarded, nor did I know the political convictions of those gentlemen. I am informed that the contractors are not all Conservatives. Further, the lowest prices ever obtained on contracts for those articles were secured this year, and I was assured by the officers of the department when the samples were examined on which the contracts were let, that the materials were of the best quality ever submitted, even though the materials had been very satisfactory before. I propose to read the figures. It is not necessary to go over the prices for the whole nine years; they were very low last year, and this year they are very much lower. The figures are as follows:—

Quantity.		Cost under old contract.	Cost under new contract	Saving for Year 1896-7.

	Saving per year.....			5,277 00

Mr. CHARLTON. What is the total cost of the articles on which the saving is effected?

Mr. TISDALE. I did not add up the figures. The total sum, however, is between $80,000 and $90,000. One further calculation, and I have done with details. As I have explained before, there were two sets of contracts, some for two and others for three years. Under the two-year contracts there was a saving in each year of about $2,500 per year.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Was there not a contract let which was not to commence until a year or two hence?

Mr. TISDALE. Yes, I am going to the contracts presently.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). What is the object of letting a contract to commence a year or two afterwards?

Mr. TISDALE. I will, with the permission of the hon. gentleman, go into this matter in my own way, and thus save the time of the House. In regard to the two-year contracts, which did not commence until a year from June, 1897, the prices were as follows:—

	Cost under old contract.	Cost under new contract	Saving per Garment.
	$ cts.	$ cts.	cts.
Cavalry, Dragoon, tunics .....	5 89½	5 48	41½
Artillery do .....	5 72	5 55	17
Rifles do .....	5 40	5 25	15
Artillery jackets.....	3 85	3 72	13
Cavalry pantaloons, Hussars.....	5 68	4 90	78
Rifles serge trousers.....	2 80	2 60	20
Average over.....			$2,500 00 per year.

That would make on these articles alone, none of which were supplied this year, about $2,500 a year. The total result would be, taking last year's contract, and taking this year and the next two years to come, that the savings made would amount to nearly 10 per cent, and taking the same price as last year, there would be a saving of twenty or thirty thousand dollars. These prices that I have mentioned bind the contractors for three years, and it does not matter whether the prices go up or down. The system which has resulted in that saving should therefore be very carefully considered before the advantage of it is lost. I venture to say further that never will you be able to get these articles of a better quality, make and colour at as cheap, or at all events, a cheaper price, than you can get them this year. I am quite satisfied, and I put it as a common-sense proposition, that you can get no firm to take these supplies as cheap for one year as you can for three years. We all know as a business principle that the larger the contract the cheaper the price. But there is more than that in the proposition. I am told by those who take these contracts that they dare not take them for three years until they have made their arrangements with the factories which manufacture the material, because they cannot control and they cannot afford the risk at the rate of profits, unless they have a long time to look ahead. I want to press this point upon the hon. Minister. I want him to consider not only the quality, but particularly the fit, and also the certainty that his department will have plenty of time to watch, as it were, the progress of the manufacture in regard to fit and quality. Now, in regard to the two or three years' contract. The system of the three-year contract was inaugurated a number of years ago, and this is the first time that two-year contracts were given. The reason of that is, that there were some articles that they did not need that year, and so they let two-year contracts subsequently, and it left them on an uneven basis. The department and the officers in charge of this matter, the inspector and the general, and the others responsible for the clothing, were well satisfied with this system because they had sufficient time to look ahead and every opportunity to see that the contracts were fully complied with. This year it was suggested for the convenience of the department to bring in the contracts all at the one time, and taking advantage of the low tenders, it was considered well that for the contracts that were not expiring this year there should be two-year contracts given. That was the reason and the sole reason for asking for the two-year contracts. I conclude, from some newspaper articles, that there was a wrong impression about the matter, for it was hinted that these articles might come in long before they were needed for use. Now, I want to set that right. The contracts provide against that. The supplies for each year can only come in the year for which they are required, and it is entirely within the control of the department when they will have them, because they are required to give the contractor so many days' notice each year, as to what articles they require. In this way they can always take care to give that notice long enough ahead so that there can be this supervision which officers of long experience in the department think almost equally important with the question of price. Now, in regard to the point as to there being two and three-year contracts ahead. I grant at first view that this might seem extraordinary, and more particularly so as the Minister of Justice has given the opinion that these contracts are not binding. I will tell the House how the officials inaugurated this system so that no possible mischief could arise from that. In every one of these contracts, the following clause is inserted:—

Always provided Parliament has before these dates (that is, the date of payment or either of them, as the case may be, sanctioned the vote for the purchase of such articles.

The contract, therefore, provides that no possible difficulty could arise in this matter. Now, let me ask, why should these contracts be cancelled? I propose under that head to read the remarks of the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) on the occasion I brought this matter up in the House on the 11th September. He said:

When I found the contract for supplying clothing after the first day of July, 1897, I thought that was an extraordinary condition of things, and I said at once to the officers of my department that I thought that contract ought to be annulled. My deputy advised me not to take any action without first consulting the Department of Justice; and that is what led me to send the contracts and all papers over to the Department of Justice for their opinion. The Department of Justice have had the matter before them for some weeks, and within a few days they have sent a carefully prepared opinion to the Militia Department stating that that department had no authority whatever to make any of those contracts; and upon the strength of that advice I have proceeded to annul the contract which agreed to supply goods after the 1st of July, 1897. I take this further view with regard to the three-year contract. The opinion of the Department of Justice, which is very clear and distinct, is that the Department of Militia had no power to enter into a contract for three years, or even one year, unless the money was voted, and that, had the money been voted for one year, the contract would be good for that year. Now, although the money was not voted, I am giving the contractors the benefit of the first year. I assume that the money will be voted this year, and we are actually receiving the goods, as they are required, and I propose to accept the contract from 1896 to 1897, subject to the will of Parliament.

I shall now read the opinion of the Minister of Justice, which is as follows:—

Department of Justice, Canada,
Ottawa, September 7th, 1896.

Colonel Panet,

Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter of 11th ult., in which you submit the following case for the opinion of this department:—

Mr. TISDALE.

1. By Order in Council of 28th April, 1893, a system of contracts for three years' supplies of militia clothing was approved.

2. Under this system tenders were called for and contracts awarded for such articles as were then deemed requisite for the coming three years.

3. Subsequently supplies of further articles were found to be necessary and a supplementary series of contracts was in like manner awarded for the three fiscal years following the first year in which the new system was adopted; thus one set of contracts expired a year in advance of the other set.

4. In order to avoid the inconvenience thus caused and to have all the contracts terminate at the same time, the Department of Militia and Defence, in calling for tenders for clothing required for the fiscal years 1896-97, 1897-98 and 1898-99, also invited tenders for that portion of the clothing which, being as above explained under contract to expire only on the 30th June, 1897, could only be awarded by the department for the fiscal years 1897-98, 1898-99.

5. The department thus undertook to make contracts for supplies, not only those for which the contracts were just about to expire, and would consequently require to be immediately renewed, but also for supplies which were under contract for a whole year to come, and stood in no need of immediate renewal.

Under these circumstances the Minister of Militia and Defence desires to be advised as to whether or not the contracts awarded for a period which will not commence until the 1st of July, 1897, are valid, or should be cancelled and only awarded when the proper time for so doing arrives.

I am directed by the Minister of Justice to state that the Executive has no constitutional authority to make a contract binding on the House of Commons, and that in his opinion in order to give a contract entered into by the Executive binding effect as against the Crown, it is necessary either that it should be expressly approved by the House of Commons or that the money necessary for carrying it out should be granted, and in the latter case it is binding for the period for which the money is granted by Parliament and no longer.

The Minister thinks, therefore, that the contracts in question are not binding. Whether or not, under the circumstances, they should be cancelled would seem to be a question for the consideration of the Minister of Militia and Defence.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,
(Sd.) E. L. NEWCOMBE,

D. M. J.

Now I propose to read, so as to get this part of the case fully before the House, the letter from the hon. Minister—I presume the letters to all the contractors were alike—notifying one of the contractors that he had cancelled the contract:

Department of Militia and Defence,
Ottawa, 11th September, 1896.

Gentlemen,—I have the honour to inform you, by direction of the Honourable the Minister of Militia and Defence, that, in the opinion of the Honourable the Minister of Justice, the contract awarded you, in May last, for certain clothing required by this department for the years 1896-97, 1897-98 and 1898-99, or either of them, is not binding upon the Crown.

I am, therefore, to inform you that our Minister has cancelled that portion of the contract in question purporting to bind this department to obtain from you for the years 1897-98 and 1898-99 the clothing, or any of it, therein described, and that only that part of it relating to the year 1896-97 shall be regarded as valid, and on condition that the necessary money is voted at the present session of Parliament.

I have the honour to be, gentlemen,
Your obedient servant,
(Signed) A. BENOIT,
Captain,

Secretary, Department of Militia and Defence.

It will be noticed that the Minister's statement to the House, which I quoted, hardly expressed the opinion of the Minister of Justice. I do not think he fully appreciated the important distinction in that opinion. The hon. Minister said that the opinion of the Minister of Justice was that the department had no authority whatever to make any of these contracts, whereas, according to my idea, he made a very different statement. He said the contracts were not binding. But, as to the policy or the advisability of cancelling the contracts, he was careful to guard himself, and, I think, properly so. He said the responsibility for that must rest on the hon. gentleman who controls the department. Now, what is the reason underlying the opinion of the Minister of Justice that those contracts are not binding? It is the plain constitutional reason which, I suppose, all gentlemen in this House will agree upon, which these very contractors knew, that it was conditional with the Crown to carry them out—that the Crown or the department need not fulfil them, though the contractors were bound to do it. The contracts were made with that condition. But what did the contractors rely upon? They relied upon two things. Most of all they relied upon this: where a department of the Government, through its duly authorized Minister, enters into a contract in good faith, they accept that as a sort of guarantee of its fulfilment. Mind you, I am not saying that that in any way binds the Minister at all. Afterwards, if there was found to be anything improper in connection with a contract, the Crown might not vote the money for the purpose. This matter was all investigated some years ago by the Public Accounts Committee, and it was impossible to produce a scintilla of evidence to show that there had been anything wrong. I do not think any one has charged, and I am glad to see that my hon. friend has not charged, anything corrupt in the matter. He is quite free, after that opinion of the Minister of Justice, to take the responsibility of cancelling the contracts: but it is beyond peradventure that my hon. friend's courage and wisdom in taking this new departure can only be justified by the results of his action. While I am not saying that everything that the Minister of Justice says is true, yet he very properly says that the contracts are not binding. At the same time, the wisdom or the policy of cancelling them rests upon my hon. friend; and, if my hon. friend thinks that their cancellation will result in an advantage to the department, if he thinks he can get better articles or get them cheaper, I am not saying that it is not within his province, under the opinion of the Minister of Justice, to cancel them. But let me call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that he has contradicted himself and has justified this contract, because he has seen fit, and I think wisely, to do the very same thing. The Minister of Justice says that no part of this contract is binding; yet my hon. friend has done his predecessor the compliment of accepting one year under it before the money is voted. A principle is a principle. He may say it was wise to do so, and I think it was wise, because the articles were immediately needed. Now, my hon. friend's justification is entirely this. The Minister of Justice says the contract is not binding; my hon. friend says "the contract being not binding, I, therefore, thought it right to cancel it." That is his whole case, as put by himself. He will have to be responsible for it; he is, I suppose, prepared to accept the responsibility: but I venture to call his attention to this, that, when another year he asks for a contract, and waits till Parliament votes the money, unless the session ends earlier than it usually does, I think he will find it impossible to get articles of the same quality and the same make, as cheaply as he had them already provided for under contract with competent parties who had hitherto not failed to meet the requirements of the case. With regard to competition, the competition was there. These circulars were sent to manufacturers of both parties. They were not sent to middlemen.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Have you the names of those to whom you sent them?

Mr. TISDALE. I have. Do you want me to read them?

Names of (a) parties invited to tender to furnish clothing to the department for the fiscal years 1896-97, 1897-98 and 1898-99:—Messrs. W. E. Sanford Manufacturing Company, Hamilton; E. A. Small & Co., Montreal; E. Boisseau & Co., Toronto; H. Shorey & Co., Montreal; Gillespie, Ansley & Dixon, Toronto; Joseph Horsfall & Sons, Montreal; The Auburn Woollen Co., Peterborough; Doull & Gibson, Montreal; A. Dupuis & Co., Montreal; Hodgson Bros. & Co., boots and shoes, Alexandria; A. E. Whitehead & Co., Montreal.

(b) Parties who tendered:—Messrs. W. E. Sanford Manufacturing Co., Hamilton; H. Shorey & Co., Montreal; Doull & Gibson, Montreal; E. Boisseau & Co., Toronto; Gillespie, Ansley & Dixon, Toronto; The Auburn Woollen Co., Peterborough; Hodgson Bros. & Co., Alexandria; A. E. Whitehead, Montreal.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). It never struck you there was such a place as the maritime provinces ?

Mr. TISDALE. I should gather from this that the manufacturers down there had not gone to the expense I have pointed out. It is only a certain number who have provided the machinery to enable them to carry out contracts of this kind.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Why were John Colborne & Company, of Hamilton, one of the largest clothiers in Canada, left out, and good, sound Conservatives ?

Mr. TISDALE. There was a large enough number to make active competition. It was not the Minister who selected the names, for I certainly was not consulted, but these invitations to tender were sent out by the deputy head, as he told me, in the usual way. When the tenders came in, I am not sure that there were not some more invitations to tender sent out to the boot and shoemakers. I did not ask for a return giving the names of those to whom notices were sent. I was given the name of the contractor to whom was awarded the contract, and I remember that the officers of the department were surprised at the lowness of his tender.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). How many Liberals in that list ?

Mr. TISDALE. I do not know, but I know that there were three Conservatives. I judged from what I saw in a Hamilton paper that Doull & Gibson are Liberals.

Mr. LOUNT. There is not a Liberal in the whole list.

Mr. TISDALE. I did not know the politics of one of them except Sanford & Company, and have never inquired since, but I learned afterwards, long after the contracts were signed, that Shorey & Co. were Conservatives, and I know that the manager of the Auburn Woolen Company was one, because I know the gentleman, but did not know he had anything to do with that company until subsequently. After all, this question narrows itself down to a question of responsibility. Hon. gentlemen opposite say the contracts are not binding, but the advisability of cancelling them rests with the Minister. In the remarks he made the other day, the hon. Minister told us that, he simply cancelled those contracts because they were not binding, but nevertheless he accepted the contract for this year, so that if there was anything improper, if there was any reason why they should be cancelled except that they were not binding, he ought not to have accepted the contract for this year.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). He wanted the clothes.

Mr. TISDALE. If it was illegal for us to make the contracts, is it not illegal for him to accept one of them ?

Mr. TISDALE.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). He could not help himself.

Mr. TISDALE. Unless some better explanation can be given, the hon. gentleman leaves himself open to the suspicion that he simply cancelled them because they were made by political opponents, and he preferred that some other party should have them. He certainly cannot get lower contracts from any one who will fulfil the conditions which the department exact. The contracts are excellent ones, they worked for the benefit of the public and the department, the special provisions in them have been a success, and this is a department into which the least possible politics should be allowed to have influence. I quite agree that it is impossible for any hon. gentleman to quite clear himself from politics, under our system, but if I did not believe that the present system was a good one, I would not appeal to the hon. gentleman to follow it. It would be a great mistake, in my opinion, a loss to the public and an unfortunate thing for the department, if the hon. Minister was to depart from this system, which has been found to work satisfactorily, and which I believe he would persist in if he gave it a trial. I think he will find on inquiry that these men are not all Conservatives. The firms whose tenders were the lowest obtained the contracts, and they are firms which are prepared to furnish excellent articles, and I ask the hon. gentleman not to cancel the contracts. Why, the contracts were advisably drawn in that shape. Was there anything improper in providing that these contracts were only binding on the Crown, so long as the Crown was satisfied, from year to year, but they are to be cancelled not on the ground that there is dissatisfaction or that the firms are not competent, or that the prices are now not low, but on the grounds simply that the contracts are not binding. The hon. gentleman has the right to say that he will change the whole system. Now, I am appealing to the hon. Minister for his own sake and for the sake of getting the militia properly clothed, not to cancel these contracts. To get the militia clothes is a difficult problem, as the hon. gentleman's officers—the same gentlemen who have so long and so well filled these positions—will tell him. These gentlemen have been thoroughly impartial so far as I know, no complaint that I have ever heard being made about the staff here by either party. I believe that they are a mixed staff in politics, so far as they can be said to have any politics at all, and in my contact with them I never found any indications of political leanings on the part of those gentlemen. I came among them as a stranger, but they knew my politics, of course, as did everybody who knew anything about me, but to their credit be it said, when these contracts were being awarded, they manifested no bias in favour of anybody on account of his politics. I thoroughly believe that the hon. gentleman has an excellent staff. I believe also that he has a chance to benefit the department and the public, and to enhance his own reputation, by allowing the system to continue as it has done, and the next time to make the contracts in the same way. At all events I hope he will do me the credit to remember that in the most courteous way I could, and in the most sincere and honest way, I have urged this course upon him. For I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that however strong a partisan I may be in other matters, and I am a party politician, I put the interests of the militia of Canada far above party. And I make this appeal because I believe that the course I urge upon him is the best course that can be taken in the interest of the service and the country.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Will the hon. gentleman kindly answer me a question? How many of these contractors received contracts for the same classes of goods? Did each contractor have a different class of goods, or did some two or more of them have the same class of goods to make?

Mr. TISDALE. The great-coats would go separately. I cannot answer the hon. gentleman's question off-hand. I have the contracts here and could look them up. My recollection is that certain gentlemen have the facilities for more than one class of goods, while others have not gone to the expense of it. The boots and shoes were a separate contract.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I speak of the clothing alone. Was the price allowed for a given class of goods the same no matter who furnished them?

Mr. TISDALE. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) will look at the contracts, he can ascertain that. I did not look into the details before I rose to speak. Though I accept the full responsibility of signing the contracts as Minister of Militia when those contracts were made, I had to rely very largely upon the staff as to matters of detail.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). My object was to find out where the objection came in—

Mr. TISDALE. I really could not inform the hon. gentleman, as I have not looked into that.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tisdale), who was Minister of Militia at the time the contracts under discussion were entered into, has rightly said that I have not made any charge against him or against the department of any corrupt act with reference to these contracts. I certainly have not done so and have no desire to do so. I have, however, said, and I repeat now, that I think an impropriety was committed in entering into a contract which did not begin to run until the 1st of July,

1897, for goods which were not wanted until after that date. To have entered into a contract of that kind fourteen or fifteen months before the date at which the goods were wanted seemed to me to be an extraordinary thing to do, and seemed to me to be a thing requiring explanation, which explanation I have not heard. It seemed to me a proper case to refer to the Department of Justice for an opinion as to whether the department was bound by a contract of that kind or not. In justice to the hon. gentleman, I must answer the explanation which he proffered with reference to why this contract beginning 1st July, 1897, was entered into. The explanation seemed to me to be a very weak one. That explanation was this: There were two sets of three-year contracts, the first ending 1st July, 1896, and the other ending 1st July, 1897. Having made up his mind to make new contracts from the 1st July, 1896, he was anxious that the other three years contracts, which did not terminate till a year later, should terminate at the same time as the contracts he was making. Well, Sir, it seems to me that the hon. gentleman might have arrived at the same result by another and very much fairer way, by making his contract for one year to cover the year until the three-year contracts were completed on the 1st July, 1897. But he chose the other course of entering into contracts for goods which were not wanted for fifteen months after the date when the contract was made. As I explained in the remarks which the hon. gentleman has quoted, that was why I referred the matter to the Department of Justice. Now, the hon. gentleman has charged me with inconsistency. He read the report of the Minister of Justice, and he pointed out that the report threw upon me the responsibility of cancelling these contracts. Of course it did. That report pointed out that these contracts were not legal—

Mr. TISDALE. Not binding.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Not legal. If they were legal they would be binding, and not being binding, they are not legal. The opinion of the Minister of Justice was that these contracts were not legal. Well, it seems to me, that the subsequent words are altogether superfluous. It was a matter for the Minister of Militia to deal with, most certainly; and I accept the full responsibility of dealing with it. There were two courses open to me as Minister of Militia. One was to come down to this House and ask this House to pass a Bill ratifying these three years contracts and the contract which did not begin to run until the 1st July, 1897. The other course was to terminate the contracts which the Department of Justice had pointed out were illegal. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tisdale) says that I have accepted a contract for one year. Why, Mr. Chairman,

I took very good care to say in the letter which was written to the contractors that I was prepared to take the goods which they were actually delivering and which we wanted, which it was a matter of policy and convenience to this Government to receive,—I was prepared to receive these goods, how? Subject to the approval of Parliament. These are the words of my letter. I cannot see any inconsistency there. We wanted the goods, and we are taking the goods and will pay for them when this vote is passed by Parliament. Now, the hon. gentleman has discussed the question of policy. That is an important question—the question whether it is the best policy to enter into these three-year contracts, assuming, of course, that if we adopt that policy, we shall ask for special legislation of this Parliament to make that policy legal. I do not think that the hon. gentleman has adduced arguments here which should satisfy this House that that is the best policy. The hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) stated here the other night that when it was determined that this clothing should be manufactured in Canada, it was necessary to give some permanence to the contracts in order to induce manufacturers in Canada to provide themselves with the expensive machinery necessary to do the work. I think that was the statement the hon. gentleman made. Well, I admit there is some force in that statement, but that is over. It cannot be said now that that argument, which may have been good at the outset, continues to be a good argument to-day. The hon. gentleman has pointed to the favourable character of this contract in regard to prices as compared with the former contract. That simply goes to show that goods are cheaper to-day than they were three, or two years ago; and that is the case, not only in military clothing, but in all kinds of goods. And here is an argument against the three years contract. Goods are cheapening year by year, methods of manufacturing are improved; let us, then, have the advantage of this lowering of prices, and not tie ourselves up for a term of three years, and pay three years hence prices which ought to be much lower than the prices which we agreed to pay. I think the arguments are all against the policy of a three-years contract. I think my hon. friend read a list of the persons who were asked to tender.

Mr. TISDALE. I read a list of those who were asked to tender.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I have a list of persons who were invited to furnish clothing to the department for the fiscal years 1896-97-98-99, composed of nine firms, or individuals, namely: The Sanford Manufacturing Company; E. A. Small & Co.; Boisseau & Co.; Shorey & Co.; Gillespie, Ansley & Dickson; Joseph Horsfall & Sons; The Auburn Woollen

Mr. BORDEN (King's).

Co.; Doull & Gibson; A Dupuis & Co. Three of these firms did not tender, namely, E. A. Small & Co.; Joseph Horsfall & Sons, and A. Dupuis & Co.; and the fact is that the six who did tender all got contracts. Now, I do not intend to draw any unfair conclusion from that fact, but I may say that there is a suspicion that these gentlemen had a perfect understanding among each other; there is that feeling. With regard to boots and shoes, my hon. friend gave two names.

Mr. TISDALE. Two names that tendered.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I have only one firm, Messrs. Hodgson Bros. & Co., as the only parties who were invited to tender.

Mr. TISDALE. I marked those tenders myself. There were only two tenders, but I do not know how many notices were sent out.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The hon. gentleman is correct, there were two firms asked to tender.

Mr. TISDALE. I do not know how many were asked.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Did any of these tenderers for clothing offer the same class of goods as were furnished by the Sanford Company, and at the same prices?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. There were other tenders received on sealed patterns. Now there is another matter to be considered with reference to the present system. The hon. gentleman remarked that it was necessary for these men to know beforehand whether they were going to have these goods to supply in order to make their arrangements with the factories, and buy the cloth. Now, I am informed that the scarlet serge which is used to manufacture this clothing, is supplied at only one place, that is the Sherbrooke Mills; and I am further informed that Mr. Sanford has engaged the whole output, has an absolute monopoly of the output of that mill; and that, therefore, it was absolutely impossible for anybody else, unless he made terms with Mr. Sanford, to tender for any class of clothing made out of scarlet serge—that is the statement made to me. If that is true, I think it shows how desirable it is that the present system of sending out requests to certain selected individuals, should be abandoned, and that advertisements should be published in the newspapers asking the country at large to tender for these supplies if they wish to do so, thus opening up this business to all the people engaged in the manufacture of clothing in the Dominion of Canada. I am also told that the cloth for overcoats is made exclusively at that one mill.

Now, my hon. friend spoke of the fact that prices were cheaper. I have already alluded to that. He seems to think that the price of these goods was lower in Canada than elsewhere. Now, I am informed in the department that the same class of goods can be bought in England 40 per cent below the price we pay here.

Mr. TISDALE. Not for the same quality of articles.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The same quality. Now, I accept the full responsibility in this matter, for I believe that the action I have taken was such as I could not, under the advice received from the Department of Justice, refuse to take. I believe that it will be in the interests of the country, and it will only be fair to those people who are engaged in industries of this kind, in the manufacture of clothing and cloth in Canada, that large Government contracts of this kind should be thrown open to the trade throughout the country. I believe it will be to the advantage of the department, and it will give all those people engaged in manufactures in Canada an equal chance to supply the clothing. I am sure that this department does not desire to discriminate in favour of any particular class, I care not whether they are Liberals or Conservatives. I am here to act in the interest of the public, and I propose that, other things being equal, the quality being the same, the people who can manufacture at the lowest figure, whether Conservatives or Liberals, shall have these contracts in future.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I may be permitted, as the Minister of Militia under whose administration of the department the new system was introduced, to say a few words in relation to the matter now under consideration. Sir, I do not rise for the purpose of entering into the question as to the legality or illegality of the contracts which the hon. gentleman is discussing at the present moment, but I am quite free to admit that they are not binding on the Crown. To my mind, that is not the question, as I view it, which is of the greatest importance at the present moment. The special point to consider is whether three-year contracts are in the interest of the Crown, or if the system introduced by that new departure in the old one is more in the interest of the Crown and of the public than the system which obtained previously, that of one-year contracts. I must state to hon. members, and the older members of the House will remember the fact, that in 1889 the whole question was thoroughly ventilated during a discussion extending over several weeks before the Committee of Public Accounts. I had no reason whatever to complain of the discussion which took place, nor the motives which induced hon. gentlemen to bring up that question before the committee for the purpose of discussing the whole subject. It is sufficient for me to say, however, that that question having been brought before the committee, it was under discussion for several weeks, and I think the committee and this House by means of that investigation were placed in full possession of the facts which induced the department to enter into the new system to which I refer. When I first came into office as Minister of Militia, this subject was considered, and it will be within the recollection of the officers of the department, who at that time were valuable ones, and who have been continued in office under the hon. gentleman who now occupies that prominent position, that the change was made because we learned from experience that the system of yearly contracts was open to considerable objection. I can recall—and I am speaking merely from memory and not from notes—the contract given to a man named Auclair, who was a tailor and a manufacturer. He tendered for the manufacturing of the clothing for the year, and, if my memory serves me, upon that contract we lost $2,000 or $3,000. He was unable to carry it out; he had not the means at his disposal to carry it out. His acceptance of that contract led to financial difficulties on his part, and also to the necessity of the Government expending, over and above the contract price, $2,000 or $3,000 for the purpose of obtaining some other manufacturer to take the contract off his hands and provide the department with the clothing which it required. I can recollect, also, a contract which was given, if I recollect rightly, in the city of Sherbrooke, for heavy coats, and in that case also the department suffered considerable loss. The inspector of military stores rejected the goods which were furnished by the manufacturer under the contract entered into with the Crown, and this led to heavy loss, the amount of which I am not prepared to state. The whole subject was gone into by the department. I never for one moment contended, although I occupied the office longer than any other Minister of Militia, that my experience could be relied upon to enable me to give judgment upon a question which came more properly under the men who have made a study of the matter, such as the inspector and Colonel Macpherson, who have had charge of that branch for a number of years, and who have shown, by the manner in which they have administered its affairs, that they understand thoroughly the affairs of that branch. But it was after consultation with all the officers of my department, and those who were capable of expressing an opinion upon the point, that I decided to go into the three years contract. On that point, I refer the Minister of Militia to the report of the investigation to which I have referred, made by the Public Accounts Committee in 1889, on expenditure for clothing. Colonel Macpherson, when under examination, was asked the reasons why the system had been changed, and, in reply, he said:

Did you from your practical experience of the past make such a recommendation to the Minister?—Yes; I joined with Colonel Panet on the subject, recommending that it would be desirable to continue the same contractors, as it will save the department a great deal of trouble and expense.

Every year it was found expensive to advertise for tenders all over the Dominion. But that is not a strong point, according to my own judgment, because, if that system is preferable to the old one, it is the duty of the Minister of Militia, whatever the expense may be, to adopt the system that will guard the interests of the Crown and the people. But my object in making this quotation from the report is to show that it is not a question of viewing the matter from a political standpoint, or from the standpoint of a preference for certain contractors, and leaving out other contractors, but because the judgment of the officers of the Department of Militia, whose experience covered several years, led them to arrive at the conclusion that it was in the interest of the department to put an end to the yearly contract system and adopt the three years system. Before any decision was arrived at by the then Minister of Militia, the whole matter was submitted to Council, and it was upon the authority of Orders in Council, not upon departmental action, that the system was changed.

It may very properly be asked: What advantage do you see in the three-year contract system over the one-year system. Sir. I leave it again to the officers of the department, and if the Minister looks into the records he will find that from the time we entered into the three-year contracts, prices went down and the quality and fit of the uniform were greatly improved. The reason of that is obvious. It is because men who have the capital and enter into these contracts for an extended period, consider it to their advantage to improve the manufacture of their goods by importing machinery which lead to the perfecting of the uniforms. It is well known to those who have studied the question, that if you go to Pimlico in England, where most of the uniforms not only for Great Britain, but for many continental nations, are manufactured, you will find that every year there are great improvements in the dies and in the hydraulic machinery used for the purpose of cutting out the cavalry breeches, and other articles of uniform. There are dies which will cut hundreds of sleeves at the one time, and these dies are so absolutely perfect that there is great economy in manufacturing, while at the same time the uniforms are produced in a more perfect manner than they could be by any other method. One of the reasons why the three-year system was adopted was that experience had shown to the officers in charge of that branch of the department, and many of them are still in the department, that the articles manufactured under the longer period contracts, were much better in every way than they had been before. I received that information from my officers, when I was head of the department, and I believe that the hon. Minister will receive the same information to-day. I have referred to Mr. Auclair, who had a contract for one year. I suppose his financial capabilities were rather limited, and he went about and bought his goods where probably he could get them at such low prices that he thought it was to his advantage. Subsequently it turned out not to be to his advantage, and it certainly was not to the advantage of the Crown, because it gave to our militia force uniforms which were quite unfit for use, and some of which I believe are still lying in the stores. I venture to prophesy that the Minister of Militia, taking, as I know he does, great interest in the department over which he presides, and, as I am quite certain, anxious to do everything that can be done to help on the militia force of Canada as every true Canadian should wish to do; I venture to prophesy that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden), if he reverts to the one-year system, will discover that it is a system which cannot obtain. I admit that these contracts are not binding upon the Crown, and when we adopted the system we never anticipated that they would be binding. The fact of putting into the contract a clause whereby the contractors cannot hold the Crown responsible unless the money is voted every session of Parliament to pay for these goods, indicated plainly that we did not consider the contract as anything binding upon the Crown. But we did consider that if the contractors were prepared to run that risk it was to the advantage of the Crown to adopt that system. I say again, that if the hon. Minister tries for one year the system of advertising all over the country, he will find that the trouble to the officers of his department is multiplied to an extent that makes it altogether inconvenient, to say the least, from the standpoint of departmental work. The camps under ordinary circumstances, are generally held from June to September, in view of the close of the harvest season in the different provinces, so as to suit the convenience of the men. We found under the one-year contract system, that just the very moment we required clothing we had to telegraph all over the country to get the contractors to send in the goods. Very frequently we were put to very considerable inconvenience, and very frequently we felt that it was next to impossible to meet the requirements of the forces under that system. Now, I am not partial to three-year contracts, except for one reason. Indeed, I would go so far as to give contracts for four or five years, say the life of a Parliament, because I think the Minister of Mil-tia will find that he can enter into contracts in that way under more favourable conditions, in so far as the Crown is concerned, than he could by adopting the system of yearly contracts. I am quite certain that if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) does adopt the one-year system, he will find that the goods are much inferior to those which have been furnished by contractors of great experience. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) says that one mill was given the monopoly. I can tell the hon. gentleman that so far as scarlet cloth is concerned, there is only one mill in Canada that manufactures it. The manufacture of scarlet cloth is very expensive and that expense is entailed largely by the dye. When the dyeing process is going on, it is necessary to drape the whole factory with white canvas in order to prevent the slightest possible speck from dropping on the cloth when it is placed in the scarlet dye vat. In England or on the continent, where scarlet cloth is universally used for military purposes, there is a very large demand; but the demand is very limited in Canada, and so there is only one mill engaged in the manufacture of this particular kind of cloth. The hon. gentleman also mentioned what would be a very strong point if the experience of the department had not shown the reverse; that is, that the goods furnished by the Canadian manufacturers are more expensive and not any better than the English goods. We have found that the life of a Canadian tunic is much longer than the life of an English tunic, and why? Because the best material is used by the Canadian manufacturers, as we all know, in manufacturing the cloth of which the tunics are made. The tunics made in England, it is true, look smart and are properly cut, but they are manufactured out of shoddy. That was proved during that investigation, and I ask the hon. gentleman at his leisure to look into that. It was proved by the testimony of several leading officers in the various regiments composing the militia force of Canada, that the goods manufactured in Canada were of a better quality than the goods we received from England. That is a matter of some importance, because I know that every year Canada sent to English manufacturers $200,000 of Canadian money to purchase tunics and uniforms for our militia force. When we adopted the system of obtaining that clothing from Canadian manufacturers, we kept the $200,000 of Canadian money for Canadians, we employed Canadian labour, and we obtained goods superior to what we had been getting from England. These were the reasons which influenced me; and when the hon. gentleman goes into the whole question, I think he will find that the new system was adopted because it was a vast improvement on the one which obtained when I became Minister of Militia. I regret that my hon. friend the member for Montreal

SIR ADOLPHE CARON.

Centre (Mr. Quinn) is not here. He intended to say a few words on this question, as there are in the city of Montreal several leading firms who have made a specialty of this kind of clothing, and I think he would have expressed views similar to mine, gathered from the opinion prevailing among those manufacturers. The point I wish to make is that if the hon. gentleman adopts the other system, he will have inferior contractors—men whose financial capabilities are not sufficient to enable them to carry out a large contract; because it is not to the advantage of a manufacturer of any standing to take a contract merely for one year. It would be well enough for an ordinary contract; but when it becomes necessary for a manufacturer to supplement the regular plant in his factory, by importing from Europe or elsewhere the machinery he requires for the manufacture of these military goods, a contract for one year would not justify his going to that trouble and expense. But if you grant the contract for three years, and the contractor renders justice to the department, then you can extend it as we did. It was only after we had acquired great experience as to the manufacturers that we selected probably ten or twelve of them, not more. There were very few to tender; but out of the whole number, we set aside those whose contracts had not been satisfactory to the department, and, under the advice of the officers of the department, as the hon. gentleman will see in that investigation, we sent circulars to the men who had complied with the requirements of the department, and had carried out their contracts satisfactorily. Admitting as I do that everything in the shape of political bias should be put aside for the purpose of doing the greatest possible justice to the militia force of Canada, I consider that, large as the sum may be for Canada, we expend very little money upon our citizen soldiers per annum, compared with the wants of the force. If the hon. gentleman goes into the whole question, I think he will arrive at the conclusion at which I arrived, after studying the subject as I did, and after being several years in the department.

Mr. DOMVILLE. In accordance with the understanding arrived at with the hon. Minister of Militia, I may be allowed at this time to bring up a question which I had intended to bring up in the form of a motion, leaving it to the Minister to act as he thinks fit. I do not wish to find any fault with the previous Administration, nor do I wish to introduce politics at all into the matter, or trench on the authority of the Minister of Militia, or interfere with any action he may propose to take in the future. But I cannot help feeling—and I express, I think, the opinion of a great many militia officers whom I have seen during the shooting contests here, and in Montreal and elsewhere, and I have had letters from a great many—the militia of Canada are the men who will have to do the fighting if Canada should ever be in peril; and that force will have to be commanded by officers skilled and capable to lead them, and there must be a proper and judicious administration of the force at headquarters, to see that the army is in a proper shape to take the field. Now, the militia of this country—and I speak for them as well as for myself—are not satisfied with the results of the expenditure of the money taken from the people of Canada. It is our money, and the 40,000 officers and men who do the work have a right to have something to say in regard to the management of the force. They feel that they are not simply like British soldiers, who are equipped with everything they can possibly require, who are simply scientific fighters trained to kill and supplied with all the requisites, but they are men who give their services voluntarily at great sacrifice to themselves and who are not at all equipped as they should be to take action when called upon. The hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) said that the trouble was that the Government have never been able to spend that amount which the militia required and were entitled to. In my opinion if we could get the matter properly before the taxpayers, the people would come to the conclusion that they must either have a militia fit for its duty or do away with it altogether. Let me read to you what General Herbert said, who was one of the finest soldiers that ever took the field in modern days. I have the right to speak of him now because I am not under his command, and I take this opportunity of saying that there are not many better officers in the British service. As an evidence of his fitness, he was sent out here by the Imperial Government. I can readily understand how a general officer, trying to do his duty, would find himself blocked at all points. I could readily understand how he would find that retrenchment and reconstruction were out of the way because they would interfere with vested rights. General Herbert was treading on everybody's toes. Whenever he made a move, he knocked up against somebody, who felt that a new broom was about to sweep the decks, and resented it. Here is what he said of the militia of Canada:

That the Militia Act has not fulfilled the expectations formed 25 years ago, is sufficiently evident to any one who carefully examines the present condition of the force, and compares that condition with the objects, held in view by the commission, to which I have referred. This is due to many causes, not the least of which is indicated by the fact that many important sections of the Act have remained wholly in abeyance. They never could and never can be practically applied, and their existence is calculated to give a delusive character to the power of defence possessed by the Dominion.

The time seems to have arrived when a fresh inquiry should be made into the working of the Militia Act, in order to ascertain how far it has provided an organization capable of adapting itself to ever-changing conditions and increasing responsibilities. Such an inquiry would furnish a fresh starting point and firm ground, for those who are called upon to guide the policy of the Dominion on the question of the defence of its territory.

That justifies me in asking the hon. Minister of Militia to appoint a royal commission, composed of members of this House belonging to the militia, taken from both sides, and drop politics for the moment. So far from this interfering with the Minister of Militia, I believe that when he would see it at work he would consider it a step taken in the right direction. This commission would place before the people the requirements of the militia, which the Government itself hardly dares to do, lest it might be accused of extravagance and exaggerated ideas. So far from this commission being an attack on the Militia Department, it is really strengthening the department, and the whole of Canada would believe it was a step taken in the right direction and give the highest credit to the hon. Minister of Militia. I propose to lay this matter, as shortly as I can, before the House, but the occasion is one which does not often occur. England expects her colonies to help her, England has thanked Canada for offering to send her assistance on various occasions, and we find great authorities in England, Lord Wolseley for example, expressing the hope that the day is not far off when the colonies will be auxiliaries and allies of the British Crown, and take their place on the army list. It is true they should not be forced to go abroad on active service, but they should feel that they are soldiers of the Empire and not have the finger of scorn pointed at them as they pass, and be derided as swashbucklers and militia instead of being considered soldiers. If we are to become auxiliaries of the Empire, we ought to show England that we are moving in a line to become part and parcel of that great country which has conquered the world. We ought also to be able to show England that we have some practical soldiers of our own in this country. We have young men trained at Kingston, some of whom have done credit to the Empire in Africa and on the Soudan, but it seems that to be educated at the Kingston College is a barrier to prevent our young men taking any prominent position in the militia of Canada. If that college is to be of any service to us, the young men who graduate from it should be given the preference in filling positions on the militia force. The young men are the men to fight. When they get to a certain age, like myself and others, it may perhaps be necessary to retain some of them because of some information they have, but the day must come when we shall have a thoroughly trained militia, practically equipped, and ready at a moment's notice to take the field. The hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) showed the necessity for an inquiry, when he said there was no clothing when the Militia Department wanted on some occasion to do something, and they had to send everywhere to get clothing. The hon. gentleman points to the fact that he had advocated a three or five years contract, and this would be good grounds for the Minister of Militia to look into the whole matter of equipment. Supposing Parliament should vote $3,000,000 to equip the forces or even more, it would be his duty to consult the soldiers and see what the opinions of their officers were as to what was required. If you are going to have a carbine for the cavalry, take cavalry officers opinion of the weapon; do not order a lot of saddles and then find them useless. Ask your cavalry men what is the best and most serviceable saddle. Get them together and ask their opinion. They do that in England; the Imperial Government takes advice from its officers. I am not saying that my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden) will not do that. They have had commissions sitting in England, and they called before them men representing the several arms of the service and get their advice, and, by comparing their opinions found out what was necessary for the service. It does not do to have one rifle bought to-day and another rifle bought to-morrow. Ten thousand are now ordered. I might find fault with the buying of these rifles, even though it were the act of my friends. I might find fault with the act of the late Government; I might say: Gentlemen, I think you should have hesitated before you bought these rifles. And I will give you my reason for that opinion. I would prefer to see my soldiers able to shoot before they are armed with such perfect weapons. How many of our volunteers can shoot? Some of them can come here to Ottawa, a few of them can go to England and sustain the credit of Canadian marksmanship. But I see several colonels on the other side of the House and on this, and I would appeal to them, how many regiments, in their opinion, can use the Snider-Enfield to advantage, to say nothing of the much superior weapon we are getting now? Very few of them, I venture to say. That is not their fault. The material is there, the men are good men; but how are they to learn to shoot? They cannot come up to these rifle meetings at Ottawa for many of them live at a great distance, and they could not bear the expense, nor could they afford to lose the time. Besides, they feel that they could not compete with crack shots. The soldier who cannot shoot is of no use in active service. We must adopt a system which will teach them to shoot, by giving them practice at their local headquarters. You could then compel them to become efficient, to a certain extent, before allowing them into camp or allowing them to take any part in militia drill. But, to my mind, it would be time to place such a perfect weapon as the new rifle in their hands when this was done. Take my own regiment, which is as good, I venture to say, as any of its class in Canada. I do not want to disparage them, but I venture to say that not one-third of them are able to handle the new weapon that is given out to them. It is a beautiful rifle, but requires skill to handle it to advantage. Our men should be able to march, but they must have boots. My hon. friend says that contracts were given to run three years, covering the supply of boots. What boots have they for the cavalry? A boot the cavalryman would not put on his foot; a boot he would not be seen walking about in. Yet we are committed to buy this cavalry boot for three years. I do not find fault with the Minister or, perhaps, with the General, or with the officers of the department; but the fact is that a good cavalry boot is not provided, because those who have this matter in hand, do not know a cavalry boot. They do not know a saddle. They think because the thing is made of leather and has stirrups and will go on a horse, it is a saddle. But, if the pommel is not made at the proper angle, it will cut the withers. It may not be known, but the horses in this country are differently shaped in the withers from those in England. These are things that officers who have the service at heart know, and they have a right to be heard as to the equipment of the men in their charge. It is very well for you gentlemen to buy everything; but you do not always know what we want or what will satisfy us. No doubt, your intentions are good, but there are some of these points upon which we could enlighten you. I would like to take back something I said about Surgeon General Oliver—or rather to straighten it out. I had no desire to disparage him or his equipment. All I was trying to do was to prevent this Oliver equipment being purchased until we get some other things now necessary at this moment, especially as the cost would be three or four thousand dollars. I make this explanation because he cannot defend himself in the House and I would be the last man in the House to find fault with an officer who has done such eminent service in the past as Surgeon General Oliver. It must not be overlooked that our needs are changing all the time. Everything is changing in relation to the art of war. My hon. friend talks about a three-year contract for clothing. But it cannot be known so far in advance exactly what we shall want. We might require kharkees, and we might want surges according to circumstances. We must dress according to the country we are going to. Take the case of the handsome new tunics for the cavalry. Fancy a man wearing a jacket ornamented with a beautiful imitation of gold lace while cleaning out a stable. That is not reasonable; it does not look soldier-like. We know that the officers in the olden days went about camp in full uniform. To-day, we have nothing but the roughest stuff for such work. We have what we call an active service rig. These things come from experience as we go along. But the greatest question, and the question at the foundation of all, is the question, who commands the militia. If you consult the Act, you will find that the militia is really commanded by the Queen. The Act does provide for an officer as Major General, but it gives him no authority; you cannot find in that Act where his duties are laid down. So he must either run counter to the department, or he must sit down and do nothing. That is, according to the Act, he cannot be of any use to the militia. In England, the statute called the Royal Warrant lays down the duties of the Commander-in-Chief, and says distinctly what he can do and what he cannot do. Therefore, there is no conflict of opinion between himself and the money department, presided over by the Secretary of State for War. In Canada, I suppose, our Secretary of State for War is the Minister of Militia. If that is the case, he has his general, and the general should be given some definite position. If we do not provide this for the present general, we might change the law so as to make it apply in the future, or it may be worked in by degrees. The Militia Act is far from perfect. I doubt whether a commander can convict a soldier or officer under it, because it contains the ambiguous words "provided he gets authority from headquarters." Suppose you are going into camp, and some trifling difficulty has arisen, and you want to make an example. You cannot court-martial a man without getting authority from Ottawa, and it will cost $2 to $5 to try a man before the civil authorities. You cannot take him before the civil courts, you cannot commit him; and so you have to let the matter slide. And so I could pass along from one branch to the other until we come down to the question of military education. We have got the raw material, as General Herbert says—there are no better men to fight than there are in Canada—and intelligent officers as well, and Parliament has given us the money to equip our corps. But if we are to have an efficient militia, we must have trained officers to command. Where are we to get the skilled officers? In England they have officers who go through their course in the regiment and then must go to Sandhurst and take the staff course before they can get any important position in the service. It might be well to consider whether we should not take the present military college at Kingston, and make that into a staff college for officers, and whether the Minister should not arrange in England to allow our cadets who wish to do so, to attend Sandhurst for the line and Woolwich for the artillery. Perhaps it might be found that it would be more economical and better to take our captains and majors and give them a staff training before allowing them to take charge of a regiment. An hon. gentleman says that the college might be abolished. I am not going to take that into consideration at all. I am trying to take up the various points which may be of advantage to the Minister and which will commend themselves to both sides of the House. The hon. gentleman has spoken about overcoats. I do not agree with him, because I do not think they are what they should be, but I do not wish to make any political point out of the matter. We have many precedents for having a royal commission. We have had such commissions in regard to agriculture and other matters, and I am satisfied that we could get several officers in this House who would be willing to serve and to prepare a report to submit to the Minister, under the advice of the department, which would show that we Canadians know something about military matters as well as other nations, perhaps not so skilled for lack of opportunity, but moving in the right direction, realizing that Canada may be called upon to do her part, for we are ready and willing, and the militia has nothing to gain except perhaps a little glory for ourselves and the Empire possibly. We could, however, show the world that we possess material, organization, and mobilization, and that we are thoroughly equipped. Without casting blame on anybody, I am dissatisfied with the position of the militia of Canada. I find that no less than $347,000 is expended for staff and permanent charges. That is too much money. Of a total of a million and a half no less than one-fifth is devoted to the permanent staff and permanent corps. If there are skilled officers, there are not men ready to take the field. They have neither boots to march in, nor kits, accoutrements, nor saddles for horses. In my own corps there are six kinds of saddles, and yet some hon. gentlemen were surprised that General Herbert should call attention to the fact that the militia is not fully equipped, and that the officers are grumbling from one end of the country to the other. I speak on behalf of the officers and men, and I am satisfied there is no newspaper that will not back me up to-morrow morning in the expression of my views, and will not admit that this is a movement in the right direction; that the officers should be allowed to come before a commission and say what they please, such an inquiry being conducted, for example, by three colonels selected from this side of the House and two from the Opposition. Officers would be asked what they thought about the artillery, whether they favoured guns in position or small field pieces, whether they favoured muzzle-loaders or breech-loaders. They would also be asked their views about cavalry, the engineering corps and other matters. Having made a thorough investigation and obtained the views of the service in this way the commission would be able to call on the Minister and lay their views before him, and state that if he could carry out some of the suggestions they would be glad. I should like to know how many Generals we have had in this country. There have been Generals Luard, Smith, Herbert, Middleton, and others, all Generals from England, and continuously we have followed a policy of drift—the militia affairs have been allowed to drift with the best intention on the part of the department. What is the use of an army such as reported to have been possessed by the King of Greece, consisting of 1,000 men and 2,000 generals. It may very properly be considered whether we want a General here at all. If hon. members will turn up the Militia Act they will find that the moment any difficulty occurs in this country—if Great Britain gets into trouble in this country—the General at Halifax supersedes the Governor General in Canada in case of actual war. If that be the case, might we not well consider the propriety of securing some smart, active, well-drilled and thoroughly up-to-date Lieutenant-Colonel and call him Adjutant General. Why should we not have the General at Halifax for purposes of discipline—he could come here and have a pretty good time. As to stores: if I had been leaving for the Soudan the other day I would have cabled to England, according to the army tables, and have thus ordered an equipment for 500 men. Then I would have gone home, and clothing, harness and full equipment would have been ready. Why should we not be able to make requisitions on the stores department of the British service for what we require? Such requisitions would be filled, and at the same time we would get rid of all questions respecting tenders and contracts. There would be no jobbery in regard to saddles; some of those supplied in Canada would not have lasted six weeks in camp, and the bridles were no better.

