I desire to give a few facts regarding the Canadian Pacific railway, inasmuch as the Liberal party at all times refers to it as the colossal and outstanding offence of the Conservative Administration. It is not difficult for me to show otherwise, and I tackle the task gaily. When the Hudson's Bay Company turned its rights to Prince Rupert land over to the Dominion Government, the area now comprising the three provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, was relinquished for the sum of £300,000 sterling, or $1,500,000. Our Liberal friends thought the price was enormous. The territory comprised at least 500,000,000 acres. The Canadian Pacific railway received a fraction of that, one-twentieth about, for the colossal work of building a railway into an unpeopled country. Some years later 6,793,014 acres of the most valuable and best situated sections were exchanged by the company for $1.50 per acre, or a total sum of $10,189,014. The total of it all is enormous, and taken in conjunction with the grant of 31,762,054 acres of land, given to the Canadian Pacific railway alone, shows what a sane and timely proposition the plank of government ownership of railroads really is.

Added to these considerations there is grave danger to the people in having the transportation facilities of the country in the hands of private ownership. We all owe our very existence, directly or indirectly, to transportation. An army of 150,000 men are employed on the railroads of this country. If we accept the usual statistical method of reduction, that number constitutes one out of every eighteen adult males in the country. The volume of freight per capita in the country is 15.3 tons and is steadily increasing, which is an evidence that the wealth production of the nation is progressing, and the aim of the legislators of the land is to see that only a minimum of that wealth is lost in wasteful competition. To do this, an endeavour should be made to scientifically lay out the necessary routes for our future railroad ventures. These should be chosen with a genuine conception as to the future needs of the country, and so as to make it possible to tap the great natural resources of the land.

I understood the right hon. leader of the Opposition to say this afternoon that the roads which had been constructed in this country had tapped great natural resources which had never been dreamt of. I submit that if the roads were constructed on that principle they were constructed in the wrong way. The policy of the Government should be to decide what country is to be tapped, and if proper supervision is exercised the roads will be built in the proper direction so as to tap our natural resources. Furthermore, wise and economic supervision is necessary to reduce the vast number of railway servants, or rather to prevent them assuming any larger proportion to the other industrial factors in our population than at the present. I, therefore, believe that the transportation needs of the country can alone be thoroughly and cheaply met by the observance of the following principles:—

First, by a careful study of the country by surveying experts, as to the best routes for trunk and branch lines. The present method of paralleling and competing lines being utterly wasteful and inadequate to meet the real needs of the country.

Second, by construction by contract, aiming at efficiency to meet all weather conditions in the country, such contracts to be given by tender with rigid regard to the conditions.

In fine, Government ownership of railways has for its object the cheapening of transportation facilities, as I believe I have shown, making the shipment of freight, outgoing and incoming, so cheap that the results will be of greater advantage than the preceding method, and will consist in binding the peoples of East and West more closely together, of harmonizing the seemingly divergent interests, a policy which alone must be the policy of any governing body, the aim of which is to retain this vast land, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, one nation and ultimately one blood.

I have already stated that so far as we have had ownership of railways by the Government the principle has not been attacked, but the objection has been raised that such ownership cannot be successful financially because of the dishonesty of politicians. This brings me to the consideration of the essentials of good government. We all admit that if a government is composed of rascals nothing which they can accomplish will be of any good. Therefore, the great and supreme essential of good government in every part of the world, no matter what country, no matter what the party of the policy concerned may be, is integrity of character on the part of the politicians who are entrusted with the power of government.

This evident truism is one which no one will gainsay in word, but which is unfortunately too frequently gainsaid in action.

Lying underneath every great national question, more important than any secondary question of national policy, there is this ever present query of the greatest moment: Are we sincere, are we honest, do we intend to use the power vested in us by the nation for the benefit of the nation or for the benefit of ourselves; are we more anxious to acquire surreptitiously a little wealth for the sake of the material comfort it brings than to indelibly impress the history of our land by an honest life and a career of unflinchable and undeviating integrity? The question involved is one which we hear frequently. It has become the stock-in-trade of those members of the preaching profession, who desire to awaken the slumbering fires of the nation's morality. We are in danger of losing its point and missing its reality and truth by hearing it only too frequently, but it is impossible for us to consider any great national question without starting out from it as a first premise, that is if we desire any valuable light and seek to arrive at any permanent conclusion.

Whatever may be the conclusions reached in this address later on, I feel that all present will agree with me as to the accuracy of this first.

No honest and sincere man believes that any executive should possess such power as the spoils system implies, and inasmuch as the promise of spoil to the party worker implies any insidious form of corruption, I believe that from the natural acceptance of the first premise, we are forced inevitably to adopt the second, which is this: Under any Government, Liberal or Conservative, the spoils system places a great difficulty in the way of political honesty, and must be reprobated by every patriot, whether Liberal or Unionist. I think that from this second principle no one among my hearers will dissent, and I believe that so far we all have a common basis of belief. I believe it is in accordance with the view of the members of this House that there is no difficulty in making the choice of a board which will be free from political influence. I regret that my hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) has made out such a poor case for himself during this debate by asking continually what we intend to do with the money that is to be voted. If the hon. gentleman went back a little into the history of the railway policy which has been pursued in this country, he would find his answer to the question, which is: We propose to vote money to cover the mistakes of the party then in power, which is represented in part by the Opposition of to-day, of which my hon. friend is a member. I believe that the right hon. the Prime Minister has taken a most important step towards absolute public ownership, and I trust it will be a shorter time than he has given us reason to believe before some plan is worked out to take over all the railways in Canada, so that we in the West may be able to live in closer union with the people of the East as a result of cheaper freight and passenger rates.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada, in 1914, lent the Canadian Northern Railway $45,000,000, and took as security $40,000,000 of the common stock of that company, out of its total capital of $100,000,000. In 1917 the Government purchased the balance of the common stock of the company, namely, $60,000,000, at a price to be fixed by arbitration, the arbitrators being bound not to pay more than $10,000,000. The Government, by thus becoming owners of the whole of the capital stock of the company, should become absolute owners of the property. But a considerable portion of the mileage comprised in the Canadian Northern railway was acquired by that company through the purchase of the stock, and in some cases only the majority of the stock, of other companies, which had built smaller roads, such as the Halifax and Southwestern, the Quebec and Lake St. John and the Great Northern of Canada.

The hon. Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) recognized this situation when he introduced the legislation in 1917 to purchase the balance of the Canadian Northern stock. Speaking of the mileage represented by subsidiary companies—Hansard, page 4807—he said that the stocks of these companies held by the public, in which Quebec people are interested, included:

Canadian Northern Quebec (including Great Northern of Canada and Northern Consolidated Holding Company) for	$2,405,400
Quebec and Lake St. John Railway	521,200

A further examination of this shows:

Quebec and Lake St. John Railway Stock.

The total issue of stock by that company is	$ 4,524,000
Which is held by
MacKenzie and Mann interests	$4,019,140
City of Quebec	220,500
English shareholders	152,800
Quebec people	131,560
	$4,524,000

The city of Quebec originally held $450,000 of this stock, for which it paid par, but surrendered 51 per cent of its holdings in 1900 to London people, so as to help the company to obtain new capital.

Great Northern Railway of Canada.

Total capital seems to be
95,500 shares of $100	$9,550,000
Viz:—
Great Northern Common Stock	$ 913,000
Great Northern Debenture Stock	650,700
Canadian Northern Quebec, Common Stock	5,637,000
Canadian Northern Quebec, Statutory stock	2,349,300
	$9,550,000

The holders are:

Northern Consolidated Holding Company, Toronto	$5,064,600
National Trust Company, Toronto; British Empire Trust Company, London	1,990,000
City of Quebec	200,000
Shareholders in Quebec, Boston, New York and other places	2 295,400
	$9,550,000

But, of the capital of the Northern Consolidated Holding Company, which holds in trust the majority of the above stock, only 45,759 shares are held by the National Trust Company. The paid up capital of the Holding Company being 61,815 shares, there remain 16,056 shares, which are held by people in Quebec, Boston and other places. These 16,056 shares are 25·97 per cent of the capital of the Holding Company, so they should be entitled to 25·97 per cent of its assets. Therefore, 25·97 per cent of the $5,064,600 of stock of the Canadian Northern Quebec, held by the Northern Consolidated Holding Company, are the property of individual shareholders outside of the Toronto interests. This would amount to $1,315,200. If to this we add the stock held by the city of Quebec, $200,000, and that held by individual shareholders not in the Holding Company, $2,295,400, the result is $3,810,600. These figures prove that of the total stock issues of the Great Northern of Canada and the Canadian Northern Quebec, amounting to $9,550,000 of paid up stock, representing the ownership of these roads, no less than $3,810,600, or nearly 40 per cent, is the property of individual shareholders, outside of the Toronto interests. From the foregoing it would seem to be equitable that the city of Quebec and the individual shareholders who own the minority stock of the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway for $504,800, and of the Great Northern of Canada and Canadian Northern Quebec for $3,810,600, making a total of $4,315,400, should share ratably, as stated in their petition, in what the Government may pay or may have paid, for the common stock of the Canadian Northern Railway, of which these roads now form part. Otherwise the minority shareholders should be entitled to a separate accounting by the Government, and share of annual profits for the mileage of the actual sections represented by their stocks, the mileage being about 500 miles.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, a very proper question to ask: The Government having purchased the majority shares of the Canadian Northern, why could not they have purchased the minority share for which the citizens and the city of Quebec subscribed? These shares, as it stated in the petition to which I have just referred, were purchased by private individuals and by the city of Quebec, and instead of acquiring them, the Government limited themselves to acquiring the shares held by Mackenzie and Mann. I submit, therefore, that the Government should give the most careful consideration to the request that has been made on several occasions for the purchase of this minority stock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In answer to the hon. member for Quebec County (Mr. Lavigueur) I would say that the Act passed last session provides for the acquisition, not only of the majority shares, but of the minority shares as well. But it is only the majority shares that are included in the purview of the agreement between the holders of them and the Government and that are now the subject of arbitration. However, the Act provides that the Government may pay to the minority shareholders the same proportion which, under the arbitration, they will be held to pay to the majority shareholders. There are outstanding shares of the Canadian Northern Quebec, the Quebec and Lake St. John, and the Duluth, Winnipeg and Western railways that we did not acquire. The minority shares that the hon. gentleman refers to are minority shares in the Canadian Northern enterprises which are held overseas, and these minority shares can be acquired under the terms of the statute of last session. As to the minority shares outstanding in the smaller lines referred to, there is as yet no provision for their acquirement.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: I know that no provision has been made to purchase the minority shares of these three subsidiary companies, but why should the Government have purchased the majority shares in other provinces, and left unacquired the minority shares of the three companies referred to?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The reason is this: The Canadian Northern Company held among its assets only the majority shares, not the minority shares, in the three companies. Now the $100,000,000 of stock of the Canadian Northern of which we had already acquired $40,000,000, and which we acquired the other $60,000,000 last session, embraces only the property of the Canadian Northern. Consequently what the hon. gentleman refers to, not being the property of the Canadian Northern Railway Company at all, is not within the purview of this legislation. Perhaps later on the Canadian Northern Railway may decide to acquire those outstanding minority shares, but they have never as yet belonged to that company.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Springfield): Only the importance of the transportation question would induce me at this late stage of the session to project myself into the present discussion. On the Budget debate I spoke at considerable length with reference to that question, and I crave the indulgence of the House to-night while I present a few figures, and refer in a brief manner historically to the subject of transportation.

I am sure it must have been gratifying not only to the members of the House, but to the country at large to have the right hon. leader of the House (Sir Robert Borden) make the very important statement which he made this afternoon. I could not help but think that after all it may have been due to the pressure that has been exercised—at least to some extent—and undoubtedly to the uneasiness of the House generally with reference to this great question, as well as to the feeling that exists throughout the country as to the necessity of solving this problem, that the Prime Minister made this speech. Personally, I was extremely gratified, because Canada, in spite of herself, is face to face with the necessity of administering a large system of railroads under public ownership. As I remarked in the House the other day, I thought the courteous and able Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) probably slipped a linguistic cog when he said that Parliament last session as well as the country seemed anxious to take hold of the Canadian Northern. I was under the impression, and still am of the opinion, that that statement on the hon. gentleman's part does not represent the real condition of affairs. I do not think the House and the country have been anxious to take over the Canadian Northern, or to take over any system of railways, in view of the conditions under which that taking over has to be done. The Prime Minister told us this afternoon that had Parliament not come to the rescue the road would have been forced into liquidation, and he expatiated on the injury that would have resulted to the public credit if this road had been allowed to go into liquidation and into the hands of a receiver. The Prime Minister's speech must have inspired the House with confidence in his earnestness and good intentions. But I say, with all due deference to him and to the late Parliament—if Parliament was responsible, but I prefer to put the blame on the shoulders of the late and old governments; I do not think the policy pursued with regard to the Canadian Northern was the right policy to adopt in the case of that railroad or of any other in a similar situation—it is not because of the action of Parliament or of the country that these roads find themselves in difficulties. The Canadian Northern for the last twenty or twenty-five years have been applying to this Parliament and to the Provincial Legislatures for aid to build mileage, and the reason they usually urge for that was that the people were clamouring for this accommodation. In my judgment, whenever a squeak was uttered by a settler for assistance, or for railway accommodation, the big noise and the real pressure came from the proprietors of this railroad. They were the ones that were anxious to build these lines of railway; they were the ones that besieged and badgered the federal and provincial Governments. They have been knocking at the doors of the Provincial Legislatures and of the Dominion Parliament for almost two decades and a half, and, in my judgment, the responsibility for the present situation rests with them.

If as the result of their manipulations, or of their failure to make a success of the road, they find themselves in great difficulties, find that they are unable to meet their obligations, on whom should the blame rest? Not upon this Parliament, not upon the provincial parliaments, not upon the people of Canada, but upon the railroad manipulators themselves. Then should they not have been obliged to take the consequences of their own folly? As a publicist, I have grown pretty tired of that old cry: "We must guard the credit of Canada." When the Byron Walkers and the other great "financiers," and the exploiters get into trouble they hold up their hands in alarm and say: "Lest the credit of Canada shall suffer, in Heaven's name, come to our rescue." And we, the people of Canada have been coming to their rescue for the last thirty or forty years. I am sure that as the House listened this afternoon to the words of the Prime Minister when he told of the campaign of raids that had been made on the public treasury by these exploiters, we must have almost blushed when we recalled that year after year these exploiters came and raided, and raided, and raided the public treasury. Are WE, therefore, to blame if, as a result of their own folly, they find that they have reached the end of their financial tether? Rather in my judgment would it be better, and I believe it to be the judgment of all thoughtful Canadians who have studied this question, that an example should be made of them, and that they should be obliged to take the consequences of their own folly. Why should this Parliament and this country be obliged to come to the rescue on every possible occasion to bolster up, say, the Bank of Commerce, and to help this or the other corporation to escape from the results of their own improvidence and folly? No. I say that this Parliament and this Government should stand solid and say: "Gentlemen, you have committed this folly yourselves, you alone are responsible, therefore you must take the consequences." Canada can take care of its own credit. Canada is a great nation, with marvellous resources, and we can afford to let one of these corporations go into liquidation, take the consequences of its folly, and by so doing we will put an end to a repetition and to all that kind of thing. We were under no responsibility, moral or legal, to take over the Canadian Northern Railway under the conditions that we have acquired it. Members of this Parliament—and we have not been very long in session—will recall debate after debate on the question as to the liabilities of the Canadian Northern railway. One day we are told that the liabilities—and it is spoken under your breath—are $300,000,000. A few days later we are told that the liabilities of this corporation have risen to $350,000,000, and, tell it not in Gath, we were supposed to stand aghast when we were informed still later that they were $400,000,000. And now, does the Prime Minister tell us from his seat in this House this afternoon that the liabilities are $300,000,000, $350,000,000, $400,000,000? No, they have risen in one jump to the astounding figure of $438,000,000. The right hon. leader of the House tells us that we are to get this system of railroads at a price that will not be more than $44,000 per mile on the ten thousand miles which constitute the system. I can tell the Prime Minister that the system which the people of Manitoba constructed some twenty years ago, and which some years ago was acquired by the Canadian Northern, cost only $9,000 per mile to construct. Yet we are asked to rejoice over the great bargain that we are going to make in acquiring this system at a capitalization not greater than $44,000 per mile. The Prime Minister gave us figures to indicate that, while the liability was $438,264,377.67, the assets we would receive would amount to $528,427,000. Now, where that argument does not hold water in my judgment is here: If we take over the Canadian Northern system—and we have to take it over—the baby, as I said the other day, has been put on our lap to nurse; we were not the authors of the baby; we did not bring it into existence, yet it is going to sit squalling on our lap for the rest of time, and we must take care of it for all time to come. If we take over this system, as we must, what is the situation? Owing to the folly, the criminal folly of the exploiters who have manipulated railroads in this country for the last twenty-five or thirty years, we find that we have to take over this and other systems with an approximate mileage probably anywhere from a thousand to three thousand miles, which will not be of any practical use to the country at the present time, and which may not be of any practical use for a long time to come, if ever. Take the road built through the Mountains by the Canadian Northern. I suppose some hon. members are here who went over that railroad on that celebrated excursion two years ago. They must have been convinced of the folly it was to build through the Yellowhead Pass a railroad to parallel the Grand Trunk Pacific; at this stage of the country's development. And then to go down to Kamloops, down the valley of the Thompson river and parallel the Canadian Pacific system to the coast. In my judgment some of those duplications will not for a long time, earn enough to pay for the stationery to set down the quantity of axle grease that will be required on them. Then you have the other railroads built around the north shore of Lake Superior, which, of course, are for the present entirely superfluous, and in the case of the Canadian Northern railway, will not be a productive portion of the road, for, perhaps, years to come. Years ago, when my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition was in office and proposed the construction of the Transcontinental railway, I was very strongly opposed to that, and took a constituency and opposed his then Minister of the Interior, Hon.—now Sir,—Clifford Sifton, because I felt that that road was entirely premature,—and I hope to come back to that point later on. I then believed in the policy of my right hon. friend the leader of the present Government (Sir Robert Borden). He then announced, and took that position before the country, that what was required was not another road around Lake Superior or another road through the mountains, but that we should double-track the Canadian Pacific railway, take it over and establish it as a railroad highway, giving all railroads running rights over that portion of the road. You see the prudence of a proposition of that kind is that it would have eliminated the vast expenditure necessary to construct this Transcontinental railway, and while on this point let me call the attention of the House to the fact that the Transcontinental railway which we were assured by the Government of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) would only cost the country $13,000,000, has already cost $200,000,000. And while the people had nothing whatever to do with bringing this child into existence, we also were obliged to have it dumped upon our lap, and there it will squall for many decades. So that we have these systems unloaded upon the country, regardless of our desires and of our necessities. That is where the tragedy of our transportation problem comes in. It would be idle for me to enlarge upon this matter, although perhaps I may a little later on in my remarks refer to the responsibilities of different parties in the country for the unenviable position in which we find ourselves. I listened to a member of the Opposition the other day rail at this Government and at the former Government for the vast mistakes that had been made with regard to our transportation system. I could not help thinking that if hon. gentlemen opposite who took that view would look up the records of the Federal Parliament and of the provincial legislatures, they would find that in the matter of the responsibility for pouring money into the lap of these railroad exploiters and for establishing the present deplorable condition "honours" have been carried off by the other side. I am not specially referring to this present "other side" because there is not a very important "other side" here; most of the Liberal party, as I said in a former speech, are indentified with this side. But it is not worth while indulging in recriminations against any particular set of politicians, because politicians—or "statesmen" if you will—on both sides have been equally responsible for the pouring of subsidies and subventions into the maw of exploiting corporations.

I should like to refer to one or two points made by the Prime Minister and by the leader of the Opposition. I will not say that the Prime Minister actually defended the arbitration proceedings now going on in Toronto, but he referred to them in a manner that led the House to conclude that he approved of them. At least he shares responsibility with the other side for the Act of the last Parliament under which the reference was made. I referred in a former speech to that arbitration. It did seem to me the height of folly. I could not conceive how public men, representatives of the people, with anything like a knowledge of the circumstances which have surrounded the building up of our transportation system, could agree—for I am sure the country does not agree—to a reference to arbitration of the question as to what amount should be paid to the Canadian Northern people for the crime that they, wittingly or unwittingly, have perpetrated against this country. They have unloaded upon us a system with a liability of $438,000,000—and that is far more than the system cost. They have the audacity—I do not know whether, Mr. Chairman, by consulting the dictionary you could give me a stronger word; if so, I should like to use it—to propose that the people of Canada shall contribute to them $10,000,000 as a reward for the outrage which they have perpetrated against the people. Perhaps I hold unusually strong views on this question, but I certainly hold that view, emphatically and unchangeably. If the decision is that they get $10,000,000 for the crime that they have perpetrated against the people, that amount will be added to the $438,000,000, making it $448,000,000; and we have only the financial figures of the Canadian Northern Railway up to last September; if you add interest and everything that may have developed since, God knows where we will be as to the actual liability when we meet in the next session of Parliament.

I said the other day that we were face to face with an appalling mess; but there it is; we have to face it. We have no option whatever in the matter. The babe is on our lap and we must nurse it. We must proceed in the most businesslike way in order to solve this difficulty. Here is the only way in which we can make any progress and success. We have the Canadian Northern system. We must take the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Grand Trunk. The leader of the Opposition warned us this afternoon that the old Grand Trunk was so loaded with obligations that we had better be very careful what we do with it. But the Grand Trunk is sponsor for the Grand Trunk Pacific, and we must take that child, because the Grand Trunk Railway cannot itself hold the babe much longer. I suggest that we make this experiment: never mind the credit of Canada and the financiers of Canada—the dozen or so alleged financial big-wigs who live in Toronto and Montreal; let them attend to their own business for a while and let the people who perpetrated this folly on the public take the consequence of their own actions. Let the Grand Trunk Pacific go into liquidation, and if the Grand Trunk cannot hold the babe let us take mighty good care that the Grand Trunk does not unload it on us at anything like the expense with which the Canadian Northern has been unloaded on us or with anything like the consequences. I reiterate this point about the credit of Canada. Personally, I have grown tired of hearing that oft-reiterated cry, and I think the people who do the paying—not who receive the dividends, mind you—are pretty well tired of it also. We want to settle this thing once and for all, We cannot borrow very much money in the markets of the Old Country now, anyway, because the war is on. We can do only what we are permitted to do by the British Government, and, perhaps, by the United States Government; so we need not fear anything about the credit of Canada suffering. Let the credit of Canada slide just for once, and let us have one showdown. Is it always to be a case of heads the exporters win and tails the people lose?

I do not know whether the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) is perfectly satisfied. He asked me the other day to use my best endeavours to get the Government to adopt the recommendation of the Drayton-Acworth Commission that our national system of railways be operated by a commission independent of the Government, free from political interference and responsible only to Parliament, in order that patronage and political control or interference might be absolutely eliminated. I said that I would use my best endeavour in the matter, and I have done so. I am not saying that because of anything I may have done to induce the Prime Minister to make the reasonably satisfactory announcement which he did this afternoon regarding the mode of management that shall be adopted. He came pretty nearly meeting my view. I hope he came as near to meeting the view of the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). He did not say that the recommendations of the Drayton-Acworth report with regard to management would be adopted to the letter, but he came pretty close to it. He promised in unqualified terms that the Government would provide for a management and administration of that system that would be entirely free from political control or manipulation. I believe the Prime Minister is a man of his word, and I know this Parliament will hold him to strict enforcement of that statement. We must have no political management of that railway, no such management as has disgraced the administration of the Intercolonial Railway system ever since Confederation. I sometimes worry about my good friend the able Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell). I have a good deal of faith in him. During my election campaign in the West I made strong use of his personality; I spoke about the stern old covenanter that would never strike his colours to the wrong, and yet, when I come down here, I find—and I hope I am not violating any private confidence—that he is not quite sound on this question of railroad management. I excuse him on the ground that he has lived in the Maritime Provinces probably all his lifetime.

Mr. CARVELL: I just want to put my hon. friend right. More than twenty times during the last fifteen years I have condemned the management of the Intercolonial railway. It is the most unbusinesslike proposition that I have ever known in my life. If the hon. member will look up the pages of Hansard, he will find I have gone further than he will in regard to the management of the road in the last twenty-five years.

Mr. RICHARDSON: The hon. gentleman quite misunderstood me if he thought for an instant that I was impugning his position on the question. If he had given me time, I would have excited his delight that I had made the reference. I was only pointing out that while he had lived in Sodom and Gomorrah so long, he had, like Lot seen so much of it that he had become disgusted with the system and felt that it could never be improved under public ownership.

Mr. CARVELL: No, he has not.

Mr. RICHARDSON: The hon. gentleman says that the Intercolonial Railway has been very badly managed, and he has not scrupled to denounce that management. Of course, it has been badly managed. You could not get anything worse on this side of Hades—if that is a parliamentary term. The whole trouble is this: The Intercolonial Railway was built as a condition of Confederation. When these scattered provinces were formed into Confederation in 1867, one of the conditions was that a railroad system should be constructed at public expense through the Maritime Provinces, and that it should be linked up with the rest of Canada, at least with Ontario and Quebec. In order to do that, it was necessary to construct the railway along the coast, touching a village here and there, and this, that and the other town, and it was built, not as a commercial enterprise, but as a condition of Confederation. Then it remained pretty largely, with an occasional inter-regnum when an effort for improvement was made, in the hands of politicians and under the control of a political department. Need I invite this House to look at the spectacle that was enacted in the last Parliament when the Chief Whip from Nova Scotia threatened to resign because the management, in its best judgment, appointed somebody to a position on that road, and the Whip had not been consulted, and because party considerations had not been paramount, as indeed they have been paramount all these years? Let him resign. We have had, as the Minister of Public Works says, and as everybody who has studied the question knows, about the worst possible mismanagement of the Intercolonial that could be conceived, but it has all been due to political manipulation and control, and that is how my good friend the Minister of Public Works got the idea that public ownership is a failure. The reason why the Intercolonial railway has not been a success is that it has not been managed by business men.

Mr. CARVELL: It has been a failure so far.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Yes, but let me point this out to the House and to the country that, during most of these years, the freight of the people of the Maritime Provinces has been carried over the Intercolonial railway at about one-third of the rates that have been charged by privately-owned railroads in this Dominion. It is well to remember that when we consider the deficits of the Intercolonial. Consequently the people of the Maritime Provinces have reaped enormous benefits from this viciously and villainously managed railway, but we hope to take it entirely out of the hands of the politicians. The Prime Minister this afternoon gave his solemn pledge to this Parliament and this country, when he intimated that the Intercolonial railway would be linked up with the Canadian Northern Railway system: that it would be placed under the management of efficient men, and that political control or manipulation would be absolutely eliminated from it. I believe the Minister of Public Works will agree with me that we can make a success of the Intercolonial in that way, and only in that way can we make a success of it. The only regret I had, although it is not serious, because I hope that will be the policy adopted, is that the Prime Minister did not state definitely that the Drayton-Acworth report with regard to the management and administration of the State system of railways would be adopted. If those recommendations were adopted, the country would be absolutely sure that no political manipulation could creep into the management of the Government railway system. If hon. members have studied the Australasian railway system, they will know that the system of public ownership of railroads prevails almost entirely in the Australasian colonies. Those railroads are managed by commissioners appointed by the parliaments, not by the governments, of the different states, and who are responsible only to the parliaments; they can be removed only for cause or by impeachment, just as we remove judges in Canada at the present time. The railway systems there have been made a splendid success. There has not been that absurd, stupid, criminal competition between exploiters in the construction of railroads in the Australasian colonies that we have witnessed and suffered from in Canada, but the governments of those colonies have done exactly what the Canadian people and the Canadian Government and Parliament should have done. They have built their trunk lines and they build branches wherever the branches are required, in the interest of the settlement of the country.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The railways of the different states have different gauges, and you have to change passenger trains at the boundary lines of the different states.

[Mr. Richardson.]

Mr. RICHARDSON:: Just the same as you have different gauges of members in this Parliament, they will cavil at pretty nearly anything you say. But the gauges really do not make any difference. Let them standardize their gauges, whether they be large or small, if they choose. I am not referring to gauges here; I am referring to the administration of the system. There is always somebody who can pick a little hole in anything that any one says. Even the great Master, the great law-giver of Nazareth, had holes picked in his utterances, so I do not expect to scape absolutely scot-free in this discussion. I say the system of managing the roads there has proved a fine success, and if it has proved a success in these Australasian colonies, which, of course, are British, why should it not prove an equal success in this great Dominion, which is also British? I dislike very much to mention the name of Germany in this British-Canadian House of Parliament, and yet I am going to state that the railroads in Germany are managed entirely by the State. Do the members of this House know that three-fourths of the people of Germany have travelled for years and years on the German system of railways at a quarter of a cent per mile, while in Canada we pay on an average of three cents per mile, and with the recent addition to rates it may even exceed that? France has public ownership of railroads; so has Austria-Hungary, and so has Italy, and yet we are told even by so good a friend of mine as the Minister of Public Works—he did not actually say it, but I am afraid he sometimes thinks it—that we in Canada have not sufficient inherent honesty in ourselves to manage a Government-owned system of railroads. I would suppose that on the average we are as honest as the people of other countries, although a great railroad man in this country once told me that the Canadian people were more dishonest than the Chinese; he may have been right or wrong, but at all events if we put sufficient guards around ourselves, take away from the Government the power of interfering with the commission, and if we absolutely prevent political manipulation and control, we ought to succeed and surely we can get railway experts like Mr. Shaughnessy—Lord Shaughnessy, I should have said, but as the mover of a resolution to abolish all titles in this country I may be forgiven for making that slip—D. B. Hanna, Grant Hall, Sir George Bury, and other excellent railway operators now engaged with our big railway systems to work for the country. Surely, if we protect their positions for them, pay them satisfactory salaries, and give them such assurances that they will be satisfied we shall not interfere with them, we can get them to serve us just as they serve the privately-owned roads. I have talked to some of these men as well as many other competent railway operators and I know they would just as readily—some of them have said they would more readily—serve the people of Canada than a private corporation, because most of these men as, indeed, most of our Canadian people, have at heart the idea of service. The average man would like to render service to his country but these men in the past could not be induced to serve publicly-owned roads so long as they were subject to political manipulation and control, and I do not blame them. But if we adopt the recommendations of the Drayton-Acworth report and put our publicly-owned system under the control of a commission of the best available men, and protect that commission from political control, I am satisfied we could get the best railroad men in the Dominion of Canada to serve us; and well it would be if we could engage such men, because we are bound to embark upon this system, it may not be of our own choosing, but we are nevertheless up against the necessity of embarking on a great publicly-owned system of railways.

In order to make such a system anything like a success, as the Prime Minister said this afternoon, and as I have already told the House, we shall have to take over certain roads. We have to remember that owing to the absurd competition among these railroad exploiters, subsidy hunters, and manipulators, railroads have been built throughout the country that are entirely unnecessary. Many of you who have travelled over the Canadian Pacific, the Canadian Northern, and the Grand Trunk Pacific in the West know that these roads parallel each other at close range for scores, if not hundreds of miles. Now, if we are to take this great combination of systems over—and we must do so—we must co-ordinate all these roads. We must eliminate every unnecessary mile in the whole system. We must eliminate the mileage that parallels some other road, and in the interests of the country we must operate only that mileage that is necessary for serving the people of this country. If we did that, we could probably reduce the mileage of these publicly-owned roads by twenty-five, or thirty, or thirty-five per cent. Then we would be face to face with this proposition. The average man may say, "You must charge rates sufficient to produce interest on the entire capitalization." Are we to charge rates on the Canadian Northern sufficient to produce interest on $528,000,000? Not so, because we are not going to be able to utilize all that system. We must eliminate at least thirty or thirty-five per cent of the mileage of the roads we take over. Then what must be done? We must strike from the national capitalization at one sweep the entire capital representing the mileage we eliminate. There is nothing else for it, because in no other way could we make the system pay. If we left the capitalization at the enormous figure which the exploiters would present to us as the cost of the roads, we could never pay the operating and maintenance expenses and proper interest on the capital.

Mr. CARVELL: How are we to eliminate any portion of the $438,000,000 represented by securities?

Mr. RICHARDSON: I can tell my hon. friend in one word—just wipe it off your book.

Mr. CARVELL: That is a pretty easy way of paying your debts.

Mr. RICHARDSON: My hon. friend knows that the people of Canada share to some extent in the responsibility for this folly because they supported Governments and parties who did the wrong. It is the people of Canada through their representatives in the provincial legislatures and in this House who have enabled these exploiters to commit this folly. Then let the people of Canada take their loss, as they will be obliged to take their loss. We shall have to wipe off $100,000,000, or $200,000,000, or $250,000,000 from the books, and that is where the iniquity of this bonusing system through all these years to exploiters comes in. But there is only one way to do it. It will just represent that much loss to the people of Canada, and it serves them right because they have gone on conniving at this thing. They have been warned many times against it, but they have gone on just the same, and the people of Canada will just have to take their loss great as it may be. Then we shall have a publicly-owned system of railroads in this country with a vast mileage capitalized at what the system would have cost to construct under sane conditions. I know of no other way of solving this great question. When you have reduced the capitalization to what it would have been if the system had been constructed under sane and rational conditions, then and then only can you establish a rate that will be just to the people of this country. I believe that if we co-ordinated these railroads, if we eliminated waste and duplicate mileage, and reduced the capital to proper proportions, we could establish both freight and passenger rates on this nationally-owned system that would produce operating expenses and maintenance charges, as well as a good return on the capital that was actually required to produce the system; and in my judgment we could have a very much lower rate than we have at the present time.

My right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) contrasted the cost of the Canadian Northern Railway system, which he placed at $44,000 per mile, with the cost of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental. The cost of the Intercolonial railway, he said, was $65,000 a mile, the cost of the Grand Trunk Pacific was at the rate of $100,000 a mile, and the cost of the Transcontinental railway was at the rate of $90,000 a mile. If you add interest up to the present time on the latter it would increase that cost to $110,000 a mile. In connection with the Transcontinental, I would like to put a question to the members of this committee. Do hon. members recall that, after the completion of the Transcontinental railway, the late Government appointed a commission to inquire into the construction of that road? Do hon. members recall that that commission found and reported that there was $40,000,000 of graft money in connection with the construction of the Transcontinental railway? No wonder the cost of the Transcontinental was run up to $90,000 a mile and $110,000 a mile if you add interest. There were many crimes perpetrated in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental. Hon. gentlemen know something of the town of Transcona. If hon. gentlemen go to Transcona they will see something that will almost sicken them of the methods that were adopted in connection with the manipulation of the townsite terminals and shops there. The town of Transcona is in my riding. I have not time to tell the story, but there are at that place great shops built by the Government led by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, and I understand that those great shops are not being properly operated at the present time. The tragedy of the town of Transcona is one of the iniquities in connection with railway construction in this country. That is a long story and must be told some other day; I have not time to tell it to-night. In connection with the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific, look at the hotels that were built, all at the public expense. It is our money that was used in this folly; it is our money that was used for the construction of these hotels. There is a great hotel in Edmonton and another in Winnipeg. I saw a report the other day that so great was the loss in the operation of these hotels that the Government contemplate closing them both down.

This country has been on a dreadful spree for the last twenty-five years or more in regard to its railway policy, an orgy that some day will have to be written up. We have had booms in this country and people have been too busy to pay special attention to the great transportation question. As a result these dreadful follies have been committed, and the country is face to face with the consequences and will be obliged to deal with the situation in the sternest fashion. I have observed in this House, within the last few weeks, a feeling of uneasiness on the part of a great many hon. members in regard to the transportation question, and I believe that feeling only reflects the uneasiness that exists among the people. No wonder hon. gentlemen have risen in their places day after day and have wanted to know when the Government is going to take control of the Canadian Northern Railway system. No wonder we are anxious to see this road placed in the hands of an independent board of expert railway men, in whose integrity and ability we may have implicit faith. No wonder the country is anxious to see this great system placed under the control of such a board. I believe the people are beginning to waken up, and to waken up in a lively manner, to the real consequences of the folly that we have been indulging in for the last twenty-five years. I believe it is because the country is beginning to waken up that the Government is moving, is ready to acquiesce in, and to comply with, the wishes of the House and the country. It is because of that feeling in the country that I wish to raise my voice and to bring my influence to bear, to induce the Government to get to this question as rapidly as possible and to find a solution for it. That is the excuse I have for rising in this House as frequently as I have done in connection with this railway situation.

One word in regard to the position which my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) took in his address this afternoon. He instituted a comparison between the Dominion of Canada and the great Republic to the South. He said he did not believe that three transcontinental lines were too many for Canada because the people of the United States had seven transcontinental lines. I could not help thinking that there is no parallel between these two cases. There is this point of difference, however, that the seven transcontinental lines that stretch across the American continent south of the 49th parallel were built almost entirely, except in one or two cases in which some land assistance was given in the early history of the country, at the expense of the owners—the stockholders and the bondholders. That is what has happened down there. In addition to that they have a population that enables them to support these seven transcontinental railway lines. But, Mr. Chairman, the three transcontinental railway lines that cross this North American continent in Canada were built by the people of Canada. The people of the Dominion have paid dollar for dollar for every foot of railway that has been constructed within the bounds of the country and yet we do not own these railways. We do not need three transcontinental railway lines. I could go on by the hour telling you about the grass and shrubs growing along the line of the Transcontinental and of various portions of that road which are not even being operated. We have tossed $200,000,000 of the people's money into this Transcontinental railway and of what use is it to us at the present time? It has been built a long way ahead of the time when, if ever, it will be required. I believe that if the policy enunciated by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister years ago of contenting ourselves with only one transcontinental railway around the north shore of Lake Superior, to be taken over by the people and left open to all lines to run their trains over, had been adopted we would not have had an expenditure of $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 to face and grapple with at the present critical juncture of the country's history. We would then have had but one Transcontinental road, and what an enormous saving would have been effected in the operation of only one great system. We do not want a lot of railroad corporations. Let me tell hon. members this—and I have it from some of the best railway authorities that ever entered this country—that notwithstanding all that is said to the politicians, all that is said to members of Parliament, and all that is said to the people of this country about competition, you get no competition, absolutely none. The railroad companies of this country, and of this continent—in fact, the railroads of all countries—are a solid combination. Their officials meet from time to time and fix the rates absolutely between themselves. If one company's line is forty miles longer than another company's line between two given points, those two companies adopt the same tariff, so that there never is competition, and there never will be competition. So that the thing to-day is to get as many railroads as you can under one management, and if you have them under one management you save so much in staff, so much in salaries, and so much in administration, that it makes an enormous contribution to the success of a railway.

Just a word while it is in my mind with regard to the Canadian Pacific railway. I notice that my hon. friend the member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) advocated that the Canadian Pacific should be taken over, and there are some people who say, "Let us take all the railroads over." In my judgment that would be the greatest mistake that the Canadian people could make in connection with the present solution of the issue. The Canadian Pacific railway is an entity in itself. It is a well-managed corporation—no keener or more efficient management can be found on this continent. But the Government system, embracing, as it will embrace, the Canadian Northern, the Intercolonial, the Prince Edward Island railways, the Transcontinental, and the Grand Trunk Pacific railways, and the old Grand Trunk railway also, will touch practically all important points in the Dominion. What special object would there be in acquiring the Canadian Pacific also? We do not want two lines of railroad touching at the same points; let the Canadian Pacific go on just as it is. But if we take and co-ordinate this great Government system of railroads, and if we adopt the advice that I have offered with regard to capitalization, I want to assure the House and the country that we shall be able to adopt rates on the Government system that will compel the Canadian Pacific to reduce its present rates, and we shall be doing an inconceiveable service to the people of Canada. Let me illustrate what I mean: We have had in the city of Winnipeg for the last twenty years or more, a system of electric light and electric power, owned, by the way, by the same interests that control the Canadian Northern. The water power was developed on the Winnipeg river, and transmitted some sixty or seventy miles into Winnipeg. Six or seven years ago—and it is worth while that every member should know these facts,—the people of Winnipeg, feeling, as they had a right to feel, that the rates they were paying for power and light were much too high, decided to develop a water power and an electric light system of their own. They procured from the Dominion Government what is known as the Point du Bois Falls on the Winnipeg river, and they developed that system at a cost of six or seven million dollars. Now, mark you, they cut the rates to one-third of what the people were paying at that time to the Winnipeg Electric Railway interests. Not only that, but they have had a yearly surplus of from $80,000 to $85,000, after providing for sinking fund and all proper expenses of operation for the last two or three years. They have saved, and are saving, the consumers of light and power in the city of Winnipeg $3,000,000 a year, so that in the last six or seven years the total saving to the people of that city has been over $18,000,000, because the other company was obliged to cut its rates and bring them down to the level of the rates charged by the public owned system. In other words, three times the cost of the entire enterprise has been saved to the citizens of Winnipeg. Now, if we adopt the plan proposed by the right hon. Prime Minister, and co-ordinate all these railroads, if we eliminate the useless mileage and wipe out the unnecessary and criminal waste which the public should not have to pay for, I believe we can duplicate the experience of the people of Winnipeg and largely reduce the rates that are in force at the present time. And the beauty of the proposition is that the great Canadian Pacific Railway, splendid road that it is, will be obliged to meet our rates, and then see what a saving there will be to the people.

Mr. McCREA: Will the hon. gentleman tell us what the rates in Winnipeg are for light?

Mr. RICHARDSON: I have those rates in my desk in my room. I will send them to my hon. friend in the morning, if he desires them. They are so low as to surprise hon. members.

Now I want to imitate—if the House is interested, and I take it from the attention I have received up to the present time that it is interested—in a small way the example of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and give a brief history of the railways of this country, and in doing so to review briefly in the first case the history of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Sir John Willison, the able Toronto editor, declared in a publication, not so very long ago, that "the Canadian Pacific Railway bargain was the most insane bargain ever entered into by a free people." I just give that by way of preface. I have heard, in going about this country in the performance of my newspaper duties and as a public man, many citizens of Canada, who ought to have better sense, say, "What a debt of gratitude the people of Canada owe to the railroad corporations." I want before I conclude to-night to present such a case that no one in this country will ever repeat a statement that is so full of folly as that statement is. I do not suppose that the average member recalls the early history of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, nor do I suppose that the memory of the average member retains the circumstances of the great Canadian Pacific Railway scandal which startled the country in the early seventies of last century as a result of which $300,000 was transferred from the original syndicate, or those representing it, to the pockets of politicians and used corruptly. But we need not go into that to-night.

When the Government of Sir John Macdonald fell, I think in 1872 or 1873, the Government of Alexander Mackenzie succeeded, and the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, with his Cabinet, undertook to construct as a public work a line across the continent to link up the province of British Columbia, which was a condition of the union of that province with the Dominion. Sometimes I think it would have been a great thing for Canada if the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie—that prime old Liberal, who loved his country, and who, as he told us in a letter, written by himself, had to sleep on his arms almost day and night in order to keep the exploiters at bay—had lived and continued in office. I believe then we would never have had this colossal and criminal folly to deal with of which I am talking to-night. The Government of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, during its regime of four or five years, continued with the construction of the Canadian Pacific as a publicly-owned railway, and they spent $35,000,000 in building certain sections of that road. When the Government fell, and Sir John Macdonald returned to power, he and his party reverted to the idea of a privately owned railway, and they handed over—and these facts may not be known to all members of this House—to the Canadian Pacific syndicate this $35,000,000 of completed railroad as a present. They gave further to that syndicate $25,000,000 in cash and 25,000,000 acres of land. I want to preface these remarks by saying that I am not here to criticise the Canadian Pacific railway, nor do I feel like criticising the bargain that was then made. The country was new; the Northwest was not opened up, and there was a big excuse for making a prodigal bargain. In fact, the public men of that day scarcely understood the nature of the bargain they were making. With that preface, I think we shall be able, perhaps, to consider this matter in a calmer and more judicial frame of mind. I want to say here, lest I forget it later on, that, with all that experience before us, with the statement of perhaps the leading publicist of this country that it was the most insane bargain ever entered into by a free people, I never could comprehend succeeding Governments continuing to reproduce this great folly in a more accentuated manner, making the conditions under which new roads were being constructed very much worse than those pertaining to the construction of the Canadian Pacific. They gave to the Canadian Pacific completed road to the value of $35,000,000 cash $25,000,0000 and 25,000,000 acres of land, on which the company had realized over $100,000,000, and still have remaining 11,000,000 acres which they estimate at a value considerably over another $100,000,000.

This land, as you know, was in a new unsettled country. But the Canadian Pacific syndicate was a live corporation. What do you suppose they did? They induced the Government in 1881-2 to set aside large tracts in the best areas of the fertile West from which they might select their land, and they subsequently did select their lands from those areas. So that, $35,000,000 of completed road, $25,000,000 in cash and 25,000,000 acres of land from which they have realized $100,000,000 and on which they expect to realize $100,000,000 more, amount to $260,000,000, which is more than the original estimate of the cost of construction of this line.

Mr. CURRIE: What was the land worth at the time the contract was made?

Mr. RICHARDSON: Never mind what it was worth; I am telling you what they got out of it. I have not condemned the bargain made; there was a great excuse for it at the time. But I want to explode this absurd notion held by many that the Canadian people owe a debt of gratitude to the railroad companies.

Then we gave exemption of duties on the materials required in the construction of that road, which was a concession of enormous value at the time. In addition we gave from the public treasury large loans whenever the company asked for them. The time was when it was not the Canadian Northern which was rapping at the doors of Parliament; it was the Canadian Pacific, and this Parliament always came to the rescue of the Canadian Pacific when it required assistance. Here is something the people of this country perhaps never think of, or have no realization of. We gave the Canadian Pacific exemption from taxation upon all its possessions until Gabriel blows his trumpet. Based on the rate of taxation which exists in the United States, this concession amounts to the appalling approximate sum of $500,000,000 every thirty years. Just think of it. Perhaps you do not recollect all these things, Mr. Chairman, but the exemption from taxation on every dollar's worth that this company owns is worth to them $500,000,000 approximately every thirty years if you take the average rate of taxation prevailing in the United States.

I want to deal with a matter which I am sure will interest the House. When a company receives a grant in the old country it is a statutory grant, and a grant by statute is just as good as if the patents were issued for the land. When the contract was made in 1881, a clause was placed in it that:

> Notwithstanding any Act of any legislature or any municipality all the possessions of the company—

Now mark this.

> —all the possessions of the company, its roadbed, rolling stock, capital stock, station houses and station grounds, shall be exempt from taxation forever

Forever! That is a long time, Mr. Chairman. Now mark what follows:

> And the land grant shall be exempt from taxation for twenty years from the grant thereof from the Crown.

It was the understanding of Parliament at the time that while the appurtenances and possessions of the company would be exempt forever, the land grant would only be exempt from taxation for twenty years from the grant thereof from the Crown. I have explained to the House that when the bargain was ratified, the Government set aside the best agricultural areas throughout the Northwest, from which the company might select their land grant. But the company did not take out their patents for this land grant at once. I was in Parliament the year before the expiration of this twenty years, and I had learned that the company had not taken out their patents, and had further learned that they proposed to contend that their exemption period should begin with the issue of their patents and not with the statutory grant from the Crown. Learning that, I introduced a Bill in the House of Commons some twenty years ago to interpret that clause. I read from speeches of hon. gentlemen who were in the House of Commons at the time the contract was ratified to show that it was the understanding of Parliament that the exemption of taxation on the land grant should only last for twenty years from the time of the ratification of the contract. I read from the remarks of Sir Hector Langevin, Minister of Public Works in Sir John A. Macdonald's Government. He said:

> Therefore in a very short time, the parish or municipality will be settled, and the exemption of taxation on these lands will not be felt, because the land remaining to be sold will remain there only until the settlement can be extended in that direction. So that after the twenty years what will remain exempted from taxation will be just the 100 feet in width on the length of the municipality.

It is clear that Sir Hector Langevin understood that the land grant would be taxable in twenty years and that the exemption from taxation would be only the 100 feet of roadbed.

Hon. Edward Blake, the greatest tribune of the people who ever sat in this House, spoke as follows:

> They have perpetual exemption—

He was referring to the Canadian Pacific.

> —from taxation on their enormous property, a monstrous provision, in my opinion; and this monstrosity is not to last merely twenty years, which is the period of bondage in other respects but it is to last forever.

Sir John A. Macdonald, in connection with the ratification of this contract, expressed the view that the Canadian Pacific, owing to the vast subsidies given to it by the people, would be able to carry freight at a very much lower rate—I think he said one-third—than that charged by privately-owned railroads. At that time I introduced an Act to interpret that land-tax exemption clause. I pointed out that the ink was scarcely dry on that contract giving the company a statutory grant of 25,000,000 acres of land when the company borrowed $25,000,000 in land grant bonds, and that the grant was as available for all the purposes of financing of the company as it ever was. But the twenty years expired, and when I introduced an Act to interpret that clause I was met, forsooth, with the most strenuous opposition on the part of leading politicians of this House. I regret to say that the present leader of the Opposition—I think at that time, certainly on one occasion—characterized me as a Socialist for daring to introduce an Act interpreting a clause in a charter and interfering with vested rights. I was prompted during my speech in the House by the late Hon. J. G. Haggart, member for Lanark, former Minister of Railways in Sir John A. Macdonald's Government, and I was able to state to the House that he had introduced an Act for the purpose of interpreting a clause in the Canadian Pacific charter, when it suited the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway company that that interpretation should be made. It happened that they wanted certain remission of duties on material that they had imported, and the Government of the day introduced an Act interpreting a clause in their charter and enabling them to make off with a large sum of money. But when I, in my humble capacity as representative of the people, asked that a clause in this charter should be interpreted in order that the interests of the public should be protected, I was denounced as a Socialist. The late Sir Charles Tupper, who was leading the Opposition, also denounced me in the grandiloquent language so characteristic of him, so that I met with opposition on all sides and was voted down. It was then that I was discovered to be a pestilent fellow, a danger to vested interests, and a menace to the country. As a matter of fact, I suppose that I was a menace to the big interests. But—I hope the House will forgive me this personal word—after the next election I was the only member of the entire 213 against whom a petition to unseat was pressed. All the other protests were sawed off and a conspiracy to drive me from public life was formed by the corrupt manipulators of the two parties who put their heads together to commit the crime. I had run as an independent candidate in the 1900 election. The Conservatives did not put up a candidate against me and supported me pretty largely. I served one session in that parliament, the protest could not be brought to trial before the House met. At that session I opposed a Bill—a Mackenzie and Mann Bill which was backed by the Conservatives—because I thought it was my duty to do so. That act of mine was used for my political undoing at that time. The so-called Liberals —that is not Liberalism at all—put up the money, and the Conservative manipulators got the evidence to prove that teams had been hired in my election. Although my entire election expenses were sworn to as being less than $600 in a riding 125 miles long by 100 miles wide, I was unseated. forsooth, on the ground of bribery and corruption. While the judges who sat on that petition were considering their verdict, a bribe was flaunted before them by the "kept" press of that day in the shape of an offer of a seat on the Supreme Court bench of this country for one, and the position of Chief Justice of Manitoba for the other.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Hon. gentlemen need not worry about my reference to the judiciary. Both the judges are dead, and if they are looking up to-night from where they are they will know the truth of what I say. The sequel is that I was unseated, and they both received the jobs suggested in the "kept" press. This is the first time I have ever made any public statement with regard to this matter. It should be a warning to any young member of this House who may ever be tempted to stand up for the right against the power of party so often exercised in the past for evil purposes. But I think the time is past when a conspiracy of that kind can be repeated and carried out successfully. I believe that a better day has dawned in this country. More independence prevails. On this side of the House we have men who belong to different schools of thought, but they speak their minds on public questions with freedom and frankness. What is a free Parliament if it is not a body which gives to those who sit within it the right to represent the interests of their constituents? But under this system of ours we have witnessed the spectacle for the last forty or fifty years of a solid phalanx sitting to the right of the Speaker—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Nesbitt): My hon. friend is very interesting on the railway question; and I would suggest to him that he adhere to it.

Mr. RICHARDSON: The point which I was making was in connection with the railway question. We have on this side of the House a splendid galaxy of men who are united in seeing that the Government does the best it can with this railway question. I was leading up to that point, but, perhaps, having been a partisan in the old days yourself, Mr. Chairman, you may be inclined to a little extent to overlook these things. I call the attention of the committee to the fact that the member for North Simcoe has stolen my glass of water. The Minister of Public Works says that my wind is all right; notwithstanding that reminds me of a story. On one occasion the late Hon. George Brown was making a speech in Peterborough. It was very warm; and he was drinking a large quantity of water and was waving his arms about and gesticulating wildly, when an Irishman in the audience said: "Mr. Chairman, this is the first time that I ever saw a wind-mill run by water."

To conclude that point of my argument about the taxation Bill that I was unable to get through the House—I mean my Bill to interpret the tax exemption clause—I think I got six or seven votes to ninety-nine, so that you see the representatives or the "mis-representatives" of the people at that time were pretty solidly lined up with the corporations. We, however, got from the Government of the day a pledge that they would issue the patents to the railroad companies for their lands, and that they would refer the question to the courts for interpretation as to whether the exemption should date from the ratification of the contracts or from the issue of the patents. I pointed out at that time upon the floor of the House that that was a dangerous thing to do; that if the reference were made to the courts of this clause the courts would take cognizance only of the actual wording of the clause, and the last act I performed in Parliament before my undoing by virtue of the conspiracy referred to, was to move a resolution that, when the reference was made to the courts, the courts should be requested to take cognizance of the understanding of Parliament when the contract was ratified. I think that was a reasonable proposition. My resolution was, however, voted down on that occasion, and the reference was made to the courts—with what result? That the courts did exactly as I predicted they would do; they rendered a decision that the exemption from taxation should bear date from the issue of the patents. Therefore, the Canadian Pacific railway had another twenty years' exemption from taxation on this enormous land grant. Do hon. members realize what this exemption from taxation has meant and means to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company? The other night

I made an estimate that that taxation would be worth, on an average, $2,000,000 a year, and as it runs, or will run, for forty years, if you compound the interest the exemption in that connection alone would probably amount to $100,000,000. About $50,000,000 at least could have been saved to the people of this country if my advice had been taken on that occasion. There is in the Canadian Pacific Railway charter a clause that is known as the ten per cent clause. Let me read it :

> The Consolidated Railway Act of 1879, respecting tolls, is hereby extended so that such reduction may be to such an extent that such tolls when reduced shall not produce less than ten per cent per annum profit on the capital actually expended in the construction of the railway.

When I was in Parliament in 1896, 1897 and 1898 I was urged by some gentleman in Winnipeg to bring up this question of the ten per cent clause. The company at that time was charging excessive rates in the Northwest. I introduced a resolution that the Government should appoint a commission to find out how much money the country put into the Canadian Pacific and how much money the Canadian Pacific capitalists put in of their own. I made at that time on the floor of the House this argument, which, I believe, is a legitimate one, that in allowing them a profit of ten per cent, we should not allow them ten per cent profit on the tens of millions of dollars that the people put in, but that we should allow them profits only on the money they put in themselves. I need hardly tell the House—it goes without saying—that my resolution was voted down on that occasion by a parliament that seemed to be more considerate of corporations than of public interests. Let me, before I pass from the consideration of the Canadian Pacific, refer very briefly to the position which Lord Shaughnessy, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, took in the manifesto which he issued the other day to the people of Canada, and which was first presented at the annual meeting of that railway company. He said in that statement that those who held the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway had paid on an average of $112 for every $100 of stock. When I read that statement, my memory carried me back to the first issue of stock of $20,000,000 which was distributed during the construction of the road amongst members of the syndicate and their associates at twenty-five per cent of its par value. This twenty million dollars worth of stock realized five million dollars, and this latter amount was set aside and was paid back to the purchasers of the stock in dividends at the rate of six per cent per annum par value, so that in four years they got back their own money and they owned the stock besides. That is pretty good financing. In 1883, also before the road was completed, there was another issue of thirty million dollars' worth of stock distributed amongst the members of the syndicate, shareholders and friends, at fifty cents on the dollar. Therefore, out of the first fifty million dollars of stock the company realized only twenty million dollars in capital, cash. This stock was also a paying investment for the shareholders, because even before the road was built, they received their six per cent per annum par value, and they soon received back more than they had paid for the stock, and they owned the stock besides. If hon. members have any desire to make fuller investigation and to check the figures I have given, they might look up the sessional papers of the day.

In addition to the aid granted to the Canadian Pacific railway, which I have already stated, over thirty million dollars were contributed to subsidiary companies. Provincial Governments granted to subsidiary companies of the Canadian Pacific railway twelve million dollars; British Columbia contributed 6,389,000 acres of land, which has netted the company an enormous amount of money, and they still own over 11,000,000 acres. They have realized from the sale of lands and townsites nearly $124,000,000, exclusive of the lands which the company still holds, and which cannot be worth less than $115,000,000 or $120,000,000. That makes a total public assistance to the company of $228,500,000. Then if you add $400,000,000 of the value of the taxation exemption, exclusive of land tax exemption for the thirty-five years the company has been in existence, it will bring the public aid up to the appalling sum of $628,000,000. If you add to that $125,000,000 for land, townsites, etc., already unsold, you have the surprising approximate figure of $753,000,000, which almost approaches the valuation that Lord Shaughnessy, in his recent manifesto, places upon the assets of the company to-day; which manifesto was, I think, issued for the purpose of serving notice on the Canadian people that if they nationalize the Canadian Pacific railway they must pay an enormous figure for it. I think the House will agree with me that the Canadian people are not under any very profound debt of gratitude, as some would have us think, to the great Canadian Pacific Railway corporation.

I do not want to go into the figures of the aid given by the country to the Canadian Northern railway. We have had those figures almost ad nauseam. The Prime Minister, this afternoon, in his able resumé, gave to the House most comprehensive figures. I have already, earlier in the evening, dealt with that aspect of affairs.

Let us now take up the question of the Grand Trunk railway. It was in the early days when the old Grand Trunk railway was established in this country, and the union between politics and the railway corporations does not seem to have been as close or as direct as it developed later on. The total subsidies to the old Grand Trunk railway were thirteen million dollars. Many years ago the Government loaned this company fifteen million dollars which were never repaid, and this makes a total of twenty-eight million dollars. If you add these two sums and figure out compound interest upon them for the long period, the result will be a huge sum.

I promised earlier in the evening to make some reference to the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific, or Transcontinental line. The construction of this enterprise is perhaps the most insane upon which the Canadian people ever embarked. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, coupled with others in and out of the House who surrounded him in 1903, are responsible for this monstrosity. If time permitted, I should like to deal fully with the history of this enterprise, but it is not of such distant date that the country is not perhaps pretty well seized of the facts. In launching the project in Parliament, the right hon. leader of the Opposition, who was then Prime Minister, spoke as follows:

> It is not of to-morrow, but of this day, of this hour and of this minute. Heaven grant that it be not already too late; Heaven grant that whilst we tarry and dispute, the trade of Canada is not deviated to other channels.

Let me recall to the House, the reply which the late Hon. Mr. Blair, who at that time was Minister of Railways in the Laurier Cabinet, made to the right hon. gentleman. Here are Mr. Blair's words:

> What does the right honourable gentleman mean when he says: "The flood of tide is upon us that leads us on to fortune; if we let it pass, it may never recur again"? What does the right hon. gentleman mean when he says: "If we let it pass, the voyage of our National life, bright as it is to-day, will be bound in shallows?" What does the right hon. gentleman mean when he says: "We cannot wait, because time does not wait?" I think, Mr. Speaker, and I say it with all respect to my right hon. friend, that it would have been as correct if not so poetic, for him to have said:— "We cannot wait, because Senator Cox cannot wait."

I shall not go further into the history of the inception of this enterprise. I would recommend hon. members to read up Hansard of that interesting period and learn what was said on the floor of the House about this preposterous proposition.

I want to repeat the point I made earlier in my remarks, that I do not believe anything is to be gained by indulging in recriminations with regard to the responsibility of this or that party for the condition of affairs we find at the present time. As I have already said, all parties are almost equally responsible, and the best thing we can do is to get behind the right hon. leader of the Government in endeavouring to evolve a satisfactory national state-owned system out of the roads that must in a very short time come to us, and some have already come. I believe that that object can be accomplished very much more easily by a Union Government than I believe that the country is seized of the seriousness of the situation, and I believe seriousness of the situation, and I believe the Government also notwithstanding the stress of work due to its multitudinous and exacting duties also realizes how serious the situation is. I believe the speech which the right hon. Prime Minister delivered this afternoon must have convinced the country, as it certainly convinced members of this House, that he at least is fully seized of the importance of the whole question, and that he and his Government propose to solve that problem in the near future in a manner that I trust will redound to the interest and credit of the country. I should like to see the Canadian state-owned system of railways placed at as early a date as possible in the hands of such a management as was foreshadowed by the Prime Minister this afternoon and as recommended in the Drayton-Acworth report. I believe the importance of the question necessitates the earliest possible solution. Speaking for myself, I am very much gratified to find that the Government as represented here this afternoon in the very able deliverance by the Prime Minister is fully alive to the importance of the whole question and has resolved to apply the solution at the earliest possible date.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: At this late hour and at a time when we are all anxious to conclude the work of the session and get away as soon as possible, I would hesitate to rise and say anything on this question but for the fact that I feel, like the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, that this is one of the burning questions before the people of this country, and one to which we should all at least endeavour to direct some attention in order that the best possible solution may be found of the railway problem in this country. If I were to follow the remarks of my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson) I would be compelled to disagree with many of the arguments he advanced and with many of the conclusions he reached. But it is not my purpose to deal with his remarks. I wish to direct my attention to what the actual condition is with regard to the whole railway situation in this country and see if I can offer any suggestions that will assist in finding a possible solution. In passing, I might say that I entirely disagree with the gloomy picture my hon. friend from Springfield drew of the future of this country when he left it to be understood that in his opinion the development of this country would never be such as to make necessary the railways we now have projected from one end of the country to the other. I heartily agree with what was said in that connection by the right hon. leader of the Opposition this afternoon, because I believe the time will come, and come very shortly, when three transcontinental lines, properly equipped and operated, will be required to handle the traffic of this country. These roads may have been projected a little too soon, but let me point out this: In the United States they have a population of four hundred people to every mile of railway, whereas in Canada, according to the last census, we have only one hundred and eighty-five people to each mile of railway. Now, in order to bring our population, sparse as it is, up to the same standard in relation to railway mileage as prevails in the United States, we need to increase our poulation just up to sixteen million people, and I do not think it is a very far cry to the day when we shall have sixteen million people in this country. I am assuming for the moment that our railway mileage should be proportionate to our population, but when we remember that our population is spread over an area as large as the United States, I think the argument will not hold water that population proportionate to railway mileage is a fair way of determining what our mileage should be. I would point out to the hon. member for Springfield that whereas in 1896 the gross earnings of all the railways in Canada serving the territory now being served by the Canadian Pacific, the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental was $38,000,000. in 1916, or just twenty years later, they had increased to $160,130,786. I would also like to remind my hon. friend that I had the privilege of running a locomotive on one of these transcontinental railways during the year when the first 1,000,000 bushels of wheat was hauled over the Canadian Pacific, then the only transcontinental railway in existence from the head of the lakes to the seaboard. In the first year when they hauled that 1,000,000 bushels of wheat it was an event in the history of this country. During this last winter 1,000,000 bushels of wheat was moved out of Fort William in one single day. If we had had the facilities to carry the traffic there would have been two or three million bushels of wheat being moved daily at some periods during the winter just passed. I have read a statement by a gentleman, who takes a position very similar to that of the hon. member for Springfield in regard to this question, that there have been wheat and flour stored in the West for years because there have not been railway facilities to get it out. I do not believe that is so, but it is just an evidence of the extreme statements that men will make when they undertake to bolster up a position that requires an extreme statement to support it.

I would like to refer to the position of the railways in this country with regard to what they have cost and what they must earn. The value of a railway property can only be estimated, providing it has been projected with a reasonable degree of common sense and properly built, on the basis of its mileage cost. We have in Canada approximately 40,000 miles of railway and in connection with these railways the Canadian people have paid $956,085,581, exclusive of the Intercolonial railway. The Prime Minister gave us some figures with regard to the Intercolonial this afternoon and placed the total investment in that road at $137,184,199.62. My own opinion is that it would be difficult to find a group of chartered accountants in the country who could determine what the Intercolonial has cost this country, if you figured it out on the same basis as that on which any private institution would figure it out. The question is: What have we got for the expenditure of this money? Let us take the Intercolonial, the Grand Trunk, the Canadian Pacific, the Transcontinental, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern, dealing with each separately.