It being Six o'clock, the Committee rose, and the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

HULL AND AYLMER ELECTRIC RAILWAY.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 20) to change the name of the Hull Electric Company to the Hull and Aylmer Railway Company, and for other purposes.—(Mr. Devlin.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 1.

Mr. BELCOURT. I have several amendments to move. The first objection I take is, that the Bill has been reprinted in English and distributed only this afternoon. Several objections of a public and private character may be made, and it is of the highest importance that a Bill of this kind should receive the mature consideration of the committee. The brief time the Bill has been in the hands of hon. members has not afforded an opportunity of giving it that consideration to which it is entitled. Another objection is that the Bill has not been printed in French. I think that is a serious objection, and I urge it now; and I ask the ruling of the Chair as to whether, under these circumstances, it is not better to defer consideration of the Bill. I would ask the ruling of the Chair whether the Bill should be now considered.

Mr. DEVLIN. Before that ruling is given, I desire to mention that the same objection was taken previously, and was disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Beausoleil). The question should have been raised on the second reading. In committee, we can only proceed with the consideration of the clauses. I understand that the same question was raised on the second reading by the hon. member for Dorchester, and it was waived. Now the Bill is being considered in committee, and we cannot do otherwise than proceed with the consideration of the clauses.

Mr. TISDALE. I understand, the point previously taken that the Bill was not printed in French, was overruled, and properly so. I understand, however, the objection is that, while it is printed in English, the text has been entirely changed. No hon. member would recognize the Bill, which has just been distributed. The question as to whether the Bill should be pushed forward at the present sitting, is one for the consideration of the committee. I was not able to attend the Railway Committee, when it was considered, and I know nothing about its provisions. Since I returned from dinner, I find this Bill in my post office box, and, without having an opportunity of reading the clauses, we are asked to consider it. I have no intention of opposing the Bill, but I suggest that, as there are other important private Bills on the paper, they should be first considered, and this Bill afterwards taken up. This Bill now contains three or four clauses, whereas formerly it covered several pages.

Mr. DEVLIN. I am quite sure that hon. members have been able to read the Bill even while my hon. friend was delivering his short speech. I admit that the Bill originally was a rather long Bill; it contained 21 clauses, and these have been reduced to 5. Those hon. members who attended the committee, know the reason why the Bill was changed from 21 clauses to 5 clauses. I press the Bill for various reasons. There was strong opposition manifested, as I had reason to feel, because for four hours I met the opposition in committee. I gave every concession that could be asked of me, and I gave these concessions to such an extent, that a Bill of 21 clauses as introduced finds itself cut down to one of five clauses now. There is every reason why this Bill should be pressed now, and put through the committee. It is an important work. It is not a short street railway for it brings the population of the county of Pontiac into the city of Ottawa. As things stand to-day the entire population of that county, coming from the province of Quebec, passing through the county of Wright, and anxious to come into the capital of Canada dare not do so, simply because a certain railway existing in this city says they shall not enter. I protest against such conduct. In the interest of this large and populous county of Pontiac, as well as in the interests of the county which I have the honour to represent, this Bill should pass. But there are stronger reasons than this in favour of the Bill. During the last week this railway has brought thousands and thousands of passengers into this city, but how were they treated? The moment they got to Hull they had to step into the street and walk over half a mile in order to reach the Ottawa Street Railway, and even then, that street railway could not accommodate them. Yet they contend that we shall not have entrance into this city. I ask: shall this House declare that the city of Ottawa must be closed to this railway, but open to every other railway that thinks proper to come to it? Both the Canada Atlantic and the Canadian Pacific Railway have now entrance into this city. It is true that this line is only about ten miles in length, but it is a connecting branch between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Pontiac Pacific Railway, and, therefore, it constitutes a line of some eighty miles long. Is this road to be prevented entering the capital of Canada simply because the Ottawa Street Railway, selfish in every possible way, says it shall not. I protest against that action. There is more than that, Sir. This Bill not only asks that the railway shall enter into Ottawa, but as the branch line running from the city of Hull to the town of Aylmer was leased a few months ago by the Canadian Pacific Railway to the Hull Electric Railway Company, this Bill asks for the confirmation of that lease. It is absolutely necessary that this lease shall be confirmed by a Dominion charter, or otherwise the lease cannot be valid or legal. In consideration of all the great interests at stake, in consideration of the immense advantages which this Bill will confer upon the great county of Pontiac, in consideration of the rights which are held in this road, I ask that the committee shall at once consider this Bill, and I hope that the House will pass it now.

Mr. LISTER. We have not much time for the consideration of this Bill and speeches must be necessarily short. It is very important in the interests of Ottawa and in the interests of the surrounding country, that the Bill shall become law in some shape. As introduced the Bill was very lengthy but in committee a practically new Bill was framed covering the points that seemed to be of vital importance to the promoters of the measure. In order that this Hull Electric Railway may continue its existence, it is necessary that the lease made between it and the Canadian Pacific Railway should be confirmed, and confirmed by this Parliament. The Bill before us proposes to confirm that lease, and unless it passes within the next day or two it cannot become law. I, therefore, do not wonder at my hon. friend (Mr. Devlin) speaking somewhat warmly in the interests of the Bill. The first object of the measure is to confirm the lease which I have referred to. The Hull Electric Railway was incorporated by the province of Quebec, and under that incorporation it has no power to enter the city of Ottawa, and so the people have to leave its cars and travel a greater or lesser distance in order to make connection with the Ottawa Street Railway. Consequently, the second object of the Bill is to allow the Hull Electric Railway Company to extend their line of railway into the city of Ottawa. The Bill as originally introduced was referred to a sub-committee for the purpose of drafting a measure that would cover these two points, and they are now included in the present Bill. I see, however, that the draftsmen in preparing the Bill have inserted a further provision which gives to this Hull Electric Railway Company the right, not only to enter the city of Ottawa, but to construct lines upon the highways of the city,—with the consent, it is true, of the city council. But the difficulty as I understand it is this: that there is an agreement between the city and the Ottawa Street Railway Company, whereby the latter company are to have the exclusive right of the streets up to the year 1899. Therefore, it is proposed by this Bill to ignore the contract entered into between the city corporation and the Ottawa Street Railway Company, and thus deprive one of the parties to that contract of the rights which they hold under it. The period fixed by the contract is short, but if such is the contract, then I take it that neither this legislature nor any other legislature in the world would think of destroying the rights of one of the parties under an existing contract. So far as the Bill provides for the confirmation of the lease, and for giving the Hull Electric Railway the right to enter the city of Ottawa the Bill should be passed now. But it is clear that if the city of Ottawa have a contract with the present Street Railway Company, giving it the exclusive right of the streets for a fixed period, then it would not be fair to the Street Railway Company to ignore the provisions of that contract and give to another railway the rights which they have under their contract.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am quite prepared to agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) up to the extent which he goes, but I should like to ask the Government, if the Department of Justice has gone into this Bill? We all know that it is a Bill of very considerable importance as affecting a question of jurisdiction, and in a matter of that kind it would be quite reasonable for the ordinary members of the House to hear the Government upon that point. I also agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Tisdale) that a Bill of this importance should have more time for its consideration, and that would apply not only to the present Bill but to every other Bill coming before the House. This Bill, from being one of 21 clauses when first introduced, has been boiled down to five or six clauses. It was distributed only a short time ago, and hon. members who are called upon to express an opinion upon it can know nothing at all about it. It would be important to compare the new Bill with the old Bill, to see what changes have been made by the sub-committee to whom the Bill was referred. I speak without any possible opposition to justice being done to the Hull Company; but I speak under a sense of the responsibility of dealing with important matters like this which come before Parliament without a moment's notice, so to speak. Acquired rights have to be guarded. The Ottawa Electric Railway Company have rights, and if the Hull Company can be given privileges and advantages without our interfering with acquired rights, I am quite prepared to help them. But I think it is wrong practice, and one which may be fraught with many disadvantages, to take up and deal with a measure of the importance of this one at the last moment, especially in view of the fact that the Department of Justice holds that it involves important questions of jurisdiction. Therefore I think we should not be asked to pass this measure without having had time to look into it and compare the new Bill with the old one, to see that ample justice is done to the parties interested.

Mr. FOSTER. I think there is a good deal in what has been said by my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, as to the quick transformations that have taken place in the Bill. However, as it is now, it is not a difficult Bill to understand. I would be in favour of giving the company the right to come into Ottawa, and I would be in favour also of having the agreement which they have made with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company made legal, as they wish, and as we have power to make it. But I certainly would not be in favour of passing the second part of the first clause, which interferes with contracts that have been made, and of which I for my part do not understand the nature, nor do I think there is a pressing necessity for it. What that railway wants to do now is to get into the city, and to get its contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway legalized by this Parliament. Let us do that; and we shall be here next winter, and if the company want these other powers, and the city of Ottawa want them to have them, and it is right and fair that they should have them, we can have a little more than an hour or two to go into the question of contract rights, and dispose of it. Certainly a delay of three months will not avail anything to the disadvantage of the road. I think that latter part of clause 1 should go out.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I entirely concur in what has fallen from the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister). What objection my hon. friend who has just taken his seat has to the last clause of the first section I cannot understand. This is the first time in all my experience of railway legislation in this House that fault has been found, as it has been by my hon. friend at my left (Sir Adolphe Caron), with a Bill because we have not had time to consider it, when the fact is that the volume of the Bill had been reduced from a great many clauses down to two clauses. The Bill simply asks for two things: first, that this company may come into the city of Ottawa instead of being compelled, as it is now, to dump its passengers into the mud about half a mile from the Canadian Pacific Railway, with which railway it seeks connection; secondly, that an agreement between the town of Aylmer and this company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company shall be ratified.

Mr. FOSTER. What about the last clause of section 2?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). That is all to be done subject to the express consent of the city of Ottawa by by-law.

Mr. FOSTER. If that clause were passed as it is, would not the company have an absolute right to build on the streets of Ottawa, and would the city council have the right to refuse them the use of the streets on fair conditions?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I think the city council could impose whatever conditions they would have a right to impose under the general act of the province of Ontario. We were very careful, in shaping this Bill as it is now, to be guided by the rules we observed in regard to questions of provincial and federal jurisdiction when the Ottawa Electric Railway Company got its Bill through the House. I think the Bill is a fair one and ought to meet with the assent of every member of this House.

Mr. DEVLIN. In regard to this clause 2, there was a great deal of discussion before the committee. Finally it was referred to the lawyers of the different companies interested, and they came back to the committee with this clause prepared. The Committee on Railways and Canals adopted it without objection, and reported it to this House; but now objections are raised against it, and we are told that we are going to interfere with vested rights. What rights? Rights granted by the municipal council of the city of Ottawa. But the last clause provides that we can interfere with nothing given by the council of the city of Ottawa, for it says that "as regards so much of its line of railway as is or may be in the city of Ottawa, the company shall only exercise the powers conferred by this Act as to the location, construction and operation of its railway upon such streets, and upon such terms and conditions and for such periods as the council of the said city may approve by by-law." Not an inch of railroad can be constructed without the permission of the city council of Ottawa. More than that, not an inch of this road can be constructed in Ottawa or in the province of Ontario that is not subject to the laws of the province of Ontario governing street railways. So they have full and ample protection. We ask for no invasion of any rights granted by the city of Ottawa to the street railway company or any other company. But we ask that we shall not be stopped at a bridge where a station cannot be erected, but that we shall be allowed to go to a point where we can take our passengers for a road ninety miles in length. I ask, therefore, that that should be considered. If this objection were a valid one, why was it not put forward in the committee and not kept in reserve to be sprung on this House by the solicitor of the company? This clause was carefully considered in the committee and adopted, and now, simply for the purpose of killing my Bill, objections are made which I hope will not be entertained by the committee.

Mr. TISDALE. I know nothing about the merits of the Bill one way or another, except what I have heard in the House, for I was not in the committee, but I call attention to this objection. Clauses 1, 2 and 3, taken together, are an entire departure from the practice of the Railway Committee during the past seven or eight years. After a good deal of contention we laid down the rule in that committee that when that committee has any legislation before it in connection with a railway, under a dual charter, the committee should take the whole charge or have nothing to do with the Bill. We decided that we would not put ourselves in the position of legislating concerning a corporation that had part of its law under one legislature and part under another. This Bill not only leaves one part of the road under the Railway Act of the province of Quebec, but it absolutely declares that the balance, the part we are asked to incorporate, shall come under the railway laws of Ontario. In other words, the part of the road which we are asked to legislate into existence, we are asked to put under the railway laws of the province of Ontario. What should have been done, if we had followed out our rule, was to have considered everything that the company had done, and then provide what their powers should be in the future, and make them a corporation under the laws of the Dominion and under the jurisdiction of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. When hon. gentlemen say that this Bill only confirms specific railway agreements, they quite mistake the section, because it goes on to provide:

And the company and the Canadian Pacific Railway are hereby respectively authorized and empowered to make such other and further deeds and agreements as they may deem expedient or proper for the purpose of securing to the said Hull and Aylmer Company the right of running its trains and cars over the bridges of the Canadian Pacific Railway between the cities of Ottawa and Hull, and so on.

We therefore give them additional powers.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). What is the object?

Mr. TISDALE. That is what I want to know. When the hon. gentleman tells me that I am obstructing his Bill, I tell him that he is mistaken. I have yet to learn in the nine years I have been in this House, that I have ever been guilty of obstruction. I feel it my duty to make this objection, because the rule to which I refer has saved us a great deal of time in discussion. If the attention of the Railway Committee had been called to what they were doing and they were prepared to change their ruling, I would bow to their decision, but I do not think they did. In all seriousness, I ask that the hon. gentleman should give us some time to consider this measure. Then there is the declaration in the first clause that this is a work for the general benefit of Canada. That is an important change which demands more than hasty consideration. Some gentlemen hold the view that such a clause is not necessary, because this Parliament has jurisdiction over any railway that runs from one province to another, and I think we ought to have the opinion of the Government on this point. It is all very well to say that this Bill is giving effect to what the solicitors of the parties interested have agreed to, but that does not relieve the committee of this House from responsibility. On the contrary, my practice has always been, in cases of that kind, to give really more attention to the legislation.

Mr. DEVLIN. In reply to the hon. gentleman's objection to this work being declared for the general advantage of Canada, all I have to say is that that question was raised before the committee, and formed subject for discussion during half an hour. But as this Bill was largely opposed by the Ottawa Street Railway, and as the committee remembered that, at a time when my hon. friend was chairman of that committee, it gave a charter to the Ottawa Street Railway, with the concurrence of my hon. friend, and declared that railway to be for the general advantage of Canada, the committee admitted at once that this company deserved a hundred-fold more to be declared a work for the general benefit of Canada.

Mr. TISDALE. If we make it in accordance with our legislation, it would have a perfect right to this clause.

Mr. DEVLIN. Then my hon. friend admits the proposition that it should be declared for the general advantage of Canada to be correct, because we have to come to this Parliament for a charter. A charter was given to the Canadian Pacific Railway which disposed of seven miles of this road to this company, which to-day constitutes the Hull Electric Railway. The lease which passed between both companies has to be confirmed by this Parliament, which gave the charter to the Canadian Pacific Railway, so that we have to come here and ask for what is in this Bill. My hon. friend finds it strange that we should ask for the power of running our trains over a bridge of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Well, the solicitor of the Canadian Pacific Railway assented to this proposal and urged on the committee the advisability of adopting it. Why then should my hon. friend oppose it? It is absolutely necessary to this road, in order that it may connect with the Canadian Pacific Railway and other roads in the city of Ottawa. It is not a small line of a mile long, it is not a road running through a village, it is the great competing line between the Pontiac and Pacific Junction and the only means that road has of conveying its passengers and baggage and freight to the capital and other points in Canada. So that we have to ask the right to run over that bridge, and the Canadian Pacific Railway consents.

Mr. BELCOURT. When I rose to object to this Bill, I raised a point which I considered of some importance. I asked the Chairman to rule on the point and resumed my seat, not because I had no more objections against the Bill, but because I wanted a decision on the question. Is the Bill to be proceeded with, notwithstanding the fact that it has not been printed in French?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Beausoleil). Yes.

Mr. BELCOURT. I think the House is under a misapprehension with reference to that point, but since the Chairman has ruled against me, I propose to address my remarks to the first section.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My hon. friend has made a mistake. The Bill originally was printed in both languages. It received the second reading, and the only point raised to-night was whether the re-printed copy should be in French or not.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is a new Bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As to the question of propriety, whether the House is prepared to go on with the Bill, whether in English or French, that is a proper question to raise; but it has not been the custom of Parliament to ask that a Bill going into committee should be printed in both languages. My hon. friend is somewhat mistaken as to the rule of the House. The rule of the House has been observed. As to whether the Bill has been materially changed and involves great principles regarding conflicting provincial and Dominion jurisdiction, and as to whether the House is prepared to consider it upon this short notice, is a different thing.

Mr. BELCOURT. I object to the first clause being carried. I wish to raise the point that this Parliament ought not to decide that the works in question are for the general advantage of Canada, and I would crave the indulgence of the House while I lay the facts before them. There are three things asked for by the Bill. First, there is the confirmation of the lease made between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Hull Electric Railway Company. This is a lease of a piece of railway situated entirely within the province of Quebec, which the Canadian Pacific Railway formerly operated from the city of Hull to the town of Aylmer. It therefore relates only to a section of the Canadian Pacific Railway situated entirely within the province of Quebec, a distance of eight miles. I would invite the attention of the hon. Solicitor General and ask him whether it is competent for the Parliament of Canada to declare that a piece of railway, built and operated entirely within the territorial limits of one province, can be a work for the general advantage of Canada. I submit it cannot, unless the work connects one province with another.

Mr. DEVLIN. That is what we want to do.

Mr. BELCOURT. If that lease is confirmed this railway company will only acquire the right to run over eight miles of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the province of Quebec, and will not have obtained the right to go to Ottawa and consequently will not connect one province with the other. The second object of the Bill is to obtain permission to build a spur line, extending from the main line of this electric railway, in the city of Hull, to pass over the Dominion slides and other Dominion Government works at the Chaudiere and over the Suspension Bridge into the city of Ottawa. The third part of the Bill relates to the erection and operation of a railway in the streets of the city of Ottawa. Having raised the point whether this is for the general advantage of Canada, it will perhaps be better for me to defer the remarks I have to make until the opinion of the Minister of Justice is obtained. I think this is a matter in which we ought not to proceed without due consideration. There is another very serious objection which is germane to the one to which I have just referred, and that is that if we pass this Bill and confirm the lease in question, we shall be giving this corporation power to build a road partly in the city of Ottawa and partly in the city of Hull. The spur line to which I have referred is situated entirely on the Quebec side of the river. The whole of these works are on the other side, and every portion of the road, including this spur line, would really belong to the province of Quebec. Hon. gentlemen looking at this Bill, will see, as was very well pointed out by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), that by passing the Bill in question, we shall have a local corporation subject to three different sets of laws—part of the works in question being governed and regulated by the laws of Quebec, another part by the laws of Ontario, still another part being under the jurisdiction of this Parliament.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Was it built under a Quebec charter?

Mr. BELCOURT. Entirely under a Quebec charter. To which of these legislatures will application be made for further legislation affecting or concerning this company? Will it be the legislature of the province of Quebec, the legislature of the province of Ontario, or the Dominion Parliament? Then again, this Bill, in order to make it one entitled to the consideration of this Parliament, I submit, should have proceeded in the first instance to form this company into a Dominion corporation. If hon. gentlemen read the Bill they will see that there is nothing to make it a Dominion corporation. It still remains a Quebec corporation, with the works themselves in the province of Quebec. Under these circumstances, it seems to me, the works in question cannot be said to be for the general advantage of Canada, and I oppose the adoption of the first clause on this ground.

Mr. DAVIN. I think we ought to have the opinion of the Department of Justice on the very important point that is involved in this Bill. I am informed that the Department of Justice did pronounce a very important opinion with regard to the Bill in its original form, and in its present form the legal difficulty is enhanced; and I think the committee, before we pass this Bill, ought to have some light from the Department of Justice; and I hope my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) will enlighten us on this matter.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I do not think that any opinion was given by the Department of Justice. It was said that there were important points involved, but that is all.

Mr. BELCOURT.

But the Bill now before the committee is not the original Bill, and, as I understand, there was a consensus of opinion—indeed an agreement was reached or something equivalent to that—that this Bill, as remodelled, was acceptable—

Mr. BELCOURT. If my hon. friend will allow me to interrupt him, I would like to refer him to the report of the committee which shows that he is entirely mistaken. By referring to page 2 of the last Votes and Proceedings, he will find that the reference to the Bill is as follows:—

With respect to the first mentioned Bill your committee point out that they have amended the said Bill so as to restrict the powers granted to confirming the agreement made between the company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and to authorize the company to extend its line from Hull to Ottawa, and recommend that the title be changed to "An Act respecting the Hull Electric Company."

So the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken when he says that it was agreed that the Bill was acceptable.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). That proves nothing; it shows simply that they changed the Bill. I know that the solicitors of the various parties went out and brought us in a new Bill, and I, as one of the committee, felt that there was a general agreement among them, which was equivalent to saying, Well, in this new form the Bill is not very objectionable. I know that almost everything that was suggested was accepted, and I thought it was settled. But, if objection is now to be raised, is it because the Bill is not to the general advantage of Canada? I fear there is something back of all that, and that this is made a bumper for an objection of another kind. Is it not a fact that in this Bill the company, with the consent of the city of Ottawa and of the Governor General in Council, are permitted to build a road over to Ottawa, and is not that sufficient? It might be argued, as matter of law, that, without the authority of this Bill, they could not do that. The question was raised before the committee last year as to whether Parliament should not authorize an electric railway to run from one province to another. It was not pressed, because the Bill was withdrawn, except so far as it related to Ontario. But we have the precedent of this very company operating an electric railway here in Ottawa, having the same powers to go across to the other side. Now, if we have given that power to cross to the Quebec side, I submit that it is in the general interest of Canada that the people of Quebec should be allowed to come to this side. Where is the difference? There was no objection made against the Bill on behalf of the Ottawa Street Railway, that it was not to the general advantage of Canada that the company should be allowed to go over to Hull. Surely, if the people of Hull come over here, it is just as much to the general advantage of Canada that the people of Ottawa should go over to Hull. Now, this was hedged in by these two things, namely, that the road cannot be built except with the consent of the council of Ottawa, and next, that the Governor in Council must approve of it, the Governor in Council, who are now made the general sinking ground for giving authority to almost every Act that is passed. The Act is simply an Act to permit these people to do just what the others have done, and I consider that it is to the general advantage of Canada that this Bill should pass.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). The Bill, as originally printed, came under the notice of the Department of Justice, but not sufficiently to enable the department to declare whether the Bill was objectionable to such an extent as to be unworthy of the consideration of the House. But I am now dealing exclusively with the first clause of the Bill. If I properly understood what was said here to-night with reference to this first clause, I think there are serious legal objections to it as now drafted. I do not say that it cannot be amended as it now stands. I may say at the outset that I think it is rather a dangerous principle to adopt that this House may simply declare a work to be for the general benefit of Canada without its being in reality a work for the general benefit of Canada, taking it in that way out of the power of the local legislature, and making it one of Dominion concern. That is in itself a serious matter so far as legislation is concerned. Although I know that it has been the practice heretofore, I do not think it should be sanctioned by the Department of Justice under its present control. But, leaving that aside, if we adopt this first clause, what are we going to have? I am not sure that I have got the facts correctly, but, if I have, this is a piece of railway built under a provincial statute, entirely in the province of Quebec. It is intended that from that railway so built in the province of Quebec, a branch line should extend across the river into the city of Ottawa. Now, this clause, as at present drafted, would mean that anything done under this statute would come under the operation, in part, of the Federal Parliament and federal law, and in part, under the operation of Ontario law; that is to say, that you would have this railway composed of three parts, one part now in existence in the province of Quebec, which will remain under the operation of the Quebec law; and then you will have that portion which connects the railway in the province of Quebec with the city of Ottawa, across the river, which would be under the operation of the federal law; then you will have that other portion in the province of Ontario, in the city of Ottawa, which will be brought under the operation of the Ontario Act. You will have, as a result, if this legislation is adopted in its present form, one enterprise under the control of a corporation that we are bringing into existence now, one enterprise subject to three different systems of law. I think that is objectionable. The clause reads thus:

The works hereinafter authorized are hereby declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada.

That is to say, the work authorized by this Bill. Now, the works authorized by the Bill are works to enable this company to connect a branch with the existing railway in the province of Quebec and bring it across the River Ottawa into the city of Ottawa, and, when it comes across the river into Ontario, it comes under the operation of the Ontario Act, by clause 3. Therefore, the connecting link between the existing railway and the new railway in Ontario, which is not provided for, will come under the operation of federal law. Now, the way to remedy that, I think, would be to draw a clause which, I think, is the clause generally found in Bills of this sort, under which the whole undertaking, that already in existence in the province of Quebec, and that to be brought into existence in this province, and the connecting link between the existing Quebec enterprise and the new Ontario enterprise—to bring the whole thing under the operation of the federal statute. I think that clause ought to be amended, as was done with the Montreal Belt Line, so as to bring the whole operation under one system of law; otherwise, it would be intolerable. That is my own personal opinion of this case, expressed somewhat hastily, after hearing the discussion here to-night. But the facts being as I have stated, I have no hesitation in declaring the law to be as I have explained it.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. Does not the fact that this road crosses from one province into another, make it a work for the general advantage of Canada to begin with? I think, according to our interpretation of the Railway Act, a work becomes to the general advantage of Canada, when it crosses from one province into another, and, if there are clauses inconsistent with that, would it not be more proper to amend those clauses?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My idea would be to drop the clause altogether, because if the Bill has for its object to establish an undertaking connecting two provinces or to cross a navigable river then it comes within the operation of the federal law and is within the control of the Dominion legislature. But in that case it is unnecessary to declare it a work for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. SPROULE. We always do it.

Mr. LISTER. I do not agree with the view taken by the Solicitor General in regard to difficulties arising from this subject coming under three sections, one being under the jurisdiction of the province of Quebec, another under the jurisdiction of this Parliament, and a third under the legislature of Ontario. That difficulty would be obviated by eliminating clause 3.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am dealing with this clause, reading it with the surrounding clauses. I am stating my proposition of law on the Bill as I find it.

Mr. LISTER. There is no doubt a double jurisdiction so far as the provinces and the Dominion are concerned, but the difficulty can be got over by declaring the work to be for the general advantage of Canada. I do not think, however, that the point is a material one, because this Parliament has undoubtedly the right to legislate. The difficulty I feel is that there is a conflict between the Ottawa Street Railway Company and the corporation of the city of Ottawa. The sanction of Ottawa city to this railway extending its line into the streets would not be sufficient, for not only is the sanction of the corporation of Ottawa necessary, but the sanction of other party to the agreement, the Ottawa Street Railway Company. If this company were allowed to enter Ottawa city, it would be depriving the Ottawa Street Railway Company of rights under its contract. That is the only real objection to the Bill. If the hon. gentleman would consent to eliminate the latter portion of clause 2 there could be no objection to this Bill. It is in the interest of the whole community, and should be passed without trouble. It would enable connection to be made with the Ottawa Street Railway, and it would enable the new company to take over the line from Hull to Aylmer. Those were the two points before the Railway Committee, and I must confess my surprise at finding powers given in the Bill to build a line into Ottawa.

The hour for Private Bills having expired, the committee rose.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Militia clothing and necessaries—Ordinary vote ..... $90,000

Mr. DOMVILLE. I do not propose to occupy very much of the time of the committee on this subject, which is a very extensive one, because I think it is only necessary to indicate briefly and concisely the lines that should be followed. In 1872, Sir George Cartier was Minister of Militia and Col. Robertson Ross was Adjutant General. Col. Ross at that time said :

The difficult task of reorganizing the military forces of Great Britain has been confided to a committee, of which General Macdougall is chairman.

Mr. LISTER.

If in England it was found necessary to appoint a committee to look into military affairs, although there are dozens of generals in the country, it would be quite justifiable to have a similar investigation here. I find that General Macdougall, in 1868, reported :

It will always be difficult to form rules and regulations of a general nature on one basis for the government of a volunteer force such as that organized in Canada to meet the circumstances of the different localities on the one hand and city and rural corps on the other ; but it is satisfactory to observe that during the past few years a large amount of practical experience has been acquired, and we know the patriotic desire of the volunteers themselves.

I might give quotations from the report by General Smith and General Herbert and the General at present commanding, each of whom finds something new to discuss, but each differs in opinion. One takes up rifled ordnance, another equipment, a third establishment, and a fourth something else, but after a number of years we are just where we were, and to-day the force is not in that state of organization we desire. We must look into the organization of the militia for ourselves, into its equipment, its staff, and in fact we must thoroughly overhaul the system. This is a large question involving the interests of 40,000 men now in the force, also 40,000 men who preceded them, and we are not trespassing on the committee or on the department in asking that notwithstanding they employ scientific men from England, we should look into the organization of the force, for colonels of regiments pay money out of their own pockets and spend their time for the benefit of the people, and they should not be treated as if it was a matter of favour for anything to be conceded to the militia, and they should not be treated with superciliousness as sometimes occurs. If the committee feel with me in regard to this matter, I will ask the Minister of Militia—I do not intend to move a motion as I contemplated—to consider this matter, and I can assure him I have no desire except to strengthen his hands and improve the position of the militia force, and if he can see his way clear to appoint a commission such as I have suggested, no doubt the militia force from Nova Scotia to British Columbia will consider it to be a step in their interest. The taxpayers of Canada will feel also that their own sons who are doing the active service have something to say as to how the money is expended. They will be more content when they find we are not rushing headforemost into contracts for rifles, as we did, without consulting one another. They will feel also that we are not rushing into large contracts for clothing for three years, and that we are not equipping our men with something that we know nothing about. The Canadians who are paying the bills are willing to submit that their own commanding officers in Canada, should give an expression of opinion to the Government as to what the men really want. I do not wish to take up the time of the House any longer, but I do trust that the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) will think over what I have said, and will feel with those who do the work, that they want to be recognized and want to have an opportunity of expressing their opinion, even if it be different from the opinion of some of those in authority. When we find general officers differing one from the other, then we might fairly suppose that it would not do much harm if the officers who actually do the work of the militia, differ from those who are differing amongst themselves. I trust the Minister shortly after this session would see his way clear to grant a royal commission composed of officers in and out of this House irrespective of politics, and get their report after a thorough investigation of the present system.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I am sure the House will agree with me that anything falling from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Domville) upon a question of this kind, is entitled to the very greatest respect and consideration. That hon. gentleman is a soldier by birth, by education, and by experience, and I would be very glad if time permitted me now to enter into a discussion of some of the matters to which he referred, although I feel myself at the present moment quite unable to do so. But I will promise the hon. gentleman (Mr. Domville) that the suggestions which he has made to-night will receive the most careful consideration of the Government. I shall take the opportunity of reading his statement at my leisure, and of reporting to him and to this House the result of the investigations which I shall make into the matters to which he has called our attention.

For a line of steamers which runs between St. John, Halifax, London or Liverpool ..... $25,000

Mr. FOSTER. Who has charge of these items ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) has, but as he is not present just now, if there is objection to any particular item it can stand over.

Mr. FOSTER. It might be well to allow this item to stand. Has the Government come to any decision yet with reference to the proposed winter service from St. John or Halifax, other than the regular service ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That matter is under the consideration of the Government. If action should be taken in the direction asked by the applicants it would involve a supplementary estimate which would have to be brought down. For the present the matter has not been decided upon.

Mr. FOSTER. This estimate is for the regular service.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes. The word "Liverpool" could be taken out if thought proper, as the steamers run to London only.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no reason for that. It gives my hon. friend a chance if he should think well of it, to run for half the year to Liverpool and for the other half to London.

Steam communication from 1st April, 1896, to 31st March, 1897, between Port Mulgrave, Arichat and Canso, and between Port Mulgrave and Guysborough, and from 1st April to 30th November, 1896, between Port Mulgrave and Port Hood ..... $5,000

Mr. GILLIES. I would like to ask the Minister in charge of this particular branch whether it is the intention of the Government to have the boat which is now plying between Port Mulgrave, Arichat and Canso continued as a daily service ? I had this service established last summer by getting a Dominion subsidy, and I wish to see it continued, as it is a most necessary service.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I think it probable that the Supplementary Estimates will add something to this vote, in order that there may be a daily service, as the hon. gentleman proposes.

Lines of steamers to run between St. John and Halifax, or either, and the West Indies and South America..... $78,000

Mr. ELLIS. What is the service covered by this item ?

Mr. FOSTER. I imagine that this vote covers the direct services which have been running for about two years under the present contract, and have yet about three years to run. These include the regular service from St. John, touching at Halifax and going around the West Indian Islands as far as British Guiana and back, and another from Halifax to the Island of Jamaica and back, touching, I think, at Turk's Island. Does my hon. friend know whether any decision has been come to by the Government as to the proposal to have a vessel running from St. John to Hayti and Porto Rico ? Is that provided for in this vote ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). That is not provided for in this vote. The hon. gentleman's statement is a reply to the question asked by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis). The service is that conducted by Pickford & Black, running from St. John and Halifax to Demerara, and also from Halifax to Jamaica. These contracts have been running for some years, and have not yet expired.

Mr. ELLIS. As the votes appear on the pages of these Estimates, the inference to be drawn is that these services are from St. John as well as from Halifax. What I want is that the Minister should make a statement as to which of them is from St. John and which from Halifax. A great many members, looking at these sums, divide them between St. John and Halifax, as if each got half. That is not a fair impression, and I think the Minister should make a clear statement of the case.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The larger portion of the item, I think $60,000, is for a service from St. John and Halifax, touching at Bermuda, St. Thomas, four or five of the West Indian Islands, and terminating at Georgetown, Demerara.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at Bermuda ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It may not be required by the contract, but, as a matter of fact, the vessel touches at Bermuda, as I can testify, for I have been there. The other service is from Halifax to Jamaica, and I believe it does not touch at St. John at all.

Mr. ELLIS. Is there not a third service included in this item ?

Mr. FOSTER. There was a line to Cuba, but that has been discontinued.

Indians, Nova Scotia..... $7,850

Mr. GILLIES. Before this item passes, I would like to draw the attention of the Minister in charge of it to a certain matter in connection with the Indian fund in my county. In the Island of Cape Breton we have a tribe of Indians called the Micmac tribe, of which there are several bands placed on the several reserves in the different counties of the Island. In my county there is a band on an Indian reserve at Salmon River, in charge of the Indian agent at St. Peter's. The late Indian agent was the Rev. Mr. Chisholm. He left the parish of St. Peter's to go to another parish on the mainland. His successor was a Rev. Mr. Fraser. Owing to the office becoming vacant last May, in consequence of Mr. Chisholm's removal from the county, I was asked by the department to nominate some one for the vacancy. I thought I could not do better than send in the name of the Rev. Mr. Chisholm's successor in the parish, and consequently I sent in the name of the Rev. Mr. Fraser. He was not appointed at the time. That appointment was made by one of those Orders in Council that had not been ratified before the late Government went out of office ; but I notice that it was one of the Orders in Council which the Governor General took cognizance of and signed. Consequently the Rev. Mr. Fraser has been since then filling the position of Indian agent at St. Peter's, and the Indians of Salmon River are therefore under his charge. The medical attendant of the Indians at Salmon River for a great number of years has been Dr. Macdonald, who lives at St. Peter's, and practices his profession all over the county of Richmond. He is a gentleman in whom there is the utmost confidence personally and professionally, and he is on good terms with the Indians.

It has been brought to my notice that since the change took place in the position of Indian agent at St. Peter's, a change in the medical attendance has been brought about by some one, I do not know by whom. A very strong remonstrance was sent to the department, through me, by the chief of the Indian tribe and three of his captains, strongly objecting to any change of medical attendant being made. I called at the department and was referred to the Secretary of State (Senator Scott). He admitted having received the remonstrance, but could not lay his hands on it, and he said he would communicate with me later on. Although that petition has been in the department nearly three weeks, I have not yet had a reply to the letter I sent in with it. I therefore now call the attention of the hon. Minister to the matter and shall read to him the remonstrance, which is as follows :—

St. Peter's, Cape Breton,
September 3rd, 1896.

To the Minister of the Interior :

Sir,—We, the undersigned, in behalf of the Indians of Salmon River Reserve, desire to bring to your notice the gross injustice of being coerced by the Indian agent here of employing a physician who is objectionable to us. We deplore the prospect of being deprived of the services of our old physician, Dr. J. A. Macdonald, who has treated us for years successfully, in whose generosity, ability, and skill we have the most implicit confidence, and for whom we entertain every feeling of respect. In politics he has never been known to be an active partisan ; on the contrary, we are well aware that during party conflicts he has quietly attended to the duties of his profession.

We have full confidence in your generosity, and sense of justice to have our grievances remedied, and humbly desire you to have our old and trusted physician's services continued.

On behalf of the Indians of Salmon River Reserve.

Your obedient servants,

JOHN DENNIS, Chief.
THOMAS W. SCOTCHMAN,
ALEX. SCOTCHMAN,
PETER RICHARD, } Captains.

That was sent to me to be handed in to the department. I did so, and I assumed that as soon as it came to the notice of the Minister in charge that an innovation was being attempted by the new agent and that the services of this well-tried and experienced physician were being dispensed with and a stranger employed, he would have this medical attendant immediately restored to his position. I ask the hon. Minister now if any order has gone forth from his department to the Indian agent at St. Peter's requiring a change of medical attendance to the Indians. If so, why was it issued, and will the old order of things be restored.

Mr. DOBELL. No order has been given to change the physician and to discontinue the services of Dr. Macdonald, and no order on the subject will be given without grave consideration.

Mr. GILLIES. Will the hon. Minister see to it that instructions are at once sent to the Indian Agent at St. Peter's to have Dr. J. A. Macdonald's services engaged?

Mr. DOBELL. I cannot promise that; I can only promise that the matter shall receive favourable consideration, and all the more after what the hon. member has said to the House.

Mr. GILLIES. I assume that the Indians should be allowed to employ whatever physician they wish without coercion; and that, if the Indian agent, who is the servant of the department should attempt to interfere, instructions would be given by the department to prevent the rights of the Indians being trampled upon.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is it not true that these physicians are appointed either by the Minister departmentally or by Order in Council?

Mr. DOBELL. Some are appointed by Order in Council and some departmentally.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How was this appointment made?

Mr. DOBELL. Departmentally.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I suppose the Indian Agent would not have authority to give instructions on a matter of this kind?

Mr. DOBELL. Instructions come from the department.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Taking the facts as stated by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) either the agent has gone beyond his instructions or he has had instructions from the department.

Mr. DOBELL. I stated that no instructions had been given.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then my hon. friend will see that the agent has gone beyond his powers.

Mr. DOBELL. I would suggest that the Indian Agent may have acted that way under the late administration and not under the present one.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have been asking my hon. friend (Mr. Gillies) when Dr. Macdonald got his letter of dismissal.

Mr. GILLIES. I do not understand that there was any dismissal. But the agent compels the Indians, as this remonstrance states, to go to a new doctor; and since the new agent was sent to St. Peter's—

Mr. CAMPBELL. What is the date of the remonstrance?

Mr. GILLIES. September 3rd, 1896. The agent was appointed last June on the retirement of the former incumbent and on my recommendation. But since his appointment the agent has been compelling the Indians to employ another doctor, a man in whom they have not the same confidence, evidently, as they had in their old physician. They wish that this coercion should cease and that they should be allowed to employ the doctor they prefer.

Mr. BETHUNE. How many Indians are there in the county of Victoria, N.S.?

Mr. DOBELL. The hon. gentleman will find the figures in the report. I cannot give him the number at the moment.

Mr. BETHUNE. I desire to call attention to the amount paid for medical attendance upon the Indians in my county—$457 last year. This is about twice as much as is paid for a similar service in any other county in the maritime provinces.

Mr. LAURIER. There is room for reform.

Mr. BETHUNE. I notice that most of the salaried officers in this service are paid $100 a year. I should think it might be well to consider the advisability of extending that system to Victoria county.

Mr. MONTAGUE. With regard to the point I raised, I suppose I might properly ask the Minister what his policy would be if an Indian agent practically dismissed an officer who had been engaged in this medical work.

Mr. DOBELL. The hon. gentleman may rely upon it that the Government will give due consideration to the circumstances of the case and that no orders will be given until the facts have been ascertained. No Indian Agent will be allowed to give them orders.

Mr. GILLIES. I understand the acting Minister (Mr. Dobell) to say that the Indian Agent at St. Peter's will not be allowed to employ a doctor without orders?

Mr. DOBELL. Certainly.

Mr. GILLIES. That being the case I want to know whether the request of the Indians will be complied with and they be allowed to employ their own physicians.

Mr. DOBELL. I think I have told the hon. gentleman three times already that due consideration will be given to what he has stated and due respect paid to it.

Mr. BERGERON. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if there has been any demand on the part of the Caughnawaga Indians for emancipation?

Mr. DOBELL. No; we have had no petition to that effect.

Mr. BERGERON. I would like to ask the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Laurier) if he has had such communication from the Caughnawaga Indians.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I do not remember having received such a communication.

Mr. BERGERON. I ask the question because I was told by one of the Indians that there was such a demand, and I understood that it had been laid before the Indian Department or before my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier).

The PRIME MINISTER. The petition has not reached me yet.

Mr. BERGERON. I know it is the intention to send it.

The PRIME MINISTER. Do you favour emancipation?

Mr. BERGERON. So far as they have the right to vote, I wish they were on the same footing as other tax-payers, because I think their present position is anomalous. But, of course, that is their own business. Now, as to another matter. I see in the Estimates an item "Removal, Lake of Two Mountains Indians, $300." How does that matter stand now? I remember that this is an old thing and I thought it was finished. I think it is about eighteen years since it was decided to begin the removal of these Indians from Two Mountains.

The PRIME MINISTER. Perhaps I am more familiar with this question than is my hon. friend (Mr. Dobell). The information I have is this—that the Indians have shown little disposition to be removed from Oka to their proposed new home in Gibson township near Lake Superior, and very few have been removed. The greater number have remained at Oka; but from year to year a few families are induced to remove from Oka to Gibson, and the amount here voted is spent in continuance of the old policy. Of course we cannot compel the Indians to remove, but the policy adopted long ago after the serious trouble that took place was to remove the whole tribe to Gibson, because, so long as they remained where they were, there would be no peace. They cannot be compelled to remove, as I have said, but they are being removed gradually and slowly.

Mr. BERGERON. Is it the policy of the Government to have the Indians removing from Oka to the Gibson reserve without having a fixed date when this expenditure shall end? My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier), I am sure, must remember the old feud that existed which led to the decision to remove these Indians to Gibson reserve, and that the seminary of St. Sulpice was glad that they were going if they would remain away. But now they go too and fro—

The PRIME MINISTER. I did not say that.

Mr. BERGERON. No; I know the hon. gentleman did not say it. But I would like to know whether the Government will put a stop to it and compel the Indians to stay either at Oka or at the Gibson reserve, because I have every reason to believe that they are making a play of it, and that there will be no end to this transporting of them unless they are told that they must stay in one place or the other.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend cannot suppose, as we have undergone the trouble and expense of removing these Indians from Oka to Gibson, that we favour their going back to Oka. Moreover, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) must remember that if anything of that kind has been allowed, if they are allowed to make a play of it, as he says, that was done under the late Administration, this Administration having been less than two months in office. I am not informed that under the late Administration the Indians were allowed to make a play of it; but we know that the Indians are nomadic in their instincts, and a few may come back to Oka. The disposition of the present Government is as I believe the disposition of the late Government was, as far as practicable to carry out the policy adopted some years ago in order to put a stop to the feud which was going on at Oka. The policy is gradually to remove all the families from Oka to Gibson. But my hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron) knows the habits of the Indians well enough to know that that is a policy that cannot be carried out except with great caution.

Mr. BERGERON. But is any of this $300 for the purpose of transporting Indians back to Oka from Gibson?

The PRIME MINISTER. This is to transport them from Oka to Gibson, and not from Gibson back to Oka.

Mr. BERGERON. That is the answer I want.

Mr. SPROULE. How many have been removed?

The PRIME MINISTER. I could not say.

Mr. WILSON. I would like to ask an explanation of the appropriation for seed grain. What is given and who receives this grain?

Mr. DOBELL. The record merely states that the agent was authorized to expend a certain amount, and properly certified vouchers accompanied each distribution of seed.

Mr. WILSON. Is that used entirely at the discretion of the agent?

Mr. DOBELL. Yes, but there are certain restrictions. He cannot give it to every one.

Mr. WILSON. Are there no general instructions governing the distribution?

Mr. DOBELL. Certainly, the general instructions are that seed grain is to be given only to those who are unable to buy.

Mr. BERGERON. I see there is an increase of $300 for blankets, and I imagine that must be in Caugnawaga, because during the last election they complained they had not been well treated in respect to blankets. I am sorry to see that the member for that county is not present. These Indians are very cute, they generally vote in such a way as to give a small majority to the Queen, that is the Government, in order that they may be well treated. But it seems they had not been well treated lately, for in June last, they were angry at the Queen, and gave a small majority against her. So I suppose this $300 is to reward them for the vote they gave.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is surprising, considering the great progress they made in industry.

Mr. GUILLET. I see there is an item for seed grain in the appropriation for all the provinces except Ontario. We have a large number of Indians on reserves in Ontario, and I would like to know how it is that there is no appropriation for seed grain to Indians in that province. I do not say that there is anything improper about it, but I would like to know why it is. There are a large number of Indians cultivating land in my riding.

Mr. DOBELL. The reason is, as I stated about the Indians in Nova Scotia, that we only grant seed grain to those who are unable to buy it. In Ontario, fortunately, the Indians are so well off that they do not need any assistance to buy grain.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend is absolutely wrong, because they are supplied on certain occasions with seed grain.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Those that are not so well off.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is quite true. The plan adopted in Ontario as regards Indians has been to grant supplies of seed grain on some occasions on the requisition of the agent, who goes over the whole reserve and sees whether there are any whose crops have not been sufficient to supply them with a living until spring, and he gives grain to those who need it. I know all the instances myself in which seed grain has been supplied to the Six Nations Reserve.