The Canadian Pacific is the most complete, most efficient and the most economically operated railway system in the world. I wonder whether my hon. friend from Springfield knows that it is part of the system of railways that gives the cheapest transportation that is given anywhere in the civilized world? The Australian railways were referred to as an example of the success that may be made in 11 p.m. the operation of publicly owned railways, and the question was asked if they could do that in Australia why could not we do it in Canada? It costs the people of Australia two cents per ton mile for every ton of freight that is moved while it costs the people of Canada three-quarters of a cent per ton mile for every ton of freight that is moved. That shows how successful they are in the operation of state railways in Australia. If you refer to the Drayton-Acworth report you will see that that is the system of railways that is held up by all those who advocate public ownership of railways as the best and most economically operated system of railroads in the world.

Mr. MURPHY: Does the rate which is just quoted apply only to the Canadian Pacific or is it a general rate in Canada?

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: A general rate in Canada. It averages three-quarters of a cent per ton mile as against the Australian rate of two cents per ton mile and that is the lowest rate on any Government-owned railway that we have any record of. I am not going to refer to Germany in this connection. You cannot compare anything that is done in central or in eastern Europe with what is being done in Canada. We are not going to pay our railway employees, or any other class of men, the wages they pay their men in Germany and that, in the last analaysis, is how we will have to determine what the cost of these respective services are.

The question that confronts us now is how best to get out of a situation in which we find ourselves as a result of our own mistakes or the mistakes of the people of Canada. In what I am going to say I want to emphasize what the hon. member for Springfield has said. I am not going to attribute to any particular group of people responsibility for the position we are in. The only thing for us to do is to try and find some way of getting out of that position. In order to determine what that position actually is, it is necessary that we should know what the capitalization of our railways is and how much money it is going to cost to bring them up to a state of one hundred per cent efficiency. I will take the Grand Trunk railway first, because, after all, the Grand Trunk with its subsidiaries presents the most difficult railway problem with which we have to deal. The Grand Trunk railway proper, with a mileage of 3,331 miles, has a total outstanding liability of $424,169,310. According to the figures given by their own experts and engineers, they require $51,000,000 at the present time for betterments and equipment, making a total of $475,169,310 or equal to $140,000 per mile of the total mileage of the railway. The Grand Trunk Pacific, with a mileage of 1,964 miles cost, according to the figures given by the Drayton-Acworth report, $197,129,387. The total cash and bond guarantees, which constitute a direct liability which the Canadian people must carry whether they like it or not, amount to $127,939,888. The Grand Trunk Railway Company proper is responsible for bond guarantees and cash that has been put into this road amounting to $69,189,499. The Grand Trunk Railway Company are also a party to the bond guarantees for which the Canadian people are responsible. In addition to that amount of $197,129,387 there were advances made to the amount of $7,500,000 making the total cost of the Grand Trunk Pacific $204,629,387. The estimated amount required to complete the road is $25,000,000, so that for the road itself with its present equipment we have a cost of $112,000 per mile.

In this connection I am going to give an estimate of what is required to bring the Transcontinental railway, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern railways up to standard.

I take the Canadian Pacific as the standard of what is required by way of rolling stock and all the facilities necessary to operate a railway. What is required to purchase equipment that will bring the Grand Trunk Pacific railway up to standard is $21,358,500, a total of $250,987,887, or approximately $128,000 per mile. It may also be noted that in addition to the above the Grand Trunk railway of Canada is contingently liable to the Government of Canada on bond guarantees totalling $54,900,481. The National Transcontinental, another subsidiary of the Grand Trunk railway, has cost, when all the outstanding liabilities are covered, approximately $200,000,000, equal to $110,000 per mile on a total mileage of 1,811 miles. To furnish the locomotives and equipment necessary to bring the road up to standard will require $26,259,500, making a total of $226,259,500, or $125,500 per mile. To recapitulate: With regard to the Grand Trunk and its subsidiaries we find that the Grand Trunk's present liability for the 3,331 miles of railway is $475,169,310; for the Grand Trunk Pacific it is $250,967,887; for the National Transcontinental, $226,259,500, or a grand total of $952,416,697 for a total of 7,104 miles, equal to $134,000 per mile on the total mileage, presenting, in my opinion, a situation that it will be utterly impossible for the Grand Trunk or any privately owned railway to meet, because the railway can never earn, in competition with railways that have been built as they should have been built, a sufficient amount of money to pay the cost of operating, and keep up the equipment, and pay the interest on that enormous overhead charge.

Now the question may be asked, what remedy can be suggested for the Grand Trunk railway problem? The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) suggested writing down the liability, and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) interjected a remark that would lead me at least to conclude that he, for one, did not think that was possible. But if we are going to deal with the railways of this country as a business proposition—whether we operate them as publicly owned, or privately owned, institutions—there is no other way out of it. If they were in the hands of a receiver, that is the first thing that it would be necessary to do—to write down the overhead liability and bring the railways down to a business basis. Now I have made a valuation of the Grand Trunk railway, and its subsidiaries, on the basis of $60,000 per mile for the Grand Trunk railway, and $55,000 per mile for the National Transcontinental and Grand Trunk Pacific railway, and you will notice that in doing that I have put the figures very high—higher than some hon. members who have spoken here in connection with this subject would lead us to conclude these railways could possibly be worth. But in putting those figures I have included what, in my judgment—after consultation with the most practical men I could get in touch with—will be a sufficient amount of money to bring these railways up to standard, both with respect to roadbed and also equipment. I have placed a capitalization of $60,000 per mile on the Grand Trunk proper, and $55,000 per mile on the other lines, and it simply works out like this: On the basis of $60,000 per mile the Grand Trunk would stand a capitalization of $199,660,000. The National Transcontinental at $55,000 per mile would stand a capitalization of $99,550,000. The Grand Trunk Pacific at $55,000 per mile would stand a capitalization of $100,370,000, a total for the group of $405,785,000. Meaning that we have to write off from the Grand Trunk proper, all their present outstanding liabilities. And in that connection let me say that I am in hearty accord with the statement of the leader of the Opposition this afternoon, that if we ever take over the Grand Trunk railway it will be necessary to scrutinize those outstanding liabilities, or we will find ourselves loaded up with something that we cannot possibly take care of, or something on which the railway itself can never earn an income. The situation narrows itself down to this: to put that group of railways on a business basis we must write off from the old Grand Trunk $266,480,000, from the National Transcontinental $70,000 per mile, or $127,656,000, and from the Grand Trunk Pacific $144,572,000, or $538,708,500 all told. Now leaving out the old Grand Trunk entirely, I would just like to ask one question: Why should we not write off from the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, the sums that I have indicated, being approximately $70,000 a mile. There is not a man in this House, I do not believe that there is a man in the country, who has given the question any thought, but will agree with me when I say that we deliberately threw that money away and we knew that we were doing so, and the Grand Trunk railway of Canada, the parent system, was contingently liable with the Canadian people. I would put it this way: The Canadian people are primarily responsible for the waste on what is called the Transcontinental from Winnipeg east, with the Grand Trunk shareholders contingently liable. For the Grand Trunk Pacific railway from Winnipeg to Prince Rupert the Grand Trunk railway is primarily, liable with the Canadian people contingently liable, because they were each supposed to be a check on the other, and when the president of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, who was, I understand, an official of the Grand Trunk railway, entered into an orgy—and it was nothing more or less when grafting contractors were permitted, or enabled, to steal $70,000 per mile on the whole mileage, for in reality that is what it amounted to—the Grand Trunk should be compelled to suffer with the Canadian people. And while the Canadian people were primarily responsible for the National Transcontinental railway, and they must bear the burden, the Grand Trunk was responsible for the Grand Trunk Pacific. Let me repeat also that if that group of railways are ever to be operated as a business proposition the capitalization has got to be written down in order to put them on the same basis as other railways that are operated in competition with them.

Now, let me refer for a moment to the Canadian Northern about which so much has been said. I have no brief for any man who is connected with the Canadian Northern, I am not quite sure that I have ever seen a number of the people to whom reference is frequently being made in connection with the construction of this railway, but I am going to say this about it, and in doing so I challenge contradiction: You cannot find anywhere on the continent of America, another railway with the same mileage, and the same equipment, that was built for the same amount of money as the Canadian Northern. Whether there was grafting in connection with this railway system or not, I do not know. Whether Mackenzie and Mann made a profit of it, I am equally ignorant, but I do know that you can trace the record of all the railways on the North American continent and you cannot find one—including the Canadian Pacific—that has been built and equipped as cheaply as the Canadian Northern. And if the Canadian people take over, as they have already taken over, the Canadian Northern, and put its management in the hands of a group of practical men, they have a railroad property as valuable as any on the American continent based on its mileage cost. I do not know all about the Canadian Northern, but I do know what many people have said with regard to it. I can quote from speeches made in this House by the Minister of Railways and Canals in former days, in which it was stated that the Canadian Northern had the most ideal group of freight and traffic gathering railways in the Canadian West. They have not such a complete group in the East, but they could project their mileage if it became necessary on the same basis. Let me repeat again: after the road has been taken over and put into a state of 100 per cent efficiency, the Canadian people will have one of the most valuable railroad properties on the American continent based on its mileage cost. I am going to give the figures. I am taking the outstanding liabilities at $400,000,000. It has been stated here this evening that they are $438,000,000, but I am putting them at $400,000,000. The Drayton-Acworth report states that $40,000,000 is required for equipment, cars, locomotives, etc. That report also states that betterments, including terminals, will require $30,000,000. I have gone into this very carefully, as I said a few moments ago, with men who, I believe, know something about the railway situation, and I have determined that the Drayton-Acworth report did not provide nearly a sufficient amount of money to complete and equip the Canadian Northern and to bring it up to efficiency. This is what I have figured would be required additional to bring the system up to standard and to provide the necessary terminals and connections, namely, $65,000,000, instead of $30,000,000 estimated in the report. The estimated additional amount for rolling stock is $85,000,000, instead of $40,000,000, making a total of $550,000,000. If you wish you can add to that a total of $50,000,000 for contingencies which have not been taken care of, and you have the railway then at $60,000 per mile. I will give the distribution of the figures as they have been worked out as to what is necessary to bring the present mileage up to standard:

Railway fastenings and railway ties on the basis of difference in weight of rails now in use and those required to bring the whole mileage up to standard	$ 14,605,000 00
Ballasting, ditching, etc	15,000,000 00
Roundhouses, coaling plants intermediate terminal facilities, way stations, trackmens' houses and general maintenance of way equipment	13,395,000 00
Main terminal facilities, and interchange connections	22,000,000 00
Locomotives of all classes	30,000,000 00
Cars of all classes	55,000,000 00
Total	$150,000,000 00

As I say, you can add to that $50,000,000 for contingencies which have not been taken into account. These figures have been very carefully gone over by railway experts, men who have worked them out in comparison with the equipment standard and roadbed of the Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. CURRIE: Are those figures based on present-day cost?

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: These are present-day prices. Another point in connection with this is that, in addition to the railway, the people of Canada, have in the Canadian Northern, a considerable amount of valuable assets. They have grain elevators at the head of the lakes, capable of taking care of 10,000,000 bushels; they have six lake steamers plying on the Great Lakes; there are the Canadian Northern Telegraph and the Great Northwestern Telegraph companies with 1,500 offices; and a variety of subsidiary assets which go with a railway of that character. Let me repeat again: you can investigate conditions as you will, and if you can find another railway on the American continent brought up to that standard at a cost of $60,000 a mile, you will have found something that I have been unable to get any information of. My honourable friend from Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) this evening referred to the Canadian Pacific as having cost $46,000 per mile, and he used one set of figures given out by the President of the Canadian Pacific in the last annual statement; but he entirely overlooked in the same statement what was given as the total cost of the road. The cost of the Canadian Pacific, including $131,000,000 of earnings put back into betterments and equipment, was $818,000,000, or $61,000 per mile for the whole system just as it is. The capital stands at $61,000 per mile for the system.

Mr. CURRIE: Do these figures provide for double-tracking the Canadian Northern?

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: No, the figures I have given will not double-track the Canadian Northern, but will put that road and its equipment on a basis equal to what the Canadian Pacific is on. And it will cost the Canadian Pacific $10,000,000 to get its grades between Port Arthur and Sudbury equal to those of the Canadian Northern between the same points. I know what I am talking about, because I have been over both lines; and I know what the Canadian Pacific is figuring on in connection with that line.

A great deal has been said with regard to what the Canadian people have put into the Canadian Pacific and what the Canadian Pacific shareholders have put into it. If we were to judge by the remarks of the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) we would come to the conclusion that the Canadian people had built the Canadian Pacific railway and presented the shareholders with many hundreds of millions of dollars in addition. You can investigate the figures from top to bottom if you will, and you will find that what the Canadian Pacific has received by way of cash subsidies and cash from their land grant, and the completed road that was given to them when they started, at a value of about $30,000,000, is $200,000,000 or $14,000 per mile on the total mileage of the road. The old Grand Trunk, which is supposed not to have received anything from the Canadian people, received more than $8,000 per mile as a cash bonus on the total mileage of their railway. As a matter of fact, the assistance granted to all of the Canadian railways is as follows:

	Per mile.
Grand Trunk	$ 8,400
Canadian Pacific	14,814
Canadian Northern	31,729
Grand Trunk Pacific	65,000
National Transcontinental	110,000

I would like to give the House some comparison between the earning capacity of the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific; because it is worth considering when you have to stop and determine what the Grand Trunk is really doing for itself. The Grand Trunk has been earning for the last accounting period for which we can get any report, $10,983 on every mile of its road.

Mr. CURRIE: What date?

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: 1916. The Canadian Pacific is earning $9,593 per mile on every mile. The balance in favour of the Grand Trunk is $1,390 per mile. The Grand Trunk earnings on the Canadian Pacific railway mileage basis would have been reduced by $4,630,090. The Canadian Pacific earnings on the Grand Trunk mileage basis would have been increased by $18,070,000. However, that is beside the point; the question we have to consider is how are we going to deal with this combination of railways and get an efficient transportation system economically operated with reasonable freight rates. Three proposals have been submitted, one of which is the nationalizing of all Canadian railways. I am opposed in principle to the nationalization of railways, because I do not believe that you can do with the biggest things in the country what you cannot do with the little things. While there is no other way out of it; while we have to make the best of the situation, the solution of the whole problem if it were possible, would be our getting back to the position we were in fifteen years ago and putting the railways into the hands of privately-owned companies under proper regulations.

It has also been suggested—in fact the Drayton-Acworth report contains this recommendation—that all the roads be turned over to one large private company. I have prepared a group of figures to show what would be necessary both in the case of the present owners continuing as they are and in the case of a new corporation being formed to take over the entire group of railways. If the Grand Trunk undertook to continue and the sum of $100,000,000 were written off the National Transcontinental to cover the moneys squandered in the enterprise, they would still have to assume a present liability of $852,416,697 and in addition would have to find at least $100,000,000 in cash to put the system in a position to make even partial operation a possibility. They would continue to be handicapped by lack of traffic-gathering branches throughout the entire Canadian West. If the Canadian Northern railway undertook to carry their obligations, they would assume a liability of $400,000,000 and have to find in addition at least $150,000,000 in cash to make the operation of their system possible. If the two were combined in one group or company, as is suggested in the Drayton-Acworth report, the amount of $1,252,416,697 would have to be found, and, eliminating all necessary obligations, at least $150,000,000 to $175,000,000 would have to be furnished for equipment and betterments to put the roads in a position to make their successful operation a possibility. In other words, the total liabilities of the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the National Transcontinental and the Canadian Northern, assuming that the Canadian people wrote off $100,000,000 for what has been wasted in the Transcontinental, would be $1,252,416,697.

An hon. MEMBER: How would you write it off?

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: You cannot do anything else but write it off. You have given it away and you cannot get it back.

Mr. McMASTER: You will have to pay interest on it.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: We will have to pay interest on it, but we cannot make the railroads earn that interest. If any one can devise a means by which the National Transcontinental as it stands to-day can earn the interest on $225,000,000, with 1,811 miles of railway in competition and with an overhead of charge of $61,000 per mile, he will find the solution for the whole problem.

Mr. McMASTER: If the Canadian people were the creditors of this amount, they could write it off; but the Canadian people are the debtors; therefore they cannot write it off.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: The Canadian people borrowed a certain amount of money and put it into the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific. For all practical purposes, they might as well have thrown it into lake Superior. When you come down to operate these railways as a business proposition, the liabilities which I have mentioned will be simply charged to the national debt and the people will pay interest on it, not because they put it into a railway, but because they permitted a group of grafters to get away with it. We are trying to get our railways down to a point where they can be operated as a business proposition, and we have to bring the capitalization down to a mileage basis in proportion to that of competing lines and to what the actual cost of the railway should be. It is not fair to ask the people who are paying freight and passenger rates on Canadian railways to pay interest on money that we deliberately threw away. Take, for instance, the case of the Grand Trunk proper, with liabilities amounting to $475,000,000. The Drayton-Acworth report, page 12, gives as the amount of securities outstanding against the 3,331 miles of the Grand Trunk as $424,169,310, and their experts say that they must have $51,000,000 in order to bring the equipment of the road up to standard. It is my opinion that $51,000,000 will not furnish the necessary equipment.

Mr. CURRIE: Page LXIV of the Drayton-Acworth report gives a statement of stock and share capital which the hon. gentleman has apparently overlooked. The grand total is about $240,000,000. The securities which may be regarded as a fixed charge against the company are the 4 per cent guaranteed stocks, £12,000,000, or, roughly speaking, $50,000,000. The only charge against the old Grand Trunk that carries with it the right of foreclosure is the 4 per cent guaranteed debenture stock. The rest represents guaranteed or preference stock and common stock.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: If my hon. friend can purchase the Grand Trunk Railway system for $50,000,000, the Government would do well to employ him has their agent and start him out to do it right at once. I am simply giving the figures of the Drayton-Acworth report as to the outstanding liabilities of this road and the amount the Grand Trunk expert says is required to bring the equipment up to standard. As I have said, one of the suggestions made in the Drayton-Acworth report is that some private corporation might be formed to take over this group of railways. If they do, they will have to assume a total liability of $1,252,416,697, and, in addition to that, find at least $175,000,000 in cash to equip and complete that group of railways just as they stand.

The next point is—what responsibility will the Canadian people, if they take over this group of railways, have to assume? On the Canadian Northern I have put the present liabilities at $400,000,000. That figure, as I have already stated, may not be exact. On the National Transcontinental, the Canadian people will have to assume a liability of $200,000,000. On the Grand Trunk Pacific, they will have to assume a liability of $135,439,888. In giving the House the figures for the Grand Trunk Pacific, I am giving simply the amounts on which the Canadian people have guaranteed the interest and which they will have to pay; I have not taken the amount that the Grand Trunk have put into the Grand Trunk Pacific, because, if the Canadian people take over the Grand Trunk Pacific, they have no more right to be called upon to make good the $69,000,000 that the Grand Trunk have squandered in it, than the Grand Trunk has to make good the $110,000,000 or $120,000,000 that the Canadian people have squandered in the Transcontinental east of Winnipeg. I would say to the Grand Trunk railway of Canada: If you are prepared to assume your own obligation and carry out the contract you made with the Canadian people by taking over and operating the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific, we shall assume our liability and write off the hundred million dollars or so that we threw away, but you will bear the rest. If you are not ready to do that, we shall take over the whole thing at its value; we shall bear the loss that we ourselves are responsible for, but we are not going to bear a loss of money which you yourself squandered. I would say to them, in cold-blooded terms: Look to the president of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway who was responsible for the squandering of that money between Winnipeg and Prince Rupert. That is the position I would take, and the owners or directors of the Grand Trunk railway were responsible for leaving him in that position. On those three railways, that makes a total liability of $735,439,888, from which the Canadian people cannot get away. But for railway purposes the proper thing to do, as I have already said, is to write off the money squandered on the National Transcontinental.

[Mr. G. B. Nicholson.]

The next point is: What additional liabilities will have to be paid for the Grand Trunk railway in order to take it over? The maximum liability that the Canadian people should assume in connection with that road is $199,860,000. That makes a total obligation of $933,299,888. The question at once arises—where are we going to get this enormous sum of money? In that connection it might be worth while to point out that we do not require to find a single cent so far as actual money is concerned. All the new money that is required is the money that will be necessary to complete the roads, equip them and put them in a position in which they can earn something. And we have to do that in any case.

There is a point raised by the hon. member for Springfield with regard to what might be done in the way of eliminating unnecessary mileage. If the Canadian people take over this group of railways, and I would say here to-night that, if we are going to do it at all, we cannot do it too quickly. The Minister of Railways and Canals is, I believe, searching the whole country in order to find steel rails with which to keep the necessary mileage in proper condition, but if the Canadian people take over that group of railways, I can tell him where he can get rails sufficient to lay 550 miles of railway. Without going west of Port Arthur, he can take up every mile of steel on the Canadian Northern from Sudbury to the city of Ottawa, and still, if the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern are grouped in one system, have a direct line between those two points. The Canadian Northern runs to Parry Sound and the Grand Trunk runs from Parry Sound to Ottawa, and the Canadian Northern parallels it all the way. I have not the mileage at my finger ends, but about 315 or 316 miles of rails from Ottawa to Sudbury can be pulled up to-morrow if the people are going to operate the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk together, and in my opinion those rails should be pulled up, whether we are going to take over those railways or not, because any traffic that comes over the Canadian Northern can be diverted at Parry Sound and brought down to Ottawa. Another 175 miles that can be pulled up without any dislocation of traffic is from Toronto to Napanee on the Canadian Northern. If the Canadian people are ever going to operate the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk together, they will certainly never use two railways running in sight of each other for 175 miles, while one of the two railways is able to carry all the traffic. From these two sections alone can be secured ten million dollars worth of steel rails that can be put into use on railways that actually require rails.

I do not know anything personally about the West, but from information I have received, this can be more than duplicated between Winnipeg and the foot of the Rocky Mountains without impairing the railways from an efficiency standpoint in the least.

I just want to say a word for the benefit of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. J. D. Reid) in connection with the purchases that the Government of Canada is making of rolling stock and motive power for the Canadian railways. If you look up the last returns that we have from the Railway Commission, you will find that the Grand Trunk railway have more locomotives per mile and more cars per mile than any other railway in Canada; that they have fifty per cent more locomotives per mile than the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and since the war broke out the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has practically not bought any locomotives.

Mr. MURPHY: The Grand Trunk or the Grand Trunk Pacific?

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: The Grand Trunk.

Mr. NICKLE: Is it not a fact that, although the Grand Trunk had a greater number of locomotives than the other railways, those locomotives were so old that the draw-bar efficiency made them practically inefficient for operating purposes?

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: That may possibly be so, at least to some degree, but to my mind it is worth while finding out just where all those locomotives are.

Mr. NICKLE: In the shops.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: Some of them may be in the shops, but information brought to me indirectly is that they are not all in the shops. The Grand Trunk is operating railroads both in Canada and the United States, and my information is that the Grand Trunk in Canada has been robbed for the benefit of the Grand Trunk in the United States. That may or may not be, but it is a matter at least worth investigating. There is another point in connection with that. My hon. friend has said that the reason for the Grand Trunk difficulty is that their locomotives are obsolete. I shall give the Minister of Railways and Canals a thought in this connection.

Who is it who is designing the locomotives the Canadian Government is purchasing for the Grand Trunk railway? My reason for asking is this: The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) has referred to the fact that the Grand Trunk locomotives are obsolete. I may tell him that the Grand Trunk put new locomotives built by the Canadian Locomotive Company at Kingston into service less than three years ago, that were obsolete before they were turned out of the shops; positively obsolete, because they were of a type and class that was discarded twenty years ago by every railway using the modern locomotives. So, if we are purchasing locomotives for the Grand Trunk railway I would say to the Minister of Railways, be sure and find out who is designing them.

Mr. NICKLE: The hon. member agrees with me that the locomotives being built for the Grand Trunk have not sufficient draw-bar efficiency to make them up to date, that the designing is bad, that the engineering service is not as it should be.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: A locomotive may be obsolete and still have draw-bar efficiency. When I referred to a type of locomotive that was obsolete twenty years ago I was not referring to the draw-bar capacity of the locomotive, but to what it is going to cost to keep that locomotive in a state of efficiency on the road. I repeat that the last locomotive built for the Grand Trunk that I have had the privilege of seeing—and I make a business of watching for all these things—was of a type that was obsolete twenty years ago.

Now a word as to the Canadian Northern and its equipment. The road is not fully equipped, but from one end of the road to the other what they have got is all modern equipment, and it is due to the fact that they have modern officials, and if the Minister of Railways is purchasing engines there is one man I know of who can give him sound advice, namely, the General Manager of the Canadian Northern lines east of Port Arthur.

Mr. CURRIE: Mr. Vaughan?

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: No, but a gentleman who learned his business with Mr. Vaughan. I am giving that information because I think the Government should know it. It is only by getting down to details that we shall ever get out of what the hon. member for Springfield terms "this mess," and that is what I have endeavoured to do in a rambling sort of way to-night. There is one other matter I want to refer to, and that is how we are going to manage these railways, and the tolls we are going to exact when we do manage them. I have studied the question from every angle, and if the declaration of the Prime Minister means anything, and I am one of those who believe it means just exactly what he said, I can see no better way than to follow the plan outlined in the Drayton-Acworth report. It will be absolutely necessary for the Canadian Parliament or the Canadian Government to appoint the first board of directors, but if the board is to be kept out of politics it should be self-perpetuating, in just the same way that the board of directors of any private-owned railway in Canada is self-perpetuating. I believe hon. gentlemen will agree with me that should the president of the Canadian Pacific retire, or before he retires for that matter, he will practically nominate his own successor, and the man he choses will be accepted by the directors, and the shareholders will back him up, and unless we are to have a new group of political directors for the State-owned system of railways in Canada, every time a change occurs we must find some means of having the members of the board chosen without coming back to Governments and Parliaments, because Governments and Parliaments will always be political so long as they exist.

Mr. McMASTER: If my hon. friend's suggestion is carried out, how will the railways owned by the people of Canada be controlled in any way by the people of Canada?

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: Place them under the Railway Commission, as far as control is concerned. As I understand it, the Drayton-Acworth report recommends that the power of nomination should rest with what they term the Dominion Railway Company, but I would term it a board of trustees for the Canadian people. The power of confirmation should rest with the Canadian Parliament or the Canadian Government. That is my idea. If some one else can suggest a better, all right, get busy. If we will look at what the Drayton-Acworth report refers to as the most efficient system of government-owned railways in the world, the Australasian experiment, we shall find that they have been changing from commission to board and then back again to commission, back and forth all the time, just because of political appointments. I say that if we are going to have political appointments in the operation of a state-owned system of railways, our last condition will be very much worse than the first.

The rates charged on the Government railways should be under the same control as the rates of privately-owned railways. I should like to refer for a moment to something that has been said with regard to the increase of rates granted Canadian railways by the Railway Commission a short time ago. The Government has been severely criticised for not reversing the order of the Railway Commission, but in my judgment if the Government is deserving of censure at all, it is because they took that order of the Railway Commission under consideration even in the slightest degree, and for this reason: If we are going to have independent control of railways, we cannot possibly set up the principle that every ruling of the Railway Commission is going to be revised by the Government of the day. Reverse the position for a moment, and assume that the Railway Commission orders a reduction of freight rates. Would that be a matter for the Government to revise? Should the Government say the reduction must not take place? The one is just as logical as the other, and it just comes down to this. I take it that we regard the Railway Commission as we would a court of justice in this country, and I do not think there is a man who would suggest that after a court had given its decision the case should go for review before a political body. Now as to the merits of the case. The railway companies have to earn increased salaries and an increased cost of all their materials, and I do not think that an increase of fifteen per cent was a large increase in proportion to the increased price they have to pay for everything. The difficulty is that people get a wrong view of what is essential and what is not essential. There are many in this House, for instance, who would say that the railways are not an agency for the production of anything, that they simply stand as a bar between producer and consumer. Now if some of the gentlemen representing a constituency in the West, we will say, will come with me one day next winter and get off the passenger train at White River I will undertake to get him a pass to ride on one of the 210 per cent engines running from White River to Chapleau. I will not ask him to handle a scoopful of coal the whole way, but just keep warm if he can and watch the men who are marketing the farmers' wheat, and I think at the end of the ride he will have a different conception of what production and consumption really mean. The hon. member for Springfield, speaking on this question a few nights ago, said with all the dramatic eloquence of which he is capable that the tragedy of the increase in the freight rates was not that the freight rates were increased by fifteen per cent, but that on the very day the order went into effect the price of sugar in the West went up one-tenth of one cent per pound. Would he believe that the locomotive fireman who helps to market the western farmers' wheat found that on the day that the wheat commission set the price of wheat 180 per cent higher than it was in pre-war days his wife had to pay 125 per cent more for the bread to make the sandwiches that she put up in his lunch basket? I have not heard anybody say that there was any tragedy about that. I have heard people undertake to say that the price of wheat went up too high but I could not agree with them. I believe it was the right thing for the commission to do in order that they might induce greater production of the things necessary to feed the people during the war. I have also heard it said in business circles that, because the price of newsprint paper went up fifty per cent it was no reason why the daily newspapers should have increased the prices in their job printing departments 200 and 300 per cent. I do not agree with that. I am just repeating these statements but they do not represent my own views. I do not agree with the callous-hearted people who make these statements, and the only reason I refer to them is that I believe that when the hon. member undertakes to stage a tragedy based on the fact that one-tenth of a cent a pound has been added to the price of sugar he should at least exercise some little regard in the selection of the costume that the villain is going to appear in. To come back to the main question. Whatever is done with the Canadian railways, one thing that is necessary, if we are going to have efficiency and economy, is to find some means of keeping the overhead charges down to a proper basis and putting the railways in the hands of men who will operate them independently of any political considerations whatever and just the same as a private company would operate its own railway.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman speaks about the Australian railways; what about the German, Belgian, French and Swiss State-owned railways?

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I stated that I would make no comparison between the railways of Central Europe and the railways on the North American continent for the reason that it is utterly impossible. A railway must earn a sufficient amount of money to pay for the things it uses. We cannot make any comparison between conditions in Canada and those on the European continent. You can produce anything you like to mention in Central Europe a great deal cheaper than you can produce it in Canada. We are not going to ask our people to work for what the people of Europe get. I simply used the Australian railways for the purposes of comparison because the Drayton-Acworth report pointed them out as examples of Government ownership.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: At this late hour I have only a few observations to make and I shall try to confine myself to about fifteen minutes. I have taken a good deal of interest in the railway question and as I listened to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) presenting the case in regard to the Canadian Northern I felt that it was one of the most masterly expositions of the financial side of the railway question that I had ever heard in this House since I have had the honour of a seat in it. The railway situation certainly does not present a rosy appearance. But, in the meantime we must view these things as they are and not as we would like to see them. Both political parties have gone very far astray on this railway business. A third transcontinental railway should never have been built in this country for at least fifty years. But we went into it with our eyes open, or at least a large part of the people did. The first election that I went into as a candidate for this House I won in opposition to the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental railway. I got a very narrow majority, it is true, but I fought the election on that issue and I am thankful to-day to be able to say that I was opposed to this project from its inception. I looked upon it as a waste of money. But it went on and the cost has assumed proportions that were never dreamed of in those days. But, we cannot now go back upon it. We are involved in the expenditure, the money has been spent and we have to make the best of the situation. It has, to say the least of it, imposed a staggering, colossal indebtedness upon the people of Canada. The war is looked upon as a tremendous enterprise, and so it is, but my hon. friend from East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) has shown that in order to nationalize the railways of Canada we would have to pay practically twice as much as we have spent in the war, or twice $1,000,000,000. I think my hon. friend placed the total railway capitalization of the country at 12 p.m. $2,500,000,000. At all events, that is within the mark. It will cost $2,500,000,000 to take possession of all the railways in Canada and to provide for the indebtedness in connection therewith. One thing I give my hon. friend great credit for is the statement with regard to the financial position of the railways of Canada which he has placed on Hansard to-night. I think he must be a practical railway man. I have received a great deal of information from the splendid address which he has given. It stands out it striking contrast to the speech delivered from this side of the House by the hon. gentleman who preceded him. I think the statements placed upon Hansard by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) are the most lamentable I have heard made in this House on any great question. My main reason for rising to-night was to try and say a few words to combat what has been placed in Hansard by the hon. member for Springfield. If that hon. gentleman knew one-tenth as much about railways as he thinks he does I should not have spoken to-night, but I feel convinced that the bulk of what he has placed on Hansard will not bear inspection on the part of any business man as being a fair statement of the railway situation.

The Prime Minister has informed us that the Canadian Northern railway has a total liability of $438,000,000. It is said to be worth, according to the figures the Prime Minister gave us, $518,000,000; so that it should have a balance on the right side of about $80,000,000. Of the two propositions, the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific, the chances of the former paying are one hundred-fold better than the latter, in my judgment. My hon. friend from East Algoma has shown that it has the lowest capitalization per mile of any railway upon this continent. That is something in its favour. Of course, it is not up to standard. We admit that. My hon. friend has submitted figures showing that $60,000 per mile will bring it up to standard whereas up to the present it has cost about $45,000 per mile.

It is admitted by all who know the railways of Canada that the best-placed railway, as far as the West is concerned, is the Canadian Northern with its branches. In saying that I am not saying anything disrespectful of the Canadian Pacific. The first speech I ever made in my public life was in favour of the building of the Canadian Pacific and carrying out the bargain that we had entered into at Confederation—because it must not be lost sight of that the Canadian Pacific was built to redeem the promise made at Confederation that we should link up with British Columbia. That was a bargain just as much as the Intercolonial was a bargain with the people of the East and that must always be borne in mind. The hon. member for Springfield asserted that we paid far more out of the coffers of the Dominion than we should have paid for the Canadian Pacific. I am not going into that; it is ancient history. But, I do not agree with him in that. We have the finest transportation system in the world, bar none, in the Canadian Pacific. All honour to the men who put it through, all honour to the men who conceived the idea and successfully built that road, and all honour to the present management who are administering it with an efficiency that few railways in the world have attained.

But we have to face the position as we find it to-day, and the Canadian Northern railway is being taken over by the Government. I know that many hon. members, are very impatient because the road is not already administered by the Government, or by some commission appointed by the Government. But we must wait a little, the value of the stock has still to be adjudicated upon in the courts. You cannot take possession until the price is settled—not very well, or if you do you will be operating at a disadvantage and be liable to further trouble, taking possession of the road before the value is settled. We do know that the $60,000,000 of stock will not cost more than $10,000,000—that is the limit set. Now there are a great many people who say, "That is all absurd. We need not have paid a dollar. There has been too much money put into that road already by the people, and therefore we should take possession of it without giving those who own the stock the slightest advantage in the way of an arbitration—let us just expropriate that stock and take possession". That would be a high-handed piece of business, which, in my judgment, would not be at all right. I want to tell the members of the House that a railroad, the same as any other property, is always worth the amount it would fetch under the hammer, at any rate. We have in this country a tremendous railway in the Canadian Pacific. All honour to it, and all credit, as I have said, for the way it is managed. But I am here to speak as a member of this House, and believing that I speak the feelings of the people of a large part of Canada from east to west and from north to south, after having put as much money into railways as we have done, we do not wish to see the whole of our Dominion placed in the hands of one railway company. That is what would have happened in Canada if the Canadian Northern railway had gone under the hammer: There was only one possible buyer of that road in the Dominion and that was the Canadian Pacific railway, who were anxious to obtain it and would have obtained it, I believe, if that course had been taken. Then the people of Canada would have shouted, and they would have had a good right to shout, because, after having built three transcontinental lines we are not prepared to put them into the hands of one railway company and have no competition, after all the money that we have spent. Let that never be lost sight of—we could not afford to do that. Even if we lost money in taking the Canadian Northern railway over, I believe when the position is explained thoroughly to the people of Canada, they will say that the Government is right, and that we could not afford to let that system pass into the hands of the Canadian Pacific, as in my judgment, it would undoubtedly have done if it had gone under the hammer. Now that is a point that I think ought to be thoroughly emphasized. We want railway competition in Canada, the West particularly is absolutely set upon competition, and that is the reason, in my judgment—one of the main reasons, at all events— why the Government has taken the course it has and is keeping the Canadian Northern railway as a separate entity and to be run as a separate entity, either by the Government or by a commission. I myself believe that it is possible, even with the black outlook of the tremendous expenditure that has to be incurred in connection with the railway situation, to make the railways of Canada still pay a fair dividend upon all the money that has gone into them. It is a big proposition, but I believe it ultimately can be done. Let us look at the situation for a moment. My honorable friend (Mr. Nicholson) who has just spoken has shown you that we are carrying freight, if I remember his figures rightly, at three-quarters of a cent per ton per mile—I think that was his statement. Despite our rigorous climate, despite the tremendous force that we must exert in winter to run our railways at all, there is no country in the world—barring only the United States, and that country only in certain sections—that has as cheap freight rates as we have in the Dominion at the present time. That is something we ought to recognize, it is something to be proud of, and I think that the administration of our railways has shown that we are prepared to carry freight in a rigorous climate, where the temperature in the winter season goes down to twenty, thirty, forty and even fifty degrees below zero, and there are snowfalls anywhere from five to ten feet deep in our northern country that have to be pushed out of the way—and still in spite of all that we are carrying freights at an infinitesimal rate per mile as compared with the old countries of Europe that have as much population to the square mile as we have in a hundred square miles. We hear a great deal about the splendid administration of European railways. I have crossed the Atlantic nearly fifty times, and I have travelled on most of the railways in Europe many and many a time, and there is not a country in the world, in my judgment, that carries passengers in as much comfort, and in as reasonable a way, as do the railways in the Dominion of Canada and in the United States. My honourable friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson) told us that people travel at a quarter of a cent, I think it was, per mile in Germany. He has more knowledge of Germany than I have if he can make that statement truthfully. I have travelled a great deal in Germany myself, I have visited that country five or ten times, and my experience was that not only did I not travel for a quarter of a cent per mile, but that it cost me a great deal more per mile to travel than it does on any of the railways of Canada. That was my experience, and if there are any other gentlemen here who have travelled much I think they can state also that they have never travelled in any country in Europe at any such charge as the honourable gentleman has spoken of, it is absurd on the face of it. Nobody who has travelled in Europe can tell me that. People have never been able to buy railway tickets from Cook, Son & Co., who are supposed to have the lowest rates that any firm in Europe have for travelling for any such price as the honourable member has spoken of.

Mr. MANION: I think in justice to the honourable member for Springfield it should be stated that in the European countries—particularly in Germany and Belgium—they have special rates for working men going to and from their work that are very low. I think the honourable gentleman is absolutely right in regard to the ordinary rates of travel, for first-class passage, and so forth, but for the average workingman there are exceedingly low rates in Germany and Belgium.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I am very much obliged to my honourable friend for making that statement. I do not wish to mis-state the position of the honourable member for Springfield, who is not in the House at present. I believe there are tickets sold at low rates that enable you to travel as much as you like between certain points. I know such tickets are issued—that you can get a passbook for thirty days, and that you can travel as much on the road as you like between certain points—but a man is not going to travel any more than he feels necessary, and under those circumstances the rate does not work out at as low a rate as might be looked for. I am speaking of the general rates that would be charged to passengers when travelling, not for a little distance that a workman would have to go between his home and his place of work, and which I do not think is a fair comparison. Certainly I was misled and others were misled listening to the figures given by the hon. member for Springfield to-night.

Some considerable attention has been given to Australia as an example. I have had the privilege of also visiting Australia, but I am not sure that the hon. member for Springfield has visited that country. I can speak candidly of the railway service rendered throughout Australia and the accommodation given, because I was there a few years ago. What did I find? At every boundary line between states you had to get out of bed at night if you were sleeping in a Pullman, and change to another Pullman, and every state has a different gauge on its roads. The remark was interjected that I was a narrow-gauge man when I asked a question during the hon. member for Springfield's speech, but I would draw that hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that in Australia every state has a different gauge practically on its railways. Moreover, they have to transfer all the freight at these state boundaries, from one car to another. The reason for that is that the labour men say that more labour is rendered necessary than there would be if they only had the one gauge, and they want the system continued. Therefore, freight is transferred from one car to another at the present time on the state boundary line.

Mr. MURPHY: Are those railways operated by the Government?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: They are state-operated. These railways were mostly built by the States before the Commonwealth came into effect. The Commonwealth has been in existence now upwards of ten years, and up to the time I visited Australia they had not made any attempt to standardize their gauges. When I asked: "How can you possibly continue to have all the passengers change at your state boundaries, and to tranship all your freight from one car to another," they said: "Well, we have a large element here upon the railways who say we would be destroying their means of obtaining a livelihood if we allowed these cars to run through; that is why we have not made our gauges uniform." All the rates in Australia are infinitely higher than ours both as to freight and as to passengers, unless they have lately come down, and their cost per mile is infinitely more than ours. So I think the comparison between Australia and Canada does not work out to our disadvantage. I mention this to show that we are not so badly off as we have been made out to be. We are in a better position than many countries considered to be as bad as we are at the present time. I admit that some of the roads are unnecessary duplications. But I am sorry I cannot quite agree with my hon. friend from East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson), when he said that the road between Toronto and Napanee should be ripped up. As one who travels frequently between Toronto and Ottawa, I find the Canadian Northern a tremendous advantage, and to rip that line up would be to say that you will have no alternative route from Toronto to Ottawa. It must be remembered that the Grand Trunk does not run into Ottawa from Toronto, unless you go down to Coteau Junction, which is only about thirty miles from Montreal, and which is a most round about way to reach Ottawa. The capital of the Dominion had only one road from Toronto until the Canadian Northern came in. This road, in my opinion, is serving a very valuable purpose in Ontario.

I want to dwell for a moment or two upon the position of the Canadian Northern, relative to the traffic that can be obtained by it. I had the pleasure not two years ago of travelling from one end of that road to the other. I would not say that it has the best roadbed in the Dominion, but we travelled comfortably from Toronto to Vancouver at the rate of twenty-five miles per hour without mishap, and the engine was able to haul twelve to fourteen heavily-laden cars over the whole of the road. If I remember correctly it hauled fourteen cars, certainly not less than twelve heavily-laden Pullman cars over the Rocky Mountains. That is something which could not be done, I believe, on any other railway either to the north or to the south of the international boundary. I believe the Canadian Northern has the best grade of any of the roads, and the Grand Trunk Pacific runs over a part of the same tracks. One hon. member has said that we should never have embarked upon aiding the Canadian Northern railway at all. The Canadian Northern is an old line and was begun before the Grand Trunk Pacific was ever thought of. Its chances of paying are infinitely better. It is a well placed road both in the West, and in a good many parts of the East. And it must be remembered that in building this road, we are building for the future, and it was thought that Canada could support at least two transcontinentals. I believe it can. I believe that two transcontinentals can be made to pay and pay well, whether operated by private companies or as Government enterprises under a commission. For my own part, I want to say that it is war time, and the amount of money required to take possession of all the railways of Canada, or even of the railways leaving out the Canadian Pacific, is so great that we cannot afford to undertake it, and that is my only reason, speaking as a business man, for not advocating the immediate nationalization of all the railways of Canada. I may be wrong, but I venture the opinion, as a business man, that with proper management, and with a thoroughly well trained commission of railway men—not politicians, not statesmen even, but railway men of a practical order, such as we have in Canada—the operation of these roads will be successful. In my judgment, if a board was got together, of five or seven of the best railway men in Canada, as a commission and all the roads of Canada were placed at their disposal, they could make a financial and a business success of that great enterprise. I may be wrong but that is my sizing up of the situation. Knowing the possibilities of traffic in Canada I say that I believe that that can be done, and the Drayton-Acworth report practically recommends that that be done. I can hardly do better than read that part of their report dealing with how these railways should be operated:

> Our formal recommendations are:—
> 1. That a Board of Trustees be constituted by Act of Parliament and incorporated as "The Dominion Railway Company."
> 2. That the ownership of the Canadian Northern, Grand Trunk, and Grand Trunk Pacific railways be vested in this Company.

I presume they mean the Transcontinental, as well as the Grand Trunk Pacific.

> 3. That the Government assume responsibility to the Company for the interest on the existing securities of these undertakings.
> 4. That the Intercolonial (including the Prince Edward Island) and National Transcontinental railways be also handed over by the Government to the Company.
> 5. That the whole of these railways, the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Intercolonial, and the National Transcontinental, be operated by the Company as one united system.

I must say that that recommendation appeals to me as sound common sense. I do not know these gentlemen personally, but after looking over their report, and having seen the basis upon which they make up all their figures, I believe that that finding is the solution of the railway question facing the Dominion at the present time. As far as I am concerned, just as soon as the war is over, I would be prepared to back up this, or any other, government which is prepared to take hold of this railway situation, face it as it is and make a success of it as a great national enterprise. I may be over optimistic, but I believe we have as good railway men in Canada as there are anywhere in the world, and nobody need tell me that we cannot get five or seven directors or trustees, whatever they may be called, who can operate the railways of Canada and make them a paying enterprise. My only reason for not advocating the immediate carrying out of these recommendations is that the war is on us, and the question is too large. I was favourable last year to the action taken by the Government in taking over the Canadian Northern. I am still of the same opinion, and it is my judgment that even if some blunders have been made in it, and though some of the money probably has been unwisely expended, we have in the Canadian Northern an asset worth all it is going to cost the people of Canada, whether we have to pay this supposed ten millions of dollars or not. I do not want to shirk any part of my responsibility in advocating that the $10,000,000 should be paid if the Commission of Arbitration find that it should be paid. I do not believe in confiscating property, even though you have technically the right to do so, if there is really an equity in it, and the Arbitration Commission is sitting for the purpose of deciding whether or not there is any equity in that $60,000,000 of stock, with the understanding that it shall not cost us more than $10,000,000. Is it not best to be generous and fair? I do not know who will get this money, I have no more knowledge than any member sitting in this House as to whom that $10,000,000 will be paid if awarded, and I do not believe all of it will be awarded. But I do not think we are justified in stating that that stock is not worth a dollar, when the question of its value is being investigated in the courts by some of the best brains in Canada.

We ought to possess our souls in patience, realizing that they will make a just finding and that we shall not have to pay any more for it than the equity in it is worth. I believe that had the Canadian Pacific been given the opportunity of getting the road for $10,000,000 or $20,000,000 and assuming all its liabilities, they would not have taken twenty-four hours to decide that they would accept it. Gentlemen in this House wanted to see the road go under the hammer, to see it knocked down to the highest bidder. They knew that the Canadian Pacific was the only bidder, and that the Canadian Pacific would not have hesitated a moment to take the road. Had we permitted anything like that to happen, we could not have looked the people of western Canada in the face. We have spent a thousand millions in giving the West railway competition, and it is suggested that now, at the final stage, for the sake of $10,000,000 or $20,000,000, we should let this road merge with the other great railway corporations and destroy competition and all possibility of competition in that country for the next twenty-five or fifty years. In my judgment, the Transcontinental will not be run as a paying enterprise within the life of any hon. gentleman in this House. I do not believe it is possible. More than a thousand miles built in the wilderness, without the slightest traffic—without any passenger traffic at all to speak of along the whole of that route; a bridge at Quebec which cost $27,000,000; a railway which, according to the statement of the Prime Minister this afternoon, cost $90,000 per mile without interest or $110,000 per mile with interest, more than double the cost per mile of the Canadian Northern railway and almost double the cost per mile of the Canadian Pacific railway.

[Mr. Cockshutt.]

We have every opportunity, I believe, of making the Canadian Northern a paying enterprise. I congratulate the Government on the splendid stand they have taken in this matter. I was elected as a kind of independent, so to speak, and I have criticised the Government; but when they do a good thing I want to give them credit for it. I stand by them to-night in the bargain that they have made with the Canadian Northern railway. They are facing this question like men. The position that the Prime Minister took in this House to-day and the statement that he made with regard to the Canadian Northern railway has put him up one hundred per cent in my estimation of him as a business man. I never thought that he was a very good business man, but the way he has tackled the railway question and the manner in which he has placed it before the House and the country gives us reassurance. At last the railway question is to be grappled with. We are to have a policy that we need not be ashamed of, the final financial results of which will be satisfactory not only to be members of the House but to all the people of Canada.

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston): At this late hour of the night—

Mr. BUREAU: Let us adjourn. It is half past twelve.

Mr. NICKLE:—At this hour of the night it may seem presumptuous for one to rise and address the committee, but as I since 1914 have taken more or less interest in this railway question I do not think I should allow this debate to close without putting on Hansard my views of the situation as I see it.

I cannot brush aside as lightly as the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) does the situation that confronts the Canadian people. Aside from the war, no one knocks more insistently on the door than those who say that a solution of this railway problem must be found. If my judgment is worth anything, before this problem is solved and before Canada meets the other financial obligations that she must of necessity meet, our resources, our foresight and our energy will be taxed to the utmost. I do not know that very much is gained by placing before the House a magnificent array of figures as to what this or that railroad cost or as to what the book value of this one is or the book value of the other one is. We should approach the question from this angle: how is Canada to attain the end that will be most beneficial for her? The way that we have come shows us that up to the present time Canada has, by gifts, guarantees, subventions and other aid, given to the various railroads in Canada approximately $1,000,000,000. The National Transcontinental has had $160,000,000—and we may say that we own that road, because by taking it over and operating it I suppose it has been assumed—it is useless to argue otherwise—that the Grand Trunk Pacific have been relieved from any obligation that they had. I am prepared, therefore, to debit Canada with $160,000,000 as the cost of the National Transcontinental. We have also spent $115,000,000 on the Intercolonial, which belongs to us; and on the Prince Edward Island railway $10,000,000 has been spent. In other words, the three railroads that Canada really owns have received from Canada $285,000,000, leaving $715,000,000 that Canada has given to privately owned railroads.

I said that perhaps we could learn something by an examination of the way that we had come to aid us in reaching a conclusion as to how we should go. It has been said that history moves in cycles, that history repeats itself. I doubt very much whether that is a truism. I doubt whether history does repeat itself exactly. But if history does not repeat itself, it moves more or less along similar lines, and in the light of what was done in years gone by we can sometimes judge what should be done to-day. Hon. gentlemen who were interested in the early history of the railway companies of Canada, and who have read the pamphlets published on that railroad in the 60's and 70's, must have observed that practically the same condition prevailed in those days that prevails to-day. Practically the same arguments were being advanced in favour of and against nationalization as are being advanced to-day. Railroads were claiming aid for the same reason that it is now claimed; public men were discussing as we are discussing to-night why aid should or should not be given. When you come to determine the book value of a railroad, you really get but little assistance. I refer particularly to that at this moment, because I am speaking of the history of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. If you go back to the history of that railroad in the 60's and 70's you will see that there were complaints of the pitiful plight in which that railway had found itself and worked itself in these years. You will find that there were charges of extravagance, corruption, mismanagement, and that the railway was in the position it was then in owing to more railway being constructed than the country could support, and to the improper and irregular way the railroad was constructed. It was just one series of financial rearrangements after another. The Grand Trunk charter was granted on the distinct understanding, if I remember the figures aright, that Canada would guarantee to Peto, Brassey, Betts and Jackson £3,000 sterling per mile and that the railway company or the railway constructors would find the other necessary capital to complete the road. The guarantee was soon used up. The company found themselves unable to sell stock. A certain amount of stock had been put on the market with a rosy prospectus that showed that 11½ per cent or thereabouts was going to be earned.

But it was soon demonstrated that the figures given were far in excess of what the company could earn, and it became apparent in a few years that the railway could not pay an ordinary dividend on its stock. No further subscriptions for stock could be had. The country was asked to put up more money and Statute after Statute was passed. Financial arrangements were brought about, but still no satisfactory result could be obtained, and the Grand Trunk, from the fifties until to-day has struggled to make dividends on an overcapitalization and has found itself utterly unable to meet the obligations cast upon it. As the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. G. B. Nicholson) and the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) have said, if the railroads of Canada are to be nationalized we might as well face the issue fairly and squarely and realize, if they are to be profitably run, capital accounts must be reduced materially, because if you do not take that method of managing your railroad, there will be, under operation and control by a commission, if that form of operation is decided upon, the same deficits that confront us to-day, because the mileage in Canada and the population per mile is not sufficient to enable us to earn enough to pay overhead charges and to meet the interest charges on the various overcapitalized undertakings.

Just let me give the House an instance of how the book value of a railway may be increased. If you turn to page 32 of the Drayton-Acworth report, you will see how in 1915 £126,809 were added to the capital charges or the book value of the Grand Trunk railway by charging up to capital account this sum to meet the discount and commission on debentures they had to sell below par, because their credit had been injured. In other words the book value of the railroad was increased almost three-quarters of a million dollars because the company had to sell its debentures at less than par and by an improper system of bookkeeping that amount was charged up to capital account.

As I have said, the problem we have to face is—where are we going and why are we going in that direction? Surely the experience of the last ten years has taught us that private ownership and the exploitation of the credit of the country has led to one of the most unfortunate railroad muddles the world has ever had to solve, and it comes on Canada at a particularly unfortunate time. We are not saying to the promoters of the railroad: We want to take away your property. We are not confiscating the property at all, but time and again they have represented to this Government and to the country at large that, if we made them an alleged sufficient grant or guarantee or a new loan, they would be able to meet their obligations, and Canada would no longer be called upon to supply further aid. There is not one of us who does not know how repeatedly we have been disappointed. I sat in this House in 1911, 1912, 1913 and 1914, and each year there was a fresh claim and an equally emphatic protest that, if Parliament yielded to the exploiters or promoters, if the hon. members like that term better, it would be the last time they would ask for money, and the undertaking would be carried to a successful conclusion. In 1914, my spirit rebelled, and I laid down what I thought was a sound principle of public guidance, namely, that if the people of Canada had to pay for a railroad, then the people of Canada were entitled to own it. In 1914, I was opposed to giving further aid, and the reason of my entering into this discussion to-night is because the hon. member for Springfield was rather severe on some of us for voting last year for the arbitration in reference to $60,000,000 worth of Canadian Northern stock. In 1914, I was opposed to Canada going into partnership with Mackenzie and Mann interests in the ownership and management of the Canadian Northern, and I felt that we were going into partnership in 1914 when we took $40,000,000 worth of their stock and left $60,000,000 of the stock to the promoters or to the Mackenzie and Mann interests, because my reading of history has told me this—and if the gentlemen present in this House care to read history--they will realize this--that when any kind of financial difficulty arises in regard to a large national undertaking, the private persons responsible for that undertaking always assert that Canada has a partnership in the undertaking, and that there is a national obligation to protect the credit of those who venture their capital in a speculative undertaking. For that reason I was opposed in 1914 to the partnership, but at that time public ownership was not as popular as it is to-day, and there was not as much cheering in the House of Commons when those of us who were in favour of public ownership and public operation of the road advocated those principles as now greets those who rise to speak on the subject. Parliament, however, decided that the partnership was to be, and the arrangement was that $45,000,000 of the Canadian Northern bonds were to be guaranteed, for which Canada was to receive $40,000,000 of the stock, the balance of $60,000,000 remaining with the owners. The probabilities are that if the war had not broken out, the cash on hand in the Canadian Northern treasuries at that time and the guarantee of the $45,000,000 of bonds would have permitted the Canadian Northern railway to work its way to a successful conclusion. Parliament laid down the principle that Canada was prepared to go into the partnership. Some of us voted against it, but then it seemed to me unfair in 1917 that those who had lent money on the stock of the company and those who had made advances on the bonds of the company should have their securities ruined because a war had unexpectedly broken out, and it was impossible for those behind the undertaking to realize what in ordinary times they would have been able to realize from their debentures and to proceed with the work as they would ordinarily have been able to proceed with it. If the Canadian Pacific were willing to say to the Canadian Northern, as I understand they were: "We are prepared to give something substantial for your stock if you are prepared to hand it over to us," and if the Parliament of Canada was not prepared to give the privilege of selling, it would have been confiscation of the rankest and most indefensible kind for Canada to say to the Canadian Northern people: You cannot sell to the Canadian Pacific, and as we are in a position to refuse you the right of selling, and are also in a position to take your property, we are going to take it for nothing, although another company is prepared to give you a substantial price for it. That would be a confiscation and doing a grave injustice and practising a national irregularity in reference to those who, in good faith, had made advances on the stock and other securities of the Canadian Northern. For that reason I feel the vote I gave in 1917 was justifiable; but even if it were not justifiable, upon that ground, I was quite willing to pay a substantial sum to remove from the lobbies of this Parliament men who exercise a pernicious influence, and to begin what I thought was the nationalization of the railways of Canada, because I cannot as a Canadian see—and I have faith in this country and am proud of Canadian ability, character and energy—why we cannot develop in this country just as capable, honest and energetic men as other countries can develop, and if all the rest of the world, with the exception of the United States and Great Britain, can successfully carry on commission operated railways, I am utterly at a loss to see why railways cannot be similarly operated in Canada. In speaking of that matter to-night, the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) reflected somewhat on the Australian railway system. He drew the attention of the House, as an evidence of the mismanagement of that system, to the fact that Australia had different gauges of railways, and he, therefore, from that seemed to argue that the Australian system was a failure.

When the railroads first began in Canada and different charters were granted to different companies, many of them started out on the same principle as actuated Australia. They started out with a different gauge of railway, each thinking that in that way it would retain freight originating on its own lines and prevent its transference to another line. Experience very quickly taught us that in a country as widespread as Canada it was absolutely necessary that for facility of transportation the gauges should be standardized and various methods were adopted to bring about that result. Without presenting the matter detail by detail the final result was this: We agreed on a standard gauge of 4 feet 8½ inches or 4 feet 8⅝ inches as the proper gauge, and to-day that is practically the gauge adopted throughout Canada. I understand that exactly the same thing is taking place in Australia that took place in Canada. The railways were originally constructed by different states with different gauges but now that they are under the Commonwealth I was told by a gentleman from Australia whom I had the pleasure of meeting two years ago that they realized that to work out their system they must standardize their gauge and they are doing exactly what Canada did. In the doing of it, of course, there is inconvenience, but from what I learned from this gentleman with whom I spoke, they are making a success of their roads even under the disadvantages under which they are working at the present time, and they are satisfied that when the work is completed they will work with greater economy and with greater advantage to the Commonwealth at large.

I therefore come to this: we have to face the situation of doing either one of two things. We have got to meet the annual deficits the railroads in Canada are going to have for many years and leave them in the hands of promoters, or we have to take over the roads and run them ourselves. I say that in 1917 we laid down the principle that all Canadian Northern stock was to be acquired by the Canadian people. Having acquired that stock, practically speaking, the people of Canada will own the Canadian Northern. We already own the National Transcontinental, the Prince Edward Island railway, and the Intercolonial railway. The Canadian Northern has a magnificent network of lines in the western provinces, though weak in the eastern part of Canada, particularly in Ontario and Quebec, where the Grand Trunk is strong. Many Canadian Northern lines parallel Grand Trunk lines. I am using " Grand Trunk " in the generic term including various departments of that railway. If we can co-ordinate these roads it is going to cheapen operation by reducing overhead and maintenance charges. Now why not do it? I quite admit that if the situation was this, that the Grand Trunk were able to carry out their undertaking it would be considered confiscation and a breach of the national obligation to interfere arbitrarily with them, but that is not the position in Canada to-day. Canada is not saying to the Grand Trunk Railway, "We are going to have your road and are not going to pay you for it." But the Grand Trunk management are saying to Canada, "We cannot carry the obligations we undertook by solemn contract. You have taken the National Transcontinental from us and we say we are relieved of all obligation for its operation. We appreciate the fact that the Grand Trunk Pacific is on our back and we cannot get rid of it. We appreciate the fact that if you insist that we carry out our obligations under the contract of 1903 there is bound to be an insolvency." You ask me on what I base that statement. I base it on the evidence given by Mr. Chamberlin, set out in the appendix to the Drayton-Acworth report, where in his examination—and the risk a man always runs when he puts himself on oath is that people will believe him even if it turns out to his disadvantage afterwards to be believed—Mr. Chamberlin said, and surely if we in the Parliament of Canada take Mr. Chamberlin as meaning what he said, he should not complain and say we are doing anything we should not do:

Sir Henry Drayton: You speak of confiscation, in your letter, Mr. Chamberlin. No person is thinking of confiscating the investment that I know of. If you can afford to carry it, you will be allowed to carry it. That was not really meant, was it? Suppose you are left to yourselves, the thing crashes, no one confiscates it. Isn't that right?

Mr. Chamberlin: To a certain extent, yes.

Sir Henry Drayton: To every extent, isn't it?

Mr. Chamberlin: To every extent.

There we have Mr. Chamberlin's own evidence that the position of the Grand Trunk to the Grand Trunk Pacific is this: That if the Government does not come to the aid of the Grand Trunk the whole scheme is going to come down in insolvency, not only the Grand Trunk Pacific, but the old Grand Trunk itself. The reason I allude to this particular point is this: I read an extract cabled a few days ago from one of the English papers to the effect that at the annual meeting of the Grand Trunk shareholders bitter denouncement had been made of the Canadian Government in that the shareholders had been led to believe that the Canadian people were confiscating the Grand Trunk railway, whereas if the facts had been fairly and squarely put before them, they would have known the Canadian people were not confiscating the Grand Trunk, but that the Grand Trunk Railway Company had admitted to the Government and the people of Canada that they were not able to carry out their obligation, and that there was bound to be an insolvency if Canada did not go to the rescue. Canada has a right to be put in a proper light before the investers of the Old World, and I sincerely hope that some echo of what is being said here to-night will be heard across the water. The position the Grand Trunk find themselves in to-day is not the fault of the Canadian people, but the fault of the promoters and exploiters of the national credit. The reason I say that is this. They began in 1903 the movement for the establishment and development of the National Transcontinental railway. The Government of Canada, headed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, did not go to the Grand Trunk Railway, but Mr. Hays came to Sir Wilfrid Laurier with a proposition. He suggested that the Grand Trunk railway in the eastern part of Canada wanted a western connection. I am ready to admit that the original proposition took the road only as far as North Bay, and that in Parliament it was extended from North Bay down as far as Quebec, and subsequently the Grand Trunk were compelled to accept an extension of the line from Quebec to Moncton. But the Grand Trunk were not compelled to accept it in the sense that they had to enter into an obligation they did not approve of. They could have said, "If the Parliament and Government desire us to go so far we will throw up the whole thing." But they did nothing of the sort. They had the choice of doing one of two things, abandoning the enterprise or carrying it out as Parliament desired. The Grand Trunk accepted the terms of the Parliament of Canada and as Mr. Chamberlin said in his evidence—I shall not give his exact words because it is getting late—the contract was utterly impossible for the company to carry out to a successful fruition, the Grand Trunk could not carry out the scheme, Mr. Chamberlin did not wish to reflect on those who had gone before but he was unable to see how Mr. Hays had ever entered into the contract believing it would be a success. He said "it was always impossible." I therefore say the people of Canada are not responsible for the difficulty in which the Grand Trunk find themselves to-night. The Grand Trunk itself, by its improper contract, by lack of foresight on the part of its officials and lack of business vision put the Grand Trunk in the position it is in to-day, and as a Canadian subject, and as a taxpayer I object, to the offspring of the Grand Trunk Railway Company being put in a basket and left on my doorstep, and the railway ringing the bell and saying: "Take charge of the basket and assume the responsibility." I have every desire to protect the credit of Canada, and I say that the Prime Minister if he carries on negotiations this summer with the Grand Trunk shareholders should make it perfectly clear to them and to the people of England that the obligation of the Canadian people was discharged to the last dollar, that Canada did more than she promised to do, that we agreed to guarantee a certain number of bonds and we did it, that we agreed to build a road and we did it and more.

One hon. gentleman has said that the people of Canada were primarily responsible for whatever sums were spent on building the National Transcontinental. I dissent from that view. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, all of whose stock is owned by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, had by their agreement with the Government the right to have their engineers superintend the construction of the Transcontinental, and if for political or other reasons their engineers and directors or their management were supine, it is not the fault of Canada if the road cost more than it should, and the blame should not be laid at the door of Canada.

I want to direct the attention of the House to another point. Somebody has stated that the Government was to blame because Canada gave aid to the Canadian Northern railway after the arrangement had been made with the Grand Trunk for the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific. The Government was not a partner in the undertaking as the Grand Trunk directors assert. The Government agreed that the people of Canada would do a certain thing in assisting this undertaking. The Government have done everything they promised to do and the Government of Canada are, and have always been, a Governement and not a partner. If the Grand Trunk management were not astute enough to protect themselves against the competition of another national transcontinental railway I do not think that they can lay it to the Government and the people that there has been any lack of faith or any bad faith, in the fact that aid was granted to another railway. I am not defending the giving of aid to the Canadian Northern subsequent to the inauguration of the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific project. I think it was a mistaken policy. It would have been infinitely wiser if the Grand Trunk had purchased the Canadian Northern line. But if the members of this House want some evidence of the money that exploiters and promoters attempt to make out of railway construction let me direct their attention to another portion of the evidence of Mr. Chamberlin. Sir Henry Drayton asked Mr. Chamberlin this question as reported at page 80 of the Drayton-Acworth report:

Sir Henry Drayton: If I am not very much mistaken, negotiations were entered into between your executive and the executive of the Canadian Northern, looking to the fusion of the systems, so that there would not be this duplication.