Mr. DOBELL. The hon. gentleman does not state the case quite correctly when he says I am absolutely wrong, because I find that although seed grain is given to a few, the money required to buy it is paid by the other Indians out of a common fund. Therefore, I think I was correct in saying that no seed grain is given to the Indians there, because they have their own funds to buy grain with.

Mr. GUILLET. I am aware that on the reserves in the county of Northumberland there are Indians who have applied for seed grain, or for a loan, or an advance to buy seed grain, and they have, in every case, been required to pay for it, although some of them are extremely poor, and it takes the whole of their year's annuity to buy the grain. I know that no relief has been accorded to the poor Indians in that province. I draw the attention of the Minister to this matter, hoping that he will give fair-play to those Indians who are absolutely destitute.

Department of Indian Affairs—
Manitoba and the North-west Territories .....$758,700 52

Mr. CAMERON. I think this is the proper time to make a few observations upon the enormous expense connected with the administration of Indian Affairs in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. Some years ago I complained in Parliament, not only of the enormous expense, but of the absolute waste of public money involved in the management of our Indians. I did not complain so much, nor do I now complain so much, of what goes to the Indians for their support, but I did then complain and I complain now, that the staff in Manitoba and the North-west Territories is stuffed from beginning to end, that every office there is unnecessarily filled, and filled with nominees of the late Administration. I complain that the expenses here and the expenses there are not at all in proportion to the benefits received either by the country or by the Indians. Now, I do not propose discussing at length this important question, because it is late in the session and the time will not admit of it. Start at Ottawa. There is, unfortunately, no Minister appointed yet to fill that important position; I say that the circumstances, unfortunately, are such that the First Minister is not able, I suppose to make the appointment he desires to make; but there is an hon. gentleman on the floor of Parliament quite capable of making the necessary explanations, and, therefore, the country has not suffered anything yet from the non-appointment of a Minister. I find the Ottawa department costs $52,000, there being 65 employees in the office. I contend that expense is absolutely unnecessary. The Department of Indian Affairs having at its head office at Ottawa no less than 65 officials, is certainly overburdening the public service, and I trust the new Minister will, at the earliest possible moment, make careful scrutiny and a thorough investigation, and, wherever he finds a man paid for doing duties when there are no duties to perform, he will discharge that man, not on account of his politics, but simply because he has nothing to do. I find the commissioner's office at Winnipeg cost $6,799. We pay for salaries of that office $5,233, and for travelling expenses the enormous sum of $2,060. There are in the employ of the commissioner six or eight officers, and altogether they absorb from the public funds very nearly $7,000. I ask the Government to deal with this question, and to deal with it as promptly as the circumstances of the case will admit. The hon. members on the Treasury benches are not responsible for the enormous staff they employ in the North-west and Manitoba to take care of the Indians, but they will be responsible if they do not deal effectually with this expenditure, after reasonable time has been allowed. I am sure the new Minister will have a full investigation made and see how many men in the service can be dispensed with. At the Regina office the expense is run up to $24,395. The travelling expenses reach the enormous sum of $4,854. How, in the name of common sense, could the travelling expenses amount to that sum? I can only account for it by a statement made to me, that, when our officials travel to visit the Indian bands, they go with coach and four and with the paraphernalia of royalty. In this way we can well understand how large sums can be paid for travelling expenses. If there is a department in the public service that requires the pruning knife and a strong and vigorous hand from the Treasury benches, it is the Department of Indian Affairs. The cost of the Regina office was $24,395, with 31 employees. There is a commissioner at $2,400; chief inspector, $2,200; surveyor, $1,400; storekeeper, $1,300; chief clerk, $1,300; another inspector, $2,199; another clerk, $1,200; an inspector of schools, $1,200, and an assistant inspector to an inspector, $45 or $50 per month. I am perfectly satisfied that the office is overstocked, that it is stuffed, and it is stuffed nearly altogether with friends of hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not blame those hon. gentlemen for putting their friends in offices, but I blame them when there are no places for their friends to fill. What is the necessity of offices at Regina and at Winnipeg? Why should there be two inspectors, an assistant and 16 clerks in one office, besides an enormous number of other employees? There is no necessity for such an expenditure, and I am satisfied, when the new Minister of the Interior investigates the condition of affairs, he will be able to make enormous reductions. The fact is that this year we are asked to vote $50,000 more than last year, notwithstanding we have the reports from the inspectors declaring that the Indian bands are largely self-sustaining—that this band has so many acres under wheat, that the other band has so many acres in potatoes, and so on, yet the Indians cost very nearly as much to sustain them as ten or fourteen years ago. Not only in the commissioner's office and in the inspector's office, but also at the agencies, does the same condition of affairs prevail. I do not make these observations with a view to blaming the Treasury benches. They are wholly irresponsible; they have not had anything to do with these appointments; and I venture to say that they have not made any appointments of commissioner or inspector, or dismissed any of them. All these matters have been under the management of hon. gentlemen opposite, and they alone are responsible for them. My theory and plan of retrenchment is to dismiss one of these commissioners and inspectors, and abolish the Winnipeg office, and thereby save money. Hon. gentlemen should dismiss them and appoint nobody else in their places, and then it could not be said that men were dismissed for the purpose of making places for political friends. Every one knows that fifteen or sixteen years ago every Conservative who was unfit for a position in Ontario, was dumped into Manitoba and the North-west, with the result we have to-day—an enormous staff and an enormous expense that, year after year, the people are called upon to pay. Then, look for a moment at the agencies. Take the agency of Portage la Prairie. There are 478 Indians, male and females, boys and girls in the bands. The annuities distributed in 1895 amounted to $5,388. What was the expense connected with distributing that sum? I find, by the Auditor General's report that "expenses" are placed at $1,920; salaries, $1,250; travelling expenses, $643; or, in all, $3,813 necessary to pay a sum of $5,388. The annuities payable to Indians at that agency amounted to $2,950, and, in order to pay them, $3,833, including "expenses" was expended, or $7 to pay $5. Do hon. gentlemen opposite believe that is a right system? Is that the way to economize and husband the resources of the country? Quite the contrary. In the Assiniboine agency there are 180, all told, males, females, boys and girls. During the fiscal year ended 1895, we expended there $6,445. I find under the head of expenses there was a sum of $1,575, and what these are I do not know. Then there were salaries $1,260, and an amount for travel which made the total $2,887. The annuities payable under treaty to that band amount to $1,055, so that you will see that it took $2,887 to disburse $6,445, and it took $2,887, including "expenses" to pay annuities amounting to $1,055. Then take the Birtle agency. In that band there are 491 males and females, boys and girls. We disbursed last year in that agency $9,425. The amount of annuities payable to the band under treaty is $2,840. In connection with the payment of these annuities there were general expenses $3,770, salaries $2,340, travelling expenses $788, or a total of $6,898. So that to disburse $9,485 it appears to have cost the taxpayers of Canada the sum of $6,898, or, in other words, to pay those Indians their annuities of $2,840, with "expenses," it appears, if I understand the Auditor General correctly, to have cost us nearly $7,000. Well, is there no room for improvement and for economy there. Verily there is, and I trust the Minister of Finance, who is looking at me now, if he has anything to do with it, will see that these enormous expenses are greatly curtailed. I find in the File Hills Agency that the band consists of 255, males, females, boys and girls. The amount expended, according to the Auditor General, in that band was $6,470. The annuities payable to that band under treaty obligation amount to $1,400. We find in connection with that band that the general expenses were $1,633, the salaries $922, and the travelling expenses $262, or in all $2,817. It would therefore appear that it cost the people of Canada $2,817, including "expenses" to pay $6,470, or $2,817 to pay the annuities of $1,400. I think there is room for change there. I give these as only a few sample bricks from the structure. Any one who takes the trouble to read the Auditor General's Report, and I assume that report to be correct, will be amazed and astounded at the extraordinary condition of affairs that prevails in the North-west Territories and Manitoba, in connection with the management of the Indians. How it is in the other provinces I have not taken the time or the trouble to inquire. I satisfied myself that in the west there was a condition of things that required reformation, and that there was an amount of extravagance that required the vigorous application of the pruning knife. I trust that the hon. gentlemen in the Government who are responsible now will see to it that this is done. I find that in one agency there are three farm instructors and two farm labourers, and yet there are only 147 Indians in the whole band. Surely now that these Indians have attained to a state of understanding agriculture, and that many of the bands are practically self-sustaining, it is not necessary to maintain the same number of farm instructors and farm labourers that we had ten of fifteen years ago, when we undertook the task of teaching the Indians agriculture, and to be self-sustaining. Why in the name of common-sense should the agents employ white men as labourers on the farms. The Indians are willing and have been taught to labour, and if any money is to be expended it ought to be expended in giving employment to the Indians. They are the men whom we are trying to Christianize and civilize, and according to the Indian reports we have largely succeeded in doing so. I challenge you to find in the Indian reports, hardly a band that has not shown a marvellous advance in Christianity, education and agriculture. Take for example the Roseau River band. I find that they sowed last year 114 acres of wheat and fourteen acres of barley, and they sold from that reserve 11,000 pounds of Seneca at 17 cents a pound, and yet that band costs us nearly as much to-day as it cost us years ago, while at the present time the produce of their land ought to be practically enough to sustain them. In the face of that we are asked to vote hundreds of thousands of dollars for destitute Indians. According to the report of the Government last year the Long Plain band, a small band, had 93 acres under cultivation and the Swan Lake band had also 93 acres under cultivation. I give you these specimens of the condition in which the affairs of this country are managed in connection with Indians, and I trust, and I know that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House will see to it that there is a great reformation in the management of the Indian agencies, and of the Indian Commissioner's office in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. Hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches may rest assured that if there is not a reformation, it will not give satisfaction to the great tax-paying masses of the people of this country. I do not propose, Sir, to discuss this question any further to-night. If I happen to be here next session of Parliament, I intend to point out more fully and clearly, not only the extravagance, but the absolute waste of money which has taken place under the late Government in connection with the management of our Indians in Manitoba and the North-west.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall this item be adopted?

Mr. FOSTER. We surely cannot have this item adopted after such an arraignment of the policy of the Government as we have just heard. I would like to have the opinion of the acting Minister as to whether he thinks these suggestions are true or not, and if he thinks they are true, is he justified in asking for this amount of money.

Mr. CAMERON. I blamed you for it.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron) looked straight at the acting Minister, and he wanted to know why it took $6,000 expenditure to pay $2,000 annuities to the Indians of one particular band. Surely we must have an answer to that?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Does my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) think that the statement of my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Cameron) is correct?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) is not in a position to question me now with reference to that. One of his own supporters has made a most tremendous onslaught against the department for which you are now asking about $900,000. He has charged that the department is literally stuffed with useless officials, and he demands why they are to be kept there. He also has charged that in one place $6,000 is the cost of paying $2,000 of annuities to a band of Indians. Now, the Minister must give this House and the country to understand whether he thinks that is true or not. If he thinks it is true, he cannot ask for money from this House, and this House would not grant it. We must hear from the Minister.

Mr. CAMERON. Just let me say to the hon. gentleman before the Minister replies that the same charge practically was made on the floor of Parliament by the Hon. David Mills, and nobody knew better than he did what he was talking about when he spoke of the Indians of the North-west Territories. The same charge was made in the face of the hon. gentleman, and he will search "Hansard" in vain for a reply to it.

Mr. FOSTER. I am very glad my hon. friend has added that. I was going to add it myself, but he has saved me the trouble. That makes the case stronger. The First Minister sat beside the Hon. David Mills and heard that statement, year after year, and did not dissent from it. Therefore, he agreed with it. Yet he now comes, with his Ministers about him, and takes $9,000. We want to know whether, having been advised years and years beforehand, the acting Minister is going now to perpetrate this terrible outrage and iniquity any longer. My blood fairly ran cold when I heard these atrocious statements. I might take leave to doubt whether the Hon. David Mills ever made such a statement in this House as that it took $6,000 to pay $2,000 of annuities to a band of Indians.

Mr. CAMERON. I did not say so. I said it took seven dollars to pay five dollars.

The PRIME MINISTER. The Hon. Mr. Mills made that statement within the hearing of the hon. gentleman repeatedly, year after year, and he now asks, what are you going to do about it? My hon. friend should not ask such a question. He knows very well that in such an important department as the Department of the Interior, it was not possible for the Administration coming into office as we did only a few days before we had to face Parliament to get the supplies voted, to see whether there were any items in these Estimates which should not be introduced. The hon. gentleman is aware that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, when he brought down these Estimates, stated that they were practically the Estimates of the late Administration, as we had not time to look into matters and correct all those errors which we brought to the attention of the hon. gentleman opposite for years, and which he had time to correct and failed to correct, but which this Administration will be bound to correct. Everybody must understand that in order to have an effective economy it was not possible for this Administration, in the short time at their disposal, to inaugurate a system of economy which would be effective. When we had so many officials to dispose of, one inspector to look after another, and a second to look after a third, how was it possible for us to have a systematic plan for bringing harmony into this confusion? The new Minister of the

Mr. FOSTER.

Interior will have to spend several weeks looking into matters before he can have a plan ready to submit to Parliament; but he will have a plan to submit next session; and if my hon. friend is here next session, and he will be here, and he finds that we have not done anything better than was done by the late Administration, after all the criticism we poured on the late Administration, we shall have to bear the consequence of it.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no doubt my hon. friend will bear it, and in the same calm way that he takes the strictures at the present time. My hon. friend cannot get out of this position, that for years he heard his colleague sitting beside him make these statements about office-stuffing and extravagance—such statements, for instance, as that it took $6,000 simply to distribute $2,000 to a band of Indians; and if he heard that and believed it for all those years, it would not take him five minutes now to say: We can take off at least 30 or 40 per cent of the vote, and show that he meant what he said when in Opposition. I must have this from the acting Minister. Is there any case where $6,000 is paid for the simple work of paying $2,000 of annuities to a band of Indians?

Mr. DOBELL. I would like to say to the hon. member that my experience of Indian affairs is of so recent a date that if he will only give me until next January I shall hope to be able then to answer him more fully.

Mr. FOSTER. But how can you get over the fact of one of your able and honest and truthful and veracious supporters telling you, in the baldest of Queen's English, right in your face, and shaking his fist at you, that these offices are stuffed, while you are still keeping them stuffed? How can you for a single moment hesitate, and not draw your pen through five or six thousand dollars at least? I do not see how the Minister can avoid reducing the vote. I think I shall have to move that it be reduced.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I just want to add one word which I got while in the North-west from a former member of this House employed there. First of all, I may state that the Government could not do anything different from what it has done, for this reason. It must assume that there are contracts pending with these parties for distributing this money, and that they must be paid this year.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend, as a lawyer, must not forget the ruling given by the Minister of Justice that there can be no contract unless the money is voted.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). The statement made by this gentleman to me was this, that at least 50 per cent of the money intended for the Indians in the North-west would be found, if the matter were investigated, to go into the pockets of the officials and not to the Indians. But the hon. gentleman does not seem to see his own shade. This is the state of things that exists, and he laughs and treats as a joke the statement that is made. He thinks there is nothing in this at all.

Mr. FOSTER. Very serious.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I am satisfied that the statement made to me was a correct statement, and I have no doubt that the Government will see that this money is not paid out unless it is in the interest of the Indians. The first thing is to see that the Indians are attended to. It is a smaller matter to see that the officials are paid. So far as the Indians of Nova Scotia are concerned, I did not make a careful analysis of the case. I did a year or two ago, and found this much, that the Liberal doctor in the county of Antigonish was dismissed and another doctor put in, and that it took about four dollars to pay the second doctor for about each dollar formerly paid.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, here is corroborative evidence. One of my hon. friend's supporters gets up and tells the House that $6,000 is paid to distribute $2,000 of annuities. He has not been on the ground lately; but the hon. member for Guysborough has been there lately, and he had private information while there which made him believe exactly the same thing. Here are two witnesses. Surely my hon. friend cannot have this. But, ah, the selfishness of human nature! The hon. member for Guysborough gets up and talks about the extravagant expenditure on the Indians away up in the North-west, but took good care not to be here when the vote for the Nova Scotia Indians was being discussed.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I brought the matter up in the House.

Mr. CAMERON. Since that is about the sixth time the hon. gentleman has repeated that I said it took $6,000 to pay $2,000, let me tell him that I do not recollect making any such statement. I have none such in my notes. I say it would take $2.50 or so to pay $1.

Mr. FOSTER. I understood the hon. gentleman that way. But, of course, if he says he did not, I must accept the correction.

Mr. CAMERON. If I did say so, it was a slip, and, when we get the figures from the reporter, we shall see.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has a right to revise it.

Mr. CAMERON. I am not going to revise it.

Mr. FOSTER. Is my hon. friend going to throw off anything?

Mr. DAVIN. This is a very interesting subject to us. I listened to the statements made by my hon. friend, with some surprise. When the Estimates have been before the House so long, I do not think there can be any excuse for the acting Minister not being able to tell us whether it takes $6,000 or $3,500 to pay $2,000.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend who is acting Minister, is not weighed down with the active duty of attending to the details. If the Finance Minister had not been able to turn his attention to it, we would not have said anything about it, because he has been growing gray, the last few days, getting out the Supplementary Estimates, and he has not got them yet. Or even if the First Minister had this work in hand, he would be excused, because he has been struggling with a vacant portfolio, and has not yet succeeded in filling it. But my hon. friend from Quebec, who had nothing to do but look after those details, should have read up what the Hon. David Mills said. He should have counselled with the Prime Minister, who sat alongside Mr. Mills and imbibed, by the very contact and nearness, this doctrine of the utter extravagance in the Indian Department, and he should have been able to say how much stuffing there was, and have brought down the figures.

The PRIME MINISTER. If the hon. gentleman has some charity, will he not tell us whether this is true that it takes $6,000 to pay $4,000.

Mr. FOSTER. We have had so little information from hon. gentlemen opposite thus far, that I thought we might be able to put it on record that we did get a definite answer to one question.

Mr. CLANCY. In one of the campaign documents circulated by the Liberal party in the last campaign, I find it stated that the Indians cost in 1878 only $421,503, yet under Conservative rule in 1893, that was increased to $956,552, or an increase of $535,449, or 136 per cent. That must have come under the notice of every hon. gentleman opposite, as well as the First Minister, and, when they came to that one conclusion, they must have been in possession of such information as would guide them in reducing the estimates of their predecessors. It does seem to me that, before the items pass, these hon. gentlemen must take the responsibility either of having made a statement that was not true, or must be prepared to reduce the estimates.

Mr. MACDONALD (Winnipeg). I notice here an item of $4,000 for buildings. I would like to ask the Government whether any sum is included in that to replace the building of the industrial school at Elkhorn destroyed by fire a few months ago. I know that there is no school in the west doing better work than this school.

The PRIME MINISTER. This is not included in these estimates.

Mr. BETHUNE. I see no item here for medical attendance and medicine as in the votes for other provinces. I would like an explanation of that.

Mr. DOBELL. That is provided for in the vote for destitute Indians.

Indians, British Columbia ..... $124,380

Mr. BOSTOCK. I would like to know whether in the item for industrial and boarding schools anything is included for the industrial school at Williams Lake?

Mr. DOBELL. The Williams industrial school was established in 1891. The buildings, originally erected by a missionary society were placed at the disposal of the department. As the buildings were hardly suitable, the department drew plans for an addition to accommodate the boys and granted $2,000 to cover a portion of the cost, which is in the neighbourhood of $5,000. Application has later been received for a similar grant to assist in erecting buildings for the girls, which application is now receiving the earnest attention of the Government.

Mr. GILLIES. I would ask whether these schools are under inspection by British Columbia inspectors or by officers appointed by the department?

Mr. DOBELL. They are inspected by the agents of the locality, as well as by the commission.

Mr. GILLIES. I cannot understand that system of inspection, but let that pass. I would like to ask if the teachers are certificated by the authorities of British Columbia, or are they licensed by some authority issued by the department? And I would ask also how they are paid, those holding first, second, and those holding third class certificates?

Mr. DOBELL. There is no certificate, and the pay—

Mr. GILLIES. What is their qualification as teachers?

Mr. DOBELL. The schools receive a grant of so much per capita and the authorities of the schools pay the teachers.

Mr. GILLIES. How is the department made aware of the standing of the different teachers? Do they undergo any examination?

Mr. DOBELL. They make the best selection they can of those best qualified to teach the Indians.

Mr. WILSON. Is it the intention of the department to see hereafter that the teachers do pass an examination to prove that they are qualified to teach?

Mr. DOBELL. It is rather difficult to get teachers at all in these remote districts, and I fancy if we insisted upon having teachers who had taken a university degree we should be without teachers. We make the best selection we can.

Mr. WILSON. Perhaps the hon. gentleman can tell us what salaries these teachers get and what distinction is made in salary by reason of qualification?

Mr. DOBELL. They receive $200 to $300 per annum.

Mr. WILSON. What proportion are males and what females?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). And what is the colour of their eyes?

Mr. WILSON. I think this is a perfectly legitimate question that I put, and the answer will enable us to judge as to the salaries.

Mr. DOBELL. In reply to the hon. gentleman's question I do not think I shall be wrong when I say they are about half and half.

North-west Mounted Police ..... $530,000

Mr. CAMERON. I would like to ask whether it is the intention of the Government to make any investigation as to the necessity of keeping up this enormous force. A gentleman who has lived in the North-west ever since the Mounted Police force was established, a prominent man there who was in the city a week or ten days ago, assured me that one half the present force would be quite enough.

The PRIME MINISTER. Up to the present time it had never occurred to me that there should be an investigation into the question of reducing the force. I took it for granted that the force should not be reduced, that it is not more than adequate for the requirements of the country.

Mr. FOSTER. The force has been largely reduced within the last five years.

The PRIME MINISTER. I think it has been somewhat reduced. I think it now has a strength of 700 men. I am sorry the North-west members are not present, but I see one (Mr. Davin) before me. The demands upon us are rather to the extension of the force, so that they may extend their work north to the Arthabasca River and so on. At the present time we have some officers and men on the Yukon River. The mining development there makes it improbable that we shall be able to reduce the number of men there. Whatever number we withdraw from older settlements, we shall probably have to carry to the newer settlements. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron) thinks the investigation ought to be held and if he feels strongly upon the matter, the department may consider the propriety of making an investigation. But I tell him frankly that the opinion that comes to us from all parts of the North-west is that the force is not too large.

Mr. DAVIN. I am glad to hear this expression of opinion from the First Minister. My hon. friend (Mr. Cameron) who wails doubt as to whether this force is too large, is ill-informed as to the needs of the North-west and as to the demands upon the North-west Mounted Police at the present moment. Within the past few years the Mounted Police have been reduced to an extent that most of us in the North-west think, as we thought at the time, is inadvisable. If the members from the North-west Territories had had any hint whatever that it was the intention of the Government to reduce the Mounted Police, we would have protested in the strongest manner against that reduction. And I can assure my hon. friend that instead of the Government reducing the police, if they have the investigation referred to, the chances are that they may come to the conclusion that it is necessary to restore the force to its former strength. The Mounted Police of the North-west for the work it has to do, is one of the most efficient bodies as well as one of the cheapest that has ever existed. If my hon. friend will compare the cost of this force with that of police forces in other parts of the world, he will find that this force is not only efficient, but is economically managed and economically paid. As this vote is on, I would ask the hon. First Minister whether there is any chance of his taking the Bill that I have on the paper as a Government measure. I think, Sir, that it will commend itself to the First Minister who has charge of this department. I am glad that he has charge of it, and I may say that it was a source of great gratification to the people of the North-west Territories to know that the hon. gentleman had taken charge of the department himself. As he has taken charge of that department himself, I hope that the Bill I have put on the paper will at all events commend itself to him, and that he will consider whether he will not take away from the Mounted Police what might be called disabilities. For instance, at the present time they have no relative rank with the militia. When they co-operated in the North-west in 1885, if a militia officer of very short standing was to go up there, he would take command and take superior rank of any of the police officers. Therefore, I suggest to him whether he will not give the officers of the Mounted Police relative grade with the militia, and also do the justice I propose to do myself in that Bill in regard to the superannuation matter. And above all it is of the first importance to his own peace of mind, if he continues to manage that department, as well as to the efficiency of that force, that he should fence himself around by law against the importunities of politicians who will press him to put men into that police force with the rank of officer. If it is made by law the rule that all promotions to the rank of officer shall be made from men who have served in the ranks or who have degrees from the Royal Military College, I can assure him that it is the opinion of every officer and non-commissioned officer I have talked with, that it would add greatly to the efficiency of the force. When I say non-commissioned officer, I bring out a feature of that force that many are not aware of. That police force stands apart, I believe, from any other force I have read of except the police force in South Africa, in this respect, that men of good social rank and education have been up to the present time accustomed to go into that force as troopers. It is no uncommon thing to meet a man who has been at Cambridge, or an Oxford man, or to meet a man of noble family or of gentle blood from England, Ireland or Scotland, serving in the ranks in that police force. Therefore, the social objection that might be used with regard to promotions from the ranks in the regular army, could not be used in regard to this force. As the hon. gentleman has taken that department under his own charge, I press these views on him, with the hope that either at the coming session, or as early as possible, he will embody them into law.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am rather pleased on the whole with the remarks of the hon. gentleman, and especially with his concluding remarks, showing that he does not expect me to bring down any modification during the present session. I am sorry to say that I have not given to his Bill the attention which otherwise I would have given it, had I believed it possible to have any legislation on this or any other subject during the present session. But while I have no opinion on the matter at present, I can say this, however, that speaking from the best judgment I have been able to form, I consider that the closer the force is made to a military organization, the better it will be for the force itself and for the country at large. It is largely a military organization at the present time, and I think that it is to this fact that we owe the great success of the police in the North-west, and the good services they have rendered to the country. Whether it would be advisable to make it still more a military organization, is a question which I am sure is entitled to much consideration, and I may say to favourable consideration. I view with favour anything which would make the police force an absolutely military organization, so far as that is possible. With regard to superannuation, that is a matter which will engage the attention of the Government, not only as respects the Mounted Police, but with regard to the whole civil service.

To meet cost of arbitration respecting the accounts between the Dominion of Canada and the provinces of Ontario and Quebec..... $10,000

Mr. FOSTER. Does the Prime Minister know whether any appeals have been taken against the judgments given by the arbitrators?

The PRIME MINISTER. I cannot give any information on that subject.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like the hon. gentleman to make a note of it, and be able to inform us if there have been any appeals since the accession to office of the present Government.

Excise ..... $398,631

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax.) I should like to ask the Controller of Inland Revenue whether any inspector of inland revenue has been appointed at Halifax. If I understand it, H. H. Grant, the former collector, was appointed to the position of inspector.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière). No appointment has been made.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax.) I understood by the return brought down that H. H. Grant was promoted, and that his promotion, which was made by the late Government, was within the class which was confirmed by Order in Council passed by the present Government.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There was nothing specially confirmed.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax.) The position seems to be this, that Mr. Grant having been appointed by the late Government, and his appointment sanctioned by His Excellency, he should hold office at the present time. I am asking if such is the case; if not, what is the position of the matter? Mr. Grant is a very capable officer, who has served in the Department of Inland Revenue for a great number of years, and is in every way qualified for promotion. I should like to know what is the present position of the matter.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend is right. This is one of the appointments which came within the category of those that were not accepted by His Excellency.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax.) Then, has Mr. Grant been notified as to whether he is collector of inland revenue, or not?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. We have not notified him yet.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax.) When will he be notified, or is there any intention to notify him?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. My intention is, as soon as possible, to organize the service so as to diminish the expenditures, and it has been impossible for me to go over the staff of over 500 officers, scattered all over the Dominion, and arrive at any definite conclusion in regard to them. But my intention is to avail myself of every possible means in order to reorganize the service, with a view to secure economy, without interfering in any way with efficiency.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). With all deference to what the hon. Controller has stated, I do not see how that affects the question of Mr. Grant being notified of his appointment. Either he has been promoted to the position of inspector of inland revenue, or not. I understood, from the return, that he had been promoted to that office. If he has been so promoted, it would be only right to give him the usual notification of it, whatever may be the view of the Government with respect to the reorganization of the department. The ordinary courtesy extended by the department should entitle Mr. Grant to that notification, if he has been appointed, which I understand from the return and from the statement of the First Minister to have been the case. Has Mr. Grant been notified?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Does that hold true with respect to the deputy collector at Halifax, Mr. King? I understood he was to be promoted to collector, in the event of Mr. Grant being made inspector.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. As I have explained, I wish to consider, if possible, the question of reorganization, with a view to retrenchment without interfering with efficiency.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). That is no answer. What is desired is an answer from the Government as to whether it is their intention to promote the inspector.

Mr. FOSTER. I was not quite clear as to the purport of the answer made by the Prime Minister the other night. I should like to have the matter clearly stated. As I understand it, Mr. Grant falls within the category of those whose appointments, on the recommendation of the Treasury Board and report to Council, was actually signed by the Governor General. Am I right in that?

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not know that they were actually signed—the hon. gentleman knows as well as myself what took place. His Excellency returned all these Treasury Board recommendations approved, with three classes of exceptions, and we understand this does not come within the exceptions.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, the direct conclusion from that, is that all who do not come within those three exceptions, were approved by His Excellency, and are, therefore, executive documents. My hon. friend, the other night, in answer to the question, stated that all that class of appointments would stand until the Government made other arrangements. Now we hear they are not operative, they are waiting, unappointed, until the hon. Controller sees what economies he can effect. The direct corollary to my hon. friend's answer was that, no matter what changes might take place afterwards, dismissal, reorganization, promotion or distribution, those appointments approved by the Governor General, were in force, and the officers should be doing the work. Surely no other inference could be drawn. The answer given to-night goes to show that, in this case, and in all other cases, these appointments are not standing, for the Government are not executing the terms of these Orders, but are simply keeping on the officers in the old capacity.

The PRIME MINISTER. The answer is quite plain, as I stated it the other day. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) asks whether Mr. Grant has been notified. The Controller of Inland Revenue replies that he has not been notified, and will not be notified until he has had time to see what changes he may have to make in the service, and what recommendations he may have to suggest to His Excellency in regard to it. My hon. friend is not able to find out what changes are immediately necessary, with a view to diminishing the cost of the service, while at the same time not impairing its efficiency, and he says that, so long as he is not able to come to that conclusion, it is not his intention to notify the officer in regard to this position.

Mr. FOSTER. Then the hon. First Minister must modify his answer given the other evening, so far as we understood it, that, for instance, in the case of Mr. Grant, he not having come under any of the three categories of exceptions, and the Order in Council having been signed, he was collector of inland revenue. My hon. friend says that there is now no Inspector of Inland Revenue. Mr. Grant was the collector until the Treasury Board report was signed by His Excellency, and then Mr. Grant became the inspector. According to the answer given by the Prime Minister the other night, he is the Inspector. But my hon. friend (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière) says that in this case Mr. Grant is not the Inspector, although that Order in Council was approved by the Governor General, and as the Prime Minister says, stood. It now seems that Mr. Grant is still Collector, and there is no Inspector, and he is going to remain in that position until the Controller finds out whether he can do without an Inspector or not, and if he can do without an Inspector then he will not give effect to the Order in Council signed by His Excellency the Governor General.

The PRIME MINISTER. If the Controller of Inland Revenue is of the opinion that the services of Mr. Grant are to be dis-pensated with, a new recommendation will have to be made to His Excellency.

Mr. FOSTER. In the meantime Mr. Grant is not Inspector.

The PRIME MINISTER. In the meantime, Mr. Grant must give the Controller of Inland Revenue the time to consider whether or not his services are to be retained.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the Controller of Inland Revenue any idea that he can do without an Inspector of Inland Revenue in Nova Scotia?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. I will tell my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) what I propose to do. What appears to be perfectly practicable, and which would be the means of saving $2,500 a year, would be to consolidate the three maritime provinces and have only one Inspector there instead of two.

Mr. FOSTER. That might be done.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. I hope I may be able to succeed in doing that, and it would at once be the beginning of the retrenchment which I propose. With this in view I cannot admit that Mr. Grant should be notified.

Mr. FOSTER. There is nothing to be found fault with in uniting the maritime provinces under one Inspector, and it quite meets my view, in fact. It appears, however, that if any Minister feels that he may reorganize his department, he simply does not notify those persons whose appointment was signed by the Governor General, and the document has no force.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). In the meantime is Mr. Borrodaile acting Inspector in Nova Scotia.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. Mr. Borrodaile was superannuated several weeks before the last election, and he is not acting now. Mr. Grant is acting.

Mr. MONTAGUE. While these Estimates are under consideration, I should like to mention a matter arising out of the classification of the Orders in Council, which seems to have been made by the present Government. I am sure that when I mention the name it will have that consideration which is always vouchsafed to those of our late colleagues, whether they come from one side of the House or the other. A vacancy existed some little time ago in the inland revenue service in the city of London. I am not sure whether it was by death or superannuation the vacancy occurred, but it certainly took place within the last five or six months. The late Government passed an Order in Council, if I remember the circumstances correctly, removing the deputy collector at Petrolea, and giving him the vacancy in London, and then they appointed to the vacancy at Petrolea the son of the late member for Middlesex, Dr. Roome, who was highly respected on both sides of the House. I notice, however, that his appointment is placed in that category which nullifies it. It was approved by the Governor General along with the other appointments, but I understand that His Excellency made a memorandum that under certain circumstances they were not to go into effect. I do not think that this case comes within either of the exceptions to which His Excellency refers. It was not a new office, and a vacancy did not exist for over a year. I do not mention this in the way of criticism, because I know my hon. friend the leader of the Government, as well as his colleague the Controller of Inland Revenue, would be glad to do justice to the son of an old colleague, whether he belonged to one side of the House or the other.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) certain that the appointment was in the Inland Revenue Department?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Are you sure?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Positive. I would like my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) to look that up, and if it does not come within the exceptions, I am sure he will treat the case fairly. If it does come within the exceptions I do not ask for it.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. It is in the list "A."

Mr. MONTAGUE. I know, but I think it is there by mistake.

The PRIME MINISTER. We will look into it.

Weights and Measures, Gas and Electric Light Inspection ..... $100,950

Mr. DAVIN. I would like to ask my hon. friend the Controller of Inland Revenue whether he has taken any steps in the direction that I suggested, to have the Inspector of Weights and Measures in the North-west Territories inspect the manner by which the wheat of the settler is weighed when he comes to the elevator to sell it?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. We have considered this matter already, and we are going to send directions in regard to it. They complain, whether right or wrong it is impossible to say, about the manner in which the wheat is weighed at the railway elevators and others. We are going to see whether their complaints are right or not. The habit was not to allow fractions, and if there were 104 pounds, the four pounds would not be allowed. This is a private transaction between the buyer and seller, and I do not see how the Government can interfere. But what we can interfere in, and I think it is our duty to do so, is to ascertain that all the appliances connected with the weighing and gauging and measuring of grain are correct. I hope we will be able to give satisfaction to the farmers of the North-west on that point.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend the Controller of Inland Revenue will remember that at an early period of the session I brought before the House the importance of taking steps with regard to making grain standards permanent, and securing that the farmers would have a fair representation on any board that would have to do with the grain standards. I should like to know if any steps have been taken towards that, and whether next session we shall have from the Government an Act that will give a permanent standard and not a variable standard from year to year. I also wish to know whether it is the intention of the department to arrange that the standard shall be made in such a way as will secure to the farmer the full justice that he is entitled to. As my hon. friend remembers, I brought to his attention the objection, the well-grounded objection, which the farmers have to mixing scoured wheat with their wheat, holding that the standard should be made in such a way as to bring before the public the wheat of the North-west Territories in its best and purest quality. The system pursued of mixing the wheat is a system entirely to the advantage of the dealer and to the disadvantage of the farmer, and I hope my hon. friend will be able to assure us that steps are being taken to meet the disadvantages of which the farmers complain, whose complaints were brought before him by me early in the session.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. While my hon. friend intimated that the department proposed to effect retrenchment and economy in other directions, in my opinion the greater part of this item of weights and measures might be wiped out. So far as my section of the country is concerned, the whole thing is a farce. The duties, I think, could be performed, probably better, by other officers of the Government, and a great saving effected. It is to a great extent a waste of money, in my section of the country at least. I merely draw the matter to the attention of the Minister, for I think that if he looks into it he will find that the greater part of this expenditure might be saved by some reorganization such as I suggest. In addition to their salaries, these officers collect fees in many cases.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think the hon. gentleman will find that the department is very nearly self-sustaining.

Mr. FOSTER. These men do not get salaries and fees, too.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. The total expenditure is $70,000 and the fees amount to about $40,000, so that at this moment the clear cost to the country is about $30,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That would no doubt be a good saving, and I would still press on the Minister the desirability of looking into the matter. The fees are often outrageously high, and, in my opinion, the work is perfectly useless to the community.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. I assure you that the most gentle pressure would be sufficient to induce me to meet the views of my hon. friend. Only you must remember that in 1879, the whole system of inspection of weights and measures was abolished, and the whole staff dismissed, with a view to retrenchment and economy, only to be reorganized a few months afterwards. Only the late Government did not reappoint the same men. We must take that matter into careful consideration.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Do as they did.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. No, I do not want to follow their bad example; but the Government will see what can be done in the way of making considerable economy in that department. I might answer what the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) said about the standard of wheat. I may tell him that His Excellency has been recommended to organize the board which is going to sit at Winnipeg, in order to settle this in such a way as appears perfectly fair, that is, by giving the farmers one-half of the representation on the board and dividing the other half between the millers and the dealers. The farmers had certainly strong claims to be considered and I do not think we have exaggerated their right.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). It is news to me to learn that the farmers are going to be put on the board for the first time. They have always had representation on the board.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. Not so much as now proposed.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). From the remarks of the hon. gentleman, it would be inferred that the farmers had hitherto no representation. When I first took charge of the department, one of the first things I did was to increase the representation of the farmers on that board. I sympathize most heartily with the hon. Controller in the difficult task he has on hand, that of satisfying all parties interested in the cultivation and sale of wheat. Much has been said on the subject, and entirely aside of the mark—the subject of mixing wheat, to my mind, is not applicable. Can the hon. Controller give an idea whether there will be any definite order made regarding the fixing of the grain standards permanently, or whether they will be changed from year to year, as at present?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. Up to this time the standard was sixty pounds and two-thirds of Red Fife, and the farmers ask us to raise the quality of that grade to 61 pounds, and require three-fourths of Red Fife, instead of two-thirds. The second grade is raised in the same proportion to 60 pounds. Then, the scoured wheat is to be turned into a quality by itself. There is a long document, covering nearly two pages of regulations, which has been submitted to His Excellency for adoption, but these are the principal changes. The idea is to make the standards permanent. It appears to have met with the approval of the boards of trade of Montreal and Toronto, and the main objection raised in Winnipeg was to the great proportion of farmers on the board.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am very glad to see the Controller take the position of trying to make the standard of grain permanent, and I hope he will be able to do so. So far as the raising of the standard is concerned, it makes but little difference what you fix the grade at, because the value of the grain will determine its price in the end, but the great object is to have the standard fixed permanently. The idea hitherto has been that, when the crop was poor, the standard might be lowered, and, when the crop was good, it could be raised. The mixing of scoured wheat with the other wheat should certainly be prevented, and the grading instead of scoured wheat should be adopted. In no case should scoured wheat be mixed up with grades 1 or 2.

Mr. CLANCY. A good deal of dissatisfaction exists in the province of Ontario, in consequence of a want of uniformity in reaching conclusions as to testing grain. Some three or four years ago, when wheat was 80 cents a bushel, the Millers' Association fixed a certain means of grading by testing wheat. Wheat that tested 60 pounds was taken as a standard, was given the ordinary price, but if it went a pound lower, a reduction of 1 cent per bushel was made; if it went 2 pounds lower, a reduction of 3 cents was made; if it went 3 pounds lower, there was a reduction of 5 cents, and so on, until it went to 53 pounds weight, when there was a reduction of 20 cents. The farmers want some disinterested tribunal to step between the grain-buyers and the producers, and, if necessary, to fix a table. It may be said that the Millers' Association have the right to fix such table as they think proper, but they are permitted the use of instruments to test the wheat, and upon these tests the table is based. It seems to me the Government should step in and fix the proper gradings and the reductions to be made on wheat going below 60 pounds or the standard. I call attention to what is an irritating question. The hon. gentleman will find that the dissatisfaction is widespread, and that some means should be adopted by which the matter would be governed by some law, rather than mere usage, either on the part of the producer or the purchaser.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am glad the hon. member for Bothwell has brought the matter up. It is one out of which he has tried to make a good deal of capital in the recent election. I may say, there is not a man in Canada who can go into the hon. gentleman's county and buy wheat on any other terms than are at present adopted. It is not unsatisfactory to the farmers; in fact, no wheat is bought there without using the tester he speaks of, which is one of the best means ever adopted for settling the matter between the buyer and seller. It is not compulsory. It was fixed first by Order in Council by the late Government. Several Orders in Council were passed, from year to year, and the system was perfected as far as possible. And, as I said before, there is no means of buying grain that is so fair to the farmers as well as to the purchasers as that in vogue in Ontario. The hon. gentleman stated that, of course, as grain declined in weight, the price declined. Where wheat goes down to 53 pounds, as stated by the hon. gentleman, it is not fit for flour; it is only fit for feed, and should be paid for on that basis. But the hon. gentleman forgot to say that as it goes up in weight the price goes up. For instance for wheat weighing 61 pounds there is 1 cent per bushel added to the price, and so on with every further increase of one pound per bushel. So far as the farmers are concerned, I know, having had some experience, that you cannot go and buy wheat to-day without using what is called the tester. Those having good wheat to sell will not sell unless you use the tester. Those having poor wheat will perhaps do so. But this instrument has been the means of greatly improving the quality of the grain in Ontario. Formerly the buyer hastily glanced at the wheat and allowed so much for it. Now it is bought on its merits and if a man grows good grain and cleans it well he will get more for it. If he brings poor stuff into the market and not well cleaned, it will weigh so much lighter and he will get so much less. Thus there is a strong inducement to the farmer to raise good grain and clean it well, and there is no dissatisfaction with the system of buying among the farmers of Ontario.

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend has taken the trouble to defend a position that was not attacked. I did not object to the use of a tester or to proper reductions being made for lack of weight. No man in his senses, would propose that wheat weighing 53 pounds per bushel should be paid for at the same rate as wheat weighing 60 pounds per bushel.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then why do you object?

Mr. CLANCY. If the hon. gentleman had paid attention—and he is perhaps better able to pay attention to these matters and understand them than any other gentleman in the House, because he is a miller—my objection was not that the tester is used but that there is no regulation by-law governing how it is to be used.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, that is provided by Order in Council.

Mr. CLANCY. No; the order in Council to which the hon. gentleman refers does not regulate the means by which the tester is to be used. There was an outcry in the province because of the want of uniformity and it was complained that the same different results were obtained in the testing of the same grain by different persons. When this complaint was raised, I think the late Controller of Inland Revenue (Mr. Wood) will say I am right, the Government passed an Order in Council not fixing regulations for the use of the tester but providing for inspection so as to secure uniformity of size in the vessels. I wish to call the Minister's attention to the fact that in consequence of want of uniformity there has been a complaint. But there is another difficulty to which I wish my hon. friend (Mr. Campbell) would pay some attention, that the Miller's Association arbitrarily fixed a table for additions and reductions in the case of grain weighing more or less than sixty pounds. I am trying to point out that this should be fixed by a tribunal not interested on either side. They give one cent per bushel additional for every pound over sixty pounds per bushel. But let it be remembered that there is more wheat that will weigh under sixty pounds than there is wheat that will weigh over sixty pounds. For one pound less than sixty pounds they take off 1 cent per bushel, for two pounds under sixty pounds, 2 cents per bushel, for three pounds, 5 cents per bushel, for four pounds, 8 cents per bushel, for five pounds, 12 cents per bushel, for six pounds, 16 cents per bushel and for seven pounds, 20 cents per bushel. The farmers are asking that the department may fix a rule by which these reductions should be fixed not arbitrarily and specifically but according to the price. This seems to me to be fair to both sides, and I believe that the rights of both sides should be guarded, the rights of millers as well as the rights of farmers. It is, of course, admitted that the grain buyer must be guided by some rule in buying, because he has to sell by a rule. But to make the reductions specifically is not fair, nor is it fair that the reductions and additions should be fixed by one side alone.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I hope I misunderstood the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière) in his answer to the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) that he would be pleased to yield to recommendations for the abandonment of the weights and measures inspection service.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. To the reorganization of the service.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But the argument of the hon. member for North Oxford was in favour for the abandonment of the service. To my mind, taking the facts as given by the Controller of Inland Revenue—that the service brings in $40,000 a year and cost $70,000 a year showing a deficit of less than $30,000 a year—I am prepared to say that there is no service outside of the post office service that is of more practical use to the people and costs relatively so little money. As the hon. Controller knows, the service is divided into two parts, those engaged in the factories and those travelling and inspecting weights in various parts of the country. We all agree that if the hon. gentleman finds the service inefficient or over-expensive, he is perfectly right in reorganizing in order to secure economy and efficiency. But I hope he will not abolish the service which is popular with all those who buy and with all who wish to sell properly and which, in the interests of the people, should be continued. I believe the officers are good men and that they earn their money.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) is quite mistaken in thinking that it does not matter to the farmer what the standard is. The farmers of the North-west Territories and Manitoba consider that it matters a great deal to them. We feel strongly there that the grain buyers in Toronto and Montreal have a great deal too much to do at the present time with fixing the standards. Their interests are not our interests. Their interests are to fix the standards in such a manner as will be detrimental to the farmers, and I hope that the Controller of Inland Revenue will see, that when he comes to deal with this question in the future, that the people of the North-west and Manitoba are allowed to fix their own standards and supply their own measurements for their own wheat, and that, therefore, we shall not be subjected to the injustice we have suffered in the past because of the greed and machinations of the buyers in Montreal and Toronto. There is nothing in the history of business transactions, in my opinion, so insolent as the demands of the grain buyers in this matter.