Mr. Chamberlin: They tried to buy the Manitoba lines, but they could not get together, Mr. Hays told me at one time, and Mr. Wainwright told me also. I asked them why they did not buy out the Canadian Northern, they said they had had meeting after meeting with them, and that the best terms they could get were that they should assume all obligations, all bonds and everything else, and give $25,000,000 for the common stock for that little bunch of lines up around Winnipeg.

That meant that the Canadian Northern people asked the Grand Trunk to pay them $25,000,000 for the common stock which they held. That will give you some idea of the exploitation that has been attempted in this country. I think it well that the people should realize what private ownership has done in connection with railway promotion. People had hardly come to realize the terrific problem that confronted us in this country before a private Bill was again introduced into this House in the session of 1915 asking Parliament to grant a charter to another transcontinental railway and it was only because of the active efforts of those opposed to Canada being loaded up with any further lines that the charter was withdrawn and the promotion stopped. For these reasons I think the time has come for the taking over of those lines. The experience of the world has demonstrated that it is possible to get able, honest men to operate public utilities such as railways. We have demonstrated that in regard to lighting and power plants and in various other ways. And if these things can be done by other public bodies why cannot the same thing be done in reference to a railway?

Then, let us regard it from another angle. The main object to be sought is to procure adequate transportation for the people and commodities of the country. It must be abundantly clear to any person who has read this report, and who knows anything of the railway situation in Canada—and certainly the hon. member from East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) put a mass of illuminating figures on the record to-night—that the railways have reached the point where they are utterly unable to raise the necessary capital to carry on their undertakings. It is admitted that the Canadian Northern Railway system cannot raise the $100,000,000 that they need in the next five years to bring their road up to the standard necessary in connection with a road seeking to undertake transportation in Canada. What will be required by the

Rebuilding and reinforcing freight car equipment	$ 8,943,971 14
Rebuilding freight and passenger cars with safety appliances	458,501 61
Equipping engines with safety appliances	17,274 32
Deferred renewals in maintenance of way department	11,761,598 00
Total	$21,181,345 07

That is the amount required to put that road in anything like a decent running state. The strange thing is that during the time that that railway was running down until it came to the disastrous condition that it is in to-day, the management of the Grand Trunk paid in dividends to its stockholders $36,000,000 which should have gone into the road to provide for the development of the transportation of the country. If you turn to the next page you will see that the capital expenditures necessary to be made are as follows:

Requirements for rolling stock, shops and machinery	$26,150,000
Requirements for automatic block signals, (main line in Canada only)	3,533,000
Requirements for installing rock ballast crushing plant	467,500
Total	$30,150,500

In other words, the Grand Trunk will have to raise $51,000,000 and the Canadian Northern $100,000,000 to put these two roads in a state of efficiency. After you have developed them on independent lines where are you? They have to meet in competition, not in co-operation, and surely it must be clear to you that the Grand Trunk cannot make improvements costing $50,000,000 meet its interest charge of $5,000,000 in addition on its Grand Trunk Pacific guarantees. In this connection I will read the answers which Mr. Chamberlin gave to questions put to him by Mr. Acworth:

Commissioner Acworth: I can follow the point this far; that the Grand Trunk Pacific, being regarded as a Government obligation, the Government should see that anybody who had put money into the Grand Trunk Pacific should be protected to the last penny. But wouldn't it be absolute justice on the part of the Government to say that the Grand Trunk went into this undertaking, and that the Government must ask the Grand Trunk to pay all it can towards the obligation the Government has to carry; in other words, that the Government must ask the Grand Trunk to accept the sinking of the $26,000,000 they have already advanced, and that the Government must ask the company to contribute, in order to minimize the loss, all the net revenue the company has, that while it is not enough yet the Government must have that.

[Mr. Nickle.]

Mr. Chamberlin: The fact is that the Grand Trunk is not able to contribute anything towards paying its own security holders and making the improvements the people of Canada demand and the business of Canada require.

Sir Henry Drayton: But last year the Grand Trunk gave its shareholders half a million sterling?

Mr. Chamberlin: Yes.

Commissioner Acworth: Do you mean to say that that was a necessary expenditure—I am not a shareholder?

Mr. Chamberlin: If you strike off the interest on your securities . . . .

Commissioner Acworth: It was not a security; they gave half a million to their guaranteed shareholders?

Mr. Ardley: Four per cent on the guaranteed stock was paid.

Commissioner Acworth: Which came to half a million sterling. Wouldn't it be absolute justice for the Government to say . . . .

Mr. Chamberlin: To wipe out these poor shareholders?

Commissioner Acworth: To say to the Grand Trunk that they must pay these liabilities to whatever extent they can, because as far as the public was concerned the Government would have to face the rest, but that the Grand Trunk must do all it can?

Mr. Chamberlin: The Grand Trunk can just about meet it, but cannot pay the shareholders anything.

What that means in ordinary language is that Mr. Chamberlin, the president of the road, says that if the Grand Trunk met the existing obligations of the Grand Trunk Pacific nothing would be available for the betterments and for the improvement of the road to say nothing of the shareholders. That is with respect to the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific which was guaranteed by Grand Trunk Railway Company. In the face of that, it seems to me that the Canadian people have the right to say to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, "If you want to be relieved from this obligation we are prepared to treat you reasonably and fairly, but we are not prepared to say that because you made a bad bargain we will relieve you from all the obligations that you have incurred and take over your original Grand Trunk railway at a reconstruction value, or whatever sum you show on your books." That would be most unfair to the people of Canada. That would put the people of Canada in this position—that those who come here to exploit our credit would practically look to Canada as a sort of fairy godmother, and if the venture turned out unprofitable Canada must lose, but if the venture turned out profitable then the company should take all the profit and all the advantage. I am not going to take any more of the time of the House.

Mr. McMASTER: Go on, it is good stuff.

Mr. NICKLE: Well, there are one or two points I want to clear up, and as honourable gentlemen have expressed the wish for me to go on, perhaps it is just as well that I should touch on those points.

Now in regard to the Intercolonial, that railway is always held up by opposing Canadians as the outstanding example of a failure of Government ownership. But is that fair? The Intercolonial was a political railroad. It was constructed round by the St. Lawrence so that it would be well removed from the American border. It was a political road and it was a military road. Every car mile that is operated on that road costs more money to run in relation to the earnings got than if it were a direct line. What I mean by that is this: The railroad is operated on the arc of a circle, but the freight charge must be in competition with the rate charged on the diameter of the circle. That is, for a very much larger mileage the Intercolonial gets only the smaller freight charged on the straight line, and while I have not the figures before me to-night—not intending to speak on this subject—I was much impressed some years ago by an examination of the figures which showed to me conclusively that the car mile freight on the Intercolonial was smaller by far than that charged on the other railroads. And that simply means this: That every extra mile you operate a railroad to carry freight means that much extra cost that the railroad has to pay for operation—wages, coal, upkeep, and everything that is included in the operation of a railroad—and if a railroad is unnecessarily long, and only earning freight proportionate to a shorter railroad, certainly it is never going to be comparatively a success. If in conjunction with that fact you take the fact that the people of the eastern provinces have always regarded the Intercolonial as a quid pro quo for the canals in the central part of the country, and incidentally used for the transportation of the western commodities to the seaboard, I do not think it is surprising that the railroad has not been a great success. Then, too, being a political railway, political considerations have entered into its operation, with the result that the road has not made money. Therefore, I say it is not an outstanding example of the failure of public operation, but is an example of how a badly situated road cannot be a profitable work, and must of necessity be a financial failure, when burdened further as I have explained.

I agree with what the hon. member for East Algoma said, that if after these railroads are taken over—I am talking of the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk system—you are going to operate them successfully, you have got to co-ordinate them, you have got to remove all unnecessary overhead charges, you have got to get rid of parallel lines, and you have got to insist that between the Canadian Pacific and these co-ordinated Government lines there shall be co-operation and control of rates through the railway commission. I do not believe the time is ripe for the taking over of the Canadian Pacific Railway system: If I understand the position of the Canadian Pacific railway, they would have a right, if the Parliament of Canada insisted there should be nationalization, that the assets of the Canadian Pacific Railway system be taken over at their value, and men who are in a position to speak—I do not profess to speak of my own knowledge—tell me that if the assets of the Canadian Pacific were taken over at reconstruction value Canada would have to practically pay $800,000,000 for the undertaking, and it would necessitate an increase in freight rates of twenty to thirty per cent probably on the rates now charged. It would be impossible for Canada to do anything of that sort.

The Canadian Pacific railway is financially strong, and it is well run, and, as I said in the beginning of my remarks, the object of Canada at this critical time must be the protection of her credit, while securing adequate transportation facilities, and if in competition with Government-owned roads and publicly-managed roads—the Canadian Pacific railway is in a sufficiently strong position to stand the competition and to operate the road as a financial success, then why should Canada load herself up at a critical time like this with $800,000,000 which she can avoid? It seems to me it would be an unwise thing to do, and unwise for another reason: If the Canadian Pacific were taken over by the Government of Canada it would remove that tremendous asset as a borrowing security when fresh capital is going to be required for the development of this country. The Canadian Pacific railway to-day has a great place in the financial markets of the world, her credit is on the soundest basis. But if the road were taken over by the Government of Canada it would not add one dollar to the credit power of the Canadian people as a people, but would remove that credit power from one of the greatest combinations that the world has ever known, as well as scattering abroad the capital represented by the stock and securities. For these reasons I think it would be unwise at the present time to take over the Canadian Pacific railway. Let us take no more steps at the present than we must take, but let us take such steps as are nationally necessary to secure for the Canadian people the properties that they are going to be called upon to carry in any event. Let us take such steps as will lessen the cost of transportation, that will cut out unnecessary duplication, and that will co-ordinate under one system in Canada these two roads that are at present a financial failure. Let us try to see to it that some scheme of operation is developed by which political interference will be avoided, that the maximum efficiency will be secured, and that we at length will take one great forward step in solving the problem that has been forced upon us, not by the choice of the Canadian people, but perhaps through the lack of vision of her statesmen and Parliamentarians. Let us take this step now in the interest of the national life of Canada, but let us make clear to the world that while we are taking this step we are not confiscating the property of other people, but that we are dealing fairly with them, that we are relieving them from obligations they have voluntarily entered into, and that if there is difficulty in the administration of their railroads and undertakings, those difficulties have not been brought about by the niggardliness, not by the parsimony, and not by the necessities of the Canadian people, but by the directors and others responsible for the administration of these great undertakings and from their lack of foresight and appreciation of the conditions that prevail in this country.

Mr. MURPHY: I suggest that the committee rise now and that the House adjourn.

Mr. SIFTON: If there is any other hon. member who wishes to speak—

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I understood from the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) that we were to adjourn at midnight. Later I was informed by the Chief Whip on this side that the Minister of Customs (Mr. Sifton) desired us to go on for an hour or so longer.

[Mr. Nickle.]

Mr. SIFTON: I said one o'clock. I am quite willing to adjourn if there is no one else desirous of continuing the debate to-night.

Mr. CURRIE: Many of us have been here since ten o'clock this morning, and I think we should adjourn.

Mr. SIFTON: I stated, if anybody desired to continue the debate to-morrow, not to-night, he could do so.

Progress reported.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

House again in Committee on Bill No. 83 to amend the Special War Revenue Act, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Progress reported.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Sifton the House adjourned at 1.18 a.m., Thursday.

Thursday, May 16, 1918.

The House met at Eleven o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Annual Report of the Department of Public Printing and Stationery for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1917.—Hon. Mr. Burrell.

Return to order of the House with reference to the Imperial Royal Flying Corps in Canada and Return to order of the House showing the status of Canadian recruits in the Royal Flying Corps.—Hon. Mr. Burrell.

SENATE BILLS.

HALIFAX RELIEF COMMISSION.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved that Bill No. 97, respecting the Halifax Relief Commission, be read the first time.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Explain.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: This Bill is merely to confirm certain legislation passed at the recent session of the Legislature of Nova Scotia.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CANADIAN PATRIOTIC FUND ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY moved the first reading of Bill No. 98, to amend the Canadian Patriotic Fund Act, 1914.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Explain.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: The Bill is simply to make clear that under the provisions of the Act incorporating the Canadian Patriotic Fund, the corporation body was to be entitled to distribute the funds among the relatives resident in Canada of soldiers forming part of our own forces or the Allied forces. Under the present reading of the statute, as the section is worded, it is open to the suggestion that this money is to be distributed among the relatives of soldiers resident, or who were resident, in Canada, when they enlisted, wherever those may be, and on the other hand that the relatives in Canada of soldiers who did not reside in Canada would not be entitled to be considered. The corporation always has acted on the interpretation that all relatives resident in Canada of soldiers actually fighting, are entitled to benefit; and they desire to have it made clear that that is the correct interpretation and the Act is for that purpose.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPREME COURT ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Doherty, Bill No. 99, to amend the Act of the present session, intituled: "An Act to amend the Supreme Court Act," was read the first time.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill No. 100, for the relief of David M. Sloss.—Mr. Copp.

Bill No. 101, for the relief of Lillie Mabel Billing.—Mr. Mowat.

HEREDITARY TITLES IN CANADA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston): Has the Prime Minister sufficiently matured his plans to let us know on what day we may renew the debate on titles?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, I have not come to a decision about that.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill No. 76, for the relief of William Leo Walpole.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 77, for the relief of Mary Claire Dawson Hislop.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 78, for the relief of Martin Hafner.—Mr. H. A. Mackie.

Bill No. 79, for the relief of Ida Sophia Wardell.—Mr. W. F. Maclean.

Bill No. 80, for the relief of Edward David Hill.—Mr. Richardson.

Bill No. 73, for the relief of Frederick Ernest Zang.—Mr. Redmond.

Bill No. 74, for the relief of Thomas Bailey Wainwright.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 91, for the relief of Francis Newman.—Mr. Lalor.

Bill No. 92, for the relief of Henry Ernest Saxby.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 90, respecting The Church and Manse Board of the Presbyterian Church in Canada.—Mr. Nickle.

JURISDICTION OF PROVINCIAL COURTS IN DIVORCE CASES.

In Committee on Private Bills:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): I notice that an unusually large number of divorce Bills are before the House this year. A few days ago a judgment was rendered by the Supreme Court of Manitoba, in which, if I mistake not, it was declared that henceforth the courts of Manitoba could grant divorces; that under the British North America Act, as amended when Manitoba came into Confederation, the English law was, in certain circumstances, to obtain in that province, and with it the application of the English law on the annulment of marriages. I believe that that pronouncement of the Supreme Court of Manitoba has not been challenged. The same assertion was made, I believe, by the courts in one of the other western provinces.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think it was decided in the same way in Saskatchewan, judging from a press report.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I should like to have an expression of opinion from my right hon. friend with regard to this very important matter, because these decisions may alter completely our divorce proceedings in this Parliament. The opinion has been expressed in the other Chamber that larger powers should be conferred on the Senate with regard to the granting of divorces.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I know nothing of the decisions referred to except what has appeared in the public press. The Minister of Justice will doubtless be able to give some information on the subject after he has had opportunity of examining it. In four of the provinces, I believe—the Maritime Provinces and British Columbia—jurisdiction has hitherto been exercised by the courts in respect to the granting of divorces. So far as I know, jurisdiction in these provinces has never been questioned. Similar jurisdiction is now asserted in Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan. It would be a very desirable consummation if these matters could be referred to the courts.

It is obvious to every one, who is familiar with divorce proceedings as conducted in the Senate, and in the courts, that the public interest is much better conserved by having such matters dealt with in a judicial way. In a divorce court it is the duty of the presiding judge, in an undefended case, to appoint a King's proctor, who is charged with taking up the defence and of making such inquiry, by cross-examination of witnesses, and so forth, as to assure himself that there is no collusion between the parties. Whether or not any proceeding of that kind is taken before the Senate Committee, I do not know, but if so it is of recent years, because formerly no such practice prevailed. Apart from that, divorce is a proper subject for judicial inquiry if it is to be dealt with at all. I venture to express the hope that, if jurisdiction has been asserted by the courts in the three western provinces, it may transpire that their decision is well founded. It may also be proper for this House to consider whether by some means the jurisdiction could be transferred to the courts of the other provinces of Canada. At all events, whenever the Senate is to consider a divorce Bill, the evidence upon which that Bill is founded, should be taken before a judicial tribunal and not by a committee of the Senate. Let us assume that there is some insuperable obstacle to vesting this jurisdiction in the courts of Ontario and Quebec. Would it not be better to have the inquiry conducted by a judge, the evidence heard by him, and the determination upon that evidence reported by him, leaving to the Senate the final adjudication by Act of Parliament? We can all, I think, agree that the present system is highly unsatisfactory.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: As I understand the question, it is not exactly as the Prime Minister puts it. Under the Act of Confederation, the Parliament of Canada alone has the power to legislate upon divorce. There is no doubt at all that, upon the broad terms of the constitution of this country, this Parliament has the right to establish a divorce court or to give jurisdiction. But this Parliament has always refrained from exercising that jurisdiction, and consequently, the practice has grown up of parties seeking divorce, and who can not obtain it in their own province, coming to this Parliament.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Just as used to be the case in Great Britain.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Exactly, and that will be the case here until there is a divorce court established. The other question to which my right hon. friend referred is, as I understand it, that the province of Manitoba and also the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta claim they have the right to establish divorce courts.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understand the province of Manitoba claims its own courts have jurisdiction to decide divorce cases. If that is the situation, there is only one question at the present time. If any province which established its constitution at the time of Confederation has not the power to give its courts jurisdiction to grant divorces, have the new provinces now the power to give their courts jurisdiction to grant divorces? That is the question to-day, and it can, of course, be decided only by the supreme judicial authority, and the sooner there is a concrete case decided in regard to this point, the better it will be. If it be determined by the supreme judicial authority that the new provinces created since Confederation have the power to have divorces granted by their own courts, that will simplify the question very much so far as the divorce business of this Parliament is concerned.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Would not my right hon. friend think it better to have those matters determined by a judicial inquiry rather than by the Senate?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Here is a province which asserts that it has, under the constitution, the authority to have its own courts decide these matters. If that be so, the question of the interpretation of the constitution ought to be determined before any other proceeding is taken.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think anybody contends that the province of Manitoba can create a divorce court. I think the contention is that the divorce court is already there, and there as a consequence of what this Parliament has done, whether it so intended or not.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Exactly.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING: As a layman, may I venture to give an expression of opinion? Not only has Manitoba declared its power in the matter; it has done more, it has exercised that power, because it has recently granted a divorce, and I believe it is claimed that, under similar legislation, Saskatchewan and Alberta may do the same thing. I am one of those who have long felt it would be better if we could have one general divorce court for the whole Dominion. I think we can all agree that the manner in which divorce cases are dealt with by this Parliament is not at all in accordance with, shall I say, moral conditions, nor in accordance with sound legislation. If we cannot have a general divorce court, might it not be a wise course for the Government to say that, wherever there is a divorce court clearly established in a province, the parties in that province shall go to that court? That would reduce the duties of this Parliament to the exercise of the functions of a divorce court only for the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, until the good day shall come when even those provinces will be allowed to dispose of those matters in a better way.

REPORT.

Second report of the War Purchasing Commission, for the year ended March 31, 1918.—Sir Robert Borden.

THE YUKON ELECTION:

CONSIDERATION OF THE REPORT FROM THE COMMITTEE.

On the Order being called for the consideration of the second report of the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, covering the Yukon election.

Mr. T. M. M. TWEEDIE (West Calgary): Although I was a member of the committee which dealt with the question of the Yukon election, and although that committee by a majority of one supported the motion of the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) I cannot concur in the report which the committee has presented to the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the intention of the hon. member to submit a motion?

Mr. TWEEDIE: Yes. The question which was really before the committee was in connection with the counting of the overseas vote for the Yukon constituency, in which Mr. F. T. Congdon and Dr. Alfred Thompson were the candidates. The general nomination day in the ridings throughout the Dominion of Canada in the last election was the nineteenth day of November, and polling day was on the seventeenth day of December. There was a deferred election in the Yukon, and under the Act, December 31, 1917, was fixed as nomination day, and January 28, 1918, as polling day. After the election had been held in the Yukon, Mr. Congdon through his agents served notice of protest on the General Returning Officer at Ottawa, forbidding him to count the overseas vote, Mr. Congdon then having a majority of 110 on the home vote. The Returning Officer referred the matter to the Governor in Council, and an Order in Council was passed on the 26th February, and pursuant to that Order in Council, the record was submitted to the House for consideration. After the record had been submitted to the House the following motion was passed:

> That the special return of the General Returning Officer to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery for Canada concerning the election of a candidate to serve in the House of Commons for the Yukon Territory, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections with power and authority to consider the same and the several documents therein alluded and to report their conclusion and their determination thereon to this House.

That limited the reference to the committee to the record as submitted to the House, and there was no question of going beyond the limits of that reference and considering extraneous matter. So the question really before the committee was whether or not the overseas vote, which amounted to 256 for Thompson and 28 for Congdon, should be counted, thereby determining who should be entitled to sit for the Yukon. When the matter came before the Committee on Privileges and Elections it was thought desirable by all the members that both parties should have the privilege of appearing and consequently adjournments of the committee were had from time to time to give Mr. Congdon the opportunity of appearing and presenting fully his side of the case in connection with the election. It was generally understood, I believe, when these adjournments were made from time to time, that after Mr. Congdon had presented his case to the members of the committee, that committee itself would settle the question at issue. But, instead of arriving at a conclusion, as they were instructed to do by the order of this House, by a resolution which was adopted and reported to this House, and which reads as follows:

> Resolved, that a stated case be prepared and submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada, or to any two judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario, for decision.

—the committee shifts to an outside jurisdiction the responsibility which was placed upon it by this House.

Once having assumed the obligation of disposing of the Yukon case, it is my opinion that it should be disposed of by that committee, and that the matter should not be kept dragging along from time to time. If it is to be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada, or to two judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario, it simply means that the parties have to appear before some tribunal and state their case. They asked for an opportunity of stating their case before the Committee on Privileges and Elections and by frequent adjournments they were enabled to do that. After they have done that, it is my opinion that the committee should dispose of the matter one way or the other and report their findings on the question of fact to this House so that it may be finally disposed of.

But, assuming, for the purposes of argument, that there may be ground upon which the contention of the mover of the resolution in the committee may be based, I submit that the resolution as it has been submitted to this House is impracticable because, if you will notice carefully the wording of the resolution, it says:

> That a stated case be prepared and submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada, or to any two judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario, for decision.

We will take the first words of the mover of that resolution, " a stated case." He is a good lawyer; he has had experience upon the bench of Nova Scotia, and he knows, as well as I know, what is meant by a stated case. It is the submission of a set of facts, or a set of questions, which must be agreed to by the parties themselves who are interested in these facts, for decision by a tribunal in the province in which the case arises. When the hon. gentleman says "a stated case" he makes no suggestion as to who shall prepare such case and he makes no suggestion as to who shall be allowed to become parties to it. He takes out of their hands the rights to which they are entitled as a matter of ordinary statute law in any province of the Dominion. Does he suggest that the committee should state that case? Does he suggest that the members of the House of Commons should state that case? Does he suggest that the Governor in Council should state that case He makes absolutely no suggestion whatever in regard to the preparation of the stated case, and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is beyond the power of this House to prepare any stated case for any court or for any judges in the Dominion.

[Mr. Tweedie.]

Mr. McKENZIE: I did suggest—

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not think it is necessary to tell me to sit down. I wish to remind my hon. friend (Mr. Tweedie) that I suggested in the committee that a subcommittee of the committee should prepare a stated case. Perhaps it escaped the ear of my hon. friend, but that is what I suggested.

Mr. TWEEDIE: There was a resolution directing that the evidence be printed and submitted to this House, and I submit that we are bound by the record as it appears here and by the resolution as it appears in the Votes and Proceedings. Then, we come to the second question. He says that a "stated case shall be prepared and submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada, or to any two judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario, for decision." My language on that point, if I cared to make it so, might perhaps be stronger than the occasion warrants. But think of a member of the House of Commons, in his place, moving that this question shall be submitted first to the Supreme Court of the Dominion of Canada, a body in which we are supposed to have the most eminent jurists in this country, or, in the alternative, to two judges of the province of Ontario. He practically says: "I would just as soon have the judgment of two judges of the province of Ontario on this question as the judgment of the whole Supreme Court of Canada." We must feel that this is more or less of an insult to the Supreme Court of this country to put it in contrast with two judges of the province of Ontario. Passing from the judges of the Supreme Court and the two judges of the province of Ontario, what justification is there for presenting to this House any resolution which would remove the consideration of this important question from the jurisdiction in which the question arises, namely, the jurisdiction of the Yukon Territory? Are these men to be brought from the Yukon Territory down to Ottawa, or Toronto, when it is purely a Yukon matter, and when, under the Controverted Elections Act, the Supreme Court of the Yukon Territory has jurisdiction? If the hon. gentleman wishes to be absolutely fair, and to be bound by the principles of law in regard to this question, I submit to the members of this House that there is absolutely no justification whatever for removing either one of the parties from the jurisdiction of the court in which the question before the House arises.

I think that this is a matter which should be disposed of by a committee of this House. I further think that if it is not so disposed of there is no authority whereby the members of this House can submit this case to the Supreme Court of Canada, or to any two judges in Ontario. If they do, it seems to me that they must stretch the Supreme Court Act to an extent which was never contemplated by the framers of that Act. If they could possibly get it in under section 60 it would have to come in under subsection (b) of the Supreme Court Act, which reads:

> Important questions of law or fact touching—(b) the constitutionality or interpretation of any Dominion or provincial legislation

It seems to me that we are not concerned in this case with any important question of law or fact touching the constitutionality or interpretation of the statutes under which elections are held. I submit that under the Act the principle upon which soldiers shall cast their vote is clearly laid down. I submit that the time in which that vote must be cast is clearly stated in the Military Voters' Act and that there is no question of constitutionality and no question of interpretation. We must take that Act and read it as we find it and if we do not, then we must be men enough to say whether or not the votes of these men overseas are going to be counted either for Dr. Thompson or for Mr. F. T. Congdon.

For these reasons I am going to ask this House to refer the matter back to the committee, and I ask that in accordance with the principle which is laid down in the 3rd edition of Bourinot's Parliamentary Practice, at page 556, and which reads:

> A report may be referred back to a committee for further consideration, or with instructions giving them power to amend the same in any respect. In this way a committee may regularly reconsider and even reverse a decision it has previously arrived at.

If my hon. friends have concluded that they have arrived at a decision, which conclusion I do not concur in, the matter still should be referred back to the committee, who have absolute power to deal with it in any manner they see fit. Therefore, for the purpose of bringing this matter to an issue I would move:

> That the second report of the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections be not concurred in, but that it be referred back to the said Committee for further consideration and to report thereon.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright): I want to present the case to the House, not in any legal way at all, but simply for the purpose of appealing to the sense of justice of hon. members, and also to their sense of fairness. Let me begin by stating that if there was delay in the consideration of this case by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, it was not due to any fault on the part of either of the parties concerned, nor was it due to any fault on the part of the members of the committee. My hon. friend (Mr. Tweedie), should not complain of this, because at the meeting of the committee which took place on Tuesday, April 21, according to the printed report of the proceedings of the committee, he first of all moved a motion and then withdrew it. Here is what the hon. gentleman said:

> I will withdraw the motion I made and substitute the following:
> That this Committee adjourn until eleven o'clock, on Thursday, May 2nd, and if at that time Mr. Congdon has not left the city of Vancouver for Ottawa, then this Committee should proceed to dispose of the case in his absence.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX: In his absence?

Mr. DEVLIN: Yes.

> If he has left then we will have a reasonable adjournment to allow him to get to the city of Ottawa.

That motion was carried.

Mr. TWEEDIE: I would like to make an explanation. I made no complaint whatever. I think the committee only acted fairly in adjourning from time to time to allow the interested parties to appear before them.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Against the wishes of the hon. gentleman?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. TWEEDIE: I moved the resolution.

Mr. DEVLIN: I am saying this in fairness to the hon. member. I am not complaining of his attitude at all, I simply want to show that the committee used all diligence in proceeding. Again on May 2, Mr. Tweedie moved:

> That the Committee adjourn until Tuesday morning next at ten-thirty o'clock, and then proceed to the consideration of the matter referred to.

That motion also was carried. That brought us up to the meeting of Tuesday, May 7, when Mr. Congdon was present, and the case was proceeded with. I mention this en passant, Mr. Speaker, in order to show that there was no fault to be found on account of the delays occasioned in the consideration of this case. The proceedings went on equitably and with all due haste. The consideration of the Yukon election was taken in different phases, and I am not going to review those phases. I merely want to point out that both candidates seemed to agree upon one thing: That the nomination papers were not to be held for any further consideration by the committee, but that they were to be accepted, the whole case then being reduced to a point of law as to whether the votes cast by the soldiers overseas should be considered in the election or not. Those members of the committee who are now present will, I think, bear me out in that statement. Nominations for the Yukon took place on December 31, 1917, and the polling day was fixed for January 28, 1918. It was contended by Mr. Congdon that any votes that were given before the day of nomination should not be counted in the election, and he supported his contention by citing different sections of the Elections Act, and notably of the Military Voters' Election Act, laying stress particularly upon section 6, and subsection 1 of section 8, the section reading:

> That at the expiration of the time for nominating the candidates—

that is to say at the expiration of the 31st of December, 1917. And then section 8:

> Polls shall be held in such camps or other places in Canada or elsewhere, as shall be assigned to the charge of presiding officers for the purposes of this part. Those held without Canada shall be maintained open during such sufficient number of days and during such hours as military exigencies will permit, but so that no polling shall commence before the day following that of the nomination of candidates, nor continue after eight o'clock of the evening of the day for holding the poll within Canada.

Let me again read the last words of the section just quoted:

> but so that no polling shall commence before the day following that of the nomination of candidates.

The nomination of candidates, I repeat, was on December 31st, 1917, and according to the Military Voters' Act, no polling of the soldiers could take place before the day following that of the nomination of candidates. There are certain exceptions to this, and notably in the case of emergencies. Subsection 5 of the said clause 8 reads:

> In any case where, for any reason, unless the vote of a military elector is immediately taken it is likely that he may not subsequently be able to vote, the Deputy Presiding Officer may take such vote otherwise than at a formally held poll, but such vote shall be so taken in the presence of the Deputy Scrutineers, or failing either or both, of a military elector, or two military electors, who shall, together with the Deputy Presiding Officer, sign upon the envelope in which the ballot is inserted a certificate that the vote was taken under this subsection, and the reasons which made it necessary.

In the opinion of the majority of the members of the Committee, the whole question then resolved itself into this simple legal question: Are the votes cast prior to nomination day for the Yukon, to be considered as votes cast in that election? In order to do justice to both candidates, the majority of the committee decided that, as it was purely a legal question, the matter should be referred in a stated case to the Supreme Court of Canada for decision. My hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) moved that a subcommittee should draft the stated case to be presented to the Supreme Court. I do not wish to enter more fully into this question; I simply desire to submit the matter to the House in fairness and justice to the people of Canada who are concerned in the election of a candidate to represent one of the constituencies of this Dominion, and in justice also to the two candidates themselves. Neither the one nor the other has any advantage to gain by referring the matter to the Supreme Court; neither the one nor the other is under any disadvantage through the fact that the Supreme Court, being a judicial body, accustomed to decide questions of law, will decide the one question that was up before the committee as to whether the votes cast before nomination day in the Yukon Territory should be considered or not. And for that purpose, Mr. Speaker, I beg to move in amendment to the motion of the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Tweedie), seconded by the hon. member for North Cape Breton:

> That all the words after "that" be struck out, and the following substituted therefor:
> That this House concurs in the said resolution of the Committee on Privileges and Elections presented to the House on the 13th day of May, concerning the election of a candidate to serve in the House of Commons for the Yukon Territory; that a stated case be prepared and submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada, or to any two judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario, for decision.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have not had opportunity to consider whether the amendment is of the nature of a negative motion. I reserve the right to determine subsequently whether it is in order or not.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): I shall be very brief in seconding the amendment of the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin). Perhaps I might, in the first instance, answer briefly the mover of the motion (Mr. Tweedie). He suggested that I had no business to move that this pure question of law should be submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada, and particularly that I had no right to say that, if it did not go to the Supreme Court of Canada it should go to two judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario. I do not know what the hon. member means by saying that I was trying to draw an insulting comparison between the Supreme Court of Canada and two judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario. Nothing could be further from my mind than to suggest such thing. The Supreme Court of Canada is par excellence the court to which any question of law which this Parliament wants decided should go. There is no question about that. I am asked why I suggested two judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario. The reason is that ordinarily any person who complains about an election has a right to petition, and by this petition he gets the benefit of the decision of two judges of the Supreme Court of a province. If he belongs to Ontario, or if the case is to be tried in the province of Ontario, he gets the benefit of the judicial knowledge of two judges of the Supreme Court of that province. That is why it seemed to me that if it was thought best to proceed along the line of a petition, it should go to the Supreme Court of the nearest and most convenient province. I did say in Committee that I was perfectly satisfied that it should go to the Yukon if they had judges there competent to deal with it, but that I thought it would be more convenient to submit the facts and argue the case before judges in Ottawa or Toronto, or some place close at hand, than to send men out to the Yukon to argue the case. That is the reason I suggested that the case should go forward to such a court as would be capable of dealing with it if it were proceeded with as a petition.

The submission by Parliament of questions of law to judges is not a new practice. It is an old practice in England, where the House of Commons and the House of Lords for many years have been in the habit of drafting questions of law difficult for them to decide and sending them down to judges of High Courts in England. The same practice is in vogue here. And where there is a question that is purely one of law, I submit to every sensible man in this House that the place to decide that question of law is a court properly constituted for that purpose. I have every respect, Sir, for the judgment and decision and conscientious beliefs and scruples of every man in this House. But we are in a House divided into two camps politically; we are a partisan body; we cannot escape from it. There may be a few here who are not partisans, but taking the House as a whole, it is a partisan body, and I am sure, Sir, that you and any reasonable man in this House will agree that a partisan body is not the proper court or institution to which to submit the deciding of a cold-blooded proposition of what the law is upon any given point. I felt that the same ideas and the same condition of things existed in the committee to which this matter was submitted, and I moved, therefore, on that occasion that it be taken out of the realm of party politics and sent where there would be no politics, and where the question of law would be dealt with purely and simply as the highest court in the land can deal with it.

The hon. member for Calgary seemed to express a doubt as to whether we have jurisdiction to send this matter to the Supreme Court of Canada. Of course, the House, as such, may not do so, although I think it is easily within the inference. But Section 60 of the Supreme Court Act, Chapter 139 of the Revised Statutes of Canada deals with questions of this kind. There are several things that we can submit to the Supreme Court of Canada. One is:

> The interpretation of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1886.

Another is:

> The constitutionality or interpretation of any Dominion or provincial legislation.

Even if the section went no further than this, we could very well send this matter to the Supreme Court for decision. But it proceeds:

> (c) the appellate jurisdiction as to educational matters, by The British North America Act, 1867, or by any other Act or law vested in the Governor in Council; or,
> (d) the powers of the Parliament of Canada, or of the legislatures of the provinces, or of the respective Governments thereof, whether or not the particular power in question has been or is proposed to be executed.

If under these provisions of the law any doubt exists as to our power to refer this matter to the Supreme Court, surely the following subsection is sufficiently sweeping:

> (e) any other matter, whether or not in the opinion of the court ejusdem generis with the foregoing enumerations, with reference to which the Governor in Council sees fit to submit any such question.

Under this provision the Governor in Council has wide power to submit to the Supreme court any question which should properly be decided by that body. I think that I have made it clear, therefore, that the Governor in Council has power and authority to submit this particular question to the Supreme Court. In any case, it should be submitted to some court satisfactory to the House and to the Governor in Council. I simply want to have a judicial finding upon a matter which is purely a question of law. The Prime Minister said this morning that in divorce cases it was unsatisfactory that questions of fact should be determined by the Senate or by any political body. If it is undesirable to try questions of fact or of law before a political body such as the Senate or this House, it is equally undesirable to try a question of this kind. While we have no power to send divorce cases to the Supreme Court of Canada, we we have power to refer to them a political question of this kind. When we did have jurisdiction to deal with these political questions—perhaps we have it yet—that jurisdiction was not vested in such a committee as we had the other day. As early as 1873 the then great leader of the Conservative party, Sir John A. Macdonald, as may be seen by reference to Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, introduced an Act into the House taking the jurisdiction in this matter entirely out of the realm of politics and placing it in the hands of the judges. Since I became a member of this House I have heard no hint of any such thing as an election trial before this House. If any such trials have taken place since 1873, I am not familiar with them. The feeling has been that the House should not try questions of law such as arise in election cases, but refer them to a competent court for decision.

Some hon. gentlemen may say that the case is plain; why should it not be decided on the spot? My answer is this: if this were a simple proposition, the Governor in Council, a body composed of very excellent lawyers, would at once direct the general returning officer to decide the case without delay. But they deemed the question of sufficient importance to cause them to issue an injunction to the general returning officer, instructing him not to decide the question. Mr. O'Connor, the general returning officer, is a good lawyer who has had a good deal of experience at the bar of Nova Scotia and has dealt with many intricate cases. He is well known to some of the members of Council, particularly to the Prime Minister. But it was deemed advisable to estop that gentleman from deciding this point, and to send it here to be dealt with. It is a pity that at the very outset this case was not sent to the court instead of this House. But if an error was made in sending it here, we have not yet gone too far; we should take the earliest opportunity of sending it to a proper court for decision. The member for South Toronto (Mr. Sheard) made a remark the other night—page 1815 of Hansard—which emphasizes what I mean when I say that this is not a proper court to try such cases. He said:

> I would form my opinion to some extent on the past history of the applicant, his or her experience, and the work that he or she had done, and the efficiency displayed in the particular branch in which the party had been engaged. If I were to undertake to give an opinion on a lawsuit, for instance, as to the grounds for submitting a case to the Court of Appeal, I would probably make a fool of myself.

That is what one of the brightest men in this House said about departing from his own sphere and passing judgment on something which his experience and training did not qualify him to decide. We should all be pleased that there is a court to which we can with confidence appeal concerning this point of law. Both sides will have full opportunity of arguing the matter. If the Supreme Court of Canada or two judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario decide that although one or other of these gentlemen was not nominated when the votes were cast, nevertheless the ballots should be counted one way or the other, then the person in whose favour that decision is given may be declared elected by the returning officer, and that will be an end to the whole business. No matter how we decide the point in this House, the decision will be looked upon with ridicule as a partisan one. The proper, the logical, the fair thing for this House to do is to refer to the Supreme Court the record, without change, as it has been handed down by the general returning officer, Mr. O'Connor. Then the decision will be regarded by all as satisfactory; the procedure will be fair and constitutional, and a precedent will be established which may safely be followed in future. I have much pleasure in seconding the amendment.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, the subject before the House is one with which I have some familiarity by reason of my attending on the Privileges and Elections Committee which has had the matter under review, but which has not finally dealt with it. My opinion is that the motion of the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Tweedie) should carry, and indeed, if this House is to dispose of the subject at all, his motion must carry. It is agreed by hon. gentlemen opposite who support the amendment that there was submitted to the Privileges and Elections Committee—to use the adjective of the preceding speaker (Mr. McKenzie) —a pure, cold-blooded question of law for decision, and that the committee declined to accept the task and recommended that it be committed elsewhere. I do not so regard the situation. There came before the Governor in Council a special report from the general returning officer, referring certain matters connected with the discharge of his duty in relation to the Yukon election to the consideration of Council, and referring Council to certain representations that had been made by Mr. Congdon, one of the candidates in the Yukon, to the effect that certain of the votes that had been cast in that election should not be counted in determining the results. The general returning officer's report was, on motion of the Prime Minister, submitted to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for consideration and determination, and for a report thereon to Parliament. I draw the attention of the House specially to the submission to the committee as passed by this House:

> Ordered, That the Special Return of the General Returning Officer to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery for Canada concerning the election of a candidate to serve in the House of Commons for the Yukon Territory be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections with power and authority to consider the same and the several documents therein alluded to and to report their conclusion and determination thereon to this House.

That was the duty of the Privileges and Elections Committee.

Mr. DEVLIN: If the minister was referring to me a moment ago, in saying that I made a statement that the only question which was submitted to the committee was a cold-blooded question of law, I think he misunderstood me. What I said was that the consideration of the whole question resolved itself into this—whether the soldiers' votes overseas should be counted or not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not refer to the hon. member. I gave the distinction of the use of that adjective to the hon. member (Mr. McKenzie).

Mr. DEVLIN: He is able to take care of himself.

Mr. McKENZIE: Perhaps I did not express myself clearly, but what I meant to say was that that was what the question resolved itself into; that was the result of it; that the question to be decided by the Committee was a question of law.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Those are precisely the words I attributed to the hon. member, and that is precisely why I take exception.

Mr. MURPHY: At what page is to be found the order which the minister has just read?

Mr. MEIGHEN: At page 1 of the Proceedings of the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. In pursuance of that committment of a clear and specific duty, there was carried in the Privileges and Elections Committee and reported to this House, a resolution recommending that the duty imposed upon them by this Parliament should be shifted from their shoulders to the Supreme Court of Canada, or to two judges of a court of Ontario, for determination upon a stated case. On the ground taken by the hon. member for West Calgary that the report of the committee is in no sense a discharge of the duty imposed upon it by this House, the only course left open to this House is to refer the matter back to that committee that it may discharge the duty imposed upon it by this House. Any other course is to depart from the stand taken by this House when that motion was passed. Either the House made a mistake when it took that stand and must now retract its position, modify its position, acknowledge its error, and settle the matter over again, or it must recommit to the Privileges and Elections Committee the duty which this House committed to it.

Was it right that Parliament should commit the adjudication of this matter to the committee? I think it was right, for the reason that the task of the committee is not by any means solely the determination of a question of law. The task of the committee is much larger than that. If it were solely a question of law, even then committees of this House have time and again questions of law and also questions of fact to determine. Questions involving both law and fact are time and again before committees of this House for determination and they are determined as best the committees can. But this is a threadbare, cold-blooded question of law and nothing else. There is a question of law involved, it is true; part of the question is a question of law. I shall see if I can define to the House this fine, hair-splitting question of law.

Mr. McCREA: The minister is well qualified to do so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The question is as to whether or not the term "nomination" day in the Military Voters' Act means the nomination day in each of the several constituencies, or means the general nomination day of Canada; whether or not the intention of Parliament was that the voters overseas should be all voted together in their respective constituencies at the same time over the same month, or whether they should be parted into camps and some voted in one period in one election and some in another, depending altogether when the vote should take place in the constituency in which they exercise their franchise. I was present when the Military Voters' Act was before this House; many other hon. members also were here, and I would like hon. gentlemen to search the records of Hansard and ascertain wherever a doubt arose in the fertile brains of any member of this House as to whether or not the vote of the soldiers overseas was all to be taken at the same time. Nobody ever questioned the thing; but it is contended—I shall not say rightly or wrongly, although I have an opinion—that according to the strict interpretation of the rules of law, the law is, that unless the overseas votes of a special constituency, namely the Yukon constituency, were taken after the day of nomination in that constituency, which day was the 29th of December, long after the whole general votes were taken overseas, then those votes could not be counted at all. It is argued, in support of that, that, inasmuch as they were taken previously, commencing on the day of the general nomination, the 19th of November, those overseas voters had voted without a full knowledge, at all events without official knowledge, of the candidates for whom they were voting. When I say that, I think I have said, in favour of the merits of contention, everything which has a right to consideration. That is a question of law; that may be called a cold-blooded question of law, and if there ever was something cold-blooded, in the nature of the legal interpretation, I think it is that.

But there is more than that involved; there is involved the question of right and justice; there is the question of the intent of Parliament, whatever be the specific interpretation of the law. There is the question of what, if that is the law, it is the duty of this Parliament to do in relation to the votes so cast. Was that duty not committed to the committee? If it should be found, on a cold-blooded question of law, that the correct interpretation was that these votes must be all disregarded, was it not the duty of the committee to determine whether or not Parliament should allow that evidence to go forward and deny the franchise to one-fifth of the electorate of that constituency, or whether it was the duty of this House to give to these men the franchise that it was within their power to exercise?

It has been argued on the part of some, as I stated before, that these men did not know officially who the candidates were, and that may be quite correct. It is argued on the part of others that these men knew who the Government was, and who the Opposition was, and knew what the issue of the election was, and to the utmost of the power reposed in them under the law of Canada, exercised the franchise which was given to them; and if it should be found, in the determination of the law alone, that because they voted before the twenty-ninth day of December their votes should not be counted, then we would have to decide whether that was sufficient reason for the Parliament of Canada to say to them: "Because you voted without knowing who the candidates were we will legalize the franchise you exercised so far as it was in your power to exercise it." They voted for the Government or for the Opposition; they voted for or against the issue of conscription; they exercised the franchise to the full extent it was in their power to exercise it when they cast their ballot, and if we decide that having done so there is a legal objection to counting the votes, then what is the duty of Parliament in the premises? Is it the duty of Parliament to legalize those votes, or shall we say that on account of the fault of Parliament these men shall remain disfranchised throughout the life of this Parliament? That was the question submitted for determination to the Privileges and Election Committee by a resolution of this House. The Privileges and Elections Committee have made no report on that question at all, but on the motion of an hon. member of the committee it was decided without discussion, and I blame no one for that, simply to refer the cold-blooded question of law to the Supreme Court of Canada or to two judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario.

Now in the first place the only way to submit a stated case, as was very clearly explained by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Tweedie), is for all the parties interested in that case to agree upon a wording, and then lay the case before the tribunal for determination. Who are all the parties interested in this case? Are they only the late hon. member for the Yukon, Mr. Thompson, and Mr. Congdon, the Opposition candidate. Is nobody else interested? Are the people of the territory itself not interested, irrespective entirely of the personal rights of these men? Are the voters overseas, some 325 men, not interested, entirely irrespective of the rights of Mr. Congdon and Mr. Thompson? Are they not to be represented in making a stated case to the Supreme Court or to two judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario? And if they are to be represented, how are they to be represented, and who is to decide that matter? None of these questions are dealt with in this report. Furthermore, I contend that even if this House had adopted the report and went further, and did what the committee refused to do laid out the machinery by which this stated case would be prepared, and had the matter submitted to the Supreme Court, the Supreme Court would be compelled to decide they had no jurisdiction to try the case at all. From no other source can the Supreme Court have jurisdiction except from the common law of Canada and the statute law, and I argue that neither common law nor statute law gives the Supreme Court any jurisdiction to hear and determine a report from a committee of Parliament. I do not think any elaboration of my own opinion would be very convincing to the House on a matter of this nature, but I take the liberty of quoting the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice on this point, which is to the effect that neither the Supreme Court of Canada nor any two judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario would have power to hear and determine such a matter, merely upon its submission by this House, as the report of the Privileges and Elections Committee. The opinion is contained in a memorandum to the Prime Minister dated May 15 and is as follows:

> The Select Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Privileges and Elections, upon reference of the special return of the General Returning Officer to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery concerning the Yukon election, recommends that a stated case be prepared and submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada, or to any two judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario, for decision.
> Obviously such a reference may be made only if it be within the jurisdiction of the court or the judges, either inherently or by statute, to determine upon such a reference the question submitted by the stated case. Now there can be no doubt that it is not at common law a part of the duty of the courts, or the judges, to determine questions referred by a committee of the House of Commons.
> It is provided by the Supreme Court Act, section 61 that the court, or any two judges thereof shall examine and report upon any private Bill or petition for a private Bill presented to the Senate or House of Commons, and referred to the court under any rules or orders made by the Senate or House of Commons.
> This section describes a jurisdiction somewhat analogous to that which the House of Lords exercises to put questions of law to the judges, the answer to which may be necessary to the House in its legislative capacity. The House of Lords also in its judicial capacity may consult the judges, but that power is exercised only for the purpose of obtaining advice with respect to the disposition of pending cases, and as to this the jurisdiction is different from any which is possessed by either House of Parliament in Canada. With respect to advice upon legislative questions the judges in England, as the cases show, have been very careful to confine their answers to the strict legal construction of existing statutes, and they have asked to be excused from answering questions which go beyond this. It will be perceived, however, that section 61 of the Supreme Court Act falls far short of enabling a committee of the House of Commons to submit a stated case with regard to an election return, and, except for section 61, there is no legislation authorizing the court or the judges to advise the House, or any committee. The business of the court is to determine questions raised between parties impleaded in judicial proceedings, and moreover no doubt to execute any judicial duty which may be imposed by statute but as the proceeding recommended by the committee is entirely novel and not within any jurisdiction which the court possesses, it is out of question that the court would decline to adjudicate upon any case submitted by the committee, or by the House upon the recommendation of the committee, and I apprehend that the only way in which the committee's recommendation could be made effective would be by statute imposing a new duty upon the court.

Words could not be clearer as to the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice on the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to hear such a commitment did this Parliament adopt the report. So upon the score of that the court suggested would have no jurisdiction whatever to determine the issue if it were committed to it, on the score, secondly, that there is no method of putting the case to the court if they had jurisdiction, and on the score, thirdly, and most strongly of all, that it is the duty of a committee of this House to discharge an obligation imposed upon them by this House and not to seek to evade that charge, and because this House is bound in justice to itself not to evade its duty until it has exhausted all its powers under a committee, I think we ought to adopt the motion of the hon. member for Calgary and refer the matter back.

Mr. J. A. CAMPBELL: I am somewhat removed from the Yukon, and have to rely mainly on newspaper reports, but I understand from those reports that there was no real issue in the election in that constituency, as both candidates stood on practically the same platform as supporters of conscription and Union Government. Perhaps the minister will say whether I am misinformed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the matter raised by the hon. member should affect the case now before Parliament, but on that matter there are very conflicting opinions

Hon. W. S. FIELDING: Mr. Speaker, if we were dealing with the merits of this question we might bring it home to ourselves, in one of our nearby constituencies, without going to the far-away Yukon. Suppose that on the 19th November in any constituency in Canada the nominations were being made and somebody should come up and say: "Look here, Mr. Returning Officer, we thought this election was going on some time ago; we held a meeting in our district, we have been doing some voting and we propose that you shall count the votes given some weeks ago when there were no candidates in the field." What would the returning officer say? Surely he would say at once: "There is no candidate in the field until the candidate is nominated, and when there is no candidate in the field, votes can hardly be counted in an election which comes on later." That seems to me to be reason and common sense. But we are not called upon in any degree to go into the merits of this question here because it seems to be rather a legal question. I was somewhat surprised at the argument put up by the Hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) when he said the committee had no discretion in this matter. We passed a resolution in this House referring the matter to a committee. I think I am justified in saying that in so doing we expressed no opinion at all. We simply referred this matter to the committee for inquiry and investigation. "No," says the Minister of the Interior, "we did not; we referred it to you with a command to settle this question yourselves." Surely that cannot have been the spirit in which this House adopted the reference. Surely it was referred to the committee with the understanding that they should deal with it as they thought best. But even if there were that command given, even if they were instructed to inquire and come to a determination and if, in their judgment they should come to the conclusion that the matter was one which might properly be referred to the court, would they not be justified in reporting accordingly? Would my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior seriously claim that because of the words of the reference, because of the instructions that they were to inquire into the matter, and to reach a conclusion and report, they were thereby not permitted to make a report advising a reference to the court? The essence of this question, as between the two motions, seems to be this: The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Tweedie) desires that the matter shall be settled by the House and by a committee of the House. He says that he desires to refer this matter back to the committee in order that the committee of the House may settle it at once. In other words, he does not want any legal reference at all. On the other hand, the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) has proposed that this matter be referred to the higher courts. The essence of the question is whether this House desires to settle this thing itself or whether it desires to obtain a judicial opinion on a judicial matter. That seems to me to be the essence of the whole question. If the machinery whereby that judicial tribunal is to be created is defective, by all means let us try to make it effective. The essence of the whole question is: "Shall we deal with this matter in the House or by a judicial reference?" On that question I do not believe there should be any hesitation in the mind of any reasonable man. Parliament has a long history in regard to the question of the trial of controverted elections. Away back in the early times of the House of Commons of Great Britain from which we draw our inspiration and practice it was found inconvenient for the House to deal with these matters because many difficulties arose from that practice, and more than that, they obtained a distinctly partisan decision. And so, in the progress of time the procedure was changed and it was agreed that a committee should be chosen to deal with these matters. For some years the committee procedure was followed. But there again they found that they were using partisan machinery to deal with questions which were not properly the subject of partisan consideration. After further years of progress it was decided that the committee system was wrong. I have a recollection of such cases in our provincial legislature. One arose in Nova Scotia in my boyhood days long before Confederation, as a result of which party feeling and great personal bitterness existed for a long period afterwards. The case was tried by a committee of the House and a decision was reported favourable to one candidate and confirming in his seat the member who had been returned. I remember that a very distinguished statesman, who afterwards rose to great eminence in this House, when, in later years another distinguished man was proposed to be made chief justice of Nova Scotia, declared in the political journal which he controlled that the latter was unfit to be a judge in Nova Scotia because he had perjured himself in that election case. That is the kind of thing you get if you proceed to deal with these matters through a party tribunal in the form of a committee of the House. There have been some cases even in this Parliament in which it was felt that that procedure was very unsatisfactory and by the common consent of all parties this Parliament resolved that it was incompetent to discuss questions of that character and that in fairness and justice all such matters should be referred to a judicial tribunal under the Controverted Elections Act.

Mr. CURRIE: Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) tell me when it was decided that Parliament was incompetent to settle these cases?

Mr. FIELDING: I cannot give my hon. friend the date of the Controverted Elections Act, but it was in the early days.

Mr. McKENZIE: 1873.

Mr. FIELDING: I say that Parliament decided it would no longer have the committee system and that there should be created a judicial tribunal for the performance of such duties. But Parliament has not absolutely dispossessed itself of authority in such matters. There are cases in which Parliament will still take action, but they are not cases which are purely matters of dispute between the parties. Take the case in which an Irish constituency returned O'Donovan Rossa. It was reported to Parliament that he was a convict. He was known to be a convict, and not only a convict but actually in prison. There arose a question as to whether he should be debarred from taking his seat. It was argued that he was not qualified to take his seat, and Parliament decided that it would not allow him to take his seat. There was no dispute as to the validity of the return; it was a question of qualification or disqualification, and it was therefore a question with which Parliament itself should deal. John Mitchell was returned by acclamation for Tipperary. John Mitchell was an escaped political convict, and Parliament decided that he was disqualified. There was no dispute as to the return, but Parliament determined that he was not qualified and it ordered a new writ to issue. John Mitchell became a candidate again mation, and I would ask hon. members to observe the distinction which Parliament made. John Mitchell having been elected by acclamation, there was no question as to the procedure by the returning officer; it was purely a question of qualification, and the House of Commons decided that it should have the say as to that. But when John Mitchell became a candidatae again he was opposed, and the question became more than one of qualification; it became a question of dispute between two candidates. Then Parliament said: "It is not a matter within our power; that must go to a judicial tribunal."

Some years ago a very famous case occurred in this House, commonly known as the King-Baird case. It will be admitted by anybody who reads the evidence that all the facts in that case were in favour of Mr. King. But Mr. Baird had been declared returned by the returning officer. The issue was threshed out, and it became more or less a matter of party controversy. However, the conclusion reached was that Parliament ought not to take any action. Sir John Thompson, who was then Minister of Justice, made a very strong argument based simply on the ground that it was a judicial matter in which Parliament should not interfere. Now the equities were so strongly with Mr. King that public opinion forced Mr. Baird, although he was sustained in his seat, to resign and be again elected. But notwithstanding that the case, in point of equity, was so strongly in favour of Mr. King, Sir John Thompson took the ground: this is not a question for Parliament, but one for the judicial tribunals of the country. I do not think this should be a matter of party controversy. We are going to make precedents in this matter to-day, and hon. gentlemen on both sides should be chary of creating precedents that may be embarrassing in the future. If there is one thing more than another which has been clearly understood it is that the House of Commons of Canada ought not of itself to undertake to deal with questions of this kind, because of the danger of partisanship entering into the matter, and, therefore, Parliament would be acting wisely in determining upon a reference to the judiciary of the country. If the machinery by which that can be done is not effective, let us improve it, but let us not try to settle the matter here in violation of the long traditions of Parliament, which declare that the courts, and not the House of Commons, are the proper authorities to decide matters of this kind.

At one o'clock the House rose.

The House resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, the House is certainly indebted to the hon. member for Queens and Shelburne (Mr. Fielding) for having put this matter before it in its proper light. As he rightly said, the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections was certainly not a refusal on the part of the members of that committee to deal with the question referred to them by the order of reference of this House. The order of reference reads:

> That the Special Return of the General Returning Officer to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery for Canada concerning the election of a candidate to serve in the House of Commons for the Yukon Territory be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections with power and authority to consider the same and the several documents therein alluded to and to report their conclusion and determination thereon to this House.

The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) to the contrary notwithstanding, the Committee on Privileges and Elections have considered the matter referred to them, and they have reported their conclusion and determination to the House. After having heard the arguments of both parties, they have determined that the question resolves itself into a mere question of law, and that it should not be left to the members of the committee, which may be a partisan committee, to decide, but that it should be decided by judicial authority. That is the gist of the case. I am not concerned as to whether the drafting is defective; that may easily be remedied by the House. Even if an Act of Parliament is necessary to give effect to the views of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, such an Act may very expeditiously be passed.

The question as to who is to represent a particular constituency in the Canadian House of Commons is of very great importance. It is just as important a question as whether a county will be represented at all, and interests not only the people of the particular constituency affected, but the people of the country as a whole. All citizens of Canada are interested in the ability, integrity, qualifications and standing of all and any of the members of the House of Commons. So the question of considering the conflicting claims of two gentlemen who assert their right to a seat in this House must be dealt with without any party spirit and free from all political bias on the part of the members of this House. By the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, this Parliament, following the precedent of the British Parliament, has left to judicial authority the decision of all questions relating to controverted elections. The principle goes to the extent, as is asserted by British constitutional authority, that the only question which Parliament has reserved to itself to deal with is the question as to whether a proper or fit person has been returned in obedience to the writ. I will quote the words of the late Sir John Thompson, then Minister of Justice, uttered in the House of Commons in 1887, as found on page 157 of Hansard of that year.

Mr. BURNHAM: Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him if he does not consider that the whole question is comprised in the disenfranchisement or otherwise of the soldiers?

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I will deal with that later on. Here are the words of the late Sir John Thompson:

> Since the change which I have referred to, and by which Parliament has renounced its rights to deal with the matter of controverted elections, there has been fully recognized in the various discussions that have taken place in the Imperial House of Commons, this principle, that everything has been transferred to the judiciary in connection with controverted elections, excepting the one question of the disqualification of persons who have been returned to Parliament. As was said by Sir Henry James, in 1882, in the case of Michael Davitt, the only question which Parliament has reserved to itself to deal with is the question whether a proper person has been returned in obedience to the writ As was explained by Lord Coleridge and Lord Selborne in a previous debate in 1870, that reservation is not in conflict with the Statute which says that the election shall only be contested by an election petition, because the House has to consider whether the writ has been obeyed which commanded the electors of the shire, or the county, to return a suitable person to sit in that House. The House, therefore, is still seized of the right to decide whether the writ has been obeyed by the election of a person who is fit and proper to sit in that House. But as soon as the question has been decided as to the qualification of the person so returned, the conduct of the returning officer, or the number of votes which were received, the conduct of the candidates, and every other question connected with the election, or with the conduct of the returning officer, has been relegated to the judiciary, and the House has always declined to exercise its functions and its power to interfere.

I shall also quote the words of May in his "Parliamentary Practice:"

Before the year 1770, controverted elections were tried and determined by the whole House of Commons, as mere party questions, upon which the strength of contending factions might be tested.

In order to prevent so notorious a perversion of justice, the House consented to submit the exercise of its privilege to a tribunal constituted by law, which, though composed of its own members, should be appointed so as to secure impartiality, and the administration of justice according to the laws of the land, and under the sanction of oaths.

Further on he says:

This principle was maintained, with partial alterations of the means by which it was carried out, until 1868, when the jurisdiction of the House, in the trial of controverted elections was transferred by statute to the courts of law.

In this country this principle has been accepted in our Dominion Controverted Elections Act. Section 91 of that Act says:

All elections shall be subject to the provisions of this Act, and shall not be questioned otherwise than in accordance herewith.

And this applies, Mr. Speaker, even when no return has been made. Section 11 of the Act says:

The petition presented under this Act may be in any prescribed form; but, if or in so far as no form is prescribed, it need not be in any particular form, but it must complain of the undue election or return of a member or that no return has been made, or that a double return has been made, or of matter contained in any special return made,

And so on. And Section 8 says:

Whenever a petition under this Act, complaining of no return, is presented, such order may be made thereon by the court as is deemed expedient for compelling a return to be made.

So that the matter of controverted elections is entirely left to judicial authority, whether a return has been made by the returning officer, or whether no return at all has been made.

Of all cases, Sir, it seems to me that the present instance should be decided according to that principle. There are no questions of fact discussed or even challenged. The Act of 1917 amending the election law must be interpreted according to the views of Dr. Thompson, or it must be interpreted according to those of Mr. Congdon. This Parliament cannot make a law for the purpose of changing a law which was passed last year in order that the change can be made applicable to an election which has actually taken place. Retroactivity in a case of that kind would be immoral on its very face. So the law as it is must be interpreted, and what the members of this House must ask themselves is: What is the proper authority to interpret that law?

I respectfully submit that the judicial authority, not this Parliament, is the only proper authority to interpret the statute passed last year. Let me ask members of the House this simple question: Do they consider that they are as well qualified as the members of the Supreme Court of Canada to interpret a law or to decide a case arising from the interpretation of a law, either from the point of view of legal knowledge, of judicial experience or even of impartiality? For my part, I admit that my qualification for that duty is not equal to that of the Supreme Court of Canada. I have my views on the matter; perhaps I may state them in a few words. It is the essential factor of an election that there should be candidates. Without candidates there can be no election. It necessarily follows that votes registered at a time or in a county when or where there is no candidate have no legal value, are worth no more than blank pieces of paper. That is my opinion, but I am willing to abide by the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada.

The first principle of responsible Government is the right to vote for a particular candidate and for the man. That rule has never been departed from in any country under the British flag. It was departed from to a certain extent for the first time at the last election, but even then it was provided that the electors could vote for the man. But in the Yukon case the voters did not have that right until after December 31, 1917; therefore all votes cast before that date are contrary to law and contrary to the rights of the parties. But I repeat that I am willing to leave the decision of this matter to judicial authority.

As to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Canada to deal with a case of this kind, I do not think that there is any difficulty. Even the Minister of the Interior

(Hon. Arthur Meighen) and the gentleman who wrote the letter that he quoted this morning, have said that Parliament could pass a law conferring such jurisdiction on the Supreme Court. He could not say otherwise, because section 43 of the Supreme Court Act says:

> Notwithstanding anything in this Act contained the court shall also have jurisdiction as provided in any other Act conferring jurisdiction.

It would be very easy to pass an Act to confer such jurisdiction on the court, but I submit that that is not necessary. Section 60 of the Act provides that the Governor in Council may refer the decision of a question of law to the Supreme Court. It says:

> Important questions of law or fact touching the constitutionality or interpretation of any Dominion or Provincial legislation may be referred by the Governor in Council to the Supreme court for hearing and consideration.

Surely the present case, which touches the interpretation of a Dominion statute, could, under this provision, be referred by the Governor in Council to the Supreme Court of Canada. I am surprised that instead of passing the Order in Council of February 26 referring this matter to Parliament the Government did not adopt the simpler method of dealing with it by referring it to the Supreme Court of Canada. Let no hon. gentleman tell me that the Governor in Council only can do that. Surely Parliament is superior to the Governor in Council. If an Order in Council is necessary to the making of such a reference, surely this House may instruct or even order the issuing of such an order. The executive power is the servant, not the master, of the legislative power. However objectionable the assertion may be to their pride, ministers of the Crown are the servants, not the masters of Parliament. Surely a decision of this House confirming the decision of the Committee on Privileges and Elections is equivalent to an instruction to the Governor in Council to refer the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada, which they have the power to do under the Supreme Court Act.