Mr. RICHARDSON. As a representative of a rural constituency in Manitoba, I have felt it was desirable that the farmers should have at least an equality on the board in fixing these standards. For years we had complaints from the farmers all over the province and the Territories that these standards have not been fixed in their interest, and they had made strong representations to their representatives and others in regard to this point. Acting with other members from the west, we made representations to the Controller of Inland Revenue, and I am pleased to be able to testify to the manner in which he took the question up. He frankly told us that the interests of the farmer were to be the interests of the department. We pointed out to him that inasmuch as it was the farmers who raised the grain, inasmuch as it was the farmers who bore the burden and the heat of the day, who gave the toil to produce the wheat, they at least should be strongly represented on the board in fixing these standards, and we were able to induce the Controller to recommend that an Order in Council be passed giving one-half the representation on the board to farmers. Since the change has been recommended, I have had representations from people in the west complaining that the proposed change in regard to the composition of the board and with regard to fixing three permanent standards, No. 1 hard, No. 2 hard, and No. 1 Northern, would not be satisfactory. I may say that these representations did not come from farmers but from dealers and others interested in the manipulation of the wheat market; so that I paid no attention to these representations. I am here as a representative of the farmer, and I want to stand up in his behalf on every possible occasion. Personally I am not in a position to say what would be the best in regard to this matter, because I have not studied the question sufficiently to be an expert, but in following the direction of the farmers, I feel that I have done my duty, and if they suffer it will be their own fault. But I may say that I am disposed to think that a change will certainly be in the interest of the farmer in the long run. By securing these permanent standards we will ensure the reputation of our wheat in the European markets. I have always felt, and representations have been made to me to that effect, that the wheat grown in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, which is the best produced in the world, has not had a fair show in the London market, because I believe it has been manipulated by the dealers. The excellent quality of our wheat has been deteriorated by mixing it with scoured, and with wheat of an inferior quality, and in that way the reputation of our wheat has suffered in the British market. I want to pay a tribute to the manner in which the Controller of Inland Revenue has taken up this matter and dealt with it, as he believes, in the interest of the farmer and in the interest of the grain trade also.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I would ask the Controller of Inland Revenue what is the present numerical strength of the board?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. There are eight farmers, five millers, and three men called dealers, those who go between the farmers and the millers.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). How many farmers were on that board before ?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. Four or five, I think. But I do not think a distinction was ever made before. I remember when we began to consider the question they were not satisfied. There was a mixture, there were two grain inspectors among them, whom we have taken away altogether, because we thought that, being executive officers, they had no right to legislate upon the work they were going to do afterwards. But it did appear at that time as if there had not been a careful classification. There were farmers on the board, but I could not say how many ; I do not think there were one-half.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I have heard no complaint in the past that there were not enough farmers on the board. I do not think you will find in the records of the department any complaint since the change was made increasing the number of farmers on the board. I understood from the Controller that he was going to await the decision of the standards board, which will meet soon, if they have not met already, in Winnipeg, to get from them information upon which we could make some change in the law making the standards permanent. Am I right ?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. That can be made by Order in Council. But we have given instructions to adopt a permanent standard.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). But can the standard fixed by statute be changed by Order in Council ?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. The standards can be changed every year by Order in Council. Last year the standard was 60 pounds and two-thirds Red Fife, now we want to put it at 61 pounds and three-fourths Red Fife, at the request of the farmers. It would look at first sight as if that increase would operate against the farmer by making the standard higher, but I was much struck by the way in which the farmers looked at the matter. I wondered why they wished to raise the standard, and they said that it was in order to raise the reputation of their wheat.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). There was a change made by the late Government on their accession to power in 1879. I was not a member of this Parliament at the time. I know as a matter of history that there was an Act passed in 1879 amending the Act respecting Weights and Measures, and that this Act was much more economical as regards the number of officers employed than the previous Act, and the expense was considerably reduced. In the event of the department undertaking changes in the direction of economy, I would heartily echo what has been said by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) that it would not be a wise move to wipe out this branch of the department, because it is performing a very useful service. If economy is desired, I strongly suggest that additional work in connection with the Weights and Measures Act might be thrown on the Department of Inland Revenue, because while some of the officers are fully employed, there are always officers in every department who are not working at their full strength. That course was pursued to a limited extent by the late Government.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. I do not wish to disturb the friendly feeling which pervades the Committee at the present time by referring to what took place in 1879. But I must say that after the Government had swept out all the staff, they reorganized a new staff a few months afterwards, and I am perfectly satisfied that not one of the officers appointed by the Mackenzie Government were reinstated. That is a statement I can establish, and I could give names. As regards abolishing the system of weights and measures, I may say that it would not require much to induce me at all events to modify it so as to work it with a less number of men, because I consider the staff is at present much too large.

Resolutions reported.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY— SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows :—

ABERDEEN.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, Supplementary Estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending 30th June, 1897, and in accordance with the provisions of "The British North America Act, 1867," the Governor General recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

Government House,

Ottawa, 25th September, 1896.

Mr. LAURIER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.20 a.m. (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 28th September, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 38) to amend the North-west Territories Representation Act by dispensing with the preparation of the new voters' lists in certain cases.—(Mr. Fitzpatrick.)

DISMISSALS ON INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals whether he can say anything as to the supplementary correspondence required, under the Order of the House, in connection with the dismissal of the bridge-tenders on the Intercolonial at the port of Pictou, mentioned to him, the correspondence referred to by himself in committee, and also in the papers brought down, but not included in the return; and I called his attention to the language of the Order of the House, which covered all correspondence.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I have not yet received the further correspondence which took place between any of the parties named and the department, but I shall hurry it up.

PROROGATION.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to ask the hon. First Minister if he is able to state on what day prorogation is expected to take place. I ask simply because it will be a great convenience to many members of the House to have some idea of the day.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). It is impossible to fix any day, but, with the concurrence of my hon. friend, I hope by Saturday to be able to prorogue.

J. K. LAMBERT.

Mr. DAVIN. I should like to ask the hon. Minister of Public Works whether he has considered the case of J. K. Lambert and has rectified the error that has been committed.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I must say that I have not yet had the time to look into this matter. I intend going west as soon as the session is over, and then I will have more time to see about it.

TIGNISH, P.E.I., FIRE SUFFERERS.

Mr. HACKETT. I would like to ask the hon. leader of the Government whether he is prepared to do something on behalf of the Government for the relief of the sufferers by the fire at Tignish? I brought the matter up some days ago, and the hon. gentleman asked me to bring before him the facts in connection with the case, and he would consider the matter. On reference to a newspaper published in the city of St. John, N.B., I find:

Some days ago we set forth the claims of the Tignish, Prince Edward Island, fire sufferers for relief, in a circular issued by responsible gentlemen. So far as known as yet little relief has been received. Mr. J. J. Gallagher, the Prince Edward Island representative of Messrs. Manchester, Robertson & Allison, is now in the city. He is just from the scene of the recent fire, and reports that there are many people in absolute want of clothing. In consequence of this the firm published a notice in this morning's issue notifying the citizens that all contributions of clothing, &c., will be collected and forwarded by the firm. No doubt many citizens will take notice and send in clothing.

In the name of the thousands who are suffering in that locality, I would ask the hon. gentleman to bring down a small amount to assist them in their great suffering.

The PRIME MINISTER. I may say that this matter has been engaging the attention of the Government, and the reports we have received are of a very conflicting character, so conflicting that the Government has not yet come to a determination. I would be obliged to my hon. friend if he would kindly send me the paper he has read from.

HULL ELECTRIC COMPANY.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 20) to change the name of the Hull Electric Company to the Hull and Aylmer Railway Company, and for other purposes.—(Mr. Devlin.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). I do not think this clause is at all necessary to give the Federal Parliament authority to deal with the undertaking; but if the clause is allowed to remain in the Bill, it should be amended so as to apply to the whole undertaking. As it now reads, it is not intended to apply to the whole undertaking, but simply to that portion which is to be constructed under the Bill.

Mr. DEVLIN. I really cannot understand the objection of the hon. gentleman.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It can be very easily understood.

Mr. DEVLIN. Maybe so, but yet I do not understand it. I wish to say that two years ago this very clause was inserted in another Bill. This Parliament gave a charter to the Ottawa City Electric Railway and incorporated this clause in the Bill, and I cannot for the life of me see why this clause should be refused entrance into this Bill, which certainly, and for a great many and stronger reasons than could apply to the Ottawa company at the time it was chartered, may be considered a work for the general advantage of Canada. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) imagines that we are simply constructing a small piece of road in the province of Ontario. I wish him to understand that that is not the case. This electric road reaches from the town of Aylmer and, at the time of its completion, it will run into the city of Ottawa. Why should this Bill be singled out for the omission of this clause when a similar clause has been inserted in other Bills? It is true, as my hon. friend says, that we have a charter from the province of Quebec. It is true we have a charter from the city of Hull and from other towns. But this work becomes one general work, consisting of one line from the town of Aylmer into the city of Ottawa, and for that line we ask a Dominion charter. Now, this Parliament two years ago gave a Dominion charter to the Ottawa Electric Company, and declared it a work for the general advantage of Canada. Why not do the same in this case?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Devlin) appreciates the point raised by the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), a point that is well taken. The question is purely a question of drafting. It cannot be suggested in the spirit of opposition to any clause of the Bill, and is based upon the point that, as the Bill is to give rights to a company for connecting the two provinces, this clause is superfluous and would be very bad drafting from any point of view. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Devlin), if he desires to press the Bill, will find that dropping this clause will in no sense prejudice the rights of this company. The hon. gentleman refers to the case of the Ottawa Electric Company. There may have been good reasons for inserting the clause in that case, for, speaking from memory, the company was not given powers to build between two provinces.

Mr. DEVLIN. Yes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then the clause, from any point of view, was quite unnecessary. This Parliament has undoubted jurisdiction—no one has contended to the contrary—over any application for powers to construct a railway between two provinces in Canada. I think my hon. friend should accept the suggestion of the
Mr. FITZPATRICK.

Solicitor General and allow the clause to drop.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There is no desire to check or block the progress of this Bill. My suggestion to my hon. friend would be that the clause should be allowed to drop. Then I think he will find that every hon. member in the House will say that the remaining clauses will bring it within the scope of the federal power. But if such a clause is to be allowed to remain, I would suggest that we draft it in this way:

The undertaking of the Hull Electric Company, a company incorporated by chapter of the statutes of Quebec and hereinafter called the company, is hereby declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada.

Then we take under the operation of the federal law the enterprise in its entirety, instead of leaving the portion in the province of Quebec under the operation of the local law. That is my desire. I offer the suggestion to my hon. friend in no spirit of hostility, but because, to a certain extent, I suppose, I should be held responsible for the drafting of the Bill if I said nothing about it. I took some trouble to look into the matter, and if you will consult the statutes, you will find that this clause has been incorporated in the Acts to incorporate the Montreal Island Belt Line, the Montreal Park Island Railway, the Shore Line and the South Shore Railway and others.

Mr. DEVLIN. I did not say that the hon. gentleman was showing any hostility to my Bill, although I found it exceedingly strange that so far as the Department of Justice is concerned, these difficulties were discovered almost too late, even too late. The Bill might have become law, and would have become law, and none of these difficulties would have been known to the Department of Justice, because at the very sitting at which these clauses were to be considered, the Bill passed and we had no such suggestion. However, I never said that my hon. friend had shown hostility to the Bill. But in my anxiety to have the Bill put through, I will consent to the clause being dropped.

Section disagreed to.

On section 2,

Mr. CHARLTON. The Ottawa Electric Railway Company has certainly vested rights in this matter, in the matter of running tracks upon the streets of Ottawa, which would be infringed upon by the second section of the Bill. This second section, I see, provides that the corporation may, within the city of Ottawa, lay tracks and operate the line. The third section also makes a similar provision. By chap. 53 of 55-56 Victoria, of Canada, I find that the Ottawa City Passenger Railway Company, under the second section of the Act, received the following power :—

The company shall not take possession of, use, nor occupy the Union Bridge nor any of the approaches thereto without the assent of the Governor General in Council, but with such consent, the company may, upon such terms as the Governor in Council prescribes, use and occupy so much of the Union Bridge and of the approaches thereto as may be necessary for the railway of the company.

And further, it is provided in the contract between the city of Ottawa and the Ottawa City Passenger Railway Company :

The corporation—

That is the corporation of the city of Ottawa—

—shall not, before the 13th day of August, A.D. 1898, grant authority to any company, private individual or firm to construct and operate a street railway in any other part of Ottawa, and in the event of any company, private individual or firm thereafter proposing to construct street railways on any of the streets of the city of Ottawa, including the streets mentioned in this agreement and not occupied by the companies, and the corporation determining that there shall be street railway service on such streets, the matter and substance of the proposal shall be notified to the companies, and the option of constructing such proposed railways on the conditions contained in this agreement shall be offered to the companies, but, if such option shall not be accepted by the companies within thirty days thereafter, or if the same having been accepted, the companies shall not proceed with the necessary work and complete the same within the time limited by the corporation, the corporation may grant the authority to any company (organized after the above date), and private individual or firm, and the corporation and its grantees shall be entitled to cross the lines of the said companies, &c.

Now, under the provisions of this agreement the Ottawa City Passenger Railway Company have the exclusive right of laying down tracks upon the streets of Ottawa up to the 13th August, 1898.

Mr. DEVLIN. Over all the streets ?

Mr. CHARLTON. Over all the streets. But if the city corporation require further railway passenger facilities in the city by laying tracks over roads where tracks do not exist, the company, under the provisions of this agreement, shall have the privilege of the first chance of laying down those tracks. The company, under the provisions of this agreement, shall have the first chance of laying down those tracks, and if they fail, under certain provisions, to lay down such tracks, and to give the additional facilities which the city corporation requires, then their rights to lay such tracks shall be forfeited, and may be granted by the city to other railway companies under such conditions as may be decided upon.

Mr. FOSTER. Do I understand my hon. friend to say that provided the present company build such lines in such streets as the city council proposes, the city is bound for thirty years to give it to this company, and to no other ?

Mr. CHARLTON. That is the provision under the contract with the city of Ottawa. This Ottawa City Passenger Railway Company has exclusive rights until the 13th August, 1898. After that, the conditions are fixed by the 17th clause. Now we are proceeding under this Bill to infringe upon the rights that the Ottawa City Passenger Railway Company exercise and possess under this contract with the city of Ottawa, and under the provisions of chapter 53, 55 and 56 Victoria.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Have you the provisions relating to that exclusive right ?

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes. Now, I hold that in the matter of this electric street railway, while I have not the slightest desire to impede the operations of this company, I hold this House is dealing with a matter which pertains properly to the provincial legislatures of Quebec and Ontario ; and if we give this charter, we grant powers and exercise authority that come into conflict with the provisions already made and authority already exercised by the parties entitled to exercise them. We are interfering with the contract made by the city of Ottawa with the Ottawa City Passenger Railway Company, we are interfering with the vested rights of the Ottawa City Passenger Railway Company granted and guaranteed by virtue of this contract between the city of Ottawa and the Ottawa Electric Street Railway Company. The provisions I have read give to that railway company exclusive rights in streets of the city of Ottawa until the 13th August, 1898, and then gives them vested rights, if they comply with the conditions demanded by the city in giving such railway extension as is required. If the city says, Here is a street upon which we wish a railway track laid, and if the company complies with that request, then the company has the exclusive right to proceed with the work ; but in the event of their failing to exercise that right and failing to meet the wishes of the Ottawa city corporation, then the corporation may make arrangements with some other company for supplying the city with this service which the Ottawa City Passenger Railway Company failed to give. Under these circumstances I do not believe this House is entitled to grant to this company further powers than to come to the Union Bridge or to cross the Union Bridge and touch the bounds of the city of Ottawa. Beyond the power of crossing the Union Bridge and reaching the confines of the city, we have no right, in my opinion, to go ; we have no right to grant this company power to lay down roads within the city. For these reasons I shall oppose this Bill unless its provisions are limited to the privilege of reaching the Union Bridge, and if it is desired, of crossing the Union Bridge to the city limits.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough) I do not think there is much in that, because the Bill provides that no work can be carried on by this company except with the consent of the city council, and approved by the Governor in Council. I can see many reasons why the passage of this Bill might be in the best interests of the city and of the company. If there was an infringement, the company could take action against the city. But I do not know that we should recognize in our legislation the fact that there is any agreement that will interfere with any other company competing with the Ottawa City Railway Company. I am sure any man who has passed over the Ottawa City Railway Company will say that there is no better service in Canada. But to argue that we should not pass an Act because there is a contract with another company, and that no other company can do the work in the city of Ottawa, is rather a strange thing to come from the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). I believe the provision that before anything is done it will have to be agreed to by both the city council and the Governor in Council, makes this a perfectly safe Bill. It is in the hands of the city themselves, and it is not likely the city are going to grant any privileges to the new company when they may be mulcted at any time in an action for damages for interfering with the other company. Suppose the present city railway ceases running altogether; then it would be well that there should be a charter with some other company who could come in. I can understand how both these companies might operate in the city to each other's advantage. There may be places where the Ottawa Street Railway Company may not want to build a line; then why not permit this other company to build a line there? It may be found that these two companies can operate together, one being the feeder of the other, having a system by which those who travel upon the new company's road may also have the privilege of travelling upon the other. But it would be dangerous to say that because there is a contract, no other company shall be allowed to operate, because I think such contract would be clearly in restraint of trade, and consequently illegal.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me that if any council of the city of Ottawa was foolish enough to enter into an agreement giving a company a monopoly of the streets of Ottawa, and if a succeeding council should see it desirable to do way with such a monopoly, we should give them a right to do so. I am surprised to hear the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) advocating this, because he, above all other men in this House, has always been opposed to monopolies, and this is clearly a monopoly of the right to the streets of Ottawa. Here is a railway that is pouring in trade from a section of country extending back seventy-five miles, and when it reaches the river it has no place to do its business. When it comes to the edge of the corporation, it cannot get into the city through the hoggishness of this other company; it cannot put freight down in the city, it cannot land its passengers in the city, and they have to be dropped down in the mud opposite the city; and the Ottawa City Railway Company controls the corporation of the city so far that they have not made an effort to reach a point where they could take charge of that traffic. The Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway is the only feeder of this line, in a commercial sense, and they want to put down freight and passengers near the centre of the city, and why should they not have the right to come in? Why should we maintain a monopoly that gives to a railway company control of the streets of this city, which company is not willing to provide accommodation for the public? It seems to me unreasonable that any council of the city of Ottawa should enter into an agreement with a corporation of that nature, and give them a practical monopoly for the length of time that is indicated in this Act. I think the sooner that monopoly is done away with, the better for the travelling public.

Mr. CHARLTON. My hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) speaks of the hoggishness of this company in desiring to retain the franchise and the privileges which pertain to it by contract, stipulation and agreement. The Ottawa City Passenger Railway Company gave up to the city a perpetual franchise over a portion of its line, in consideration of the privileges granted under this contract. To talk about monopoly in this case is absurd, because there is no city in this Dominion, I venture to say, that is served so efficiently by an electric railway as is the city of Ottawa. The Ottawa City Railway Company is a wide-awake corporation prepared to afford to the public all the advantages that can be reasonably asked for. It has secured from the city of Ottawa a contract, and it surrendered for that contract a perpetual franchise. It gave for that contract this franchise, and received the privilege which that contract contains, that it should have exclusive rights in this city until the 13th August, 1898. Then the city corporation of Ottawa provided and safeguarded its interests by the provision that if it indicated to this company that it wanted additional railway lines laid upon any street, the company should proceed at once to lay those lines according to the requisition.

If within a certain length of time, I think it is thirty days, the company did not proceed to lay down the lines as required by the city corporation, then the corporation had liberty to make arrangements with other companies, and to leave this company out of consideration. We are dealing with a matter now that is not a question of monopoly. It is a question of carrying out with this Ottawa City Street Railway Company, the stipulations and agreements that were entered into, and giving to them that which they received as a quid pro quo for the concessions they made, for the franchises they abandoned, and for the measures they took to meet the wishes of the Ottawa city council. I hold that under all these circumstances, it would be an act of bad faith and an act of injustice on the part of this House to set aside the provisions of the contract, and to leave the Ottawa Street Railway unprotected in the rights they had purchased from the city, by surrendering franchises and other privileges. If the Hull Electric Railway Company is permitted to enter the confines of the city of Ottawa and to make connection with the Ottawa Street Railway, I venture to say that the public will be served just as well as if the Hull company were permitted to lay down its parallel lines in the streets, in competition with the Street Railway Company of this city. That condition of things might be injurious to both lines. It is the right of the Ottawa City Street Railway to enjoy the stipulations that are granted to it under its contract. I hold that if the Hull Electric Railway Company is permitted to cross the Union Bridge, and is permitted to make connection with the Ottawa Street Railway Company, we may rest satisfied, until we see whether the Ottawa Street Railway can afford necessary facilities for the traffic which the Hull Electric Company brings to it. These companies should be allies, and what would be for the benefit of the one would be for the benefit of the other. It will be in the interest of the Ottawa Street Railway Company to afford the Hull company all needed facilities for transacting its business, and it would unquestionably do so. We would not be doing anything to benefit the public interest by abrogating the provisions of this contract, and by taking from the Ottawa City Company that which belongs to it as a matter of right and a matter of law.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I would draw the attention of the House to the fact that the people of the city of Ottawa do not deem their street railway a monopoly, for I understand that the two representatives of the city in this House are opposed to the passage of this clause. More than that, I believe that the local member is strongly opposed to it, and the opinion of these three gentlemen who are representatives of the feeling of the city ought go a long way to show that the citizens of Ottawa do not consider that the street railway is a monopoly. This company entered into a bargain some few years ago, with the city in good faith, and they would deem it a violation of that agreement if we,—without having any particular interest because it is a local matter—should take from them their power to govern their own city and to provide as they think proper the means of travel within their municipal limits. It is necessary to understand a few things about this question before we go further. It is argued by those in favour of the present Bill that there is a gap between one railway and the other. Well, Sir, that gap arises not by any action of the Ottawa Street Railway Company, but by the action of the Hull company. They leased from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that section of road between Hull and Aylmer, and under the lease they have actually cut out that section which is now called a gap. The traffic from Pontiac and the various centres of the county has been actually taken away from the patronage of the Ottawa Street Railway Company. The Ottawa company on the other hand are prepared to fill in that gap, and in fact they have already let a contract to that effect, so that they may meet all the demands of the travelling public. These two companies interviewed the late Government on the 18th of May last, asking permission to extend their road, one from the Hull side and the other from the Ottawa side, and after the Governor in Council considered the matter carefully, they passed an Order in Council in favour of the Ottawa company extending their line to a point adjacent to the other. All that was required was a plan of the new construction, to be placed before the Minister of Public Works, and that plan was placed before and accepted by the Minister, and permission given to let the contract. The contract was let three days after permission was given, and on the 15th of November next, that gap will be closed and all the facilities formerly enjoyed by the people of Pontiac will be restored to them. There is another point in the matter. It is argued by those who know, probably better than I do, that there is no room on the Interprovincial bridge for the two railways, and that even if this legislation were passed influence would be brought to bear on the Government, from those on either side of the bridge, as to prevent the construction of this road. If you read the latter part of clause 2 you will find under it the Hull road will be permitted to come in and distribute its branch lines through the streets of the city. It reads :

And may also extend its railway into the city of Ottawa and on, over and along the streets thereof, subject to the following proviso: that as regards so much of its line of railway as is or may be within the city of Ottawa, the company shall only exercise the powers conferred by this Act as to the location, construction and operation of its railway upon such streets, and upon such terms and conditions and for such periods as the council of the said city may approve by by-law.

Now, if that clause passed, and if I had my way, I would have inserted this proviso, which would protect the city company to a greater extent than it is protected now :

Approved of by by-law, ratified by the ratepayers of the city.

You know, Mr. Chairman, that sometimes strong influences are brought to bear upon councilmen to pass a by-law, and that large privileges and franchises might be given to a company by certain ulterior influences which might probably be brought to bear upon the members of the council. But if you broaden the franchise, that is rendered less likely to be accomplished at all, and, therefore, if the clause is passed, I think that the by-law approved by council, should be ratified by the ratepayers of the city before it would take effect. In that way it would be in the hands of the city ratepayers themselves. It must be remembered that the people of Ottawa are perfectly satisfied with the service given by their street railway company, and I must say that so far as my observation goes, this company gives a better service than any other in the province of Ontario. You will notice by their charter, that on the 13th of August, 1898, any extensions that may be required by the city council so as to provide for the convenience of the people must be carried out by the company, at rates agreed to between the company and the citizens. In past years the ratepayers of Ottawa have been perfectly satisfied with the arrangements and conditions existing. We must bear in mind that the question is not the same as if the representatives of this city had asked us, or if the ratepayers of the city had petitioned us to pass a law so as to prevent a monopoly which is in existence. If that were the case then it would be our duty to look into the matter very carefully. But, as these things are not brought to bear upon Parliament by the city or by the representative men of the city, it is clear that there is perfectly good satisfaction given to the people of the city; and, therefore, I think Parliament should not interfere and allow another company to come in. In view of these facts—that the gap is to be closed up within a month and a half, that service is to be given equal to what was given by the Canadian Pacific Railway, that there is no application from the people of Ottawa for any improved facilities—I think we would be interfering prematurely to pass this provision. If, after a year or two, the people of Ottawa believe that the electric railway is not serving them properly, or doing justice to them, and they or their representatives come to Parliament and ask for the admittance of this new company, and the breaking down of the present monopoly, then, I think I would be perfectly justified in interfering; but until that time, I do not think we should pass this clause of the Bill.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman says that the ratepayers of Ottawa are perfectly satisfied with the present arrangement. That is not my information. I have heard individual complaints from a number of people who are not satisfied, but are very anxious that this company should get the power asked for in this Bill. But even if the ratepayers were satisfied, are we to overlook the interests of the great travelling public?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). They have the same connection as before.

Mr. SPROULE. The connection they had before may have been unsatisfactory, but it was used in lieu of something better. Now we have the opportunity of providing better facilities, and we should not overlook the rights of the great travelling public who are accommodated by this railway for 75 miles back, in bringing their produce into the city of Ottawa. When the interests of the travelling public demand it, a monopoly should not longer exist. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says that this is not a monopoly. I would like to know what a monopoly is. He argues that the Ottawa company should have the exclusive right to build railway lines on the streets of Ottawa. If an exclusive right is not a monopoly, I do not know what a monopoly is. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Macdonald) says the Ottawa company is prepared to fill in the gap. If they do, the public would still have to transfer from one railway to the other, and pay two railway fares.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The Ottawa Electric Railway Company are perfectly willing that the other company should have the privilege of coming to the boundary, where it goes already. Certainly, there would be a transfer, just as there was from the Canadian Pacific Railway before. Goods coming from Aylmer, Pontiac, Shawville and other places, had to be transferred at the Canadian Pacific Railway station and delivered in the city; and that is what would occur at the bridge.

Mr. SPROULE. That is just the trouble. The Ottawa company will allow passengers and freight to be dumped down at the boundary, instead of coming into the centre of the city. Why has the Ottawa, Parry Sound and Arnprior Railway Company, at great expense, brought its station into the midst of the city of Ottawa? For the convenience of the travelling public. And for the same reason this railway wants to get an entrance into the city, where it may discharge its passengers and carry its freight to the market where it is sold. It is no argument to say that the public have the same convenience as they had before. Perhaps the public had not sufficient convenience before. It is plain they had not. But, if this company get the right they ask for, they are prepared to give to the public better convenience, and they should be given that right. The hon. gentleman says the members for Ottawa are against the giving of this right. Well, it sometimes happens that members for a city do not represent the views of the people of the city, and I question very much in this instance, from what I am told privately, whether the members for Ottawa do represent the views of the people of Ottawa, if they deny the rights of this company to come into the city. It is very important to the trade of the city that that right should be given, and it is very important to the travelling public to be able to come in over one railway, instead of over two. It think it is necessary that we should give that convenience, because the interests of the great travelling public demand it; and, when that is the case, public sentiment will reach the stage at some time when the power will be taken from any company that controls any place, so far as to become a monopoly.

Mr. McCARTHY. Does the hon. gentleman advocate that, if the Ottawa Railway Company has, by contract and for good consideration, obtained from the city of Ottawa the exclusive right to the use of the streets, we should take it away from them?

Mr. SPROULE. I advocate this, on the same principle that we took away the monopoly right from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, because public sentiment got so strong that we had to do it.

Mr. McCARTHY. We had to pay for it.

Mr. SPROULE. In a measure. We gave them a consideration. But I say that, if we were foolish enough to give a monopoly to any company, and it was found afterwards to work to the detriment of the public to a great extent, we would be justified in abolishing it. But I object to any city council which is elected for only one year, entering into an agreement with a company to give away the rights of the people for thirty-three years.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to ask if the Minister of Railways has gone over this Bill. As one member of the committee, I would like to know his opinion in regard to the merits of the dispute between these two corporations, and what his suggestion would be to the committee, as Minister of Railways.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I had not the opportunity of hearing the discussion which took place on this Bill at the Railway Committee, as I was attending a meeting of the Privy Council at the time. All I have heard on the subject has been what I have been able to catch since this discussion has been going on. Some new light, I think, has been thrown on the matter, but I have not yet formed an opinion to suggest to the committee.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The reason I ask is, that I suppose the usual course has been taken of having a report made to the hon. gentleman by his officers. That was the practice heretofore with regard to railway Bills, private and public; but, I suppose, in this case that has been overlooked.

Mr. DEVLIN. I have taken note of some of the objections offered to this Bill, and I may say at once frankly that most of these objections were put before the Railway Committee, and answered there; and the Bill as it now stands, with the exception of this clause which the committee has just dropped, came before this House, as we supposed, ready to receive its sanction. I am asked why we should come to this Parliament and ask for a Dominion charter. That objection was put by the hon. gentleman who resumed his seat a few moments ago, although he knows perfectly well that there is no other Parliament in this country to which we can properly apply for a charter except the Dominion Parliament. The charter given the Canadian Pacific Railway was given by this Parliament. A part of the road belonging to the Canadian Pacific Railway has been handed over to the Hull Electric Railway, a lease has been passed, and they have to come to this Parliament and ask for a confirmation of that lease, as otherwise it is of no value. That is one of the reasons which induced us to come to this House. Again, it is a railway connecting both provinces, and it is quite reasonable that we should apply to the Dominion Parliament for a charter. Now, this road is spoken of as a small street railway. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) knows well that it is not an ordinary street railway. It is perhaps the finest railway of its kind on the continent, and a large amount of money has been invested in it. It connects the Pontiac and Pacific Junction Railway with the city of Ottawa, and with the Canadian Pacific Railway, Canada Atlantic and other lines. So that instead of this being a small street railway, it is the starting point and principal portion of a road some ninety miles long. My hon. friend knows perfectly well that the Pontiac and Pacific Junction Railway, starting from a northern point in the county of Pontiac, brings its passengers and freight and supplies into the town of Aylmer, where they are transferred to this Hull Electric Railway, and by it brought into the city of Ottawa—at least not into the city of Ottawa, for it stops in the city of Hull at a corner. It has no station there, and its passengers are obliged to get off and walk across to suit the convenience of the Ottawa Electric Railway. Why is it that a railway of this importance, having a large amount of capital invested in it, with all the characters of a large steam railway, except that it is moved by electrical power, should be the only one to be refused an entrance into the Capital, and that simply to please the Ottawa Electric Railway. There is not a man in this House who will say that the business community of Ottawa want the entrance to the city refused to this line. It is in the interest of every business man in this city that this road, laden with freight and passengers, from the large county of Pontiac, should be allowed into this city. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said that the Ottawa Electric Railway has exclusive right to the streets of Ottawa.

Mr. McCARTHY. No, I said if it has. I do not know what it has—I do not know anything about it.

Mr. DEVLIN. I venture the statement that it has not. It has the exclusive right only to those streets through which it runs. We are quite willing to leave it to the streets on which it runs, and find some back way, if possible, on which it does not run, by which we can get to a point where we can land our passengers and freight and build our station. Bear in mind, Sir, that this is a road which carries an immense quantity of passengers and freight. Millions of feet of lumber are carried over it. It is a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, of which it was said that it was the most paying branch of the entire system, on account of the passengers and the freight it carried; yet to-day we must be told, to please the Ottawa Electric Railway Company and nobody else, that we must stop over there at that little corner in Hull and not come into the Capital of Canada, our entrance into which would be of great advantage to all the business interests in this city. I answered all these objections in the committee. To please the members of that committee, I dropped sixteen clauses of the Bill. The lawyers representing the various interests met together and came to an understanding to agree to this Bill as it was this afternoon, when we opened the proceedings of the House. It was agreed upon and reported to the House, and now fresh objections are made. I consented, a moment ago, to a proposal made by the hon. Solicitor General that a certain clause should be left out, and the House was under the impression that the Bill would then safely go through. Hardly, however, was that amendment settled than a serious objection was formulated to clause 2, and I venture to say that if I were to drop this clause also, we would have objections to every other line in every other clause. In the interests of the county I represent, a county which is largely served by this Bill, and which demands entrance into this Capital, I ask that the doors of the Capital shall not be declared closed against us by the Dominion Parliament. We want to invade no rights of the Ottawa Street Railway. These rights are protected, in the strongest possible way, by this very clause 2. I have personally no interest in the road. Far from it, it is a road that used all its influence against me day and night, and influences of the strongest character, but out of regard for the interests of the county of Pontiac, I ask that this clause be adopted and shall insist on a vote.

Mr. DEVLIN.

Mr. LOUNT. There is a strong objection urged by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) against this Bill, namely, that an exclusive privilege was given by the Ontario legislature to the Ottawa Electric Railway Company. It is contended by the promoter of this Bill that there is no such exclusive privilege. I have not been able to read the Act with care, but the best consideration I can give it leads me to the belief that probably an exclusive right has been granted by the Ontario legislature. However, that is a question perhaps for the determination of the courts, but still we should avoid a reference to the courts if possible. It occurs to me that we should endeavour, as far as possible, to escape what is claimed to be a monopoly which has been granted to the Ottawa Street Railway. All monopolies are objectionable, and I consider that the Ontario legislature, in giving this exclusive right—if such right has been granted—went in the wrong direction, and, as far as I am personally concerned, as a member of the committee, I would endeavour to find a way out of the difficulty. It occurs to me that there is a way to grant the passage of this clause, without infringing upon the exclusive privilege given by the Ontario Act to the Ottawa Street Railway Company, if such exclusive privilege was given. This second clause, which is now objected to, has this provision:

The company shall only exercise the power conferred by this Act as to location, construction and operation of the railway upon such streets and such terms and conditions and for such period as the council of the city may approve of by by-law.

The Act, which was read by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), declares that this exclusive privilege is granted to the Ottawa Street Railway until August, 1898.

Mr. HAGGART. Does the hon. gentleman contend that the Ottawa Electric Railway is run under an Ontario charter?

Mr. LOUNT. So I understood.

Mr. DEVLIN. A Dominion charter, too.

Mr. HAGGART. Has it a double charter the same as this proposed one?

Mr. DEVLIN. It has its local charter, and then it came to this Parliament and got a charter.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I understand it in this way—that the old horse cars company had a charter from the late provinces of Canada, having obtained the charter in 1866. When they took over that company, the electric company had to get a change in that charter in order to enable them to apply electric power instead of horse power; and it was decided by their solicitor that the local legislature had not power to amend that charter of 1866, and therefore they came to the Dominion Parliament to have it amended to enable them to use electricity as a motive power instead of horses. That is what my hon. friend refers to as a Dominion charter.

Mr. DEVLIN. My hon. friend knows that it has a Dominion charter, and the very second clause of that charter declares that this company's railway is a work for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. LOUNT. However the charter may be, the proposition we are now considering is the advisability of passing this clause. The question appears to be one arising out of the fact that one side contends that a franchise has been granted to the Ottawa Electric Company governing all the streets of Ottawa, and the other side contends that it is not so. I am adverse to all monopolies that would grant to any company exclusive rights in any city. I am further in favour of opening, as far as possible, the right to other companies to enter the city of Ottawa. I think it is largely against the interests of the people of Ottawa, especially against the interest of a railway of the character described that it should not have the opportunity to enter this city and give to the people the advantages that must necessarily attend such an enterprise. If the clause read by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has the construction placed upon it that it is exclusively the right of the Ottawa Electric Railway Company to cover the whole streets of the city, then this clause becomes inoperative; it cannot be put into force, because in my humble judgment, the corporation of the city of Ottawa cannot be compelled to permit any railway enterprise to go upon their streets other than the Ottawa Electric Company. But, while the corporation may not be compelled to do that, if this charter is granted to this railway company exclusively, right is not given to them, but they get the advantage they seek for by this Bill. They have not the right to enter, as the corporation can reject, still it is granting a privilege which will be of very great use to this company in this direction:—Assume the possibility, and it is a reasonable possibility, because railway companies anticipate the Act of a legislature, that the Ottawa Electric Company will be perfectly willing if the charter is granted, to make arrangements with the company by which they can operate upon certain of the streets of Ottawa, then when you grant the charter that arrangement can be carried out, and no harm is done to the electric company by granting what is asked and a great deal of benefit may be given to the people of the city. Therefore I am in favour of granting it.

Mr. McMULLEN. There is one point I would like to understand before being called upon to vote for or against this clause. I am not opposed to the Bill. It appears that under the charter of the Street Railway Company, the city of Ottawa has the right, at the end of thirty years from the passage of that charter, to become the absolute owner of all plant and franchise of the company. About four years of its time has expired, so that this charter has still about twenty-five or twenty-six years to run. If we pass the charter now asked for and this company, by influences exercised upon the aldermen of the city, secure the right to build lines along certain streets, you will then place the city of Ottawa in the position that it will be deprived of the opportunity to take advantage of the right given it in other cases to take over street railways operated in the city. The city would thus be prevented from making an arrangement such as that which has been made in Toronto, under which the street railway contributes to the revenues of the city a proportion of its daily receipts. Now, when Ottawa becomes an important city, as I have no doubt it will, they will expect to receive a contribution from their street railway just as they do in Toronto. The question is, if you grant this privilege that is now asked by this company, and the company, by the exercise of proper or improper influences upon city aldermen, secure by-laws authorizing them to make roads which would not come within the agreement between the city and the Ottawa company, the advantage of that agreement will be practically destroyed. I do not think we should legislate in that direction.

Mr. CAMERON. That is already provided for. It says: "On such terms and conditions as the city may impose."

Mr. McMULLEN. It does not cover the point I referred to. Suppose that the by-laws are secured by means of influences brought to bear upon the aldermen?

Mr. DEVLIN. That is the city's business.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think a suggestion might be made which would overcome some, if not all, the difficulties which have been urged by gentlemen who are opposed to this section and which I think would offer all the protection that could be asked by those who are interested in the Ottawa Street Railway. I would propose that all the words after the word "thereof" in section 2 of the Bill be struck out and the following substituted:—

To the city of Ottawa and to such point therein as the council of the said city may declare reasonably necessary and suitable for the location of the terminus of the company's line of railway in the said city, and making such regulations and doing all such things as are necessary for such purpose.

Now, I think there could be no question at all on the part of members of the committee who are opposing this Bill, to entrusting to the council of the city the exercise of the power and of the discretion which is contemplated by this amendment.

On the other hand, the company could claim no greater right than the right to enter the city and find a suitable terminus. That, I think, ought to be conceded to the applicants. I do not know any reason why you should confine their entrance to the city just at that point where they may enter the city after crossing the bridge. We should allow them to seek the most fitting place they can find for the purpose of a terminus. Now, as to whether such place is found, or as to whether they propose a suitable locality, that must rest in the discretion of somebody, and I think the city council would be the safest parties to whom to entrust the responsibility of deciding that question. I would propose, therefore, an amendment to clause 2, adding after the word "thereof," in the sixth line, the following words:—

Into the city of Ottawa, and to such point therein as the council of the said city may by by-law declare necessary and suitable for the location of the terminus of the company's line of railway in the said city, and may make whatever connection and do all such things as are necessary for such purpose.

Mr. DEVLIN. I will accept that.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I infer from the remarks made by the promoter of the Bill that his road proposes to go over the Union Bridge. Now I want to know if it is intended to give permission to this road to go over the same track which is used by the Ottawa Electric Railway?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The Governor in Council will determine that.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I assume that is the intention, and I would like to know whether there is room for the two tracks. If that is the case, it strikes me it would be a serious objection to this portion of the Bill.

Mr. DEVLIN. I understand my hon. friend wants to know if we would have running powers over this bridge, and also whether there is room for a double track. At the present time, over the large bridge, there is a double track used by the Ottawa Electric Railway, that double track terminates the moment the bridge is crossed. I do not think a double track, or even a single track, would be permitted over the stone bridge; I myself would be sorry to see even a single track over the stone bridge. At present there is simply room for the ordinary traffic, and scarcely room for that. I am in hopes some day that the Dominion Government will construct a decent bridge there, and I am going to press for that. But as matters stand at present, the bridge is so imperfect that I would not be willing to have even a single track constructed over it.

Mr. FOSTER. In addition to that, if I understand the Order in Council aright which now governs the present Ottawa Passenger Railway, it has recently received from the Government, under Order in Council, as authorized by the Act of 1892, the right to put a track across to the city of Hull, and under that proposal the present Minister of Public Works has already approved of the plans.

Mr. BLAIR.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. But who owns the track?

Mr. FOSTER. I will come to that—on which they have given a contract, which contract is now in process of fulfilment; so that by the middle of November, as I am informed, the Ottawa Passenger Railway will have its structure completed, and will make its entrance into Hull, and make a connection. But that is not over the stone bridge.

Mr. McCARTHY. Where is the stone bridge?

Mr. FOSTER. It is on the Hull side? I quite agree with my hon. friend, and the Government was of the same opinion when they passed the Order in Council, that the track of the Passenger Railway was not to pass over the bridge, but they were to build a side structure, and build it so that if the Government wishes to utilize it to widen the roadway across the bridge, it should be capable of being used for that purpose. So that under this if the Government were of the same opinion, they could only allow this company to come in in one of two ways: either by making an arrangement with this Ottawa Passenger Railway Company, which builds the structure itself, and which, as I understand it, owns it only so far that the Government has the right to use it in making the general roadway wider. It would have to do it under an arrangement with that company, or authorize another side track, either on the other side of the bridge or on this side of the bridge, over which the rails could be laid. The amendment of the Minister of Railways meets exactly the view I stated here on Friday night. I said: I thought the Hull Electric road ought to be allowed to unload its passengers and its freight in the city of Ottawa, and to that end ought to be given an entrance to the city; but I did not think, under the contract which has been made with, and the franchises which have been paid for, by the Ottawa Passenger Railway, that we ought now to interject an element of contention and rivalry, by investing another road with powers to go over the streets of Ottawa. I objected to that, but I was entirely in favour of having this company get the right to unload its passengers and freight at a terminus in the city of Ottawa. This amendment of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) meets with my view; I am entirely in favour of it.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I merely rise to ask the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) for some information. I understand that about a month ago the representatives of both companies met, and mutually agreed that the Ottawa Electric Company should extend its line to the square at Hull adjoining the Hull Company's tracks, and that a union station should then be erected for the accommodation and exchange of passengers and of traffic. I fully agree with hon. gentlemen who have advocated the necessity of giving the travelling public every facility, and, if such an agreement as I refer to has been entered into, it was for the purpose of realizing that very laudable object. Now, as I am also informed, under that agreement, the Ottawa Electric Railway Company gave a contract to the Bridge Company for the purpose of building the necessary works.

Mr. DEVLIN. May I ask my hon. friend when that contract was given?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am told that the Ottawa Company gave a contract to the Dominion Bridge Company three days after this agreement was entered into. Of course, I am merely giving the information which was conveyed to me, and I am asking the hon. gentleman (Mr. Devlin) for information. To my mind, Sir, this is a Bill upon which a policy should be declared by the Government, and for this reason. On the 13th of May, 1896, an Order in Council was passed and approved of, which contains the following:—

That the company having received the permission to use the Union Bridge, they laid tracks on it, and that the Ottawa City Passenger Railway Company having obtained a federal charter, wherein is explicitly granted the privilege they now ask, under certain conditions; there can be no doubt that they are entitled to be granted the privilege in preference to the Hull Electric Railway Company, under whatever conditions the Government may prescribe.

Now, if the Order in Council states that the Ottawa Electric Company ought, in preference to the other company, obtain the privileges which they ask, it seems to me that the Bill, as introduced by my hon. friend (Mr. Devlin), is a contradiction to the policy enunciated in that Order in Council, and hence, if there is to be a change in that Order in Council, which had the authority of the Governor General, then, the Government should declare their policy as to what the change is to be. As far as I can judge of the privileges accorded to the Ottawa Electric Street Railway Company, they have, during the term of their agreement with the corporation, the privilege of running their lines in the streets which have been assigned, and, moreover, if the Ottawa city corporation in their wisdom consider that the system should be extended to other streets, then the Ottawa Electric Railway are bound to build their lines on these streets. Ample provisions have been made in the agreement between the city corporation and the Ottawa Electric Railway Company to meet all the requirements of the public. My hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) has spoken of a monopoly. Well, Sir, monopolies are certainly very bad things to introduce into any city or any country; but hon. gentlemen must recollect that, previous to the enterprise of the Ottawa Company, the city was served by a horse-car railway, and the promoters of the Electric Street Railway Company had to invest considerable capital and to take certain risks on their investment. They have given to this city a service which, so far as my experience goes, is unequalled by any other in the Dominion. To-day, after this agreement has been signed and sealed by the municipal corporation on one side, and by the Electric Street Railway Company on the other, it is all very well to say that this company have got too extensive privileges, and that they should be curtailed. In my opinion, the time to discuss what kind of privileges should be granted to the company, was before that contract was entered into between the company and the city council. You have in question here, vested rights, which, under every possible system of law, are and should be protected. If you take these rights away by legislation, you can only do so by indemnifying the company which loses by the action of the legislature. The fact of the Ottawa Company undertaking to connect their lines with the Hull Electric Company and agreeing to build a union station for the interchange of traffic, goes far enough to protect the interests of the public and the requirements of traffic between the city of Hull and the city of Ottawa, as well as the counties and districts which my hon. friend (Mr. Devlin) claims to be served by the Hull Electric Railway Company.

Mr. LANGELIER. I was not in the Railway Committee when this Bill was considered, and I may be mistaken as to the meaning of clause 2, but, if it has the meaning which I deduce from it, it constitutes a very serious departure from the practice which has always been followed by the Railway Committee and by this House in connection with Bills of this kind.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Langelier) see the amendment proposed by the Minister of Railways?

Mr. LANGELIER. That does not bear on the point I wish to allude to. I will not enter into the squabbles between these railway companies; I am speaking simply in the interest of the public, and, if I am not mistaken, this would be a serious departure from the practice which has always been followed by the Railway Committee and by this House. It has been the uniform practice of that committee, since I have been a member of the same, that is to say, for a good number of years, never to grant to a street railway company the power to enter into a city and pass over its streets, without the approval and consent of the city council of that city. There was a very great fight on that point before the Railway Committee two years ago in connection with the Bill to give a Dominion charter to the Montreal Belt Line Railway. That company had been incorporated by the legislature of Quebec, from which they obtained power to go into the city of Montreal, with the consent of the city council of Montreal. They had obtained such consent from the city council. They then, for some reason, came to this Parliament to obtain a Dominion charter. They wanted to get the sanction of the Dominion to their local charter, and to retain the power they had already obtained from the city council of Montreal to go into the city. Their Bill was drafted in such a way that, if it was passed in its then shape, it would have given the company power to go into the city of Montreal, whether the city council of Montreal wanted it or not. All the discretion which was left to the city council of Montreal was to locate the streets upon which the railway might pass; but it was not at liberty to prevent the railway coming into the city. That was struck out by the Railway Committee. The committee decided, I think unanimously, that the company should obtain the consent of the city council of Montreal, although they already had it under their local charter. This shows how careful the Railway Committee has always been never to grant power to a street railway company to pass over the streets of a city without the consent of the council of that city. Well, as I read section 2 of this Bill—I would like to have the point explained to me by my hon. friend from Wright (Mr. Devlin) if I am mistaken—the city council of Ottawa would have no power at all to refuse this company the right to come into the city. The Hull Street Railway Company would have power to come into the city of Ottawa whether the city council of Ottawa wanted it or not. The only power reserved to the city council of Ottawa would be to determine the particular streets over which it might pass. If that is the intention of the promoters of the Bill, to carry their railway over the streets of Ottawa without the consent of the city council, I would be compelled to vote against that, in pursuance of the course we have always followed in every case in which that question has come before the Railway Committee or before this House.

Mr. DEVLIN. In answer to my hon. friend, I may say at once, that we do ask full power to come into the city of Ottawa, just as any other railway company has the right to ask power to come into the city.

Mr. LANGELIER. Without the consent of the city council of Ottawa?

Mr. LANGELIER.

Mr. DEVLIN. We would be very sorry indeed to put ourselves in such a position that the city council could refuse us its assent to come into the city. We think we have a right to ask for power to come into the city of Ottawa, and the proper body to grant us that power is the Dominion Parliament. With regard to the objection of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron), I can say that there never was such an agreement.