The decision of the Supreme Court in this matter would be easy of execution. They would either instruct the returning officer to count or not to count the challenged votes, or instruct the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to declare Dr. Thompson or Mr. Congdon duly elected. Shorn of all legal technicalities, the question is, can the votes which were given and registered previous to the nomination of candidates—in other words, when there were no candidates—be counted under the law of the country as it is to-day? I respectfully submit that the matter of deciding this question does not pertain to the members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or to the members of this House. I strongly urge members of the House not to take a step backwards, but to act according to constitutional usage and authority and to leave the decision of such an important question to the judiciary of the land.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): My hon. friend (Mr. E. Lapointe) attaches a meaning to the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections and to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin), which it is rather difficult to follow. Both the report and the amendment, if adopted by this House, would be admittedly ineffective so far as the two judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario are concerned, and, unless the Governor in Council should act according to my hon. friend's suggestion—I will deal with that a little later—they would be equally ineffective so far as the Supreme Court of Canada is concerned. Does my hon. friend (Mr. E. Lapointe) suggest that the Governor in Council, or this House, has without special legislation, power to refer this matter to two judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario. The hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) who moved the resolution in the Committee admitted that, according to his view, the Committee on Privileges and Elections and not the Governor in Council should have prepared the stated case. Hon. gentlemen who have dealt with this matter do not seem quite to understand what it is they do suggest. Let us, in the first place recall the fact that this matter came into this House by reason of a special return which did not declare any candidate elected for the Yukon territory. Having come into this House on the report of the General Returning Officer, it was referred by unanimous consent, as the House deemed proper to refer it, to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I repeat that, according to my conception, the Committee on Privileges and Elections have made to this House a report which is both impracticable and ineffective, and for that reason I think it ought to be referred back in order that they may make a report such as the House contemplated when the reference was made in the first instance. The question came into this House upon a special return.

The House had the right to deal with that return. The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom the matter was referred, had the right to deal with it, and that Committee have left the matter just about where it was in the first instance, I have already said that no hon. gentleman in this House would for one moment contend that this report or the amendment could be carried out in its literal terms. Both the report and the amendment suggest that this matter may be left to two judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario. Those who vote for this amendment vote their belief that this House can properly refer the matter to two judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario, or that the Governor in Council could do so. The matter would degenerate into a farce if the Governor in Council attempted to do anything of the kind, because everyone in this House knows perfectly well that the Governor in Council has no such power. So far as the Supreme Court of Canada is concerned, neither the report nor the amendment suggests that the Governor in Council should take any action.

The purport of the motion in committee of the hon. member (Mr. McKenzie) was that a committee of this House should refer the question to the Supreme Court of Canada. Neither this House nor the Committee on Privileges and Elections has any such power without special legislation. So far as the Governor in Council is concerned, I do not concur in the view expressed by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) that this is in contemplation of section 60 of the Supreme Court Act. On the contrary, I am impressed with the view taken by the Deputy Minister of Justice. It seems to me it was not the intention of that Act to refer controverted election matters—because this practically amounts to that—to refer questions between parties, although these matters concern this House as well—to the Supreme Court of Canada for determination under section 60 of the Supreme Court Act. No such jurisdiction has ever been exercised by the Governor in Council in such matters in the past, and I venture to believe it was not the intention of the Act that they should be so referred.

Just one or two words more. My hon. friend (Mr. E. Lapointe) speaks of any action by this House or by a committee of this House, which would not be based upon an exact and literal interpretation of the Military Voters' Act or the War-time Elections Act, as quite immoral.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I never said that.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Does my hon. friend understand that any member of this House during the past session, when those Acts were passed, had it in contemplation that, by reason of such conditions as he has alluded to, three or four hundred men—I forget how many—who have gone overseas to fight for this country and who, equally with the other 300,000 had the right to vote, should be deprived of their franchise? That, I think, is a pretty important question to take into consideration. This House has rights; the people of this country have rights, and the men who, under the terms of that Act, according to its true intention, were to have the right to vote, must also be taken into consideration when this matter comes to be determined, and the matter could not be put more clearly than it was put before the Committee on Privileges and Elections by Mr. Congdon, one of the candidates at the recent election in the Yukon. This is what Mr. Congdon said on the 7th of this month before that committee:

> There cannot be any doubt that even under the Controverted Elections Act of Canada the House of Commons still has jurisdiction over election matters of this kind; that was evidenced by the fact that even in the case of an election petition before a court established under the Controverted Elections Act, the court might report to Parliament, which enables Parliament to go further than any decision which could possibly be given by the court and to come to a conclusion such as the court could not possibly arrive at. The commonwealth is interested in the service of every member of the Commons' House of Parliament, and the court and the council of State and Justice of which this Committee is the representative is governed by rules of state and law peculiar and more high and more politic than those which govern the court in cases of any matter between party and party. For this reason it has always been the practice in regard to matters of this kind not to be scared away by technicalities, not to be hampered by rules which might be binding in courts of Justice, but to go straight to the heart of the matter, and determine what is just in regard to the matter in dispute.

I do not think the matter could be put in more cogent terms. I may be permitted to recall the attention of the hon. member for Kamouraska to the fact that the Act in question deliberately sanctioned the vote by men overseas, not for a particular candidate, but for one party or the other in this House. That was the purpose of this Act. Men were authorized to vote either for the Government or the Opposition; and for the very reason that it might, in some instances, be impossible for those men to know who was the particular candidate supporting the Government or the particular candidate supporting the Opposition, that provision was inserted in the Bill presented to the House. For that reason, Parliament sanctioned that principle, and even if there be such a technicality as that hon. gentleman relies on, I think that statute, interpreted, according to the language of Mr. Congdon before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, might not necessarily result in the disfranchisement of three or four hundred gallant men from the Yukon who have fought the battles of this country overseas and who have the same right to be heard in the determination of their representative in this Parliament as any other man in this country or any other soldier overseas. My hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) has addressed certain observations to this House with the greater part of which I agree, but I venture to think that the very argument which he put forward constitutes one of the strongest reasons for referring this matter back to the Committee of Privileges and Elections. He says that if it is necessary, for the purpose of doing what is right and just and fair in this matter, let us have special legislation. Well if we are to have special legislation was it not the duty of the Committee on Privileges and Elections to suggest that to us; and to prepare a draft of that necessary legislation and report it to the House? Instead of doing that they have brought in a report which I repeat is in its terms both impracticable and ineffective. The committee in short has not discharged the functions conferred upon it by this Parliament when the special election return was referred to it, and under those circumstances I think it is eminently right and proper that the report should be referred back for further consideration by that committee. If the committee reaches the conclusion that there should be special legislation one way or the other—special legislation to assure to these soldiers the right to the franchises which Parliament undoubtedly intended to confer upon them, or special legislation for the purpose of making it abundantly clear that some court in this country shall have the power to determine this matter—then let the Committee on Privileges and Elections take that matter into consideration, prepare their draft of the proposed legislation, and report it to the House. For the reasons which were urged by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens, if for no other reason, I would think that the report should be referred back. I am content to leave the matter there, pointing out to my hon. friend who has last spoken (Mr. E. Lapointe) that it never was the intention of this Parliament from first to last to deprive a single man of those 300,000 who are overseas of the right to vote because he did not happen to know who the candidate was. That I repeat never was the intention of Parliament from first to last, and if there is any technicality in the statute by reason of which the postponement of the election in the Yukon will bring about a different result from that which would have been brought about if that particular contingency had been foreseen and provided for in clear terms in the statute, I still think it is the duty of this House to take very carefully into consideration whether or not they are to sanction the disfranchisement of the soldiers who have voted and whose right to vote is now called in question.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, the legislation of last session was of such a hasty character that we need not be surprised if it has resulted in a great deal of confusion, one or two instances of which have already come to our attention. The Act was passed without any contemplation of a case such as we have before us to-day; in fact, many of the points which have arisen in the working out of the Act were not foreseen. For instance, the Act provides that a petition to controvert an election must be presented within forty days of the election, together with the return or no return, and so on. The date for the nomination of candidates in the Yukon was the thirty-first day of December, 1917, and as some of the votes were polled overseas, it was not possible to have a full return of the election within forty days of nomination. The same condition applies in practically every riding, and therefore under the law there could be no petition against an election. I might allude to an election in one of the western provinces which my friends wanted to controvert; we thought there was good ground for protest, and we were satisfied that if the matter was brought before a court the election would be set aside, but we could not bring a protest at all because in framing the new legislation last year regard had not been had to existing legislation. Another contingency was not foreseen. The legislation of last session provided that the election in the Yukon should take place, not at the same time as the general election, but afterwards, and it should have been the duty of Parliament, primarily, the duty of the Government, who had charge of the legislation and introduced it, to provide for the Yukon soldiers' vote being protected. But their votes were not protected, and the Act was passed with all the blemishes with which we are now familiar. Provision should have been made to secure the soldiers' votes in the Yukon election, but that was not done, and therefore the soldiers' votes did not apply.

The Prime Minister a moment ago made a strong point of the fact that the soldiers might be disfranchised. That may be, but it will not be the fault of Parliament, but the fault of the law which did not provide for this case. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior said that the soldiers knew whether they voted for the Government or for the Opposition. In the Military Voters Bill of 1915 provision was not made for the mention of any particular candidate on the ballot; the soldier was simply permitted to vote for the Government or for the Opposition. I called the attention of my right hon. friend to that point last year and the section was amended. Primarily, of course, the Government and the Opposition are at issue, but the candidate himself has always an influence on the elector, and we should not abridge the elector's liberty in that respect in the slightest degree. Everybody in this House knows that many and many a time an elector will be influenced to vote for this or that candidate for other than political reasons, and sometimes for political reasons which the elector will not accept generally, but will accept in a particular case. Again, a man may be in favour of the Government or Opposition candidate, but will not support the policy of the Government or of the Opposition. On the other hand, many and many an elector is in sympathy with the Government or Opposition, but not in sympathy with the Government or Opposition candidate. These considerations influence the voters many and many a time. But the Military Voters' Act of 1915 swept all these considerations aside, and limited the soldiers' choice to the Government or Opposition candidate, without mention of his name.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think I can very positively say that my right hon. friend is falling into error when he says that in the Act of 1915 there was no provision by which a man could vote for a particular candidate. I have not the statute before me, but my recollection is very clear on the point.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My memory may be at fault, but I do not think so. Supposing I am wrong, I come now to a provision which I certainly believe was not in the Act of 1915. Here is the ballot which was submitted to the soldier:

> The deputy presiding officer shall sign such certificate and deliver the envelope on which it appears, with a ballot paper, to the voter, who may mark the ballot paper in accordance with the directions thereon as a vote for the Government, the Opposition, or any Independent candidate or candidates, or Labour candidate or candidates or for any candidate or candidates (if more than one candidate is to be elected) designated by name for whom he desires to vote;

Whether that is in the Act of 1915 or not, it is in the Act of 1917. The voter could vote for the Government; he could vote for the Opposition, for Mr. Congdon, or for Mr. Thompson, but at the time he voted he could vote for neither Mr. Thompson nor Mr. Congdon because neither Mr. Thompson nor Mr. Congdon was a candidate. Therefore, his liberty was abridged. He could not select as between any candidate because there were no candidates in the field. Will my hon. friend tell me that under such circumstances it is fair to Mr. Congdon, or fair to Mr. Thompson, when the voters could vote neither for one nor the other? That is the reason that all the arguments which have been put up by hon. gentlemen opposite fall to the ground. The liberty of the elector was abridged. If it was intended, as it should have been when it was made the general law of the land, that the law should be applied in the Yukon as well as anywhere else, it should have been provided that voters in the Yukon should vote not before there were candidates but after there were candidates. Why was that not done? Somebody blundered perhaps but it was not done and that is the condition we have to-day. Mr. Congdon, who had a majority of the votes of those who alone could vote in the election, made a protest to the returning officer that he should not count the soldiers' votes. He gave as a reason probably in his own mind, if not in writing, that the liberty of the voter had been abridged in that nobody was named as a candidate and the choice was limited simply between the Government and the Opposition. The returning officer did not decide the objection himself. He referred it to the Governor in Council. I do not know what authority the Government had to deal with the matter when they passed the Order in Council. I suppose they derived their authority from section 19 of the Act of last year which reads:

> For the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this Part, or supplying any deficiency therein, the Governor General in Council may make such regulations, not inconsistent therewith, as may be deemed necessary.

I doubt very much if under this section of the Act the Governor in Council could pass an Order in Council which was passed because it was not a regulation. A regulation would have been passed before the election and not after the election. But they did it. In the preamble of that Order in Council I read this:

The Governor in Council is pleased under authority of section 19 of Part IV. of the Dominion Elections Act, and section 6 of the War Measures Act, 1914, to make the following regulations and the same are hereby made and enacted accordingly.

I do not know whether the War Measures Act would give any power to the Governor in Council but this is the Order:

The general returning officer shall, with respect to the elections in said electoral districts of the Yukon Territory, and Nelson, make to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery a special return fully disclosing the conditions and showing the result of the polling and such return shall be put before the House of Commons for its consideration and for such action by it as may be deemed necessary or proper according to the circumstances.

When this return was laid before the House, the House very properly, referred it to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The committee met, considered the matter and they made the report which is now before us. In it they stated that in their opinion the matter should be decided by judicial authority. My hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Tweedie) who made the motion that is now before the House, took exception to this report. I will read it in order to make intelligible that which is to follow. It is recommended:

That a stated case be prepared and submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada, or to any two judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario, for decision.

My hon. friend from West Calgary stated that the committee had not properly discharged its duty. I cannot agree with him and I believe that on reflection he must come to the conclusion that the point that he has now raised is not justified. The reference is in these terms:

Ordered, that the special return of the general returning officer to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery for Canada concerning the election of a candidate to serve in the House of Commons for the Yukon Territory be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections with power and authority to consider the same and the several documents therein alluded to and to report their conclusion and determination thereon to this House.

[Sir Wilfrid Laurier.]

We have to-day that conclusion and determination. The conclusion and determination, as stated here, is that a stated case should be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada, or to any two judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario, for decision. They did not take it upon themselves to determine the case involved for the very reasons which have been given in this discussion already. The committee is composed of the members of this House and the members of this House are actively engaged in politics. We may make the concession that we are partisans. However honestly we may hold to our opinions. I suppose our opinions and our convictions may be said to be biased one way or the other. The judges are supposed to be and ought to be above party consideration. I think we can say in fairness to the bench of Canada that whenever a man goes upon the bench, whatever may have been his political proclivities in the past, from that time on he leaves them behind him and goes into the matters that are placed before him and decides the cases with which he has to deal according to law and the principles of justice as he understands them. The committee, of which my hon. friend is a member, has decided, after taking the whole question into consideration, that the best way is to refer the case to the judicial authority. Is there a man in this House, on one side of the other, who believes that in a matter of this kind there is a better way of disposing of it than by having a judicial determination of it? If anybody is competent to go into these matters, if anybody has to decide whether the soldiers' vote ought to be taken into consideration, or whether the rights of parties or candidates ought to be considered is it not the judges of our courts? Is there any man in this House more competent or better qualified to do this than those who are appointed by law to be the arbiters between man and man? There may, perhaps, be some technicality, but I am sure that had I been a member of the committee I would have endeavoured to have made the report firmer than it is. I would have left no alternative in it. Even suppose the House adopts the principle laid down by the committee, it is not deprived of its power to supplement this report in any manner that it thinks fit in order to give it the proper judicial interpretation and sanction which it must have. The report does not ask that the decision should be final, but it asks that a stated case be prepared for submission to the Supreme Court of Canada, or to two judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario for decision.

They can give their decision so far as it can be given, and if their opinion is that they have not the authority to determine this matter, then the report will come back and Parliament will take, if need be, whatever action may be necessary to supplement the opinion which they have expressed. I call the attention of my hon. friends to the fact that again and again matters have been referred to the Supreme Court of Canada in order to have a judicial interpretation of a point at issue, not with the idea that the court should judicially determine those matters themselves and render a decision which would be binding upon all parties, but to permit the court to give their opinion to the Government and to Parliament so that such action as afterwards may be taken, and should be taken, by Parliament, in the interest of all parties concerned, may have the sanction of the law. Sir, I say this to my hon. friends on the other side of the House: Let us adopt this report, let the case go to the judges, and whatever decision they give, whatever the judicial opinion may be, it is only an opinion, it will not be a final decision binding upon all parties. Then it will be incumbent upon the Parliament of Canada to supplement that opinion in such a manner as to grant justice to whomsoever justice may be due.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): If I might venture to do so, I would express sympathy with the hon. gentleman who moved this amendment, by reason of the fact that those who support him seem to me to have furnished the most conclusive argument why his amendment should not be adopted. First of all, I think that the right hon. leader of the Opposition in his main argument has furnished us with reasons which should confirm us in the belief that beyond a doubt the action recommended by this Committee should not be taken. What is the principal argument of the right hon. gentleman? It is that because these votes were taken, under the statute, before nominations, and because provision was not made in the statute for that, that therefore all of the soldier ballots must be rejected, and the soldiers must be deprived absolutely of their vote. And why does the right hon. gentleman say that those votes should be rejected? Because the statute as enacted, if held to be applicable and to permit these votes, would abridge the right of the soldier, because it would deprive him of the privilege of voting for a candidate by name. And what is his remedy for this grievance? It is to wipe out entirely the right of the soldiers to vote. Let us say that the statute in its operation did abridge the right of the soldier, but it still left him the right, in common with all others to vote for the Government, or vote for the Opposition, and the right hon. gentleman says: Let us remedy that by taking a course that will infallibly deprive the soldier even of that abridged right.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Hear, hear.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY: The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) says that somebody blundered. He does not dispute that Parliament in passing the Act in question intended the soldier voter in the Yukon to have the right to vote like every other soldier, but he says that somebody blundered. I presume that I might take that suggestion to myself, inasmuch as I had a good deal to do with the drawing of that Act. How does he propose to remedy that? I blundered, therefore let us punish the soldier by taking his vote away from him. I am far from admitting that under a correct or reasonable interpretation of the statute those votes should not be counted. But what is precisely the advantage that results from this return being referred to this House? It is that the House would not be tied down. Mr. Congdon himself congratulated us upon that. This House would not be tied down to a literal interpretation of the statute, and if the committee had come to the conclusion that that literal interpretation precluded the counting of the soldiers' vote, if they came to the conclusion that somebody had blundered, the committee had it in their power to recommend to the House that the blunder be corrected. But the right hon. gentleman does not want that to be made possible. He wants this matter sent to a tribunal that will be bound by the letter of the statute, and no matter what the people of Canada, acting through their representatives desired and intended, although it be absolutely clear that they intended that those men should vote, and though it be absolutely clear therefore that in substance those men had a right to vote—because there is an irregularity according to the letter of the statute those votes shall be wiped out. I must confess that if I had any doubts in my own mind as to what the proper course to be taken with regard to this motion and this amendment was after listening to the argument of the right hon. gentleman I would feel that it was absolutely impossible for me to reach any other conclusion than that this question should remain in the hands of the legislative authority clothed with power to provide an adequate remedy if a mistake has been made, and that it would be the most futile of remedies to send the matter to a tribunal that will be tied down to the letter of the law; and, if the right hon. gentleman is correct in his contention, with the only result that we will have a decision that somebody blundered, and because of that fact the soldier must lose his vote. If, in the judgment of the House, that is the important matter to have decided, I think we should vote for the amendment. But if, in the opinion of the House, the proper thing to have decided is whether or not men who had a right to vote—men who, by the admission of the right hon. gentleman, failed to obtain their votes because the statute was not made sufficiently clear—shall be, as regards this election, permanently disfranchised, then we should vote down the amendment. I might point out also that it will be no adequate remedy to say: You may go back and have another election, because those very men whose rights are in question will, under the statute in such a case, have no votes. So the amendment, if it be carried, assures this one thing: That if the statute is not perfectly clear the soldiers will be disfranchised, and the intention of Parliament will be defeated. The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) says that it is the exclusive privilege of the courts to interpret the statutes. That is quite true if you are dealing with the application of a statute, but is it an unknown thing that when Parliament has discovered that the interpretation attached by the courts to a particular Act of Parliament was not in accord with its intention, that Parliament should legislate to give authoritative interpretation to its own statute? And if ever there was a case, it seems to me, where the exercise of that power on the part of Parliament—if there be need to exercise it—would be justified, it is in this particular case. If there be need for it, and Parliament does not exercise its power to effect a remedy, you irreparably deprive all of these men of the right that Parliament itself, with the people of Canada behind it, intended to give them. I do not think that I need add anything further except to ask, in regard to what the hon. member for Kamouraska said as to the clearness of the right of the Governor in Council to refer this matter to the Supreme Court—assuming he is quite right in that contention, what is it we will get from the Supreme Court? A decision as to who was elected? An order is issued to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make a certain return and to the returning officer to count those votes? There is nothing of the kind in that section. What will it be that will come back to us? It will be advice as to what the law is, that is all. Nobody will be authorized to do anything. Parliament will have to take it up, and we will then have to act. And, in my judgment, if there came back to us the advice that, because of the too narrow words of the statute, because, if you will, some one had blundered these men under the strict letter of the Act were deprived of their votes, there would, in my judgment, be no proper course for Parliament to take, having the power to remedy the evil result of a possibly ambiguous statute than to so legislate as to secure to those men the recognition of the effect of their vote.

[Mr. Doherty.]

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers and St. Maurice): I did not have the pleasure this morning of being here when my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Tweedie) moved his motion, and when my hon. friend from Wright (Mr. Devlin) moved his amendment, as I was kept busy before the Private Bills Committee. We should get down to the cold facts of this whole matter. What are they? Last year we passed two Acts, the War-time Elections Act and the Military Voters Act. A mistake has been made in one of the Acts. We forgot to provide for the Yukon Territory, which, under the War-time Elections Act is a deferred election. Whose fault is that? I say, Mr. Chairman, that every member who sat in this House last year must take his responsibility for not having thought the matter over and suggested it, and those who framed the Bill must take responsibility for not having properly studied its provisions, and for not having provided for this contingency. As a result we are confronted with the situation to-day that a deferred election has taken place in the Yukon, and that no return has been made declaring one of the candidates elected. But such grave doubt as to the proper course existed in the minds of the ministers that they ordered the returning officer to report the matter to the House of Commons. I will read section 3 of the Order in Council of the 26th of February:

The General Returning Officer shall, with respect to the elections in said electoral districts of the Yukon Territory, and Nelson, make to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery a special return fully disclosing the conditions and showing the result of the polling and such return shall be put before the House of Commons for its consideration and for such action by it as may be deemed necessary or proper according to the circumstances.

The special return of the General Returning Officer came to the House and the House decided to refer the special return to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I should here interpret the genealogy of the events. I ask myself, Mr. Chairman, was this return referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections with a mandate to declare one or the other of the candidates elected and more especially, one of them? No. It was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for the purpose of inquiring into it and making a report to this House of its conclusion and determination. A majority of the committee has made a report. Apparently that report did not satisfy the members of the Cabinet and some of the supporters of the Government, and therefore they tell the committee: "You do not know your business, we will tell you what to do, and when you have learned what to do, come back and make us a proper report." I am not willing as a member of the committee to accept that kind of teaching, even from the Prime Minister. I have sat in the committee, and have faithfully and honestly considered the case, and I am going to submit what conclusion I have come to, and justify my vote in favour of this report.

I listened with interest this morning to the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) who talked of hair-splitting. I have always awarded him the palm so far as hair-splitting is concerned, and nobody has come into this House to take it away from him. He says: "You cannot put that reference before the Supreme Court; the remedy is to legislate by statute." My hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) says: "Why should we not legislate by statute and also give the court authority?" But the Minister of the Interior immediately contended that we would burden the court with too much work.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I never said that.

Mr. BUREAU: My hon. friend said in very words: "It will impose new duties upon the court." This is a special case which is the result of our own fault, because we did not legislate properly, and the Supreme Court has only to substitute itself for the general returning officer and to give an interpretation to the statute. The Minister of Justice has given an interpretation of the statute, not like the Prime Minister, who says that if that statute is submitted to the Supreme Court, by the very wording of the statute you will deprive a certain number of soldiers of their votes. I do not consider that we are here to be charged, if we do not admit that the statute should be interpreted as read, as willing to do anything against the soldiers. And under the circumstance of this election taking place after the others, it may well be likened to a by-election. My friends on the other side, the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister especially, tried to evade the question by saying: "Are you going to deprive those poor boys of their vote?" We do not want to deprive the poor boys of their vote. We worked steadily at these Election Acts last year, and the Minister of the Interior will give us credit for staying long enough to help him discuss them and pass them. I remember that the Prime Minister stated at that time that we could not be too careful; that despite all the precautions we were taking, some soldiers would have to lose their votes. And he was right. We could not presume that every soldier who was in Europe would be able to cast his vote. Therefore, there was at the time of the passing of the Act the anticipation that some of the soldiers would lose their votes, and the protection went so far as to provide, in subsection 5 of section 8 of the Military Voters Act, whereby it is enacted:

(5) In any case where, for any reason, unless the vote of a military elector is immediately taken, it is likely that he may not subsequently be able to vote, the Deputy Presiding Officer may take such vote otherwise than at a formally held poll.

There was a provision in the Act whereby the people voting in the Yukon would have been entitled to vote if the Act had been properly put into effect by following certain restrictions imposed under that subsection. If the soldiers' vote was the essence of all these votes, and if the representation in this House was to be based on the fact that all men at the front should give their vote to the man who was elected to entitle him to have the proper status in this House, I do not see why this Act applies only to a general election. My hon. friends will admit that if to-morrow these candidates were both to die we would be compelled to have a new election, and the soldier would not have a vote at that election. If one of us should disappear from this political scene, we should have to have a new election for the constituency affected. What, then, becomes of all our protestations, of all the eloquence of the Minister of Justice in his remarks on this subject? In a case like that the Military Voters Act would not apply; we wilfully deprive the soldiers of their votes in by-elections. The Yukon election may be likened to a by-election; because that election was deferred, the requirements of the Act with regard to general elections do not apply.

Something has been said about the alleged difficulty of preparing a stated case. The Committee on Privileges and Elections have decided that the matter should be turned over to six judges of the Supreme Court whose duty it is to read laws and to interpret them. After all, the general returning officer undertook to interpret this law. On page 4 of the special report of the clerk of the Crown in chancery, the general returning officer says:

> The day for holding the poll within Canada under Part IV of said Act for the election of a member to represent the Yukon Territory is not specifically denominated by said Act, but I have assumed it to have been the intention of Parliament that in the case of a general election, in which case only does Part IV of said Act at all apply, (see Section 1) polling ought to be, as it could proceed for all electoral districts including the Yukon Territory, on one and the same day.

This is what the general returning officer thinks Parliament intended to convey. You say to the members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections: tell us whether the general returning officer's interpretation of the Act is correct; if you say that it is not correct, we will keep you at work until you say that it is, so that we may declare Dr. Thompson elected. I shall say nothing about the reasons which induced Parliament in 1873 to pass an Act taking these matters away from the jurisdiction of politicians. Dr. Thompson and Mr. Congdon are known to most members of Parliament who have been here for a number of years. Both have sat in Parliament, both are able men and are too well known to need any eulogy from me. I could not pay either of them too high a compliment. In deciding this matter, then, where is the line of division? Just your political feeling; just the political affiliations of these gentlemen in the past. Both are eminently qualified to represent a constituency; both would honour the House of Commons by sitting in it; we do not have to decide as to their abilities or qualifications. I confess that if I saw a hole that would sink the man who was not of my political affiliation, I would naturally and humanly be inclined to look upon that hole as bigger than it really was. The man who would not see it that way would have to have an aeroplane or some other means of flying higher than ordinary mortals. If the reverse were the case, I should be inclined to see the hole a little smaller, so that the other fellow would not get through. That is human nature; that is the reason why these political issues have been taken away from political tribunals and submitted to a judicial body.

This issue has been stated as a mixture of fact and of law. Somebody said that if we were to have a stated case, both parties would have to be represented at its preparation and the case agreed upon by both. I agree to that. But both parties have already been heard by members of the committee. The Prime Minister has read part of Mr. Congdon's statement before the committee. I wish to read part of Dr. Thompson's statement, made through his solicitor, Mr. Hogg, as follows:

> Mr. Hogg.—Mr. Chairman, and Gentlemen of the Committee, perhaps I may make it clearer to the committee, acting for Dr. Thompson, what in my view is before the committee for consideration. There is no matter of fact before the committee and upon which a vote would need to be taken. The facts are contained entirely in documents before the committee. The matter is a pure question of law and the first point of law to be determined is as to the interpretation of the Military Voters' Act which covers the voting of those persons qualified by the Act, that is the soldiers, within and without Canada. That is a matter for interpretation with respect to that Act as dealing with this question as follows: First, does this Act apply to the Yukon, and second, were the soldiers' votes taken with respect to that constituency at the proper and lawful time, and at the only time laid down by the Military Voters Act?

Further on, Mr. Hogg says:

> There is a stated case laid before Parliament as to the interpretation of this statute and as to the legality of Mr. Congdon's nomination paper.

This is Dr. Thompson's view of the whole matter. The special report of the general returning officer was submitted to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as it could be to the Supreme Court, as a stated case. The committee, after considering the matter, have come to the conclusion that the point should be decided by proper judicial authority. If it is said that the report is defective, that is no reason why it should not be corrected when the defect is shown. If the law is defective, that is no reason why Parliament should not have the courage to amend it. Time and again the Minister of Justice has asked the House to adopt amendments to remove ambiguities in enactments. In the Committee on Privileges and Elections we have no press gallery; there is a kind of muffler on the proceedings. Committees do not draw as much interest or publicity as the House does. If we have erred; if we have not treated the soldiers properly; if we have made a mistake in not making proper provision in the Military Voters' Act under which the soldiers could vote, let us assume the responsibility like men and enact such legislation as will correct the law. If, on the other hand, there is a doubt as to the interpretation, we should not undertake to make that interpretation.

It has been said that the general returning officer is a good lawyer and a man of ability. In that I concur. Nobody will dispute the fact that the Minister of Justice is a good lawyer, that his legal experience has extended over many years, and that he is a man of ability. Here are two conflicting issues. The general returning officer says that he took the Act to mean that the voting of the soldiers would take place on the same day all through Canada for all elections. If that holds good, there is no reason why the votes polled during the general election in the riding of any hon. member here should not be counted if a by-election should occur. Supposing some of us should die to-day, if the interpretation given by the general returning officer holds good that you can vote for a candidate when he is not a candidate, and that the fact that you vote for the Government means that you vote for the candidate endorsed by the Government, the same principle must apply in a by-election. The vote is there; the question is there; the issues are there, and there is no reason and I do not think any good reason can be given why the same principle should not apply. The Act is mandatory. There are three things to be done before you can vote for a candidate. In the first place, there must be a nomination. Nominations in the Yukon took place on the 31st of December. Voting overseas ceased on the 17th of December, and there was no candidate in the Yukon before the 31st of December. Does the House wish to establish the principle that people have the right to vote for a man who has not been nominated? If the votes given for the Government or against the Government are to be applied to one candidate or the other, there is a jurisdiction pre-requisite. You cannot endorse a man unless he has been nominated, and, therefore, the endorsation, if given before nomination, is worthless. Subsection 5 of section 12 of the Military Voters' Act says so in as many words:

> A vote for a party shall be counted as a vote for the candidate or candidates who has or have been recognized, in the manner hereinafter prescribed, as the candidate or candidates representing that party in the electoral district to which the vote has been applied. Some recognition shall be made in the case of the Government party by the Prime Minister, in the case of the Opposition party by the leader of the Opposition, and in the case of any Independent or Labour party by the recognized leader of such party. Within five days after the day of nomination the Prime Minister, the leader of the Opposition, and the recognized leader of any Independent or Labour party, shall severally notify the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

The Act is mandatory. If not, those votes cannot be applied. In this case nomination took place on the 31st of December, 1917. On the 5th of January, 1918, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery for Canada, by virtue of the subsection which I have just read, published in the Canada Gazette the official recognition of Alfred Thompson by the Government party and of Frederick Tennyson Congdon by the Opposition party. If you are going to take the votes that were polled before the 17th of December, you will be completely ignoring the Act. The Act says that you shall endorse the candidates within five days after nomination, and if you have endorsed them within five days after nomination, how are you going to apply those votes which were given while there was not a candidate in the field? Under the circumstances I have not heard any answer which would justify sending back to the committee the whole question which the committee has decided not to consider any further, but to submit to another body. The committee has referred the matter back to the House. Why should we, as members of the House, saddle the members of the committee with the responsibility of deciding the matter? If legislation is necessary for a reference, let us have it. We can pass it If the House decides that we should pass legislation and say: In the matter of the Yukon Territory, we shall count the soldiers' votes, although, according to law, we are not entitled to do so by any interpretation of the Statute as it exists, let us pass such legislation; but why refer the matter back to the Committee on Privileges and Elections? If Parliament is supreme, Parliament ought to take the matter in hand and respect the wishes of the committee which are expressed in the resolution saying: We want to refer the matter to the Supreme Court; we do not want to assume the responsibility of deciding it. If Parliament thinks the Supreme Court should not be given the matter to decide, let Parliament take the matter in hand themselves and legislate accordingly. I do not think it is fair to treat the committee in the way it is proposed to do. We are all members of this House and we have expressed our views. If what is in the minds of those who wish the matter to be referred back to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, is that, when it is so referred back, a candidate will be elected as a result of that reference, I say: Let us act as a whole; let us take the responsibility of enacting the legislation. It is not fair to saddle this matter on the committee for the committee to pass judgment, to sit as a Court of Appeal and say what decision should be given in regard to the matter, and then, when the decision of the committee comes to the House of Commons, the House will say: The report is concurred in, and that will be the end of it. A full discussion should take place as to what legislation we should enact and as to how the matter should be disposed of. I suggest that, if there is any irregularity in the report, we should correct it. If there are any suggestions to be made, let us make them. The Prime Minister has said that the two judges of Ontario should not be mentioned, in the motion. Let us strike out that part and refer the matter to the Supreme Court. If a case has to be stated, the Governor in Council, who has been willing to take the stated case of the general returning officer, ought not to object to have the stated case prepared and agreed upon by Mr. Hogg submitted to the Supreme Court. I think the Governor in Council does not think less of the Committee than of the Supreme Court, and what is good for the Committee ought to be good enough for the Supreme Court to inquire into. As Mr. Hogg has said, the question is—shall those military votes be counted or not, and under the Act as it now stands, can we, by any method of interpretation—I do not care how elastic it is—say that the Military Voters' Act goes as far as to say that votes polled before a candidate was in the field should be counted for a candidate who later on comes into the field for election? This ought to be looked upon as a by-election as it did not come on at the time of the general election. The general election meant all elections that took place on the same day and the nominations for which took place on the same day. At the time we passed the War-time Elections Act, we made an exception for the Yukon; we forgot it, and I submit that it is up to Parliament, if we come to the conclusion that we are to do justice to the soldiers, to legislate to repair that injustice, but we should not saddle the committee with the interpretation of that law and then put the responsibility on it when the report of the committee is concurred in by this House.

[Mr. Bureau.]

Mr. H. M. MOWAT (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak for a few minutes in regard to the feature of the case which is involved in the reference by the House of this matter to the Supreme Court or to any court. I am not in favour of the amendment because it involves an entirely new principle in the practice of Parliament, and because if a reference is made to the Supreme Court it will be utterly futile, as it will come back with the greatest celerity from the Supreme Court judges when they have looked into the law and the practice. To the hon. gentlemen who are attracted by the argument that they do not know the law and that it would be the best thing to do to refer the matter to judges who do know the law, I would point out that Parliament has never abrogated its rights to be the supreme decider of the law. The courts interpret the law made by Parliament, but Parliament is the law-giver; Parliament is the law-maker, and never, in the whole history of our jurisprudence or our parliamentary life, has Parliament given up to the courts what is its inherent jurisdiction, except in this one instance that, in a private Bill, which does not affect public rights at all, with which Parliament chiefly has to deal, the opinion of a court may be had in regard to it, under section 61 of the Supreme Court Act.

What cases may the Governor in Council refer to the Supreme Court?—they may refer cases in which the Governor in Council may have doubts upon a question of law. Then the Cabinet, but not Parliament, may refer the point to the Supreme Court. Let us make a clear distinction between Parliament and the gentlemen who form the Cabinet, and who in administering the law may have some doubt on a question arising. The Cabinet is an entirely different thing from Parliament. Parliament is the law-giver, the law-maker, the supreme body, and if Parliament has any doubts as to its past legislation Parliament can make a new law to declare what it means. In the whole history of parliamentary institutions, Parliament has never left it to another body to say what the law shall be. If Parliament makes a mistake it should right that mistake.

It was pointed out by the Prime Minister that under section 60 of the Supreme Court Act the reference is by the Governor in Council. Now, if we passed this motion referring the matter to the Supreme Court, the judges of the Supreme Court would at once say "What right has Parliament to send this matter to us, we can only act under the statute which creates us; we are governed by the Supreme Court Act, and if our jurisdiction is to be extended, another Act must be passed." Therefore, if we sent this half-baked resolution, drawn without proper consideration and without pondering over the wording of the Act, to the Supreme Court, back it would come again to Parliament, and I do not want to be a member of a parliament that would be subjected to that. That would be the inevitable result of our passing this amendment, and therefore I say we should be very careful before we pass a motion of that kind. It was pointed out in the committee, of which I am a member, that it was not competent for Parliament to refer these things to the Supreme Court. I myself pointed out that it was beneath the dignity of the House to do so, but the decision of the committee passed through very quickly, and in my view without mature consideration.

We could not refer the matter to the Ontario judges either, because there are what seem to me vital objections against that, and I suggested that my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) should take the responsibility of moving the adoption of a report by the committee, which would involve his own motion of a few days before, but he declined to do so, saying that that was not the practice of the committee.

But that is to some extent technical, and we want to get down to the meat of the matter. It is true we must all approach this thing with the idea, not of being partisans, but of doing justice, and that I believe is the spirit that prevails in every one of us. The point is how can we best do justice? Have we in our minds the easy road by which we can dump this matter on to the judges and make them decide it for us, or have we the spirit that says: "This is something entirely within our jurisdiction, and we will deal with it whether or not we know as much law as we think we ought to." Then we have to consider this: to whom have we to do justice? Have we in mind only the two eminent gentlemen who have been referred to in this House as irreproachable candidates, or have we in mind those who voted for those candidates? That to my mind is the supreme question, and while I respect both candidates, I have a very slight acquaintance with them, and in my opinion the conservation of the vote of every one of those 325 soldiers who voted for one or other of the candidates is more important to me than whether Mr. Congdon or Mr. Thompson shall be elected. And I shall hesitate a long time before aligning myself with a movement which may have the effect of taking away the votes of those soldiers who voted overseas, and in Canada. Conditions at the front are constantly changing and if a new election were held it would be impossible to get the same vote as before. While I have come to the conclusion that this is a matter of law and of justice with which Parliament itself should deal, yet, and one cannot escape this if he is a man at all—having received and taken advantage of the votes of soldiers in my own constituency, I am not going to say that when it comes to the Yukon, that constituency shall be placed in a different position from the constituency that elected me.

There is another reason, it seems to me, why the proposal in this amendment should be beneath our dignity. I intended to say that a mistake had occurred in the drafting of this act. Undoubtedly the Committee of the Whole which considered the Act clause by clause last year made this slip: everybody forgot the Yukon. I am glad to see that what would have been my contention has been amply supported by the leader of the Opposition and by my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau), who said that "somebody blundered." Somebody did blunder. It is no use now trying to place the responsibility on any one in particular. The whole House must share the responsibility for leaving the Yukon out of reckoning.

Suppose we sent this case on to the Supreme Court for determination, because we had blundered in drafting the Act, they would say: "This is not a case for our interpretation of your deliberate opinion, but it is being sent to us simply to get out of the effects of a blunder you made yourself, we cannot and we will not decide the case for you." That is the answer that would come back. The judges of the Supreme Court, you know, are very sensitive about the questions submitted to them. They think their duty is to decide points of litigation between man and man, and while they have to decide theoretical questions that are submitted to them by Order in Council—that is the only way in which it can be done—they try to avoid them in every possible way, and judge after judge of the greatest eminence has declared that it is not the function of the Supreme Court to decide these questions. The same opinion has been expressed by the Privy Council in England. Here is a case where the Supreme Court judges would say: "This matter does not come to us under authority from the Governor in Council." Because, if this amendment passes, we cannot compel the Governor in Council to pass it on; the Cabinet is a body of men of independent judgment, and we cannot force them to do it, and, therefore, the case would inevitably go to the Supreme Court direct from Parliament, and, as I said before, the judges would return it, respectfully saying they could not deal with the case. Why, therefore, should we take such a futile proceeding? No matter what the Supreme Court does, no matter what kind of a stated case is made on which to get their opinion, the case is bound to come back to this Parliament. There is no power under the statute enabling the Supreme Court judges to say that So-and-so is elected in such a case as this. All the court can do is to find on facts, and give their opinions thereon. Why should we postpone this case and keep these two gentlemen, who I believe are now in the gallery of this Chamber, in suspense for a year or more, if the case is appealed, instead of taking it up ourselves and deciding at this session what is the just thing to do, not only as between these two gentlemen, but as regards the men who voted?

Mr. LUCIEN CANNON (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee which drew up the report now under discussion, I wish to express my views and also state to the House why I came to the conclusion in which the majority of the committee concurred. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat), who preceded me, summed up his whole speech in one argument, and that argument was that Parliament, having passed the electoral law, was the only power in the land to interpret that law, and that therefore this matter should not be referred to the courts of justice. If that is a legal proposition to be admitted, if that is a legal thesis to be ratified by the majority of this House, let us forthwith introduce a law abolishing all tribunals because Parliament passes Federal laws, for the interpretation of which we have Federal tribunals, and the provincial legislatures pass provincial laws and they have provincial tribunals to interpret them. If the contention of my right hon. friend is right why should we have tribunals to interpret these laws and why should not the Federal Parliament and the provincial legislatures sit permanently to interpret the laws which they pass?

The right hon. leader of the House (Sir Robert Borden) made one main argument also, in which he parcelled up all the others and his argument was as follows: Should we, the elected representatives of the people of Canada, deprive the soldiers at the front, the boys in the trenches, of the votes that they have cast? Both sides of the House agreed that the boys in the trenches, the soldiers who are fighting the fight for Canada and the Empire, were entitled to cast their ballots and choose their representatives in this Parliament. But if the Prime Minister thinks for a moment that because the soldier cast a ballot on the other side that gave him a right not to be deprived of that ballot, how is it that the Government gave power to the returning officer to deprive 15,000 soldiers of their votes as he did? If this House should decide to concur in the report of the committee as laid before it, is it fair, is it logical, is it reasonable, to claim that we are depriving the soldiers of their votes? We are not giving any decision. We are not stating that the soldiers on the other side shall be disfranchised. By concurring in that report we are not saying that the soldiers who voted either for or against Mr. Congdon or either for or against Mr. Thompson are deprived of their votes. We are simply saying that we refer the matter to the highest tribunal in this land, a tribunal composed of competent men, a tribunal representing judicial science in this country in its highest degree. We simply put the case in the hands of fair-minded men who can give the best judgment, we refer to them the whole matter and we say that if the soldier is entitled to cast a vote, give it to him. If the soldier should not be entitled to a vote, take it away from him. But we members of the Canadian Parliament, faithful to the traditions left to us by the greatest of Parliaments, that is the British Parliament, refuse, as partisans and politicians, to sit as judges. I think that is the whole question.

The British North America Act establishes in this country the same constitution and institutions as exist in England, to wit, the executive power, the legislative power and the judicial power. Our constitution will work well, our constitution will produce results, our constitution will improve the condition of things in this country so long as the three powers remain each within its own province. I do not think it would be wise for this Parliament, being the legislative power, to take to itself the judicial power. Why so? The question now before us involves one election, one seat, one member. Suppose the member for the Yukon sits on your right, Mr. Speaker, suppose the member for the Yukon sits on your left, is that a question of sufficient moment to justify us in changing the basis of the whole constitution of this country? I claim it is not. In the old days, when elections were controverted, they were, as has been pointed out, decided by Parliament. But the abuses were numerous and the Parliament of Great Britain, in 1830 or 1832, rightly decided that controverted elections should be decided by tribunals and courts of justice. The same principle was also adopted in Canada in 1873 by a Bill introduced by Sir John Macdonald, then Premier. It was confirmed in 1874 by a Bill introduced by the Hon. Mr. Fournier, then Minister of Justice. Since that time controverted elections have been decided by the courts of justice and never by the House, composed of politicians and partisans. I heard an hon. member on the other side saying that we had no right to leave this matter to the Supreme Court of Canada. I beg, Mr. Speaker, to take issue with that hon. member. If we read Bourinot, page 219, 3rd edition, we find that the whole law is there interpreted and the author lays down a theory which ought to be accepted in the case which is now under discussion before the House:

> In the session of 1887 the subject of the powers and duties of returning officers, and the jurisdiction still possessed by the House in controverted elections was discussed. It appears that the returning officer for the county of Queen's, New Brunswick, instead of declaring Mr. King, who had the majority of votes at the general election of 1887, duly elected to represent that electoral district, decided that his nomination paper was invalid on the ground that the deposit was not legally made. He returned Mr. Baird as the representative in Parliament. It was proposed in the House to amend the return, by erasing Mr. Baird's name and inserting Mr. King's in its place, but after a long debate the matter was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. In the course of the debate the Minister of Justice, (the late Sir John Thompson), strenuously supported the principle of non-interference with the jurisdiction of the courts over matters of controverted election, "but he thought it quite competent for the House to refer the case to the Committee for the express purpose 'not of trying the case, but of finding' whether the court is already exercising jurisdiction therein, and of inquiring into precedents governing such matters."
> The Committee, after full investigation of authorities, reported as their opinion that the House "ought not to declare that the said George F. Baird is not entitled to sit in the said House, but should leave the case disposed of under the provisions of the Controverted Elections Act, it being the intention, spirit, and policy of Parliament that all questions as to the validity of the election of members to the House of Commons should be decided by the ordinary legal tribunals of the country instead of the House of Commons.

This is the constitutional law as laid down by Bourinot, and this was the decision given by the House of Commons. Mr. Speaker, any reader of British constitutional law will feel higher admiration for the House of Commons as it exists in England, because that House of Commons in all matters pertaining to the interpretation of the law always lays aside politics and partisanship, and gives justice and nothing but justice. I think the occasion has now come for this Parliament to act in a similar way, and to follow the course that was adopted by the House of Commons in the case which I had the honour to quote a minute ago.

I do not wish to take up the time of the House in giving particulars or details as to the present case, which are well known. The question involved is purely a question of law. Being a matter of law I submit that it ought to be decided by the courts by the submission of a stated case, and the preparation of such a case is a very easy task because the contentions of both parties are set forth in the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I do not think that a serious or real difference would arise.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call your attention to one fact: This case is exceptional in many ways. For instance, the Prime Minister declared this afternoon that the Government had not the right, or had not the power, by Order in Council to order a reference to the courts because there was nothing in the Election Act giving such power to the Government. I do not wish to discuss the merits or demerits of this contention, but I wish to say this: If the Government has no right by Order in Council to change the law, how is it that not later than the 26th of February, 1918, the Government took upon itself to change the law by Order in Council by saying that as far as the Yukon election is concerned the returning officer should make no report? Such an Order in Council was passed and the first paragraph of the recommendation reads:

> That the general returning officer shall not declare any candidate to have been elected to represent the said Yukon Territory.

Have the powers of the Government decreased within two or three months? Has our constitution changed within that time? Are the powers of the Government the same to-day as they were in February? I defy any member of this House to say that the Imperial Parliament interfered in respect of our constitution so that there might be any such change, alteration or modification in it. Mr. Speaker, while the Prime Minister of Canada, declared that he cannot do such a thing by Order in Council I hold in my hand the evidence to show that the right hon. gentleman did three months ago what he says to-day he cannot do. If an Order in Council could be passed to prevent the returning officer from making a return of the Yukon election, I submit very humbly that an Order in Council could be very easily prepared referring this case to the Supreme Court for a decision. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, this Order in Council which was passed changing the electoral law as embodied in an Act of Parliament deprives Mr. Congdon and Mr. Thompson of the right of petitioning the courts to have their interests safeguarded. The moment the returning officer was not empowered to make a return, naturally, the election could not be contested before the courts, and both the gentlemen named are in the position that the Government has deprived them of the right to go before the courts to contest the election in the Yukon territory, and to-day, because the Committee on Privileges and Elections wants to give the Supreme Court of Canada authority to decide an exclusively legal question, the Prime Minister says: An Order in Council cannot be passed to change the Election Act. I submit that this argument cannot be very serious in the face of what happened three months ago.

There is one last point to which I desire to call your attention, Mr. Speaker: The House of Commons must act according to constitutional usage and according to its own rules, and cannot act otherwise. As far as the powers of the House in respect to elections are concerned the only rule upon which we can base our conduct is rule 80, which says:

> If it shall appear that any person hath been elected and returned a member of this House, or endeavoured so to be; by bribery, or any other corrupt practices, this House will proceed with the utmost severity against all such persons as shall have been wilfully concerned in such bribery or other corrupt practices.

My contention is that the House of Commons since 1874 has the power of inquiry only into the acts of bribery, and in this special case no act of bribery is alleged, and therefore we have absolutely no competency. We cannot go outside the rules of parliamentary procedure; we cannot go outside the limits as laid down and determined by the law of 1873-74. I claim that in this case this question ought to be decided by the courts, and that Parliament has no jurisdiction. Parliament has jurisdiction to reprimand its members, and to act upon anything pertaining to its members. But in this particular case we are not dealing with members of the House. Neither Mr. Congdon nor Mr. Thompson is a member of the House, consequently we have absolutely no jurisdiction or competency. This Parliament, as regards elections, cannot go beyond its limitations. We have our rules and our laws. We can act as far as our members are concerned, but these two gentlemen not being members of the House, we cannot act in their special case.

I will end these few remarks by saying that in this country we are all proud of our British institutions. We look to the British House of Commons as the mother of all Parliaments for example and guidance. Let us do so in this special case. If we refer to such cases as have come before the British Parliament, the latest, I think, is the case of Colonel Arthur Lynch, who was elected for an Irish constituency during the South African war. Colonel Lynch was elected although he was fighting for the Boers at the time. His case came before Parliament, and what did Parliament do? It took the usual course in all such cases, Parliament stuck to the old traditions and rules, and would not interfere with judicial duty. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to rise above party ideals and aspirations and narrowmindedness of partisanship. We should not remain Liberals, Tories or Unionists, whatever we may call ourselves. We ought to rise to the great status the law has given us in this Parliament, we ought to rise to the status of judges. And being judges in this special case we ought to say that, having to choose between the two parties as belonging to one party or the other in this House, we are not fit judges, because we have not the required impartiality. And if this House takes that decision, it will lay down a precedent that will compare with all precedents laid down by Parliament, and we will have shown that when questions of a judicial character arise we can lay aside our politics, our small, mean interests, and become men who understand their duties and wish to perform them according to justice and equity.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, in the very few words that I shall address to this House on this question, I need scarcely tell you or the House that I do not speak as a lawyer. Edmund Burke said somewhere that while legal training increases greatly the intensity of the human intellect, it does not add correspondingly to its breadth. And Edmund Burke, sir, was a very great man. Leaving on one side the righteousness or the wrongness of Burke's opinion, I do think, Sir, that this discussion has fallen perhaps too much into the hands of the legal profession and I approach it purely as a layman. And it seems to me to be one of those questions that can be settled by the rough commonsense of Parliament, or its committees, better than the superfine distinctions of the legal mind. The distinguished layman from Queens and Shelburne (Mr. Fielding) who spoke on the question for once in a way became more legal than the lawyers, if such criticism will be considered by him fair and courteous. He referred at some length and learnedly to precedents. Well, that is just what the judges would do. They would settle this thing along the lines of precedents. Why, Sir, all precedents were thrown to the winds in the last election.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: And my friends opposite say, "Hear, hear." The most striking precedent in regard to the election was thrown to the winds by my right hon. friend opposite (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) when he extended the life of Parliament. The election was a year late in being held. My right hon. friend agreed to throw precedents to the winds in an oration as noble, persuasive and eloquent as was ever addressed to this or any other Parliament. Precedents were thrown to the winds because we are in the midst of an unprecedented war.

What was important in the last election was that the mind of Canada should go forth with no uncertain sound that the Kaiser and the Allies and the whole civilized world should know that on the part of this proud young country there was going to be no faltering until we carried this war to victory. Speaking as a layman, and looking at this question as a layman what is the one question that I have to settle? What the judges would settle the lawyers have not told us; they have a shrewd suspicion, I am quite sure of that. They know how the judges would go about the consideration of the question. Why they would call up all the precedents of John Mitchell and O'Donovan Rossa and the others we have heard of from the other side of the House. They would look into the musty documents of the past and give an exact technical decision as to the legality or otherwise of the election. What I am perfectly sure the majority of the people of this country want to know about the election is this: What set of opinions will represent the mind of the majority of the electors of the Yukon Territory as they voted in the election, whether in the Yukon or overseas? That is the one question which appeals to my mind. And I agree very much with the remarks that fell from my hon. friend from Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) that the opinion of one soldier in this election is of as much importance as the right of either Mr. Congdon or Mr. Thompson to sit in this House. That is the one question that would appeal to me as a layman, and that is the one question I think that would appeal to the great majority of the people of this country.

With regard to the gentlemen concerned, I endorse every word that fell from my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) about the House being fortunate if the Yukon was represented by either of the candidates in the last election.

With regard to Mr. Congdon especially, I have enjoyed his intimate personal friendship for many years, so that my opinion on this subject is most dispassionate. I have always admired his wide culture, his great reading, and his fair and well-balanced mind. If I had anything to say against Mr. Congdon, however, I should say that in the last election his political affiliations were, to say the least, elastic, flexible and adaptable. I do not think anybody who knew how Mr. Congdon conducted that election could be quite clear that he was a supporter of Union Government. I think there was grave room for doubt on that subject. On the other side, you have an undoubted supporter of Union in the case of Dr. Thompson; there is no doubt about where he stood in the matter. The majority of the votes of the Yukon and the men overseas were cast for Union, and Dr. Thompson was the Union candidate. That is the consideration which I believe will sway the minds of the people; it will certainly sway mine—were the votes for Union or against it, and which of the candidates was for Union and which against it?

Mr. DAVIDSON: Is it not true that Dr. Thompson was named by the Prime Minister as his candidate and Mr. Congdon by the leader of the Opposition as his?

Mr. MURPHY: No, it is not.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I really could not say about the endorsation in this case.

An hon. MEMBER: It is in the return.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: So far, so good. But I have far more regard for what was in the minds of the candidates than I have for the endorsation of leaders. That is how we decide whether a man was for or against Union.

Stripped of all legal trimmings and the refinements of the law, what have we in this amendment which has been submitted by the member for Wright (Mr. Devlin)? It is a mere move in the party game. I was charmed with the sentiments expressed by the member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) just before he took his seat. Apparently there is no partisanship in Dorchester. Let us rise to view this thing above the lines of party. This amendment is an attempt to take advantage of an oversight in an Act of Parliament to gain a supporter, or a semi-supporter, if you will have it so, by the disfranchisement of the soldiers from the Yukon who voted overseas. If I talked all night I could not say anything better than I have just said, and viewing it in that light I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. JOSEPH READ (Prince, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, as a layman I wish to answer the layman who has just sat down (Mr. Michael Clark). I shall not go into the legal aspect of this question. The member for Red Deer says that the question is: How would the soldiers have voted? As a matter of fact, how would the soldiers have voted had they known who the candidates were and what they represented? If I were a soldier at the front and had been asked to vote for either Mr. Congdon or Dr. Thompson, certainly, if I were a Liberal-Unionist—or a pretended one, like the member for Red Deer—I should have voted for Mr. Congdon, on the principle of Liberalism and on the principle of Unionism. The boys at the front did not cast an intelligent vote when they were voting on a ballot the first blank space of which was prepared for the name of the candidate, not for the Government, not for the Opposition, not for an independent or labour candidate. They could not have the name of the candidate if there was no candidate; so how were the boys to vote? The probability is that the majority of the votes would have gone to Mr. Congdon, because the bulk of the men at the front are Liberals. Most of the Canadians fighting to-day on the fields of France and Flanders are Liberals, fighting for Liberal principles. What is Liberalism? It is anti-Germanism. Gentlemen on the other side of the House do not seem to recognize that they are the representatives in Canada of Prussian polity and Prussian principle.

The proper thing to do in this case is to refer the matter to the judicial tribunals of the country. All questions as to the validity of elections have been referred to the judicial authority. In this case, owing to the peculiarity of the vote and of the election, it was impossible for either of these gentlemen to lodge a protest. If one of them had been declared elected, the other could have filed an election petition; but in this case neither was declared elected. The Government stopped the returning officer from declaring one of these men elected, and thus preventing the other from entering the courts; consequently it is proper that this House should give back to that man what they took away from him illegally by Order in Council.

The House divided on the proposed amendment of Mr. Devlin, which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. COPP: I was paired with the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Hartt). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. HUNT: I was paired with the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. J. M. Douglas). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. CLEMENTS: I was paired with the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Molloy). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. DOHERTY: My attention has been drawn to the fact that the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), with whom I was paired throughout the last Parliament, whom I have not seen during the present Parliament and who, I understood, was not coming here, understands that the pair still stands. Of course, under those circumstances, I would beg, if it be possible, to be allowed to withdraw my vote.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret that, according to the rules, a vote once given cannot be withdrawn.

Mr. J. A. CAMPBELL (Nelson): Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment to move to the motion as it now stands. I have felt throughout this debate, to which I have listened very attentively, that a considerable number of hon. members, including myself, are not satisfied with either the main motion or the amendment moved by the hon. member for Wright. Some of us have voted for the amendment and some have voted against it, including myself.

It seems to me there is a sort of middle course to pursue, a course which, if I understood him correctly, is in accord with the sentiments expressed by the Prime Minister. This is a large question, and in my humble opinion it will not be settled by adopting either the motion or the amendment. The question which we want to determine is the procedure to be followed not only in the present instance but when cases of this kind occur in the future, and we make no progress in that direction by voting for either the motion or the amendment. If the matter is referred back, the committee have carte blanche to do what they like, and if they decide who shall represent the Yukon constituency we shall still be in the dark as to the procedure that should be followed in similar cases. Like my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) I would sweep to one side all technicalities and meet the issue fairly and squarely. There is no one on either side of the House, I believe, who does not want to do full justice to the soldiers and their votes. There is no question here of distinguishing between justice to the soldiers and justice to the candidates, because if justice is done to the candidates, justice is done to the soldiers, and vice versa. If one candidate gets soldiers' votes that he is not entitled to, he is not getting justice nor are the soldiers. The question is how would the soldiers have voted? The candidates had not been nominated when the soldiers voted, so there was no candidate for whom they could vote personally. I also understand there was no Opposition candidate in the field, because both candidates favoured conscription and both were supporting Union Government. If I knew that one of the candidates was not supporting the Government policy I would have nothing to say at this time, although technically and from a legal standpoint that would not alter the merits of the case. But all the reports I have received are to the effect that both candidates stand on practically the same platform. There was no difference as to policy, but there was doubtless a preference amongst the soldiers as to the man who should be elected to support and carry out that policy. As far as I am concerned I might, as I do, stand for Union Government and the Union Government policy for conscription, but the candidate opposing me might also be doing the same thing, and soldiers would undoubtedly prefer one of us to the other to carry out their policy. The question is now as to the disposal of these soldiers' votes, and whether they can be allotted as the soldiers intended that they should be, or whether they should rightfully not be counted, as was the case in many other instances. If a reason were wanted as to why this should be decided by a judicial body instead of by a committee of the House, I think we have been furnished with a very clear reason this afternoon, in the debate on the question. I do not think any hon. member will say that this House or a committee of this House would approach the case from an absolutely non-partisan standpoint. I therefore think the only thing to do is to submit it to the highest court of the Dominion. I do not know just how we can overcome the technicalities in the way, but there certainly ought to be some means of submitting the case to that court. What are those means? I take it from the speeches we have heard from hon. members of the Government that there are means of accomplishing this, but that the method is not indicated in the amendment which has just been declared lost. Therefore, without taking up further time as the question has been very fully argued, I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding):

That all the words after the word "that" at the end of the question be left out and the following substituted therefor:

The report be referred back to the committee for the purpose of devising means of submitting the matter in dispute to a competent judicial authority in accordance with the long established practice of this House to have controverted elections tried by the courts and not by the House.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queens): As a choice between the motion by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Tweedie) and that of the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin), I prefer the latter although, as may have been gathered from some of the remarks, the wording of the amendment of the hon. gentleman for Wright might have been improved. The essence of the difference is this: The hon. member for Calgary was strongly of opinion, as he said in his speech, that this was a matter which should be settled definitely and finally by the committee, while the hon. member for Wright advanced the view that the matter was one for judicial decision. As between these two theories I have no hesitation in supporting the idea of a judicial decision, but I think the amendment moved by the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Campbell) presents the matter in a form that ought to be acceptable to the whole House.

The Prime Minister did me the honour of saying that he agreed very heartily with nearly all I had said on the subject. That was a great compliment, which I appreciated. The right hon. gentleman will remember, however, that the burden of what I said was this, that following the precedents in this House for a great many years, this House by itself or by a committee should not undertake to deal with a matter of this kind, but should devise means by which a decision could be reached. The Prime Minister having said that he agreed to nearly everything I said, I have a right to assume he agreed to that principle. He went on to say that he thought I had laid a good foundation for the argument that the case should be referred back to the committee, presumably in order that the committee might do something to the end which he had in view. I want to ask the House now to consider whether they will not deal with this question as essentially this: Shall this House go back to the bygone days when these matters were decided by committees with a partisan bias? I wonder if it could be said that there is not some partisan bias on some of us to-day in this matter. I heard one hon. gentleman speak about "pairs." Pairs relate to party divisions, and therefore if this question of pairs exists, the question has been decided, so far as we have decided it this afternoon by a partisan division. I submit that we have in this very transaction given evidence of the fact that however good our intentions may be, it is almost inevitable, as has been shown in the long experience of the Imperial Parliament and this Parliament, that when matters of this kind are dealt with by the House there is imported into the case some element of partisan feeling. I think the motion my hon. friend (Mr. Campbell) has just made meets the objection that the first proposal to refer the matter back to the committee was too vague, and he has also met other objections that might be raised. If the House approves this motion, we refer the matter back to the committee, but with the full understanding that it is not the desire of the House that the committee shall finally settle it, but shall rather advise as to the best means of getting this matter before a legal tribunal. It seems to me that this is a motion which ought to command the support of the whole House.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If I might be permitted just one sentence I would say that the proposal embodied in this amendment seems to me to amount to this: that we are not to leave this matter free to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but are to give them a direction that they shall find the means of avoiding a technicality which stands in the way of referring this matter to the court, in order that a technicality which prevents the soldiers' votes from being counted may be maintained and perpetuated. I cannot agree with that for a moment.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question now is on the amendment of the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. J. A. Campbell):

That all the words after the word "that" at the end of the motion be omitted and the following substituted therefor:

The report be referred back to the Committee for the purpose of deriving means of submitting the matter in dispute to a competent judicial authority in accordance with the long established practice of this House to have controverted elections tried by the courts and not by the House.

The House divided on the amendment of Mr. J. A. Campbell, which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. J. A. ROBB: After you had put the question, Mr. Speaker, the hon. members for Welland and Halton entered the Chamber. I wish to know if you have recorded their votes.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will put the question to the hon. member for Welland whether he was present in the House and heard the question put?

Mr. E. E. FRASER: I was not in the Chamber, I was just outside.

Mr. SPEAKER: According to Bourinot, the hon. gentleman must answer the question either in the affirmative or in the negative. I therefore put the question again: Was the hon. member present in the House and did he hear the question put?

Mr. FRASER: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: In that case the vote of the hon. member must be stricken from the record. I now ask the hon. member for Halton: Was he present in the House and did he hear the question put?

Mr. R. K. ANDERSON: I heard the question put by Mr. Speaker before I went out of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must answer in the affirmative or the negative.

Mr. ANDERSON: Then I will answer yes.

Mr. LALOR: I beg to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that an hon. gentleman on the opposite side, with whose name or constituency I am not familiar, entered the Chamber after the question had been put.