Mr. CHARLTON. I yield to no member in this House in my desire to see the section represented by my hon. friend from Wright (Mr. Devlin) served, and properly served, by railway facilities; and I realize the great advantages to the city of Ottawa to be derived from connection with that section of country north of the city. But I am not able to reconcile the desire I have to see my hon. friend's constituents served in this matter, with my sense of justice as to the carrying out of contracts which are existing and binding. I shall not vote in this committee for the passing of a measure which shall override the rights of any corporation which has rights guaranteed to it by a contract which is still valid and binding. This Ottawa Passenger Railway Company was incorporated first in the year 1868, by the legislature of Ontario. It was again incorporated by the legislature of Ontario in 1892. It was incorporated by the Dominion Parliament in the same year. As I said before, this railway company surrendered a perpetual charter, in consideration of which it received certain privileges from the city of Ottawa. We want to consider what those privileges were; this is the keynote of the whole situation. What contract exists between the city of Ottawa and the Ottawa City Passenger Railway Company? Under what circumstances was this contract made? Did the Ottawa City Passenger Railway Company surrender franchises and give a quid pro quo for this contract? Is this contract still in existence? These are matters which I am bound to consider; and my vote on this measure will be governed by the state of these questions between this railway company and the city corporation. Mark you, the city of Ottawa has not asked for this measure; it is no party to it. The representatives of the city of Ottawa are opposed to this measure. The representative of the city of Ottawa in the legislative assembly of Ontario is opposed to it. So far as we know, this measure is very seriously opposed in this city. These are considerations which have very great weight with me. Now, what are the conditions of this contract between the Ottawa City Passenger Railway Company and the city of Ottawa? I again refer to the provision. Section 17 of that contract provides as follows:—

The corporation shall not, before the 13th day of August, A.D. 1898, grant authority to any company, private individual or firm to construct and operate a street railway in any part of Ottawa, and in the event of any company, private individual or firm thereafter proposing to construct street railways on any of the streets of the city of Ottawa, including the streets mentioned in this agreement and not occupied by the companies, and the corporation determining that there should be street railway service on such streets, the matter and substance of the proposal shall be notified to the companies and the option of constructing such proposed railway on the conditions contained in this agreement shall be offered to the companies, but, if such option shall not be accepted by the companies within thirty days thereafter, or if the same having been accepted, the companies shall not proceed with the necessary works and complete the same within the time limited by the corporation, the corporation may grant the authority to any company (organized after the above date), private individual or firm, and the corporation and its grantees shall be entitled to cross the lines of the said railway companies with such railways as are authorized by this clause.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). How does the amendment of the Minister of Railways conflict with these powers?

Mr. CHARLTON. I shall proceed to show you in a few minutes. By this agreement, the Ottawa Street Railway Company has the exclusive right to build railway lines within the corporate limits of the city of Ottawa until the 13th August, 1898, and any provision that allows the Hull Electric Company to enter the city of Ottawa and to use any street in that city conflicts with this provision.

Mr. HAGGART. What reference is there in the Act to that agreement?

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not know that there is any. I do not know that it is necessary there should be any. All that is necessary for me to know is that the Ottawa Street Railway Company surrendered a perpetual charter, and one of the conditions of the surrender of that franchise was the agreement entered into between the city of Ottawa and that railway company, and I hold that this Parliament is bound to protect the interests of the Ottawa Street Railway Company in that matter because it has paid valuable consideration for the rights that are granted in this agreement. The city of Ottawa is as much interested in this matter as the counties of Ottawa or Pontiac or Wright. The city of Ottawa has made no request that the powers asked for in this charter be granted. It apparently is perfectly well satisfied with the service given it by the Ottawa Street Railway, and it has every reason to be satisfied with that service. The city of Ottawa opposes this measure through its representatives in this House and in the local legislature. It has been stated by my hon. friend that this road will be compelled to bring its passengers down and dump them in the road in Hull. Well, the Ottawa Street Railway Company are building a line to connect with this Hull railway and are to build a passenger depot for the purpose of exchanging traffic with that line. There can be no question but that the Ottawa Railway Company is willing to make any reasonable arrangements with this Hull line for the forwarding of its freight and passengers to Ottawa. Representations have been held out that no such agreement is contemplated. But whether there be an agreement or not—my hon. friend says there is not—the Ottawa Street Railway Company are evidently proceeding on the assumption that there is one, and are building an extension and propose to build a union station, which will afford all the facilities necessary for the transfer of passengers and freight from the Hull Street Railway to the city of Ottawa.

Mr. LOUNT. What invasion of the rights of the Ottawa Electric Railway is done by simply giving the Hull company the right to cross the river and the terminal point?

Mr. CHARLTON. The Ottawa City Railway Passenger Company, under the provisions of the Act of 1892, have the following powers and privileges with reference to the crossing of the bridge:—

The company shall not take possession of, use or occupy the Union Bridge, or any of the approaches thereto, without the consent of the Governor in Council, but with such consent the company may, on such terms as the Governor in Council prescribes, use and occupy so much of the Union Bridge and the approaches thereto as may be necessary for the railway company.

Under the provisions of that section the Ottawa City Passenger Railway Company have, by Order in Council, the possession of that Union Bridge.

Mr. LOUNT. Nobody takes it from them.

Mr. CHARLTON. If this charter becomes law, the Hull Electric Railway Company will take it from them. There is no room on that bridge for both corporations.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They may have running powers.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is not necessary to give them running powers so long as the Ottawa Street Railway Company, under its charter, crosses that bridge and furnished all the facilities necessary for the interchange of traffic.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman promised to answer how, in the amendment proposed by the Minister of Railways, the exclusive rights of the Ottawa Railway Company to run its trains through the streets of Ottawa are affected.

Mr. CHARLTON. City councils sometimes do rather curious things, and arrangements may be secured from the city council which were not contemplated at the outset. Under the amendment of the hon. Minister of Railways, it might be possible that this road would get power to get a long way into the city. It might get powers very important to itself and detrimental to the Ottawa Street Railway Company. If the amendment is to be accepted, I would ask to append to it a few additional words, providing that the Hull Electric Railway should not be permitted to collect any fares within the city of Ottawa.

Mr. LOUNT. What fares can be collected? The railway terminates at the boundary of the city of Ottawa, on the Ottawa side of the river. There can be no fares collected at the terminal point.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is not proposed to make it terminate at the boundary of the city of Ottawa.

Mr. LOUNT. A reasonable construction must be put on the amendment of the Minister of Railways.

Mr. CHARLTON. I say, at all events, admit the connection between these two roads at the Union Station in the city of Hull, with an extension made by the Ottawa Street Railway Company to that station and the offering of necessary facilities at that point for the interchange of traffic, and that will remove all the qualms I feel over the stipulations between the city of Ottawa and the Ottawa Street Railway Company. If that view of the case is not accepted by the committee, I shall urge the adoption of a safeguard, that the Hull Electric Railway shall not be empowered to collect fares for service in the city of Ottawa.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I understand from this amendment that the point for the erection of the company's station will depend wholly and entirely on the city council, and I think that that is fair. The council will determine the point, and of course a practical and sensible man will know that a certain amount of land is requisite, and if they cross the bridge at all they have to proceed until they get the requisite amount of land on which to build, and, therefore, the security of the city and the railway is placed in the hands of the city council.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I would propose the addition of some further words at the end of the section, and I do so because I think the point made by my hon. friend from Westminster (Mr. Morrison) has been very well taken. I would call attention to the fact that there is no provision whereby the company would be entitled to cross this bridge. I think that is clear, and I suggest that these words be added:

And the said company, in crossing over the said bridge, subject to the approval and upon such terms as the Governor in Council prescribes, has the right to connect with and may exercise running powers over the line or lines of railways upon said bridge.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to know exactly what that means. It surely does not mean that we arbitrarily give them the right to run over the tracks of the City Passenger Railway, but that they have the right to do so subject to agreement?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Mr. FOSTER. If that is not the idea, I think quite a new element is introduced. I was quite willing to accept the first amendment, but I would like to have the sense of the committee on the amendment first, as this materially varies the effect of it. A member may quite fairly say that he is in favour of the first but not in favour of this.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman is in favour of the first and if the facts as stated to us are correct, he must necessarily favour the second.

Mr. FOSTER. Why?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Because there is no room for another line across the bridge. When you give a theoretical power to cross which cannot practically be exercised, you merely play with the question. If you give the power to run over the bridge, you must give that power over the existing line of road, because there is no room for another.

Mr. McCARTHY. But I do not see why they should not pay some reasonable compensation for that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This provides that the crossing shall be upon such terms as the Governor in Council may prescribe.

Mr. McCARTHY. That, then, leaves the whole question with the Governor in Council.

Mr. FOSTER. There ought to be reasonable compensation provided.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I presume that the Railway Committee of the Privy Council could settle that.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That would come within the jurisdiction of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. In any case, they have the right to allow running powers over railway lines on such terms as to them seem reasonable.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is already provided under the law.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We have to confer upon the Governor General in Council, or upon the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, the power to determine the terms upon which it is to be exercised.

Mr. FOSTER. Very well, if it is understood that there is to be a compensation.

Mr. HAGGART. Surely the compensation hardly amounts to anything. They have the power to lay rails on what is public property. If the other company acquire the right to use the rails the compensation would, surely, be merely nominal.

Mr. FOSTER. But in order to get their rails down, this company is building a very expensive bridge at their own cost. And after they have spent thousands of dollars to build that bridge, you give another company the right to run over it and say nothing about compensation.

Mr. DEVLIN. Where is that bridge?

Mr. FOSTER. That bridge is going to be partly in the air—

Mr. DEVLIN. My hon. friend knows there is no such thing in existence.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman's hon. friend does not know any such thing. He knows that he has been told by responsible parties that the contract is let for the work, to be finished on the 15th November, and that the material is nearly all bought and paid for.

Mr. DEVLIN. My hon. friend is speaking of a private bridge.

Mr. FOSTER. And this bridge the railway must cross in order to reach the Union Bridge.

Mr. DEVLIN. Of course, the Government have the best knowledge of this matter. I do not know whether the Government have given the Ottawa Electric Company the rights to construct such a bridge.

Mr. FOSTER. It is already provided for by Order in Council, and the plans have been approved by the present Minister of Public Works.

Mr. SPROULE. This speaks of the Union Bridge and speaks of it always as "the" bridge.

Mr. BELCOURT. I rise to say a few words in support of the amendment suggested by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster). But before doing so, I wish to say that while this Bill was before the committee of the House I was charged outside and inside the House with obstructing arbitrarily the passage of this Bill. Personally I have no objection to the Bill, and I quite agree with the expressions of opinion I have heard that the Hull Electric Railway Company should have some means of depositing its passengers in the city of Ottawa, and, so far as I am concerned, I am in favour of allowing them such powers as will enable them to deposit their passengers in the city of Ottawa, and not in the mud, as the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) has told us. In taking the part I have taken in discussing the Bill, I have sought to protect the interests of a large number of my constituents in the city of Ottawa, who, I consider, have acquired vested rights sanctioned by the city council of Ottawa, by the legislature of Ontario and by this Parliament. I have tried simply to protect the rights for which they have given consideration and large concessions. I think that, with reference to a particular amendment now before the Chair, the words "with compensation to the Ottawa Electric Railway Company," or some such words, should be added; because these people have gone to great expense in laying tracks on this bridge, and in providing for tracks to be laid from the bridge to join the other company in Hull. Now, I will read to the committee the Order in Council in question under which the Ottawa City Passenger Railway Company has had plans made, and has given out a contract for the erection of the work required. The Order in Council is dated 13th May, 1896, and reads as follows:—

On a report dated 30th April, 1896, from the Minister of Public Works, stating that the Ottawa Electric Railway Company have asked the Department of Public Works for permission to extend their track from the bridge over the Ottawa River at the Chaudière into the city of Hull, either by using the present roadway or by using the right of way over the reserves and waterways adjoining said roadway.

That the Chief Engineer, to whom this matter was referred, states it is out of the question to grant the company permission to use the present roadway owing to its narrowness, but that there cannot be any objection to permitting them to lay their tracks in the position shown by a dotted line on the plan hereto attached, on the condition that they will agree to lay at points "B" and "B" where the tracks will cross the roadway, a permanent pavement between the tracks and at least two feet outside of the outer rails in such a way that the surface of their rails shall not project more than a half inch above the pavement, the pavement itself being always kept at the level of the roadway. The Chief Engineer further states that the company also ask for permission to lay a track on the ten foot reserve on the north side of the slide channel, and as this reserve is not used in connection with the working of the slide, there cannot be any objection to granting the company the permission they ask for.

The Minister further stated that the Department of Public Works is of opinion that it would be advisable that the ten foot reserve referred to, be only leased to the said company for a yearly nominal sum, as it is not known for a certainty whether in the near or distant future, the said reserve may be required, and that in return for the privilege to be granted to the company to extend their line as aforesaid, the company should agree that the erection which will carry their railway on the side of the causeway which the Department of Public Works may have to do in the future.

And I invite the attention of the committee to that.

The Minister further states that an application has also been made by the Hull Electric Company for a right of way upon the Government road in that city, from the Suspension bridge, northward to Main Street, and failing that, they ask for the privilege of constructing a bridge on the east side of the road, the company stating at the time that they hold from the city of Hull an exclusive franchise to run an electric road over all its streets.

The Minister further states that the Hull Electric Company was incorporated by an Act passed by the legislature of the province of Quebec, under chapter 59 of 58 Vic., 1895, the company being granted the power to construct tramways in any point or points of the city of Hull, town of Aylmer, and village of Gatineau Point, in and between such city, town or village.

The Minister further states that the Ottawa Electric Railway Company, as the Ottawa City Passenger Railway Company, obtained a statute from the Parliament of Canada in the year 1892, being chapter 53 of 55-56 Victoria. In the first clause of the Act it is enacted that the Ottawa City Passenger Railway Company may extend, construct, maintain and complete an iron railway from and communicating with the end of its present line of railway, at or near the Union bridge, thence subject to the provision hereinafter set forth, across the said Union bridge and over, along and upon such streets in the city of Hull as may be authorized. Clause second provides that the company shall not take possession of any of the approaches to the Union bridge without the consent of the Governor in Council, but with such consent, the company may, upon such terms as the Governor in Council shall prescribe, use and occupy so much of the Union bridge, and of the approaches thereto, as may be necessary for the railway of the company.

The Minister further states that the company have received permission to use the Union bridge, and have laid tracks on it; and that the Ottawa City Passenger Railway Company, having obtained a federal charter wherein is explicitly granted the privilege now asked under certain conditions, there can be no doubt that they are entitled to be granted the privilege in question in preference—

And I invite the special attention of the committee to that.

—to the Hull Electric Company under whatever conditions the Government may prescribe.

The Minister, in view of the foregoing facts, recommends that the Ottawa Electric Railway Company be granted permission to extend their track from the bridge over the Ottawa River at the Chaudière into the city of Hull, on the following conditions: 1st. That the said track be laid in the position shown by blue dotted lines on the plan hereto attached. 2nd. That at the point marked "B" and "B" on the said plan where the tracks will cross the roadway, a permanent pavement between their tracks and at least two feet outside of the outer rails, to be laid in such a way that the surface of the rails shall not project more than one-half inch above the pavement.

The conditions are too long, and I will not read the rest now. This is the last clause of the Order in Council:

The Minister further recommends that before any work is proceeded with by the company, they shall submit for the approval of the Minister of Public Works, plans showing the exact location of the tracks with relation to the roadway, as well as details of construction.

Acting under this proposal, the Ottawa Electric Railway Company proceeded to call for plans of the proposed structures in order to complete the gap between the bridge and Main street in the city of Hull, and had these plans prepared. The work is already under contract, and the Ottawa Railway Company has gone to considerable expense in the matter. Now, the Hull people not only ask that they may be permitted to come into the city of Ottawa—to which I, for one, have no objection—but they also ask to be allowed to use the tracks of the Ottawa Electric Railway. I submit that that amendment should be made subject, not only to such conditions as the Governor in Council may impose, but also to an agreement between the Ottawa Railway Company and the Hull Electric Railway Company, or upon such compensation as this committee may deem right to impose.

Mr. CHARLTON. I desire to propose as a new amendment to this section, that the following words be added:—

And the said company shall not have power to collect fares or rates for service within the limits of the city of Ottawa.

I think this has been assented to by the promoter of the Bill, and this removes the objection as to infringement of the rights secured by the Ottawa City Railway Company by contract with the city.

Mr. DEVLIN. My hon. friend must have misunderstood me, I never agreed to such a proposition. It would be utterly impossible. In fact there are some days when half the fare would not be collected, and such a clause would not work. First of all, I must explain that the cars are crowded. There are days when we carry as many as four or five thousand passengers, and the conductor must begin to collect the fare from the very start.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not mean that they shall not be allowed to collect fares within the limits of the city of Ottawa, but that they shall not collect fares for service within the city.

Mr. DEVLIN. Then I will point out that the Ottawa Electric Railway will not even allow us to cross a quarter of an acre of their track without forcing us to pay fare; and they want the Hull Electric Company to run over a large portion of its own track without collecting a cent. I cannot accept that amendment.

On section 4,

Mr. CHARLTON. It appears, from the provisions of this section, that the Hull Electric Company contemplate entering the city of Ottawa by means of the Canadian Pacific Railway bridge. The words are:

And of running and operating said trams and cars upon the railway tracks of Canadian Pacific Railway Company within the city of Ottawa.

This provision gives the company entrance into the city of Ottawa, and all the entrance it needs to acquire. It gives them that entrance without the necessity of infringing upon the rights of the Ottawa Street Railway Company by setting aside, by an Act of this Parliament, the conditions of the contract entered into between that company and Ottawa city council. We are, therefore, doing an injustice to the Ottawa Street Railway Company by the passage of the second section, and it is now revealed by the fourth section that we are doing this injustice without there being any necessity whatever for it; because the Hull Company will secure entrance to the city of Ottawa by means of the Canadian Pacific Railway and their bridge.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). There is another point to which I direct the attention of the committee. At page 2 of the Bill, from line 5 to line 11, it says :

And the possession by the company of the said railway under the lease to be given by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in pursuance of the said agreement shall be held to be a fulfilment by the company of the obligation under its charter to construct a railway or tramway to Aylmer aforesaid, and other places referred to in its charter.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the charter is a Quebec charter, and it contains a by-law passed by the city of Hull. That provides that the Hull company shall connect Hull with Aylmer, Gatineau Point and Ironsides. The Bill, therefore, asks Parliament to declare that the lease of the line between Hull and Aylmer shall not only be held to be a fulfilment of the company's obligation to construct a line between these two points, but that it shall be held to be also a fulfilment of its obligations to construct a line to Gatineau Point and Ironsides. I think that is a point the lawyers of the committee should look into, and see if this agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company prevents the construction of the other two lines.

Mr. DEVLIN. My hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Macdonald) states that, by endorsing this provision of clause 4, we shall pronounce the line already constructed. I may say at once that it is already constructed. I have explained to the House a dozen times over that, instead of building a new line, the Hull Electric Company simply leased from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway extending from Hull to Aylmer. They immediately placed a trolley wire above it, and ran their electric cars over the track. I would like to know wherein is the difference, whether you construct a line independently, or whether you take a line already constructed and perfect it in such a way as to meet all the requirements of the Act? The road is now constructed. It was taken over from the Canadian Pacific Railway, not forcibly, but with the consent and good-will of the company. It was converted from a steam railway into an electric railway, so that every provision of that very charter is met here, and every one is satisfied. My hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) objects to the cars of the Hull Electric Railway passing the Canadian Pacific Railway bridge.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not object. I simply say that this gives you an entrance into the city of Ottawa.

Mr. DEVLIN. Certainly, I admit that at once. My hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) knows that, by the previous provisions of the Bill, we cannot go one inch into the city of Ottawa, except so far as we are allowed by the city council. We ask to cross this Canadian Pacific Railway bridge, so that we may draw our freight trains straight to the Union station, and so that we may bring these passengers who wish to connect with the Canadian Pacific Railway trains going west, to to the station. My hon. friend must know, and no one in the House knows better, the object for which the Pontiac Pacific Railway was constructed. He has travelled over the road, has visited the county of Pontiac, and knows the traffic that is done over this road. He knows well, that the passengers coming from Pontiac must get into the city of Ottawa, if they are to take a train to Toronto or the west. For that reason, it is asked that this lease shall be granted, and that the Hull Electric Company shall have the power of crossing this bridge, provided, of course, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, who are the party most interested, shall give them that permission.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). My hon. friend (Mr. Devlin) said that the railway has already been constructed. That portion of it from Aylmer to Hull has been constructed, but that portion of it from Hull to Gatineau and Ironsides has not been constructed.

Mr. DEVLIN. I will at once meet the objection of the hon. member (Mr. Macdonald), if he allows me. I will drop out every word in the lines from 5 to 10 of the Bill, and that will cover more ground than my hon. friend wants.

Mr. CHARLTON. Undoubtedly, the company have reason to suppose that they will be able to effect an entrance to the city of Ottawa over the Canadian Pacific Railway bridge. My hon. friend (Mr. Devlin) points out the necessity to the company of having access to the Canadian Pacific Railway depot for its freight and its passengers going west. That is a commendable part of the scheme, but, if that power is obtained by the Hull Electric Company, I am unable to see that the passenger traffic would not be served just as well by a union depot on the Hull side as by a union depot on the Ottawa side. The Hull Company would have all the facilities it requires so far as its access to Ottawa is concerned, by making a connection at the Union station in Hull, which the Ottawa Street Railway Company intends to reach by the 15th of November. Why, therefore, should we take away a portion of the franchises of the Ottawa Street Railway Company and allow the Hull Company to cover the tracks they have laid down? I cannot divest my mind from the impression that this House is doing an injustice to the Ottawa Street Railway Company, and is not in any material degree benefiting the other enterprise, by insisting that the Hull Electric Company shall have the privilege of assuming partial control of a portion of the franchise and track of the Ottawa Street Railway Company, by coming across the Union bridge to make connection, instead of making connection on the other side of the bridge. It seems to me we are trespassing on the vested rights of a company, and are doing it unnecessarily.

Mr. MORRISON. I submit that the words from line 12 to the end of the clause ought to be included in the amendment, as they are inconsistent with the amendment of the hon. Minister of Railways. The clause as it reads gives the Hull Electric Railway power to run over the Canadian Pacific Railway tracks to the city of Ottawa, that is, to apply electric power to a road which is now used for steam power; and I submit that this cannot or ought not to be done without the matter going first before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council.

Mr. BELCOURT. Would the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) say whether it is intended to operate electric cars over the railway bridge for anything but freight, or is it intended also to run passenger electric cars?

Mr. DEVLIN. My hon. friend puts a question which it is of course impossible for me to answer. I do not know what the administration of this road may decide upon. My business here is simply to submit what the Bill is. I have explained to my hon. friend that one of the reasons why we ask for permission to cross this bridge is that western-bound passengers may be transferred to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. BELCOURT. I take for granted, then, that it is intended to operate electric passenger cars over this bridge. It is well known to most of the members of this House that on this bridge there is only one line of track, and that there is not room to lay another line. I do not think it is quite prudent to allow the operation of an electric railway over a bridge of this kind, with only one track, and that for a railway operated by steam. There is no provision in the Railway Act for anything of this kind, and I think it is a very serious matter. On behalf of the citizens of Ottawa, I must ask this committee to afford some measure of protection to the people who are going to use this railway. It must be quite evident to every member of this House that electric trains passing over this bridge every ten or fifteen minutes, or possibly at shorter intervals, will constitute a very serious danger to people using that railway. There are no safeguards provided in this clause to insure any reasonable safety. I move that all the words after the word "thereof" in the 11th line of section 4 be struck out.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). As I understand this part of the section, it means that a railway in existence, such as the Canadian Pacific Railway, which is subject to the provisions of the general Railway Act, has the right to give this electric railway company the right to run on its line across a bridge within the limits of the city of Ottawa. How are you going to treat an electric railway, which is not subject to the provisions of the general Railway Act, on the lines of an ordinary railway? How is it going to be treated, for the protection of the people who will use it? That seems to be an objection that is worthy of the attention of the committee.

Mr. DAVIN. I will support the amendment. I think the objection stated by the hon. and learned gentleman is a very important one. Here you have one line, and you are going to allow two companies to have the right to operate their railway upon it. I think there is great danger to the public here, and Parliament ought to pause, especially as there seems to be running through this Act an element of injustice to the Ottawa company. The Ottawa company has arranged under an Order in Council to go across the bridge to get into Hull, and to remove the objection, from the point of view of public usefulness, which has been urged at a prior part of the discussion of this Bill.

Mr. SPROULE. I see that the old Ottawa Passenger Railway Company have the same right to run on the tracks of the Ottawa and St. Lawrence Railway. So that it does not seem that we are giving any more power here than was given originally to the Ottawa City Passenger Railway Company.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In reference to the observation of the hon. Solicitor General, there must be power in existing legislation to enable the Railway Committee of the Privy Council to deal with electric railways as well as other railways, because numerous applications are now dealt with by that committee in regard to these railways crossing each other.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Then, would it not be wise in this case to provide that this shall be subject to such regulations as shall be made by the Governor in Council?

Mr. HAGGART. Under the Railway Act every railway has a right to run either by steam or electricity. I do not see any difficulty in running one road by steam and the other by electricity on the same tracks, any more than running two steam railways.

Mr. MORRISON. My point is that this Hull Electric Railway Company may run their cars over the Canadian Pacific Railway in the city of Ottawa and ignore the objections of the city, which, I think, is contrary to the spirit of the Act. By leaving in these words, from the twelfth line to the end, you cause a conflict in the Act itself. You will ignore the right of the city of Ottawa to decide as to whether and to what extent the electric road may run on the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. DEVLIN. I cannot see the necessity of taking out those few lines to please my hon. friend.

Mr. BELCOURT. To please my constituents.

Mr. DEVLIN. My hon. friend's constituents did not ask him to oppose this Bill. The views of those who sent him to Parliament were pretty well represented in an article in the "Free Press," which said that the citizens of Ottawa had no objection to the passing of this Bill, but, on the contrary, were most anxious to see this road get into the city of Ottawa. So far as my hon. friend's constituents are concerned, their interests will best be served and their pockets better lined, in every possible sense, if this road comes into the city of Ottawa.

Mr. FOSTER. What does that mean?

Mr. DEVLIN. That a lot of money will be brought from the county of Pontiac to Ottawa. It means that the products of Pontiac and Wright counties will be brought into Ottawa, and that the money obtained for these products will be spent in Ottawa.

Mr. FOSTER. That was a pretty sharp turn.

Mr. DEVLIN. My hon. friend must not put any construction on what I said which is not borne out by my words.

Mr. DAVIN. According to this clause, you would be able to carry your road over the Canadian Pacific Railway line through the streets of Ottawa. Your line runs on Sundays, do you propose to run through Ottawa on Sunday?

Mr. DEVLIN. My hon. friend must have travelled over the line on Sunday.

Mr. DAVIN. No, I have never been over the line.

Mr. DEVLIN. It is impossible for me to consent that this clause should be struck out, because that would defeat the end of the Bill.

Mr. MORRISON. It ought to be defeated.

Mr. DEVLIN. No doubt my hon. friend has worked hard enough to defeat it. I wish to bring our freight and passengers destined for western points over the Canadian Pacific Railway, which object, the hon. gentleman must see, is a most laudable one, and altogether in the interests of the community. I am perfectly willing to move that, as a further amendment be added to the clause:

That all contracts hereafter made between the said company, relating to the above matters, shall be subject to the approval of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council.

Mr. BELCOURT. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken in the assertion he has repeated so often, that I have received no instructions from my constituents to take the part I have taken, and to show my hon. friend and this hon. committee that I have no intention or desire of opposing the passage of this Bill. I declare that with the amendment he has proposed I am satisfied. I am not arbitrarily opposing the passage of this Bill. I may say that I have had instructions from the City Solicitor himself, who requested me, in the interests of the citizens of Ottawa, to see that every protection should be afforded the public of the capital in the use of this railway bridge. I deny that the hon. member is competent to express the sentiments of the electors of the city of Ottawa. My colleague (Mr. Hutchison) and myself have been elected to represent their views, and I deny any right or authority on the part of the hon. gentleman to state what the views of the citizens of Ottawa are. What I have done here in opposing the Bill and in seeking to introduce into it the measure of protection to which the citizens of Ottawa are entitled, I have only done in the exercise of my duty. I withdraw the amendment I submitted because that proposed by the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) meets my views.

On section 5,

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I desire to say that I object to this clause on the ground that we are called upon to ratify by it a by-law of the city of Hull and an agreement which we have not before us and with the contents of which we are not made acquainted.

Mr. DEVLIN. This clause was put in at the desire of the city of Hull. Here are the facts connected with this clause. The city of Hull thought the Act an infringement upon its rights and privileges, and it was so represented before the Committee on Railways and Canals, and in order to meet the wishes of the city and of several representatives of the city present, this clause was framed and inserted, and was passed with the approval of the whole Railway Committee.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I object on the ground I have stated. Are we going to give effect to a document which is not before us and with the provisions of which we are not acquainted? I do not make objection on account of the city of Hull.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is quite evident that this point is a very important one. As was pointed out on a previous occasion also there are many points in this Bill affecting principles that are not only important but new, involving questions between the provinces and the Dominion. Therefore, the committee ought carefully to consider the details of such legislation. It was stated on behalf of the Minister of Justice, when the Bill was before the committee, that these were the views he held. But he had not had time fully to investigate the matter. The lawyers in this House will understand that these are most complicated questions, questions that the Minister of Justice, whoever he might be, would require time to look into. I would call attention to the fact that the Railway Act would not apply to this Bill, and I do not see how the Railway Committee are going to exercise their power in respect of it. As this clause was put in simply to please somebody representing the city of Hull, and on grounds that I think good reasons could not be given for, and, as in the judgment of gentlemen who understand these matters, this is a new principle, it is of no particular advantage to the city, nor can it be to parties interested in this Bill. Therefore, I think it ought to be struck out.

It being Six o'clock, the committee took recess.

After Recess.

Mr. DEVLIN. Before you left the Chair at Six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, objection was made to this clause 5 by the Solicitor General. I stated that the clause had been inserted at the request of the representatives of the city of Hull, who came before the Committee of the House on Railways and Canals. I myself was most anxious to have it inserted as it seems to me to give considerable protection to the city of Hull in so far as any rights and privileges belonging to the city are concerned. I am most anxious to get this Bill through, and since this clause is objected to by the Solicitor General, and as objections have been formulated against it by the Department of Justice, all I have to say is that I will have to withdraw the clause.

Mr. BELCOURT. I do not quite agree with the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin). I do not think the whole clause should be struck out. I think that the objection raised by the Solicitor General would be quite sufficiently met by striking out all after the word "Act" in the 5th line of the clause. This would leave the clause reading as follows:—

Nothing in this Act contained shall confer on the company any additional powers, franchises, rights or privileges in the city of Hull beyond those held, acquired or possessed by the Hull Electric Company at the time of the passing of this Act.

Mr. LOUNT. I do not see that any purpose would be served by leaving the clause as suggested. It would simply be a declaration that the law should remain as it is and that this Act shall not convey any additional power. Well, as the Act does not profess to convey additional power other than has been conceded by the committee so far, it seems to me that the clause suggested conveys no meaning.

Mr. BELCOURT. The Act authorizes this company to construct certain lines of railway in addition to those already constructed and for which no provision is made under the agreement sought to be ratified by section 5. I think that the company, if this is passed, will be in a position to construct a branch line in the city for which no provision has been entered into between this company and the corporation of the city of Hull. The object I have in view in proposing the clause I do is to make it clear that before constructing on the streets to which I have referred it will be necessary for the company to go to the Hull city council and make an arrangement for this particular branch. There could surely be nothing to object to in that. I can well conceive the objection hon. members would entertain to ratifying an agreement of which they know nothing and which is not now before the House. But this does not apply to ratifying the first four lines of section 5.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall this clause be struck out? Carried.

Mr. BELCOURT. I should like to have the opinion of the committee on my amendment. The hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) proposes that the clause should be struck out. I move that it be not struck out, but that all after the word "Act" in the 5th line be struck out.

Mr. DEVLIN. My hon. friend must understand that I only yield to the desire of the Solicitor General.

Mr. BELCOURT. I am not now finding fault with my hon. friend from Wright (Mr. Devlin), but I think the amendment I propose is not open to the objection raised by the hon. Solicitor General.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If I understand the hon. member for Ottawa City (Mr. Belcourt) correctly, his position is that this Bill, standing as it does now, confers upon the Hull Electric Company the right to lay down tracks and construct works within the city of Hull, which it has not the right to do under its existing charter. Well, that is a matter which I think ought to be very readily settled. I suppose what the hon. member has in his mind is that such additional powers are conferred under the second clause of the Bill and is to be found in these words: "That the Electric Company may construct and extend its railway to and over the Union Bridge and the approaches." In other words, it is held by my hon. friend that under the existing charter the Hull Electric Company has no power to extend its present railway to the Union Bridge and its approaches, or to and over such portion of the bridge and its approaches as may be within the limits of the city of Hull. Now, if he is right, I think he is making a point which is worthy of the consideration of the committee; and the effect of leaving the proposed portion of section 5 in the Bill would be practically to denude the company of the powers which are conferred upon it by the first clause of section 2 of this Bill. If, as a matter of fact, he is right, then the present Bill does give additional rights to the Hull Electric Company in the extension of its railway over these approaches and through this bridge. Now, I think section 5 which declares that nothing in this Act shall confer upon the company any additional powers beyond those already possessed by it under its special charter, clearly destroys the effect of the first clause of section 2. Therefore I take it that if we intend to give the company rights which we have already declared it is our purpose to confer upon them by the 2nd section, that whole 5th clause should go out.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I would like to point out to the Minister of Railways that after giving the legislation provided for in clause 2, clause 3 provides that the operation of so much of the company's line of railway made within the province of Ontario shall be subject to the statutes of Ontario. Then we go on and grant certain powers to this company which he says it can exercise in the province of Quebec, and there is no provision to bring this company under the jurisdiction of the Dominion Railway Act, neither is there anything to show that you have taken it out of the jurisdiction of the provincial legislation of the province of Quebec. As I pointed out to the committee in the first place, it seems to me that the Bill is very badly drawn. I am not taking any part at all in the contention between the two companies. It has been pointed out by several members who take an active part in railway legislation that this is somewhat inconsistent and different from any legislation we have had heretofore, and that there are some very important points of principle involved in this legislation. It seems to me that one clause is inconsistent with the other, and where the company will be when this Bill is through, I cannot understand.

Mr. BERGERON. Before the courts.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not know where the jurisdiction of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council would come in, unless there was some declaration to bring this under the Railway Act.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think we are raising difficulties here. I see nothing in the Bill as the hon. gentleman proposes to leave it, which is very objectionable. He proposes to strike out section 5 altogether, for the plain reason expressed by the Minister of Railways that we have under section 2 conferred powers upon them which they are not given by the local charter. If section 5 is left in, it simply contradicts and annuls the powers that were conferred by section 2. Therefore the hon. gentleman is well advised in withdrawing it, and when section 5 is withdrawn, the Bill is plainly understood. The other section to which my hon. friend refers, relates entirely to that portion of the work in the city of Ottawa to reach the station which they are going to build, and that 3rd section simply prescribes that that particular branch of the road shall be subject to the statutes of Ontario.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the promoter of the Bill if, as a matter of fact, the city of Hull has given any authority at all to this company to build from the present terminus to the stone bridge?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think the question to which the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) directed our attention, does not arise in connection with the 5th clause. We have either passed beyond that point, or else we have not come to it. At all events, it is really not germane to the discussion we are now carrying on. I think my hon. friend has properly called the attention of the committee to the question as to the jurisdiction of the Railway Committee, and it is a matter that we might very well consider. But at the moment we have before us the 5th clause of the Bill, and the question before the committee is whether that should be left in whole or in part, or whether it should be struck out. My judgment is that the 5th section should not remain in the Bill, as I think it is really contradictory of one of the three preceding provisions. I think the point which the hon. member who raised this question had in his mind, was that we have, under the second clause and with the amendments which have been added, taken the precaution of requiring that the consent or approval of the city authorities at Ottawa shall first be had before this company extends its line of railway within the corporate limits of the city. But the hon. member would have us bear in mind that we have not done that in respect of the extension within the city of Hull, and what he desires is that there shall be a similar clause inserted in this Bill, or in some independent section of it, which will make it necessary that the consent or approval of the corporation of the city of Hull should be had before the extension takes place which is authorized by the 2nd section of the Bill. That is a very fair request to make, and the hon. gentleman need only propose an additional section which will contain something to that effect, to cover all the ground. The 5th clause may drop out not only without any disadvantage to the Bill, but with positive advantage to it.

Mr. FOSTER. Can the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) tell me if the city of Hull has given authority to the Hull Electric Company to build from its present terminus up to the bridge approaches?

Mr. DEVLIN. The company is operating under a charter already received from the city of Hull.

Mr. FOSTER. That is, as far as the present terminus is concerned. Perhaps the hon. gentleman does not know whether the city of Hull has given them power to extend their line to the bridge approaches.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The members of the Hull City Council, through their solicitor, appeared before the committee and said that the company did not have this power, and they wanted a clause to protect them. If this clause is struck out, some other provision ought to be made to meet the request of the Hull City Council. They desired, as suggested by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt) and the Minister of Railways, that they should be protected against the company proceeding with the work without the consent of the council under the municipal and provincial laws.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, we should legislate in this matter. We have legislated so with reference to Ottawa and the province of Ontario, and we would be acting unfairly, if we gave this company the right to build any line in the streets of Hull without the consent of the council.

Mr. BELCOURT. The suggestion made by the Minister of Railways would, I think, meet with the desire of the city council of Hull. I am quite willing, on their behalf, to adopt the suggestion and to allow clause 5 to be struck out, and another clause substituted. I would suggest that the substituted clause should read in the following words, and I am following almost verbatim the last part of section 2, which affords protection to the city of Ottawa. I would move that clause 5 be struck out and the following be substituted as clause 5:—

That as regards so much of its line of railway as may hereafter be constructed in the city of Hull, the company shall only exercise the powers conferred by this Act as to the location, construction and operation of its railway, upon such streets and upon such terms and conditions and for such periods as the council of the said city of Hull has approved or may hereafter approve by by-law.

Mr. DEVLIN. That is all very good, but I cannot agree to it. First of all, my hon. friend (Mr. Belcourt) cannot come here and say that he represents the city of Hull.

Mr. BELCOURT. I did not say that I represented the city of Hull.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the hon. gentleman (Mr. Belcourt) to say: On behalf of the city of Hull, I propose to do so and so.

Mr. BELCOURT. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; I did not say, on behalf of the city of Hull.

Mr. DEVLIN. The objection of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) is a fair one, and I shall meet it at once. My hon. friend will remember that, when this Bill was first before the House, the by-law which had been passed by the city of Hull with reference to the electric railway, was put into the hands of every member of this House. It is not included in the Bill in its present form, and I do not know why. Clause 5 refers to this by-law 61, which was published in the Bill, and that is the reason clause 5 is here. Clause 2 of the by-law 61 reads as follows:—

The said street railway may pass along one or more or all the streets of the city of Hull, provided always that the circulation of foot passengers shall in no manner be diminished, prevented, or endangered by the said railway.

The power of passing along this very street referred to by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), is enjoyed by the company. Why take it away from them?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The best way to remedy this difficulty, which is a serious one, would be to take clause 17 of the Bill as first printed, insert it as clause 5 of the present Bill, and print the by-law as a schedule.

Mr. McCARTHY. If we strike out clause 5 altogether, this company could go on without any hindrance. If we leave in the first portion of the clause, we will say that they cannot do anything except what they are allowed to do by the original statute and by the by-law.

Mr. FOSTER. If the city of Hull afterwards come to the conclusion that something else ought to be done in railway construction, that would necessitate them coming here for legislation again.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think so. You could add "or by any other arrangement made with the city of Hull." All that we have to do is to protect the city of Hull. The company is represented here, and is protecting itself.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The objection is not met by the suggestion of the hon.

member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), because it would be thought, if the by-law was referred to and not printed, that it was a mistake in legislation. The promoter of the Bill agrees to accept section 17 of the original Bill, which refers to the by-law, and then the by-law should be printed as part of the schedule to the Act. That will remedy the whole of the difficulty.

Mr. LOUNT. I believe there is no absolute necessity to publish the by-law in the Act. It is only encumbering the Act with an unnecessary by-law. I think the suggestion of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is pertinent. It removes the difficulty, and protects the city of Hull, so far as it can be protected. As I recollect the proceedings before the Railway Committee, this matter was submitted to the parties, the solicitor for the railway company was present, and they framed this provision and brought it back to the committee, saying that they all agreed to it. The city of Hull and the city of Ottawa having agreed upon it, it does not appear to me that any objection should be urged by the committee against that in which both sides have to a large extent concurred. The clause, as it would read after the first five lines are struck out, would be a perfect protection to the city of Hull, and I do not see the necessity of printing a by-law as part of the Act. It refers to the by-law, and incorporates it in the Act by that reference to it.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not agree with the Solicitor General, because clause 17 proposes to validate by-law 61. I do not think we should validate that by-law, and we do not propose to do so. What we say is that they shall not do anything that is not provided by the by-law. Otherwise we leave them just as they were before.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My objection is to referring to the by-law as part of the statute without printing it.

Mr. McCARTHY. Clause 17 purports to confirm a by-law. What I say is to leave that part out. We can schedule the by-law if you please. It is always better to do that when we refer to a by-law at all.

Mr. SUTHEELAND. I think the amendment meets the wishes of the city council of Hull, as I understood them.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. DEVLIN moved that the Bill be now read the third time.

Mr. FOSTER. I think this Bill was railroaded through the committee with great speed, and it should not be railroaded through the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is a question of urgency before the House as to whether they will have this Bill read a third time now or not, and I shall put it to the House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 21) to incorporate the Columbia Telephone and Telegraph Company.—(Mr. Bostock.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 31) respecting the St. Catharines and Niagara Central Railway Company.—(Mr. Lount.)

Bill (No. 32) respecting the South Shore Railway Company.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Bill (No. 35) for the relief of Albert Nordheimer—(from the Senate).—(Mr. Lount) on division.

Bill (No. 36) to incorporate the Manitoba and Nelson Valley Railway Company.—(Mr. Roche.)

ACHILLE JOBIN.

Mr. MONK asked :

Has the Government dismissed Achille Jobin, of Dorval, P.Q., from the position he held in connection with the dredging now being done on Lake St. Louis? What was the cause of his dismissal? Were any complaints made against him, and by whom? Has his successor been appointed? What is his name, and by whom was he recommended?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The superintending engineer, it appears, dispensed with the services of Achille Jobin, and appointed Arthur Desjardins in his stead, but the removal took place without any direction or authority from my department. I was not apprised of what had taken place until this question was put on the Table, but shall procure full information on the subject.

Mr. FOSTER. Was it without the endorsement of the Minister acting at that time?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have no reason to suppose it was either with his knowledge or endorsement. I am advised it was without any knowledge whatever of the department. I presume that would include all the officers of the department.

NANAIMO, COMOX, UNION, &c., MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. McINNES asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to establish a semi-weekly mail service between Nanaimo City, Comox, Union and intermediate points?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The hon. gentleman having pressed on the Government the advisability of establishing a semi-weekly mail service between Nanaimo City, Comox, Union and intermediate points, it is the intention of the Government, at an early day, to invite tenders for such service.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that the only reason ?

MR. CHARLES R. SMITH.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (for Mr. Gibson) asked :

Was Mr. Charles R. Smith, of the city of Hamilton, recommended by the late Government for a position in the Government service ? If so, what was the nature of the recommendation and the salary attached thereto ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Mr. Smith was recommended on the 27th of April last by the then Controller of Customs as a preventive officer in the Customs at a salary of $1,000, and no action appears to have been taken by the late Government.

MINING ENGINEERS' VISIT TO CANADA.

Mr. McDOUGALL asked :

Is the Government aware that on the invitation of the Federated Canadian Mining Institute, the Iron and Steel Institute of Great Britain, the Federated Institute of Mining Engineers, and the American Institute of Mining Engineers, are to visit Canada in 1897 ? If so, has the Government been asked to provide transportation facilities to enable the visitors to make personal inspection of the mineral resources and mining industries of the Dominion ? If not, will the Government give favourable consideration to a request to provide such facilities ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). This matter has not been brought to the attention of the Government yet.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. McALISTER asked :

Did the Honourable leader of the Government, in speaking at the court-house at Dalhousie, N.B., on Monday, the 28th day of August, A.D. 1895, say :—

“ If one of you gentlemen take a load of farm produce to sell in the American market, you are stopped on the road when you come to the American boundary line and made to pay a customs duty which more than takes away any profit you might make. It is the policy of the great Liberal party of Canada, of which I have the honour to be the leader, to make the American markets free to the farmers of Canada, and as soon as we get in power, which will not now be long, we will make such arrangements with the Government of the United States as will cause these markets to be opened to Canadian farmers. The Conservatives tell you that they cannot make any fair arrangements with the American Government for reciprocity, but that is because they never were in earnest about doing so ” ?

Mr. McINNES.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I am sorry to say to my hon. friend that that is one of the numerous questions asked of me to answer which my memory is not equal, but the sentiments are quite commendable, however.

BALSAM AND CAMERON LAKES—IMPROVEMENT OF CHANNEL.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (for Mr. McHugh) asked :

1. What amount has been expended for improvement of the channel between Balsam and Cameron Lakes, at Rosedale, during the last two years ending 30th June, 1896 ?

2. What work has been done for such expenditure ?

3. Was such work done under contract let by public tenders ? If not, then under what authority was such work done ?

4. What amount has been expended or paid on roads, or allowed in respect of roads, in the township of Bexley and Eldon affected, or likely to be affected, by the construction of the Trent Valley Canal ?

5. Under what authority was such last mentioned expenditure or payment made ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The amount expended for improvement of the channel between Balsam and Cameron Lakes at Rosedale, during the two years ended 30th June, 1896, is $19,089.71. The work done for such expenditure has been the drilling of 14,000 holes through this channel of an average depth of 4 feet 6 inches, ready for blasting ; the length of channel drilled is 4,000 feet ; the blasting of a portion of the surface drilled is 2,500 feet in length by 90 feet in width, and the dredging out 6,500 cubic yards of the material blasted. Such work was not done under contract let by public tenders. Such work was executed by day's labour, under authority from the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals. The amount expended, or paid on roads, or allowed in respect of roads, in the township of Bexley and Eldon, affected or likely to be affected by the construction of the Trent Valley Canal, $12,699.15. By authority of the Government and under a contract with Andrew Onderdonk for construction of Section No. 1 of the Balsam Lake and Lake Simcoe Division of the Trent Canal

ATLANTIC FAST SS. SERVICE—CONTRACT.

Mr. POULIOT asked :

Whether it is true that, subsequently to the 23rd June last, the late Government sent to Sir Donald Smith, High Commissioner at London England, a cablegram or other document instructing him to sign immediately, in the name of the Government of Canada, the contract with the Allan Company, for the fast line of steamships between Canada and England, on the basis of an annual subsidy of $750,000 for ten years ?

If so, what is the date of the said telegram or other document ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). All the papers in regard to the fast Atlantic service will soon be laid on the Table, and in these my hon. friend will find the answer to his question.

THE "HURVEY" LINE.