Several hon. MEMBERS: Name, name.

Mr. LALOR: I am unable to give the hon. gentleman's name. He came in after the question had been put and my statement can be corroborated by several other hon. gentlemen. The hon. gentleman in question is now sitting beside the Deputy Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will put the same question to the hon. member for St. Mary's: Was the hon. gentleman in the House and did he hear the question put?

Mr. H. DESLAURIERS: Yes.

Mr. COPP: Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Hartt). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. A. B. HUNT (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. Douglas). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question now is on the main motion (Mr. Tweedie). I declare the motion carried on the same division reversed.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

REGISTRATION IN EAST PETERBOROUGH.

Mr. SEXSMITH:

1. Who is appointed Registrar under the Act for man-power registration in East Peterborough?

2. Who recommended the appointee?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. R. B. Rogers.

2. On recommendation of the Superintendent of Registration.

APPOINTMENTS NOT BY EXAMINATION.

Mr. BURNHAM:

1. Is the Government aware that constituencies hold their representatives responsible for all appointments not made by examination?
2. Is the Government aware that it is impossible to shift this responsibility to others?
3. Does the Government therefore intend to refer appointments to the representatives concerned, for approval?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: With reference to this question I do not know that I can add very much to the reply which was given to the hon. member on 6th May, and which is to be found at pages 1536-1537 of the Unrevised Hansard. The Government, in respect to appointments to the public service, is responsible to Parliament; Parliament is responsible to the people. In making such appointment the Government is, of course, desirous of obtaining the best possible information that may be available as to the qualifications of the persons proposed to be appointed. It will always be very glad to receive suggestions or recommendations from members of this House in regard to such appointments.

Mr. BURNHAM:

1. What appointments will be made to the Public Service by recommendation and not by examination after the regulations respecting the Civil Service now existing and in contemplation become law?
2. Who will make these recommendations?
3. Will these recommendations be founded upon inquiry made by those making them?
4. Of whom will those making such recommendations seek information?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN:

1. That depends, of course, on the provisions of the regulations and the Civil Service Act in its final form.

2. 3. and 4. The word "recommendation" is capable of two meanings. If it is intended to ask as to recommendations to members of the Government by others, it would be impossible to foretell in advance who might desire to offer such recommendations or on what inquiry they would be founded. If, on the other hand, the word is intended to allude to recommendations to Council for such an appointment, it is obvious that the recommendations must be made by the responsible minister in whose department the appointment is to be made.

MEDICAL EXAMINATION OF OFFICERS FOR OVERSEAS.

Mr. STEVENS:

1. Since the outbreak of war has it been a military rule that all officers receiving commissions and appointments in overseas forces should submit to a medical examination and receive a certificate of physical fitness before receiving such appointment?
2. If any appointments in the Military forces have been made or commissions granted in active service in the C.E.F. without such medical certificate as to physical fitness, is it the policy of the Government to grant pensions to such individuals who may have been suffering from physical disabilities before their appointment and who may claim pension after a period of service?
3. Did Colonel Labatt, member of the Pensions Commission, secure a certificate of physical fitness before receiving appointment in the C.E.F.?
4. What was the date of Colonel Labatt's appointment as a member of the Pensions Board?
5. What was the date on which the pension was granted to Colonel Labatt by the Pensions Board, and from what date did such pension take effect?
6. How much has Colonel Labatt drawn in pensions?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL (for the Minister of Militia and Defence):

1. No information is available as to medical certificates of officers of the First Contingent concentrated at Valcartier, but, through inquiries made, it is understood that all officers had a medical examination before proceeding overseas with the First Contingent.

2. Where there is evidence that a disability pre-existed enlistment, a pension is awarded for aggravation of such disability on service, if not due to intemperance or improper conduct.

3. It is understood that Colonel Labatt did have a medical examination as to physical fitness at Valcartier before proceeding overseas with the First Contingent.

4. September 11, 1916.

5. Pension was awarded November 27, 1917, to take effect from October 16, 1917.

6. $1,334.11.

STEAMBOAT HELENA.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR:

1. Is the steamboat Helena in the employ of the Government at Sydney Harbour, N.S.?
2. If so, who is the owner?
3. How much per day is being paid for this steamer?
4. What was the total amount paid during the year 1917?
5. Is it intended to keep this steamboat permanently on the service?
6. What duties is she performing?
7. What is the total amount paid for the services of this boat since first employed?

Hon. Mr. SIFTON:

1. Yes.

2. Mr. Finlay MacDonald.

?. $15 per day, owner to supply gasolene and oil and a man to run the boat.

4. $3,975.

5. The engagement is only for temporary service, paid by the day.

6. This motor boat has been employed for the purpose of enabling Customs and naval officers to board steamers while in port before coming into the dock, in connection with the Naval Detention Service.

7. 1914-15, $2,130; 1915-16, $4,065; 1916-17, $3,855; 1917-18, $3,855.

CASUALTY RECORDS OF CERTAIN SOLDIERS.

Mr. KENNEDY:

*1. Is there a casualty record attached to any of the Overseas soldiers represented by the following regimental numbers, viz.:—2085431, 166045, 402736, 1042448, 2304223, 1033209, 435837, 243248 and 340263?

2. If so, what is the nature of the casualty in each case, when did it occur, and are any of these soldiers discharged from active service?

3. If so, on what dates were said men discharged?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL (For the Minister of Militia and Defence): If the hon. member (Mr. Kennedy) would give further information as to the names and units of the men above referred to, the desired information will be obtained. It may be explained that regimental numbers have no significance other than as a verification of identity, and no records are maintained on a numerical basis.

THE KENT HOUSE AS HOSPITAL.

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Has the Kent House, a hotel situated at Montmorency Falls, Quebec, been recommended as suitable for a military hospital by some medical board? If so, when, and what are the names of the persons on said medical board?

2. Did the Government get an estimate as to the amount required to put said Kent House in suitable condition to receive patients?

3. If so, from whom, what is the estimated cost of repairs, alterations or additions, and how many patients can said Kent House accommodate?

Hon. Mr. Burrell (For the Minister of Militia and Defence):

1. Yes. Colonel I. H. Cameron, President; Colonel J. D. Courtenay, Lt.-Colonel D. McGillivary, and Lt.-Colonel R. J. Wilson, members.

2. Under consideration.

3. Under consideration. Officers, 89; Other ranks, 165.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN.

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. What is the total number of the families of soldiers deceased since the beginning of the war, who receive pensions from the Government?

2. Of this number, how many reside in Great Britain, how many reside in Canada, and how many reside elsewhere?

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY.

RENEWAL OR POSTPONEMENT OF PAYMENT OF INDEBTEDNESS.

House again in committee on Bill No. 87, supplementary to chapter twenty-four of the statutes of 1917, respecting the Canadian Northern Railway system—Hon. A. K. Maclean—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Guarantee on renewal or postponement of payments:

Mr. CURRIE: Mr. Speaker, last evening when the House adjourned, it was my intention to offer a few remarks in connection with the Canadian Northern Bill. Earlier in the session, on the Budget, I took occasion to say a few words in reference to the management of this road and to express myself pretty thoroughly in that connection. I noticed particularly to-day and yesterday that the Government papers are giving a good deal of attention to the so-called "Ginger group" and saying that we have not accomplished very much. During yesterday's proceedings we had a most excellent speech from the right hon. the leader of the Government (Sir Robert Borden); in fact, the best I have ever heard him deliver since we were in Opposition when he used to thunder against the iniquities of the Transcontinental, the Canadian Northern railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. He was back again to his old form, and the facts that he laid before the House were such as to give us reason to congratulate ourselves. As a member of that so-called "Ginger group," I am particularly pleased to know that the policy which we have enunciated so far during the session, of eliminating those railway magnates who come down and want subsidies every day, and want to take charge of the municipalities and town and water-powers of the country, is being adopted by the Government. The Government appear to have assumed an attitude adverse to the claims of these men. That is our policy.

Several very important announcements were made by the leader of the Government. He made a definite statement to the effect that Mackenzie and Mann will be eliminated entirely from the management of the Canadian Northern railway. We all know very well that desperate efforts were made by those gentlemen to retain their hold upon the road. I am pleased to know that when the new board of directors is constituted these gentlemen will be eliminated. The only thing I regret is that we have no assurance that, whether the arbitration tribunal now engaged upon the task of placing a value on the stock of Mackenzie and Mann have or have not arrived at an award by the date set, the first of June, the Government will take over the road, as it should, and that Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann will then be asked to resign. That applies not only to these two gentlemen but to those others who have been associated with them in the transactions connected with this road, with the exception of Mr. Hanna who is a purely operative man and who is a very fine and reliable gentleman. Mr. Hanna is, indeed, one of the great railroad men of the continent. Outside of him, it is believed, the so-called Mackenzie and Mann influence will be eliminated from the road. I say that for this reason, that I fully expect an effort will be made by these gentlemen in some way, to stay on in some advisory capacity probably to attach their influence still to that road. And if they do, we will find that the coal will be supplied to the Government by a Mackenzie and Mann company; the wood will be furnished by another Mackenzie and Mann company; the oil for the journals on the cars will be sold by some organization of Mackenzie and Mann; the lamp chimneys and everything else needed on the road will be furnished by some concern which these gentlemen control; and the result will be that if they are allowed to do that, this country will every year have a sucked orange on its hand, and there will be nothing left for the people after they get through with it. I have only to refer to the manner in which they left the shareholders of the Winnipeg Street Railway—and Mackenzie and Mann are still acting in an advisory capacity on that road. They have got out of the Toronto Street Railway, but are still acting in an advisory capacity on the board of that road; and we all know that the shareholders have no hope of getting their money back from that road as long as these men are attached to it. An effort has been made on several occasions to get rid of them, but it seems impossible. The Government will have a job on its hands also getting rid of them.

Now a word with reference to the amount of money that these gentlemen are supposed to put into this road. We all know that the Grand Trunk people put $25,000,000 of cold cash into their western lines. There is no doubt about that. The figures speak for themselves. The Grand Trunk claim they have advanced $28,000,000, but we will concede that they contributed $25,000,000 in cold cash—real money, not stage money. The Canadian Pacific railway, as we were told by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) the other night put up $25,000,000 of honest-to-God money in the common stock of that road. If you at the beginning take all the anti-aircraft searchlights of London city, and all the high power microscopes in the world, you cannot find that the Canadian Northern promoters paid one cent for their common stock, for the reason that they never put one cent of real money of their own into the road or into the common stock. For that reason I say that the country would be well justified in saying to these gentlemen: "You have no interest whatever in this road; you have not put any money in it, and it cannot be said that you are making any loss." It is true they may have lost some of their valuable time. But they have done well in other things outside of this, such as townsites and other exploits of their own in the West, and they might be very well satisfied. If the gentlemen who are arbitrating the valuation of this common stock should be good enough to give these two gentlemen a cheque for even one million dollars each, I do not think they will starve for the remainder of their lives; and I do not think it is so absolutely necessary that they should be given ten millions. I heard some hon. gentlemen here stacking up figures for this road that would make any one believe that we had secured an enormous asset available immediately, and that we are taking away from these gentlemen an equity of something like $50,000,000 or $60,000,000. The evidence in Toronto was that as matters stood this common stock would not pay for itself inside of twenty-five years, and for that reason I do not think it is of very much value now. A stock that cannot possibly pay anything in twenty-five years has not very much value at the present time. That is too remote a period of time, and possibly some other means of locomotion may be devised before then. I say without any hesitation that the people of this country will not stand for any side-door influence of Mackenzie and Mann in this road, no influence that will throw all kinds of little contracts their way or to companies connected with them. The public will not stand for these promoters getting $10,000,000, because, as I say, they have not put a single dollar in this common stock, whilst the evidence shows that the Grand Trunk people put $25,000,000 of cold cash in the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Pacific invested $25,000,000 of their own money represented by common stock. There is no great difference between the condition of the other propositions and this Canadian Northern.

I am sure every member of the House will be satisfied that the Grand Trunk is to be taken over by the country in connection with the Grand Trunk branch lines in the West. I have here a book, Poor's Manual of Railways, containing the statistics of all the railways, showing the number of box cars, passenger cars and all classes of rolling stock equipment, and details of earnings, and so on. Anybody with a fondness for statistics on railway matters can consult Poor's Manual, which will be found in the Library. I do not intend to hand out a lot of statistics to the people or to this House, because we have had a tremendous lot of statistics already. We have had statistics on this Canadian Northern until I was not surprised to reach the House the other day and be told that they had a surplus of something like $35,000,000. They may have an operating income of that amount, but it is a very remote date till they have $35,000,000 net income. The actual facts are these. The possible deficit on the Canadian Northern for perhaps many years to come, if things were allowed to remain as they are, will amount to about $12,000,000 annually. Everybody can understand that. That was virtually the deficit reported for last year. The deficit on account of the Grand Trunk is something like $9,000,000; I am told it may reach $11,000,000 this year, making a total of $20,000,000 or $21,000,000 of a deficit on these two roads that this country will have to meet by votes every year. How are we going to meet it? We are going to take these roads over, and we must meet that deficit some way. There is no use arguing that these roads will pay when we are face to face with that deficit. Unless there are betterments they can never pay. That is the reason the Government is asked to do something for them. The deficit on the Canadian Northern will be met to the extent of $7,000,000 or $8,000,000 a year by the increase in freight rates recently put in force. About $7,000,000 more will be added to income from that source. About $4,000,000 or $5,000,000, perhaps $6,000,000, will come from the Grand Trunk also from a similar source. That is to say, we have increased the freight rate fifteen per cent, and having increased the freight rate we must naturally expect an increase in the income of these roads, with the result that there will be virtually 15 per cent added to their income. Against that there will be an increase, however, in the operating expenses. We cannot expect men to stay loyally with these roads as they have been doing without getting something in the nature of a war bonus to assist them in maintaining their families, and they will hardly be satisfied to receive the same rate of wages as before. Altogether we might expect that one-half of this deficit will be met by the increase in the income from traffic. The Canadian Pacific railway will put up $7,000,000 more, making $17,000,000 out of the $22,000,000; and the Government will have to make up the balance unless something unforeseen arises. Fortunately something has arisen. The railway operations are now controlled by a war board. I made a calculation from the figures given by the Prime Minister yesterday, which led me to the conclusion that if the savings to be made by this board were such as they stated we might expect an additional $10,000,000 or $11,000,000 as a result of the operations of the board, one-half of which would go to the railways owned by the Government. This would mean that we would have about $6,000,000, which would practically wipe out our deficit. If that is done and care is exercised in the management of the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk, there is still hope for these roads.

We have heard a great deal about the matter of wiping out the investment in these companies. The investments in these companies consist of practically three things. First, a funded debt covered by mortgage. Against this there is a fixed charge which we must pay for twenty or thirty years unless we extinguish it in the meantime by a sinking fund—and we cannot do that, because in order to establish a sinking fund we should have to continue to buy up the stock out of earnings. Second, guaranteed debentures or stock, third the first, second, or third preference stock. Sometimes these stocks are guaranteed, as in the case of the Grand Trunk, by floating mortgage constituting a charge on all the valuable property of the road, similar to a second mortgage on a farm or building. These are known as debentures, as distinguished from bonds. Bonds are generally first mortgage charges; debentures are second mortgage, or floating charges funded. When a man gets a railway debenture he knows that he is getting a second mortgage on something, the road, the equipment, or the net income. The stocks are preference stock; first, second, third, or fourth, with a fixed dividend, and last of all, the common stock. We need not take into consideration the common stock of these roads. The common stock of the Canadian Northern has never paid anything, and, so far as I can see, never will. So that we might as well eliminate that $100,000,000, though we shall always have to carry on our books the $35,000,000 that we pay Mackenzie and Mann for the common stock, and on which we must consider that we are entitled to interest. The common stock of the Grand Trunk paid a small dividend once or twice, but it can also be eliminated by the payment of a very small sum. So that so far as the Can-

9 p.m. adian Northern is concerned, the charges narrow down to, first, the mortgage bonds, and, second, the debentures. Most of these bonds are guaranteed. If this matter were placed before arbitrators or judges they would certainly decide that if there were a deficit every year in the operation of the Canadian Northern the provinces should pay their proportion of that deficit, because these mortgage bonds and debentures in certain cases, are guaranteed by the provinces. A fair proportion of the annual deficit on the bonds and debentures that the provinces have guaranteed would be as follows: Ontario has guaranteed some $7,000,000 worth of bonds of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. The province's annual payment in respect of its proportion of the deficit would, at three or three and one-half per cent, amount to about $210,000 a year. Manitoba has guaranteed $25,500,000 worth of Canadian Northern bonds; its proportion would be about $750,000 a year. Saskatchewan has guaranteed $14,000,000; they would pay about $420,000 a year. Alberta has guaranteed about $19,000,000; their proportion would be about $550,000 a year. British Columbia has guaranteed $40,000,000, and would have to pay about $1,000,000 a year.

The securities of the Canadian Northern are of three kinds, so far as the bonds are concerned: first, bonds guaranteed by the provinces; second, bonds guaranteed by the Dominion; third; bonds and debentures not guaranteed. I have given the amount of bonds guaranteed by the provinces. Bonds to the value of $104,000,000 have been guaranteed by the Dominion, and of unguaranteed securities there are $147,000,000 worth. We might eliminate the unguaranteed securities altogether and take over the road if it went into the hands of a receiver, but it has been pointed out that that would be a very bad thing to do; and it is only right that we should act fairly to those who have put their money into the road. But there is a very large issue of debenture stock, which is a guaranteed security. Nobody knows who holds that debenture stock, I am told, and nobody knows what was paid for it. An effort should be made by the arbitration now proceeding in Toronto to find out at what discount those debenture stocks were sold, because if we are to undertake to pay for them one hundred cents on the dollar somebody is going to reap a rich harvest. I am satisfied that they did not sell to the public at over 60 or 70. The arbitrators, when they are ascertaining the value of the common stock, should ascertain also the value of that other debenture stock which stands between the common stock and the value of the road. It is a matter of public interest.

I understand that the short-date notes, for which collateral was put in the banks, were under a very heavy discount in New York. I do not think that the railway got more than 75 or 80 cents on the dollar for them. Nobody knows how much was received for them, but they are to be renewed in a few days by the Government, and, of course, the moment the Government goes on those notes they become worth 100 cents on the dollar. Somebody will make a million or two there. These are matters of detail which the Government should take under advisement and which the arbitrators in Toronto should consider in connection with their inquiry into the value of the common stock—what was the actual loss on the sale of debenture stock and short-term notes?

I understand that a number of branch lines are to be built in connection with the Canadian Northern. In the statement given the other day we were informed as to the estimated requirements for the year 1918. Item 5 in that estimate reads:

> Construction: completion of western branch lines already graded; terminals, etc., as per statement, etc.

That means that during the current year the minister expects to spend $7,185,000 on further extending the Canadian Northern. That expenditure may not be remotely removed from the fact that Mackenzie and Mann want to hang on to the road, possibly until the contracts are made for these extensions. I have gone into the question of what these extensions are. The Acting

Minister of Finance should explain very clearly to the committee what extensions it is intended to continue and to complete this year. There is an extension from Calgary to Macleod which absolutely parallels the Canadian Pacific. The House should, during the war, frown down on this paralleling of roads. The hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. G. B. Nicholson) yesterday told us we could pull up the rails on the Canadian Northern between Ottawa and Sudbury. I agree with him. There is hardly a pound of traffic between those two points. He also stated that the rails on that road between Napanee and Toronto could very well be pulled up. Between Napanee and Toronto, the Canadian Northern runs within 150 or 200 yards of the Grand Trunk all the way. If we take over the Grand Trunk, what is the use of maintaining stations along that portion of the Canadian Northern? It will not be the first time in the history of Ontario that roads have been pulled up to obtain efficiency. If you travel along the Canadian Pacific from Smith's Falls to Toronto for forty miles, if you look out of the window on your right hand side, you will see the bed of a road which was built twenty-five or thirty years ago and which was pulled up, everything being removed, but the grading, in order to bring about greater efficiency and economy. It is, therefore, not a new thing to pull up rails and ties on a road. The road between Strathcona and Calgary—that is virtually between Calgary and Edmonton—also parallels the Canadian Pacific. I cannot, for the life of me, see why we should build 32.66 of a railroad there. The proposed 103 miles of railway between Calgary and Macleod will parallel the Canadian Pacific all the way and yet it is mentioned by the Government in the list of roads they intend to build this year. Those extensions are all set forth on pages 1773 and 1774 of Hansard in the report of the speech delivered by the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) the other night, and he stated that these proposed lines would cost in the neighbourhood of $17,000,000. It would be well for us, if we have $17,000,000 to spend on extending the Canadian Northern, to wait until the war is over, and then after the men come home from the war, looking for work, we can utilise them to good purpose in constructing those extensions. The map shows not only the paralleling system of the Canadian Pacific, but other parallel lines. There are five proposed lines running within a short distance of each other. Charters were obtained for these, but I think most of the charters have elapsed.

The Swift Current branch runs southwest, if I remember aright, paralleling the Canadian Pacific. It runs to Vanguard.

Mr. MAHARG: The hon. member is wrong.

Mr. CURRIE: I have the map right here. The map shows that the road runs from Swift Current southeast, and, as I stated, parallels and crosses the Canadian Pacific extension from Swift Current to Vanguard.

Mr. MAHARG: When it is completed.

Mr. CURRIE: Well, then, what is the use of saying that I do not know what I am speaking about? I know quite well what I am speaking about. I hold the map in my hand. I was over the road before the hon. member ever was.

Mr. MAHARG: I know every part of that country. I have travelled back and forth over it for the last twenty-seven or twenty-eight years. The proposed extension runs out fourteen miles from Gravelbourg. If the hon. member looks at the map, he will see that fourteen miles from Gravelbourg is a long way from Swift Current.

Mr. CURRIE: All I can say is that the railway item in the estimates reads, "from Swift Current southeast."

Mr. MAHARG: Quite right.

Mr. CURRIE: If it is not intended to commence the line from Swift Current, that is all right. I have stated what the map shows. What is proposed to be done afterwards does not matter very much, but it is a deliberate paralleling of the Canadian Pacific, if that extension is constructed in the manner shown on the charter. That country is already fairly well served with railways. I think from the station at Vanguard you can see the station of two or three roads. The next branch, which is known as the Elrose extension, runs from Moosejaw to Kerr-Robert, and is fifty miles long.

Mr. MAHARG: It does not run within eighty miles of Moosejaw.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. member may be right. These new names puzzle me somewhat. The next branch is from Medicine Hat to Hanna. I know that ground. That runs in a northerly direction and crosses the Red Deer river at Walsbury, and all that country that is fit for settlement along the Red Deer river is virtually served by the Empress branch of the Canadian Pacific, and that is the extension in regard to which I notice there is in the press an article stating that work on it is going to be proceeded with during the summer. That extension is to be 145 miles long.

Mr. J. D. REID: The extension is from Hanna towards Medicine Hat, not from Medicine Hat the other way, and the proposed extension of fifty miles is from Hanna to the river that runs between Medicine Hat and Hanna, and in that section there is no railway at all. This will serve a population that has been there for many years without any railway facilities at all.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I might supplement the statement of the minister by saying that if those railways are not constructed, settlers in the country about which the hon. member has just spoken will be compelled to haul their produce thirty or forty or fifty miles to a railroad.

Mr. CURRIE: But in the province of Ontario there are places, for instance, in the county of Huron, where the settlers have to haul their produce thirty or forty miles to a railroad. The country that I was speaking about is arid country, only fit for ranching. The hon. member cannot tell me that there are any settlers north of Medicine Hat, until you get near the Red Deer river, along which there are settlements served by the Canadian Pacific Railway line. From the river it goes to Hanna. I do not know if it runs as far as Big valley. That country is largely arid ranching country, and for twenty years before the war was given up to sheep ranching. I say without any hesitation that the people of this country should be well advised before they ask any Government to adopt and any Government should be well advised before adopting the policy of building branch lines and pioneering when the country is now sweating blood in this war and requires every dollar for the war. I do not think that north of the Red Deer river valley, as it is called, there are ten settlers. I know the country; it is a ranching country, largely from Hanna south, and for that reason, whatever may be the case in the near future—I grant the hon. member that possibly ten years from now, when all the rest of that country gets filled up fairly well, they will need a railroad there. They do not at present need one. If you go through that country, or if you look at the map, you will see that the Grand Trunk Pacific has a road projected running through by Kennersley to Empress and across that same country. I do not wish to be understood as opposed to the West getting branch line railways, but I say that one-half of the railway mileage built in the last ten years was not required. It was paralleling existing, useless duplicating. What use was there in the Canadian Northern paralleling the Candian Pacific Railway from Sudbury to Toronto? It was of no earthly use whatever. There was not enough traffic there to keep one road going. What use was there in paralleling as far as Napanee? What use was there in building a road from Sudbury through the wilderness to Ottawa here? There are no settlers in that country, and the territory was well served by the old Booth road or the Canadian Pacific railway. I say that without hesitation the same of Ontario as in the West. When the Grand Trunk Pacific was built in the West, if the management of the road had been allowed to build it as they wanted to build it, through the country they wanted to build through, the road would have served a far more useful purpose than it does now. The original intention was that the Grand Trunk Pacific was to keep fifty or sixty miles away from the other roads, so that it would be a colonizing road and open up new territory. But the minute they started to build through the West deputations came down, political pull and pressure was exerted, and the road was compelled to go from one point to another all over the West through what would be known as competitive territory. Now the day has gone by when we need any competition in railways; in fact we have had to raise the rates and put the railways under an operating board, which is convincing evidence to everybody that the day of competition as far as railway rates and service are concerned, is not now over. The Railway Commission that was constituted fixes the freight rates, and if two roads run into one town it simply means that they will divide the freight between them, and the rate will remain the same. The only other form of competition, and it was the form of competition that nearly destroyed the railroads, was competition in service. At one time three magnificent trains pulled out of Ottawa every night for Toronto within half an hour of each other. Everybody knows that one train would have been sufficient, and in fact the service has been cut down one-half all over the province of Ontario. An effort has been made to prevent duplication of service. The saving will be $6,000,000 per year. While it is a great hardship to a town to have only one train in and out every day it undoubtedly saves the railways from financial destruction, and saves the people of this country from bearing greater burdens than we are now bearing and must continue to bear for a few years.

When I speak of extensions, I want the minister to understand that we in the East do not intend to vote money for any further extensions into territory in the West already served. I go to the West about twice a year, and not only to one point, but pretty well all over it. I know the various towns and cities growing up out there and the magnificent country around them. I know it would be far better for that country if the railways and speculators which own the land all through that country along the right of way were compelled to give it up and place it at the disposal of settlers, and that would avoid the building of many branch lines forty miles out from the main line to give the farmers access to a market. From Saskatoon westward on the Goose Lake line one-half of the land on each side of the road, as every member who lives up in that district knows, is not even settled, but is held for speculative purposes. Would it not be far better if the railways and speculators were compelled to give up that land, which is the best in the West, for the use of settlers? At the present time the settlers have to drive out with an ox team fifty miles away from a railroad to get land, and I have seen lots of them do that when there was rich virgin land lying idle all along the line of railway. Under the present policy the settlers who go out forty or fifty miles from the railway will in time build up a farming settlement, and then some one will come down to Ottawa and demand money to build a branch line out to that settlement, and the branch line to reach that settlement will have to cross these vacant lands owned by the railways and speculators. If the Government are going to take these roads over, they should take very seriously into consideration the question of also taking over large sections of the farming lands alongside of the roads. When Ontario was first settled we had "string" or narrow farms extending back along the main road so that there would be enough houses built and families settled along the waggon roads to keep them in repair. The same policy should have been adapted in the West. When the railways wanted extensions they should have released at least a portion of the land along the line, so that the settlers could go in and take them, then the country would have been better served by the different railways as they went through.

I have this to say in connection with competitive extensions, and I think I am supported by the majority of the members in this House, that this is not the time to expend seven, eight, or ten million dollars in such extensions until we know exactly where we are in our expenditure on the war and on the railways of this country. Within a year or two the railways may be all under one system, and then what use would it be to have, say, a parallel line from Macleod to Calgary? Nothing of the kind is desired. Why the Canadian Northern railway in many cases were not satisfied with paralleling other roads, but if I had time to describe their operations I could show that in several places they have even paralleled themselves or have acquired railways running parallel to their own line and are still running both roads.

Nothing has been said about the finances of the Grand Trunk railway, but I want to say this: You can read Poor's Manual from cover to cover and you will not find a road with as small a funded debt as the Grand Trunk railway, and Poor gives them credit for that. He says their funded debt is almost infinitesimal. I think possibly ten millions would cover the funded debt of the whole Grand Trunk railway with all its branches. The securities against the Grand Trunk railway are guaranteed stock against which there is a floating charge or mortgage, and guaranteed first, second and third debenture stocks. Now you can wipe out a stock, but not a bond security, because a bond security is a mortgage, and you will always have to pay interest on it until the mortgage is extinguished; but you can always wipe out a stock, unless it is a guaranteed one. So I think the securities of the old Grand Trunk railway, so far as the common stock is concerned, could be wiped out, except $25,000,000; but the preferred stocks, for instance, have received dividends from previous to the time the Grand Trunk railway went into this unfortunate speculation.

The speech of the Prime Minister yesterday was notable. I hope that when a board is formed the ablest men in the country will be appointed to it. If you figure out what the War Board has saved to this country during the last year, since it has been in operation, you will find it has effected a saving of about seven million dollars. I trust the War Board will continue to operate these roads, and that we shall only build such extensions as are absolutely necessary. The question is, where are you going to get the steel? None of the big roads are able to get steel enough, as the hon. member for Algoma said, to replace the rails that are broken and wearing out every day, and broken rails have to be cut up and inserted here and there to patch the roads up. I think altogether seven hundred miles of new road are shown in the minister's abstract. Now what is the use of undertaking this work when we cannot get the rails? The great railways of Canada would buy another one hundred million dollars' worth of rails if they could simply for renewals. They have asked the minister for that, but they cannot get the steel anywhere, because it is required for shells and other munitions. And why should we rob the munitions industry to extend our railways into new country? I say that the service our railroads are giving at the present time is sufficient for our purpose. I know that some members from the West will say: "Colonel Currie is going after the West, and does not want railways built there." If hon. gentlemen will read what I said in the House—

Mr. J. F. REID: May I interrupt? Would the hon. gentleman be willing to stop the building of canals in Ontario and build branch lines in the West?

Mr. CURRIE: Exactly. But the hon. gentleman does not apparently know that since this war began the building of canals in Ontario has entirely ceased. The Welland canal extension was well under way, but the machinery for that has virtually been scrapped and the work has stood idle since the war commenced. All canal construction has been stopped in Ontario, and we are quite agreeable to that. Ontario never got one-eighth of the public works that the West has got in the way of railways and public works. We do not kick about that, but I want to remind hon. gentlemen that the Ontario farmer puts his own crop into his own barn and he does not ask for any public elevators. He pays his own money for the things that he needs. The West is quite capable of taking care of itself. It is the richest part of the country, and if they want to take care of themselves let them put their own money into their own enterprises as Ontario does. The West has come back with a full representation in this House and it is not fair that the farmers of Ontario, Quebec and the East should be asked to go down in their jeans for $7,000,000 a year to spend on duplications of branch lines in the West where they are not needed at the present time. Let them supply their own railways. From the time that I first came into this House I protested against this mistaken policy of building competitive transcontinental railways through the West. Every western member hooted me when I spoke in that way. But the chickens have come home to roost. If the money spent on transcontinental railways had been spent on branch lines in the West there is not a remote section in the West which would not now be unserved. The West was not contented until it had got the Hudson Bay railway. Now nobody in the West has a good word to say about that Hudson Bay railway.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. CURRIE: Yes, yes. There is no hope for that railway. I was told in the West, when speaking about the Hudson Bay railway: "It is a very good thing to talk about if you want to sell town lots." The West has been pretty liberally dealt with and we are quite willing to do the best we can for that part of the country, but there are other parts of the country which are doing their duty just as well as the West. If the building of duplicate branch lines everywhere in the West is going to be the policy of the new board from now on, I feel satisfied that this country will be bankrupt inside of ten or fifteen years. The United States did not build its western roads to any extent. They were built by private capital. Outside of the Union Pacific and one or two lesser or greater roads, none of the western roads was built with public money. In Minnesota and through country in the United States similar to our West, you will not find half of the mileage that you find in our West. The West has the best system of railways that you can find in any section of the world to-day. The Canadian Northern needs grading much more than it needs branch lines. If it is provided with steel bridges, station houses and terminals it will be able to take care of its branch line extensions itself later, because the Canadian Pacific have shown us that once a road gets upon a paying basis it can build extensions wherever it wants them. For goodness sake, let the people of this country have a breathing spell for a minute or two before you start building parallel lines in any part of the country either West or East. What would be said of a proposal to parallel the roads in Ontario and Quebec? I do not think Ontario will need any roads for a long time, especially leading to and from the West. There is a part of the riding represented by the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. G. B. Nicholson) where there were thousands of settlers—that is Manitoulin Island—and because of the lack of railways at one time many of them had to leave that section of the country, which is fairly fertile, and go where there were roads. Yet, they did not send deputations down here howling for competing branch lines; they took their medicine. There are parts of the province of Quebec where they need colonization roads just as badly as they do in any part of Canada. I think I have dealt sufficiently with that feature of the question. Any declaration of an intention to make another grab at the treasury for branch lines until this war is over will be resented by the country.

With reference to the railways, I think I have covered all the ground that is necessary. I wish we had some substantial analysis or an abstract with reference to the Canadian Northern prepared by, say, Price-Waterhouse, or some competent auditors, on the same lines as the other statements that have appeared in Poor's Manual so that we would know how to compare the condition of the Canadian Northern railway with the condition of other roads. We would then know what we were getting. I am satisfied if the proper policy is pursued with reference to this road, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Grand Trunk, the result will be very much more satisfactory to the country. I do not look for anything but deficits for the next five or ten years. If the management is any good, I am satisfied that in ten years these railways will be self-sustaining and that in twenty-five years they will be able to take care of their own branch lines, their mileage will be materially increased and large portions will be double tracked. They will be a great asset.

This Railway War Board which has taken charge of our railways has inaugurated a policy of switching the traffic. The traffic which arises on the Canadian Pacific is switched to the Transcontinental, the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific. It would be very easy for that board, if they so desired, with that policy to destroy the premier security of this country—the Canadian Pacific. In that way the Canadian Pacific would be deprived of half its traffic in the West and the traffic routed over these non-paying lines. In this way they can make the other lines pay but they will destroy the Canadian Pacific. I trust that is not the policy that the minister would stand for. The Canadian Pacific has consented and is quite willing to have this tax of $7,000,000 handed over to the other two roads. It would have been much easier if an adjustment had been made of the amount of money that should have been collected in rates from these two roads and if a proper war board had been established at the time the war broke out, there never would have been any real deficit from these roads at all. But the deficits stare us in the face, and it will be necessary to increase the freight rates payable by the people, and to take one-half of the amount realized from those increased freights and turn it back into the public treasury. The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) was quite right in his statement that this increase is pretty hard on those who pay these freight rates. If the charges were increased one-half under a war board they would take care of most of the deficits, but the rates have got to be doubled, and what the Canadian Pacific makes out of the increased rates is taken away from them by Order in Council and turned into the public treasury. I do not think myself that is just to the Canadian Pacific. Every dollar which that company has made since the war it has invested in far securities, in fact I think they have put into war bonds over $100,000,000. They are behind the credit of Canada just as much as the greatest public institution in the world. There is no other railroad in the world, for example, that can give you a through bill of lading to any point on the globe, under peace and ordinary conditions, like the Canadian Pacific. A Canadian who wants to ship goods to any part of the world by the Canadian Pacific railway can go to that company's agent at any station and get a through bill of lading to the uttermost parts of the earth. What is more, if he wants to have his bill collected, he can send it C.O.D. Canadian Pacific to Ceylon or to any part of China, Australasia, or South Africa, and the Canadian Pacific agent at that point will collect his money. Furthermore if he buys goods in any part of the world and wants to check up the weight of those goods or anything else, he will find a Canadian Pacific freight agent there who will do it for him. After the war those agents are going to be a most potent influence in favour of this country in securing a share of the world's trade. For this reason we should be very careful not to do anything to disarrange the operations of that road. If anybody thinks that a reduction of freight on every road is going to help the country let me say that the Canadian Pacific can carry freight cheaper than any other line and make money on it. All of these other railways that have been built have beeen loaded up with tremendous fixed charges so that none of them will be able to carry freight as cheaply as the Canadian Pacific, at any rate not for twenty-five years. Now, Mr. Speaker, the debate over this Bill of my hon. friend the Acting Finance Minister has been considerably prolonged, and I regret very much that my remarks have been at greater length than I intended, but their length was due in large part to interruptions.

Hon. J. D. REID: I do not intend to discuss the merits of the Bill before the committee, but I would like to correct a few statements which have been made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Currie) who has just taken his seat. In the latter part of his remarks, he spoke of the work of the Canadian Railway War Board in Montreal. Let me expand the hon. gentleman's observations on that subject a little and explain the workings of that Board, because I do not believe the people of Sanada realize the good work which it has accomplished. The board was organized in October last, when the heads of the several Canadian railways came to Ottawa for the purpose, and it was agreed that it should operate the several railways of Canada practically as one road. The organization of that board was fully described by the Prime Minister and its record is set out at length in his speech as reported in Hansard. I only wish to say that the Department of Railways and Canals have been working in harmony with the board, and the several Canadian railways have also displayed a similar spirit of co-operation. Where freight was congested at any terminal one railway has not hesitated in the slightest to hand it over to another in order that there might be the least possible delay. The intention of the War Board is to continue operating the Canadian railways as they have been doing during the last six months so long as the present war continues, and perhaps for some time longer.

It was not with reference to the operations of the War Board, however, that I desired particularly to speak. There is a point that seems to call for a word in fairness to the Government, the people and the Canadian Northern. The Canadian Northern railway has been taken over by the Government; it is owned by the people of Canada; and it is indispensable for the continued operation of the system that it should be financed by the Dominion Government. I feel that it is hardly doing justice to the Canadian Northern or to the Canadian people that we should continue "knocking" that system from day to day now that it has become the property of the people. It is necesary for the Finance Minister to go into the open market and raise money to finance the Canadian Northern, and as I said a few days ago, those to whom we apply for the next loan will no doubt have been reading the remarks made by hon. gentlemen in this House, and it certainly will not assist the Finance Minister in raising that money for hon. gentlemen to continue attacking the past history of the Canadian Northern, and giving the public the impression that it does not possess the value, and is not of the good character that it really is. The hon. gentleman makes the statement that the Government, now that it has assumed the ownership of the Canadian Northern railway, is starting out to build branch lines in the West in connection with the system that were never heard of before. That is the impression I gathered from his remarks, but it is not in accordance with the facts. As I understand the situation, the Canadian Northern, prior to the war, laid out branch lines from certain points along its system in the Northwest. Those branch lines were graded, and in some cases the ties were laid down. Settlers went into those districts and located there, believing that the Canadian Northern, having expended a lot of money and done a certain amount of work, and having promised to build lines, would go on and complete the work. Hon. members have asked whether it is the intention of the Government to carry out the promises, honest promises, that were made by the Canadian Northern in that regard. In view of the promises that were made to settlers that if they would go in along the route of the proposed lines, settle there and cultivate the land, these branch lines would be built, and in view of the large expenditure of money that has already been made on these lines, I do not think it is right for the Government to repudiate the promises that were made to those people that they should get branch lines as soon as they could be constructed.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE: Do these lines parallel existing lines, or are they colonization railways?

Hon. J. D. REID: I am going to deal with that question. So far as the four lines that it is proposed to construct are concerned, I have gone into the matter thoroughly and there is absolutely no truth in the statement that they parallel either the Canadian Pacific or any other line.

Mr. CURRIE: These four lines?

Hon. J. D. REID: As far as I can remember, I have not the record here. There is an extension of fourteen miles from Gravelbourg on one line. Between the Canadian Pacific and another road, I do not recall at the moment whether it is the Grand Trunk Pacific or the Canadian Northern, there is a large expanse of country, and the road from Gravelbourg is fourteen miles into a country without railway facilities for many miles on either side of the proposed line. Then there is the Elrose extension. If I remember right—and members from Saskatchewan will correct me—that is an extension to another point where it will connect with the Canadian Northern. If this line goes on it will connect with the Canadian Northern and save a long haul, and in addition will give the farmers of that section the railroad they were promised years ago, and which they would have had if the war had not prevented the Canadian Northern from carrying out its promises. Then there is the Oliver branch, simply extending the present line in that district some twenty-five or thirty-five miles further on, where the road is already graded and ready for the rails. The statement is made that we are spending $7,000,000 for these few extensions, but that is not in accordance with the facts, because all we are doing is simply laying the rails on the grading already done. And what the Government are suggesting to the Canadian Northern is that the second-hand rails we are taking up on the main line, where we are putting the 85-pound rails, should be put on these branch lines. Then there is another line from Hanna south. I believe the hon. gentleman stated that there were very few settlers in that section of the country. My information from members knowing that country is that there is one of the best settlements of farmers between Hanna and the river to be found in the great Northwest. The mayor of Medicine Hat came down here and assured me that the farmers were in there, and had been in there for some years, that they had this promise, and that it was unfair that these branch lines had not been built. I went into this matter thoroughly, and my information is that if those branch lines are extended millions of bushels of wheat will be raised during this coming season and will be brought out, which never would have been done if these lines were not extended.

Another remark of the hon. member was with reference to the Hudson Bay railway. We all realize that when that railway was built it was not expected that it would pay for some time. But since the Hudson Bay railway has been built, it is very evident that we must do something with it. Last year it was operated because we were told that there was a quantity of fish which could be brought out, and which was necessary for food for the western provinces, and also that there were some mines along the railway which could be developed. The result of the operation of trains, which I think ran twice a month, was that the operating expenses were paid with simply the receipts from the fish and the mine traffic.

Mr. CURRIE: How far was it operated?

Hon. J. D. REID: The most of the freight was hauled about one hundred and twenty miles.

Mr. CURRIE: Is the road operated from the bay itself?

Hon. J. D. REID: It is not operated from the bay. The rails are laid 324 miles, speaking from memory.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. minister gave the House the impression that the fish had been brought from Hudson bay.

Hon. J. D. REID: There was none from the bay. But there are lakes all along the railroads. Fish was brought from these lakes, and there was freight from the mines.

Mr. CURRIE: You have not carried on any construction work for a couple of years, I understand?

Hon. J. D. REID: We are not doing much work on the Hudson Bay railway, simply keeping the line in order as it is.

Mr. CURRIE: Could the minister give me off-hand what the loss was on the operation of the Hudson Bay line?

Hon. J. D. REID: There was no loss on the operation carried on during the winter just ended. I think it is twice a month the train runs up and down. It has not cost the country anything for the operation.

Mr. CURRIE: Is the contractor running the road?

Hon. J. D. REID: Yes, it has not been taken off the contractor's hands. So far as the province of Ontario is concerned, I come from that province, and I wish to say that we have all the railways we require at the present time. The hon. member has stated that Ontario has not been building many railways of late, that the great Northwest has been getting them all. If my memory serves me aright, within the last five years we have had a thousand miles of railway built in Ontario by the Canadian Northern between Port Arthur and Ottawa. Then we have had the Canadian Northern built from Toronto to Ottawa, and many other lines have been built in the province of Ontario. So that we have had a great deal of railway construction in this province. I am free to admit that a great deal of it should not have been built, there is no doubt about that. I agree with the hon. member that the line from Toronto to Ottawa should not have been built.

Mr. CURRIE: For part of the way.

Hon. J. D. REID: Yes, and a great deal of the road from Port Arthur to Ottawa. I only wanted to emphasize the fact, however, that we have had all these railways built in Ontario. Although we have many railways in Ontario, there is a great influence at work in the province to give us more railways, which will parallel each other, too. When the Canadian Northern Bill was up in the Railway Committee a few days ago for extension from Toronto to Niagara Falls, undoubtedly the impression left on the committee was that an electric railway should run from Toronto to Niagara Falls instead of the Canadian Northern system. If that railway is built between Toronto and Niagara Falls there is no doubt but that it will parallel two railways that are now in operation. I am not saying that I am in favour of the road between Toronto and Niagara Falls being built by the Canadian Northern system; I am not advocating that at all. But what I do say is that I cannot see at the present time, why there should be another road, electric or otherwise, built by any other corporation from Toronto to Niagara Falls, to parallel the two existing roads. When the hon. member stated that in the West the Canadian Northern are now commencing to parallel other lines, I want to say as Minister of Railways, and on behalf of every member of the Government, that we are not paralleling, and we will not parallel other lines. We will see that the Canadian Pacific railway gets its territory; we do not want to build any railways where they will build them. We will keep the Canadian Northern away from the Grand Trunk Pacific or any other line; the Government will not parallel any lines. The paralleling of lines is being urged in Ontario by other railway corporations; that policy has my disapproval in Ontario as it has in the great West. It is the duty of this Government and of the provincial governments to prevent the paralleling of railway lines. That is my policy and I shall carry it out so long as I am a member of this House.

Mr. CURRIE: Is it the policy of the Government not to continue the program of paralleling that has been the program during the last four or five years?

Hon. J. D. REID: The Government are now the owners of the Canadian Northern. If paralleling has been the policy of the Canadian Northern in the past, it will be stopped at once; it will not be proceeded with by the Government.

Mr. CURRIE: I do not object to colonization roads when we have the money to build them, but I do not think it is necessary to parallel now.

Mr. RICHARDSON: It is not necessary to parallel at any time.

Hon. J. D. REID: I understood the hon. gentleman (Mr. Currie) to say that the Government were proceeding with construction work on the Canadian Northern and that the lines which we were extending paralleled other railway lines than the Canadian Northern. That is not in accordance with the facts. Our policy is not to build parallel lines, and we are not doing that, in the case of the few lines that we are extending. Why hold a post mortem on the policy of the Canadian Northern in the past? The Government have taken over the Canadian Northern and put in a new set of directors, or commissioners—call them what you like; men who go there with a business-like policy, men who know that the Government will not undertake to build parallel lines. When hon. gentlemen know that these directors cannot construct a mile of railway without having the money voted by Parliament, surely it is in the best interest of the Canadian Northern, of the Government and of the people that we forget the past, that we start anew, that we do not try to disparage in the markets of this country and in the eyes of the people of Canada this railroad that we own.

Mr. BUCHANAN: In my judgment, the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) understands western railway conditions a good deal better than the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie). Mention has been made of the proposed Canadian Northern line between Hanna and Medicine Hat. The section of country from Hanna south to the Red Deer river is thickly settled; it embraces settlements which are fifty or sixty miles from the Goose Lake branch of the Canadian Northern. This district has no railway facilities. I am not in a position to say whether south of the Red Deer river there is sufficient settlement to justify railway construction, but certainly there is from Hanna south to the Red Deer river. I am an advocate of the construction of branch lines during the war. The people living in the section of the West from which I come have been patiently waiting until the war is over before they make any demands for the construction of branch lines. Settlers who, even for the last three or four years, have been hauling their products from forty to fifty miles to reach railway communication in the constituency which I represent originally went into those sections of the country because charters had been granted by Parliament to the Canadian Northern and other railway companies to construct lines into those districts, and the people had been promised that those lines would be built. In one section of my constituency the people who have to haul their grain forty or fifty miles to a railway have been there since 1909. The member for North Simcoe mentioned the people on Manitoulin Island. I happen to have a colony of Manitoulin people in my constituency; they are living in what is probably the oldest homestead district in Southern Alberta. But they have no railway facilities; they haul their grain twenty or thirty miles to the nearest station. These people have been contributing to the development and enrichment of the country, and we shall have to provide branch lines very soon to give them railway communication, or we shall lose them; they will leave Canada and go to some other section of the continent. I went over most of my constituency a few months ago, and in places twenty or thirty miles from a railroad I saw as fine dwellings and farm buildings as you would see in some of the oldest districts in Ontario. That is indicative of the faith which these people have. They are patiently waiting for the construction of branch lines. I have not been pressing the matter on the minister, but the Government would be mistaken in not considering the construction of branch lines in the West, because lack of attention to this subject may mean a great loss to our country through the departure of many of the settlers in the western provinces.

I am satisfied with the position taken by the leader of the Government with regard to railway policy. I do not believe in the Government rushing to a quick decision concerning railway affairs. Proper consideration should be given to them, and after that consideration has been given it will remain with supporters of the Government and members of the House to decide whether or not the policy adopted by the Government is proper.

Mr. MURPHY: It is not my intention to enter into a discussion of the general railway situation, nor do I intend to present the railway needs of any particular locality. Were it necessary for me to do so, I am rather dubious as to the reception any representation that I might make would meet at the hands of the Government. I desire to come back to a discussion of the Bill before the committee. I have refrained from doing that in order to give my colleagues in the House who desired to discuss railway matters generally an opportunity to ventilate whatever views or grievances they might desire to place before the Government and the country.

When the Bill was in committee yesterday, just before the House rose at one o'clock, I had drawn attention to the fact that the difficulty in getting information from the Canadian Northern Railway Company, which has attended every piece of legislation brought before this Parliament, is a prominent feature of the arbitration proceedings now in progress in Toronto.

I was surprised at a statement by the Minister of Railways that the country's interests were admirably protected because the country was represented there by an eminent counsel in the person of Mr. Tilley. Following the lead of the Minister of Railways, the Prime Minister was unlucky enough to repeat that statement. I drew his attention to the fact that I had in my hand a clipping from a newspaper giving expression to a statement made by Mr. Tilley at one of the sittings of the board, that he, the Government counsel, and assumed to be the representative of the people before that board, could not get the information to which he was entitled. I have that clipping here for the information of any person who may be curious to look at it.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Will the hon. member read it?

Mr. MURPHY: My hon. friend from Prince (Mr. Joseph Read) asks me to read this clipping. He is always so reasonable in his requests that I shall comply with this one. The despatch in question is from Toronto under date of April 9, and it details the proceedings at the meeting of the Board of Arbitration sitting in that city on that date. It goes on to say:

> Mr. Tilley, K.C., chief Government counsel, sprung a mild sensation just before adjournment for the night when he announced that he was unable to get any information from the railway officials as to what the gross earnings and operating expenses have been since October 1st, 1917. Sir William McKenzie declared that no one in attendance possessed the information requested.

It will be within the recollection of the Committee that yesterday after I had checked up the Prime Minister with that item, he hurriedly consulted with one of the officials of the railway department in attendance on the floor of this House, and then he qualified his remarks by saying that he was informed that Mr. Tilley did make that protest, but that the information was on the way to him at that time and that he received it afterwards. That statement, as hon. members will observe, hardly squares with the statement made by Sir William Mackenzie that there was no one in attendance who possessed the information required.

Hon. J. D. REID: I noticed that item in the press the next morning. I asked Mr. Tilley if there was any truth in the statement that he had not received all the information, and in a telegram or a letter—or it may have been in a conversation over the telephone—Mr. Tilley assured me he had received all the information he asked for at that time, and almost immediately after he made that statement. It was on the way to him at the time he made the statement.

Mr. MURPHY: Of course, I am not in a position to discuss this new phase now interjected by the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) but I venture to say a very slight inquiry will establish the fact that this is only one of innumerable protests made by Mr. Tilley against the withholding of information. We have had experience of that in this House year after year. No matter what comes up in connection with the Canadian Northern, the committee may take it for granted in advance that they will not get the information necessary to discuss the matter intelligently. The time of this House has been taken up by hon. gentlemen on both sides with demands for information; that information is never forthcoming. I am going, in a few minutes, to put the minister to the test in order to illustrate to this Committee that even now the Government have not the information to justify it in going on with this legislation. Before I come to that, I want to emphasize this point, that the Canadian Northern railway, unlike every other company or body in this country with which Parliament is called upon to deal, will not supply information. When that attitude is assumed towards me in my ordinary business or private relations, I am willing to accept the challenge, and if I were dealing with the Canadian Northern railway, they would either give the information or get not one farthing of what they were after,—the information would be forthcoming first, and afterwards a decision would be reached as to what they were to get. I refer to this matter now, because if a stand is not taken upon it by this new Parliament, we shall have the same thing repeated over and over again during the lifetime of this Parliament. I feel I am discharging a necessary public duty in once more drawing the attention of the House to this feature of every transaction with which the Canadian Northern Railway Company and Mackenzie, Mann and Company, Limited, are connected.

I agree in the main with my hon. friends on the opposite side of the House who have dealt at length with the provisions of this Bill and with the attitude which the country as a whole should assume towards the Canadian Northern Railway system. I could point out differences of opinion, differences of view that exist as between them and me, but at the present stage I do not think any good purpose would be served by taking up the time of the Committee in doing that, and so I shall pass on.

I want for a moment or two to refer to the speech delivered last night by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson), in whose utterances I always take a great interest, but who, like the rest of us, is fallible, and who will not think it unkind of me if I draw his attention to a few slips that he made in the course of his very interesting address. My hon. friend, as was natural in such a general review as that in which he indulged, dealt with the question of railway mileage in this country and the relation which it bore to the population of Canada. I think I am correct in saying that the deduction drawn by my hon. friend from that comparison was that we had too many miles of railway, and that several railways need not have been constructed. He proceeded to apportion the responsibility, and if my memory again serves me correctly, he apportioned the greater part of the responsibility for that state of affairs to the Government previously led by the present leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I did not happen to be a member of that Government at the time any of its railway policies were determined upon, but I was a member while some of them were being carried out. I do not, however, wish to be understood as disclaiming responsibility for anything for which that Government may fairly be held to be responsible. My hon. friend, in the same connection, spoke of the Drayton-Acworth report, and as he seemed to set great store by that report and to be in general agreement with it, I may be pardoned if I direct his attention to what is stated in it with regard to the mileage of railways in Canada and the proportion which that mileage bears to the population of the Dominion both now and in decennial periods past. At page 10 of the report the members of the committee say:

> We may put the same thing in another way. The growth of the mileage has far outstripped the growth of the population. In 1901 with a a population of 5,371,315, Canada had 18,140 miles of railway in operation; roughly, a mile of railway for every 300 inhabitants. In 1911, the population had increased 34 per cent to 7,206,643, while the mileage had increased by forty per cent to 25,400 miles; a mile of railway to every 284 inhabitants. Since 1911, the population has, it is understood, not much increased, but the railway mileage open and under construction has grown to 40,584 miles. In other words, Canada has to-day, taking the present population as 7,500,000 only 185 inhabitants to support each mile of railway.

Running over that, for the purpose of giving a summary comparison, it will be observed that in 1901 the total mileage was 18,401; in 1911, after a period of ten years, it was 25,400, or an increase of 7,260 miles. Starting with the mileage of 25,400 in 1911 the mileage had grown between that year and 1917 to 40,584, or an increase of 15,000 miles—an increase, mark you, which had taken place under the Government of which the present Prime Minister was the leader. I am not advancing this argument, but rather applying it because it has been advanced by the hon. member for Springfield. So that if a mistake has been made in building too many miles of road, if the responsibility is to be placed anywhere, I submit that according to the report which was cited by my hon. friend himself the burden of the responsibility must be placed on the shoulders of the Government of which my right hon. friend the Prime Minister was the head.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: When was the building of that 15,000 miles of railway projected and determined upon? When was the country bound to the policy by which that 15,000 miles became a necessity?

Mr. MURPHY: I would be glad to give my hon. friend exact information on that point if I had it at hand. I do not happen to have it at hand, but I would point out this: that if we had too many miles of railway then, as the Government claim now that we have, that discovery should have been made by the Government between 1911 and 1917.

My hon. friend from Springfield also referred to a statement which he attributed to the Government of which my right hon. leader was the head, and which he expressed in these terms:

> We were assured by the Government of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) the railway (the Transcontinental) would only cost the country $13,000,000.

My hon. friend has been out of Parliament for some years, much to the country's loss—and I say that in all sincerity—but had he been in Parliament he would have heard that fable exploded over and over again by hon. gentlemen among whom he is now sitting and by members of the Government of which he is now a follower. The last time I have a distinct recollection of that argument being taken up and refuted was by the hon. Mr. Justice Lennox, the former Conservative member for South Simcoe, I believe, at all events one of the Simcoes; and when I have time I will refer my hon. friend to the page in Hansard containing Mr. Justice Lennox's refutation of that argument.

My hon. friend from Springfield also referred to the investigation which was carried on by the commission appointed by the late Government into the construction of the National Transcontinental railway, a commission known as the Gutelius-Lynch Staunton Commission. My hon. friend asserted, without referring to the findings of that commission, but using a phrase which has done great service in the headlines of the Conservative press in this country, and which has been worked to death on Conservative platforms all over the Dominion, that the finding of that commission was that "there was $40,000,000 of graft money in connection with the construction of the National Transcontinental railway." Now I wish to give that statement made by my hon. friend—made in good faith I have no doubt, and without having looked at the report of the commission—the most emphatic and unqualified denial. No such finding was made by that commission, because no such finding could have been made, and no such report was made by that commission. What did the report of that commission say? It said:

> We find that without including money which was unnecessarily expended in building the railway east of the St. Lawrence River, $40,000,000 was needlessly expended in the building of this road.

And then the commissioners go on to say what they mean by "needlessly expended." They say that the permanent work should not have been permanent, but temporary work, that trestles should have been put in instead of fills and bridges, and that the road, instead of being constructed on a four-tenths grade in one direction and a six-tenths in the other, should have had velocity grades; in other words, that the character of the road should have been cheapened, and that if this cheapening process had been carried out from start to finish the cost of the road would have been $40,000,000 less. That is the finding of that commission, and not that $40,000,000 of graft was obtained in the construction of the road. I mention these things because from my limited experience in Parliament I find it is a mistake to let such statements go unchallenged. It is an injustice to new members who may not know the facts, and who, if the statements are left unchallenged, will believe them and give them circulation throughout the country. That is the reason why I have gone to the trouble of quoting chapter and verse for my hon. friend from Springfield, who I know desires to be fair in this as in all other matters of public criticism.

Coming to the Bill itself, I submit that it is open to the same objections as were urged againt two measures introduced into this House a little earlier in the session, one of the them by the Minister of Railways and Canals. I refer to the measure by which he proposed to withdraw from Parliament control over a certain annual expenditure. Hon. gentlemen will recall that opposition to that measure was so marked and so general in this House that the minister wisely withdrew his Bill. I submit that the Bill we are now discussing, Bill No. 87, is open to the very same objections. This Bill, if passed, will deprive Parliament of the control of the expenditure made in connection with the Canadian Northern Railway system, and I am sure that that has only to be pointed out to hon. members, and particularly to those who have already criticised the Canadian Northern Railway management and who know something of the manner in which the management carry on their transactions, to secure their approval of a proposal that this Bill should be so amended as to make it apply to the expenditure for one year only; so that the Government and the company will have to come before Parliament each year and submit a statement of what the expenditure has been and is to be and secure approval for that which has been spent and authority for that which is to be expended in the current or the coming year. If we do not do that, if we pass this Bill in its present blanket shape, this Parliament will, with its eyes open, have divested itself of all control of these expenditures. Parliament, I am certain, does not intend to do that. It is quite possible that in the rush of work this session, and owing to the continuous strain upon members, due to the long sittings, that feature of the Bill may not have presented itself to them.

I am trying to draw attention to it now. My submission is that both the first section and the preamble should be entirely re-cast so as to make this Bill apply only to the expenditure of the current fiscal year. The Government can come back to Parliament next session, give us a statement of the amount which has been expended and secure authority, which Parliament will willingly give, for the expenditure that has to be made in the next fiscal year. I want also to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that, in addition to remodelling section 1 and the preamble of the Bill, there ought to be a further section added, making it the last section, containing a schedule of the securities maturing in the year. Members of the committee will recall that when making his statement in the House on Friday May 10, the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) gave a list of the securities maturing this year. My proposal is that the list of securities maturing this year should form the schedule to this Bill so that the House will know that it is authorizing this Government to arrange or postpone the payment of indebtedness amounting to $67,370,607, and no more, on account of the Canadian Northern railway system during the current fiscal year. The House, knowing that, will proceed with this legislation with confidence and certainty. It is my firm conviction that that is what hon. gentlemen on both sides desire to do. I agree entirely with what the hon. member for Springfield and other hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have said, that this is a burden that is upon our hands. We must deal with it as best we can and in the light of the best intelligence that we can apply to the solution of the numerous and intricate problems connected with it. But I do ask the committee and the House not to make that difficulty greater still by proceeding in the dark and by giving a blanket authority, such as this Bill would give, thereby making it certain that each year Parliament would have its time taken up and would be distracted with discussion based on insufficient information; making it certain that members of the Government of the day, no matter what Administration it might be, would be bombarded from the beginning to the end of the session by members on both sides with requests for information which they would not be able to give; making it certain that unless the commmittee pass this amendment we will perpetuate for an indefinite length of time all those things of which hon. gentlemen on both sides have so severely complained. Now, my suggestion in concrete form is that section 1 and the preamble of the Bill be struck out and that the following be substituted therefor:

Whereas, five-sixths of the shares mentioned in section 3 of chapter 24 of the statutes of Canada for the year 1917, have been transferred as required by said Act, His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

1. The Governor in Council may assist the Canadian Northern Railway Company, or any company included in the Canadian Northern Railway System, in renewing or postponing the payment of any indebtedness of any such company maturing in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1919, on such terms as may be agreed on, by guaranteeing in whole or in part the payment thereof with interest, or the notes or obligations given for such renewal or postponement: Provided that the amount of principal to be so guaranteed shall not exceed the amount of the indebtedness the payment of which is renewed or postponed.

In a word, it is proposed by this suggested amendment to make the Bill apply solely to payments to be made during the fiscal year ending the 31st March next, the expectation being—in fact it was so stated by the Prime Minister or one of his colleagues—that the Government would come back to the House next session for such legislation or other authority as might be desired. After the other sections of the Bill are passed, I propose to move another section. I shall read it now merely for convenience and to give hon. members an idea of the general proposal I am making. I propose to add, as section 4 of the Bill, the following:

The securities of the said company maturing in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1919, and to which this Act shall apply, are the securities mentioned in the schedule hereto annexed.

Then follows the schedule which is taken verbatim from the list of securities given by my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance as being the securities maturing in the present year.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: Would the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. J. D. Reid) tell us what rate of interest has been paid on the securities maturing this year and at what rate of interest does he expect he will be able to renew these liabilities? A great many figures have been given to this House by the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and the hon. Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) regarding the cost of this railway (C.N.R.). During the last election the people took a great deal of interest in this question. Might we have a complete statement of the liabilities to date of the Canadian Northern railway, of the amount that has been paid by the Government to the company to date, and how much it is expected it will cost to extinguish the interest of the balance of the stockholders in the preferred and common stock or other claims in order that the country may become the sole owner of this property? The minister could perhaps also tell us what the policy of the Government will be in case the commission sitting at Toronto to fix the amount to be paid to Mackenzie and Mann do not agree, or if one of the parties does not accept the award.

It has been stated that the Canadian Northern company may appeal from the award of the arbitration board, if they do not approve of it, and if so the proceedings may drag on for a year or two longer. The Government has bought the road but it does not control a majority of the directors though it has the majority of the common stock. The country having invested hundreds of millions in this railroad, would be interested in knowing what policy is contemplated by the Government in the event of any such delay as I have referred to.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. gentleman has asked what rate of interest the Canadian Northern is paying on its short term loans. I am informed that it is paying five and six per cent on those loans that will be retired shortly. The hon. member also asked what rate will be paid on the loans that are renewed. He can see that it will be impossible for me to give that information because it may be several months before some of the loans are taken up and renewed. As to what the total cost of the Canadian Northern has been to the people of Canada I would refer him to the Prime Minister's speech as reported at page 2070 of Hansard, in which he stated that the total cost would be $438,264,367.67, that is if par were paid for the outstanding securities. On the same page of Hansard will be found a list of the total liabilities, as follows:

Funded Debt	$285,795,420 61
Equipment, Trust obligations	13,526,000 00
Demand and short term loans secured by collateral	58,056,961 11
Due to other companies on construction account, secured	30,502,392 04
Current liabilities	19,408,495 79
Accrued interest	4,730,069 93
Reserves for taxes and insurance	1,245,038 19
Total	$413,264,377 67

The Prime Minister after giving the foregoing figures stated:

> I add to that total the amount of the five per cent income charge convertible debenture stock, $25,000,000, making a total of $438,264,377.67.

That is if we were retiring all those liabilities and paying par for them.

The hon. member also asked what would be the policy of the Government after the new directors are installed in office. The Prime Minister also went into that matter yesterday, and I could not add to anything that he has already said. I hope that the hon. gentleman will find that the Prime Minister answered his questions fully in the statement of yesterday.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: It appears to me that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Murphy) who proposed the amendment must be losing sight of the fact that the Canadian Northern is the property of the people, upon whom all of the outstanding securities of the Canadian Northern are a direct obligation. The Finance Minister will not be renewing obligations for a private railway company when he renews, either this year or next year, any obligations that are outstanding or maturing, chargeable against the Canadian Northern Railway property, and I submit this question: Will the Canadian people or the Parliament of Canada be acting wisely in tying the hands of the Finance Minister? If the opportunity arises during the present fiscal year of renewing any part of the outstanding obligations of the Canadian Northern Railway system on the basis of an interest charge similar to what they have been carrying for the past ten years, will he be wise in renewing them or will he be not? Let me put it this way: I assume, and I believe that every hon. member in this House will assume, that many of the obligations maturing this year are held by parties who hold obligations that will be maturing next year. Now, if the opportunity is presented to the Finance Minister during the present year of renewing both sets of obligations on the old terms, will he not be wise in availing himself of that privilege? If we tie the hands of the Finance Minister and say to him that he can only renew the obligations that are maturing up to 31st March, 1919, we are placing him in a position that will not make it possible for him to take advantage of the fact that you can without question extend the time of a large block of securities much more readily than you can a small block of securities. If the Minister of Finance can, during the present fiscal year, extend the time on every single dollar of outstanding securities that the Canadian Northern have for a period of ten or fifteen years, he would be doing good business to seize the advantage and do it, because we know these securities were sold at a price and at a rate of interest that could not possibly be obtained if we went into the markets of the world and endeavoured to sell new securities to-day. So that I say that the House will be acting very wisely if it does not tie the hands of the Finance Minister in any degree in extending the time on any part of these securities, if it is possible for him to do it.

Mr. NESBITT: I would like to endorse what the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has said. I think it would be very foolish for us, now that we have assumed a big undertaking of this kind, to tie the hands of the Finance Minister from year to year. It would be very unwise for him not to try and renew the indebtedness which is falling due in the future as well as that which is falling due this year. No man doing a large business who had an indebtedness of that kind falling due would want to wait until the indebtedness was due before he tried to renew the same, any more than any firm, or any corporation, that had a large discount at the bank would want to wait until the discounts were due, or until the bills matured, before it tried to renew them. I hope my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy) will see the matter in that light and withdraw his amendment.

Mr. MURPHY: In response to the request made by both the hon. gentlemen who have just spoken, let me say that I do not propose to tie the hands of the Finance Minister at all. I propose to take the very statement submitted to the House and embalmed in Hansard by the Acting Finance Minister himself, and say that this legislation shall apply to those securities. If there are others to be added, very well; I am quite willing that they should be added. My point is that we should know what we are doing; we should have them now. Really the most acceptable form for this Bill, the form in which it ought to pass would be with a schedule of all the indebtedness and of all the renewals that are to be made. I know very well that the Government have not got that, that so long as they are dealing with the Canadian Northern system they will not get it. And it is because of that that I propose to limit the application of the Bill to the present fiscal year—not to tie the hands of the Acting Finance Minister, as my hon. friend has said, but simply to accept his own statement and make it the schedule of the Bill.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am sorry that I was not in the House at the time the member for Russell proposed his amendment. As the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) stated a few moments ago, the hon. gentleman deals with this matter as if the road was not the property of the people of Canada. He knows, Parliament knows, what the maturities of the road are for this year; they have been given to the House in detail, and all we ask is power to renew these from time to time. It seems an absurd suggestion to me to limit the power of renewal just for one year, thus obliging the Government to come back to Parliament year after year. For what purpose? To renew securities which must be provided for in some way. There is a provision in clause 1 that the amount of principal that is guaranteed by way of renewals "shall not exceed the amount of the indebtedness the payment of which is from time to time renewed or postponed." We cannot increase the liabilities of the Canadian Northern through any power granted to the Government under this Bill. The suggestion is not business-like. It is unfair to seek to impose that amendment in this legislation, and I ask that the House do not adopt it.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Amendment negatived on division: Yeas, 47; nays, 75.

Mr. CAHILL: In view of the fact that we are not able to get the information asked for repeatedly as to where this money is going, are we to assume that the deal is so shady that the information will not be furnished?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What information is it the hon. gentleman wants?

Mr. CAHILL: Where the money is going. We are told it is going to the Canadian Northern, but we are also told that the Canadian Northern is the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Any money that is paid will be paid to those to whom it is owing.

Mr. CAHILL: Who are the owners of the debenture stock? Why can we not find where this money is going?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does my hon. friend mean to say we should tell him who are the holders of bonds that are maturing during the present year?

Mr. CAHILL: And last year.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is that what my hon. friend wants? There is maturing in July or August of this year certain notes which were purchased by the brokerage firm of W. A. Read & Co., New York, to the amount of several millions of dollars. These notes have probably been sold all over the United States. Does my hon. friend mean to say that we shall submit to the House the names of the holders of these notes? The request is not fair, and it is impossible for us to get that information, even if we wanted it.

Mr. CAHILL: In the statement last year there is an item of $12,500,000 payable to the Canadian Northern railway. But as the Canadian Northern railway belongs, we are told, to Canada, we are taking the money from one pocket and putting it into the other. Who did the Canadian Northern pay it to? Where can we get that information?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I gave all that information to the House, and the Prime Minister gave it much more fully yesterday. It is impossible to do anything more.

Mr. CAHILL: There is nothing further in that information than that it was paid to the Canadian Northern?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman does not seem to understand the difference between paying money and not paying it at all. This is a Bill enabling us not to pay but to postpone obligations due to various banking firms, the names of which the hon. gentleman has. It is not to pay a dollar to the Canadian Northern Railway or any subsidiary railway, but to enable us to postpone and renew obligations of the company to various banking firms of the world. I do not know that anything more can be done except to repeat that over and over again to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CAHILL: You are not asking for any money in this Bil?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We are asking power to renew securities that are maturing this and when necessary to guarantee the securities renewed.

Mr. CAHILL: What am I to understand by retiring the debenture stock of $12,000,000? What is the meaning of that? Are you renewing that too?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We hope to renew everything that is maturing this year. Surely the hon. gentleman would not say it was not good business to pay in full any of the securities maturing during the present year if we can renew them upon favourable terms, and during the war period?

Mr. CAHILL: Did the Prime Minister not tell us yesterday that we would retire $12,000,000 of debenture stock?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is another matter altogether. That is payment of the $25,000,000 which Parliament advanced last year. We showed where that money went. That has nothing to do with this Bill.

Mr. CAHILL: Why not? Whom did the Canadian Northern pay the money to? There is also an item here of $12,000,000 to pay on debenture stock this year. To whom is that to be paid?

Section 2 carried on division.

Bill reported.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: When shall the Bill be read the third time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Now.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Next sitting of the House.

Mr. MURPHY: I object to the third reading of the Bill now. The leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) desires to make a statement regarding it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Next sitting of the House.

WAR REVENUE ACT, 1915, AMENDMENT.

House again in committee on Bill No. 83, to amend the Special War Revenue Act, 1915—the Minister of Finance—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 5, 19B, subsection 1—tax on articles in schedule:

Mr. McMASTER: Is this tax to be paid when the goods are completed and put into stock, or when they are sold to the retailer?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is payable when the goods are sold.

Mr. McMASTER: Is that clearly stated in the Bill?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The words used are "manufactured and sold".

Subsection agreed to.

On section 5, 19B, subsection 2—automobiles and jewellery in stock on 30th April liable to tax:

Mr. BUREAU: This subsection says:

There shall be levied, collected and paid upon automobiles and jewellery imported into Canada.

I understand, when an automobile is imported into Canada, this duty will be paid.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: If it is imported for sale?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: The subsection says for sale or manufacture. I understand when an automobile is imported into Canada it is generally manufactured. It is all set up except the wheels which are tied on the side. When the automobile is taken out of the car, the only thing to be done is to put the wheels on. Does the word "manufacture" apply to the word "automobiles" or just to the word "jewelry"?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It applies to both.

Mr. BUREAU: If the automobile is imported into Canada, it cannot be for manufacture unless the parts are to be manufactured.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The word "imported" comes first. The word "manufacture" should be "manufactured". I move that the word "manufactured" be substituted for the word "manufacture" in line 42 on page 3 of the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McMASTER: I have to renew the objection which I made to the resolution concerning automobiles when the Acting Minister of Finance brought down his Budget. I take the liberty of again pointing out to him that the word "automobile" is a very broad term and could properly be applied to such widely separated vehicles as tractors or heavy trucks and the most expensive and luxurious touring cars or limousines. From replies made to me by the minister when I was endeavouring to criticise the Budget speech, I understood that the word "automobile" was practically restricted to pleasure cars. If that be so, it should be so stated in the Bill. The term is so wide that there is bound to be misapprehension and confusion unless it is more closely defined.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Was my hon. friend's attention drawn to the schedule to this Bill? The word "automobile" is there defined:

Automobiles adapted or adaptable for passenger use.

It was intended that the tax should apply only to such classes of automobiles.

Mr. McMASTER: I am afraid that definition, although it helps a great deal, does not altogether clear away the difficulty. I am afraid it will suggest to people's minds that automobiles adapted or adaptable for passenger use are automobiles for the carrying of passengers who pay money for that privilege. Let us take Ford cars with an interchangeable rear part which are used as express cars, but which can be used as pleasure cars. Would such cars be exempted?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No. They would not be liable to the tax.

Mr. McMASTER: The schedule says: "adapted or adaptable for passenger use."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Passenger automobiles are sometimes used for delivery purposes by the removal of the body from the truck. That class of automobiles would be subject to the tax.

Mr. CURRIE: Is it the intention to give people who have a stock of those cars an opportunity to dispose of them before the tax is collected, or has the manufacturer to pay the tax as soon as a car is manufactured? An excise tax is generally payable only when the article is sold. The article is supposed to be in bond until it is sold to the consumer. I was called up by long distance telephone to find out in regard to this matter.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The tax will be paid only when the car is sold.

Mr. CURRIE: That is to say, the numbers of the cars that have been imported and stored in the warehouses can be handed in to the department and the tax paid as they are sold to the buyers.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is, if they were imported before 30th April, and in stock at that time, the tax will be paid only at the time of sale.

Mr. CURRIE: What about cars manufactured in Canada?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The tax on cars manufactured in Canada is payable at the time of sale.

Mr. McMASTER: The duty on automobiles being now 42½ per cent if you add this 10 per cent duty on automobiles that are imported, although you do attempt to equalize that by the exercise tax on automobiles manufactured in this country, you are practically putting the users of automobiles at the mercy of the automobile manufacturers of this country, because our import tax of 52½ per cent on automobiles will absolutely reserve the whole market for the Canadian manufacturers. The 10 per cent excise tax will be altogether inadequate to equalize the situation as between the manufacturer and the importer. The minister should carefully consider whether, in imposing this extra 10 per cent import duty, he should not very substantially increase his excise tax on automobiles manufactured in Canada. If he puts the consumers at the mercy of the Canadian manufacturers, he will get a 10 per cent excise tax, but if he shuts out altogether the importation of automobiles he will lose the 42½ per cent he is collecting now on cars brought in, and the last state, so far as the treasury is concerned, will be worse than the first.

Mr. CURRIE: As we are putting a tax on automobiles I think the minister should consider the advisability of fixing the price of gasolene of the price prevailing in the United States. Over there they pay twenty-two cents, compared with our thirty and thirty-five cents per gallon. Would it not be advisable to put a tax of five cents per gallon of gasolene? That would bring the price of gasolene in Canada up to about thirty cents and the Government would get five cents a gallon in taxes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I did not give any consideration to the fixing of the price of the gasolene when considering the imposition of this tax, but I may say that the matter of the price of gasolene has received some attention from the Government, and it is to receive further attention very shortly. I do not think the difference between the price of gasolene in Canada and the United States is as great as the hon. gentleman suggests. In the first place he must remember that gasolene is sold in the United States by a different measure from ours, and that accounts for a difference of three cents per gallon. Then the question of transportation enters very largely into the cost.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: If gasolene now comes in free, I cannot quite understand the argument of my hon. friend.

Mr. CURRIE: There is no argument in favour of charging the people of Canada ten cents more for gasolene than the people of Windsor and Detroit are paying. It is true there is no duty on gasolene, but I cannot understand why gasolene can be purchased in the United States at twenty-five cents an imperial gallon at Detroit or Buffalo, and as soon as you cross the river it costs thirty-five cents. This country is not benefited at all by this additional price, and I think it would be advisable for the minister to take into consideration the fixing of a price for gasolene, just as the price is fixed in the United States, making an allowance for the difference between the imperial and the wine measure.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is the price fixed in the United States?

Mr. CURRIE: It is, because you can buy the wine gallon for twenty to twenty-three cents in the remotest parts of the Southern States. At Chicago, Detroit, Buffalo, and all through that territory it sells for from twenty-three to twenty-five cents, but when you cross the river it is thirty-five cents. I think the Government, when putting a tax on automobiles, which are a luxury, should also take into consideration the fixing of a price for gasolene for these automobiles, because gasolene is very much used by the farmers nowadays both on the farm and in trucking. I think the price of gasolene should be fixed so that Canada will not be imposed upon, and a little tax upon gasolene might probably get the Government more revenue than the tax on automobiles.

Mr. NESBITT: I do not know where my hon. friend found the price to be twenty-three cents per gallon in the United States and thirty-three cents in Canada. The last time I was over there the bigger gallon sold for thirty cents, as compared with thirty-three cents here, and thirty cents there is exactly equal to thirty-six cents here.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I understand that gasolene is cheaper in Toronto at the present time than in Buffalo. It is very difficult to explain the spread in price, but had I known this question was coming up to-night I would have had some information on the subject which would have helped in the discussion. I may assure my hon. friend (Mr. Currie) that certain representations have been made to the Government in respect to the price of gasolene, and we are proposing to make some inquiries into the matter.

Mr. BUREAU: I think the question raised by my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) is very apropos. He wanted to know whether big motor trucks would be subject to this tax.

Mr. McMASTER: That has been explained.

Mr. BUREAU: Personally, I do not know of a motor truck that cannot be adapted to passenger service. Let me give an illustration. A truck was imported, something like the ones that are seen in the streets of Ottawa sprinkling water. It wore out, and was sold to a couple of fellows who took off the tank and put on seats, and now the car is being used to transport passengers between two villages. That goes to show that any automobile is adaptable to passenger purposes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It was not in that condition when it was imported.

Mr. BUREAU: Who is going to decide if it is adaptable for passengers when it is imported? I say there is no truck that is not adaptable for passengers.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think there will be any serious attempt to evade the tax by importing an automobile as a motor truck, and afterwards converting it into a passenger automobile. I do not anticipate there will be any trouble on the part of the officials of the Customs Department in giving a satisfactory ruling in every instance. You can convert possibly almost any motor vehicle into a passenger car, but I would point out that the cost of a motor truck is very much greater than the cost of a passenger automobile.

Mr. DECHENE: Is the tax applicable only to automobiles brought in for sale or for manufacture?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Applicable to every automobile imported.

Mr. DECHENE: The clause reads, "Automobiles imported into Canada for sale or manufacture."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is in respect of stock on hand on the thirtieth of April, stock already imported.

Mr. PEDLOW: I should like to make a suggestion with reference to taxing automobiles, and the object of my suggestion is not only to increase the revenue but by taxation to discourage the purchase of luxuries and unremunerative articles. I would suggest that instead of a flat rate of ten per cent on motor cars a sliding scale be adopted, taxing motor cars costing $1,000 or under say ten per cent, cars costing $2,000 twenty per cent, and on the more luxurious cars and limousines costing $3,000 or over, a tax of thirty per cent of the selling price. I think motor cycles should also be included in this scheme of taxation. They cost anywhere from $300 to $500, and, of course, are pleasure vehicles. I do not see any reason why motor cycles should be excluded. You would derive an increased revenue from this source. The imposition of a tax on the lines as suggested might discourage the investment of money in luxuries. I would endorse the proposition made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) that a tax of five cents a gallon should be levied on gasolene when used for pleasure purposes. Gasolene as used for industrial or utility purposes should be exempt, but when it it used for purely pleasure purposes I do not see any reason why you should not levy a tax on it. In the Old Country they prohibit the use of gasolene entirely for pleasure purposes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It would be very difficult to administer a tax on gasolene unless it were made applicable to all uses. Gasolene is used very largely by farmers, particularly in the western provinces, and by fishermen on the Pacific and Atlantic coasts. The question of the taxation of gasolene received very considerable attention. I do not know that I should state to the House what considerations influenced me in not including such a tax in this Bill. Possibly it may be imposed next year. The price of gasolene is now very high and possibly it may go higher owing to the fact that the cost of crude oil has advanced between 200 and 300 per cent. Crude oil, from which gasolene is made, sold before the war for 95 cents a barrel. Three weeks ago it was selling for $3.95. It is believed in the United States that it will go a great deal higher. The supply of crude oil in the United States to-day will not meet their own wants for fuel purposes. It was that consideration which largely influenced the Government in abandoning the idea of a tax upon gasolene for this year at least. The suggestion about grading the tax on automobiles has merit, of course. However, as long as it is based upon the selling value, the more expensive car will pay more than the cheaper one. The larger proportion of automobiles purchased or manufactured in Canada cost under $1,000. In Canada last year there were manufactured 68,000 automobiles which were sold at a price under $1,000. There were 8,000 sold at a price between $1,000 and $2,000, and 400 only over $2,000. The number of imported automobiles costing over $2,000 was very small indeed. It was for that reason that I thought it better to make the tax applicable to all.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I see no definition of the word "jewellery" in the Bill. The only paragraph I can find, having reference to the matter, is that in the schedule to part IV, which says:

> Articles commonly or commercially known as jewellery, whether real or imitation, for personal use or for adornment of the person.

Will that include medals given as rewards in schools, convents, colleges and universities? Many of these medals are manufactured in Montreal, and I have received some inquiries as to what would be included under the word "jewellery." Will religious medals be included? The paragraph reads in such a way that these medals might be classed as "jewellery," because it says that the tax shall apply when these articles are acquired for personal use or for adornment of the person. Some of these medals are worn because they have been bestowed as a reward or a distinction.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think I may safely say that a medal will hardly come within the definition of the word "jewellery."

Mr. PEDLOW: The Acting Minister of Finance did not deal with the suggestion to include motor cycles in the articles subject to taxation. I do not see why they should not be. A motor cycle is as much a pleasure car as any other car, and it should bear taxation as well as the cheaper motor cars.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, it was not intended to include them.

Mr. PEDLOW: I think they are a great nuisance, and if they were taxed out of existence it would not be a bad idea.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not wish to importune the minister, but it was a serious argument I advanced which he has not replied to, namely, that when he puts the duty as high as 52½ per cent he will in a large measure reduce the revenue to be derived from that source. It may possibly be that that is the object—to stop imports from the United States.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That was one of the objects.

Mr. McMASTER: If that is so, well and good, but it will not help the revenue.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: The minister has not given answer to my question as to whether medals are included within the term "jewellery."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I could not speak definitely about that matter, because the department administering the Act will have to frame regulations as to what will come within the definition of jewellery from time to time. I am only giving my opinion, which is that medals would not be classified as jewellery. I think the Department of Customs would take the definition of medals that is found in the Customs Act, and exclude them from the tax:

> Medals, of gold, silver, or copper and other metallic articles, actually bestowed as trophies or prizes and received and accepted as honorary distinctions, and cups or other metallic prizes won in bona fide competition.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Will this tax apply to watches, including wrist watches?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I think the clause should be amended so that it would be demonstrated beyond all doubt that it does not apply to medals.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think it is an important matter anyway, because the amount taxable would be very small. I think my hon. friend can afford to let the matter drop.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 3—Tax on tea.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: This subsection is indefinite. It refers, as far as I can understand it, to tea that was in warehouses on April 30, and does not cover tea that was purchased after that date.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This is the excise tax. The other is in the Customs Act.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Could not the minister get along without this tax on tea? It is very unpopular. Tea is a beverage of the poor man and the poor woman, in fact of everybody. The fact of whisky being prohibited makes it all the harder—

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I should think that would make it easier to pay the tea tax.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: —harder that this heavy tax should be imposed on the only beverage that is left for the people. I think the minister ought to be able to carry on without this tax on tea. It is one of the taxes that we have not levied in the past, and it appears to me that he ought to give the matter some further consideration. My view would be that this tax should be struck out.

Mr. PEDLOW: I quite agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. J. H. Sinclair) in regard to the tax on tea. I think if the minister were to transfer the tax from tea to gasolene he would obtain as much revenue, or more, and would please a lot of people. To change this tax from tea to gasolene might displease some persons, but I am sure the pleasure that the tea-drinkers would derive would more than overcome any displeasure that such a change might cause.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: A tax upon anything is unpopular. But, unfortunately, we must have a revenue, and it must be imposed upon things that enter into consumption. The consumption of tea per capita in Canada is about four and a quarter pounds per year, so that after all the tax will not be a very onerous one. I would be very pleased indeed if we did not have to impose it, but I think the people of Canada will accept it in good spirit.

Mr. McMASTER: I can quite understand that it is as impossible to tax and be popular as to love and be wise, but when when we are taxing tea let us proceed in accordance with proper principles. I am urging once more—and it is only proper that I should do so—that this excise tax on tea should be ad valorem and not a specific tax. You are taxing at ten cents a pound the thirty-cent tea used by the poor, which means an imposition of 33⅓ per cent, while the tea costing fifty or sixty cents a pound, used by the richer people, is only taxed to the extent of fifteen or twenty per cent. This is not a fair or a right way to impose taxation. In the second place, I see no reason for departing from the principle introduced in 1897 of a British preference. A British preference should be granted to the tea growers of Ceylon and other parts of the world where the British flag flies. I see no reason for departing from that policy, and I would urge upon the minister even at this eleventh hour to change his tax to an ad valorem one, and to preserve the British preference in regard to tea.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think it is absolutely impossible to have an ad valorem tax on tea. In the first place, it would be very difficult to administer such a tax, and in the second place it would yield very little revenue. If you have an ad valorem tax upon tea importations it must be upon the price in the country of production. In India, China, and Ceylon, tea sells at four, five and six cents a pound. It would not be fair to the British exporters of tea to this country. Then I am informed by the officers of the department that almost all the countries of the world regard an ad valorem tax upon tea as being practically impossible. The only countries which have an ad valorem tax are Turkey, China and Egypt. At the present moment the British tax upon tea is a shilling a pound; in France, I think, it is twenty-four cents a pound, and in Italy it is even higher. I think I may safely say that an ad valorem tax on tea would yield very little revenue, and it would practically be impossible of administration. Now, as to a preference to importations from British countries, I repeat what I said a few days ago, that the suggestion is worthy of consideration. At the present moment we are in need of the revenue and we thought it advisable to put this tax in the same category as the tax upon tobaccos and liquors; in regard to which a preference is not given to any of the British countries. However, the matter may receive the consideration of the Government later. I want to point out also that for the present year a preferential rate for the British dominions would not carry any advantage owing to the impossibility of getting shipping to forward tea. The suggestion of my hon. friend, however, is a very fair one, and I quite agree with him that it is worthy of consideration.

Mr. BUREAU: Does not the minister think that the tax should be 20 per cent ad valorem? The man who buys tea for 25 cents or 50 cents a pound would then pay 5 and 10 cents. And if he bought tea for $1 a pound, he would pay 20 cents. The minister has referred to the consumption of tea in France. Tea is not drunk in France, not because it not used, but because coffee is drunk to a greater extent, and the drink of the poor man is not tea, but coffee. So the poor man is not hit as hard by that tax in France as we are here.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Tea is the great article in Great Britain, not coffee, and I think Canada is a tea-consuming country.

Mr. BUREAU: Absolutely. Tea is the poor man's drink in Canada. If we made the tax 20 per cent ad valorem, the tax on fifty-cent tea would be 10 cents and on dollar-tea 20 cents.

Mr. LALOR: Is there any dollar-tea?

Mr. BUREAU: Yes. I think I have paid as much as $1.50 for tea.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is no such thing as importations of tea costing 50 cents. The export prices now from British India are 7.27 cents per pound; Ceylon, 6.56 cents; China, 5.1 cents; Japan 7.10 cents. The export prices are just as I have given, and the 50 cent tea sold in Canada is blended by Canadian tea houses. Of course, blended tea also comes from Great Britain.

Mr. DECHENE: Does the section provide that this tax shall only apply to dealers holding 1,000 pounds of tea at a time? In a great many cases, especially in the big towns, there are many small dealers holding only a few hundred pounds of tea.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They do not pay.

Mr. DECHENE: But they are charging ten cents to the consumer just the same. The consumer is paying at this time of the year in Ottawa 10 cents excise tax which the corner-store dealer pockets. When the departmental inspector goes to the dealer, he will prove that he has not a stock of 1,000 pounds of tea, nevertheless he is charging 10 cents to the consumer just the same. Why is the provision limited to a minimum stock of 1,000 pounds? There is no way of the consumer getting back his money, and the dealer will usually be sharp enough to get the ten cents. If the consumer is paying the tax, the Government should take means to get it, and not allow the dealer to pocket it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think it is correct that in all places the dealer has added already the tax to the price of stocks now on hand. If stocks of tea on hand regardless of quantity had to pay the tax, it would cost more to collect the same than we should receive. It might be possible to have collected the tax upon all stocks on hand in the large cities. But if the Department of Customs and Excise were obliged to send their officers all over Canada, through the country districts collecting ten cents a pound on every pound of tea held by merchants, my hon. friend will readily see that that would be a very expensive operation, the net result of which would be that the treasury would be out of pocket. We had to fix a limit and we thought 1,000 pounds about right.

Mr. DECHENE: I understand that. But in order to collect the tax at all, your collectors will have to visit every store, to find out what amount of tea is on hand.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Now they do, but hereafter the tax will be paid through the customs.

Mr. TOBIN: What amount does the minister expect to get from this tax on tea?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: About $3,200,000.

Mr. DECHENE: As many hon. members have said, a heavy tax is being put on tea. But I think coffee should not be neglected.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Oh, we have not forgotten coffee.

On section sub-paragraph (4)—Tax on moving picture films:

Mr. PEDLOW: I would suggest that a different basis would be, perhaps fairer on taxes of this kind and not decrease the revenue in any way. Instead of a flat rate of 10 cents, or whatever the rate is, a graduated rate on films and moving picture theatre tickets and other theatre tickets might be imposed. For instance, it is hardly fair that expensive tickets costing $1.50 and $2 should only pay a minimum tax of 10 cents each. I think any one who is flush enough to spend $1.50 or $2 on a theatre ticket can well afford to pay 25 or 50 cents in addition. I think that feature should be looked into if it has not been already.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If the war continues very much longer there will be ample time to create further additional taxes, if up to the present time we have overlooked any. Theatre tickets are now taxed by all the provinces. In some places there is a municipal tax as well. I think it is better that we do not enter into conflict with the provinces and municipalities in matters of this kind, at least so long as we can avoid it.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

On the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean the House adjourned at 11.59 p.m.

Friday, May 17, 1918.

The House met at Eleven o'clock.

REPORTS.

Annual Report of the Department of Trade and Commerce.—Sir George Foster.

Report relative to mail subsidies and steamship subventions.—Sir George Foster.

Report of the Honorary Advisory Council for Scientific and Industrial Research. —Sir George Foster.

CANADIAN WAR RECORDS OFFICE.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): I lay on the table of the House the second Annual Report of the Canadian War Records Office for the year 1917. It is a very interesting report, and later it may be proper to move that it be printed at once. I shall be glad to make that motion if the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, after looking over the report, concurs in my view.

OFFICIALS OF THE HOUSE.

APPOINTMENT OF MR. W. H. DICKSON AS OFFICIAL REPORTER.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That the recommendation of His Honour the Speaker, laid upon the table of the House on the 13th instant, respecting the promotion of Mr. W. H. Dickson to the position of Reporter of the Official Debates of the House of Commons, be concurred in.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Has the Civil Service Commission reported on this promotion?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes, and has given its certificate.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF MR. J. P. A. CHEVASSU AS TRANSLATOR.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That the recommendation of His Honour the Speaker, laid upon the table of the House on the 11th instant, respecting the appointment of Mr. J. P. A. Chevassu to Hansard Division of the Translation Staff of the House of Commons, be concurred in.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Has this also been before the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes, the certificate of the Civil Service Commission has been issued. The appointee is a returned soldier.

Motion agreed to.

SENATE BILLS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill No. 102, for the relief of Emily Kathleen Cochrane Lackey.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 103, for the relief of Alfred Frank Scott.—Mr. Harold.

Bill No. 104, for the relief of Alonzo Jesse Chapman.—Mr. Copp.

Bill No. 105, for the relief of Margaret Bell Charlesworth.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 106, to amend The Companies Act in various particulars.—The Secretary of State.

FLOUR MILLING COMPANIES PROFITS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères): I am informed that before his resignation, Mr. W. F. O'Connor, of the Cost of Living Branch of the Labour Department, made a report on the profits of the flour companies of the Dominion of Canada. I understand that that report was submitted about a month ago. Is it the intention of the Government to bring down that report, and if so, when? It is important that it be brought down before the end of the session.

Hon. Mr. CROTHERS: Mr. O'Connor has made no report concerning the milling industry of this country. Another officer of the department has collected a large quantity of information and has a report now in course of preparation, but Mr. O'Connor has nothing whatever to do with that report.

EXPORTATION OF BRAN.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. F. KAY (Missisquoi): May I ask the Minister of Customs when I may expect a return to an Order of the House dealing with the exportation of bran into the United States?

Hon. Mr. SIFTON: That matter is not under the Department of Customs. It is under the control of the Department of Agriculture through the Canada Food Board.

Mr. KAY: Perhaps the Minister of Agriculture will give me the information.

Mr. ROBB: As I understand it, the hon. member for Missisquoi desires information as to the quantity exported.

Mr. KAY: I put a question on the Order Paper and my question was changed to an Order for a return.

Hon. Mr. CRERAR: I shall look into the matter and get the information the hon. member desires.

THE MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT: I wish to draw the attention of the House to this item in this morning's Citizen:

Plan to deal with hardships resulting from military call.

The Government has under consideration steps to deal with cases of extreme hardship which would result from the abolition of exemptions, without any exception between the ages of 20 and 22. It is probable that in each military district some one will be delegated authority to deal with such cases and grant leave of absence from service.

I simply want to know if there is any truth in this report.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The statement to which my hon. friend alludes has not been made on behalf of the Government.

PAYMENTS MADE TO NEWSPAPERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): If the Secretary of State were in his seat, I would ask him when we may expect returns to Orders passed several weeks ago regarding payments made to certain newspapers in Toronto and Ottawa.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: In connection with the Victory Loan?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: That was laid on the table of the House some days ago.

Mr. MURPHY: Not only payments in connection with the Victory Loan, but payments generally over a stated period of time.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I really could not give my hon. friend any information about the matter, but I shall draw the attention of the Secretary of State to the inquiry. If my hon. friend will be good enough to send me a memorandum, so that I shall not forget the matter, I shall be much obliged.

Mr. MURPHY: All right.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

BILL TO AMEND THE CIVIL SERVICE ACT AND TO BRING THE OUTSIDE SERVICE UNDER ITS PROVISIONS.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Acting Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 53, respecting the Civil Service of Canada.

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers and St. Maurice): I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe):

That the said Bill be not now read the third time, but be referred back to the Committee of the Whole, with power to amend same by substituting the following for section 30.

30. Subject to the provisions of section three of this Act, power to remove or dismiss any deputy head, officer, clerk or employee, shall vest in the Commission.

Before exercising such power, the Commission shall require a statement in writing, from the minister in the case of a deputy head, and from the deputy head in all other cases, giving the causes, reasons and facts invoked for such dismissal.

Upon receipt of such statement in writing the Commission shall forthwith communicate a copy of same to the deputy head or other employee whose dismissal is sought.

The deputy head or employee shall within ten days after the receipt of copy of said statement file with the Commission a statement in writing in answer to such charges in default of which the Commission may proceed on the statement submitted asking for dismissal.

I do not want to make any further remarks on this amendment except this: When the Bill was before the House, it provided that the power of dismissal should be vested in the Governor in Council, but no power of appointment was provided in the Bill. The only section that had any reference as to how employees should come into the service was the one providing that, on the request of a deputy head, the commission should, as it saw fit, in its best judgment, supply the proper person. We had the Bill amended to vest the power of appointment in the commission by substituting the word "appoint" for the word "supply." Consequently the amendment which I have just moved should be passed so as to make section 30 conform with the rest of the Bill. When I moved that amendment the first time I explained my reasons for it. I then stated that it was only fair that the body which had the power of appointment should also have the power of dismissal, and I wanted this amendment to carry for another reason. My contention is that even if the power of dismissal rests in the Governor in Council, any one whose dismissal is asked for should have an opportunity of stating his case and submitting his answer to the power which is to dismiss him. My amendment is, I think, just and fair, and the Civil Service employee is entitled to a certain amount of protection by being allowed, whenever charges are made against him or whenever his dismissal is asked, at least to submit his case. It was argued in answer that this might involve a good deal of work on the part of the commission. Certainly we cannot expect that there will be a trial each time a dismissal is requested, but the least this House should do is to give the employee, who is charged with any offence or whose dismissal is requested, the privilege of putting his reason in writing and having them made part of the record of his dismissal.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: The amendment proposed by my hon. friend was very thoroughly discussed when the Bill was being considered in committee, and there is nothing that I can add to what I said at that time. The intent of the Civil Service Act is to provide a different method so far as the appointment of civil servants is concerned. It was not intended that we should change the existing method of dismissing officials.

Mr. BUREAU: The purport of the Bill was to abolish patronage.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Patronage in the matter of appointing officials.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Not in the matter of dismissals?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My hon. friend contends that the Civil Service Commission have the power of dismissing even deputy ministers and deputy heads, and I submit that is not a fair proposition and should not receive the support of the House.

Mr. BUREAU: On the recommendation of the minister?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: On the recommendation of anybody. I wish to repeat what I have already said on more than one occasion in this House, namely, that civil servants are employees of the Crown. They are paid by the Crown, and the power of dismissal should rest in the Crown and in no other body, the Crown being responsible to Parliament.

The House divided on the proposed amendment of Mr. Bureau which was negatived on the following division.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): Mr. Speaker, before the motion for the third reading of this Bill is carried, I desire to repeat what I said in committee that this Bill, instead of abolishing patronage, affords a greater incentive to the exercise of patronage than has existed in this country since 1908. I will prove that by a very brief reference to the old statute and to the Bill in its present form. The Act of 1908, section 42, provided that:

> No person shall, directly or indirectly, solicit or endeavour to influence any minister of the Crown or the head of any department with respect to the appointment of any person to the service, or with respect to the promotion or transfer of or an increase of salary to, any officer, clerk, or employee in the public service.
> (2) Any person who, directly or indirectly, solicits or endeavours to influence any minister of the Crown or the head of any department in favour of his appointment or promotion or to increase his salary, shall be deemed to be unworthy of such appointment, promotion or increase, and it shall not be accorded him; and if he is employed in the public service he shall be liable to immediate dismissal.

When the Bill, whose third reading has now been moved, was drafted, the efficacy of that section was recognized because it was repeated in the Bill as section 9 and a third subsection was added in these terms:

Any person shall have the right to submit to the Commission a representation in writing with respect to the appointment of any person to the public service or with respect to the promotion, transfer of or an increase of salary to any officer, clerk or employee in the public service.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Suppose an officer of a department wanted to be promoted and placed a statement before the commission. would he contravene the Act?

Mr. MURPHY: Not under this. The question the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) asks reminds me that when this matter was under discussion a few days ago the right hon. the Prime Minister pointed out that the remedy of the official would be the very one suggested by my hon. friend.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Perfectly proper.

Mr. MURPHY: Perfectly proper, as my hon. friend says, and yet this section, as it has existed since 1908 with this new subsection, was stricken out of this Act at the demand of an hon. gentleman supporting the Government and representing one of the Toronto seats. So that, this Act, not only does not preserve the safeguard against patronage that the old Act contained but it throws the door wide open to the exercise of patronage. I am of opinion, Mr. Speaker, that had the right hon. the Prime Minister been in the House at the time the demand came from the Government side of the House for the elimination of that section, my right hon. friend would never have acceded to it. However, that demand has been acceded to and the new Act shorn of that protection coupled with the fact that 15,000 or 20,000 employees of the Outside Service are still left outside of the operation of the Act, and coupled with the dual complexion of the support of this Government, convinces me that this Act not only does not abolish patronage, but that patronage under it will be more rampant than ever. From what I have heard, I am certain that a well known medical principle will be applied in the operation of this Act. It is that when a person takes poison an antidote is administered. I am satisfied that the principle that will be applied in the operation of this Act in future will be that when a Grit gets an appointment a Tory will have to get another to wipe out the effect of the first.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has not the opportunity of replying unless he desires to ask the consent of the House. Having moved a motion, an hon. member exhausts his right to speak again.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, when the Bill was in committee I called attention to clause 38, which reads:

Nothing in this Act shall be held to curtail the privileges now enjoyed by the officers, clerks and employees of the Senate, House of Commons or Library of Parliament with respect to rank and precedence or to attendance, office hours, or leave of absence, or with respect to engaging in such employment during parliamentary recess as may entitle them to receive extra salary or remuneration.

I was told that that clause was in the old Act, and I understand it was continued in the amended Act. I made the suggestion that inasmuch as a great many of these employees were only employed during the session, their offices, or their services, might be availed of by the country during the recess, and, perhaps, a large saving to the country effected thereby. I was informed by the hon. Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean), in whose hands the Bill is, that a report was being prepared by yourself, Mr. Speaker, on this question and upon receiving that explanation I did not press for any revision of this clause. I also took the opportunity of calling upon you and you were good enough to show me a report which you had prepared, a report which I thought was of very great importance, and, if adopted by this House, would result in a large saving to the country. I think the Acting Minister of Finance was not aware that that report was ready. However, at this stage of the proceedings I would not suggest that the Bill be recommitted and that we take any action, but in view of my information from having had the privilege of reading that report, I would have liked that we should have heard from Mr. Speaker on the whole question, because he, more than any other member of this House, is competent to inform the House as to the real situation and to make recommendations.

I would suggest that the report of Mr. Speaker, which will contain suggestions with respect to economies that can be effected, and how money may be saved to the country by availing ourselves of the services of many of the officers of the House during recess, together with such recommendations as may commend themselves to the good judgment of His Honour, be printed and distributed during recess. Then, perhaps, we would be in a position to amend this particular clause of the Act in such manner as would result in a material saving of the public revenue.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Has the Internal Economy Commission of the House made any report to Parliament this year?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Speaker is a member of the Commission of Internal Economy of the House, and in that capacity he has been making the inquiry alluded to by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson). The report has not been brought to my attention yet—in fact, I do not know whether it is completed—but I have understood from His Honour the Speaker that he expects to effect very considerable economies in the affairs of the House by the new dispositions which he will propose.

So far as the observations of my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy) are concerned, I cannot concur in the view which he has taken. It seems to me a singularly exaggerated view. The subsection which he condemns, as far as I understand his argument, is this:

> Any person shall have the right to submit to the Commission a representation in writing with respect to the appointment of any person to the public service or with respect to the promotion, transfer of or an increase of salary to any officers, clerk or employee in the public service.

The purpose of that section, as I understand, is to give reasonable opportunity to men employed in the public service to make their representations, in an open and proper way, to the Civil Service Commission. It seemed undesirable that they should be absolutely cut off from a representation either to the minister to whose department they belong, or to the Civil Service Commission itself. How this would lead to the increase of patronage in the ordinary sense is entirely beyond my comprehension. The exercise of patronage in the past, as it has been condemned on both sides of the House, is the exercise by ministers of the Crown of the power of appointment, not in the public interest, as it is said, but in a party interest. The Civil Service Commission is an absolutely independent body, which is bound to make appointments to the public service upon competitive examination, or for reasons which are absolutely in the public interest. To suggest, therefore, that the giving of this right to public servants to make their representations in written form and in an open manner to the Civil Service Commission will lead to the continuance, or the increase, of patronage, seems to me to be absolutely beyond the bounds of common sense.

With regard to the Bill as a whole, hon. gentlemen will realize that it necessarily has been prepared under very great stress, and possibly without the opportunity of giving to it the prolonged consideration which ought to be given to a very important Bill of this character. It brings under the control of the Civil Service Commission many thousands of employees throughout the country: I am informed by the Acting Minister of Finance, who has had charge of the Bill, that the number will not fall short of fifty-five thousand. To undertake that the appointments of so large a number of public servants shall be made under the direction of the Civil Service Commission is obviously a very great step in advance, and I should not be at all surprised if it were found necessary at the next session of Parliament to go over this Bill again, to improve it if possible, and to amend it in the light of the experience which will have been gained in its practical operation during the next six or seven months. There is a desire, I believe, on both sides of the House to make the Bill as effective and as workable as possible. We shall endeavour to join our efforts for that purpose at the next session, in so far as it may be found necessary by reason of the experience which will have been gained by the Civil Service Commission in the meantime.

A reference has also been made in the House to the importance of having the commission strengthened in personnel by an increase of members.

Sir SAM HUGHES: And in salary.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: And in salary also, my hon. friend suggests. Well, those are matters which must be taken into consideration in the meantime. Obviously the extension of the scope of the Commission to fifty-five thousand public servants will entail upon the members of the Commission an enormously increased responsibility and very great additional labour. How those labours can best be discharged we shall have to consider between now and the next session, if it turns out in the meantime that the Commission as at present constituted is not able to give to all these matters the direct personal attention which will obviously be necessary. In the past when discussing the question of Civil Service reform, and how it would be possible to deal with fifty or sixty thousand additional public servants by means of the Civil Service Commission, the suggestion has been made to me that possibly local boards might have to be established in each province in Canada for the purpose of reporting directly to a central board here. That would be one method. Another method, which has been suggested to the House, is the increase of the personnel of the Board by one or two members. However, the subject will be open at the next session of Parliament.

I need only add this further observation : Reference has been made to the desirability of having returned soldiers represented on the Commission. If it becomes necessary to increase the personnel of the Commission, I think hon. members may rest assured that the claims of returned soldiers will not be overlooked or forgotten. It is quite proper that they should be considered, and furthermore, that action should be taken upon that consideration. But I know the spirit of the returned men too well to believe that they would desire the personnel of the Civil Service increased unless it were in the public interest to do so. It may, and very probably it will, become necessary in the public interest to make some increase, and hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this subject along that line may rest assured that this matter —which has been under consideration before it was brought up in the House—together with any suggestions which they have made in that connection, will not be overlooked.

Mr. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): I would like, as a returned soldier, to put myself strongly on record in favour of having a returned soldier on the Civil Service Commission, and my reason for doing so is this: Either we are going to give some preference to the returned soldier when he comes back from the front, or we are not. We say that we intend to give them some preference. Taking that for granted, I think that the body of some four or five hundred thousand men who are serving at the front at the risk of their lives should be represented on the Commission. If they are not to be so represented then we should quit saying that we mean to give returned soldiers a preference.

I wish to say that I am very strongly in favour of a representative of the returned soldiers on that commission. The Ottawa Veterans Association passed, within the last week, what seems to me to be a very reasonable resolution suggesting one representative. I think there is reason in all things, and that I think is a very reasonable request.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend will realize, of course, that a preference has been established by Order in Council, and is confirmed by this Bill.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysboro): To my mind the great defect in this proposal is the fact that the railway employees have not been included, and there is no branch of the service in Eastern Canada that has been used for patronage purposes as have the Government railways. The Government are retaining the right to continue the old system, which is wrong and out-of-date, as every one admits; not only on the Intercolonial but all the Government railways. We were told the other day that the Intercolonial employs some twenty thousand men. And when the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern are taken in, the number of employees will be increased perhaps to hundreds of thousands. It is of the greatest importance that this question should be considered at this stage. I have not heard any good reason given by any member of the Government why the railways should not be included. My hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Maclean) said in a former speech that instructions had been given to the management of the Intercolonial railway to discontinue the patronage system. He was asked to produce the instructions and to lay them on the Table, and he was not able to do so. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) himself, was pressed for a clear statement on that question the other night, and he admitted that he did not send out any instructions, that he had had a conversation with the general superintendent of the Intercolonial, in which he had told him that he had a free hand to abolish patronage if he wished to do so. That is no way to abolish patronage. Something more definite than that must be done. Instructions must be sent out. The system has existed so long that it has permeated the whole of Eastern Canada, and patronage will never be abolished merely by having a conversation with an official of the Intercolonial

The Government must announce to every superintendent and every foreman in the workshops along the line that they are to have a free hand to employ the men required. Why should a boy, who wants to be an engineer or a driver on the road, or to start in as a brakeman and grow up to be a conductor, have to go to a member of Parliament or to a patronage committee before he can be taken on? That is the present system. No young boy can get into the shops unless he is armed with a certificate from a member of Parliament or a patronage committee. That system exists in Nova Scotia, notwithstanding the declaration of the Prime Minister, and it is still as rampant as ever it was. And it is only a pretense to say that there was a conversation with the general superintendent of the road. If such instruction was given, it has never reached the superintendents or the men along the line who are foremen in the shops and who employ the men. If the Government is sincere about this they must do something more than they have done in the past. It is idle to say that we are abolishing patronage throughout Canada if we still continue it on the Government railways.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka): I was very much pleased indeed to hear the Premier's promise that if it is necessary to enlarge the Civil Service Commission a returned soldier will be placed on it. I may say that I would have been better pleased if one had been placed there already. I think it is absolutely necessary, as the hon. member for Fort William has said, that if we are going to do justice to the soldier, we should bring that justice into the realm of practical politics. Personally, it is very disagreeable to me, and to every boy who has served overseas, to have so much notoriety given in this House and in the newspapers to the returned soldiers. When a man in this House wants to draw applause he simply has to refer to something which has been done on the western front by the Canadians. I think we are all more interested in the future of the returned men than we are in the applause of this House; and I would like to see this matter brought into the realm of practical politics, where something can be done in a practical way to place these men in the public service. I do not see any way by which it can so easily and so well be accomplished than by having a representative on the commission. I am not pleading that the returned men should get any preference if they are not capable, for that would be fatal to their best interests. But other things being equal, I think they should have the preference. And if we are going to give them a preference, we should start about it in a practical way.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): I do not wish to repeat the arguments set forth by the hon. member for Russell with regard to the disappearence from the Bill of section 9. But I wish to endorse everything he has said in that connection. I consider that section 9 was by far the most important section of the Bill, so far as doing away with patronage and political influence is concerned. I desire accordingly to move, seconded by the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie):

That this Bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House to restore Section 9 of the Bill as at first submitted to the House.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Mr. Speaker, when we were in committee on this Bill, section 9 was discussed and the opinion of the committee was that it was not advisable to have that section embodied in the Bill. The reasons for coming to that conclusion were advanced at that time, and, to my mind at least, they were sufficient to justify the leaving out of that section. I have listened to the arguments advanced with regard to the amendment which has just been voted down; and I have listened to the statement made by the Prime Minister with regard to what might possibly be done at the next session of Parliament if defects were found in the present Bill, which possibly was drafted rather hurriedly owing to the amount of work that has been before the Government.

Upwards of a year ago instructions were sent out that only those who had seen service at the front should be considered in the matter of appointments to the Civil Service both the Inside and the Outside service, where such men could be had, and I believe that that course was observed by those sending in recommendations to the Government from that time on. I cannot help but feel, in view of the fact that a Committee on Pensions is now sitting in this House, that this matter should have received some attention at the hands of the Government as well as at the hands of the representatives in Parliament. I do think that the soldiers would have felt that their interests were being safeguarded and looked after much better had a returned soldier been appointed as one of the members of this commission.

Under the proposal to reinsert this clause in the Bill, we are justified in considering the present personnel of the commission. It is not a pleasant thing to do, particularly when one happens to be acquainted with these gentlemen and to have a personal high regard for them. But in the selection of the members of the Civil Service Commission I do not believe that care has been taken to obtain men of outstanding administrative ability such as is necessary for the exercising of such tremendous power, influence and responsibility as will devolve upon this body. More than 55,000 men in the public service will be placed directly under the control of this commission. I submit that among returned soldiers men could have been found possessing the qualifications which I have mentioned; yet, for some reason, no returned soldier has been selected to fill one of these positions. The greatest problem of this country to-day is how to look after the men who are returning from the front. This problem will be before us for years, and I do not think that next session is the proper time to consider the matter, nor do I think that a commission of three is sufficient to look after it at this time. It has been intimated that local boards may have to be established throughout the country in order to facilitate the work of the commission. Under the clause which is proposed to be reinserted it would almost appear necessary that the members of this commission should be arrayed in uniform, or to have some distinguishing mark to indicate that they are the Civil Service Commission, and that it is not advisable for any representative of the people to go within speaking distance of them; otherwise it may be implied that somebody's interest is to be advanced or jeopardized. These men have ordinary human instincts; they have their social connections, and if a provision of this kind is inserted in the Bill many deserving applicants will be placed at a disadvantage and the cases of others will be advanced because of their social connection with the members of this commission. The representatives of the people should not be deprived of all responsibility in matters of this kind. Judging from my experience in the county from which I come, I do not believe that abuses have arisen in connection with appointments. When the subject was being discussed on the hustings members of the present Government referred more particularly to the expenditure of money involved under the patronage system than to the advisability of having all appointments made by the Civil Service Commission. In one of the first meetings held in Winnipeg the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. T. A. Crerar) said, as reported in the Manitoba Free Press, that he had already been approached by some one who wanted to dispose of a patent for certain purposes and by some one from Ontario who wished him to use his influence respecting an appointment to the Upper House. These were the things uppermost in his mind, apparently, when he was referring to patronage. Yet under no measure that has been introduced are the Government being freed from this patronage so condemned by them at that time. Under this provision the representatives of the people will not dare place before the Civil Service Commission their views respecting the qualifications of any candidate or applicant for a position in the Civil Service. I do not think it is possible to make a more severe reflection on the representatives of the people than is embodied in the clause which it is now proposed to reinsert in the Bill. I do not believe that it was in the public interest to introduce a Bill of this kind. You are creating a class corporation in this country. You are erecting a wall of protection around them. You are placing the most absolute power in the hands of this commission, and, under this clause, you seek to deprive the representatives of the people of the right to go near this body, upon whom you have conferred such vast powers, for an applicant to advance his or her claims for consideration. I do not think it is in the public interest that this clause should be reinserted in the Bill.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): With some of the features of this Bill I do not agree, but a body of opinion throughout the country is in favour of some such measure as this. Never having had great reverence for the doctrine of infallibility, however, I shall allow my judgment to give way to what I believe to be the judgment of the vast majority of the people and of most of the members of this House. No great harm can be done in the next six or eight months by allowing this Bill to go through now. I am satisfied that next session it will come up for reconsideration and, with our larger experience, we shall probably be able to improve it.

But I rise principally to endorse the remarks made by the members for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion), and Muskoka (Mr. Peter McGibbon), who supported the suggestion that a returned soldier should be appointed to the Civil Service Commission. I think that should be done now. We have to consider the cost of all these things; it is right that we should be economical. But I will tell the Government where they can get the money to pay the salary of this returned soldier for at least a year as a member of this commission. They have only to make a certain gentleman whose name I dare not mention here refund $5,000 that he looted from the Treasury and that he did not earn. That will pay the salary of this returned soldier on the board for one year, and next year we may consider where we can get the salary for the future.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queens): Mr. Speaker, if the amendment were that no person should approach the Civil Service Commission in the way indicated, I should be rather inclined to vote for the re-insertion of the clause, but the clause, as it appeared in the original Bill, was that no person should approach a minister of the Crown. I must say that, on careful consideration, that looks like an interference with responsible Government. Almost anybody should have the right in a respectful way to approach any minister of the Crown on any matter of public business. If, however, it were deemed necessary to move an amendment to insert a section that no person should approach the Civil Service Commission in that way, I am inclined to think I would support it, because the Civil Service Commission is supposed to be a judicial commission, and we would not, for one moment, tolerate the idea of any person approaching the judges of the land in order to exercise undue influence. But as respects the right to approach a minister of the Crown and discuss any matter with him and even to ask or advise him respecting appointments to any public office, I should not like to interfere with that right or privilege, although apparently that has been done in the past. I know that section has not been respected in the past, and I do not think it would be respected in the future.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I wish to endorse the view of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) as regards approaching ministers of the Crown. I take this ground regarding lobbying in this House in respect to appointments to positions, that it is the privilege of any citizen in the Dominion of Canada to approach any minister of the Crown, member of Parliament or member of the Civil Service Commission and to tell him about his qualification for such position; but it is the privilege of the minister of the Crown, member of Parliament, or commissioner to exercise his own judgment, show his back-bone and show that there is some manhood in him. Why should any person be suppressed? Why should he be chloroformed? Why should he be prevented from looking at a minister except through smoked glasses or at a Civil Service commissioner except through glasses equally opaque. Why should a minister of the Crown, member of Parliament or commissioner not have the back-bone to say: Here are the facts; I regard you as a proper person for the position, and I do not so regard the other party. Many of us can remember certain pre-election promises. If we get in, such and such a person will get the position; and then if the wheel of fortune turns, we find that the same promise has been made to ten other people. We want backbone on the part of ministers and other high officials. Then, let any person approach them in any manner, and the result will be all right. So far as the judges of the land are concerned, there are all sorts of stories in regard to people consulting judges in advance, but the judges, to their eternal credit, do not yield to such importuning, but rather count it against those who exercise undue influence.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) is quite within his right, but nevertheless I am sorry he is going to divide the House upon this matter. Personally I would have preferred that this section had been left in the Bill. I withdrew it because that seemed to be the unanimous opinion of the House at the time. I do not recollect any single person suggesting that the section should remain in the Bill. I think sometime afterwards the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) expressed his regrets that the section was dropped.

Mr. MURPHY: I objected at the time.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Had I not been left with the impression that it was the unanimous view of the House that any person should have the right of approaching ministers of the Crown, I should not have dropped the section, and I regret the hon. member for Kamouraska is going to inconvenience the House by dividing it on this matter.

Mr. MURPHY: I made my view at the time as plain as words could make it.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I am sorry I was not in the House at the time.

Mr. THOMAS HAY (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to say that I am not in full sympathy with this Bill, although I do not purpose voting against it. I believe it will do no harm to try it out for at least six or eight months, and then, if necessary, it may be amended. But I feel that the Bill, as it at present exists, will not greatly improve conditions in this country.

Mr. JOSEPH READ (Prince, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, I want to give expression to my unqualified support of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr Fielding). If there is anything this House ought to do, it is to make the Civil Service Commission absolutely independent of every outside influence, to surround it with all the safeguards vouchsafed to the judiciary of this country. It should not be permitted to be approached by any other than, at any rate, the ministers. I hope, therefore, my hon. friend (Mr. E. Lapointe) will amend his motion so as to make it conform with the suggestion of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens.

The salaries of the commissioners are not high enough. Instead of having $5,000 a year, they should have $7,000. You cannot expect judicial service unless you pay a man a proper salary. The commissioners should receive the salary of a Supreme Court judge, and they should have all the sanctity that can be given to a commission that is absolutely judicial in its capacity.

Mr. SPEAKER: When the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. E Lapointe) rose, I was under the impression that he was entitled to speak upon the main motion, and after consultation with the authorities, I find I was correct in that assumption. But, having seconded the first amendment moved, he is not competent to move this amendment. I, therefore, after a consultation, propose Mr. Parent as mover of the motion, to be seconded by Mr. McKenzie.

The House divided on the proposed amendment of Mr. Parent, which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (North Simcoe): I desire to submit an amendment, and as I do not want to prolong the session I should like a division on it as soon as possible, but, of course, if other hon. gentlemen wish to speak to it, that is their privilege. The great majority of the members of this House owe their seats to the soldiers, and more particularly to the ladies. I have urged on the Government the advisability of giving representation on the commission to the ladies, and particularly to returned soldiers, but they have steadily declined, and I therefore propose to move, if I can find a seconder in the House—

Mr. PEDLOW: I will second the motion.

Mr. CURRIE: I beg to move:

That the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to Committee of the Whole House with instructions to amend the Bill so as to give representation on the Board to returned soldiers and ladies.

Mr. PEDLOW: I have much pleasure in seconding that motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: May I ask my hon. friend if he intends that these representatives on the board shall serve without salary?

Mr. CURRIE: Why, certainly.

Mr. SPEAKER: I was just going to point out that if they were to be paid, the amendment would not be in order, but inasmuch as it may follow that they may serve without salary, I will give the hon. member the benefit of the doubt.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I submit that as the Bill provides that the members of the commission shall be paid a salary of $5,000, the amendment is clearly out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the point of order is well taken, inasmuch as if the commissioners were appointed an increase in expenditure would be involved, and it is not competent for an hon. member to move a motion which involves an increased grant.

Mr. CURRIE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member wish to speak to a point of order?

Mr. CURRIE: I made a similar proposal to that contained in my motion when the Bill was under discussion, and I stated distinctly then that I knew the rules of the House precluded me from making a motion that would involve an increase in salary. I now desire to amend my motion so that it will read that these representatives shall serve without pay and let the Government provide for them. May I be permitted to do that. I should like this motion to be voted on, and for that purpose I will insert the words "without pay," so that the motion will be in order. We will see whether the returned soldiers have friends here or not.

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not think it is competent for the hon. member to make any such motion, because the Bill provides that members of the commission shall receive a salary of $5,000, and it would serve no purpose for the hon. member to have his motion put, leaving it to the Government to fix a salary, because the salary is already fixed by the Act, and there is no way of getting around it. Each of the commissioners must receive a salary. Therefore, I claim my hon. friend's motion is entirely out of order.

Mr. CURRIE: May I not be permitted to amend the motion to the effect that notwithstanding anything heretofore contained in the Act, these representatives may occupy positions on the commission?

Mr. SPEAKER: It is competent for the House of Commons, which passes an Act, to amend it in any form it desires, but at the moment I am charged with the duty of deciding whether the motion in my hands is in conformity with the rules of the House, and I feel disposed to rule that the point of order raised by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) is well taken.

Mr. CURRIE: May I be permitted to amend the motion?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is permitted to submit an amendment, but I doubt very much if he can get around the difficulty.

Mr. CURRIE: It is quite competent for members of this House to move to strike out salaries, but not to insert them, and I think it is quite competent for me to submit an amendment that does not involve an increased grant.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I appreciate, as everybody does, the motive of my hon. friend, but surely he does not suggest that a soldier, and particularly a lady, would undertake such onerous duties as are imposed by this Bill, without salary. I think his remedy is first to convince the members of the Government, who may then bring in a motion to the effect that he desires.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Springfield): Section 3 of part 1 of the Bill says:

> The chairman shall be paid a salary of six thousand dollars, and each of the other commissioners five thousand dollars.

So it is very clear that if we appointed other commissioners they must receive salary.

Mr. CURRIE: That section limits the commission to three members.

Mr. RICHARDSON: No, it says: "each of the other commissioners."

Mr. SPEAKER: I am of opinion that the point of order raised by the hon. member for Halifax is well taken, and that the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Simcoe is not in order, and I so rule. The question is now on the main motion.

Mr. COPP: I desire to endorse the remarks of my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) with reference to withdrawing the employees of the Intercolonial and other Government railways from the operation of this Bill.

At one o'clock the House rose.

The House resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. COPP: When we separated at one o'clock I had just risen to express my very great regret that the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean), who is piloting this Bill through the House, was unable to persuade his colleagues to bring the employees of the Government railway system under the operation of the Civil Service Act the same as those of other departments. I am sure that any one who has any knowledge or experience of the great evil of patronage that seems to be in the mind of every hon. member of this House, must realize that if there is one department more than another in which it is present, in the greatest possible degree, it is that of the Government railway system. If, in order to abolish patronage the Civil Service Commission is to take practically complete control of the appointment and promotion of civil servants, I cannot understand why the employees of the Government railway system should not also come under the direction of the commission. The hon. the Acting Minister of Finance, during the past two or three years, took very strong ground against the evils of patronage and demanded that they should be abolished. The hon. gentleman's own constituency, and the Maritime Provinces generally, must be more affected by the Intercolonial than other parts of the Dominion and therefore, my hon. friend being a representative of that part of the country, has complete knowledge of the great disadvantages arising from the existence of the patronage system as applied to the Intercolonial.

Personally, I have very little confidence that the Bill will have any great effect in doing away with the patronage evil. But it will be of some use to the ministers because they will be able to employ it as a sort of buffer between themselves and the applicants when they desire to do so and they will use the Civil Service Commission as an excuse when they do not themselves wish to deal with any particular application. When asked to make an appointment or a promotion they will be able to say: "We have nothing whatever to do with this; the Civil Service Commission has charge of it." The hon. the Minister of Railway and Canals (Mr. J. D. Reid) says that in spite of the fact that Government railway employees are not to be brought under the Civil Service Commission, he has given instructions to the general manager that patronage must be abolished and that no influence may be used by any candidates, friends of the Government or otherwise to impress upon the general manager the advantage of appointing this, that or the other man. The general manager is given authority to appoint men to positions without regard to political influence or to pressure from any person whatsoever. I naturally accept that statement of the Minister of Railways but it places the general manager of the Government railway system in a very peculiar position. Personally, I have not a great deal of acquaintance with him, but as far as I know he is a man of splendid ability and I believe he is very anxious to make a success of the railway system. It is hard for one to believe that a man occupying that position would stoop to petty political partisanship and patronage in connection with the operation of the road. Yet, during the past two years, men in the employ of the Intercolonial, who would naturally be entitled to promotion, have been kept in their same positions while men new in the service have been put over their heads. That is not only true in regard to more important positions, but also in regard to the very lowest employees. Even in regard to temporary employees, the patronage curse is being forced upon the people in that portion of Canada. A man who comes with his saw and hammer, and who wants a job to help to erect or repair a small building, is not recognized by the man who has charge of the work unless he is armed with a certificate from the man who has the patronage. As evidence in support of that statement, I want to draw the attention of the Government to a case that happened during the past winter in my own town. The Intercolonial required to erect a small roundhouse, or engine house, and the foreman was particularly anxious to get the work in progress as rapidly as possible. If the work were not proceeded with the engines would be left out in the cold and would suffer damage. The foreman tried to get men to go to work on that building. Finally he got a few men, and amongst them one man in particular who worked for four or five days. Then the foreman told him that unless he got a letter from the chairman of the patronage committee in the town of Sackville he could not continue on that work. How can the Government or the Minister of Railways and Canals expect us to accept the statement as to what they are going to do when we have such facts before us showing that instead of abolishing patronage, or making any attempt to abolish it, patronage is more rampant than ever and it is getting worse every day. In order to prove to this House the extent of the patronage evil in connection with the Intercolonial railway, and as an evidence why the Government railway system should be placed under the operation of this Bill, I will read the following affidavit:

[Mr. Copp.]

Province of New Brunswick, County of Westmoreland, N.S.

I, Bernard Bowser, Builder and Contractor of the town of Sackville in the aforesaid county of Westmoreland, province of New Brunswick, being duly sworn make Oath and Say:—

That having been advised that skilled carpenters were required by the Canadian Government railway in the erection of a Roundhouse building at the railway yards in the town of Sackville aforesaid, I personally applied at the aforesaid premises of the railway for employment on or about the Thirtieth day of January A.D. 1918 and was employed and set to work by D. A. Seaman, foreman in charge of the said work, and continued at the said work for some five days.

That on the fifth day of my employment as aforesaid I was visited by the said Seaman, the foreman of the said work, and the following conversation took place between him and me:—

Seaman (foreman) "Can you get a recommendation?"

Bowser (employee) "It might be according to whom I got."

Seaman (foreman) "It is all right if it passes. Who are you going to get"?

Bowser (employee) "I might get Mr. Copp or Mr. McCord."

Seaman (foreman) "That won't do at all you will have to get some one from the Conservative Committee. Get Mr. Trites, some one that will pass it. It looks as if some of the party have written to Moncton saying you can not work without a recommendation. Can't you get Mr. Trites to give you a recommendation"?

Bowser (employee) "No, I wont ask Trites for any recommendation, the job is not worth more than a day's pay."

Seaman (foreman) "You had better leave your tools and see Mr. Trites, I do not want you to quit."

Bowser (employee) "No, I am not going to see Trites for any job."

Nothing further was said between Mr. Seaman and me on the occasion and I picked up my tools and quit the job and premises.

I am a native of the Parish of Sackville and have been active in my trade as a joiner and housebuilder for many years.

Sworn to at the town of Sackville, in the county of Westmoreland, province of New Brunswick this first day of April, A.D. 1918. Before me, (Signed) Bernard Brown.