Mr. KAULBACH asked :

Is the Government aware that on the proposed line of railway, located from Sand Point, Shelburne County, to New Germany, Lunenburg County, Nova Scotia, known as the "Hurvey Line," upon which construction had commenced, an application was made last year for an extension of said road from New Germany passing through New Ross, connecting Chester Basin, Chester and Hubbert's Cove, making the terminal point at Halifax? If so, is it the intention of the Government to submit a resolution to Parliament, this session, with the usual provision of $3,200 per mile to complete the same?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I can only repeat the answer given to similar questions, that it is not the intention of the Government to bring down this session any resolutions whatever or to promote any legislation in the way of giving subsidies for railways.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY—DISMISSALS.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

Whether it is the intention of the Honourable Minister of Railways and Canals to make inquiries into the cases of Anthony Duggan, William Stuart, Richard Fitzpatrick, Robert Stuart, Joseph Gallant, Andrew LeClair, Thomas Hughes, Patrick Berrigan, Ewen Stuart, Jas. Currie, Sylvain Wedge, Daniel McAlduff, Alex. Livingston, Alex. McConnell, Mortimer McEwen, Phillip Mooney and other employees, in all about sixty, who were summarily dismissed from the Prince Edward Island Railway, since the 11th July last, without investigation, with a view to the redress of any wrongs which may have been committed, in order to reinstate faithful and efficient servants of the department, according to the declaration made by the Honourable the Minister of Railways to the House in committee on the 18th inst.?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I am unable to answer this question fully until further information is obtained from the superintendent of the railway. The assumption in the question that about 60 men have been dismissed since the 11th July, is incorrect. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who acted as Minister of Railways until the 27th August, informs me that all casual or temporary labourers on the road were previously to the 23rd June, employed on the recommendation of politicians supporting the late Government, and that he at once ordered that this should cease, and temporary workmen be employed hereafter on the recommendation of the friends of the present Government. As a consequence of this change, a number of men temporarily employed under the old system, have ceased to be employed, and others have been substituted for them. A return giving the names and dates of dismissal of these men is being prepared, and will be laid before Parliament shortly. No application has been made by, or on behalf of, any of the parties named in question for an investigation into his case. If any such is made, it will receive careful consideration, and, in cases where an investigation is ordered, the parties will be allowed to tender evidence in their own defence.

Mr. HACKETT asked :

1. Has the Government dismissed the following men from the service of the Prince Edward Island Railway, viz.:—James Currie, trackman; Sylvain Wedge, trackman; Daniel McAlduff, porter; at Alberton station?

2. What charges was preferred against them?

3. Who investigated the charges, and were the men allowed to defend themselves?

4. What officials reported on those dismissed, and what reasons, if any, were assigned for making them?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I understand, the men named in the question of the hon. member were removed. The fact of the removals has only come to my knowledge since the question was asked, and I am intending to make full inquiry respecting the same.

POSTMASTER AT SAILOR'S HOPE.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's) asked :

Whether Mr. Fidelus Macdonald, postmaster at Sailor's Hope, P.E.I., has been dismissed? If so, on what charge and by whom was it preferred? Was an investigation held and the charge proved? Has a successor been appointed and what is his name? What was the salary of the late incumbent?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Mr. Fidelus Macdonald has not been dismissed. A complaint was made against him and notice thereof communicated to him, to which he has made reply, denying the correctness of the charge. His salary is $120 a year.

MR. A. P. LEPINE.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (for Mr. Casgrain) asked :

What was the date of the dismissal of Mr. A. P. Lépine, of Quebec, from the public service? What was the date of the appointment of Mr. Belland in the place of Mr. Lépine?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Mr. Lépine was notified on the 5th August last that his services were no longer required. The work in connection with his position had ceased on 30th June last, with the expenditure of the appropriation for 1895-96, there being no money to spend and no work to be done after that date. 2. 5th September instant.

SEIZURE OF THE "WILLIE MCGOWAN" AND "ARIEL."

Mr. McDUGALL asked :

Has the Government addressed any communication to the Imperial Government since May last, further urging early settlement of the claims against the Russian authorities in connection with the seizure of the schooners "Willie McGowan" and "Ariel" in the Behring Sea? If so, on what date?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). No such communications have been addressed to the Imperial Government by the Government of Canada since May last, nor would any such representations appear to serve any purpose. The information which this Government has is to the effect that the claims and all the documents in support thereof have been, or are about to be, referred to Her Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg, for early adjustment with the Russian government; and negotiations, it is understood, are proceeding in that direction. No representations on the part of the Canadian Government could expedite matters at this point.

THE HORN-FLY.

Mr. RINFRET asked :

Whether it is the intention of the Government to offer a reward to any person who finds the best means of averting or fighting the horn-fly scourge, provided such means be found effectual and practical by the Department of Agriculture of Canada?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). The matter has not been under consideration of the Government. The Government has, on the Experimental Farm staff an entomologist, whose duty it is to study all such matters. He has given most careful attention to this subject, and has published for the farmers of Canada a remedy which is satisfactory, when applied properly. Further experiments have been undertaken, to discover whether anything cheaper and better than these remedies can be found. There is, therefore, no necessity for the Government to offer any reward, as suggested above.

TOBACCO REGULATIONS.

Mr. GAUTHIER asked :

Whether it is the intention of the Government to maintain the law which forbids tobacco-growers to manufacture into cut tobacco or cigars the tobacco they require for their personal use?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière). I am not in a position to answer at present.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Mr. GAUTHIER asked :

Whether it is the intention of the Government to repeal the law respecting weights and mea-

Mr. TARTE.

asures, in order to relieve merchants and others from the payment of the fees and costs attending inspection?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière). The matter has not yet been considered by the Government.

EMPLOYMENT OF MESSENGERS.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (for Mr. Dugas) asked :

What was the number of messengers during the last session under the Mackenzie Government, in 1878?

What were their names?

How many of them did not resume their positions in the first session under the succeeding Administration?

What are the names of those who were left out?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). As my hon. friend knows, this is a matter that is not under the control of the Government.

DISMISSALS FROM THE INTER-COLONIAL.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (for Mr. Casgrain) asked :

Were the following persons dismissed from the service of the Intercolonial Railway, and, if so, for what reason, viz. :—George Talbot and Alfred Dubé, both of the town of Montmagny; Xavier Simoneau and J. Bte. Proulx, both of the parish of St. Pierre, Rivière du Sud; Xavier Poitras and Sifroid Fortier, both of Cap St. Ignace?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Alfred Dubé is one of the three or four persons to whom I referred the other day, as having been discharged from the Intercolonial Railway employ. As to Talbot, Simoneau and Fortier, I have inquired, and learn that they have not been continued in the employ. I had not learned of their discharge until the question of the hon. member brought the matter to my notice, nor was the department communicated with previously thereto, to my knowledge. I shall make inquiry into the circumstances. Proulx and Poitras have not been removed.

JOHN O'NEIL.

Mr. BRODEUR asked :

Is John O'Neil, whose name appears in the Civil Service List for 1895 as collector of canal tolls at Montreal, set down as having been born on 3rd September, 1835, first appointed April, 1858, and in receipt of a salary of $2,000, still in the employment of the Government? If not, when did he leave such employment, and by whom has he been replaced?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). John O'Neil is still in the employment of the Government.

LOCK-KEEPER, CHAMBLY CANAL.

Mr. MORIN asked :

Whether the Government before appointing Bernard O'Cain in place of Cyrille Patenaude, as lock-keeper on the Chambly Canal, P.Q., made inquiry as to his age and competency ?

On whose recommendation was the said B. O'Cain appointed ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Bernard O'Cain has not been appointed in the place of Cyrille Patenaude as lock-keeper on the Chambly Canal.

WILFRID BROUSSEAU, POSTMASTER, ST. JOHNS.

Mr. MORIN asked :

Whether Wilfrid Brosseau, appointed postmaster of the town of St. Johns, P.Q., in the place of James Macpherson, is not a manufacturer and merchant of the said town of St. Johns ?

Do the Government allow town postmasters to conduct stores or manufactures ?

Has the said Wilfrid Brosseau furnished any, and, if so, what security as postmaster of the town of St. Johns ?

Who recommended the appointment of Wilfrid Brosseau ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 1. It is not known to department whether or not Mr. Brosseau is a manufacturer or merchant. 2. No rule has been laid down on this subject, the department merely requiring every postmaster who is paid by commission to give a proper degree of personal oversight to the duties of his office. 3. Mr. Brosseau has been called upon to furnish a guarantee bond in the usual amount. 4. A number of citizens of St. Johns petitioned the department in Mr. Brosseau's favour.

MAIL CONTRACT WITH THE ALLAN SS. COMPANY.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

1. When was the last contract with the Allan SS. Company for carrying mails between Canada and Great Britain made, and for what length of time ?

2. Was there any clause in the contract requiring the Government to give notice to the company of the expiry of the same ?

3. In what way have the renewals since been made ?

4. If by Order in Council, what are the dates of the several orders issued since the last contract ?

5. For what period was the renewal made by the last Order in Council ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). 1. 16th day of December, 1891, until the 24th day of December, 1892, inclusive, with a proviso that the Government should have the right to continue the operation of the contract for a further period not exceeding one year. 2. No, but in view of the fact that the contract had been continued from year to year for many years, the Government were of the opinion that notice to terminate the arangement should have been given, and that under all the circumstances the company was entitled to the contract for carrying the mails to the close of the season of 1897, and no longer. 3. By Orders in Council. 4. 17th of May, 1893, authorizing renewal for one year from the 24th of December, 1893—12th June, 1894, authorizing a further extension until the close of navigation on the St. Lawrence in 1895—7th of September, 1895. 5. For one year from the close of navigation in 1895, or say, until the 25th day of November, 1896.

MR. H. E. PETIT, AND COAL CONTRACT.

Mr. MORIN (translation) asked :

Whether the Minister of Public Works has taken cognizance of the following letter which concludes an article intitled "Mr. Tarte," published in the journal "La Libre Parole," on 5th September, 1896, at Montreal :—

2nd September, 1896.

Dear Sir,—I have received from the Public Works Department at Ottawa a letter informing me that you have tendered for the furnishing of _____ to the public buildings of _____. But as your tender is the same as that of another house, they write to ask me to whom the contract is to be given.

I write you to-day to know what you intend to do for me in this matter. I shall await your answer.

Business is business, as you know.

Respectfully yours (?)

Did the Minister of Public Works write, or cause a letter to be written, in relation to a contract for supplying coal, to Mr. H. E. Petit, the defeated Liberal candidate in the County of Terrebonne at the late Dominion election ? If so, is the Minister of Public Works aware that Mr. H. E. Petit, the defeated Liberal candidate at the said election, is, according to public rumour, the author of the letter quoted in the journal "La Libre Parole" ?

Is it the intention of the Minister of Public Works to govern himself hereafter by the opinion of the said Mr. Petit, in awarding contracts for certain supplies ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I have seen the letter in the journal mentioned. I had received two tenders for the supply of coal to the public building at St. Jérôme. The prices were equal. If there had been a difference, the lower tender would have been accepted as a matter of course. But, as they were equal, I was free to accept either. In such cases, the practice of the department, for many years, had been to ask the opinion of the friends of the Government as to which tender should be accepted. Following this practice, the secretary of my department sent the following letter to Mr. Petit, who had been the Liberal candidate at the last election :—

Department of Public Works,
Ottawa, August 28th, 1896.

Sir,—In answer to a notice asking tenders for the supply of coal for the Public Buildings of the Dominion, two tenders have been received for the supply of coal necessary for the Public Building of St. Jérôme, viz. :—Messrs. Evans Brothers and Labrecque, Cousineau & Co. The price demanded by those tenderers being equal, I am instructed to ask you to kindly tell me to whom you would like the contract for the supply of coal to be granted.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
E. F. E. ROY
Secretary.

If Mr. Petit wrote such a letter as is given in the question, he did so without my knowledge and the knowledge of the department, and I emphatically disapprove of and condemn it. No action has been taken on the tender.

It is my determination that in every case in which tenders are invited, the lowest tender shall be accepted, if the parties are responsible.

The letter mentioned in the question was part of an article of a libellous character reflecting on the administration of my department and the letter was used for the purpose of supporting unfounded accusations against me. Immediately, on having my attention drawn to the article, I caused steps to be taken to prosecute the author, and the proceedings now pending in court will be prosecuted as vigorously as the law will permit.

CARRYING WOOD ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. FLINT asked :

1. Is the Department of Railways informed that the following persons, employees on the Intercolonial at Rivière du Loup, have their wood carried free of charge, from the station at Cap St. Ignace or other places on the Intercolonial Railway, namely : Joseph Chenard, conductor ; Johnny Wilson, chief switchman ; Joseph Dion, fireman ; Grégoire Soucy, baggageman ; Arthur Beaulieu, switchman ; F. O. Fortin, despatcher ; Charles St. Pierre, day labourer ; Louis Michaud, brakesman ?

2. If the Government has no information on this subject, does it intend to inquire into the truth of these matters ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. No ; the Department of Railways is not informed that the following persons, employees on the Intercolonial Railway at Rivière du Loup, have their wood carried free of charge, from the station at Cap St. Ignace or other places on the Intercolonial Railway, namely :—Joseph Chenard, conductor ; Johnny Wilson, chief switchman ; Joseph Dion, fireman ; Grégoire Soucy, baggageman ; Arthur Beaulieu, switchman ; F. O. Fortin, despatcher ; Charles St. Pierre, day labourer ; Louis Michaud, brakesman. 2. Yes ; inquiry is being made.

MR. FLODDY, AND THE DEPARTMENT OF INLAND REVENUE.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked :

1. Is there, in the Department of Inland Revenue, a person named Floddy, who is now going through the counties below Quebec, as an informer ?
Mr. TARTE.

2. If so, when was he appointed, and on whose recommendation ?

3. What is his pay ?

4. Besides his pay, how much is he allowed for travelling expenses ?

5. Has he made any report to the department since his appointment, in reference to seizures made ?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière). 1. Yes, a temporary preventive officer. 2. Appointed on the 27th December, 1895, and was recommended by Hon. John F. Wood. 3. His pay is $50 per month. 4. His actual travelling expenses. 5. A report of every seizure made through his efforts has been forwarded to the collector of the division at Quebec, who has reported the matter to the department.

INSPECTOR OF INLAND REVENUE AT HALIFAX.

Mr. McDOUGALL (for Mr. Borden, Halifax) asked :

(a.) Who is the inspector of inland revenue at Halifax ?

(b.) When was he appointed or promoted to that office ?

(c.) Has he been notified of his appointment or promotion ?

(d.) If not, when will he be so notified ?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière). Mr. H. H. Grant is acting as Inspector of Inland Revenue at Halifax. It is questionable whether any appointment of inspector has been made. Mr. H. H. Grant was recommended for such office by the late Ministry. His nomination formed part of a report which was approved by His Excellency the Governor General, subject to certain qualifications. In making the classification rendered necessary by His Excellency's action it was supposed that Mr. Grant's nomination came within the category of those which were intended to be approved, and it was so placed in the published return, but we have since had reason to doubt the correctness of this.

For this reason and for reasons connected with the reorganization of the office, Mr. Grant will not be notified of appointment.

MAIL CONTRACT CANCELLED—MANITOBA.

Mr. RICHARDSON asked :

Why was the contract made by the Post Office Department, prior to the present Government taking office, with one J. D. Burke for the carrying of mails from the post office in Morris to the Northern Pacific and Canadian Pacific Railway stations, cancelled ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to state that prior to the contract above referred to, there existed two separate contracts with one J. D. Burke, for carrying the mails from the post office in Morris to the stations of the Canadian Pacific and Northern Pacific, respectively, at sums amounting together to $227.50 per annum. That these two contracts, in ordinary course, would have expired on the 28th February, 1896, and tenders for new contracts were duly advertised for.

The last day for receiving such tenders was the 14th February, 1896, and, within such date, two tenders were received for the two services.

That on the 14th February, 1896, a letter was received at the Post Office Department from Hon. A. A. C. LaRivière, in the following words:—

House of Commons,
Ottawa, 14th February, 1896.

Dear Colonel,—I beg herewith to inclose a telegram from Mr. J. D. Burke, of Morris, Manitoba, offering to renew his mail contract on the old terms, and to ask that the tenders for contract to carry mails from the office of Morris to railway station be not opened, but that the old contract for the same be renewed as requested.

Yours very truly,
(Signed) A. A. C. LaRIVIERE.

Lt.-Col. White,
Deputy P. M. General,
Ottawa.

And that the said tenders were not opened in the department, but by order of the then Postmaster General, a new contract was entered into with said John David Burke for the performance of the two services at the total sum of $227.50 per annum.

That on the 23rd September, 1896, information reached me that said contracts had been renewed at a price exceeding that for which a tender had been received, and, accordingly, I directed an inquiry into the matter and learned, on the information of the clerk having charge of such tenders, that the tenders in question were still unopened in the department, whereupon I directed their being opened and found amongst them a tender from George Spence (the lowest tenderer) to perform both services at the rate of $100 per year instead of $227.50, the amount at which said contract had been entered into; and accordingly, I directed that steps be taken for the cancellation of such renewed contract and for the service being offered to George Spence on the terms of his tender, namely, $100 a year.

FISHERY OVERSEER, HARRY LINLEY.

Mr. CAMPBELL asked :

What amount of money has been paid Harry Linley, fishery overseer at Lake Erie, county of Kent, Ontario, during the years 1893, 1894 and 1895, for salary in each year? Also, what amount has been allowed him for expenses in each year? How are his expenses made up, and are vouchers for each item required of him?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The following sums were paid to Harry Linley, fishery overseer:—

1893 .....	$112 50	$169 07
1894 .....	125 00	98 39
1895 .....	125 00	67 40

Expenses made up in detail of horse hire and living expenses whilst travelling on official duty. Vouchers are required when it is possible for the officer to obtain them, otherwise the name of the person to whom the money is paid must be inserted in the account, which account is sworn to before a justice of the peace.

RETURNS ORDERED.

1. A statement showing what sums of public money have been spent on Port Stanley harbour, with dates. 2. At what dates and on what conditions, the control of said harbour passed into the hands of the London and Port Stanley Railway Company, and through them to the Great Western and subsequently the Grand Trunk Railway Company. 3. Whether such conditions have been observed.—(Mr. Casey.)

1. Copy of all reports made by the engineers of the Public Works Department since the 1st day of January, 1890, as to the condition and requirements of the Goderich harbour and of the north breakwater.

2. Statement in detail of all amounts voted for the construction and improvement of said harbour.

Copies of despatches, minutes of Council, and correspondence relating to the London International Railway Congress, 1895.—(Mr. Bell, Pictou, for Sir C. H. Tupper.)

Copies of despatches, minutes of Council, and all correspondence relating to the death duties imposed upon colonists domiciled in England.—(Mr. Bell, Pictou, for Sir C. H. Tupper.)

Copies of all correspondence which has passed between the Government and party or parties in reference to the "Montreal, Ottawa, Georgian Bay Canal" scheme; also all papers in connection with any application for financial aid towards this project.—(Mr. Taylor, for Mr. Poirer.)

Copies of all reports of inquiries, &c., made to the Government, in or about May last, by the Inspector of Indian Agencies and Reserves, in relation to complaints made by the Indians of the Abenakis village of St. François re Sales, in the county of Yamaska, against their agent, Mr. A. A. Mondoux.—(Mr. Mignault.)

Preparation and printing of the return of the Eighth General Election for the House of Commons of Canada.—(Mr. Leduc, for Mr. Lavergne.)

Statement showing the amount of money expended by the Dominion Government since the first day of July, 1873, for constructing, equipping and subsidizing railways in Canada, with the number of acres of land granted as subsidies, and their estimate value. Also, a statement showing separately the part of such expenditure made on railways in each province of the Dominion and the North-west Territory, deducting any sums that may have been charged against any of the provinces or the North-west Territory in their debt account with the Dominion.—(Mr. Martin.)

SUPPLY—ATLANTIC FAST SS. SERVICE.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I should like to take up the time of the House for a few moments while I refer to a matter which has already attracted the attention of the House and the country. On the 22nd inst., I had the honour of addressing the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell), in reference to a telegram which appeared in the newspapers, and which I read on that occasion. That telegram had apparently been sent to "L'Electeur" newspaper, and it reads as follows:—

Ottawa, Sept. 18th, 1896.

You can assure my friends that fast line will be all right and that both Quebec and the country will gain by delay. I am advising.

R. R. DOBELL.

Mr. DAVIES.

In my question to the hon. member, I ventured to ask him whether that telegram had been sent by him, and whether it referred to a 17 or 20-knot line. I also stated that, after the hon. gentleman had given his answer, I should ask the Government whether it meant to assume the policy indicated by the hon. gentleman in that telegram. On the 24th instant, the hon. gentleman—and I must thank him for his courtesy—told me that he desired, when the Orders of the Day were called, to make some reference to the telegram upon which I had questioned him. I told the hon. gentleman that I had an engagement, and he told me that he would not bring the matter up until I was in my seat. I left very shortly before the House closed, and the next morning I was somewhat surprised at finding that the hon. gentleman had made the following statement, which I take from "Hansard":—

Mr. DOBELL. Before the House adjourns, I wish to say a few words of personal explanation with regard to a question which the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) put the night before last. I am sorry to trouble the House at this late hour, but I do not wish to defer the explanation longer in justice to parties upon which an unjust reflection has been cast, under which I do not desire they should labour any longer. The hon. member asked me if I had sent a telegram which was published in the "L'Electeur," and I replied, without hesitation and without the least mental reservation, that I had seen that telegram in "L'Electeur," but that that was the first time I had seen it. Well, yesterday I received a message that made me look through the replies I had sent to several telegrams which I had received just a week ago, and I found that I had sent a message to a private friend, a week ago, exactly in the terms of the message which appeared in "L'Electeur," but I never expected that message to be published in that newspaper, and I did not send it for that purpose, and did not give my consent in any way to its publication. I think it is due to my hon. friend from Three Rivers that I should make this explanation.

I can only say that the want of memory of the hon. gentleman surprised me more than I can express. On the first occasion he said positively that he knew nothing at all about this telegram. The question was not whether he had sent it to "L'Electeur" or confidentially to intimate friends, but he stated positively that he knew nothing whatever of the telegram, as read by myself and as published in "L'Electeur." Sir, it was somewhat surprising to me that a matter so important, not only to the city of Quebec, but to the whole Dominion, should have so little impressed the mind of the hon. gentleman that he had to refer back to the answers which he had sent broadcast over the Dominion in reply to telegrams sent him, no doubt, by private friends, to ascertain whether he had expressed any opinions in reference to the fast line, which is a matter of the greatest possible importance to the trade and commerce of this Dominion. Not only the province of Quebec, but the other provinces of the Dominion, feel that this is one of the most important questions with which the present Government has to deal, and it seems difficult to account for this singular want of memory on the part of the hon. gentleman representing particularly a constituency in the city of Quebec, which is more specially interested in this matter concerning which he sent this telegram. Now, I merely regret, for the sake of the hon. gentleman, and for the sake of Quebec, that the matter was of so little importance that he had to jog his memory by referring to the files of the telegrams which he had sent. I told the hon. gentleman on a former occasion that I would ask the question whether this telegram referred to a 17, an 18 or a 20-knot line. Of course, when the hon. gentleman asserted so positively that he knew nothing at all about the telegram I dropped my question, which I beg to renew; and I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether that telegram refers—

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Order.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I beg pardon?

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman has no right to put a question in that way. The hon. gentleman knows that he must give notice.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am following out the question which I put on that night and which I dropped because the hon. gentleman stated that he knew nothing at all about the telegram, and I have a perfect right now, Mr. Speaker, to ask whether the telegram referred—

The PRIME MINISTER. Order, order.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I leave it to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell).

Mr. SPEAKER. The point of order has been raised, and I understand the hon. member (Sir Adolphe Caron) is speaking to it. I may say, in the first place, that I was inclined to check the hon. gentleman on the ground that he was referring to a past debate. But there is an exception to the rule respecting a past debate, covering the case of a question asked or answer given across the floor. So far as that part of the hon. gentleman's remarks are concerned, I take it that they refer to a question or answer, though it was not one put in the regular way by notice; still the question was asked and answered. However, as to asking an hon. gentleman a question without notice at any time, while the hon. gentleman may ask a question, but no Minister or member of the House need answer it, no notice having been given.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. There can be no doubt of the correctness of your decision, Mr. Speaker. I understand it exactly in that way. The hon. gentleman has a perfect right to refuse to reply. Just as the hon. gentleman forgot about the telegram, so he may say that he does not wish to reply to my question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I put the question and the hon. gentleman may say whether he will reply to it or not.

Mr. DOBELL. Mr. Speaker, I have no difficulty in replying to the question put by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron). I am somewhat surprised, Sir, that he does not know how to appreciate the perfectly frank, open statement I made to him. I do not consider, Mr. Speaker, that I was under any obligation to make the explanation that I did, because I felt that, as a matter of accuracy, I was perfectly right in saying I had no knowledge of the telegram that was sent to "L'Electeur," because I sent no message to "L'Electeur" or any other newspaper. I would like to give the exact details of how that message was sent. I was writing a letter in my own room, when I received a telegram stating that dissatisfaction existed with my expression respecting the fast line. I did not write the reply myself, but said to my secretary: Write a telegram that the fast line will be all right and that the country will gain by the delay. I admit, Mr. Speaker, that in the multiplicity of telegrams that I had sent, I had forgotten that one. But the spirit of that telegram I am now prepared to defend, and as to the slip of memory, I think my explanation is quite a reasonable one, and that one might easily forget a hasty message sent off in that way. As to the telegram itself, I hold that whether the fast line is eighteen knots or twenty knots, it will be an immense contrast to the line of steamers which the late Government have been content with for the last eighteen years for they have been content with 12 and 13-knot steamers carrying cattle. I have over and over again said that it was not worthy of Canada to have such a line, but I consider that 18-knot steamers would be such an improvement that it might fairly be said that the country had gained greatly by the delay. I am very sorry, Sir, that the hon. gentleman has not been able to appreciate, as I said before, the explanation offered by a gentleman in a perfectly open and frank way without the least mental reservation.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I understand the hon. gentleman refuses to answer my question.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. gentleman has already spoken.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I do not think we can get away from the discussion of the present question without calling attention to the extraordinary dubiousness which characterise the hon. gentleman's

(Mr. Dobell's) remarks. In the first place, he said he was not under any obligation to make the explanation he did to the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron). That depends upon the hon. gentleman's own feeling in the matter. Evidently the answer he gave to the House on the interpellation of my hon. friend from Three Rivers conveyed to the House and the country the impression that he had written no such telegram as was referred to. He did not confine his answer to a denial of having sent such a telegram to "L'Electeur." If I remember aright, he said he had never sent the telegram at all, thus conveying to the House and the country the idea that he knew nothing about it, but that some mischievous fellow had simulated his position and had penetrated to his inner consciousness and had sent the telegram which appeared in "L'Electeur." The whole country got the idea that some one had forged the telegram or that "L'Electeur" had published a telegram which never was sent. Under these circumstances, the hon. gentleman, I submit, owed it to himself and to the House and to the country to lay at rest any such imputation, because, it appears that he did send the telegram to a friend and told him that he was to advise other friends, and so the matter became public. I think the hon. gentleman owed it as a duty to himself and to the House more than to my friend (Sir Adolphe Caron) to set himself right, which he did frankly and truly. But the doubtfulness now comes as to what he means about this fast service. He says in the telegram: Do not be afraid; all the doubts and clouds are clearing away. The delay I am advising is going to bring this matter out right, and Quebec will be perfectly satisfied. The hon. member from the other part of Quebec (Mr. Langelier) says that Quebec would not be satisfied; he says that any man who would go upon the hustings in Quebec to-day and defend anything less than a 20-knot service, would be hustled off the hustings.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is now distinctly referring to a previous debate, and I cannot allow that.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I will not refer any longer to a previous debate. My hon. friend who leads the Government has stated, and it is within the memory of this House, that a fast line is to be the policy of the Government. I know he received a rude shock when the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) got up immediately and warned him that if he brought down a vote for a fast line, or for any line that went any further in expenditure than the present steamship service between this country and Great Britain—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must not bring up anything that was said in a previous debate. I want to remind the hon.

Mr. FOSTER.

gentleman that he cannot get round this rule of the House by putting a hypothetical case. He must frankly leave that old debate alone.

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose I saw it in a newspaper.

Mr. SPEAKER. If it was in connection with a past debate in the House, it would still be obnoxious and open to the same objection.

Mr. FOSTER. If I read an editorial, how would that stand?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member must know that he cannot refer to a previous debate in the House this session for the reason that it would make our discussions interminable.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I will take up to-night's debate, and certain information I have from the debates that took place in this House last year and previous years, and I believe I am safe in saying that the leader of the Government is in favour of a fast line. Now, my hon. friend argued in this House on two several occasions, differently. My hon. friend, however, in his telegram which we are discussing to-night, says to his friends in Quebec: It is all right, you will get just what you desire by this delay I am advising—as if he was in favour of a 20-knot service. To-night he says that an 18-knot service would be preferable, and far better than anything we have ever had. I do not disagree with him in that, it would have been better. But my hon. friend, by his remarks, to-night, seemed to imply that he is still in favour of an 18-knot service. Now, will my hon. friend be perfectly frank, and tell this House whether he is in favour of an 18-knot service or a 20-knot service. He is a member of the Government. He need not answer that question unless he likes. But he knows what he is in favour of, and my hon. friend would relieve this House, and the country, and the people of the city of Quebec, very much if he would just be frank and open, and make a clean breast of it, and tell the House what he considers a fast line service to be. I see my hon. friend about to rise.

Mr. DOBELL. Mr. Speaker, we know too much—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has spoken before.

Mr. FOSTER. I bow to your right as the guardian—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Spoken, spoken, Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Did the hon. gentleman only give way to allow the member for Quebec to answer a question?

Mr. FOSTER. Only for that purpose. I did not think, Mr. Speaker, would so paternally interfere to protect my hon. friend from Quebec West as to warn him that he need not speak. I hope when his honour the Speaker sees some of us on this side going to the verge of indiscretion in being ready to make an answer—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member will take my statement, of course, that when he sat down I thought he had finished his speech, and I thought the hon. member for Quebec got up to make a reply. But if the hon. gentleman only sat down to give way to the member for Quebec, of course, I was not right in stopping the member for Quebec, if he chose to answer the question.

Mr. FOSTER. It was a question.

Mr. DOBELL. Well, I should much like the privilege once for all to state that I am in favour of such a fast line of steamship service as will do credit to the country, and be perfectly satisfactory to the whole Dominion.

Mr. FOSTER. I congratulate my hon. friend with all my heart. My hon. friend proposes to do something, or to be in favour of something, which all sensible men must agree with; he is in favour of such a fast line as will benefit the country, and will please every person in the Dominion. But I congratulate my hon. friend, also, that in the short time he has been under the tutelage of the leader of this Government, he has been able to catch the peculiar style of the First Minister in being able to give us an utterance in words without leaving the least definite idea on the House as to what he means. My hon. friend shows that he, like the other members of the Government, is fast becoming an adept in concealing his ideas, and in having no policy, and consequently not any longer blundering into an expression of policy. I noticed the anxiety of the leader of the Government when the hon. member rose to give his answer to that question; he did not think his pupil would be so apt. He was afraid that his pupil might be frank, and might give an honest statement to this House of his views as to what a fast line was. He will distrust him no longer. Not a tremor of nervousness will pass over the face of the leader of the Government hereafter when the member for Quebec West rises to answer a question; he will make it as delightfully indefinite as his leader ever did in this world, and that is pretty indefinite. But still, we have no light as to what the hon. gentleman's fast service is. It is going to be something better than we have had, something that will please everybody; but if any one in this House knows whether he is in favour of a 18 or a 20-knot service, from what he has stated to-night, he catches on much more quickly than I can.

SUPPLY—SIR RICHARD CARTWRIGHT AND THE RIGHT HON J. A.
CHAMBERLAIN.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to bring before the House a very important question connected with the subject we have just had up. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has just returned from a conference with the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, and the House would like to know whether the hon. gentleman discussed with Mr. Chamberlain that fast Atlantic service, or the Pacific Cable; whether it should be a 20-knot service across the Atlantic, and also what was agreed upon as to the Pacific Cable—in fact whatever Imperial issues may have been brought up in the historical conference between these two distinguished men. I think the House would be interested, and so would the public, if the hon. gentleman would take the House and the public into his confidence. I think the question I have put to the Minister of Trade and Commerce will not delay the House very long.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I had a long, pleasant, and extremely interesting conversation I must admit with the right honourable gentleman referred to, but I do not think it would be in consonance with my duty or with the public interest to give any further details at present.

Motion agreed to, and the House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Mail service ..... $2,336,000

Mr. GILLIES. I would like to draw the attention of the hon. the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) to a certain mail service in the Island of Cape Breton to which he referred in this House on the 11th of the present month. I venture to say that he made statements upon that occasion that he will now correct after he has had an opportunity of further reference to the papers that are on file in his department. The service to which I refer is the stage service between Port Hawkesbury on the Straits of Canso and the town of Sydney. It will be in the recollection of the House that the Postmaster General very abruptly stated on the occasion to which I refer, that the service as now being performed cost $9,000 a year, and that there were offers in the department to have it performed for $2,700, that the contract had been renewed from time to time without any tenders or notice of tenders being given, and that therefore there was something wrong in connection with it. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I will adduce such facts before this committee as will convince them clearly that every matter in connection with that contract was as straight as an unbroken line, and that every conclusion come to with regard to it was strictly accurate and guiltless of the least suspicion of wrong and in every way unimpeachable.

What are the facts in connection with this mail contract? The mail service between New Glasgow and Sydney began about 38 years ago, the contractors being Lindsay & Co., and the annual subsidy to it was about $11,000. I state the amount approximately because I have not the figures at my hand, nor could I get them from the department. When the railway was finished to the Straits of Canso in 1880, the department let the service to the then contractors for a sum pro rata of the whole amount. That is to say, the sum given for the distance between the Straits of Canso and Sydney, 100 miles, was based upon the sum given for the whole service from New Glasgow to Sydney. In 1880 the sum given for the service from the Straits of Canso to Sydney was $5,724, Lindsay & Co. being the contractors. Mr. Morrison the present contractor was then a member of the firm of Lindsay & Co., and in 1883, he bought out the other partners and carried on the mail service himself for the sum of $5,724. This went on for some years, and in 1886 a stage line was established by the central route so-called, namely, from the Straits of Canso via the Grand Narrows down to North Sydney, at a cost of $5,000. That made the mail service from Canso to the two Sydneys over $10,000 a year. Mr. Morrison, as the committee will understand, when taking over that contract for the conveying of the mails from Canso to Sydney based his tender upon the probable receipts that he would get from passenger traffic. He then had the whole of the traffic passenger travel from Hawkesbury to Sydney. But immediately on the establishment of the central stage mail route via the Grand Narrows, it took away a large portion of the passenger travel, diminished his receipts, and disturbed the basis upon which he made his calculation when taking the contract. He represented this matter to the department in 1890, long before I came to this House, when Mr. Morrison was a strong supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, and when the member representing that county in this House was a strong friend of hon. gentlemen opposite. Therefore, no politics can be asserted to have in the least influenced the Government at that time. He represented the state of affairs to the department. He showed that his contract was leading him to ruin, that he could not carry it on, inasmuch as the Government had established a rival stage line by the central route. He showed by facts and figures that he was unable to carry it on, and that no one was able to carry it on for a less sum than $9,000. The department then, as they had a legal right to do under the post office law, made a temporary arrangement with Mr. Morrison for carrying on the stage line at the sum of $9,000. This was early in the year 1890, and it went on until I came here. In the meantime, in 1891, the railway was opened through the island of Cape Breton on exactly the same line on which the central stage line was being conducted. That did away with the central stage line, and Mr. Morrison continued the stage line by way of St. Peter's to Sydney, with the same number of horses and the same equipment as before. When I came here I found this order of things, and I represented to the department that that stage line was just as necessary now as it was when it was first established. Any one looking at the map will see that the railway running as it does, along the north side of Bras d'Or Lake and across the Grand Narrows to Sydney, is no accommodation to the people on the southern side of the lake. It can no more serve them for the purpose of mail carriage than could the Canada Atlantic Railway that runs from Ottawa to Coteau Landing. Hon. Mr. Haggart was then in charge of the department, and he continued the temporary service for one year more. That carried it up to 1892. The department then decided to break up the stage line into small sections, upon a report being sent into the department, by the post office inspector recommending that the stage line be done away with, and that the whole service be reduced to merely a postal route. This aroused a storm of disapproval all along the line from Port Hawkesbury to Sydney. The stage line ran through my county for about 60 miles, and through the adjoining county to Sydney for some 40 miles; and from the people all along that hundred miles strong representations were sent to the department protesting against the breaking up of this stage line. Telegrams were sent in from the clergyman at East Bay, from the clergyman at Red Islands, from the councillor at East Bay, who is a strong supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, and from the warden of the municipality of Cape Breton, who is also a strong supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, as the Minister of Finance well knows. These gentlemen all protested against any interference with the existing order of things and with the breaking up of the stage line. In like manner, from my county strong representations were sent—from the clergyman at Red Islands, St. Peter's, L'Ardoise and River Bourgeois, the most populous places along the route. What was I to do? I simply pressed on the Administration the views and requests of the people who were pressing them upon me. I was thoroughly acquainted with the service which was being carried on. I knew it was as necessary then as it was when first established, and I requested the Government to continue their temporary arrangement for another year. They did so. They carried the service on in that manner until 1893. When 1893 came, the then Postmaster General—I am glad he is in the House now—told me the line would have to be put up to tender and contract. And here I draw the hon. Postmaster General's attention to that fact, because he very loudly stated the other day that there were no tenders called for; but if he had examined his papers, he would have seen that the contrary was the fact. Tenders were called for in the following manner:—

MAIL CONTRACT.

Sealed Tenders addressed to the Postmaster General will be received at Ottawa until noon on Friday, 26th of January, for the conveyance of Her Majesty's Mails six times per week each way between Port Hawkesbury and Sydney under a proposed contract for three years and eleven months from the 1st of February next. Printed notices containing further information as to conditions of proposed contract may be seen and blank forms of tender may be obtained at the post offices of Port Hawkesbury and St. Peter's and at this office.

CHAS. J. MACDONALD,
Post Office Inspector.

Post Office Inspector's Office,
Halifax, December 15th, 1893.

This notice was published in three papers in the island of Cape Breton, namely, the North Sydney "Herald," the Sydney "Advocate," and the Port Hawkesbury "Journal," and was posted in every post office from Port Hawkesbury to Sydney along the route for which tenders were called. In these ways the notice was published for six weeks before the 26th of January, the last day for the receiving of tenders. So that the committee will at once see that the regular legal notice was given. The following tenders came in and were filed in the office of the Postmaster General:—

Received at the Post Office Department at Ottawa up to 12 o'clock noon on Friday, the 26th January next, under an advertisement issued by the Post Office Inspector for the Nova Scotia Division, dated the 15th November, 1893, ultimo, for the conveyance of mail six times per week between Port Hawkesbury and Sydney, distance 100 miles, on and from the 1st February, 1894, next.

Present cost of service, $9,000. Name of present contractor, John Morrison.

There were two tenders—that of F. McInnis for $6,700, and that of J. Morrison for $9,000. These were the two tenders received in response to that notice. Hon. gentlemen, then, will admit that everything thus far at least was regular. The tender of Mr. Farquhar McInnis was the lowest. He is a most respectable and reliable man, a friend of mine personally and politically. I did not care who might have the service, so long as it was properly performed. Accompanying Mr. McInnis's tender was the following letter, which was also filed in the office of the Postmaster General:—

Port Hawkesbury, C.B., Jan. 22, 1894.

To the Postmaster General,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—I am this day mailing you a tender for the mail service from Port Hawkesbury to Sydney with P. A. McDonald, M.D., of Hawkesbury, and Duncan McConnell, of Long Point, as sureties. They are both good and responsible parties and should my tender be within the limit of consideration, I would refer you to Dr. Cameron, M.D., Mabou, Inverness County, or to the agency of the Merchant's Bank at Halifax at Port Hawkesbury.

In the event of my tender being accepted, please notify by wire as the time is so very short to get plant on the road in order to be to work on the 1st February. I have the most of the plant on hand and can complete the balance if necessary with short notice. Meantime,

I remain, yours respectfully,
FARQUHAR McINNIS.

It will be seen that Mr. McInnis stated that he had most of the plant on hand, ready to commence service if the tender was awarded. His sureties were perfectly good for the amount for which they were called upon to become surety, which was $14,000. These two gentlemen would be perfectly good for that amount or any other. The committee will remember that the notices were given to tender and that tenders were received, and that the letter I have just read accompanied Mr. McInnis's tender. Mr. McInnis subsequently wrote the following letter:—

Port Hawkesbury, Feb. 8th, 1894.

Sir,—In conformity with advertisement calling for tenders to carry Her Majesty's mails between Port Hawkesbury and Sydney, I tendered on the 26th ultimo. I have since considered the matter fully, and in view of the difficulties in the way of stocking the line at this season of the year and other uncertainties, I have decided to withdraw my offer and hereby notify you that I will not accept the contract in the event of my tender being the lowest.

Yours respectfully,
FARQUHAR McINNIS.

After this withdrawal, there was only one tender left, the tender of Mr. John Morrison. I find another letter in the department signed by Dr. P. A. McDonald, one of the sureties of Mr. McInnis. This letter is as follows:—

Port Hawkesbury, 9th Feb., 1894.

To the Hon. P. M. General,
Ottawa.

In re Mr. Farquhar McInnis's tender.

He now considers that he cannot perform the contract for the amount, and therefore desires to withdraw his tender. The weather is stormy and the roads partially blockaded and consequently it would undoubtedly cost several hundred dollars more to start a contract now than it would at any other season of the year.

In view of these facts I hope you will allow him to withdraw his tender before awarding the contract.

Your obedient servant,
P. A. McDONALD.

What was the department to do? Two tenders were regularly received, and one of the tenderers withdrew his offer, so that there was only one left, Mr. Morrison, and he received the contract. If there is anything straighter in the department, I would like to know it. Were there any other offers made, irrespective of tenders? If so, they would be irregular, but however irregular, were there any? I shall read the only one that was made, and that was made long after the tenders were awarded and when the service was being performed by Mr. John Morrison, and that offer was made in this irregular fashion by Messrs. John McLeod & Sons, of Cleveland. Here is the offer they made, and hon. gentlemen will see at once that it was in every way irregular. It was dated Cape Breton, 12th April, 1894, months after the tenders were called for, months after the date specified for their receipt, and when the contract had been given and Mr. Morrison was doing the work under that contract:

Cleveland, C.B., 12th April, 1894.

To the Hon. Sir A. P. Caron,
Postmaster General.

Sir,—We understand that you have not awarded the mail contract from Port Hawkesbury and Sydney to John Morrison; if not had the mails to come off the train at McIntyre's Lake station instead of Point Tupper—there is practically no need for the eastern mails to go to Port Hawkesbury—and he will accept the contract for $7,800, and if the contract would not be entered into at once or till navigation is open, would do it cheaper. We will furnish satisfactory security.

Yours truly,

JOHN MCLEOD & SONS.

Hon. gentlemen will see there is not very much difference between this irregular offer and the regularly allotted contract. John McLeod & Sons offered to do the service for $7,800 from Hawkesbury Station to Sydney. To McIntyre Station the mails are carried by rail. The Postmaster General, seeing that they were carried that distance by rail, caused Morrison to begin at McIntyre Station and change from Port Hawkesbury to McIntyre Station, shortening his contract some six or seven miles, and deducting from the $9,000 a proportionate rate. That cut down his receipts to $8,400. McLeod & Sons offered to do the contract in this irregular way for $7,800, making a difference of only $600. That is the only offer that the Postmaster General has in his hands to-day, although I am willing to do him the justice of admitting that when he made the statement the other day that he had offers to do the work for $2,700, he was making that statement under a misapprehension of the facts. Let me now direct the committee's attention to what the Post Office Inspector for that division suggested in breaking up the line. The committee will remember that this service is being performed from Hawkesbury to Sydney by a stage line, the conditions of which are that the distance carried per hour should not be less than six miles, that there should not be less than two horses. This entailed the employment of 24 horses or six relays to every stage in the whole system. The Post Office Inspector after the mail service was opened by the railway on the north side of the island and by the Grand Narrows—which railway is no accommodation whatever to the southern side so far as the mail traffic goes—wrote the following to the Postmaster General:—

Mr. GILLIES.

Post Office Inspector's Office.

Halifax, N.S., 13th May, 1892.

Sir,—With reference to the letter from the mail contract branch No. 960 B, of the 10th instant, in which it is stated that the arrangement with Mr. John Morrison for the mail service between Port Hawkesbury and Sydney will come to an end when the arrangements for the Cape Breton Railway service are completed, I shall be glad to have your instructions as to what arrangements are to be made for the services of the offices on this route.

In my report No. 665 of the 24th December, 1890, I recommend the following new services:—
Port Hawkesbury and St. Peter's, daily..$2,082 24
Big Pond and St. Peter's, tri-weekly.... 540 00
Sydney and Sydney Forks, tri-weekly... 90 00

$2,712 24

Now, the hon. gentleman will at once see a great difference between the service suggested by Mr. Macdonald here, and the service as it is now carried on. As I said, it was then, and is now, a stage service between Port Hawkesbury and Sydney. Mr. Macdonald suggested a reduced postal service, in the shape of a daily service between Port Hawkesbury and St. Peter's, and a tri-weekly service from St. Peter's to Big Pond, a distance of 40 miles, and no service at all from Big Pond to East Bay, a distance of some 20 miles. Yet the hon. Postmaster General was under the impression—and honestly under the impression, because he does not know the geography of the country, and the purport of these papers had not been studied by him as closely as he otherwise would have done, if he had given close attention to the question before speaking—that the whole service being performed by Mr. Morrison, was the very service suggested by Mr. Macdonald, the inspector. But, from what I have read, he will see the difference between the two. One is a daily stage service between McIntyre Station and Sydney, while what Mr. Macdonald suggested, as I have said, included a tri-weekly service from St. Peter's to Big Pond, a distance of 40 miles, and leaving a complete blank from Big Pond to Sydney Forks, a distance of 20 miles. It is impossible to compare the service suggested by the inspector with that performed by Morrison. Perhaps I have dwelt upon this a little longer than the committee will think I was justified in doing; nevertheless, I must bring to the attention of the Postmaster General and of this committee the great injustice that would be inflicted upon the people who live in that portion of the country, if the hon. gentleman were to do with this stage line as he proposes. If the hon. Postmaster General will look at the map of Cape Breton, he will agree with me that the railway on the northern side is no accommodation to the people from St. Peter's to East Bay, because the Great Bras d'Or Lake lies between them and the railway. When the winter comes in and navigation is closed, there is no way to get out, except by this stage line or by private conveyance. There is nothing to prevent the Postmaster General sending mails in any way he likes; still, in doing away with this stage line, he would be taking a retrograde step, for this is a convenience the people have had since 1862, when the daily mail was established. I do hope and trust the hon. Postmaster General will pause before he cancels this contract. There is one other suggestion I wish to bring to the hon. gentleman's notice, and, as the request is a reasonable one, I think he will agree with it. Mr. Morrison's contract will expire on the 31st December, 1897, fifteen months from now. Will the Postmaster General cancel it at this season of the year and throw this man's stock of horses and equipment for a heavy stage line on his hands, and ruin him? Why not let the contract run until its expiration, and, in the meantime, the Postmaster General can ascertain what are the best steps to be taken in the interests of the mail service and of the convenience of the people living upon that route, and who are, as I say, shut out from communication with the railway when navigation closes. Mr. Morrison got this contract fairly and properly, in response to a call for tenders sent out by the Postmaster General's own department, and published in every paper in Cape Breton, and posted in every post office from Hawkesbury to Sydney; and, when his tender of $9,000 was accepted, he filed securities to the amount of $12,000, as required. He is the only contractor, and has been doing the service remarkably well, and the service is honestly demanded by the people in that section. For these reasons, I hope the Postmaster General will allow the contract to run until its termination. I would remind the hon. Postmaster General that this road runs 60 miles through my county and about 40 miles through the county of Cape Breton. The facts are quite familiar to my hon. friend in the adjoining county (Mr. McDougall), whose constituents are equally interested with mine, and the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), the two gentlemen representing that county. In justice to the contractor, who has done his work efficiently, in carrying out a contract into which he entered in good faith, and to the people thereby accommodated, I trust the hon. Postmaster General will reconsider the statement he made, and will allow this contract to run to its termination, which will be only fifteen months from now.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I will not wade through this vast return unless my statements are challenged; but I simply say that the contract now in force is one so manifestly improvident that I could not, in the proper discharge of my duties, allow it to continue in force; and it is my intention to recommend its cancellation, and that new tenders be called for, on due notice in the proper way, and upon the advice of the proper officers of the department. The return upon the Table discloses this state of facts; This service in Cape Breton district has been held by the same contractor, or his son, for many years. At first, the service was performed for the sum of five thousand odd dollars; and by some peculiar circumstances it was renewed in favour of the contractor for nine thousand dollars.