(Signed) A. W. Bennett.

A Commissioner for taking affidavits to be read in the Supreme Court of New Brunswick.

My reason for reading the affidavit is to demonstrate to my hon. friends who, I believe, are in earnest in their determination to abolish the patronage evil, what is taking place on the Government system of railways, notwithstanding the fact that we now have a Union Government, and that one of the arguments in favour of the election of such a Government was that through its agency the country would be enabled to put an end to this evil. In the fall of 1917, we had the announcement that patronage was to be done away with, and yet we find that as late as January, 1918, the system was still flourishing on the Government railways, and more particularly on the Intercolonial. In view of these facts, and in view of the realization on the part of hon. gentlemen, not only from the Maritime Provinces, but from the rest of Canada as well, of the extent of the patronage evil, in view of the announcement that we were going to have a thorough housecleaning with respect to patronage, the Acting Minister of Finance will not be doing justice to himself, to the employees of the Intercolonial, or to the members of this House, if he fails to make provision whereby the employees of the Government Railway system shall be placed with respect to this matter in exactly the same category as the civil servants in other departments of the public service.

Mr. O. TURGEON (Gloucester): As a member from the Maritime Provinces, representing an extensive constituency traversed by the Intercolonial, I wish to put myself plainly on record in favour of abolishing patronage in all departments of the Civil Service, and more particularly in the system of Government Railways. On the occasion of four successive elections, with the responsibility of patronage on my shoulders, I went before my constituents and was elected by majorities varying from one thousand to fourteen hundred. Since 1911 my opponents have exerted the full weight of the patronage system on the Intercolonial against me, more particularly under the late administration, but I am glad to say, without result. I mention this to show how the system of patronage has been abused. In 1911, I was elected by acclamation and the change of Government left me entirely without any responsibility in the matter of patronage. I was greatly disappointed when this Bill was introduced to find that it did not apply to the Government Railways as well as to other departments of the Government. As my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Copp) has so well stated, the ramifications of the patronage evil extend down even to working men in the matter of small appointments, and for the last four years it has been well nigh impossible for a workingman to get even a day's employment at repair work on the Intercolonial railway without having to go to the patronage committee of the parish in which he resided, and then only on his promising to observe the principles laid down by the members of that committee. The patronage evil strikes at the right of a citizen residing along the route of the Intercolonial to obtain employment on that railway, and if I may be permitted I will give an illustration of something which happened during the latter part of February or the early part of March, two or three months after the return of the Union Government, which claimed to be animated by a sincere desire to eliminate patronage with all its evils. An employee of the Intercolonial, with a record to his credit of from twenty-two to twenty-three years' service as a station agent and operator of the Intercolonial, had a young son who had acquired a knowledge of telegraphy under his father, and was eager to undergo an examination so that he might obtain some position on the Intercolonial for which his knowledge fitted him. The father wrote to the superintendent of the division stating that the son was prepared to pass an examination as a telegrapher, and expressing the hope that upon passing the examination his son would be given the first vacancy that occurred. In response to that letter there came a reply that the young man would have to get a recommendation from the Unionist member for the county, who was located in Northern New Brunswick. In compliance with the superintendent's request this man wrote to the member for the county, and was notified by him that he was sending his application to the patronage committee of the county. After all that circumlocution the father induced the son to pass the necessary examination, but the fact remains that the young man was regarded as not eligible for examination until he was in possession of the recommendation of the patronage committee of the county. The Minister of Railways has stated that he has given verbal instructions to the superintendent of the Intercolonial to abolish the patronage system, but it will be readily seen, from the illustrations which I have given, that it will require more than verbal instructions of that kind to abolish an evil the roots of which extend so deeply into the system of appointments on the Government railways. I repeat that I was greatly disappointed that this evil has not been dealt with by bringing the Government railways under the operation of the present Bill, and if, as the Government cannot see its way clear to accept an amendment having that object in view, I hope they will deal with the evil in some other way.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY BILL —THIRD READING.

On the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean, Bill No. 87, an Act supplementary to chapter twenty-four of the Statutes of 1917, respecting the Canadian Northern Railway system, was read the third time.

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT ACT, 1918.

On motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean, Bill No. 81, to amend the Customs Tariff 1907, was read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On Section 3—Commencement of Act:

Mr. PEDLOW: Before passing on clause 3, I would like the minister to explain the reason for the different rates on coffee and tea. There are two classifications here. Coffee, green, imported direct, etc., 5 cents preferential, and 7 cents intermediate and general tariff. Then there is coffee, green, n.o.p., 5 cents and 7½ per cent preferential, and 7 cents and 10 per cent intermediate and general.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The clause referred to by the hon. gentleman has already been carried. But with the unanimous consent of the committee we might revert to it. Is it the unanimous consent of the committee that we revert to section 2?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: The reason for the different rates on tea and coffee is that the higher rate applies to indirect importations. The purpose is to control the tea trade and the coffee trade in Canada so far as possible, and to make as much as possible of it direct.

BUSINESS PROFITS WAR TAX ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean, Bill No. 84, to amend the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, was read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 3—Dividends paid considered a reduction of reserves, etc.:

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: Will the minister explain this section?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Under the law as it stood, if a company earned $100,000 in profits during the year and did not distribute them, they could contend that that was part of their capital and that they were entitled to a deduction of 7 per cent upon that. This provides that if the profits are later distributed the amount cannot be counted as part of the capital. It is to prevent a possible increase of capital and resulting exemption.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Tax continued for another twelve months:

Mr. PEDLOW: When are these taxes to be paid?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The main Bill provides that the tax shall be paid each year within one month from the date of the mailing of the notice of assessment.

Mr. PEDLOW: At what time of the year will these notices be mailed?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: At all times of the year. Difficulties are sometimes encountered in determining the assessments of some companies. Departmental officers must determine the capital employed in companies of very large capitalization. Some companies in Canada have a share capital of say $50,000,000, whereas only about $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 of that is employed as capital. In such cases assessments must be made by the department, and this often takes a good deal of time.

Mr. PEDLOW: The intention is that the taxes may be collected at any time during the fiscal year?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. PEDLOW: I wish to direct the minister's attention to a method of payment which is under consideration in the United States. It is suggested that this tax should be collected not in one payment, but in quarterly payments spread over the current fiscal year. A provision of that kind would be quite an advantage not only to the Government in collecting the taxes, but also to the companies and firms assessed particularly those whose business is very large.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: A regulation to that effect was suggested in the United States; but it has been overruled by the Treasury Department; it was decided that the plan was not workable. Their taxes are payable on June 15th of each year.

Mr. PEDLOW: Is there any reason why the Canadian Government should be opposed to it?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I really do not see any necessity for such a provision. While to some firms it may be hardship to pay promptly, still, I think it is wise to provide that the tax shall be paid in one sum.

Mr. PEDLOW: It is more of an inconvenience than a hardship. The withdrawal from large businesses of amounts assessed by way of taxation may in some cases be a serious matter. Quarterly payments would be much more convenient.

Mr. ROBB: In introducing the income tax measure last year the Finance Minister created the impression that the Business Profits War Tax would cease at the end of the period named in the Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think the Finance Minister made a statement to the contrary at the end of the session. At any rate, it is deemed advisable that the tax should be continued this year.

Mr. PEDLOW: I quote the following extract, from a firm doing a large business in my constituency, with regard to the methods of obtaining information as to those who come under the Act:

> With reference to the income tax, it seems to the writer that at the present time the matter of making a return for payment of income tax is, apparently, a voluntary matter. There does not seem to be a sufficiently comprehensive attempt to collect from all that should be liable, and if the matter has not been provided for I would suggest that it be part of the duties of the municipal assessor in each municipality to make out a list of all those in his district whom he has reason to think come under the income tax, and forward this list to the inspector of collector of income tax for the district, who could then follow it up. Unless something of this sort is done it seems certain that many will fail to make a return who should properly do so under the income tax law.
> Further, the income tax should cover all classes, special provision in the way of accounting being made to cover the various lines of business and industry.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN I am obliged to my hon. friend for the suggestion contained in the letter from which he has read. Of course, they are applicable to the Income Tax Act, not to this measure.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean (Acting Minister of Finance), Bill No. 85, to amend the Income War Tax Act, 1917, was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—definitions:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Subsection 1 says:

> Paragraph (e) of section two of The Income War Tax Act, 1917, chapter twenty-eight of the statutes of 1917, is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:—
> (e) "supertax" means the taxes authorized by paragraphs (b) to (m), both inclusive, of section four of this Act;"

Will my hon. friend state what that means so that the public may understand it? It is not clear in the Bill.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In section 4 of the Act as it now stands there are paragraphs from (a) to (g) setting forth the tax and the amounts of income. For instance, by paragraph (b) the tax is 2 per cent on incomes exceeding $6,000 and not exceeding $10,000; paragraph (c) has reference to incomes exceeding $10,000 and not exceeding $20,000, and so on. Paragraph (g), which is the last clause in the old Act, provides a tax on incomes exceeding $100,000. We have divided incomes in excess of $100,000 into several clauses. For instance, on incomes from $100,000 to $200,000 there is a separate tax, and on incomes from $200,000 to $400,000 there is separate tax. That necessitated amending the paragraph.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It would be better to explain in general terms what is the meaning of the word "tax" and what is the meaning of the word "supertax."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The present Bill provides for a normal tax of 4 per cent, which runs right through the whole list of taxable incomes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Commencing where?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Commencing, in the case of unmarried persons, at $1,000 and the case of married persons at $2,000. In addition to that, there is the super-tax. In the present Act it commences at $6,000, and it is 2 per cent on incomes in excess of $6,000 and not exceeding $10,000; 5 per cent on incomes exceeding $10,000 and not exceeding $20,000 and so on. The Bill we are now considering provides for an additional tax to be known as the "surtax". That commences on incomes in excess of $6,000. The amounts of the surtax are to be found in paragraphs (n), (o), (p) and (q).

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend has reduced the amount which by the Act of last year was exempted from taxation.

That exemption was $3,000 in the case of married persons and $1,500 in the case of unmarried persons without dependents. Those amounts are now reduced from $3,000 to $2,000, and from $1,500 to $1,000 respectively. Does not my hon. friend think, if he requires additional revenue that the small incomes should be left just as they are and the higher incomes should be more heavily taxed? My hon. friend is aware that the cost of living is every day becoming a more and more anxious problem for families with average incomes. I do not know that the policy is wise of reducing the amount of exemption on incomes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My right hon. friend will remember that the tax is only 2 per cent upon incomes between $2,000 and $3,000 in the case of married persons, and between $1,000 and $1,500 in the case of unmarried persons. If he were considering this matter from the standpoint of revenue, it is quite clear that on the smaller revenues we would derive the greater revenue. That is true, I think, of all countries in the world. Our rates of taxation on the smaller incomes are less than they are in most countries except the United States.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Last year we agreed that the average family should have a certain portion of its income exempt from taxation, and we placed that exemption at $3,000 in the case of a married person and $1,500 in the case of a single person without dependents. My hon. friend is reducing that exemption, and it seems to me that in these days when the cost of living is becoming increasingly heavy, he is going to get this revenue at the expense of a good deal of comfort on the part of families with average incomes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is absolutely necessary that we have a revenue, and the Government were of the opinion it was desirable to reduce the amounts of exemption.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Why not increase the tax on the larger incomes?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My right hon. friend must not forget that the rate of taxation on the smaller incomes is very light, and that there is also a provision for granting an exemption of $200 for each child under sixteen years of age.

Mr. COWAN: If it is in order at this point, I should like to have a statement from the minister regarding the organization which he is providing for the collection of this tax. The organization which he has already provided in our section of the country is wholly inadequate, the result being that I am satisfied the Government is going to lose thousands upon thousands of dollars this year and is going to create against this tax a sentiment which does not at the present time exist. There should be created from the very beginning an organization which will bring the very best methods to bear on the collection of this tax, and that, I contend is not being done. The gentleman who has been appointed as our collector in my district is one of the most competent men one could get in Canada, and he is doing his best to see that this tax is collected properly. But what are the conditions? I find to-day in his office in Regina from twenty-five to thirty thousand letters remain unanswered. simply because the staff and equipment is not sufficient. I understand the inspector has not been authorized to increase his staff, and his quarters are wholly inadequate for transacting the business that is to be done in that province. The result has been that when the returns come in, a great number of them are incorrectly made out, and the officer of the department, not having the necessary staff and equipment to reply fully, simply sends back the return, and the recipient very often becomes rebellious and says he will not pay the tax at all. I am satisfied that the people of Saskatchewan are quite willing to pay this tax; in fact, they want to pay it, but at the present rate of progress I do not think this tax will be collected in Saskatchewan until next year's tax becomes due. I do not know what conditions are in other provinces, but that is the state of affairs in Saskatchewan. We have the very best man possible at the head of the organization and he will do everything he can, but, without assistance it will be quite impossible for him to give the results we want. I should like to know whether it is correct that the department do not expect to get this system of taxation into complete operation for four or five years. I see no reason for such a long delay as that, although I admit the Act will be difficult to administer, especially in our part of the country where probably more than a third of our population are foreigners, many of whom are liable to this tax. They are farmers, however, and are not banking their money, and some very complete organization will have to be devised to reach them.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am instructed by the officers of the department that the inspector for Saskatchewan has been given all the assistance he has asked for. There has been some trouble in obtaining suitable premises, and I shall be very glad to take into consideration what my hon. friend has said, and ascertain whether additional help is required. The department, of course, proposes to enforce the Act at once. My honourable friend's suggestion that it is going to take four or five years to put the Act into effect is not correct. Probably he has heard some one remark that it will take a long number of years to have the Act working properly, but that has been the experience in all countries. It is stated that it took Great Britain twenty-five years to approximate efficiency in the administration of their Income Tax Act, and the same is said of the United States. Difficulties and confusion will doubtless arise in Canada for the first few years, but I hope that gradually we shall be able to develop an efficient and capable organization for the administration of this Act.

Mr. COWAN: I am not blaming the Finance Department altogether. I have seen the deputy minister several times about the conditions out there, and I wish to repeat that the quarters provided are not at all satisfactory. Last year the same quarters were hired by the Imperial Oil company, and they got out because they could not keep the place heated. They had seven coal oil stoves going all winter to keep the place warm, and the staff naturally fell sick. Now we do not want anything like that.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Why is the unmarried woman on a different footing from the married woman?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is no inequality. The unmarried and the married woman have the same exemption. "Married" includes both male and female. The married woman is exempt up to $2,000 and the unmarried up to $1,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I understand that, but I want to know why an unmarried woman should have to pay a larger tax than a married woman. A married woman has a husband to take care of her, and is in a much better position to pay than the unmarried woman.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: Paragraph (i) of section 1 says:

> "Dependent child" means a child under twenty-one years of age dependent on his parent for support.

In some provinces, in Quebec, for instance, there is a law compelling children to provide for the support of their father or mother or grandfather or grandmother. Would it not therefore be wise to add a definition of the word "dependent" somewhat to this effect: "relatives who are dependent upon the taxpayers for support according to the law of each province."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That matter was considered very thoroughly at the last session of Parliament when the income tax was introduced. It may be possible that the tax may be onerous on unmarried persons who may have to support relatives or other persons, but it is impossible to draft a provision providing for these exceptional cases.

Mr. LALOR: Is the income of a man and his wife regarded as one income or as two separate incomes?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: As two incomes.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—par, relating to payments at source:

Mr. McKENZIE: How are you going to determine whether the child under sixteen years of age is dependent upon the taxpayer for support? Would it not be better to take for granted that every child under sixteen is dependent on his parents for support? Otherwise the onus is thrown on the parent or on some one else to prove that the child is dependent.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There might be cases where children were in receipt of a large income from a trustee or something of that kind.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is one of the difficult cases which the minister says cannot be provided for. If we are going to exempt the taxpayer $200 for each child under sixteen, why not come out and say so flatfootedly? As the Act now stands, the department must obtain proof that the child is dependent on its parents for support.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think it is clear enough. I do not think it would be wise to amend the section along the lines suggested by my hon. friend. There may be other cases than the one I cited a moment ago, but I really do not think there will be any difficulty in administering the Act in that respect.

Mr. PARDEE: Will the minister tell me why, under section 27, judges' incomes are not taxable?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would my hon. friend renew his question when we come to that section?

Mr. McMASTER: I notice that by section 2 there is an exemption of $200 for every child under 16. Might I ask the minister whether he has considered the advisability of raising that age to, say, 18? There are a great number of people of moderate means who are doing their best to have their children finish their high school courses and it is rarely that children of 16 have finished with the high school. I would suggest that it would be advisable to raise the age to 18. The minister would still be protected to the extent that the child must be dependent on the parent. The loss of revenue would not be considerable and it would be a great help to people of moderate means who are endeavouring to give the best possible education to their children.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That matter was considered by the Government. A great deal could be said in favour of the suggestion but all exemptions and rates of taxation are arbitrary as a rule and suggestions are easily made in regard to them. The Government were of the opinion that 16 was the proper age to which to apply the exemption.

On section 3—income tax:

Mr. NICKLE: Will the minister be good enough to give me an explanation, because I have not been able to think of one, why it is that the incomes of husband and wife are treated as one. I think that in the working out of this Act, the country is losing considerable money owing to a married couple being entitled to double exemption. If there is any reason for the law being drafted as it is now, I would like to know what it is, and if the reason does not seem to be one that the House should approve, I would like to know if the minister would consider an amendment to the provision so that the exemption given to married people is only applicable to the income of one and not to the income of both.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is a matter that had the consideration of the Government in the preparation of this Bill and they concluded that it was not advisable to amend the Bill in the direction suggested at this present session of Parliament. The chief reason is that a woman is a separate individual, as is a man, and in a country where we propose giving woman the franchise, just as we do a male person, I think the argument is very strongly in favour of treating their incomes as separate. That is the general principle upon which the Government decided not to treat the incomes as one.

Mr. NICKLE: I do not think the philosophy of the minister's statement will stand criticism. He says the reason the exemption is given is because a woman is a separate entity before the law, as is also a man.

Mr. McMASTER: Might I ask the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) to speak a little slower and a little louder because we want to hear what he is saying on this side of the House?

Mr NICKLE: I say that I do not think the philosophy of the minister's statement will stand criticism. If I understood him correctly, he said that the reason that a separate exemption was given to a married man, and also to a married woman, was that the married woman was an entity before the law as was also the man. I cannot dispute that because to dispute it would lead one into a ridiculous position. We all accept that, but if a married woman is an entity before the law, and also a married man, why should the married woman get a married woman's exemption and the married man also get a married man's exemption when the responsibility for the maintenance of the family is on the married man and is not on the married woman? As the law stands at the present time, if a woman is unmarried, and has therefore no family responsibility, she is entitled to an exemption of $1,000, but if she marries and has an income, I think under the present Act, of $1,450, or of less than $1,500, she is entitled to exemption up to $1,500 and her husband is similarly entitled to exemption. I opposed this principle of the Act when it was introduced last session, emphasizing, as best I could, that I thought in exemption given to married people the exemption should only apply up to the aggregate of the two incomes. In other words, if the combined income amounted to $1,500, exemption would be given under the present Act up to that amount. But if the combined income reached $2,000 then an income tax should be paid on the difference between $1,500 and $2,000. My experience during the past summer has convinced me that the contention I raised in the House last year is sound if the object of the Government is to get money.

Suppose there should be a couple, a man who had an income of say $3,500, and whose wife had an income of something over $2,500. The combined income, we will say, was $6,000, and under the law as it stood last year each was entitled to an exemption of $3,000. That is the woman paid no income tax, and the man only paid income tax on $500. Let us suppose the particular family I mention had no children, the result would be that a married man and woman without children get an exemption of $5,500, whereas these same people if unmarried would only get a small exemption granted to them, under the Act as drawn last year, $1,500 each, and this year, of $1,000 each. I say it is not sound finance and it is bad in principle, if the object is to get money, and I say it for the reason that I believe this income tax has come to stay, and in my judgment if the practice continues of treating as separate the incomes of married men and women, there are going to be a good many incomes in this country divided into two parts to the extent at least of the exemption granted the woman, for the purpose of saving the income tax which she otherwise would have to pay. For instance, let me give an example: Suppose for the sake of my argument, a married man's income was just over $10,000 and suppose that the husband wants to get rid of the surtax, he transfers securities of such a value that it will bring an income to his wife of $1,450, and in that way she is entitled to exemption because being a married woman her income is less than $1,500, and he gets rid of the extra tax because he has $1,500 of the income applied to the wife, and leaves himself under the $10,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. There is a provision in the Act against that.

Mr. NICKLE: There is a provision in the Act against it, a provision in the Act does not amount to very much, because you cannot draw any Act to-day by which a husband cannot give to his wife a certain number of securities as a gift. I admit the principle of the Act says you must not do it, but there is no principle you can put in any Act which is going to prevent a married man, if he wants to do so, transferring certain securities over to his wife. The hon. gentleman says there is a provision in the Act against it. The forms that we had to sign last year certainly had nothing in them requiring one to declare that there had not been a transfer of property for the purpose of escaping the tax. As the practice, and as the law is at present, I submit the whole tendency is to deprive the State of some money that it legitimately should have, and to raise in the minds of the people who have a taxable income, that they should look about in the hope that they may see a way of relieving themselves of some of the taxation. If the minister tells me he will not consider an amendment, nothing would be gained at this late hour of the session, by my moving an amendment, but I would like to urge upon him, as I did unsuccessfully urge upon his predecessor, that he give this matter consideration and impress upon him that I am looking at it from the point of view in a part of the country where incomes are not large, and where people feel that all should bear equitably, the burden that is cast upon them by this war.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It would be very difficult now to amend the Bill so as to cover the points raised by my hon. friend (Mr. Nickle). But I assure him that during the recess the matter shall have consideration by the Government. Personally, I am disposed to agree with the remarks of my hon. friend, and I think that probably at the next session of Parliament an amendment will be proposed to carry that idea into effect.

Mr. NICKLE: I am satisfied to have bent the line, even if I have not broken it, but I hope that next session I shall succeed in breaking through.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): The tax on corporations is embraced within this clause. Suppose the tax is paid by the corporation, does that give an exemption to the man who holds the stock? To make myself clear I will give an example: Suppose John Smith has $5,000 of capital invested in Canadian Pacific stock, and the Canadian Pacific in the first place pays a tax of six per cent. Now, is any allowance made to Smith by reason of the fact that the corporation owning the stock has already paid that tax?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The income in that case is exempt from the normal tax only, which is four per cent.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is not the tax six per cent?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Four per cent is the normal tax upon incomes, as will be found in subsection a of section 4 of the Bill. The income tax upon corporations is six per cent, and when the corporation pays an income tax, the individual is exempt from the normal tax.

Mr. HUME CRONYN (London): Before this clause carries I think we should protest against the method prescribed of increasing the tax upon a corporation and not giving credit to the stockholder, which means the imposition of an extra tax on the latter. There can be really no question on that point. A corporation, under this clause, is called upon to pay six per cent upon its total net income. It distributes part, perhaps the larger part, of that income among its stockholders, some of whom are not liable to income tax. The Government gets six per cent from the corporation, and to that no objection can be raised. But is the stockholder, who is liable for income tax, prepared to have a two per cent tax imposed upon his income in addition to whatever tax he may be subject? The man who holds bonds, mortgages, or other securities, is not subject to this disability; it is one peculiar to the holder of stock, and I cannot see the logical justification for such a measure.

Mr. PARENT: Has the Acting Minister of Finance taken any measures so as to protect Americans residing in this country from paying a double tax? I understand that at the present time there are a good many American citizens living temporarily in Canada who are earning wages and paying taxes in this country, and at the same time paying taxes in the United States; so that they are paying a double income tax. Has the Acting Minister of Finance had any communication with the United States Government so as to prevent the imposition of double taxes upon such persons?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That matter was a subject of negotiation between the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) and the officers of the Treasury Board at Washington a few days ago. The Minister of Finance advises me that he anticipates reaching some arrangement with the United States whereby persons might be relieved of the double income tax. And he also had a conference with the same officials in respect of the business profits tax, as there are instances where companies pay the business profits tax in Canada and in the United States as well. There is no provision in the Bill in respect of the matter, and it can only be overcome by arrangements reached by negotiations between the two countries. The matter of the double income tax received consideration at the last Imperial conference, and I understand it was decided to let the matter stand in abeyance until after the conclusion of the war. There is no doubt in the world that it is a great hardship, and should be eliminated in some way or other.

[Mr. Cronyn.]

Mr. CROWE: If I remember aright, the Acting Finance Minister in his Budget told us that the Government received practically $385,000 from the insurance companies. I received the insurance blue book the other day, and looking over the statements of the insurance companies, I figured out that they were doing business to the extent of $110,000,000 annually in Canada, and paid out in losses $43,000,000, leaving about $67,000,000 for expenses of operation. Of this the Government received only $385,000. It seems to me that is a very small amount.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The insurance companies pay one per cent upon their net premiums.

Mr. CROWE: The net premiums for fire, life and other insurance amount, I figure, to $110,000,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Life insurance is not included.

Mr. CROWE: Why should it not be included as well as fire and other insurance?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I imagine it was deemed to be an unjust and unnecessary tax, and perhaps would do an injustice to people who were insured. The amount of the tax would probably have been added to the premium.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: On the point raised by the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn), the minister has not yet given a satisfactory explanation. In the income tax of last year, where corporations were taxed at the rate of 4 per cent on all their profits and the balance distributed to shareholders, this 4 per cent was carried forward to the credit of the individual shareholder upon the dividend he had received. The present Bill raises the rate from four to six per cent. But on the two per cent additional the principle introduced into the Bill last year for some unexplained reason is now dropped. If it was good business and fair, even-handed justice to carry forward to the credit of the shareholder of the corporation or company the 4 per cent the argument is absolutely unanswerable, in my judgment, that now that 6 per cent is levied that 6 per cent should be carried forward to the credit of the shareholder, and he should not be subject to this extra 2 per cent, which does not fall on any other class of the community only on corporations and joint stock companies. As the member for London said, if a man's income is invested in bonds, mortgages, or real estate, or anything of that kind, it escapes. But, under this provision, as I understand it—I may be wrong, but I have not heard anything to the contrary—while the tax is raised from 4 to 6 per cent, the shareholder in these corporations is only credited with 4 per cent instead of 6 per cent, which his stock has already paid before the dividends were distributed. I should like to ask the minister to justify that position if he can, so that I may be clear why the principle involved in the taxation of last year is being deviated from.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The point made by the hon. member for London is very substantial, indeed, and I am much impressed with it. I think probably at some future session of this Parliament some consideration will have to be given to that point. The necessities for revenue will justify the difference between the income tax—

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It does not justify the inequality.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: All taxation measures contain inequalities.

Mr. MORPHY: I would like the acting minister to consider the phraseology of section 3, subsection (1), which reads:

> There shall be assessed, levied and paid, upon the income during the preceding year of every person residing or ordinarily resident in Canada or carrying on any business in Canada, and upon the income received by any person from any source within Canada, the following taxes:

I put to the minister the case of a gentleman having an income of $10,000 arising in Scotland and who is living in Canada. I would assume that that income is not taxed a second time. It is taxed 25 per cent, I think, in England. I notice that the minister said a moment ago—but do not know that I clearly grasped his meaning—that at the Imperial Conference it was decided to prevent double taxation.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Efforts are being made to evolve some scheme to avoid double income tax, but no scheme or plan has yet been worked out. The purpose of the words "from any source" in the Bill is to make it possible for us to tax persons who earn an income within Canada, but who live outside of Canada. We want to put ourselves in the same position as the United States in this respect.

Mr. MORPHY: If that is the intention, the Bill seems to be unfortunately worded. The section as it reads provides that the income must be obtained from any source within Canada. If it is obtained from a source in Scotland, it is not taxable?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. NESBITT: I was going to ask also if that is the intention of the Act. "From any source within Canada" would mean derived from a source within Canada, or as long as he received it while he is in Canada.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That was intended to impose taxation upon incomes earned in Canada by persons who do not live in Canada.

Mr. PEDLOW: Since the hon. member for Kingston made his point in regard to the working out of this Bill, I have been doing some figuring, and would like to know whether the results are correct or not. Take for instance the income of $10,000 in the case of a married man. There would be an exemption deducted from that of $1,500, leaving $8,500 subject to a 2 per cent assessment, which would be $170. Then the income would be subject to a further tax after another exemption of $3,000 of 4 per cent on $5,500, which would be $220. In addition to that there would be a supertax of 2 per cent on $2,500, the balance of income over $6,000, amounting to $50. Adding these three amounts, $170, $220 and $50, the tax on a married man with an income of $10,000 would be $440.

Suppose a man's estate is in stocks and bonds, half of which he transfers to his wife. Each has then an income of $5,000, and would pay 2 per cent on $3,500 and 4 per cent on $500, or $90 each, a total of $180 as against $440 if the estate had not been divided. The member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), who is a good lawyer, says that it is possible to drive a wedge into the Act in this respect. Is the argument of the member for Kingston sound, and are my figures correct?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The member for Kingston properly stated the facts, but I was unable to follow the figures given by my hon. friend (Mr. Pedlow); I did not hear them. Section 4 of the Income War Tax Act provides that any person who after the 1st day of August, 1917, reduced his income by transfer or assignment of any property, real or personal, to his wife or to any members of his family shall nevertheless be as liable to the tax as if such transfer or assignment had not been made. The income from any property so transferred is treated as the income of the husband, notwithstanding the transfer.

Mr. McMASTER: In view of the fact that we have to get money, the larger incomes should be more heavily taxed than they are by this proposed measure. The reply made by the Acting Minister of Finance the other evening when I brought this matter up was that although the British taxes are a great deal heavier than ours—$3,000 on an income of $10,000 in Great Britain as against $400 or $500 on the same income here—we must not forget that the customs tariff imposes a very substantial indirect burden upon the people. In that I agree, but that is not the question. Money has to be found, and after we tax certain yearly incomes more or less lightly, we are in respect of taxation on the higher incomes, really taxing the luxuries and superfluities of life which a few people have but which the great masses of the people have not. To tax more heavily these higher incomes is the proper system of direct taxation to be followed at this time. I urge the Acting Minister of Finance to amend the Act so that the larger incomes will be taxed, perhaps not as heavily as they are in Great Britain, but at least more heavily than they will be taxed if this Act is passed in its present form. The minister will probably say that there is a great deal in my argument and that next year he may have to adopt my suggestion. He is running the risk of becoming known as the minister of good intentions rather than the Acting Minister of Finance. The poor people of this country, who are paying taxes on tobacco and tea, expect the Government to carry out the promise they made at the last election to stand for the conscription of wealth as well as for the conscription of men, and to carry it out as fearlessly with regard to wealth as they seem inclined to carry it out with regard to men. I believe that in this respect I voice, however feebly, the views of the people at large.

Mr. NESBITT: Being one of those who may be classed among the poor men who will help to pay these taxes, in any arguments that I make I shall not be accused of defending the rich man. The Acting Minister of Finance read a statement the other evening showing the amounts paid here by way of income tax compared with those paid in the United States. We must not forget our geographical relation to the United States. England's large incomes have been worked up during a long period of years, while large incomes in this country are of very recent date. If you make the income tax in Canada larger than it is in the United States, those who receive the larger incomes here may go to the United States—it is just as warm there as it is here; it is quite as comfortable a place to live in, and we are accustomed to the habits of their people. Most of the large incomes earned in this country are derived from industrial pursuits. If a man whose income is very large is taxed too heavily, he is induced to put his money into Government bonds, which are not taxed, and to let the wheels of industry stand still. No greater calamity could overtake this country than that these large incomes should be put into Government bonds and the wheels of industry not kept moving after the war is over. Heavy taxes are now imposed under the Business Profits War Tax Act. If we continue to increase that tax we hamper a great many industries which have not yet been able to build up sufficient reserve to carry them through the hard times which will prevail after the war. So with income tax; there is a limit to the tax that we should impose on the income of the so-called rich man.

From the table which the acting minister put on Hansard the other evening, I noticed that the taxation on income up to $1,000,000 is higher in Canada than in the United States. Practically no one in this country is receiving an income of $1,000,000; indeed, there are in this country very few people receiving an income of more than $100,000, and yet our taxation on incomes up to $100,000 is considerably above the tax in the United States. Nearly all the men in Canada who are deriving large incomes are deriving them from the risks they have run and the strenuous exertions they have made to establish industries in this country. The man who is prepared to take chances in investing his money to build up industries in this country deserves what he gets. I would ask any of my hon. friends who are anxious to see how much money they can make in industries, just to invest money in them, and see what happiness they will have after they have been in the business for a while. I give credit to men who have put their money together and started an organization. I do not understand the feeling that exists in this country against corporations. Corporations are only unions of individuals who have had faith enough to put money into one man's hands for investment in an industry which he manages. If he makes a success of it and they begin to make money they deserve it, because they have taken a risk. For one corporation that succeeds in this country three fail to accomplish their purposes, so that there is a big risk in putting your money into industries. It is unwise for us to keep harping against the so-called large incomes and to keep taxing them out of this country, because it will be a great detriment to Canada to drive men into investing their money in Government bonds or out of the country altogether.

Mr. McMASTER: I have no desire to tax capital out of this country, but I have a desire to see some basis of equality of sacrifice between the people of smaller incomes, whose sons have gone to the front and who remain and are taxed on their simple luxuries at home, and those people of large incomes, whose sons have also gone gallantly forward, but who remain with as many luxuries, as great incomes from a material standpoint as they had before the war, and many of whom find that their fortunes have been enormously increased on account of the war. We ought, as far as possible, to have an equality of sacrifice between the different classes of this country. Suppose I said to you, Mr. Chairman, that we should judge of the sacrifice of men between ourselves and the United States. We would point out that they should send overseas an army of 5,000,000 men to be on an equality with the man-sacrifice demanded in this war. The argument is, therefore, not altogether sound that we should look merely to the United States to see whether our taxes are on an equality with theirs. I think better of the wealthy men of this country than to imagine that they will object to heavy taxation so long as that heavy taxation is distributed justly and evenly, and I do not think, if they are heavily taxed, they will skedaddle to the United States.

Mr. NESBITT: My hon. friend has much greater faith in humanity than I have.

Mr. McMASTER: Perhaps I have.

Mr. NESBITT: So far as the sacrifice of the rich man since this war started is concerned, I venture to say that if my hon. friend picks out man for man in this country, he will find that the so-called rich man has sacrificed just as much, both physically through his family and so far as his means are concerned, as any other class of people. Not only is that the case, but the rich men have been the great subscribers to all the benevolent funds that have been started in this country. Otherwise, those funds could not succeed. Let my hon. friend pick out, if he will, the so-called rich men in this country, and he will see how many of them have sent their sons and brothers to the front just as freely as the poorest man in Canada.

Mr. McMASTER: I said that they had gallantly sent their sons to the front.

Mr. CANNON: The question raised by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) and the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) is a most interesting one, and I am much surprised that no hon. member from the Western Provinces has so far taken part in the debate. Before the last elections were held, there was a convention, which was forgotten by most people, but which I remember. I refer to the convention held in the city of Winnipeg. I understand that certain members of this Government and certain other hon. members sitting in this House were present at that convention, at which one of the main planks of the platform of the so-called western party was conscription of wealth. Where is conscription of wealth? How has that promise been fulfilled? The Acting Minister of Finance makes the proposition of taxing incomes up to 50 per cent and not above. That is not sufficient. Conditions throughout the world are to-day most extraordinary and exceptional, and a Government that wants the actual condition of things and order to be maintained in this country must see that the burden of taxation is evenly and fairly distributed amongst the different classes of our people. Is that the case to-day? I claim it is not. After this Bill is passed, whenever a poor man who earns a few dollars a day goes to the grocery store at the corner, he will have to pay taxes for all kinds of commodities of which he is in absolute need. He will have to pay taxes on tea, matches, tobacco, playing-cards. This poor man who, by working probably ten or twelve hours a day, is able to earn $2.50 or $3, will be spending practically one-half of his salary in paying taxes. In comparison with that man, let us take a man like Sir Joseph Flavelle. How is he taxed by this Government? How are Mackenzie and Mann taxed by this Government? How are those millionaires who bought and bribed the press of this country during the last election taxed? How is the wealth of our country taxed? How are those people who claim to own this country taxed by the present Government? They are not taxed at all—and why? Because this Government does not dare to do its duty.

The Acting Minister of Finance, whose Liberal principles are well known, who used in this House to profess real Liberalism, who last year got up in this House and said in reply to the Minister of Finance in the then Tory Government, "Taxation is not equal in this country"—what changes has he brought about? I have listened to all his speeches this year, and from a Liberal speaker he is changing into a speaker more Tory than his predecessor ever was. We do not want any more Tory theories in this country. The Canadian people stand for Liberalism and democracy. The only Tory country left in the universe to-day is the one against which we are directing all our efforts—Germany—and the only Tories left in the world to-day are the Germans. I do not wish to join them. I wish to remain with the real Liberals, the Liberals who say that when people are to be taxed, they shall be taxed according to their means and not according to their power or influence.

When it comes to the poor man in this country, with little money and no influence, the Minister of Finance goes into his pockets and takes a few pennies he has, taxes his tobacco, his matches, his tea and his other necessities. But when Sir Joseph Flavelle walks along the corridors of this Parliament, his pockets bulging with the profits he has made out of the sweat of the people of this country, the Acting Minister of Finance is only too glad to bow to him. And why? Because Sir Joseph Flavelle represents wealth. Mr. Chairman, I do not represent wealth in this Parliament; I do not represent robbery; I do not represent thievery. I represent democracy and Liberalism and I warn the Government: they can vote us down this year, they can vote us down next year, they can drown our voice and defeat our proposals, but never will they drown the voice of real Liberalism in this country because this country is Liberal to the core. The Government have bought the press of the country, which can no longer express its views freely unless the President of the Privy Council has O.K.'d the articles printed. We in the province of Quebec and other Liberals in other provinces cannot speak freely any more. Why? Because by Order in Council the Government have tried to stifle freedom of speech in this country. Members of Parliament cannot express their views because this Government does not bring measures before the House, but on the third floor of this building, behind locked doors, passes Orders in Council, tears up our constitution, and—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member, I am afraid, is not speaking to the clause before the committee. His arguments concerning the taxation of wealth were, I thought, in order, but I would ask him to confine his remarks to that subject.

[Mr. Cannon.]

Mr. CANNON: I was just saying that if this Government wishes to meet the views of the country, if the Liberals who have joined this Government wish to maintain their principle, if the members from the West wish to stick to their principles as expressed at the Winnipeg convention, let us have conscription of wealth. Let us see that Mackenzie and Mann, for instance, pay something into the exchequer of this country; let us see that they give back some of the money they have stolen from the Government and people of this country. Let us see that those new-rich we meet on the streets of every large city and on every train in this country, men who have made millions in shells and bullets and rifles made under war contracts—let us see that these people pay not a small tax like the Government imposes, but a real tax, because those people are exactly like the birds of prey seen on the battlefields at night after the strife is over. They swoop down to the ground, and for what? To eat those who have died. If we have birds of prey in this country, if they wish to feed on the Canadian people, the least we can do is to tax them when we find them out.

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not know whether there is enough water in the Rideau canal to drown the eloquence of the hon. member (Mr. Cannon), who has just taken his seat, but I am quite certain there is not enough in the whole St. Lawrence to drown his voice. He has just given demonstration of the fact that we have in this Victoria Museum to-day a Cannon which can carry three thousand miles, if we are to judge by the volume of sound it emits. If democracy and Liberalism have to depend on the hon. member for Dorchester, then God help democracy and Liberalism. This is the gentleman who speaks of sacrifice, and he dwells on the sacrifice of money. Is that the only sacrifice? The greatest sacrifice which this country has made is not the sacrifice of dollars, but the sacrifice of men, and when he speaks of equality of sacrifice in taxation I should like him to direct his vehement attention to the inequality of taxation in the men of this country. I ask him what he has done in the past to bring about equality of taxation in the men of this country for the purposes of the war? What sacrifices has he induced the people of Dorchester to make in the past? This is the gentleman who appealed in a picayune, peanut style for the votes of his electors on the ground that the Government was putting a tax on a bottle of patent medicine. This is the high-minded gentleman from Dorchester county who undertakes to read a lecture to the Liberals of the West who have recognized their responsibilities as citizens of this country, and undertaken to carry them out. It is not possible for the hon. member for Dorchester to realize what are the responsibilities of a true Canadian citizen. Far be it from him then, to undertake to read a lecture to men in this House whose shoe latchets he is not worthy to unloose. Sacrifice? Why, when my dear Lucien appealed to the people of Dorchester, did he appeal to them on the ground of the sacrifices they should make? Not at all. His appeal was of the most inflammable nature, just as was his speech this afternoon.

With regard to taxation, I have said before that I think the higher incomes should be more heavily taxed. I have given a reason for that, but, nevertheless, I do not think it would be wise for this Government to impose all at once as high a tax as I think will in time be imposed on wealth in this country. I can see reasons why it would be inadvisable just now. I should like the hon. member for Dorchester, who preaches about sacrifice, and talks about Sir Joseph Flavelle, Mackenzie and Mann, and so on, to tell us some of the sacrifices he has made towards winning this war or towards paying the debt of this war. Let him tell us what he has invited his constituents to do in the way of meeting their obligations, not only in regard to taxation, but in the way of standing on Flanders fields and doing their part. The hon. member is on record in this country. Long before he had a seat in this House he did everything he possibly could to prevent equality of sacrifice in this country on the part of men to take up their responsibilities on the battlefield. It ill becomes him, and it becomes him less than any other hon. member in this House, to get up and read a lecture to men on this side of the House for their political affiliations whether they are Liberals or Conservatives

Mr. CANNON: In my province—and I am sure the hon. gentleman who has spoken before knows nothing about it—history reminds us that long ago the French regime Quebec was attacked and the voice of Frontenac was heard. When I mention the voice of Frontenac in that instance I may tell the hon. gentleman that it would take only a very small river to drown his voice but that after many centuries the voice of Frontenac is heard even to-day. I do not wish to enter into a discussion with the hon. member as to what he might have done to win the war, or as to what I might have done to win the war. When a man really does something he does not boast about it as the hon. member for Frontenac has been doing this afternoon. The hon. gentleman mentioned the by-election in Dorchester. I am sure the information that he has about that by-election comes from the same source as that from which he derives most of his information; that is the Orange Sentinel and papers of the same colour. But I will give this House some real information about Dorchester and I hope it will be broad enough to counteract the effect of the narrow-mindedness of the hon. member. The by-election in Dorchester was brought about by the appointment of Mr. Sevigny as a member of the Borden Cabinet. I am not afraid to say that I ran against him and I did so because I was a Liberal and because Mr. Sevigny was a Nationalist.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. CANNON: Some hon. gentlemen are calling me to order. I am simply answering the remarks of the hon. member for Frontenac. I have always been in favour of Canada taking part in this war. I fought for that policy. I expounded the same principles during the Dorchester election and if my hon. friend wants to know what the candidate whom he supported, and the candidate of the Government which he supported, was doing, I will tell him that he and his friends were taking the National Service cards, throwing them into the stove and telling the people to pay no attention to them, and that they did not amount to anything. I do not wish to go into these details, but if the hon. gentleman believes for one moment that I belong to his school——

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not.

Mr. CANNON: If he believes for one moment that my mind is of the same gauge as his——

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not.

Mr. CANNON: I am grateful to the hon. member. If the hon. member thinks for one moment that in the province of Quebec we could produce a school of extremists, fanatical, narrow-minded men, and parochial politicians, like the hon. gentleman, he is making a mistake. I understand British principles—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Chairman—

An hon. MEMBER: Take it.

Mr. CANNON: Sit down; I stood it through.

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Frontenac is rising to a point of order. I must ask the hon. member for Dorchester to take his seat.

Mr. EDWARDS: I ask you, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member was in order in referring to me as a narrow-minded, fanatical, parochial politician?

The CHAIRMAN: Such an expression should not be used with reference to an hon. member in this House, and I must ask the hon. member (Mr. Cannon) to withdraw it.

Mr. CANNON: I regret that my knowledge of English gives me no opportunity of expressing in parliamentary words the same idea. I therefore withdraw the last words if they are not parliamentary. But to continue, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the hon. member for Frontenac that extremists in this country, like the hon. member and his friends, are too numerous even to-day, but, thank God, they are vanishing from the field of our politics, and I could wish that the hon. member would be the last of them.

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must ask the hon. member (Mr. Cannon) to confine his remarks to the clause under discussion. We have had a very interesting little trip into Dorchester county, but it is entirely out of order. I did not call the hon. member for Frontenac to order when he started on that excursion, and therefore I did not think it right to call the hon. member for Dorchester to order when he answered the hon. member for Frontenac, but I must ask both hon. members to return to the item under discussion.

Mr. EDWARDS: I want to express to you, Mr. Chairman, my extreme appreciation of the advice gratuitously offered. I was not aware that I had made any trip to Dorchester in what I said in reply to the hon. member, and, as a matter of fact, I never used the word "Dorchester." I think I might be permitted to refer to the allusion made by the hon. member (Mr. Cannon) to the source of my information. One of the sources of my information, I am proud to say, has been the Orange Sentinel and others have been the Toronto Globe, the Toronto Mail and Empire, and various other newspapers throughout the country, all of which without exception have, in unmitigated terms, condemned the stand taken by the hon. member for Dorchester on more than one occasion. But in so far as his little slur in regard to the Orange Sentinel is concerned, I may say that there are overseas to-day some 60,000 representatives of the Orange order fighting for the good people of Dorchester whom he has time and again told it was their place to stay at home instead of going overseas.

Mr. CANNON: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman I said nothing of the kind.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. EDWARDS: I would——

The CHAIRMAN: Order; the hon. member for Dorchester has risen to a point of order.

Mr. EDWARDS: Let him state his point.

Mr. DEVLIN: He did.

The CHAIRMAN: Would the hon. member for Dorchester repeat his point of order?

Mr. CANNON: Inasmuch as the hon. member for Frontenac is making a statement as to declarations that he says I made, I wish to state that I never made any such declaration and I wish him to take note of what I am saying now.

Mr. EDWARDS: With regard to the declaration of the hon. member I must respectfully decline to take careful note of anything he has said. I do not think it is worth taking note of.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. gentleman is obliged to accept the statement of the hon. member for Dorchester.

Mr. EDWARDS: I beg your pardon; I am not obliged by any rules of this House to accept a false or incorrect statement.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The rule of order is that the hon. member for Frontenac must accept the statement made by the hon. member for Dorchester concerning his own statements outside this House.

Mr. EDWARDS: Well, Mr. Chairman, I was proceeding to state that it ill became the hon. member for Dorchester to cast any reflection upon an order some 60,000 of whose members are overseas fighting for him and people whom his whole course has led to stay at home and let others do the fighting for them.

We have the records of this House, as a matter of fact, showing that there were only some fifteen soldiers' votes recorded in the county of Dorchester election, so I think I am not very far astray when I say that every man who went overseas is putting up a fight for the member for Dorchester and his constituency. I say further that the whole attitude of the hon. member for Dorchester has been one to discourage his constituents from taking their proper part in this war. If that is not the case, then we must conclude that, notwithstanding the hon. member's own high estimation of himself, he has absolutely no influence in the county he represents, because that county's record bears out my statement that it has done practically nothing in the way of sending men overseas. With regard to the hon. member's opinion of myself, I think I can afford to let that pass. The hon. member for Dorchester's opinion of me will not cause me any worry, and I presume what I think of the hon. member will not cause him any concern as far as that goes. With absolute confidence I place my record, and any sacrifices which I have made in connection with this war, alongside the record of the hon. member. I have not made any boasts in that connection in this House, and I do not intend to do so, but I have made sacrifices, and my people also, that count for something in this war. I am proud also to say this: That there is not one of my blood relatives in this country but has done everything he could do to assist in carrying on the war, even to the extent of risking life overseas. I have not a single blood relative to-day of military age who is not in uniform overseas, or in this country preparing to go over.

Mr. VIEN: I rise to a point of order, and it is this. You, Mr. Chairman, have repeatedly asked hon. members who have taken part in this debate to discuss the question which is at issue. I think that the hon. member for Frontenac has wandered far from the subject, and if discussion is permitted to continue on such lines we shall have to follow him, which would not be in Order

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the clause be adopted?

Mr. HOCKEN: Would I be in order, Mr. Chairman, in speaking as one having some authority on the question of the veracity of the Sentinel; a point which has been raised by the hon. member for Dorchester?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman would be entirely out of order

Mr. HOCHEN: If I had the opportunity I would tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cannon) that he can not quote anything from The Sentinel which would prove his assertions against it.

Section agreed to.

Mr. MORPHY: Am I too late to say a word or two?

The CHAIRMAN: Clause 3 has been carried.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The hon. member can make his observations when we have completed the consideration of the Bill.

The CHAIRMAN: Is that satisfactory to the hon. gentleman?

Mr. MORPHY: Yes.

On section 4—Judges' salaries, retiring allowances or annuities exempted:

Mr. McKENZIE: The language in paragraph (k) is rather complicated, does it mean that the salaries of judges are not taxable?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Under the Judges' Act the incomes of judges are exempt from taxation, and it was desired to state that exemption in the present Bill for the guidance of the officers of the department who will be charged with administering the Act when it goes into force throughout Canada. This provision does not change the law in any respect.

Mr. McKENZIE: The provision has been framed in a rather roundabout and complicated way. All I want is to make it perfectly clear what is regarded as income and what is not regarded as such. In this connection I do not think any definite judicial opinion has been expressed as to whether the indemnity of members of Parliament is regarded as income for the purposes of taxation. It would be well perhaps for members to know whether it is or not.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The indemnity of members is subject to the income tax. Section 3 of the Judges' Act, which grants exemption from taxation, is as follows:

> The salaries and retiring allowances, or annuities, shall be payable by monthly instalments, and shall be free and clear of all taxes and deductions whatsoever imposed under any Act of the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. MORPHY: Under that I would apprehend the allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick of $5,000 a year for acting as deputy of the Governor General—that is, he comes down, I believe, once a year and nods his head to a few Bills, for which he gets $5,000—will escape taxation although it is income.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, I hardly think that.

Mr. MORPHY: Yes, it is not salary in the real sense of the term. And his allowance of $2,500 will escape taxation also. Why should judges' salaries be exempted from taxation? I am opposed to the whole thing. I do not believe it is democracy at all. Why should a judge's salary escape taxation? Can he not stand on the same plane as anybody else, and pay his share of the burdens imposed by the war. It seems ridiculous to me; I am opposed to it, and will test the sense of the Committee by a vote if I can get the necessary support.

Mr. DUFF: As every member of this House has to pay income tax, there is no reason why the judges should be exempt. The ordinary man has to go out and earn money to help to pay the salaries of judges, and it seems to me they should be made subject to the tax just the same as anybody else. I intend to move that paragraph (k) in clause 4 be struck out.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It would not help the situation any to strike this paragraph out.

Mr. DUFF: It would show that we are opposed to this exemption.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Under a separate Act of Parliament the salaries and retiring allowances or annuities of judges are not subject to any taxation by this Parliament. Paragraph (k) was inserted in the Bill to make all the officers who will be engaged in the administration of the Act cognizant of the fact, and if the paragraph is struck out it does not change the situation at all.

Mr. COPP: Why not have an amendment providing that notwithstanding anything in the Judges' Act, this income tax shall apply?

Mr. NICKLE: Although I sympathize very much with what the hon. member for Perth says, that judges as well as every other citizen shall bear their part in the cost of this war, I would not be disposed on general principles to go the length that he is disposed to go. I have endeavoured since I have been in this House to keep before me that contractual obligations should be respected. Section 27, subsection 3 of the Judges' Act says:

> The salaries and retiring allowances, or annuities, shall be payable by monthly instalments, and shall be free and clear of all taxes and deductions whatsoever imposed under any Act of the Parliament of Canada.

Now it seems to me, Sir, that when a judge is appointed, a contractual relationship is established by which that judge is entitled to the remuneration set out in the statute, together with such other emoluments of office, as may have been defined at the time he entered into office. Under those circumstances it seems to me it would be a breach of contract for this House to attempt to deprive a judge of an immunity he enjoyed by statute. I am not saying that I think their lordships should claim this exemption, because the taxes now imposed are very different in character and for a different reason than could have been in the contemplation of Parliament when the Judges' Act was passed. I think we should, although I sympathize with the point of view that we might go this far: make clear that while we feel ourselves estopped by virtue of contractual relationship in so far as salaries of judges now appointed are concerned, it would not be amiss to amend the Judges' Act so that the exemption in reference to war taxes, and particularly this income tax, should be taken from those who are appointed subsequently to the date of the amendment. That would relieve the present judges, if they care to take advantage of the exemption given them of this impost, but would make those subsequently appointed liable for taxes. And if the Government cared delicately to point out to the judges that they were of the opinion that present conditions were peculiar, they might say that the judges would only be entitled to the exemption if specially claimed by judges now exempt; and any judge subsequently appointed should pay in any event.

Mr. MORPHY: I do not quite feel disposed to accept the phraseology too aptly applied by the hon. member for Kingston under the terms of contractual relationship. I do not see that there is any contractual relationship in the matter at all. As I view the situation, considering the period through which we are passing, it is men of that judicial class, enjoying large salaries, that we should reach and not attempt to hide. The Government could find a way for making a pledge to the country that farmers' sons should not be taken for military service. But they found it necessary in the stress of war to change their mind and break their pledge, for which I give them credit. But the statutory exemption which has been enjoyed by judges almost from time immemorial could easily be withdrawn by this legislation until after the close of the war. And the judges themselves, I think, would be the very first to admit the justice of it. I do not think in war time that we should be bound by any statute ever passed to give a bigger salary to a man no matter how deserving he may be. What I am opposed to is the principle of putting into this Bill something that the minister says is not necessary to put here. If you look at the phraseology of the Bill you will find it very hard to understand. It is not salaries altogether. The phraseology is confusing, and really, I have not been able to determine just what it means. One provision is to save the judges from taxation on their salaries. I want to see the judge stand in the position of any other highly-paid man in the country in regard to taxation. I say that highly paid civil servants should also be subject to this tax, like Professor McCallum, whom I do not mention in any invidious way, who gets $10,000 a year as the head of the Advisory Council of Scientific Research. Judges are patriotic men. I do not believe they will thank hon. gentlemen in this House for appealing to save them from a fair and just taxation. Take the case I put to the minister a few moments ago, of a man who has an income from Scotland of $10,000 a year, and who is taxed about $3,000 on it. He is one of the most philanthropic and splendid citizens I know of in my county. His pockets are always open to charitable and patriotic purposes. He pays about $3,000 in Britain on a $10,000 income. He comes to live in Canada and the acting minister soaks him again, if I may use a vulgar expression, by this Bill. If he is going to be so drastic with a man so liberal and patriotic as this man is, who generously contributes to the Red Cross and other war funds, under what process of reasoning may I ask is it necessary to argue that a judge, who has a sinecure, who has a life appointment, who is provided for by a paternal State in his old age, should not do something now towards paying for this war in the shape of taxation?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It was not the purpose or intention of this section to remit taxation. Under the Judges' Act their salary is exempt from taxation under this or any other Act. At any rate I propose asking the committee to permit me to withdraw this paragraph (k) altogether. I propose submitting the matter on an amendments of the Judges' Act to my colleagues.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS: I have often wished that I had studied law. If I ever get time I intend to study it just as a pastime. The Judges' Act has been quoted as a reason why salaries of judges cannot be touched. I do not suppose that the Judges' Act, providing that their salaries should be exempt from taxation, while it had reference to Acts already passed, was intended to apply to Acts that might be passed in all futurity. Surely it never meant that. If you can provide in any Act that a certain thing can be done notwithstanding anything in any other statute, surely you can put the same proviso in this Bill in regard to the salaries of judges, and say that they shall be taxed notwithstanding anything in any other statute. Apart altogether from that, under the War Measures Act, by which it seems we can move the Atlantic to the Pacific, and the Pacific to the Atlantic, the Rocky mountains to the sea, and the plains down to the ocean, there is power enough to put a tax on judges' salaries. Why should not a tax be placed on their salaries? That is a question which every person will ask.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Even on the salary of a Chief Justice.

Mr. EDWARDS: Even a Chief Justice—if I might even mention that title—should be taxed, and a certain five thousand dollars should have a supertax on it. However, I won't talk about that, I may be called to order. Allow me to point out what sacrifices men are making in this country. Take, for instance, a farmer who, with the help of his only son, and of his whole family as well, by working from daylight until dark, is making possibly $1,500 or $1,600 a year. That son has to go to the war as provided by the recent order. That is all right. But that will mean for that farmer and his family a lessened revenue by five or six hundred dollars a year. He is not only sacrificing his flesh and blood, or at least offering it for sacrifice overseas if that may be necessary; but his revenue is being depleted by the absence of his son by five or six hundred dollars, and he is a poor man. While he is making that sacrifice not only on the battlefield but in a monetary way as well, we are told that we must not touch the salaries of these gentlemen who remain and sit on the Bench. I, for one, say it is not democratic, fair, or reasonable in any sense that if those gentlemen do not voluntarily contribute as other men contribute, then I say by an Act of this House they should be forced to contribute as other men drawing like salaries are forced to do. Their future has been well looked after by Parliament. A certain number of lawyers in the House of Commons are always anxious to look after any of the fraternity. They have provided fair-sized salaries for the judges, and they have made provision for the time when those judges reach old age or think that they should retire—and some of them have retired on good, fat allowances and have taken up much more strenuous work than that which they performed on the bench, and at larger salaries than they formerly received. It is said that men who occupy judicial positions should not pay anything by way of taxation towards the expenses of this war. That view is absolutely indefensible, and, if put to a vote of the people, would not get the support of a corporal's guard outside of those members of the legal fraternity who look forward to the day when they shall occupy a position on the bench.

Mr. McKENZIE: This question is not at all one-sided. For a time I was a judge in a small way, but I am a judge no longer, so I cannot be accused of partiality. It is in the interests of this great, democratic country that judges should be absolutely independent. Judges are paid high salaries so that, as far as money is concerned, they shall be absolutely beyond temptation. That is a good thing for the country. Our judges are splendid men; they give fair decisions and administer the law as they understand it. I know of no case in which money considerations has influenced any of our judges. They get good, fat salaries, and they are absolutely independent. Another thing that is in the interest of democracy is that the judges should not be dragged into political controversies. We have stripped them of the franchise; they may not express their opinion at the polls. It is highly desirable that they should be absolutely independent. Considering them as a class, there are but a few judges in this country, and the few dollars that we would get by imposing a tax on their incomes would not amount to very much. I do not express these views because I believe that the judges should be allowed to keep the few dollars which the imposition of the tax would involve. There is therefore another side to the matter which is of more importance to the country than the small amount of money we would get by assessing their incomes for this tax.

Mr. HOCKEN: It is not a question of the few dollars that we would get; it is a question of the principle that is involved. Why should the man earning a small salary be required to pay taxes while the judge, who is earning a large salary should be exempt? The unfairness of the suggestion will surely impress itself upon the people. The member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) believes that judges are given the large salaries so that they will not be subjected to temptation with regard to money. I recall a case where a judge was required to make restitution of $5,000 that he had taken improperly. Moreover, we have the case referred to recently in this House—that of a gentleman, whose name I am not allowed to mention, who took at least $5,000 to which he had no claim. The payment of large salaries to judges does not change their sense of humanity; so that the argument of the member for North Cape Breton does not hold. The man who draws a Government salary of $10,000 has just as much right to pay taxes as the man who draws $3,000 from an industrial organization. We want to be fair and just. The member for Kingston suggests that we should in a delicate way suggest to the judges that they pay these taxes, although they are not required to do so. I am afraid we would not increase the revenue very largely by that process. If the principle is right, then everybody should be taxed under the law. The amount of revenue we get in this case is not the point at issue, there is an important principle at stake.

Mr. NICKLE: I quite agree with the hon. member (Mr. Hocken) that a principle is involved; if I did not feel that I should not be on my feet again. If I understand anything about the constitutional position of the judges under our British system, particularly in a democratic country, it is this: judges are supposed to be above and beyond governments and parliaments in so far as either governments or parliaments can in any way indirectly influence them by passing legislation affecting their financial position in relation to their salaries. The very principle upon which the stability of our judicial system is based is this: when you appoint a judge you appoint him for life. You give him reasonable remuneration to prevent the possibility of his desiring to secure further financial assistance by improper methods, and you lay down in your statute that he shall not be taxable by the Government by virtue of any legislation passed subsequent to his being appointed to the bench.

Mr. MORPHY: When was that provision adopted—many years ago?

Mr. NICKLE: I am referring to the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906.

Mr. MORPHY: That section is perhaps twenty-five or fifty years old.

Mr. NICKLE: If we should trace the section in all its history, I should not be surprised to find that it was taken from some British statute perhaps two hundred years ago.

Mr. MORPHY: We are at war now.

Mr. NICKLE: In the working out of our constitution to define the position of the judiciary, of the executive and of the legislature, an effort was made to put the judicial powers far beyond the interference either of the Government or of the legislature and the object sought was to give the judge sufficient remuneration to make him immune from temptation and to put him in such a position that no adverse Government, no body of legislators opposed to the man, could by duress—that is, by threatening to interfere with his salary by a tax—do something to impair his administration of justice. I argue that because by statute we said that the salary of a judge should be exempt, and because men were on that condition appointed to the bench, that that national obligation should be respected—because it is, in my judgment, a national obligation. The member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) says that it is not a contractual obligation. I meet my hon. friend by saying that it is a statutory contractual obligation, and that we should respect that obligation so far as the position of the judges now appointed goes. And the argument of the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) falls to the ground when he says that members of the legal profession always rush to the defence of the judiciary because they hope sometime to reach the woolsack. My position is that I am willing that the Act be amended to provide that this income tax shall apply to the salary of any judge subsequently appointed. But I should be sorry to see this House or this Government lay down the principle that an obligation of the nation to the judges should be interfered with unless the judges were prepared to acquiesce. It is fundamental and a protection to democracy that judges should feel that their tenure of office is secure and that their promised emoluments are not subject to attack either by Government or by Parliament.

Mr. MORPHY: I shall just refer the hon. member to the fact that it is to be deplored that he, as well as the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), is under the impression that judges have to be paid high salaries to be honest. That is the the most startling statement ever made in this Parliament, and it casts a reflection on the county court judges of the country and the district judges of Quebec who are not paid high salaries. I am to be told, forsooth, that, owing to that fact, the judges of the district courts of Quebec and of the county courts of Ontario and other similar judges throughout the rest of the Dominion must be dishonest because they are paid low salaries. That gives the whole case away. There is the other fact that the low salaried judge would have to pay something if it were not for the Judges' Act. It would not hurt them if they paid that tax, and the Supreme Court judge, with ten or twelve thousand dollars a year, can surely afford to pay a little? The fact that this Act, which has been on the statute-books from time immemorial and is a relic of the Middle Ages, has been abused to the extent that judges in England are receiving $50,000 a year and upwards, should not make us want to follow such a custom in this democratic country. In ordinary times of peace a judge in this country can live pretty well on $10,000 a year, and in time of war, a judge, if he is patriotic at all, might reasonably afford to pay a little in taxes. If he does not want to do it, because apparently, as the hon. member for Kingston has said, a judge should be above legislation by Parliament, I do not so conceive the position of a judge. As the hon. member said, this Parliament has frowned on exemption; it has dealt with the man-power and the blood of the nation in the most drastic legislation, and it is humiliating to me to find in the twentieth century men arguing that a judge is too sacred a being for Parliament to lay its hands on him. The minister has, in my opinion, acted wisely in saying he has withdrawn this section. I shall now, in anticipation, thank him for not putting into the Judges' Act any amendment that is going to unduly favour judges in this time of stress.