Mr. FOSTER. When?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The renewal took place, I think, in 1890.

Mr. GILLIES. The contract was first taken by this man Morrison in 1883, from Hawkesbury to Sydney, for $5,724, as the records of the department will show. It was increased in 1890 to $9,000, for the reasons I have given.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Then this went on. It was a temporary arrangement continued.

Mr. GILLIES. To 1892, then to 1893, and then tenders were called for.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not think a contract involving this large expenditure should have been renewed from time to time except after open public competition. I do not find that from the time it was entered into until this moment, there has ever been a fair opportunity given to the public to tender. Now, I quote from the papers laid before the House, the total receipts from the post offices served by this line—I think I have the report in these papers—amounts to $242 a year. Am I right on that point?

Mr. GILLIES. You are wrong.

Mr. McDUGALL. There is more than one office on the route that furnishes more money than that.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Very well, I won't quarrel with the figures. Perhaps some one will turn them up.

Mr. McDUGALL. The hon. gentleman should not mislead the committee, even if he has to wade through the papers, because that statement is very misleading.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am quite prepared to lock horns with the hon. gentleman on any branch, if it is necessary to do so. I did not propose to do more than deal with the improvident character of the existing contract, but I am quite prepared, on the statement contained in these papers, to discuss everything with the hon. gentlemen.

Mr. McDUGALL. I will make it easier for him. For instance, what is the revenue of the office at St. Peter's, or Sydney, or Red Island, or Arichat?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Here is a telegram I find on page 21 of the return. It appears, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. gentleman who preceded me, has taken a great interest, according to these documents, in the renewal of this contract. He stated in his remarks that he was wholly indifferent as to who the contractor was, provided the service was properly performed. I do not find any such indifference on his part in his communications to the department; but I find running through these documents a great anxiety manifested by the hon. gentleman, in telegrams and letters sent by him to the department, and to the late Postmaster General, and to the superintendent, urging them to renew the contract with Mr. Morrison, not to invite public tenders, but desiring them to interfere in every possible way with fair and open competition.

Mr. GILLIES. Were these telegrams and letters sent in before this contract was called for ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It is suggested that I made a misleading statement; if I did so, I did it on this telegram, and it is my only authority. This is a telegram from Sir Adolphe Caron to J. A. Gillies, Cape Breton, dated October 2nd, 1892 :

Regret exceedingly cannot comply with your request to continue Morrison's contract. Cost would be $6,000. Receipts from all offices interested, $242.

Mr. GILLIES. That is a mistake.

Mr. McDUGALL. That is a mistake.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That is the return placed in my hands by the department.

Mr. GILLIES. The hon. gentleman can convince himself that it is a mistake from taking up the report.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I know nothing about it, but I will take the hon. gentleman's supposition. We will assume there is ample demand for the service, for the purpose of argument. I am now dealing with the contract I find in force, and I say that when this contract was in existence in 1890, and expired, the proper course to take was to give the public a fair opportunity to tender for it; and I say with the exception of the pretended tender that they invited in 1894—

Mr. GILLIES. 1893.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The advertisement was issued in December, 1893, and called for tenders returnable on or before the 26th January, 1894. With that single exception, I do not find there was an offer to the general public to tender, nor was it ever put up for tender between the time it expired in 1890, and the time when it was renewed in 1894.

Mr. GILLIES.

Mr. GILLIES. It did not expire in 1894.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It was renewed from year to year. The hon. gentleman knows full well that it was renewed from year to year, at his urgent request.

Mr. GILLIES. You do not understand it.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I see I shall have to take up the time of committee. I supposed that my predecessor was well informed when he wrote that telegram. This contract was never submitted to tender except at the time I mention, in December, 1893. An attempt was made in 1892, and the following correspondence is on record. This is signed J. A. Gillies :

Sydney, C.B., Oct. 18th, 1892.

To Sir Adolphe Caron,
Postmaster General.

Please continue John Morrison's contract for carrying mails from Hawkesbury to Sydney for another year upon its present basis. This is essentially important to me. Writing your answer.

Was it his interest or was it the public interest that had to be considered? I do not find any indifference as to who should be the contractor in this case. Then the hon. gentleman telegraphs or writes again :

18th October, 1892.

To Col. Wm. White,
D. P. M. G.

Please urge Postmaster General to continue Morrison's contract upon the present basis for another year for carriage of mails from Hawkesbury to Sydney. Do this for me. It is absolutely necessary.

(Sgd.) J. A. GILLIES.

And the next day he follows it up with a communication to Sir John Thompson in the same words :

Will you kindly see Sir Adolphe Caron immediately, and get him to allow Morrison's contract for carrying mails from Hawkesbury to Sydney to remain upon its present basis for another year. This is absolutely important and I wish you to carry it out for me. Answer.

(Sgd.) J. A. GILLIES.

Then he writes another communication at great length—I will not read it all unless hon. gentlemen desire to hear it. It is dated 19th October, 1892, and is addressed to Sir Adolphe Caron. After urging a renewal of this contract, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gillies) says that he understands it will soon expire—I presume that point might be admitted—and he urges that it should be renewed in favour of Morrison. He says :

Have faithfully stood by the Government in the last two contests.

Mr. GILLIES. I never wrote that letter.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It is a letter from the Rev. Father McInnis, parish priest.

Mr. GILLIES. Then it is not my letter.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. You alluded to it, if you did not endorse it.

Mr. GILLIES. The hon. gentleman must not say that; because there is no allusion to it in my letter. I never saw it, and I never heard of it until I saw it in that file. It should be beneath the dignity of a Minister of the Crown to make a statement of that kind.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The letter continues:

Have faithfully stood by the Government in the last two contests, and therefore entertain the hope that you will see your way clear to renew Mr. Morrison's contract for at least another year upon its present basis.

Mr. Gillies, M.P., feels very strongly on this point, and I trust he will succeed in his effort to get a renewal of Mr. Morrison's contract, and thus confer a great favour upon the largest number of his constituents.

I have the honour to be, sir
Your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) R. McINNIS, P.P.

Then Mr. Gillies on the 19th October, the very day that was written—

Mr. FOSTER. The Postmaster General said at first that that letter was from Mr. Gillies, M.P., and now it appears that it was not.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I corrected that. My attention was called to it by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser).

Mr. FOSTER. But there were cheers when that was read.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. You will not have much chance to cheer when I get through. On the very same day that letter was written, and it is a coincidence at least, Mr. Gillies wrote urging the renewal of this contract. I do not see him urging, that in the public interest it ought to be put up for tender, but I find him using his influence the other way, and he says:

If this line be disturbed this year, it will ruin me in Richmond County, politically.

On the 21st he telegraphed to the Postmaster General:

Sydney, C.B., Oct. 21st, 1892.

To Sir Adolphe Caron,
Postmaster General.

Will Morrison's contract be continued for another year as requested. If not matters will be worse than serious. Please wire answer immediately.

(Sgd.) J. A. GILLIES.

Then he telegraphed to the Deputy Minister the same day:

Sydney, C.B., Oct. 21st, 1892.

To Col. Wm. White.

Please urge my request immediately continuance Morrison's contract another year. Extremely and essentially important that this be done. Please answer.

(Sgd.) J. A. GILLIES.

Well, Sir Adolphe Caron replies at last. He has been standing fire during these days, and on the 22nd October, 1892, he says as follows:—

Ottawa, 22nd Oct., 1892.

J. A. Gillies, M.P.,
Sydney, C.B.

Regret exceedingly that I cannot comply with your request to continue Morrison's contract. Costs would be $6,000—

It grew to be $9,000 afterwards.

—Receipts from all offices interested, $242. It would be impossible for me to justify such an expenditure.

(Sgd.) A. P. CARON.

He went 50 per cent better in a short time. After the Minister declared that it would be impossible for him to justify such an expenditure, on the 9th November, a couple of weeks later, he telegraphed Gillies and McEachren, Sydney, C.B., as follows:—

Ottawa, Nov. 9, 1892.

Messrs. Gillies & McEachren,
Sydney, C.B.

Present arrangement to continue until 31st December. New arrangement to be for one year from date if Morrison accepts terms offered.

(Sgd.) W. WHITE.

Mr. GILLIES. Hear, hear.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Yes, and the terms offered, what were they? Mr. Gillies writes to Sir Adolphe Caron on the 31st, as follows:—

Sydney, Dec. 31, 1892.

The Honourable Sir A. P. Caron,
Ottawa.

My dear Sir Adolphe,—

I am in receipt of your letter of the 14th inst., in which you state that the present arrangement for the conveyance of the mails from Port Hawkesbury to Sydney will be continued for one year from the first of January next. I write to acknowledge your letter and to thank you for the just and liberal spirit with which your department met the case.

With compliments of the season,

I am, yours very truly,

(Sgd.) J. A. GILLIES.

And so it went on for a year.

Mr. WALLACE. What were the terms offered?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think the terms offered were $9,000.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No, no.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. $6,000. On the 29th November, 1893, when the year's contract was about to run out again, another attempt is made to renew it by Mr. Gillies, but the Government decided to offer it for tender, and Mr. Gillies having learned from the Government that they intended to offer it for tender writes on the 29th November, to Sir Adolphe Caron in regard to the matter, and he requests in these words:

The forms of tender, please send to the postmaster at Sydney and if there be no infringement of the regulations you will not send any to St. Peter's.

Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gillies) explain to the House and to the country, how he came to ask not to publish the tenders in St. Peter's, an important point on the line of service?

Mr. GILLIES. Read the reply of the Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron).

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Yes, I will read his reply. He rebuked you for it. Mr. Gillies goes on to write:

You are already fully aware of my desire that Mr. Morrison be continued as contractor, both from the excellence of the equipment and long established line, and also of his own personal worth.

I feel very grateful to you personally and to the other members of your Government for the kind, business-like and liberal manner in which they met me while at Ottawa this month.

I am, dear Sir Adolphe,
Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) J. A. GILLIES.

Mr. GILLIES. Read the Postmaster General's reply.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will read it all.

Ottawa, Dec. 5th, 1893.

J. A. Gillies, Esq., M.P.,
Sydney, C.B.

My dear Gillies,—I am in receipt of your letter of the 29th ult., recommending that mail service between Port Hawkesbury and Sydney be advertised for one year from the 1st January next.

In reply, I beg to state that there is not time to advertise this service between now and the beginning of the year, as the law requires that the notices be exhibited for at least six weeks before the tenders are opened. It is usual to advertise services for four years, not one year as you suggest. As to your request that no notice may be sent to St. Peter's, this cannot be entertained as in the words of the statute, the advertisement shall be by public notice put up in the principal post offices concerned in such contract.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) A. P. CARON.

It would appear from the letter of the 14th December that there had been an offer made because the Minister writes as follows to Mr. Gillies, and he refers to a letter of the 9th of December from Mr. Gillies, which I do not see on the file:—

J. A. Gillies, Esq., M.P.,
Sydney, C.B.

Ottawa, 14th Dec., 1893.

Dear Mr. Gillies.—I am in receipt of your letter of the 9th inst., respecting the mail service between Port Hawkesbury and Sydney in which you state that Mr. Morrison cannot accept less than $9,000 per annum for this service. In reply I beg to say that an arrangement for one year from 1st January next will be made with Mr. Morrison, but on expiration of that term the service will have to be discontinued.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) A. P. CARON.

Mr. MULOCK.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) allow me to ask him a question?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Certainly.

Mr. WALLACE. As I understand it, and I would like to know if my understanding is correct, before tenders were asked for, the contract was for about $6,000; but after tenders were asked for it increased to $9,000. Is that a correct statement of the case?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) says it was $9,000 before.

Mr. WALLACE. But I am asking the Postmaster General who has got the documents in his hands.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The information is equally valuable, I suppose.

Mr. WALLACE. We are asking the Postmaster General for his statement.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. And I am answering. On the 6th day—

Mr. FOSTER. Will the Postmaster General tell the House whether the amount was $6,000 or $9,000? Surely it is not an answer for him to ask an hon. gentleman on the back benches, what it is, and to give his statement.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) is concerned in this case.

Mr. FOSTER. How is he concerned?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. He is concerned as a member of this House who has attempted to prevent the continuance of this improper arrangement.

Mr. FOSTER. Every member may be concerned in it, but we are dealing with the official, that is, the Postmaster General; and, when the House asks him to lay before it what was got in a certain year, it is no answer to tell the House that which some one else tells him. He ought to know his case. He knew his case sufficiently well the other day.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I know it sufficiently now, and, if my hon. friend will be patient, he will get the information. I have the floor, and I propose to proceed. On the 6th day of January, 1896, Sir Adolphe Caron replies to Mr. Gillies, as follows:—

My Dear Mr. Gillies,—

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman say—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I propose to answer the hon. gentleman's question, and I would ask the Chairman to keep order. I propose to answer it by giving the official answer, not giving my own words. I am going to read a letter from my predecessor, the late Postmaster General, which, perhaps, may be accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite, at least.

Mr. FOSTER. The information seems to be second-hand.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It may not be a reliable source, but I am going to give it.

Mr. FOSTER. Any man who is for the time being a Minister—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER—must give the information, when he is asked.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. FOSTER. I have sat in this House for years, and I have never yet heard a Minister refuse to answer a question, and hon. gentlemen will not make much progress by refusing to answer civil questions.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is no mogul. He comes down to this House and refuses to give it information.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is there to answer questions—the servant of the people.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. This document, if the hon. gentleman will please preserve himself in patience for a moment, will give him all the information he desires:

Ottawa, 6th January, 1896.

My Dear Mr. Gillies,—In accordance with the request which you make in your letter of the 3rd inst I beg to give you the following information regarding the Port Hawkesbury and North Sydney mail service.

1st. A daily mail service was established between Port Hawkesbury and Sydney on 1st February, 1850, with Mr. T. S. Lindsay as contractor, the rate of pay being $5,724.89.

2. The service was performed by Mr. John Morrison between the 1st April, 1885, and the 1st March, 1894.

3. The rates were $5,724.89, and $9,000 per annum.

4. The rate was increased to $9,000 on 1st February, 1890.

5. Tenders were last invited by notices dated the 13th December, 1893, and were due to be opened on the 26th January, 1894.

6. The notices were posted up at Port Hawkesbury, St. Peter's and Sydney.

7. The tenders were Farquhar McInnis, $6,970, and John Morrison, $9,000 per annum. Mr. McInnis was released from his offer on his pleading that there was not time between the notification to him of the acceptance of his offer and the date on which the contract was to commence.

Yours faithfully,

ADOLPHE CARON.

Now, the hon. gentleman sees when the increase took place, and, if he had been patient with me, he would have got that information without that manifestation of feeling, which, I am sure, he regrets.

Mr. FOSTER. I actually do not understand it yet.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Well, I cannot supply the hon. gentleman with understanding.

Mr. FOSTER. I would not ask you for any, because you have little enough of your own.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Well, Mr. McInnes tendered, and his tender was subsequently withdrawn. The amount of his tender was $6,970. He was certified to by Dr. Cameron, the late member for Inverness. The tenders were invited in December, 1893, to be opened on the 26th day of January, 1894, the contractor to be prepared to enter upon his work on the 1st day of February, five days thereafter. Whether it is a sound argument or not, it is complained of, and the records in my hands show that this was an unreasonable condition—to advertise in the dead of winter for a contract, and the tenderers not to have more than five days' notice whether or not their tenders were accepted, and, if so, to provide all their necessary equipment. I am surprised to find that the hon. member for Richmond, after these tenders had been received, endeavoured to ascertain particulars in regard to them, and I am equally surprised that, before a contract was entered into, any such information was given to him. Nevertheless, such appears to have been the case. On the 2nd of February, 1894, the following telegram was sent to the Deputy Postmaster General:—

Hawkesbury, Feb. 2nd, 1894.—Have been expecting letter from Postmaster General, but none arrived yet. Please wire me names and amounts tenders Hawkesbury and Sydney route.

J. A. GILLIES.

To that the Postmaster General replies as follows:—

Ottawa, 2nd February, 1894.

My dear Mr. Gillies,—

Referring to your telegram of to-day asking to be informed as to names and amount of the tenders for the Port Hawkesbury and Sydney mail service, I regret exceedingly it will be impossible for me to accede to your request in this matter as the regulations of the department impose on me the obligation of keeping inviolately secret all information regarding tenders until the contract is awarded.

I think, however, that I may stretch a point and tell you confidentially that the lowest tenderer is for $6,970, and that the person making it is strongly recommended by Dr. Cameron, M.P., and other prominent gentlemen in the locality.

That letter was written before the contract was entered into. Well, that information went down to Port Hawkesbury, and it was followed by the communication dated 8th

February, 1894, from Mr. Farquhar McInnis withdrawing his tender. He said :

I tendered on the 26th ultimo. I have since considered the matter fully and in view of the difficulties in the way of starting the line at this season and other uncertainties, I have decided to withdraw my offer, and hereby notify you that I will not accept the contract in the event of my tender being the lowest.

And the Inspector, on the 9th of February, wrote to the Postmaster General in regard to this tender in which, after alluding to this withdrawal, he said :

The weather is stormy and the roads partially blockaded.

Mr. GILLIES. That is McInnis's surety.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It is from P. A. McDonald. He continues :

Consequently it would be almost impossible to distribute fodder along the route, and it would undoubtedly cost several hundred dollars more to start the contract now than at any other season of the year. In view of these facts, I hope you will allow him to withdraw his tender before awarding the contract.

P. A. McDONALD.

The contract went to the old tenderer Mr. Morrison. But I find that, a former member of this House, Mr. Paint, on the 29th May, 1895, addressed a communication to the department with regard to this outstanding contract and he forwarded a protest, in which he set forth :

By this public instrument of protest, be it known to all whom it may concern that on the 29th May, 1895, before me, Richard John Wicksteed, notary public in and for the province of Ontario, duly commissioned and practising in the city of Ottawa, of the said province, personally came and appeared Henry M. Paint, of Point Tupper, gentleman, who, being duly sworn, declared that in 1889 and 1890 one John Morrison, of St. Peter's, Cape Breton, was paid $5,724.88 by the Postmaster General of Canada for the conveyance of the mails between Port Hawkesbury and Sydney. By the terms of the contract he was required to furnish accommodation for passengers to be drawn in a stage, to be drawn by not less than two horses. In 1890 and 1891 Mr. Morrison got $6,270.73, whereas Henry Archibald, of Port Hastings, Cape Breton, was then and since carrying nearly all the mails for him by railway. In 1891, 1892, 1893 and 1894, Mr. Morrison got an increased sum of $9,000, with extras, as perquisites. In the beginning of the year 1894, John Morrison, the father, transferred his contract to his son, the father being then candidate for the local legislature. In January, 1894, a very short advertisement appeared in three journals of Cape Breton inviting tenders for the service above mentioned. These tenders to be received in Ottawa, and to be opened on the 26th day of January, 1894, and service to commence on the 1st day of February, 1894. By thus allowing only five days in midwinter to commence a service of greater cost to the country, than any other of its kind, it was attempted to avoid competition. But competition did occur and was bought off. When the valuable and heavy mails for the mining population and interests of Sydney, Cape Breton, were carried by Morrison's coach for twenty years, he received about $5,000. Now, when the railway carries the great bulk of the matter he receives in the vicinity of $10,000. Only a few local mail bags having to be delivered by him. It may be said that the railway destroys his passenger business. In reply, I assert that long before the railway was completed, it has disgusted and turned aside the travelling public from its coaches, by doubling the fare or largely increasing it in the winter season when the steamboats were laid up. In consequence, passengers preferred to hire a private conveyance and local teams. Morrison, for some twelve years did all in his power to destroy the Conservative Government at Ottawa. I would myself be willing to, and do hereby tender for the practical delivery of the mails and the perfect performance of the service and between Hawkesbury or McIntyre's Lake Station, the service to begin on the 1st of July, 1895, the route to be divided into five sections or a less number as agreeable to the Government and its inspector, for the yearly sum of $4,950.

On the 29th May, 1895, Mr. Paint wrote to the Postmaster General as follows :—

I have the honour to inclose herewith a protest which I have formulated against the mail contractor at St. Peter's, Cape Breton, re John Morrison & Son, contractors. I ask, sir, that the investigation that you shall order may be exhaustive, close and searching, as I may now be compelled to defend myself publicly.

A rigid inquiry, such as you in your wisdom will insist upon, should be sufficient to prevent any further attention being given to it before the House of Commons committee.

Your most obedient servant.

HENRY M. PAINT.

Then on the 30th May, 1895, the then Premier, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, wrote to the Minister as follows :—

My dear Sir Adolphe,—

I had an interview the other day with a friend who complained of the manner in which the mail service was performed between Hawkesbury and Sydney, although there is an exorbitant price paid to the contractor. I then informed him that if he would put his allegations in writing, I would have them investigated. This morning I received a letter and affidavit by which Mr. Paint makes certain charges and offered to perform the service for $4,950, which he says cost $10,000. Will you have this matter looked into.

Sincerely yours,

MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Then follows the acknowledgment and other formal papers, but I am not aware that the request of the hon. gentleman has ever been complied with or that the charge that the lowest tender was bought off has never been looked into. I have myself received a letter from Mr. Paint in the following words :—

(Private.)

Point Tupper Railway Station,
Cape Breton, 6th August, 1896.

Hon. Wm. Mulock, M.P.,
Postmaster General, Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—Although not a Liberal, will you permit me to give you my views on the mail contract now held by John Morrison operated from McIntyre's Lake railway station to Sydney, ninety-four miles, for $9,000 per annum. You may remember that Fraser, M.P. for Guysborough, N.S., read my protest and tender in the House of Commons two years ago to perform the service for $4,950. I still offer to take it for that money; but I would require to divide it into four stages. If you do this and put it up to tender, the service can and will and shall be performed daily for $2,600 and less. The law compels Morrison to drive a pair; he only drives one horse, which is quite sufficient, as the railway takes the mails now that are of any importance. The local mails must still be carried. One horse is ample and will be satisfactory. No matter what reports come to you from any source whatever, even from your deputy. My plan is the only one if you want efficiency and Government funds saved. I am on the spot and know best. The public have not had a fair chance to tender for this special service for thirty years. I will give you a sketch which will help you in forming your opinion.

Then he gives me his sketch. Sir, I find the report of Mr. C. J. Macdonald, Post Office Inspector, on file in the following words:—

Post Office Inspector's Office,
Halifax, N.S., 13th May, 1892.

Sir,—With reference to the letter from the mail contract, branch No. 960 B, of the 10th instant, in which it is stated that the arrangement with Mr John Morrison for the mail service between Port Hawkesbury and Sydney will come to an end when the arrangements for the Cape Breton Railway service are completed, I shall be glad to have your instructions as to what arrangements are to be made for the services of the offices on this route.

In my report No. 665, of the 24th December, 1890, I recommend the following new services:

Port Hawkesbury and St. Peter's, daily.	$2,082 24
Big Pond and St. Peter's, tri-weekly....	540 00
Sydney and Sydney Forks, tri-weekly..	90 00
	$2,712 24

Mr. McDOUGALL. That does not take in the whole line.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL—

Am I to understand that the present arrangement with Morrison is to be terminated on the 31st instant?

The hon. gentleman says that does not take in the whole line. I understand the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) says it leaves out a piece of twenty miles, and as to two other important sections it proposes to give a tri-weekly mail instead of a daily mail. Suppose that, for the sake of argument, we ascertain what will be the cost, according to the Inspector's own statement and assuming the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Gillie's) statement to be correct. For the service from Port Hawkesbury to St. Peter's daily, the cost will be $2,082.24. From Big Pond to St. Peter's, tri-weekly, will cost $540. If the Inspector is right, a daily service could be got for twice that, or $1,080. Then from Sydney to Sydney Forks $90, or daily for twice that, $180. Then the hon.

gentleman says there is a line of twenty miles left out. From my observation, I should think a service of that kind could be performed for $600 a year. So that gives us a total of $3,942. In the face of these statements and these records, and believing, as I do, that the contract of January of 1894 did not represent the result of a fair competition under fair circumstances, I think I am only discharging my duty by terminating that contract and inviting new tenders upon the advice of the Inspector, on the ground, the official inspector at Halifax, who is familiar with the geography of the country, or if not, will make himself familiar with it. After that we will settle whether the public are paying too much or too little. I shall not exercise my own judgment as to selecting the time of calling for tenders; I will be guided by those who know best. If the Inspector is of opinion that the present is not an opportune time, I will be governed by the practical advice of that officer, who, I am told, is a very reliable officer. On his advice a time will be selected. But I could not, with this record before me, allow that contract to run out its time. I am perfectly satisfied, and I am sure every hon. gentleman in his House is satisfied, that the service is costing the country too much money. Mr. Paint says that he will do the work for $3,600, and when you consider these figures as given by the Inspector—

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Paint's figure is $4,950 is it not?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. On the 6th August he sent me this letter, in which he says he will do the work for $3,600 or less.

Mr. GILLIES. Do you consider that an offer?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It is a statement from a responsible man to which I am obliged to give some weight. I do not call it an offer, because I do not know whether he is in a position to put up the security and so on.

Mr. GILLIES. Mr. Paint does not say that he will give such a service as Mr. Morrison is performing for the money he has mentioned.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Let us see what he does say:

You remember that Fraser, M.P. for Guysborough, N.S., read my protest and tender in the House of Commons two years ago to perform the service for $4,950. I still offer to take it for that money; but would require to divide it into four stages. If you do this and put it up to tender the service can and will and shall be performed daily for $3,600 and less.

I do not know how much less, but he says "less." So, if the result of putting it up for tender is to ascertain the fair value of the service, I am sure my hon. friend (Mr.

Gillies), on thinking it over, will agree with me that it is a proper course to pursue, instead of allowing this improvident contract to continue. I am pressed on all sides for an increase of mail facilities, and I think it is the wiser course to save leakage and waste, and, with the money so saved to serve districts that require it. We must extend the mail service, but it is not incumbent upon the Government to allow improvident contracts to continue. The matter has been brought up in this House more than once, and we have the sworn evidence of Mr. Paint that the lower tender was bought off, and that there was a proper case calling for investigation long ago, and the moment it came to my knowledge I decided upon a course.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The Postmaster General made some statements to the House which require investigation by a person more familiar with the locality through which this service is performed, than the Postmaster General appears to be. He told us that the revenue from the office, according to the report he held in his hand—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The letter from my predecessor.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The Postmaster General made use of that, and took it out of his department and gave it to this House as authentic information. I want to show to the House the inaccuracy of the statement, and the extent to which the hon. gentleman was misleading the House and the country. Previous to 1880 the contractor, Mr. Morrison, and those who preceded him in that service, performed a great portion of the service that is now done by railway from Point Tupper to Sydney, a distance of nearly a hundred miles. He did not only the mail service, but the passenger and the express service, which brought a revenue to the contractor of not less than $10,000 a year. I do not propose to give the exact figures, but any hon. gentleman who will look into the matter will see that the revenue from the passenger service could not be less than $30 a day, which would make for the whole year about $9,000. The whole express service going to North Sydney and Sydney, in the county of Cape Breton, went over that route, and the revenue derived from it was earned by Mr. Morrison and those who preceded him. Under these circumstances, the House will understand that the contractor was better paid by $5,000 at that time, than he could possibly be paid with $10,000 under the present arrangement, when the passenger and express services are largely done by the railway for at least one-half the portion of country that was previously being served by Mr. Morrison. The railway to-day, I am glad to say, is one of the best paying pieces of road under the management of the department, by reason of the number of passengers and the volume of business carried over it. But at the same time the business pertaining to one-half the territory through which that road goes now, was done over the stage route conducted by Mr. Morrison. Now, Mr. Morrison to-day goes over that same territory, on the same road, with a single exception which only took place within the last few years, of about seven miles, and with the same equipment. I understand his contract provides for the performance of the service with the same equipment, the same coaches, the same number of horses. I believe the regular service requires 24 horses, with six spare horses, or about 30 in all. Any hon. gentleman will understand that the cost of feeding a horse for twelve months for a service of that kind would be about $250. If we take the stabling, the shoeing, harnessses, coaches, sleighs, furs, and all the equipment the contractor requires, it would amount to one-half or more than half the amount that he received previous to the building of the railway. Now, as I said before, Mr. Morrison was in the receipt of all the revenue derived from his contract with the Government, and from the passenger and express services going over this route up to about 1880. At that time I myself started an agitation for getting another mail service through what is known now, and has been known since, as the central route by way of Grand Narrows, the route over which the railway was built. About then that service was established, and it injured the service that Mr. Morrison was carrying on to the extent of nearly one-half the passenger traffic. In 1887 the Government undertook to build a railway over that route, which was completed in 1890, but even before it was completed, the very fact that a road was building, and the very fact that the central route, inaugurated between 1880 and 1881, was becoming more popular, reduced the passenger traffic, and the consequent revenue, from day to day, and with the beginning of the operation of the railway, Mr. Morrison was deprived almost entirely of his regular passenger traffic, and was altogether deprived of the express business; because the express business was principally going to the extreme point of Sydney and North Sydney, and the mines in the county of Cape Breton, lying along the shore east of the Sydneys. The House will understand from this explanation the difference between the circumstances in which Mr. Morrison finds himself to-day, and ever since the building of the railway, and the circumstances he occupied previous to 1880, and previous to the building and operation of the present railway.

Now, the Postmaster General stated that the revenue derived from that route through the post offices on that route, only aggregated $240. Why, any person with any understanding of business, ought to inform himself, on discovering a statement of that kind on the public records, whether the statement was right or wrong, before he came before any assembly and made use of it. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will name but a portion of the offices, and the localities in which they are situated, that are being served by this mail service. First, I will name a number of important settlements, villages and towns lying at a short distance from the mail route, that is the direct road over which the mail is carried, and which are served from Mr. Morrison's line by side services. There are Arichat, Descousse, Little Arichat, L'Ardoise, Loch Lomond, Grand River and Fourchu. These are mostly populous villages doing a great deal of business. Now, the mails destined for these different points have been carried over the road by Mr. Morrison's stage for distances extending from 5, 10, 20, 30 and even 40 miles. Right on the line itself the principle point is St. Peter's, where Mr. Morrison resides. Then there is Grand Anse, Red Island, Big Pond, East Bay, Salmon River and Irish Cove, and many other. This is a thickly populated country; and there are a number of other offices along that line that I will not mention now. Will any one, hearing these names mentioned, and having any knowledge of what business ought to be in a country where such towns, and villages, and settlements exist—will any one, I ask credit the statement made by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock). My complaint is that, when he was questioned in respect to this matter, he made no reasonable or fair attempt to correct himself. He fell back on a report that he says he took from the department.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I fell back on the letter of the then Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron).

Mr. McDOUGALL. My complaint is, that the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) did not go into this matter in a business-like way. Knowing, as he did, that this matter had to come before the House, it was his duty to ascertain from the records of the department the revenue of the different post offices along the route. He ought to be able to name the different offices served under Morrison's contract, the different side services connecting with this line, and the amount of revenue derived from these offices, and not rely on a telegram which had the appearance of error on its face. It was only by doing so that the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) could give reliable information to this House. It seems to me that the only reason the Postmaster General can have for going into this question in the manner he has done, is owing to the fact that the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) has taken such an interest in having this service remain intact, as one continuous service from Port Hawkesbury to Sydney, in preference to breaking it up into five or six different and disconnected contracts. Every one who knows anything about a mail service through the country, must know that it cannot be satisfactory, if broken up. One contractor arrives at a certain hour at his destination, the other is waiting for his arrival, going to the next point, he finds he was so many hours late, and so continuously along the line the service is delayed and the public is suffering.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The inspector advised this course.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It matters not. The Postmaster General ought to know his business, regardless of the inspector. He ought to be able to judge the inspector's report, and he ought to be able to judge the communications and correspondence and complaints coming to his department.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think the inspector is right.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Then, why not delegate the whole duties to the inspector and give him the entire charge of your department? The only reason which the Postmaster General can give for his action in this matter is because my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Gillies) has taken an interest in continuing this service intact as it has been for the last thirty or forty years. Perhaps there is another reason, and that is that Mr. Paint made an offer for the contract and made a statement by letter. The Postmaster General made use of the statement as official information from his department, that Mr. Paint informed him that Mr. Morrison had done all in his power for twelve years to destroy the late Government. Does that indicate that there would be any collusion between the late Government and Mr. Morrison for the continuance, through improper means, of the contract for that service? The Postmaster General quoted against himself, when he said that Mr. Morrison did all in his power to destroy the late Government for the last twelve years, and up to the date of the letter, which, I think, is only a year or two ago.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Not up to the date of it. I think the papers show that he has been supporting Mr. Gillies.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It appears, also, that Mr. Paint was offering to perform the service for much less than Mr. Morrison is performing it at. Well, I do not know any one who would stand $500 for Mr. Paint in the part of the country he resides in, not to speak of guaranteeing him to carry out a contract at the figures the Postmaster General has given. We know the reason why Mr. Paint has written letters against Mr. Morrison. It was because Mr. Morrison did not support him in his elections for this House. I may state to my hon. friend and to the House, that I was approached, about twelve years ago, by Mr. Morrison and asked to intercede for the renewal of his contract. At that time, and for all the time before then, and, I believe, for all the time since then, Mr. Morrison was not a political friend of mine. But I knew what the public interest demanded. I knew no man in my county who would like to see the service taken from Mr. Morrison and given to others who, perhaps, could not perform it as well. I knew that, if I tried to take that service from Mr. Morrison, I would be making myself unpopular with the people who sent me to this House, and who wanted the very best man that could be got to have that contract. That was long before the hon. member (Mr. Gillies) had a seat in this House. It was before the building of the railway. I remember interceding for Mr. Morrison, and I interceded for him because I knew he had given satisfaction to the public, and that no other man could undertake the service for less money and do it as efficiently. It was an efficient service that the country required, and not a service to please the contractor or the men who wanted to get the contract. Coming, as I do, from a locality where I had every means of knowing how this service was performed, and knowing the importance of the service, I thought it was my duty to make this statement to the House, notwithstanding the statement made by the Postmaster General, who based his remarks upon papers from his department, without going fully into them. I am sorry to see the Postmaster General place himself in the position he did. If he had given as much care and study to the correspondence and information in his department as he gave to outside information, some of it from irresponsible parties, he would have acted very differently. He would have made up his mind in a different manner from that which he did, when he informed the House that he had such information as justified him in cancelling that contract twelve or fifteen months before it expired.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). The hon. gentleman (Mr. McDougall) need not have worked himself up to such a fury against the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), in relation to the telegram that was sent by his predecessor (Sir Adolphe Caron). I leave it to the reason of any right-thinking man, if a Postmaster General one month in office is bound to make further inquiries, when he finds a telegram in his office, left by his predecessor in the department, stating that the receipts from all the places served by this route were $242.

Mr. GILLIES. He should have made inquiries before he made the statement to the House.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). He simply stated what his predecessor had said, and he read a telegram of the late Postmaster General.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Why should the hon. gentleman use the telegram when he had the information in his department?

Mr. McDOUGALL.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). What better information could he have in the first instance than the statement of his predecessor? I admit that if anybody had said that was not correct, he ought to have inquired. But I notice that the hon. member for Richmond himself did not deny the statement, or say that the receipts were more. You will search this correspondence in vain for one word from the hon. member in reply to the telegram of the late Postmaster General that the receipts were $243, or stating that he was wrong. There is no doubt that he was wrong; there is no doubt that the receipts were more than that; but is the present Postmaster General to be blamed because he takes the statement of his predecessor as correct, when there is not a word of denial from either the hon. member for Richmond or the hon. member for Cape Breton? Has it come to this that the Postmaster General or any other Minister, when he gets a statement made by a previous Minister, must inquire whether it is correct or not? Is he not bound to accept that statement as correct?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Well, the hon. gentlemen are the best judges of the late Government. But I submit that such a statement would not be made by any man who understands the functions of a government. The present Ministers would require ten times as much time as they have at their disposal if they had to take every letter written by their predecessors during the last eighteen years and institute an inquiry to find out whether it was correct or not. A fine state of things that would be. These gentlemen are attempting to show that this matter is all right when it is all wrong. The hon. gentleman says he has assisted Mr. Morrison; that is to say, he did all he could. I would like the hon. member to point out one word he said for him from 1890?

Mr. McDOUGALL. I think I said that about ten or twelve years ago I had interceded for Mr. Morrison.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). He was only getting $5,700 odd at that time.

Mr. McDOUGALL. But he was getting all the revenue from the passenger service.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). In the summer time that was not large, because everybody who travelled to Sydney went by boat, and not by coach; and the hon. gentleman knows that previous to the building of the railway the winter traffic was not very large.

Mr. GILLIES. The boats were only semi-weekly.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Once a week sometimes and twice a week sometimes, and they only began in June and stopped in October.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). But the larger part of the travel was by boat in summer when the boats ran. Up to that year Mr. Morrison seems never to have made any claim, and the hon. gentleman never made any claim for him for any increase. In 1890 he gets the amount raised to $9,000 without a single fact being put before the Government. In reading this correspondence, it is a very curious thing that there is not a line on record showing who made the application, or the reason for the increase. One would suppose that when the department increased the amount from $5,700 to $9,000, they ought to have had something to offer to justify the change. But there is not a word; there is not one of the facts put forward now by the hon. member for Cape Breton when arguing for his friend Morrison.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The county was then represented by a friend of the hon. member for Guysborough, and a supporter of the present Government, and it is quite possible he interceded.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). That is to say, so well satisfied were the Government with the word of a gentleman in opposition that they would accept it in carrying out a transaction of this kind? Is that the position—that this increase was made, because Mr. Morrison was recommended by Mr. Flynn, who then represented the county of Richmond? If the hon. gentleman is satisfied with that argument, I am. But there is not a letter even from Mr. Flynn asking for the change. If the statement had been made by the hon. member for Cape Breton that Mr. Morrison was going to lose so much by the building of the railway, I could understand it; but after the matter is made public, the hon. member comes and makes such a statement, which should be in this correspondence if there was anything in it. The hon. gentleman knows that about the year 1890, a change took place in the political feelings of Mr. Morrison, and from that time he has been a strong Conservative. I do not blame him, but I only mention the fact, and the change paid him. In relation to the asking for tenders for the mail route, I want to correct my hon. friend from Richmond, who I know would not wilfully for a moment make a misstatement. But the evidence is against him, so far as Mr. McInnis is concerned, and his ability to carry out this contract, I suppose Mr. McInnis will be the best judge of that; and my hon. friend gives him a very high character, saying that he is a great friend of his personally and politically, and consequently a man of repute. Let us see what Mr. McInnis himself says about the whole transaction. He does not seem to think that his friend the hon. member for Richmond would look after his interest as well as he ought to; consequently he gets somebody else to attend to it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. He is not in Richmond county.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Does he live in Cape Breton county?

Mr. McDOUGALL. He does not.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Does he live in Inverness county?

Mr. McDOUGALL. He does.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Why did he not go to his own member?

Mr. GILLIES. He did.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Well, we will find out. He referred to Mr. Murdoch McCrea, ex-M.P.P., for the county of Richmond.

Mr. GILLIES. Does not the hon. gentleman remember the Postmaster General reading a letter from Dr. Cameron to the Postmaster General of that day on behalf of Mr. McInnis?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). There is no doubt about it—saying that he was a good man. But I want to show that he was not satisfied either with the hon. member for Richmond or with his own member. He went to Mr. Murdoch McRae, an ex-M.P.P. of the county of Richmond and now an official of the present Government at Ottawa, appointed to office by the late Government.

As the mail contract from Hawkesbury to Sydney is up for tenders, and I am thinking of tendering for it, I thought I would write you to know if you would protect my interests at the opening of the tenders on the 26th instant, or could get some friend that would look after the matter for a small fee, as I presume Mr. Gillies will be there for Mr. Morrison, and will get it for him if at all possible for him to do so, and no doubt he has the inside track, as the time is short between the opening of tenders on the 26th and the contractor to go to work on the 1st of February makes it look very risky.

This is the honest friend of the hon. member for Richmond, his political ally, the friend of whom he spoke so highly, when, a moment ago, he rose in his place to show that the hon. member for Inverness had spoken of him in the highest terms. He went on to say:

But I think I will try, and if successful will make the best of it, even if the time is so unreasonably short.

Mr. McRea, when he got that letter, wrote at once to Sir John Thompson, so that the Government were fully apprised of the matter.

My dear Sir John.—The inclosed letter explains itself. The distance from Hawkesbury to Sydney is 100 miles, and the idea of the tenders being open on the 26th of the current month and the service to commence on the first of February, just six days afterwards, is preposterous, unless there is some reason for it that I cannot apprehend. The present contractors have been most inveterate and energetic opponents of the Conservative party for the last twenty years, and still retain the contract. I believe in the last election Mr. Morrison supported Mr. Gillies. His having done so may give colour to the charge that the Post Office Department is conniving, by a very contemptible trick, to continue the contract.

Mr. GILLIES. Where is the possible harm in the giving of the contract when the notices for tenders are advertised six weeks?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I am reading the letter to show what the opinion of this man was. I will show the contract in a minute. How did Mr. McInnis stand himself in relation to the matter? To put himself right with the Postmaster General, on the 22nd January, 1894, he wrote the following letter, and it will be noticed that Mr. McInnis was ready and able to go to work. I make this statement here, and I claim no privilege as a member of Parliament, that unless he had been bought off, he would have gone to work.

I am this day mailing you a tender for the mail service from Port Hawkesbury to Sydney, with A. P. McDonald, M.D., of Hawkesbury, and Duncan Macdonald, of Long Point, as sureties. They are both good and responsible parties and should my tender be within the limit of consideration, I would refer you to Dr. Cameron, M.D., Mabou, Inverness County, or to the agency of the Merchants' Bank at Halifax at Port Hawkesbury.

Here was a reference to a bank, an M.P., and a well-known physician. Mr. McInnis says:

In the event of my tender being accepted, please notify by wire, as the time is so very short to get plant on the road in order to be at work on the 1st February.

He knew very well that the other man was getting $9,000 besides perquisites, and he went a good deal lower, and he knew very well that Mr. Morrison would get the contract at $9,000, because of the contract referred to by Mr. McRea.

In the event of my tender being accepted, please notify by wire, as the time is so very short to get plant on the road in order to be at work on the 1st of February. I have the most of the plant on hand, and can complete the balance if necessary with short notice.

What then is the information? The explanation is that it was made worth the while of this man to withdraw.

Mr. GILLIES. By whom?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). By those interested in the contract.

Mr. GILLIES. Will the hon. gentleman say, from his place or anywhere else, that Mr. McInnis was bought off by Mr. Morrison or anybody else? He makes a cowardly insinuation.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I make the statement that he was bought off by some one or other interested in the contract, and I claim no privilege of Parliament when I make the statement, and Mr. McInnis can proceed against me.

Mr. GILLIES. The only person interested in the contract was Mr. Morrison.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). The hon. gentleman need not argue the legal case. Mr. Morrison has an action against me.

Mr. GILLIES. Will the hon. gentleman say that Mr. Morrison bought out Mr. McInnis?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I make the statement, in order that it may cover Mr. Morrison and every other person, including the hon. gentleman himself, interested in the matter, that those interested in the contract purchased McInnis off and paid him the money. I claim no privileges of Parliament in this respect. And the hon. gentleman can proceed against me at any time.

Mr. GILLIES. You will not state that Morrison or any person bought him off?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Mr. Morrison might set up the plea that an agent did it without his knowledge, and then his son was interested in it. His son got the contract, when Mr. Morrison was running for the local House, and perhaps his son paid it. All that I know is that the son took the contract to relieve the father. I can understand the feelings of the hon. member for Richmond in this matter, because he had a great deal of trouble. I can well understand how he was worried in working this matter and how he had to work it in a way sometimes that he would not do in private matters. I can quite understand how he was being worried on every side and his writing to Mr. White: My dear Mr. White, I wish to get the contract so as to get some peace for my troubled soul. I can understand how that troubled soul led him on to send a telegram to Sir Adolphe Caron and another to Mr. White, and in case the double-barrelled gun would not go off, he sent another to Sir John Thompson. But the late Postmaster General did not take his own course and decide the matter. It is rather suggestive that it needed two telegrams sent in the same day, one to the Minister, and one urging the deputy to urge his superior to do that which the superior had been requested to do. This indicates the great trouble the hon. gentleman was put to; I am sure the evidence before the House is such as to indicate that the hon. gentleman must have passed through the fiery furnace of tribulation, when he was so anxious to have his troubled soul set at rest by the signing of this contract. Let it not be forgotten that in 1890 the contract was raised to $9,000. Up to the end of 1891 it was continued at $9,000, and the same in 1892, and the same in 1893; and it was not until 1894 that tenders were called for. It will be seen that the hon. Minister, for whom I have some sympathy, decided that this should not continue. Once he felt his soul must be relieved of its burden about this contract. He, too, said that he would throw aside the influences that surrounded him. Noble purpose! and so he sent a telegram, as read by the present Minister, in which, in a moment of strength, he said:

Regret exceedingly that I cannot comply with your request to continue Morrison's contract. Cost would be $6,000.

It was then $9,000.

It would be impossible for us to justify such an expenditure.

I like to see a man rise to a great occasion; I like to see a man holding the noble position of a Minister of the Crown, standing by the country. But the curious thing is that, within less than three months, the hon. gentleman did justify the expenditure to himself. No doubt, the messages that came to him, one after the other, worried him so that the Morrison contract became a nightmare to him. He felt it was necessary to continue it, in order thereby to continue the life of a political friend for another parliamentary term. And so his backbone gave way, and Morrison got his contract. Let us be thankful that great men have moments of strength which enable them to rise above mere external circumstances and assert their native dignity. But, while this contract was being continued for three years, there was a report, dated 1890, which had been sent in by the deputy, to whom reference has been made, suggesting a new way for dealing with this contract. I am not going to say this is the right way, but I wish to point out that there must be something wrong about the department and the contract, when their own inspector for the province of Nova Scotia writes and makes this suggestion, and they not only write to say that it is not a good suggestion, but completely ignore his report. The hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) said that the Minister ought to be above his deputy and ought to go into every question. I entirely dissent from that, and for this reason—that no Postmaster General that ever was, or ever will be, in Canada, can master the intricacies of the postal service of this country. I venture to say, in the presence of the hon. member for Three Rivers, a former Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron), that all those who have been at the head of this department, together, have but a faint idea of the postal system of the whole Dominion.

Mr. McDOUGALL. In the case of a $9,000, they ought to know the particulars.

Mr. FRASER. They evidently had the particulars from the deputy, but they acted in the very opposite way from his report. But that statement of the particulars must come from the deputy. There would be no need for a deputy, if the hon. member for Cape Breton is right.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Inspector.

Mr. FRASER. Inspector or deputy, for the Minister must depend upon them for detailed information respecting his department. The fact is that this is a job and to continue it would be to perpetuate a job. Can there be anything wrong in asking for tenders, so as to ascertain if this contractor is getting too much? I do not know whether Mr. Paint could or could not run a mail route. I know that he was able on one occasion to carry the county of Richmond, and that he sat in this House, and I know he was going to run again, but, for some reason, did not do so. It surely would be criminal on my part to refuse to accept the statement of a Conservative ex-member of this House. I highly commend what the hon. Minister has done.

Mr. TAYLOR. Carried.

Mr. FRASER. The chief whip (Mr. Taylor) is afraid that there is still worse to be exposed, and he wants this subject to be dropped. But the facts must be known. It is assumed that a contract of this kind should be continued from year to year, but I contend that a contract of this kind should not be continued. Inquiry should be made, and I am glad the hon. Minister has decided to make inquiry. I know the people of the county very well, and I have many letters from men in Richmond and Cape Breton, who are in favour of such action as that the Minister has taken.

Mr. MONK. I would like to call the attention of the Postmaster General to Senneville, in the county of Jacques Cartier. It is an important municipality, frequented by a large number of summer residents. There is no post office there. It formed a part formerly of the municipality of St. Anne's, but is now a distinct municipality. I trust the Postmaster General will see his way clear to furnish it with a post office as soon as possible.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I would be glad if the hon. gentleman would do me the favour to call at the department, and I would be pleased to go into the matter with him, and endeavour to meet his wishes.

Mr. WALLACE. I would like to ask the Postmaster General if the rumour is true that we have seen stated in the Toronto papers, that the Rev. Mr. Dixon, who sold postage stamps in the Toronto post office, has been dismissed from that position, and if so why?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I did not know that Mr. Dixon was a clergyman, but there has been a change made in the licensee in the Toronto post office. I was informed, and believe it to be the case, that the licensee to sell stamps at the Toronto post office, was a member of a wholesale firm in that city, and was engaged in that business; that he did not give personal attention to the work of selling stamps, but farmed it out, his only interest being to collect the profits.

Mr. WALLACE. What was the commission given ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think the regular commission is 1 per cent. I inquired of my deputy as to the light in which licenses were held, and he informed me that they were treated as revocable privileges, and not as permanent offices. I quite agree with him in that view, and am of the opinion that an office of that kind can better go to relieve some needy person, than be utilized as it was in this instance. I selected for the office a most worthy citizen of Toronto, whom I suppose the hon. gentleman knows, Mr. William Hewitt, a man who had at one time been a prominent hardware merchant in our city, but had been unsuccessful in business, and had grown old, almost too old to earn a living in any way requiring much labour. I know that he has been reduced almost to want. His case was one that appealed to the sympathy of every man who had any sympathy in his bosom; and when the circumstances of that office were brought to my attention, I considered that it was proper to give Mr. Hewitt that little means of keeping soul and body together. I may say, however, that I stipulated with him that he was not to dismiss the employees there, a couple of women, but to continue them until they could get other employment. I guarded their interests as well as possible. Of course, that is only a temporary understanding. I would further say that in acting as I did, I did not know, nor do I know now, Mr. Dixon's politics. I do not know the gentleman at all; but if I find any similar case in the department, or if the hon. gentleman will point out to me any person holding a privilege of this kind under similar circumstances, I shall deem it my duty, no matter what his politics may be, to follow the precedent I have set in this case.

Mr. WALLACE. I know Mr. Dixon as a gentleman who was a minister in the city of Toronto, and who preaches without any compensation. I know that for about 18 years he has held the privilege of selling postage stamps in the post office in Toronto. I think it is an arbitrary act to displace him without any charge of incompetency being made against him, or any charge of any kind except that he was a member of some commercial firm. I have no doubt that he performed the duties of selling stamps with entire satisfaction of the citizens of Toronto.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Does the hon. gentleman say he discharged the duties personally ?

Mr. WALLACE. Not at all. The hon. gentleman has said that two ladies are performing those duties, and those two ladies.

Mr. MULOCK.

he says, are to continue to perform those duties.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Only temporarily. I do not even know their names.

Mr. WALLACE. He tells me that these two ladies are to continue to sell stamps in the post office after Mr. Hewitt has been appointed, although he has discharged Mr. Dixon because he did not personally attend to the work of selling stamps, but allowed it to be done by two ladies. I do not think the Postmaster General has made out a very good case. He says that Mr. Hewitt is a poor man. I am not aware whether Mr. Dixon's circumstances, financially, are those of a poor man. I do not suppose the Postmaster General has made an inquiry to find out whether he is displacing one poor man to put in another poor man.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I observe in the Ottawa "Citizen" of last Saturday an item which I think refers to Mr. Dixon. It says: "Mr. Dixon is a partner in a wholesale house." That means in the city of Toronto. This is a telegraphic despatch, and I assume it to be correct.

Mr. WALLACE. The Postmaster General did not make the change until he saw that statement in Saturday's "Citizen."

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I did not make any such statement.

Mr. WALLACE. Has the Postmaster General any information of his own that he could give the committee ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have given that information as a citizen of Toronto, and I only sent for that paper to confirm what I stated.

Mr. WALLACE. What firm is he a member of ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think the name of the firm is Ansley, Gillespie & Dixon, furriers. I thought that item in the "Citizen," a Conservative paper, would convince the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems to me that we are face to face now with a new principle upon which dismissals are to be made. The Postmaster General lays down as a principle that wherever he finds a man who is doing his work, if he is not an officer in the civil service where it requires some strong action of the Government to dispossess him, but is subject at any time to change, if it is made apparent to him that this gentleman is not as poor as another man, he will dispossess him from that office and put in a man who is poorer. Now, that does not seem to be a good rule of conduct to go by. Is the Postmaster General going to adopt it as a principle that he will dismiss every man—even though he does his work to the complete satisfaction of the department—simply because there is a poorer man who would like to have the position. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) has not given the information here of his own knowledge that Mr. Dixon is one of a firm of wholesale merchants, but he relies on a newspaper report to back him up in his assertion. He (Mr. Mulock) has confessed here himself to-night that no one person is able to do the stamp-vending, and that there are two ladies who are engaged at it. Mr. Hewitt is an old man and cannot do the work himself. Now, if the Postmaster General is informed by his department that the work has been well done, and has been supervised by Mr. Dixon who must employ help, surely he has no ground to dispossess Mr. Dixon. My information is that Mr. Dixon is a preacher of the Gospel, has been a missionary, and that for eighteen years he has performed his work to the utmost satisfaction. He is a respectable man in every way and very acceptable to the people who have done this work. Mr. Dixon does not farm it out, because he has to have persons to assist him. And if he superintends the work, and it is done to the satisfaction of the department and the public, it does seem to me we are getting upon very sandy ground, if we adopt the principle that because there is a poorer man somewhere around, a good official is to be dispossessed of his position. That is not a satisfactory principle to go by.

Mr. McMULLEN. Under the circumstances, the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) was perfectly right in dismissing a man who is clearly a member of a wholesale firm, and a man who took no interest whatever in the duties that were supposed to devolve upon him as holding a commission for the sale of stamps. Mr. Dixon did not attend his office, but virtually farmed it out by employing two girls, possibly at low salaries, to discharge the duties. He pocketed the balance of receipts himself, and did nothing at all in the office. We know under the present condition of the country that there are too many poor people who are willing to take any little position for the purpose of earning an honest livelihood. Hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible for that condition of affairs, for they have unquestionably contributed a good deal to it by their policy. I consider the Postmaster General was perfectly right in dismissing a man who was evidently receiving a very nice annual income for which he did little or nothing.

Mr. FOSTER. How much was his income?

Mr. McMULLEN. He paid the salary of the two girls and pocketed the rest of the commission.

Mr. FOSTER. How much?

Mr. McMULLEN. We have good reason to believe that it is worth a considerable sum. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) gets up here and tells us that this gentleman has been a missionary. We do not want to reflect upon any person, but if Mr. Dixon was a man in the position that the Postmaster General had a right to conclude he was, a member of a wholesale firm, and was pocketing an annual sum without doing a single stroke of duty, the Postmaster General did perfectly right, and I hope if there are any more such cases he will deal with the rest of them in the same manner. I hope he will give the poor and industrious classes in this country an opportunity of filling positions of that kind, and not allow the money to go into the pockets of men who are evidently in a position to live comfortably without it. I have no doubt that my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) knows this gentleman very well. He says he has been a minister and a missionary.

Mr. WALLACE. He is a minister yet.

Mr. McMULLEN. I earnestly hope that my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) has received considerable benefit from Mr. Dixon's efforts in that direction; but I have to say that so far he has not shown any evidence of it. We are glad to know there are such people in the country, but we do not want to make them all commissioners for selling stamps. We do not want wholesale merchants, who presumably have a considerable annual revenue from their business, in the position of selling stamps, while the poor people are not able to make a living. Why should an office of that kind not go to a person who is in need of it. It is a laudable act on the part of the Postmaster General to deal with this case as he has done, and I hope he will repeat his action in every similar case where the work is farmed out as it has been in this case.

Mr. FOSTER. Could the Postmaster General tell us what is the amount of the sales of stamps each year at this office?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am unable to inform the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman think it is a large sum?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have no opinion which the hon. gentleman is willing to accept.

Mr. FOSTER. I am afraid the hon. gentleman will have to try and get an opinion for the House. The hon. gentleman does not seem to think he is bound to give any information to the House at all. The hon. gentleman dispossesses an old official because he thinks he is a member of a wholesale establishment, and because another man is poor. Another hon. gentleman gets up in the House and makes a charge that this official pays low salaries to the girls, and pockets a large amount of money. It is only fair we should know what the amount of the transactions at that office is. Has the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) not informed himself from his deputy. Has he gone to work and dispossessed an old and thoroughly good and efficient servant and never inquired into the facts at all. Surely the hon. gentleman has not proceeded that way.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) turns up the post office report, he will find that the sale of stamps in Toronto is something like $370,000 a year, and that 1 per cent on that would be $3,700 per annum.

Mr. WALLACE. One man does not sell all the stamps there ?

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes.

Mr. WALLACE. There are over a dozen places where stamps are sold in Toronto.

Mr. FOSTER. Then we have no solid ground at all to judge on. We must appeal to the Postmaster General to set us right in this matter, and surely he will give us the information before the item passes. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) tell us how many vendors of stamps there are in the city of Toronto ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think there are sixteen branch post offices where stamps are sold in addition to the general office in question.

Mr. WALLACE. I might inform the Postmaster General that there are at least a dozen places in that portion of the city that is in my riding, selling postage stamps and they are not branch post offices.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That is so much more.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes. So that this $100,000 is distributed among probably one hundred people.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Then it did not take much away from your friend.

Mr. TAYLOR. I wish to ask the Postmaster General if in the arrangement he has made by changing from the Rev. Mr. Dixon to Mr. Hewitt, he has effected any saving ? Is the commission as much to Mr. Hewitt as was paid to Mr. Dixon ? I might say before the hon. gentleman answers this question that I am informed that the Rev. Mr. Dixon has no business whatever except that of a missionary without salary ; among the poor people of the city of Toronto ; and that the offence, if offence it was, which he committed was the preaching of a sermon to the Orangemen on the 12th of July, in which he perhaps overstepped what some people might regard as the bounds of religion and went into politics. That is the offence for which he is deprived of this petty office. But, so far as I know, he has no connection with any mercantile institution, and I think the item should stand until the members from Toronto are here, who are fully conversant with the subject.

Mr. FOSTER.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I emphatically repudiate the insinuation of the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor). I was not aware, until I read in the "Citizen" on Saturday, that the gentleman had any connection with the order to which the hon. gentleman refers, or with any order, and I never heard of him delivering a 12th of July sermon or any other sermon to any organization. I have given the one and only reason for my action.

Mr. TAYLOR. Have you effected a saving ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Mr. Hewitt is allowed the same compensation. There is one scale of remuneration allowed to all vendors of stamps.

Mr. FOSTER. Does Mr. Hewitt take this office under the distinct understanding that he is to do the whole labour himself ? The objection seemed to be that the other man was farming out the work, when the fact was that he could not do the whole work himself, and had to employ a couple of girls as clerks. Does Mr. Hewitt avoid all that, or is he to employ any girls ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have explained to the hon. gentleman once, and I will explain again. As I understand, Mr. Dixon conducted the office by deputy, employing two women or more. I have stipulated that Mr. Hewitt is not to discharge them at once, but to keep them until they get equally lucrative employment. He has inmates of his own family who will assist him in the work.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the Postmaster General know whether Mr. Hewitt is a Liberal and Mr. Dixon a Liberal-Conservative ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not know anything about Mr. Dixon's politics. I presume that being a clergyman he takes no part in politics. Mr. Hewitt is a Liberal.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman says that because a man is a clergyman he takes no part in politics, he knows more than I thought ; for he has two clergymen behind him who have taken part in politics.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I want to call the attention of the Postmaster General to the expenses of the Toronto Post Office. I think he could save a large amount of money there, and I would advise him to commence at the head and cut down the salaries from the top to the bottom. The postmaster of Toronto is getting a salary of $4,000 a year, while the Deputy Postmaster General of this Dominion is only getting a salary of $3,200 a year. The expenses of the Toronto Post Office amount to nearly $151,000, for a population of about 175,000 while the expenses of the Montreal Post Office amount to only $143,000 for a population of about 250,000. So that the city of Toronto, with 75,000 fewer people, costs nearly $8,000 more than the city of Montreal. The Toronto district postal service costs nearly $13,000 more than the service of the Montreal district. In the city of Toronto there are no less than 135 letter carriers, whereas in Montreal, with 75,000 more people, there are only 99 letter carriers. I think the Postmaster General, with great benefit to this Dominion, ought to investigate the affairs of the Toronto Post Office, as well as those of other cities, and I believe he would be able to make a very large saving to the people of this country every year.

Mr. FOSTER. After that appeal, made by one of his strong supporters, I think the hon. gentleman has hardly an excuse for asking for about $107,000 more than was given last year, and adding five or six clerks. I want to press for the information I asked as to the amount of the sales at the Toronto Post Office by Mr. Dixon, and the number of clerks he had to employ; and while I am not going to be so unreasonable as to insist on that information to-night, I would ask my hon. friend to make a note of it and let us have it when we are considering another vote for his department, or on concurrence. But I would add my appeal to the appeal of the hon. member for Kent, that he should strike something off this estimate.

Mr. MONTAGUE. When the hon. Postmaster General is bringing down that information, it might be well, in view of the statements made by the hon. member for Kent, to bring down a comparison of the work done at Toronto with that done at Montreal as regards the number of letters and newspapers distributed, and the amount of the revenue. Will the hon. gentleman make a note of that?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not think I can get such a statement, but I will try and meet the hon. gentleman's request.

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to say to the committee that I find the total revenue received at the Toronto post office is $370,361.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What is the Montreal revenue?

Mr. BOSTOCK. Before this item is adopted, I want to draw the attention of the hon. Postmaster General to the condition of the mail facilities in the Kootenay country. In Rossland, the lack of proper facilities has been a great drawback to business. The people there are obliged to send their mail very largely through the States, which has a bad effect on the business of this country. There is a daily mail from Rossland down to Spokane at present, but, owing to the arrangement of the boats running between Revelstoke and Trail, the mail service going north and carried by the Canadian Pacific Railway is only tri-weekly, instead of daily. This is a matter that requires serious attention. It would be a great benefit to that country, if it were put right at once. We also require better facilities for communication with the east. There is a good deal of business being done in that part of the country at present, and it is being found by gentlemen from the east, who send their mail to Rossland, that their letters do not reach there as quickly as they expected, and business difficulties have resulted in consequence. I have a clipping here from one of the Rossland newspapers, which points out that there should be a mail received and despatched daily at and from all Canadian Pacific Railway points possible, and, if this cannot be arranged, then there should be such a mail to points east of Winnipeg and the coast cities, such as Vancouver and New Westminster. With regard to post office deliveries, the general delivery windows should be kept open from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. every day, and from 7 p.m. to 9 p.m., and from 9 a.m. to 11 a.m., on Sundays. There are great complaints, owing to the postmaster not having sufficient assistance to keep his work up to time, so that the mails are not distributed as quickly as they should be. There is another matter I might mention. In the Kootenay country there has been more than one instance in which it has taken a very long time to get letters from places like New Denver and Sandon, in the Slocan country, brought down to Nelson, which is the seat of the provincial government offices, and to which records have to be sent by prospectors and miners. There is an instance of a letter sent from New Denver to Rossland, which was dated the 24th of July, and not received until the 14th August, though the length of time it takes to travel from New Denver to Rossland is at the most three days. The House can easily see that it is a very serious matter for people doing business to have their letters delayed in this way.

I draw the attention of the hon. Postmaster General to these facts, in the hope that he will be able to see his way to make better arrangements in the future. There is another point which shows the defective way our postal service is carried on in that part of the country, and that is in regard to letters that are insufficiently stamped. There are a number of instances coming up of letters insufficiently stamped, and which are held, as a rule, in the post office at Victoria. Cases have occurred of very protracted delays. In one instance, when a letter was posted on the Shuswap and Okanagan Railway, to a gentleman in Midway, he received a notice from the post office in Victoria, telling him that his letter was waiting for him in Victoria and would be sent to him on his sending sufficient stamps to pay the postage. The time it takes between Victoria and Midway to deliver a letter is about three and a half days, and, as the mail only runs out twice a week, it usually takes a good deal longer. It is a great hardship that people should have to wait in this way simply because a letter happens to be insufficiently stamped. I think that the system adopted in England would be very much more advantageous, and that is, that the person to whom the letter is addressed has to pay double postage, when the letter is insufficiently stamped, in which case there is no delay. Some arrangement of that kind will be a great benefit to us in British Columbia.

Mr. FOSTER. There is another little point I had almost forgotten. Who is the postmaster at present at Marsh Hill, Ont. ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have a most efficient postmaster there. He manifested his great respect for and high appreciation of the officer under its new head, by resigning a position which is highly prized by most gentlemen, and accepting in lieu thereof the honourable, if not very lucrative, position of postmaster at Marsh Hill, in which he receives the annual salary of $10. It is not considered necessary, under the circumstances, to require such postmasters to devote the whole of their time to the discharge of their duties. This is one of the cases in which a public official is permitted to serve his country by deputy. With regard to the remarks of my hon. friend from Yale (Mr. Bostock), I would say that he and some of his colleagues from British Columbia have called my attention to the insufficient mail service in that province, and it is the intention of the department to endeavour to improve that service without delay. We are endeavouring to prepare specifications with a view to that end, and are in communication with the railways and considering the propositions from steambot companies, with the view of trying to carry out the suggestions and wishes of the representatives of that province. As regards the insufficiency of the staff at Rossland, the post office at Rossland is what is known as an accounting office, and the postmaster is not paid a fixed salary, but is remunerated on a general scale applicable to all postmasters at accounting offices, and he is obliged to supply his own staff. Allowances are made for the maintenance of the office, and if, therefore, that is insufficient, it rests with the postmaster himself to supplement it, for the scale of remuneration is one that has been in force for years, and I never heard it proving insufficient.

Mr. FOSTER. I would call the attention of the Postmaster General to the case of the postmaster at Marsh Hill. There is an excellent chance there for him to carry out the principles he has just laid down in the case of Mr. Dixon. The postmaster, Mr. King, is a fairly wealthy man who owns a saw-mill and carries on a business. There are certainly men at Marsh Hill, men who are much poorer than Mr. King. In carrying out the humanitarian ideas he has expressed, the hon. gentleman will be expected to find some poor man in Marsh Hill to displace the richer man who is so largely engaged in other business. More than that, I am afraid that Mr. King is violating the rule laid down in that he does not attend to the work himself. Mr. Dixon's head came off because he did not do his own work. Now, Mr. King, in June last, left his work—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. He was not postmaster.

Mr. FOSTER. He was appointed in June.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Not in June.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes ; in June or July.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That is a different month.

Mr. FOSTER. I can say with my hon. friend and myself when in Queen's and Sunbury, he would be bound to bear witness that Mr. King was there. We saw him in the flesh ; but he was not there to carry on his work as postmaster at Marsh Hill. He is doing this work by deputy, I believe, making nearly $9 a year out of it himself and giving about $1 to some poor fellow who is doing the work.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is the hon. gentleman an applicant for the position.

Mr. FOSTER. No ; I would rather leave it for my hon. friend.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Well, probably I need it more.

Mr. WALLACE. With reference to the hon. gentleman's statement as to British Columbia, I regard it as a matter of the greatest importance that the West Kootenay country should be supplied with a daily mail. The place is becoming very populous ; there is a very large amount of trade there, and trade will go where the best trade facilities are offered. One of the most important factors in that regard is postal accommodation. The United States towns along the boundary line are being built up at the expense of our Canadian towns, and there is nothing that I know of that the Government can do at the present time that would so much promote the trade from Canada as to supply the facilities of a daily mail. From what I know of the country, I believe that this mail can be supplied easily and without great expense. The trade of the country will justify daily communication and the Government should give the encouragement required in the way of postal facilities.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think the Postmaster General need not bring down the figures I asked for showing the comparison between the Toronto and Montreal post offices. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) seemed to think that the post office at Toronto was very extravagantly managed under the late Administration, because although the population of the city was less than that of Montreal, the post office cost more. I find, however, on consulting the report, that the revenue from Montreal post office was $317,000, while Toronto was $370,000, the difference in the expense of running the two offices is $8,000 in favour of Montreal, while the difference in the income of the two is $53,000 in favour of Toronto.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to know if the Government have considered the abolition of this land board at Winnipeg?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) is not in his place.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding. This question is one that may well engage the attention of the Government; but, so far, it has not been taken up.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 1.25 a.m. (Tuesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 29th September, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES.

Mr. CHOQUETTE presented the fourth report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the official report of the Debates of the House, as follows:—

Your committee recommend that Messrs. J. O. Pelland, J. A. Geoffrion and H. R. Fiset be appointed as translators of the debates, at salaries of $1,000 each, to replace Messrs. McLeod, Vanasse and Bouchard, whose services are to be dispensed with on the completion by them of their share of the work of translation of the debates of the present session, and that the appointment and remuneration of the above-mentioned Messrs. Pelland, Geoffrion and Fiset date from the commencement of the next session of Parliament.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Bill (No. 36) to incorporate the Manitoba and Nelson Valley Railway Company.—(Mr. Davin.)

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES.

Mr. CHOQUETTE moved:

That the fourth report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of the House be adopted.

Mr. BERGERON. I believe the hon. gentleman should not bring this up now. The rule is that, without the consent of the whole House, such a resolution cannot be moved without notice.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Will there be any discussion?

Mr. BERGERON. Yes, of course.

Mr. SPEAKER. An hon. gentleman takes objection; and, therefore, this motion cannot be submitted without notice.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I will give this as a notice of motion for Thursday next.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 28) to revive and amend the Act incorporating the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company.—(Mr. Edwards.)

Bill (No. 31) respecting the St. Catharines and Niagara Central Railway Company.—(Mr. Lount.)

Bill (No. 32) respecting the South Shore Railway Company.—(Mr. Bruneau.)

GOVERNMENT OF THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

The Order being read for introduction of Bills,

Mr. DAVIN. At this late period of the session, I do not intend to leave the Bill standing in my name to remain any longer on the Notice paper. I had intended to bring in a Bill that would have given the Territories responsible government. It would have been impossible for me to carry such a Bill without the co-operation of the Government, and as the Government had decided not to have any heroic legislation this session, there was no use in my having the Bill even printed. But if spared, and if I have the honour of sitting in this House in a future session, or in a future Parliament, I shall certainly bring before the attention of Parliament a Bill that will give the Territories responsible government. They have at present responsible powers with the exception of two trifling details; but there is a serious disability and it is this: that owing to their present state of pupilage they do not get either the full amount of money they are entitled to nor have they the responsibility and the power to govern those great Territories in a way that, in my opinion, would precipitate their progress at a rate they can never hope to attain when they are governed three-quarters there or half there, and half here. I shall therefore not move for leave to introduce this Bill.

STAFF OF THE INLAND REVENUE DEPARTMENT.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir H. Joly de Lotbinière). I beg leave of the House to make a personal explanation. I am in the painful position of one who has unwittingly deceived the House by a statement I made on Friday evening, when we were discussing the Weights and Measures estimates. I stated, and I really thought I was stating the exact truth, that when the service was remodelled by the Conservative Government which succeeded Mr. Mackenzie's Government, the staff that was appointed a short time afterwards did not contain a single one of the officers who had been appointed in that department under the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie. Well, since then I have discovered that I made a mistake in making such a statement, and so positively. I have had a return prepared which it would have been more prudent on my part, I acknowledge, to have had prepared before I made that statement, and it shows that when the organization made by the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie for the Weights and Measures was set aside, the staff consisted of ninety-seven officers. A year afterwards, in 1879-80, when the new staff was organized by the Conservative Government, sixty-seven officers were appointed, and out of those sixty-seven, I find that seven belong to the old staff appointed by Mr. Mackenzie. I was so completely under the impression that the whole staff had been swept away and that none of them had been left, that I took it upon myself to make the statement I did, and I beg now to correct it.

DISMISSALS ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not wish to be considered unduly pertinacious, but I would like to call the attention of the Government again to the subject I mentioned yesterday, and that is the supplementary return in regard to the dismissals in connection with the bridge at Pictou on the Intercolonial Railway. My object in referring to it so soon again is that the session is, as we all hope, drawing rapidly to a close, and I should not like to be compelled to occupy any amount of time on that subject. If the First Minister will kindly take occasion to urge on the Minister of Railways, who is not in his place for the moment, to have the supplementary return brought down, it would, I think, avoid considerable discussion.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). What documents are missing?

Mr. DAVIN.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The documents covered, as I contend, by the Order of the House. The Minister of Railways promised yesterday to give his attention to it. A return was brought down, but I called the attention of the Minister to the fact that very important correspondence referred to in the return was omitted. He promised to inquire into it, and either have the return corrected or else state reasons for not having another return made. The urgency of the case is obvious.

REGINA COURT HOUSE.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works, that it is dangerous to allow any large building in the North-west Territories to have its heating unattended to in case of severe frost. Unless somebody is appointed to attend to the heating of the Regina court-house—a building which has cost the country from forty to fifty thousand dollars—it may be very seriously damaged. As the Minister has nothing against J. K. Lambert, and, as he has been undoubtedly deceived in the matter, I hope he will reappoint Mr. Lambert to the position, as he has by implication promised to do.

THE LOBSTER FISHERY.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to refer for a moment to a paragraph which I see in the Montreal "Gazette" today, and which reads as follows:—

Reports have been received at the Department of Marine and Fisheries that a number of American vessels are fishing for lobsters outside the three-mile limit in the Straits of Northumberland, between Cape Breton and Prince Edward Island. This is the close season for lobsters, according to Canadian law, but the question will probably be raised whether it is to be made applicable to foreign vessels fishing outside the three-mile limit.

I would respectfully ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if any steps are likely to be taken to prevent the fishing of lobsters outside the three-mile limit in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, because, if it is allowed to be continued, it will most effectually destroy our lobster fishery in the future.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The matter was brought under the attention of the department yesterday, and telegraphic orders were sent to take the necessary steps to protect our waters in that respect.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

NORTH ONTARIO INDIAN RESERVE.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the House to a paragraph in the Orillia "Packet," a newspaper published in Orillia, East Simcoe, adjacent to North Ontario. It says :

Mr. F. J. Gillespie attended the monthly meeting of the council of Rama Reserve, on Monday. He desired to secure the trade of the Indians, which Mr. C. W. Myers has heretofore enjoyed for eighteen years, to the satisfaction of the whole band. At the close of the usual business of the council, Mr. Gillespie put forth an appeal on his own behalf, reading a letter from Hon. Mr. Laurier to the effect that the Premier would be pleased to see his friends get the trade, which he was sure Mr. Gillespie deserved. He also read a letter which he claimed was from the Minister of the Interior. These were both private, though the chief appeared to believe it was an order from headquarters. The council referred Mr. Gillespie to the audience, and he repeated his appeal to them. Mr. Gillespie was understood to intimate that if he secured their trade, he would exert an influence in the favour of the Indians, in the matter of annuities, &c. Otherwise that influence would be detrimental to them. This influence, however, Mr. Gillespie denied, when asked whether he had been correctly understood.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have allowed the hon. gentleman to go thus far, in order to ascertain if this was what I would consider a proper question to bring up on the Orders of the Day. The hon. gentleman will have a much better opportunity to bring the matter forward on going into Supply.

SUPPLY—NORTH ONTARIO INDIAN RESERVE.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. Mr. Speaker, I shall just read to the House the end of the paragraph which I have already referred to, because I have a question to ask, and I do not think it would be fair to ask that question until the whole paragraph is read. The end of the paragraph shows that Mr. Gillespie did not succeed in his intention.

The chief appeared to have so understood Mr. Gillespie, and to the end did not seem to have his mind fully disabused of the impression. After a discussion which lasted for an hour or more, a standing vote was demanded and the council reluctantly consenting, the motion that the trade be continued to Mr. Myers was carried amid cheers and without one dissenting voice.

I might say that I have had several communications from the Indians themselves and from others interested in them, asking me about this paragraph. I was asked to see the Minister of the Interior before the Indian council was held, because the letter was being used upon the reserve prior to that meeting. However, there is no Minister of the Interior, and I did not know until a day or two ago that the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) was acting Minister. Now, the Indians of North Ontario are a most obedient lot of men, and they obey all constituted authority in every way. Mr. Gillespie was my opponent in the by-election in December last; not in the general elections. As this paragraph says that these letters to Mr. Gillespie were private, I have no doubt they were private, and I hope neither of the Ministers who wrote them, intended that they should be used in any such improper way as that in which they appear to have been used. In justice to the First Minister, and in the interests of the Indians of our country and particularly those of North Ontario, I think it should be known to them that they are, as in the past, free agents to the extent to which they have been free agents. Mr. Myers has done their business satisfactorily for eighteen years. Most of his lifetime he has been an active Liberal in politics, and he is pretty independent now, sometimes voting one way and sometimes another. Outside of the question of his politics, Mr. Myers is a most respected citizen, and a man entirely beloved by the Indians. His store is adjacent to their territory, whereas the store of Mr. Gillespie, the friend of the Prime Minister, is several miles away from the reserve. It would be in the interest of the public generally, if we could have a declaration from the First Minister that, if such a letter was written by him, it was never intended to be used for such a purpose.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). What is the question of my hon. friend?

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. I would like to know whether the Premier authorized the use of that letter in such a way, if, indeed, he wrote such a letter at all. We have only got it from his friend Mr. Gillespie that he did write such a letter, and that a similar letter was written by the hon. the acting Minister of the Interior.

The PRIME MINISTER. This is what I read in the paper which the hon. gentleman was kind enough to send me in advance :

Mr. F. J. Gillespie attended the monthly meeting of the council of Rama Reserve on Monday. He desired to secure the trade of the Indians, which Mr. C. W. Myers has heretofore enjoyed for eighteen years, to the satisfaction of the whole band.

At the close of the usual business of the council, Mr. Gillespie put forth an appeal on his own behalf, reading a letter from Hon. Mr. Laurier to the effect that the Premier would be pleased to see his friends get the trade, which he was sure Mr. Gillespie deserved. He also read a letter which he claimed was from the Minister of the Interior. These were both private.

Well, I am quite sure, if it be a private letter, I do not know what was in it. If there was nothing more in it than that, I would be glad if Mr. Gillespie got the trade. I think that is all right, and I will not go back on that sentiment.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) allow Mr. Gillespie to use the letter in that way among a band of Indians ?

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman asked me if it was a private letter.

Mr. FOSTER. We have not yet heard from the Minister from Quebec West (Mr. Dobell).

Mr. DAVIN. In this connection I would remind my hon. friend from Quebec West that I called his attention five or six days ago to an allegation which has been sent to me, authoritatively I think, to the effect that Mr. A. E. Forget, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs at Regina, had sent out circulars to the agents telling them that they were to deal only with friends of the Government. I may say that I remember a similar intimation, but it was during the rule of the third Napoleon. It was a message from Paris telling prefects that they were to take care and make a distinction between the chickens of the friends of the Government and those of their enemies.

The PRIME MINISTER. We need not go so far as France for that.

Mr. DAVIN. I hope my hon. friend from Quebec West will be able to assure me that I have been misinformed. But if I am properly informed, I hope he will put a stop to this very improper procedure—improper especially in the North-west Territories ; because I can state without fear of contradiction that the rule of confining the patronage to the friends of the Government has never been pursued there. In Regina, the capital, leading Reformers were accustomed to get patronage from this very department. The present President of the Reform Association of Regina, Mr. J. K. Kerr, has been accustomed to get large patronage from the Indian Department.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). There was nobody else there to supply it.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken. There are two other gentlemen in the same line of business.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). None of them could do it as well as Mr. Kerr.

Mr. DAVIN. Is he a friend of the hon. gentleman ? Anyway, we have never pursued that rule, and I hope my hon. friend will be able to say that he does not believe in it.

Mr. DOBELL. I have only to say that I have no knowledge whatever of the matter that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) speaks of.

Mr. DAVIN. Did my hon. friend not enquire about it ?

Mr. McMULLEN. With regard to the statement made by the hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), I have received letters this session, and I have them now in my possession, from Reformers who live in Regina, complaining that for the last three years they have not received a single order from the Government for supplies. Yet the hon. gentleman has just stated to the House that they administer affairs there so impartially that the orders are given out indiscriminately to Conservatives and Reformers alike. I have the most positive proof that such is not the case. I have in my possession letters asking me to call the department's attention to the manner in which supplies have been got from friends of the Government and nobody else, and I was rather surprised to see the hon. gentleman get up in his place and make the statement he did to-day.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has spoken.

Mr. FOSTER. There is evidently a history in connection with that letter, and I would ask my hon. friend if he has any objection to bringing down the letter which Mr. Gillespie wrote to him asking for the patronage of that band of Indians. Evidently Mr. Gillespie, who is a defeated candidate, has applied to the Prime Minister, asking his influence to get him that trade ; and the Prime Minister, on the ground that those who help him must be helped, has evidently sent a sympathetic letter to Mr. Gillespie which that gentleman has been hawking around among the Indian bands, and the purport of which is that the Prime Minister would be very glad if Mr. Gillespie got the patronage. This is very important, and I rise to ask if the Prime Minister would have any objection to lay the letter of Mr. Gillespie on the Table of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend is not serious when he asks that question.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a very serious matter.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not take it seriously.

Mr. LANGELIER. The hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) says that the course which he supposes has been followed in this case was only seen in France during the time of Napoleon the Third.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the fowl question.

Mr. LANGELIER. I can state that the same course has been followed in Quebec during the whole time the late Government was in power. I can mention a remarkable instance of it. Strict orders were given to the agent of the Department of Marine and Fisheries not to purchase anything except from certain merchants whose names were mentioned to him. On one occasion he wanted a knife of a peculiar kind, costing 40 or 60 cents. Not finding the article in the stores in which he had been ordered to purchase exclusively, he went to the store of a Liberal hardware merchant and purchased the knife. There was so much correspondence on the subject that the agent told me he would have preferred to have paid ten times over for the knife himself. The correspondence lasted several weeks, and the effect of it was that his official head would be cut off if he repeated the experiment.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Department of Justice ..... $1,110 83

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to ask the Solicitor General for an explanation as to the additional amount required for contingencies.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). The $1,000 is required to cover the additional amount rendered necessary by a change which we have adopted in the system of taking cases. An additional amount is required for travelling expenses. I am informed by the Deputy Minister that heretofore the amount for contingencies has been found to be too small.

Salary of an additional county judge in Manitoba ..... $2,000

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. Solicitor General give the House the information which has led him to provide for this appointment? What information has he outside the action of the provincial legislature? Has the hon. gentleman gone into the real necessity of making the appointment?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We have not hitherto proceeded at all on the ground that if a provincial legislature should create an additional judgeship, we, therefore, should provide the salary, but have always gone carefully into the necessity from our own point of view.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I quite appreciate the point made by my hon. friend from Pictou, and I think we have provided against his objection in this way. The attention of the Government was drawn to the fact that it would be necessary to have an additional judge for this district, by the judge who presides over it. Hereafter it will become necessary to amend our own statutes with references to judges in Manitoba, and in the interval opportunity will be afforded to make the necessary inquiries to be in a position to give the information required.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is not able to say at present whether this appointment is really required. Under the circumstances, considering that the House will meet in a very few months again in regular session, I think this item should be allowed to drop.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I have gone to the very best sources of information on this subject. I have gone to the Attorney General of the province, or rather I have received a portion of the information as to the public need for this appointment from the Attorney General, who is charged with the supervision of the administration of justice in the province, and who is presumed to know something of its requirements. But in addition to that, I have also got the statement from the judge presiding over this particular judicial district—and his statement must be presumed to be entirely devoid of any political bias—and he says that the particular district with which he is connected requires that another judge be appointed to assist him in the administration of justice there. So much for the information. The appointment is, of necessity, of a provisional character. I do not say that we cannot proceed to make the appointment after this item has been voted, but it will still remain in the control of the House, because until such time as the statute is amended, the appointment is essentially provisional. Therefore, at any time, until the statute is amended, by dropping this item in the Estimates, the appointment will cease.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am very anxious, as far as I can, to assist the hon. gentleman. But I would again point out that he has hardly established the necessity for this appointment. In the first place, the legislature covers the opinion of the Attorney General in all cases. The Attorney General must have given his opinion to the local House before any provision for an additional judgeship was made. In the opinion of the local legislature, there is a necessity for this, but that has never been considered sufficient to warrant this House in taking supplementary action to provide the ways and means. Then, in regard to the county court judges, I think that most of the judges in this country—and it is not disrespectful to say so—would be very glad to have assistance, and none of them are exceedingly anxious to do all the work they have, if, by any possibility, their duties could be lightened. So that, without disrespect to them, I think that this House, having a request for assistance from either a Superior or county court judge has not, in that alone, sufficient reason for going to additional expense. I have had an experience myself in this House of the difficulties of providing adequate compensation for the judges in the different courts of this country. There is, I sometimes think, an unreasonable prejudice against the salaries that are paid to the judges, and I know that many members on both sides of the House, and I think many members of the profession are of the opinion that in Canada, whether considering the county court judges or the judges of the superior courts, the difficulty is not as to the number of judges, but as to the inadequate salaries paid. And, rather than increase the number of judges, it seems to me the additional money should go to increase the salaries of the judiciary as it exists, making them comparable with the salaries paid in other British dominions to judges or in connection with the administration of justice. But I feel that if I object, as I do most strongly, in view of the statement of the Solicitor General to the appointment of this judge at the present time or upon the information conveyed to the committee, I shall be supported by gentlemen of the legal profession on either side of the House, not only because of the prejudice to which I have referred in regard to the increase of expenditure in connection with the administration of justice generally, but because of the very scanty information we have as to the necessity for this expenditure at all. And in regard to the committee having this matter under control, I think that on reflection the Solicitor General will see that practically this is a permanent appointment. If it be not so, if it be merely an appointment ad hoc, and it is possible is to be swept away by the Crown omitting to come down and ask for the provision necessary, then there is more serious objection than ever to the appointment. Practically, as the hon. gentleman knows, Parliament having voted this money, will proceed to adopt a Bill for uniformity in the matter, as it has done on previous occasions. I think it was the session before last that I myself brought down and was able to press through this House, a Bill to make uniform the legislation and practice, covering just such cases,—where we had been giving from session to session these salaries to the county court judges—to make their position similar to that of the other judges of the land. So, in this case, we are practically making provision here which will saddle the country for all time, as in the case of any other county judge, with the duty of paying that additional judge in the province of Manitoba. The information we ought to have are the facts as to the condition of litigation in that district, the actual amount of work done by the present judge or judges, the amount of arrears and all these particulars have been thoroughly examined in connection with previous appointments. I hope the hon. gentleman will not press this item.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Speaking personally, I quite agree with the hon. gentleman in what he says as to the inadequate remuneration given for the services rendered by our judges. But, dealing with the case in hand, it seems to me I have given the best possible information upon this item. I have given the statement of the gentleman in charge of the administration of justice in the province that this appointment is necessary. He must have made that statement with the sense of the responsibility which attaches to it. Still, it may be considered by some hon. members of this House that it was tainted somewhat with political bias. But we cannot overlook the fact that the judge charged with the administration of justice reports that it is necessary, and a reason is given by him which, I think, must appeal to our sense of right. The increase in business in Winnipeg is the reason that must appeal to us. Then there is the reason arising out of the fact that the jurisdiction of the court has been extended from $200 to $400. At least, these are the reasons upon which I must base the application.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would call attention to the fact that further inquiry is necessary. The hon. gentleman does not know and the committee does not know the judge's reasons. The conclusion at which he arrives is, no doubt, bona fide, but the facts upon which he bases that conclusion are most material. Let us look at some of the facts by which such a matter is to be judged. In Nova Scotia, with a population of 450,000, we have only seven county court judges. In the province of Manitoba, with a population of about 200,000, they have at present four county court judges.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Five.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Five including this one.

An hon. MEMBER. No; five already.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then that makes it all the worse. In the province of New Brunswick there are six county court judges for a population of 320,000. Now, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) will see what will happen. If on the statement of a county court judge the hon. gentleman bases such a vote as this, he will have statements equally fair and equally reasonable—and I think a great deal stronger—from all the other provinces, and his own position will be made most embarrassing. He cannot come to this committee and say because a county court judge in Manitoba and the Attorney General of the province have given him assurance, therefore, this increase must be allowed in connection with the administration of justice, without treating in a similar manner all other similar representations—and the committee will understand as well as I can explain it what the result of that will be. So, in view of the manner in which this business is viewed in the older provinces, and the unfair and apparently unreasonable proportion in regard to the distribution of work over the provinces that this would create, I trust that, as it would only be a matter of a few months, the hon. gentleman will let this item drop and will then come prepared to give us, not the conclusions arrived at by the judge and the Attorney General of Manitoba, but the ground upon which those conclusions were based.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Mr. DAVIN. I hope my hon. friend will act on the suggestion of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), because there is a strong feeling against adding to the burdens that the people bear in this regard, and there is a strong feeling against giving adequate remuneration to the judges, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Pictou. That supplies a reason why we should not unnecessarily add to their number, and thus make it still more difficult to meet what are really just claims. But let me point out to the Solicitor General that in the North-west Territories, with a vast area many times larger than Manitoba, and with a population about half that of Manitoba, we have only five judges. They are very fully employed, but I have heard no complaint that they are overtaxed, as I have heard no complaint that they are overtaxed in Manitoba, and we have only five Supreme Court judges and not one county court judge in the North-west Territories. But there is a reason why the Solicitor General, in my opinion, is bound to let this vote drop. The principal reason he gives to excuse us to ourselves for passing this vote, is that we can take what strikes many of us as an inconvenient course, because by and by we could take a still more inconvenient course. We do not like to pass a vote like this without knowing whether this judge is necessary. The hon. gentleman says we are only passing this vote as a temporary one, and that by and by we can suspend it in mid-air; and although the judge has been receiving salary, he may be dismissed. Constitutionally, we are not justified in voting money for an additional judge without evidence that such an appointment is necessary. The Government can have no idea how strongly impressed the public mind is, partly justly and partly unjustly, with the view that the incidence of the burden they have to bear in consequence of supporting the judiciary, is a great deal too high. My hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has frequently dilated on this subject in this House, and I am surprised that he has not risen to protest against this increase in the burdens, and also against this innovation. I think that when the committee turn their minds more fully to the vote, the feeling will be so strong that the Solicitor General will have to drop it.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not want this item to pass without asking my hon. friend to consider seriously whether he had better press it at the present time. Now, I have had a great deal of experience as Minister of Finance in reference to judges. Year after year there has been from certain influential quarters in this country a very determined pressure for heightening the salaries of the judges. The statement is made, and there is a great deal of truth in it, that in order to get the men you ought to have for the superior courts, you must pay them larger salaries; and although it has been found possible to fill all vacancies on the bench, and although I think the general character of our courts has been high, yet I have for several years acknowledged the strength of that argument. I have paid a good deal of attention to it, and up to the present time it has been impossible to pass a vote through this House providing for raising the judges' salaries. My impression, gained from the study of the question, is that the end might be accomplished in a different way. I honestly believe that we have too many judges in Canada at the present time, and that a considerable reduction in the number might be made without any detriment at all to the administration of justice. I think that the claim made for an appreciation of the judges' salaries could be met in connection with a judicious reorganization of the system of the judiciary which would diminish its numbers, and while appropriating the same amount of money, would add to the salaries of the judges who remain. Now, what have we in this case? I must ask the attention of the committee and of the Minister of Finance to the facts which are developed by the Estimates now before the House. Sir, the Estimates are the largest now that have ever been brought down to this House. They are over two millions more than any preceding Government has brought down out of consolidated revenue fund; and we come to-day to the point where my hon. friend is asking us to vote him for current expenditures on consolidated revenue account, two millions and more of money than he can possibly hope to get out of the whole of the revenue of Canada for this current year. Now, if that be the case, and if we are providing no ways and means for meeting that, we are coming face to face with an expenditure of over two millions more than we can get out of revenue, with the only alternative of borrowing upon the London market to pay our current expenses. I say that no Finance Minister can, with equanimity, come face to face with that state of things, and I think my hon. friend will see that at such a time—and I am not going to dilate any more on that phase of the question now—but at such a time nothing more than an absolutely necessary expenditure should be made. Now, is this absolutely necessary? The Solicitor General is himself authority for saying that it is only provisional. He says in effect that the appointment cannot be made provisionally even until there is more legislation.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, he says in effect that it is provisional.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, I ask my hon. friend what kind of a judge he can get on a provisional tenure. Will you get first-class lawyers, such as ought to be judges, when you say to them: We are going to take you out of your practice, we are going to make you a judge for a little while, and may be Parliament will then cease to vote your salary, and down you will go again! You cannot get any men whom you ought to appoint upon the bench to come in under those circumstances. It is another arrangement like this "ad hoc" business, which does not make for dignity nor the standing of the judiciary of this country. That is a point which I would strongly urge upon my hon. friend. Now, unless there is an absolute necessity for this measure, and none has been made apparent, let us, as men who have the finances of the country to look after, and not as party men at all, seriously ponder over this matter, and let us come to the conclusion that if it is not absolutely necessary, we ought not to vote it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I do not understand the hon. gentleman's argument at all. If he means that he is merely talking for the sake of talking to the country, and talking against time, I can understand what he is doing.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend ought not to say that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not want to say a word at all offensive.

Mr. FOSTER. I gave the committee a serious statement, and I pledge my faith to that statement.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman says he is serious, I will accept his word.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman ought to accept my statement without any such pledge.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I accept it frankly.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman commenced with an unworthy insinuation.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I made no insinuation. I made the statement feeling that the hon. gentleman was not serious.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I think that is the worst insinuation that one sensible man can make against another.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Then I do not understand an insinuation. I say the impression made on my mind was that the hon. gentleman was not serious in pressing this objection.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. I am sorry the hon. gentleman cannot come to any better impression.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman won't allow me to form my own impression. Does he intend to take charge of the consciences and minds of members on both sides of the House, and dictate to them? I have no objection to any criticism he may make. He started off with talking about the feeling that was abroad in the community that the judges are paid too much; that the whole question had to be considered. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) never took that into consideration during the many years he had the power to do so, and if the very moment he takes his seat upon the other side of the House, he makes a declaration that no judicial appointments shall be made until the whole merits of the question are investigated, surely he will perceive why I assume that he was not serious and was poking fun at us. I must believe that, when a gentleman who for eight years had charge of the finances, is suddenly transferred to the other side, announces without hesitation that no appointment ought to be made to the judicial bench until the whole question of the salaries paid to the judges had been revised and carefully considered. The hon. gentleman also ventured the assertion, that it would be found that many of the judges were paid too much. If he were serious and believed in that, how in the name of goodness could he recommend votes to this House year after year, without ever suggesting the desirability for investigation? That is why I thought the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) was poking fun at us, and I told him so frankly. Now let us talk seriously about the proposition before the House. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) knows there is a dual power in this matter, and that the Parliament of Canada is not absolutely and entirely its own master in respect of it. He knows very well, that the local legislatures create the court, and unless the Parliament of Canada is convinced that the creation is unnecessary and improper they are bound, and they always hitherto have felt themselves bound, to appoint the officers to carry out the judicial work which the local legislatures decree ought to be done.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is not correct.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not recollect any instance at the moment, in which it was not done.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is a standing case in Quebec, in connection with a provision there for the appointment of assistant judges, and that has never been acted upon since the Act was passed by the local legislature.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think I remember one case