Mr. EDWARDS: I want to refer to just one point in the argument of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle). The hon. member put forward two grounds. One was a statutory ground, namely, that those salaries were granted to those men, and that there was a contractual or statutory obligation in connection therewith. I think that was the legal phraseology used to describe the operation. There was also a contractual or statutory obligation to pay certain members of the Civil Service who went overseas their salaries in addition to their pay of rank as soldiers. Those civil salaries were paid for a time when those men went overseas, but it has recently been thought wise to break that contractual or statutory obligation to those men, who are overseas fighting and risking their lives for the judges who are here in safety and who, God grant, will all live to be one hundred or more years of age. The point was raised by the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) that the salaries of the judges were fixed at an amount which would place them above temptation. That point was also mentioned by the hon. member for Kingston. I am glad to hear that given as a reason. It throws a great deal of light on past history and past action in this House, because at various times, the salaries of judges have been increased. I presume at the time the salaries were first fixed, the amount, for instance, $5,000, was considered sufficient to keep them honest; but when in the wisdom of Parliament, that was raised to $7,000, I presume it was thought absolutely necessary to give them another two thousand dollars if we wanted to keep them honest and to remove temptation from them. The simple explanation of any increase in the salaries of judges is: We must keep those judges above temptation; we must remove all temptations from them by raising their salaries so that they will not be tempted to go elsewhere for money. Has that been the result? Not that one would notice particularly. I have in mind a judge whose salary is fixed at a good figure—at least I would consider it a good figure if I was getting it. Of course, I would not say that I was competent to earn any such salary. I do not object to judges getting generous salaries; I would like to see them all getting good salaries. But that was not considered, according to the argument of the hon. member for North Cape Breton, sufficient to keep this judge honest, and, therefore, he was given an additional sum for certain work which did not take him five minutes in the year, for signing his name once or twice for another party who might happen to be away fishing for the time being. Some four or five thousand dollars was given to him in that way to keep him above temptation. One would have thought a salary of $10,000, plus the additional amount to which I have referred, would have been sufficient to lift him clear above any possible temptation; but it did not, and another salary was created for certain duties which he had to perform in a far distant country. He was not to get this salary unless he performed those duties, it should not have been paid to him. There was only one reason why it should be paid to him. I am glad to note that it was not because he was justified in getting it or because he earned it, but it was granted and paid to him for two years in succession in order to keep him above temptation. Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from judges.

Mr. HOCKEN: I understood the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) to say, in a very fervent manner, that taxes should be imposed in accordance with the ability of a person to pay. That is a pretty sound Liberal principle; at least, it has been enunicated in that way here to-day, and it is one that I am entirely willing to accept. If we are going to proceed along that line, surely those men who are getting $10,000 a year and who are relieved of many financial responsibilities which other citizens have to bear, should be willing to submit to this form of taxation. An ordinary man, in business or in any profession, has sometimes to pay up to $1,000 or $1,500 a year for life insurance, if he wishes to take care of his family after his decease; but here we have a set of men who drew full salary as a pension, and who are not under the same financial obligation to take care of their families, because they may be expected to live at least until all their children are settled. There is another consideration. Most of the men who are appointed to the judiciary are men who have been eminent in the legal profession. A man, who has had a good practice of the kind that most men have who get to be judges, should be able to put away a large sum of money. Such men are usually able to amass a considerable competence before they are appointed to the bench, so that on the grounds of relief from financial responsibilities that other men must carry, and on the salary they receive, and on the probability that they are fairly well off to begin with, I do not see why we should exempt every one of them to the extent of $360 a year. My opinion is that any self-respecting man occupying the position of judge in this country would be not only willing but anxious that he and his class should not be taken out of this Act and exempted when all the other people of this country are being taxed in this time of national stress.

Mr. FIELDING: I brought up this matter at an earlier stage when the resolution was under discusion, and I was met by the statement that there was a guarantee in the Judges' Act that the judges should be exempt from taxation. I have a profound respect for vested rights; I have a profound respect for a promise that has been made by a man, a Government or by anybody else, and since we have given the judges, foolishly I think, this exemption, I would not advocate the violation of our pledge. I think the only reason why this exemption has been tolerated in the past is that we never understood it. There was no such tax from which they could be exempt. They were not exempt from customs, they were not exempt from excise, but there was a clause that they were exempt from taxes which had no existence whatever then. That being the case, there was nothing to draw public attention to it. I am content that we should keep faith with the judges. I am sorry the Minister of Justice is not in his seat, for I would have offered the suggestion that he should now at this session introduce a Bill to repeal that exemption clause in the Judges' Act, not as respects the judges of to-day—I would keep faith with them, because a bargain is a bargain, and even if it is a bad bargain or an imprudent bargain we must nevertheless stick to it—but to abolish that exemption as respects any judge who may hereafter be appointed.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I beg to move:

That paragraph (k) of section 4 be struck out, and the word "paragraph" be substituted for "paragraphs" in line 24 of said section.

SUPPLY.

ANNUAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS ON THE GOVERNMENT RAILWAY SYSTEM.

House again in Committee of Supply, Mr Boivin in the Chair.

Canadian Government Railways—Construction and betterments, including equipment, $18,000,000.

Mr. MURPHY: Does the Minister of Railways and Canals intend to make his promised statement on this item?

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Chairman, it has been customary for the Minister of Railways and Canals to make a statement in connection with the operations of the Government Railway system from year to year. Following that custom, I desire to present a detailed explanation of those operations to the Committee.

For long the Government Railway system consisted of the Intercolonial Railway from Montreal to Halifax, with branch lines to Fredericton, St. John and Sydney, and the Prince Edward Island railway. In recent years we have taken over the Transcontinental railway between Winnipeg and Moncton, and have leased from the Grand Trunk Pacific their line between Superior Junction and Fort William. We have also absorbed additional branch lines. So that now there are slightly more than 4,130 miles of railway under the direction and control of the Department of Railways and Canals and comprising the following systems:

	Miles.
The Intercolonial, including branches to St. John and Sydney, and the Canada Eastern	1,518.39
The Prince Edward Island Railway	275.20
The Transcontinental Railway, Moncton to Winnipeg	1,811.28
The Lake Superior Branch	191.75
The International Railway	111.30
The New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Railway	36.05
Dartmouth to Dean's Branch	67.00
St. John and Quebec Railway	119.87
	4,130.84

These figures, of course, do not include the Canadian Northern Railway system to which special reference was made by the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) yesterday.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister has mentioned the St. John and Quebec railway. He does not refer to the Quebec and Lake St. John railway which was acquired from the Canadian Northern company?

Mr. J. D. REID: I have just mentioned that this statement does not include any part of the Canadian Northern Railway system. The line I mentioned is in the province of New Brunswick; it runs down the St. John river to the city of St. John. It is commonly called the St. John Valley railway.

The Department of Railways and Canals is directly responsible for the operation of these roads through a general manager of eastern lines (between Montreal and Sydney and Halifax), and a general manager of western lines (between Quebec and Winnipeg). These managers in turn have their general superintendents and other officials responsible for the detailed operation of their respective departments. The principal officials are :

C. A. Hayes, General Manager, Eastern Lines, Moncton, N. B.; F. P. Brady, General Manager, Western Lines, Winnipeg, Man.; C. B. Brown, Assistant General Manager and Chief Engineer, Eastern Lines, Moncton, N. B.; H. H. Melanson, Passenger Traffic Manager, Moncton, N. B.; D. A. Story, Freight Traffic Manager, Moncton, N. B.; L. S. Brown, General Superintendent, Moncton, N. B.; W. A. Cowan, General Superintendent, Cochrane, Ont.; G. E. Smart, Superintendent Car Department, Moncton, N. B.; W. U. Appleton, Superintendent Rolling Stock, Moncton, N. B.

Since the taking over of the Transcontinental on 1st May, 1914, the department has sought to operate the entire system as one railway, and by proper co-operation and co-ordination to economize in the cost of operation and increase efficiency. During the recent year the railways of Canada generally have been working to full capacity, and I am pleased to state that the Government Railway system has received its fair share of business. But the House will observe that even though our earnings during that period reached high-water mark, the actual net results are not such as I would like to report. The reason for this is that the costs of operation and maintenance have so largely increased. Fuel has almost doubled in price; living conditions, owing to the war, have necessitated very large increases in wages to all classes of labour; supplies of all kinds have very greatly advanced; equipment has at least doubled in cost, and in some cases considerably more. But, taking everything into consideration, I believe the results achieved have been equal to those of other railways. I am pleased to be able to state that, in the operation of the Government Railways since the war began, we have had the good will and assistance of employees of all classes and to the greatest possible extent.

I will now give a statement showing the results of operation during the past fiscal year ending March 31 compared with those of the previous year:

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS—ALL LINES.

Average per month	$ 2,052,272.62	$ 2,691,578.66

* Estimated.

It will be noted that the total working expenses for the year 1916-17 were $24,627,271.48, compared with $32,298,947.60 for the year 1917-18. The average per month was $2,052,272.62 in 1916-17 and $2,691,578.66 for the past fiscal year.

The earnings on the Canadian Government railways were $23,468,998.99 for 1916-17, and $27,004,666.61 for 1917-18. The average earnings per month for the fiscal year 1916-17 were $1,955,749.91, and for the fiscal year 1917-18 they were $2,250,388.87. Hon.

members will see that there was an increase in the earnings during the last fiscal year of an average of about $300,000 per month. Although we had an increase in earnings of some $4,000,000, the deficit for the fiscal year was $5,294,280.99. The detailed statement of earnings is as follows:

	Earnings.
April	$ 1,737,658.90	$ 2,181,474.74

Mr. COPP: Will the hon. minister permit a question? Have the freight rates been increased in the last fiscal year over the preceding year?

Mr. J. D. REID: No, the freight rates were exactly the same. The order of the Board of Railway Commissioners, granting the railways an increase of 15 per cent, became effective on the railways on a certain date, and on the same date a similar increase was made on the Government railway system. That was two months ago. We got no benefit last year from that decision.

Hon. gentlemen are aware that during the past year the several large railway corporations have been pressing the Railway Commission to allow them an increase of rates. From the statement I have presented in connection with the Government railways, it must be apparent to every member of this House that they were justified in asking an increase. The Government railway system increased freight rates equally with other railways. Even though we have increased rates. I am not looking forward to any surplus; we expect to have a loss, and perhaps a very large one, during the coming year.

During the past year we have not undertaken any extensive new work, although we have been endeavouring to complete the works in process of construction. I am pleased to be able to say that we expect that the Halifax ocean terminals will be practically completed during the present fiscal year. I am also glad to say that last year we used those portions of these new terminals which have been made available. Had those works not been undertaken, we would not have been able to handle the traffic that has developed at that port during the present war. I desire to emphasize that fact—it would have been impossible to have handled the freight and passenger traffic at Halifax if we had not had the new terminals now nearing completion. Then again, when the disastrous explosion occurred on December 6, last year, which destroyed the major portion of the other docks, the fact that we had available a large portion of the new terminals saved the situation.

It has been customary to bring down certain statistical information of interest to many hon. members, more especially to those from the Maritime Provinces. I will include now a statement showing the earnings and expenses of the Canadian Government railways for the last fiscal year compared with the two preceding years. With the consent of the committee I shall place this statement on Hansard without reading it:

*Estimated.

I merely point out that the total working expenses for the year 1915-16 were $17,797,061.11 compared with $32,298,947.60 in 1917-18. Hon. gentlemen will note that they have nearly doubled. The earnings were $18,373,143.45 in 1915-16 as compared with $27,004,666.61 in 1917-18.

Early last spring the Department of Railways and Canals ordered the following equipment:—

	A total Cost of			$26,013,000

In addition to this new equipment we purchased a number of second-hand engines and cars, without which we should not have been able to show such good results. Not only were we able to meet the requirements of the Canadian Government railways, but we were able to come to the assistance of other railways.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Prince Edward Island Railway.

The deficit on this railway during the last year amounts to $488,172, the largest in the history of the road. It has never been possible to make this railway pay, but at the time of Confederation it was taken over and the Government has to operate it for the accommodation of the public. No doubt the members all know that it was decided to construct and operate a car ferry between the mainland and Prince Edward Island. I am pleased to say that this car ferry is in operation and is doing good work. It has been suggested that the railway on the island be changed from the present narrow gauge to the standard gauge, and I may say that it was the intention of the Government to consider this, in order that commodities shipped to and from the island could go through to their destination without transhipment. But owing to war conditions making the financial situation so serious and so greatly enhancing the cost, it is impossible for the Government to go into the widening of the gauge of the Prince Edward Island railway while the war continues. It is not merely a question of change of gauge; it practically means an entirely new railway, the complete replacement of all motive power and equipment, and the revision of curves and gradients so numerous on the island, and which, while suitable for the present light equipment, would never do for the heavier main-line motive power and rolling stock. It would mean an expenditure of at least $2,000,000, which cannot be entertained at this time.

Provident Fund.

The provident fund, which is an employees' pension department, to which the railway contributes $100,000 per year, had on its rolls 1,096 ex-employees, covering a period from 1907 to 28th February, 1918. Of this number 368 have died, and the remaining are receiving pensions which amount to $254,201.50.

Employers' Relief and Insurance Association.

This is a life and accident insurance organization supported by contributions from employees and $10,000 per annum contributed by the railway. During the past year 197 death claims and three total disability claims were paid, amounting to $76,000. Sick benefits to employees, medical and surgical attendance and other expenses in connection with the organization show a gross expenditure on this account of $30,783.51. These amounts are larger than previous years, owing principally to loss of life and injuries to employees in the Halifax disaster.

Canadian Railway Association for National Defence.

It might be well to mention at this point that, in my opinion, the operation of all the railway systems in the Dominion of Canada during the past year was the equal of, if not better than, that of any other railways on the continent; and I believe that the reason of this was the action of the large railway systems—the Canadian Pacific railway, Grand Trunk railway, Grand Trunk Pacific railway, Canadian Northern railway and the Canadian Government railways—in joining together and forming an organization known as the Canadian Railway Association for National Defence. The association's executive committee on war and national defence is composed of the following persons: Lord Shaughnessy, Canadian Pacific railway; Howard G. Kelley, Grand Trunk railway; Sir William Mackenzie, Canadian Northern railway, and Alfred H. Smith, New York Central railway. In turn they organized an administrative committee to deal with the situation, composed of the following: U. E. Gillen, chairman; D. B. Hanna, A. E. Warren, C. A. Hayes, Sir George Bury, F. F. Backus, E. D. Bronner, J. H. Walsh and A. E. Warren, the latter representing the Minister of Railways.

The Prime Minister explained this organization on Wednesday last, and I will not go into further details. We have reports from this organization day by day. During the past year the different railway companies have been working together practically as one organization, and the results have been as stated by the Prime Minister.

Equipment for 1918.

We require a good deal of equipment for the present year. In fact, all the railways are short of equipment. It was necessary for us to order equipment not only for the Canadian Government railways, but also in order to protect some of our other large railway systems. The following equipment purchases have been authorized for 1918:

All orders have been given for cars and engines. Before ordering these cars, I conferred with the Canadian Northern railway, the Grand Trunk railway and the Canadian Government railway management, and they all agreed that this additional equipment should be ordered and secured at the earliest possible moment.

I shall now refer, very briefly, to other phases of departmental activity.

Halifax Ocean Terminals.

The work on the Halifax ocean terminals has been continued, the present status being as follows. Grading is practically completed; overhead bridges carrying streets across the railway are all practically completed. Sufficient trackage has been installed to serve the two temporary sheds built last year, and two large temporary sheds on pier A, which were rushed to completion after the explosion of December 6 last, and which are now in use, together with a 100-car team track yard for serving the north end of the city. The placing of concrete blocks for quay walls is practically completed, and there remains only a small quantity of concrete work and granite facing in order to finish the quay walls. The filling has been proceeded with, but there still remains over 500,000 yards of filling to be placed behind the quay walls. Arrangements are being made for the erection of a temporary station and the construction of coach yard with coach-cleaning and repair facilities for the handling of the passenger traffic business of the city, as North street station and facilities are not suitable since the explosion for the carrying on of this work.

I may also state that the station was very badly damaged, and that we must get away from it at the earliest possible moment. The contractor claims that the new station will be ready for us about the month of September next, when we shall run all trains into the new terminals.

Halifax Disaster and Restoration.

In the disaster of 6th December, 1917, at Halifax 56 employees and 10 pensioners of the Canadian Government railways were killed, and 2 employees afterwards died from injuries received in the explosion. Thirty employees were killed while on duty. Of the 1,078 employees of the railway living in Halifax and Dartmouth at the time of the explosion, investigation showed that only 157 were comparatively unaffected by the disaster; 107 who owned their own homes, and 165 who were tenants had their property totally destroyed; 432 had properties more or less damaged, requiring at least considerable repairs. Later on, the Rehabilitation Branch of the Relief Committee, in their housing programme, agreed to provide at least 84 temporary houses for employees of the railway. The following railway and 56 freight cars of other lines, valued at $50,000, were destroyed.

Removal of wreckage and clearing tracks and replacing various electrical lines throughout Richmond yard and North street station will have cost, when complete, roughly, $100,000.

One hundred and three Government railway cars of passenger class, and 9 cars of other lines of the same class were damaged to an estimated extent of $60,000.

Thirty-seven Canadian Government railway and 56 freight cars of other lines valued at $50,000, were destroyed.

One hundred and twenty Canadian Government railway and 222 freight cars of other lines were damaged to approximately $54,000.

Four Canadian Government railway locomotives suffered damages estimated to amount to $6,000.

Canadian Government railway steamer McKee was also damaged and is now under repair.

The Willow Park shops, consisting of roundhouse, machine shop, power plant, planing mill, car repair shop, coaling plant and ash pit, and stores and office building suffered severely. These damages have been estimated at $130,000.

The shipping facilities at piers Nos. 2, 3 and 4 and the adjacent freight shed and other buildings, are all much damaged, but they have been nearly completely repaired. The elevator has been repaired.

The piers at Richmond are all wrecked and some are totally destroyed. Pier No. 9 has been repaired and is in use.

In order to obtain relief as quickly as possible from the effects of the damage to the various shipping facilities, the construction of two large sheds on pier A at the ocean terminals site was rushed to completion at the same time as repairs were being made to the previously used wharves, etc. These sheds are now in operation and the repair work is also practically complete. In addition to the work on the railway properties, the Restoration Organization have carried out the repairs to H.M.C. naval dockyard and to the naval hospital, under arrangement with the Department of the Naval Service. This work will cost about $205,000. The estimated cost of reconstruction on Canadian Government railways' properties is estimated to be about $1,250,000. Of this amount $850,000 will have been spent by March 31. Or in other words, the loss to the country on account of the Halifax disaster, so far as the Canadian Government railway system is concerned, is $1,250,000.

Hudson Bay Railway.

We have expended upon this enterprise up to February 28 of this year, the sum of $20,161,000, of which $13,814,000 was on account of the railway, and $6,347,000 was on account of the harbour and terminals at Port Nelson. The latter sum includes expenditures incurred in the purchase of steamships which are now in general service throughout the year, as well as the valuable plant at Port Nelson. During the past year the construction of the bridge over the Nelson river at Kettle rapids has caused the suspension of tracklaying. The north and south arms of the bridge were connected up in December and tracklaying can be continued this season. The grading between Kettle rapids and Nelson was completed and train-filling and ballasting at various points along the line was continued. At Port Nelson a restricted programme was followed, in which materials and supplies on hand were utilized. Owing to the general shortage of ocean tonnage no further shipments were made to the Bay during the season. The island cribwork was extended and dredging continued.

Prince Edward Island Car Ferry.

The total amount expended upon this work has been about $2,875,000. We are asking for a further appropriation of $65,000 to cover certain minor additions which have been deferred until actual operating conditions could be observed. The main contracts for the construction of terminals were completed during the season of 1917 and the steamer "Prince Edward Island" was placed on the route in the beginning of October. All freight offering has been satisfactorily handled since that time.

Canals, General.

But little new construction work was done on the canals during the past year, and even minor improvements and works of maintenance were restricted to essentials. Our only appropriations on capital account for the year just closed were for the Welland ship canal and the Trent canal. Upon the ship canal the work done during the year was of an emergency repair nature, being occasioned by clay slides, one of which destroyed the temporary crossing provided for the Queenston road, and the other, by its proximity to the existing canal, was considered so menacing as to require immediate attention. Construction work under the several contracts was suspended throughout the year. As there appears to be no possibility of resuming this work for some years, the several contractors have requested that they be relieved of further responsibility with respect thereto. Equitable arrangements have been concluded with several of them for the surrender of their contracts, and it is hoped that mutually satisfactory arrangements will shortly be completed with the others.

On the Trent system we had a number of contracts nearing completion on the Ontario-Rice lake division, upon which work was continued with some hope of clearing them up during the year. Owing chiefly to labour conditions, slow progress was made, and although we shall be able to open this division for navigation this spring, each of the contractors has a few months' work to do. The Grand Trunk railway are proceeding with their high-level bridge at Campbellford, and the barrier created by their present low-level structure will be removed during the early spring.

On the Severn division, two contracts were in force. As this division cannot be brought into service until another section, not yet under contract, has been completed it was deemed advisable to close down work upon section 3, which connects Lake Couchiching with the Severn river. On section 2, all efforts were concentrated upon the completion of the power house and dam at Swift rapids, with auxiliary works related thereto. This structure was completed with great benefit to the power situation in the surrounding neighbourhood.

I do not think I can add anything to what I have already said, but I shall be very glad, indeed, to give full information on any questions that are asked.

Mr. BOYCE: Was that large tract of land at Rideau junction included in the bargain with the Canadian Northern railway?

Mr. J. D. REID: That land was purchased by the Canadian Northern Railway system; it was deeded to that railway, and is now owned by the Crown.

Mr. BOYCE: I am very glad to hear that, as it is one of the most valuable pieces of land in that section of the country. I trust the Government will not allow it to lie waste as it has done for the last five years. It has been nothing but an eyesore in the past. The buildings that were on it were pulled down, and the land could not have looked worse if the Germans had passed over it. Part of the land has been cultivated this year, but very little, and I trust the Government will see to it that this valuable tract of land, comprising eight or nine hundred acres, will be used not only for railway purposes but cultivated to the very best advantage. I should also like to know whether any improvements will be made through that section.

Mr. J. D. REID: Any improvements along the Canadian Northern will be made through the board of directors which is now operating the Canadian Northern Railway system, and not through the staff of the Railway Department at Ottawa.

Mr. BOYCE: The sooner the improvements are made the better, because that part of the road is in a very bad state.

Mr. J. D. REID: At the present time the Government would have no say in such matters as the hon. member has mentioned. But I would suggest that from now on, as this railway belongs to the people, any hon. member who thinks improvements should be made on the line in any part of his constituency should communicate with the head of the Canadian Northern Railway system. Later on, of course, he should communicate with the head of the reorganized board, which the Prime Minister said would be constituted at a date not far distant.

Mr. BOYCE: I can assure the minister I will cheerfully do anything I can for the benefit of the road.

Mr. MURPHY: What use is being made of the land my hon. friend spoke of just now?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Canadian Northern directors will use it as they think best, but I was suggesting that if any hon. member sees land going to waste belonging to the railway, or the necessity for improvements on the line in his constituency, he should communicate with Mr. Hanna, the general manager of the Canadian Northern Railway system. Of course, if he should write to me as Minister of Railways and Canals I shall be very glad, indeed, to forward the communication, but I wish to emphasize that the management will be by the board, and not by the Department of Railways and Canals.

Mr. MURPHY: I think my hon. friend mentioned something about buildings at Rideau Junction.

Mr. J. D. REID: No, there are only ties there.

Mr. ARTHURS: I think the statement that has been made by the minister is satisfactory. I should like to know whether the Government railways have charged the same rate for the conveyance of troops as the other roads. In other words, is the deficit on the Intercolonial and other Government roads partly attributable to the fact that Canadian troops have been carried at a lower rate than on the other roads in Canada?

Mr. J. D. REID: I understand that the Government railway system charges the same rates as the other roads, with this exception, that ours is the longer haul, and consequently the proportion we get of the through rate is greater. The amount we receive is in proportion to the haul.

Mr. ARTHURS: Is the minister sure of that? The Government haul may or may not be the longer haul. Let us suppose the traffic originates in British Columbia, comes partly over the Government road, and then over the Grand Trunk to Montreal, and is there transferred to the Intercolonial. Will the minister say that that traffic is in the ordinary proportion as between two privately owned roads?

Mr. J. D. REID: That is the information I have from my officials.

Mr PEDLOW: I have been informed that a number of cheques were issued by the Department of Railways and Canals during December last in settlement of claims for right of way through Carleton county. Is that information correct, if so, how many of such claims were settled, and had these claims reference to the pieces or sections of land that the hon. member for Carleton referred to?

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member must be referring to the Canadian Northern Railway system?

Mr PEDLOW: Yes.

Mr. J. D. REID: I have no information in connection with that. I never heard of the matter before.

Mr. COPP: I understood the minister to say there were something like 1,200 participating in the Provident fund.

Mr. J. D. REID: I said there were 1,096. But 398 have died.

Mr. COPP: The Provident fund has been in force since 1906 or 1907. At that time it was an experiment. This fund was arranged by the then Minister of Railways and Canals and quite a large number of employees of the lower-paid classes went into that fund, their participation entitling them to the minimum amount of $20 a month. There are quite a number of these men living in Moncton and I know a number who have absolutely nothing to live upon except this $20 a month. They are in destitute circumstances, after they have given their lives to work on the Intercolonial. We must not forget that the wages paid to these men were very much smaller than those paid to-day and notwithstanding the greatly increased cost of living they have only this small monthly allowance and they have to pay the same for whatever they purchase as the men who are working on the road and receiving higher wages. I wrote a letter to the minister in the early part of the session and I trust that the department will enter into negotiations by which fair treatment may be meted out to this class of retired Intercolonial employees. It is ridiculous to expect men, living in a city and some of them with families and without any other income, to live on the pittance that they receive from the Provident fund.

Mr. J. D. REID: The contribution is made half by the Government and half by the employees and the Provident fund is administered by a committee composed of employees and some of the officials of the Railway Department. The whole matter was brought to my attention by my hon. friend (Mr. Copp) and I think also by one or two of the employees who were superannuated under that fund and who asked me to take the matter up. The Compensation Act has gone through this session, and it is necessary that we should take up this whole matter of the Provident fund in connection with it. It is being looked into, and as soon as the session is over, and I can get an opportunity, I intend to go into the whole matter. The point which the hon. gentleman has mentioned will have to be brought before this committee to see if something cannot be done for the old employees. I realize that their pension is very small and that something should be done. I had a gentleman to-day appealing for a larger retiring allowance. He has a pension of $20 a month, he is 80 years of age and he was on the road for forty years. But, it is not within the power of the minister to deal with the matter; the committee must agree to any changes.

Mr. COPP: The trouble is that the matter has been taken up in a half-hearted way by some members of the Provident fund board, but there has been no one to take hold of it actively, meet the men, consider the case. I would suggest that the minister give it to some particular man in his department as part of his work, and let him look into the matter, visit the diffferent localities and see if some scheme cannot be evolved by which fair treatment can be given both to the railway and to the men.

Mr. FIELDING: I think the minister said that the Government contribute $100,-

000 to the Provident fund and that it has been a fixed sum for a number of years.

Mr. J. D. REID: That is right.

Mr. FIELDING: If the principle of making such a grant is a sound one—and I think, on the whole it is, although I have some reason to believe that there is a difference of opinion on that—it seems to me that the grant should bear some proportion to the number of employees. The idea that there should be a fixed sum given for a smaller number of employees and no larger sum when the number of employees has increased, does not seem to me to be consistent with sound business. There may be room for doubt as to whether or not this is the best form of dealing with the problem, but I think the sum to be contributed ought to bear some proportion to the number of employees and the contributions of the men.

Mr. J. D. REID: When the scheme was started the contributions, by the Government and the employees, were to be on a fifty-fifty basis. The Government's contribution did not start with $100,000 but it was limited to $100,000, and it has reached that amount. Now that the Compensation Act has been passed, the matter will likely be taken up and some change will probably have to be made in the whole organization.

Mr. HENDERS: Will the House be put in possession of the whole history of this Provident fund scheme and will hon. members have an opportunity of studying the question, not only from the viewpoint of those having it in charge but also from the purely business standpoint; and will they have an opportunity of fully discussing it before any definite policy is laid down?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Provident fund required an Act passed by Parliament to legalize it. This Act will require amendment if there is any change proposed and therefore it will come before the House. It can then be thoroughly discussed and hon. members will have an opportunity of expressing their opinions on the matter.

Mr. HENDERS: Will all the information in connection with it be in the department and shall we be able to secure it by making application?

Mr. J. D. REID: We have in the department full information in connection with all those matters, and we submit to the House the annual report of the department, which contains the information the hon. gentleman wishes. We are at all times pleased to give such information as we can. Sometimes, of course, there are matters that perhaps we may consider of minor importance which a member of Parliament or the public may deem to be of greater value. In such a case. if our attention is drawn to the matter, the department will give explanations by letter, or by a statement to the House, or communicate with the public in any way that is asked for.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I want to make a few brief observations concerning the Prince Edward Island railway before the session is too far advanced. I am quite aware that the veteran members of Parliament know the history of that railway, but this is a new Parliament, and the new members may not be quite so well informed. To review the whole history of that railway would be too long a story to relate to-night when we are so anxious to close Parliament and return to our homes. I shall, therefore, not discuss the history of the building of the railroad in Prince Edward Island, which was one of the greatest political conspiracies ever carried out in the civilized world—a conspiracy which cost the province of Prince Edward Island its liberties, and which robbed the people of that province of their birthright for a mess of pottage. I am simply making the present statement as an introduction to the speech which I propose to deliver next year if I live to return, and you will give me the hearing such as you have always accorded. First of all, let me draw the attention of the committee to the fact that Prince Edward Island paid for its own railroad. The Dominion Government does not own the Prince Edward Island railway; it holds it in trust for the benefit of the general public. However, I am not going to enter upon a discussion of this truth to-night, because some of us are in too big a hurry to get away to Europe. All that will come up next year.

Mr. HENDERS: May I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Nesbitt): Yes, if the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Read) consents.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: The hon. gentleman can ask his question.

Mr. HENDERS: I suggest that if Prince Edward Island owns the railway it would be a very proper thing for this House to hand it back to that province.

Mr. MURPHY: That is not a question.

Mr. BUREAU: That's a conclusion.

Mr. READ: The Government would never take it back and pay us what they owe us through Confederation. The present deficit on the Prince Edward Island railway represents the interest on the money that belonged to Prince Edward Island when it entered Confederation. Those of you who have studied the history of Confederation know that when the four original provinces of the Dominion—Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick—united, they did so on the principle of funding the whole of their public debt and then crediting it on a per capita basis to be held as part of the funded debt of Canada on which they would pay five per cent per annum for all time to come. When Prince Edward Island entered the union our proportion was one-fortieth. The public debt of the four big provinces was $240,000,000 and one-fortieth of that would be $6,000,000 due to the province of Prince Edward Island, provided it had any public debt. But as a matter of fact it did not have any such obligation except the railway debt. That was imposed upon us by the connivance of the Imperial and Dominion Governments, and the set of politicians that sold, as I have already told you, our birthright for a mess of pottage. I want the House to be seized of the fact that the money which is absorbed by the present deficit on the Prince Edward Island railway really belongs to that province. That deficit amounts this year to about $470,000. Why is that debt so great? There is no part of Canada which yields so much traffic to its railway as Prince Edward Island. In the name of goodness then, why should there be a deficit? I will tell you why. I have received a letter from home to-day, a business letter, and the complaint made in that letter—and the complaint which has been made for the last twelve months by every business man in Prince Edward Island—is that they cannot get their produce carried away, they cannot get sufficient cars for the purpose and the Minister of Railways knows that. However, I am not blaming the Government for it, because, as the minister has pointed out, they intend to widen the gauge, and they do not want to expend a considerable sum of money on a system that is going out of use. But I am still hoping that the minister will bring down Supplementary Estimates before the present session closes that will make provision for widening the gauge between Port Borden, Summerside and Charlottetown, and consequently obviating the present great necessity that exists for cars and locomotives. The Government has had Dr. Robertson in Prince Edward Island telling the people to increase their production, and they are going to produce more. But what are they going to do with the food that is produced if no provision is made for transporting it to the markets of the mainland? That is the condition of things which exists there to-day. Hon. gentlemen who are in the habit of reading the newspapers will have noticed that the Food Controller has been advising the people of Peterborough, Ontario, to sell their potatoes instead of feeding them, giving as the reason that the Prince Edward Island people are feeding their potatoes to hogs because they had not the necessary transportation facilities to move them. The Minister of Railways has pointed out that it will take $2,000,000 to widen the gauge of the whole of the Prince Edward Island railway, with its 275 miles. But we are not asking him to undertake that work this summer. We are only urging him, between now and next September or October, to widen the gauge for a distance of sixty miles, and the bulk of that is over level country, with easy grades and bridges already constructed.

Mr. MURPHY: Between what points does the stretch of railway to which you allude extend?

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Between Port Borden and Summerside and Charlottetown. The name "Port Borden" was bestowed in recognition of the leader of the Government because he was good enough to inaugurate the car ferry system, for which we are much obliged to him and to the Government. There are some 49 miles between Summerside and Charlottetown, and then there is a branch that runs down to the car ferry from Emerald Junction, some 11 miles. If we had the railway in such a shape that between now and next September or October we could use the wide gauge cars over the 60 miles referred to, it would obviate the necessity of purchasing any more narrow gauge cars or engines beyond the three or four that have been already ordered. I am not criticising the Government for the purchase of these narrow-gauge locomotives; it had to be done unless we were to go into the cellar altogether.

Mr. COPP: The Government could not run the new private car on the narrow gauge system.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I hope the Minister of Railways and the Government will consider our position and endeavour to make some provision for meeting our necessities during the coming summer. I ask this House to be fair to our little province, for we have been the "staggering bob" on the Dominion for many years.

Sir Richard Cartwright used to claim that Ontario was Canada's milch cow. We are the " staggering bob," the poor little sister bled white, though not by any intention on the part of the big provinces, who have not understood our situation. When we went into Confederation the Government put in the terms certain statutory promises —or, rather, not promises merely, but statutory contracts. And one of them was that we were to have uninterrupted steam communication, summer and winter, so as to connect the Prince Edward Island railway with the railroad system of the Dominion. After forty-five years of waiting this contract was only fulfilled last October. I am proud to think that the Government has found a way to overcome the difficulties. All governments have made an honest endeavour at one time and another to give us winter communication, and have provided the Stanley, the Minto, the Earl Grey and all those beautiful ships. But they could not do the trick. Now they have a vessel that can. All I am pleading for now is that the Government will take into consideration the situation in our province and appropriate at least $300,000 or $400,000 to widen the gauge on the sections of the line I have referred to. I believe it will cost only $2,000,000 to standardize the gauges on the whole line, and the $400,000 I am asking for is a mere bagatelle in these days when we are talking hundreds of millions.

Mr. McISAAC: I am pleased to notice that the Minister of Railways has an item of $65,000 in his estimates for the completion of the terminals at Port Borden and Cape Tormentine, where the car ferry steamer Prince Edward Island plies between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. I need not say that I deeply regret that the minister has not found it convenient to include an amount in the estimates, at least to commence the standardization of the gauge on the Prince Edward Island railway. I would not suggest to the Government, as my hon. friend from Prince (Mr. Read) has done, to standardize the gauge from Port Borden to Summerside and from Port Borden to Charlottetown. That would only be a piece-meal proposal. I would not dictate or suggest to the Government where they should begin. But I sincerely desire that they shall make a beginning as soon as reasonably possible. And when they do begin to standardize, it should be done in such a way that all portions of the province traversed by the railway will be benefited. As I had occasion to say before, in consequence of the dearth of coastal steamships, the removal of the products of Prince Edward Island will be a very difficult problem this very year. Notwithstanding that a great many of our sons, I am proud to say, have gone to fight our battles at the front, I am satisfied that there will be a very considerable increase of agricultural production in Prince Edward Island this year. That being so, we shall have much more to export to provide food for the soldiers fighting our battles. We have scarcely any idea of how productive Prince Edward Island is, for the very fact that we have never had sufficient facilities to ship our products from the Island. The car ferry steamer "Prince Edward Island" is a splendid ship. In my opinion, she is the greatest product of marine architecture of her class. During the past winter, which was unprecedently severe and arduous, she made daily trips across the Straits; several times a day, sometimes. As I said before, the question of winter navigation of the Straits has been solved. The solution of that problem, which had caused so much difficulty, hardship, disappointment and uncertainty to our people, has caused a revolution of feeling, and the matter of winter navigation of the straits is now accepted as beyond any question. Consequently we feel exceedingly grateful to the Government for what they have done in furnishing this magnificent steamer, and solving this difficult problem, and placing us in continuous communication with the Intercolonial and other railway systems of the Dominion, which was written in the bond at the time we entered Confederation. It was the lack of this understanding which prevented Prince Edward Island from going into Confederation with the original four provinces in 1867. In 1873 the Imperial Order in Council contained what the Island asked for, but it is only now that we have succeeded in getting the link across the Straits. As the minister knows, the standardization of the gauge is the complement of the car ferry steamer. I think I can thus speak, though I have no warrant for it: As we all know, the people of Prince Edward Island are not poor, although it is a small place. They have contributed most generously to the loans that Canada has floated. I feel I am safe in saying that if the Government would issue a special loan of $2,000,000 for the purpose of broadening the gauge on the Prince Edward Island railway, the people of Prince Edward Island have the money; and they would buy the bonds and furnish the necessary funds to complete the work. If the Government take that departure, they will solve at least one difficulty in connection with the problem of standardizing the road. If the Minister of Railways, in his supplementary estimates, provides a sum for the commencement of this work he will do something that will be dear to the hearts of the people of Prince Edward Island, something for which the people of that province will never cease to be thankful, and something which will be a benefit to the whole Dominion as well.

Mr. TURGEON: I wish to bring to the attention of the minister the matter of the acquirement by the Government of the Caraquet and Gulf Shore Railway in Gloucester county. I hold no brief for the company which operates that road; my brief is for the people of Gloucester county. Indeed, this is a national as well as a local question; it affects not only the interests of my county, but the larger interests of the Dominion. During the last two months the Minister of Railways has received many petitions on behalf of the people of Gloucester county requesting that the Government take over that road. I do not wish to say anything in disparagement of the company which operates that road, but if I point out that through lack of initiative, of wise administration, or of ability to raise the necessary capital the road is in an embarrassed condition and the people of Gloucester county are thereby suffering inconveniences in the matter of transportation of their products to the markets which are clamouring for them, I do so only in order to put the case as it is before the Government. I wish to read only one of the many petitions which have been sent, as indicating the gravity of the situation to-day in that district—the most potential district in the matter of resources not only in New Brunswick, but, considering its size, in the whole of Canada.

Caraquet, N.-B., March 22, 1918.

O. Turgeon, M.P.,
Ottawa, Ont.

At a public meeting held here last night the following resolutions were unanimously passed:

Whereas petitions pointing out the dilapidated and unsafe condition of the Caraquet and Gulf Shore railway and its unfitness to satisfactorily perform the public service required of it were signed by a large number of the residents and ratepayers of this county, and forwarded to the Hon. F. B. Carvell, Minister of Public Works, Ottawa, respectfully asking that the Government acquire the railway and operate it as part of the Government railway system in the interest of the people; and, whereas the Caraquet and Gulf Shore railway represents the only system of transportation on the south side of bay Chaleur from Bathurst to Shippigan and Tracadie, a distance of more than hundred miles on which is dependent the traffic resulting from the agriculture, lumbering and extensive fishing industries along the coast; and whereas the service performed by the railway, which for some time has been most unsatisfactory and irregular, has become entirely inadequate to handle the increased traffic, notwithstanding the equipment recently obtained from the Government; and whereas the Government has taken no definite action thus far to acquire the railway and operate it in the interests of the people;

Therefore resolved, that in the opinion of this meeting, representative of the industrial, agricultural and fishing interests of the community, the time has now arrived when serious loss and injury will occur to these industries unless the railway is taken over by the Government at as early a date as possible and operated as part of the Government railway system.

Dr. F. X. Comeau,
Chairman.

The minister has received many such petitions from residents of the districts traversed by that railway. Since I first became a member of this House it has been my duty on many occasions, on behalf of my constituents, to request that this road, which for some reason has never been operated as it should have been in the public interest, be taken over by the Government and operated as part of the Canadian Government railways. The main line of the Government road passes through the head of the Gloucester peninsula. Sir Sanford Fleming had a survey made in 1873 and 1874, and it was his plan at that time to construct a branch line in that county as part of the Government road. Had this proposal been accepted, direct communication with Newfoundland would have been afforded and Newfoundland would have undoubtedly entered the Confederation. It was understood by the people of Canada that the construction of branch lines in that county as well as on the other side of Chaleur bay should not be left to private enterprise, because a branch line cannot be expected to pay unless it belongs to the company holding the trunk line. The Government made a great mistake when they allowed this branch line railway in Gloucester county to be constructed by private enterprise. However, a few men were trying to get sufficient capital together in order to build branch lines, and they got a charter for the construction of this road. As far back as 1882, as an independent candidate I was advocating the construction of that line by the Government. My Conservative opponent, a man of wealth, advocated the construction of the line by a private company under subsidy. He got the subsidy and built the road—and died from worry. Although that line is in a dilapidated condition, if the minister acquires it he will not be getting a road which has no value. If it has not great worth as a road, owing to its condition, it has great value because of the potentialities of the district through which it runs. It is not a line of railway ten or fifteen miles in length, a distance over which traffic might to-day be readily carried on by auto-trucks; it is 88½ miles long, and serves one of the richest districts of northern New Brunswick with its wealth of resources of land and sea. The lumber industry there has grown tremendously in the last year. A few years ago that industry was not of much value to the road, because the price of lumber was low, and the lumber cut along that road could be transported by water. To-day there is no more transportation by water, while there is at present an immense demand for lumber in the American market, and it commands a high price. There is no limit to the thousands of cars of lumber the district along this road can produce. The transportation of this means traffic not only for the road itself but for the Intercolonial railway from Bathurst to Montreal as well as from Tracadie to Bathurst. The Government, therefore, should look after its interests by taking over this road. The fishing industry in this district has doubled and trebled, and even quadrupled, in the last few years on account of the market in the United States and in the Old Country. Transportation has, therefore, been transferred from water service to railroad service, and consequently the hundreds of carloads of fish that the district will provide, from Shippigan and Caraquet to Bathurst, will be freight for the Intercolonial from Bathurst to Halifax or St. John. The road of which I speak has been a feeder for the Intercolonial, although not to such an extent as it can be made to-day. But of late years, notwithstanding the unsafe and dilapidated condition of the road, the freight which it has procured for the Intercolonial has increased from $50,000 in 1905, to $80,000 in 1917. I say, with knowledge, that if the Government take over that road, putting it into safe condition for this year and improving it later on, it will double its productivity as a feeder to the Intercolonial from Bathurst to Montreal as well as from Bathurst to St. John and Halifax. These are the figures as to the length of the road:

	Miles.
From Gloucester Junction to Shippigan..	68
From Pokemouche Junction to Tracadie..	16
	87½

The road was built between 1884 and 1887, and the cost of construction at the time was $1,163,826.12. It will be remembered that in those years railway construction did not cost one-quarter of what it costs to-day. Labour was worth 90 cents or $1 a day, and lumber and everything else was very cheap. I have had a statement prepared by a man who knows the products of the country and who has interviewed men engaged in the lumber business and men engaged in the fishing industry as well as the leading fishermen, and this is the result at which he has arrived as to the traffic that will be forthcoming. From the Bathurst company's mills the output is 20,000,000 feet of lumber, or a thousand cars—to be transported to Gloucester Junction, a distance of five miles. The minister is aware of the big interests which, during the last six or seven years, have developed at Bathurst by the erection of immense pulp and lumber mills, which have increased the amount of freight from Bathurst to Montreal and also to St. John. This industry has increased the revenue of the customs at that port by thousands of dollars. Bathurst is to-day a station which, outside of the great cities, produces one of the greatest revenues along the Intercolonial. This is the statement:

Large Saw Mills at.	Export Lumber. Output.	Railway Transportation.
Bathurst	20,000,000 feet.	1,000 cars.
Burnsville	5,000,000 "	300 "
Inkerman	3,000,000 "	150 "
Tracadie	5,000,000 "	300 "
	Total..	1,750 "
	Pulp Wood.. ..	1,000 cars
	Stone	100 "
	Potatoes..	300 "
	General merchandise..	50 "
	Grand total ..	3,200 "

In Tracadie a large sawmill was closed down this spring, operations being stopped during the winter, just because they had lumber ahead, due to the fact that they could not ship last fall, and could not under existing conditions rely upon having their goods transported. In addition to the traffic which I have already enumerated, 750 carloads of hay, flour and other goods could be got. I wish to call the minister's attention to the figures which I have given, in order that he may see the necessity of taking over that road. For the last ten days or so I have had a question on the Order Paper, which the minister has not yet answered. If he had answered it, he as well as the committee would have been spared this address to-night. As, however, he has not made up his mind upon this subject, I wish to impress him with the good results which will ensue to the Government from taking over this road. The Prime Minister, in his statement on Wednesday, said that, although the acquisition of the Canadian Northern will for the moment impose a terrible burden upon the people of Canada, that road will eventually prove to be a benefit, because, in the course of some years, it will yield a profit. I will admit that railroads in their inception do not pay, no matter where they are built. I believe that this Caraquet and Gulf Shore railway, when the Government operates it properly so that the various industries will have confidence that their products will get adequate transportation, will prove a paying proposition. It will produce more traffic year by year for the Intercolonial.

I understand the department claim they cannot pay much for the road on account of its dilapidated condition, and that they have not agreed on a price with the owners. If they cannot agree, why not submit the matter to arbitration, as is usually done in cases of this kind. If either party could be said to have the advantage in an arbitration it would be the Government, because public opinion in New Brunswick is against the company operating the road. The cry all over New Brunswick is that the company have allowed the road to get into a very dilapidated condition. I hope the minister, therefore, will take steps immediately to acquire the road and let me know to-night what has been decided on.

Mr. KEEFER: Before the minister answers my hon. friend I should like to ask whether he has received a petition from the inhabitants of the town of Sioux Lookout requesting that the name of the railway station be changed to the name of their town. The matter might have the appearance of having politics in it, but I can assure the minister that there are none. The name of Sioux Lookout is an old name that was given to the place long before the railway went through. It is the junction point of the waters by which the Indians from lake Superior used to travel westwards, and the Sioux on a high hill could see them coming a long way off, and so the town got its name, just as Medicine Hat got its name. When the railway was built, the place began to grow and eventually became a divisional point. The station was then called Graham. But the town name is still Sioux Lookout; the post office is Sioux Lookout; the registry office plan is under the name of Sioux Lookout, and if you wish to write a letter to a person there you have to address it Sioux Lookout; but if you want to send a telegram it has to be addressed to Graham, and it is exceedingly confusing. It would be a pity to see the name of Graham disappear from the Transcontinental, but one of the other divisional points east or west, Armstrong or Redditt, for instance, might take that name, or if it was desired to give the name to a junction point, why not call Superior Junction, where the railway comes down to lake Superior, Graham? But to continue the name of Graham for the railway station and Sioux Lookout for the post office is certainly confusing to business life. The people will not give up their name of Sioux Lookout, all their deeds and conveyances being under that name in the registry office plan, and that being also the name of the post office. I should like to know whether they have asked the minister to change the name, and whether he can see his way clear to do so, giving the name of Graham to some other divisional point.

Mr. J. D. REID: I have received petitions and numerous requests to change the name of the station. The petitioners if I remember rightly, stated that Sioux Lookout was the name of the town, an incorporated town, I believe, and the post office and registry office was also in that name. Every reason appeared in the petition why the name of the railway station should be changed to Sioux Lookout, but I will frankly admit that I have hesitated to change the name of the station because it was named after the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals. He had a great deal to do with the building of this railway. He lives within a few miles of me, and we have always been friends, and I have hesitated, and hesitate now, to change the name for that reason, because it might be thought that since I had become Minister of Railways I had some other object in changing the name.

Mr. KEEFER: Why not name one of the other divisional points Graham?

Mr. J. D. REID: That is a good suggestion that never occurred to me before, and perhaps it could be arranged in that way. I will look into the matter. In reply to my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon), if I understood him aright, he is urging the Government to take over the Caraquet and Gulf Shore Railway. Perhaps I might briefly review the situation in connection with branch lines in New Brunswick. Members who have been in this House for some years will remember that every session the question has been brought up of taking over branch lines in the province of New Brunswick. These branch lines, as they are commonly called, or feeders of the Intercolonial, certainly run through well-settled districts in New Brunswick and serve a great many people in the localities through which they run. There are seven of them in all, but none of them is very long, the Caraquet and Gulf Shore being the longest. The owners of these roads have managed to keep them running for many years, but I do not think any of them have ever paid dividends to the shareholders; in fact, they have not even paid the interest on the bonds, and since the war began some of these railways have got into a condition where they cannot possibly operate, and the Government had to come to their rescue last winter and assist them financially and with rolling stock. Unless we continue to do that, the roads must cease operation. Something has to be done, and that has been urged on me by members representing all the constituencies through which these lines run. The hon. member for Gloucester not only in the House to-night, but on previous occasions, has urged me to negotiate for the taking over of the Caraquet and Gulf Shore railway. The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. McLeod) has also urged that we take over a small road of ten miles in his constituency. The hon. member for St. John city and counties of St. John and Albert (Mr. Elkin) and Mr. Wigmore have also urged me to take over the Salisbury and Albert railway. Besides the representations made by the members for all these constituencies, we have had deputations from the province of New Brunswick to see if something could not be done to put these roads in good condition or to bring them under Government operation. I have entered into negotiations with the owners of these roads. The owners of the York and Carleton railway, some ten miles long, and the Government have agreed on an amount which will appear in the Supplementary Estimates for the consideration of the House. We have also negotiated with the owners of the Elgin and Havelock railway, thirty miles long, and they have submitted a price at which I think every member of the House will agree we ought to take over the road. The owners of the Salisbury and Albert road, some forty-seven miles long, and the owners of the St. Martin's road, some thirty miles long, have also submitted a price which I think the House will approve. If the House agrees to taking over these four roads at the prices submitted, we will make them part of the Intercolonial railway system, and we will operate them so that the people will have a continuous service during the year. Last winter these railways were not able to operate. They had not the power, they could not keep their roads open, and had we not assisted in their operation there would have been no service during a great part of the winter. There are three roads, the Moncton and Buctouche, the Kent Northern and the Caraquet and Gulf Shore. The hon. member (Mr. Turgeon) has had a question on the Order Paper, and I must frankly admit the reason I did not answer. They have been pressing us to take that road. The reports I have are that it is in such a very bad condition that it can hardly be operated. After consultation with some of my colleagues, with members and with prominent men from New Brunswick, I have offered them a price that I would be willing to submit for consideration to this House and that I do not believe any man in New Brunswick would say is not a fair and reasonable price. To go above the price offered I cannot see my way clear, and it will not be in the estimates when I do bring them down unless they accept the amount I have offered. I would feel very sorry if we should not clear up the whole situation, get these railways in under the Intercolonial and then give the people the service they want. I believe that if I were to discuss the matter with the hon. member he would admit that I have been fair in any negotiations that have taken place. I am willing to take any of these roads on the same terms as the others have been taken over. I went further with the Caraquet and Gulf Shore and offered more per mile than for any of the other four that I have mentioned. The same thing applies to the Kent Northern and the Moncton and Buctouche. If these companies were willing to hand over their roads to the Government railway system on the same terms, or even at a little advance, we might close out the whole transaction at once. But I am not coming to this House with an offer for the Caraquet and Gulf Shore that would be unreasonable. Therefore, if the hon. member does not see the Caraquet and Gulf Shore in the estimates I want him, and the people along that line, to understand that I have been negotiating with the owners and that I was willing to take it over and was hoping to take it over at a price per mile proportionate to what has been agreed upon for these other roads. The information I have is that it will take quite a large amount of money to put it in good repair. But if we take it over I can say to the hon. member that I shall do my best to put it in such a condition that the people along the line shall have a continuous service and better than they have had in the past. I would also like to say to the hon. members from New Brunswick, who have been urging this matter on my attention, that none of them can be blamed if these roads are not taken over because they have all done their part in urging the Government to take them over.

Mr. TURGEON: I believe that if the minister takes over any of these branch lines he will find that the Caraquet and Gulf Shore traverses a district having the greatest potentialities and from which he will in future get a more profitable traffic than from any other part of the country. None of these roads travels through a wealthier district than that traversed by the Caraquet and Gulf Shore. If he once gets possession of that line he will find its operation profitable. It is for that reason that we are so anxious to have it transferred from the company to the Government. The minister tells me that he has made an offer equal to that which he has made to the other companies in New Brunswick and that while the others have accepted offers made to them, this company has not accepted. I do not wish to say that the minister has not offered enough. I am not an engineer and I will not put my estimate upon the railway itself. I can indicate the value of the road better by estimating the traffic that is to come to it in the future than I can by putting any value on the road itself. Meanwhile I would say that perhaps if he were to put in his Estimates the price which he offers the owners of the road might be disposed, or induced, to accept it.

Mr. J. D. REID: I could not do that.

Mr. TURGEON: Then why not leave it to arbitration?

Mr. J. D. REID: No; if they do not take it now I will not put it in.

Mr. TURGEON: The minister is willing to pay the price that he says he has offered the company. The company ask for a little more.

Mr. J. D. REID: The company ask double what I offered them.

Mr. TURGEON: Even if it is double, let it be referred to arbitration and it is most likely that the decision will be on the side of the Government. If the minister is willing to spend so much for bridges, repairs and so on to put it in good condition, is it worth while, for the sake of a few thousand dollars, separating the county of Gloucester from the rest of the Dominion?

Mr. J. D. REID: They are not anxious to sell and I am not anxious to buy.

Mr. TURGEON: The minister may not be anxious to buy but in the exercise of his duty he should consider the interests of the north shore of New Brunswick as well as the interests of any other portion of the country. It is well known that in 1911 the Government of that day, at my insistent request and at the request of other members from New Brunswick, gave some attention to this question. I see my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) coming into the House and I am very glad. I missed him during my first remarks. I will ask him to corroborate the statements I have made in his absence. I was asking if it was worth while, for the sake of a few thousand dollars, to differentiate from the rest of the country the county of Gloucester or the northern part of New Brunswick whose advantages, from the railway point of view, will, in the future, exceed those of any other district. I stated that the Caraquet and Gulf Shore railway traversed an immense district in the eastern portion of Gloucester which is the wealthiest district in New Brunswick to-day. Railway traffic is assured in the abundance of those products which are the most profitable in the operation of a railway, more particularly the lumber traffic. The lumber traffic is certainly one out of which the railways can make more money than they can out of any other kind of business.

This railway traverses a district, as I have already said, where there is as yet virgin forest, and where the great industry of agriculture has been progressing rapidly, more particularly for the last few years. As the Minister of Public Works knows, that railway, starting from Bathurst runs for a distance of 20 or 25 miles through a long-settled agricultural district inhabited by an active and enterprising population who have progressed in agriculture for the last forty years. The salmon fishing industry needs prompt railway transportation in order that its yield may be placed on the market as rapidly as possible. It is now separated from the main station at Bathurst by distances extending anywhere from ten, fifteen, twenty and thirty-five miles. The Minister of Public Works knows of the operations that are going on at Stone Haven where there is a quarry with one hundred carloads of stone ready to be transported to the province of Ontario, and which could easily double and treble its output if there was only certainty of getting those transportation facilities which have been lacking. At Caraquet there is the great fishing industry requiring the services of 256 schooners daily, and with a catch of fish easily estimated at $1,000,000 a year. No one can over-estimate the importance of this industry in helping to feed our soldiers at the front. Then there is the great lumbering industry, between Caraquet, Burnsville and Tracadie, which also is in need of proper transportation facilities. The Minister of Public Works knows that there are vast forest areas which are capable of supplying millions of tons of pulpwood to the industry at Bathurst, which has furnished a large amount of traffic for the last five or six years in that district. He knows the increased prices which the pulp company has had to pay owing to the condition of the railway, and that it has thousands of cords of pulpwood lying alongside the line which cannot at present be transported because the freight charges are too high. He knows that every statement that I am making on this subject to-night is correct, and he knows the potentialities of that district just as well as I do. He cannot say that I am exaggerating at all the possibilities of the district of which I am speaking. If, in the Prairie Provinces there was a stretch of eighty-eight miles in which a good railroad service had been lacking during the last twenty or thirty years, so that the development of the district was retarded, the farmers would long ago have insisted on the Government taking over that line and giving them a proper service for the carriage of their wheat.

If to-day the branch lines in New Brunswick are in a dilapidated condition, successive Governments of Canada in the past which allowed these companies to build the small branch lines are responsible for it, and during the past few years the people living in the districts through which they pass have been encouraged to hope that the Government would take these roads over. In 1911 the late Government introduced a Bill which passed its first reading and was awaiting the return of Parliament to undergo its second reading, providing for taking over the road of which I have been speaking, together with others. During that election the present Prime Minister, at the request of his supporters in New Brunswick, wired to Mr. Fowler, now a member of the Upper Chamber, who was at that time a candidate in Kings county, declaring that if his party were returned to power he would not depart from the Liberal policy in regard to the acquisition of branch lines in New Brunswick, but that his administration would also take over these branch lines.

An hon. MEMBER: That was an election promise.

Mr. TURGEON: That was an election promise, and it has not been carried out. During the last two or three years I have constantly urged this matter on the Minister of Railways, and have received the reply that owing to war conditions it was impossible to get the necessary money to take over these lines. I would like to say that the advent of the present Government preceded the outbreak of war. There was a period of three years before the war during which opportunity was afforded of carrying out its promise. Let me say that the conditions last winter on these branch lines were almost intolerable. It is hard enough in the case of passengers, but where freight is concerned it is almost impossible to secure any transportation. I would urge the Government, in view of the fact that it has decided to take over branch lines elsewhere, to see whether it cannot do something for New Brunswick, even if it involves some sacrifice.

Mr. CARVELL: I did not know that this item was under discussion, having been very busy in another part of the building, otherwise I would have made my appearance earlier. However, I am very glad to have listened to the remarks of my hon. friend from Gloucester (M. Turgeon) and I want to assure the committee that he is absolutely sincere in every word he has stated. With his statement of facts that the condition of affairs which has existed with respect to the branch lines in the province of New Brunswick has become almost unbearable, I have very little quarrel indeed. Twenty-five or thirty years ago, when railway construction in Eastern Canada was fairly in its infancy, when railway communication was beginning to be called for, and the Government of the day refused to build branch lines, the people organized small companies and built them themselves.

The Intercolonial through New Brunswick, as you will observe by looking at the map, does not follow the seacoast where the settlements are, but runs some twenty-five or thirty miles away. Unfortunately, a very great portion of the central part of New Brunswick on the eastern side is not very valuable land. But along the seacoast it is valuable land, and there is a very dense population, the descendants of the old French settlers who came there a hundred and fifty years ago or more. It became necessary then to build branch lines from the main line running down to the seaboard and the Bay of Fundy, as well as on Northumberland strait and the Gulf of St. Lawrence. There were six of these roads altogether. There is another small road, built from Cross Creek, on what is now a portion of the Government railways, to the town of Stanley, in the county of York, but it is not of the same class as the six roads I have referred to. These roads all received small subsidies, probably $6,000 a mile would be the maximum amount of assistance, and in many cases much less than that. In some cases they got a Dominion subsidy of $3,200 a mile and $2,500 a mile from the province of New Brunswick. For a number of years after their construction they got along very well, until the time of replacement arrived. They had no reserves, and were not in a position to charge sufficient rates; in fact, there was not sufficient traffic to justify them in keeping the roads up to standard and they commenced to deteriorate. The result was that about ten or fifteen years ago, or a little before that period, practically all these roads went under the hammer; they were foreclosed by the bondholders and bid in by certain parties. Many of the owners of these roads have fairly large amounts of money invested in them—I know—as my hon. friend (Mr. Turgeon) says regarding the road in his constituency, that the Caraquet railway has cost the present owners quite a large amount of money; I don't know how much. We had several representatives before us a few days ago, who said they could not tell us what it did cost. However, there is no doubt that the roads cost a great deal more money than the Government is offering for them. When the late Hon. Mr. Emmerson was Minister of Railways and canals a very strong agitation sprang up to have these roads taken over by the Intercolonial, as it was then called. I have always supported that proposition, and I am on record a great many times in this House during the last fifteen years as advocating the acquisition of all branch lines by the trunk line, for the simple reason that under modern conditions it is impossible to operate branch lines successfully. I do not believe there is a place in Canada in which a branch line could be economically operated. It must become part of the main trunk line. That policy has been laid down by the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Canadian Northern, and by the Government railways to quite an extent. Unfortunately, however, the acquisition of these roads from the very beginning of the agitation down to a few months ago was simply used as a political football. Not an election, either provincial or federal, has been run in the province of New Brunswick in the last ten or twelve years, I am safe in saying in which the question of the acquisition of these lines has not been an issue, and both parties have used it as a football for political benefit. I do not think I am going too far when I say that some of the gentlemen who purchased these roads did so with the idea of selling them to the Government. I do know that when an attempt was made within the last five years to take over some of these roads, there was always the inevitable grafter who had to have his thirty-three and a third per cent. But the Government would not pay that and I give them all credit for not doing so.

When I became Minister of Public Works, last October, the representative of practically every one of these roads came to me to exact a promise that these roads would be taken over, and I absolutely refused to have anything to do with it or to make any promise whatever. I told them I would not be a party to holding out the purchase of these lines as an election promise, but that I would see that they were operated during the coming winter, because I believed that was necessary. I discussed the matter with my colleague the Minister of Railways, and an Order in Council was passed giving the Government railways the right to operate these roads and supply whatever was necessary in the way of equipment, men, and even money, on the principle that the roads must be kept open. Probably it was the worst winter for railroading we have had in the Maritime Provinces for the past twenty years. But, through the activities of the railroads themselves, assisted by the Government railways, they were kept open with very few intervals. There may have been a week or two when one or another was closed down. After the election was over I asked my colleagues to adopt the policy of purchasing these branch lines, and I do not think I am revealing any confidence when I say that it took a great deal of persuasion on my part to bring them to consent to it. However, they agreed, and the Minister of Railways and myself were appointed a committee to purchase them under certain restrictions. Now, Mr. Chairman, we were bound to approach the question of the purchase of these lines, not from the standpoint of what the people had put into them, not to consider any set of men who were losing or making money, but on the principle of what the Government could afford to give. I have no hesitation in saying that they did not put back into these roads anything like what would be required by ordinary railroad management in the way of replacement. The roads had gone down in their physical condition until they were the veritable "one hoss shay"; they were ready to fall to pieces. Yet the people who owned these roads, or their predecessors, had put into them very large amounts of money. We were obliged to approach the purchase of these roads more from the standpoint of necessary accommodation to the people who lived in the locality, and anything which we offer to the owners of these roads is more in the way of a bonus for the purpose of giving accommodation to the people than as a purchase price for the railways themselves. I hope there will not be any misunderstanding as to the principle on which we approached the purchase of these roads. I admit that the amount of $2,000 a mile, which is probably the average price offered, is ridiculous when you consider what the roads have cost. I admit that every one of these companies could tear up their rails and sell them for two or three times what we are willing to pay for the roads as they stand. I believe my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon) is right. However, it is a fact that they could take up the rails at the present price of steel and get—

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. TURGEON: Double.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes. But we admit at once that we are not purchasing these roads from the standpoint of what they cost at all. If men in the United States and Canada have been unfortunate enough to put their money into an unprofitable venture, that is their misfortune and not ours, and we cannot under any consideration whatever attempt to reimburse these people because of their unbusinesslike venture.

We have offered these companies virtually $2,000 a mile—really only a bonus to get rid of them, and to provide that the people living along these lines may have the necessary accommodation. I think I am safe in saying that within the next two years the Government will have to spend another $2,000 a mile to make these roads passable. But the Government can operate them very much better than local companies can, because large quantities of second-hand and light equipment, both motive power and cars, which are not fit for use on the main lines, can be used on these branch lines. These small roads have practically no rolling stock. They have engines of an obsolete character, but they have practically no cars. Shippers along these lines cannot get the accommodation to which they are entitled because they cannot get cars. Naturally, the Canadian Government Railway authorities supply their own shippers with cars before they devote their attention to outsiders, and the result is that the industrial life of the northern and eastern portions of New Brunswick have been absolutely stagnant for the last ten years because of the lack of railway facilities. I make no apology, even under present financial conditions, for the policy which I have asked my colleagues to adopt in connection with these roads. We have entered into agreement to purchase four of these roads, and the matter will be submitted to the House for consideration in the form of supplementary estimates. The prices vary, but they average $2,000 a mile. The price offered for some is a little less than that; in one case, because the road was in very much worse physical condition than the others. In two cases, I think, the price slightly exceeds $2,000 a mile; in one of these cases the road is very much better equipped with rolling stock and motive power than the others. One has 67-pound rails, practically new, which will last for the next fifty years; the others have 52 and 56-pound rails. We took these things into consideration to some extent, but not wholly, because if we had regard to the value of the rails as they are to-day for junk, we should have to pay twice as much as we are offering. We have bought three of the roads running from the main line of the Intercolonial to the sea. We have bought a fourth running from Cross Creek to Stanley in the county of York, which is not in the same category as the others; it is simply a small branch line. Then there are three others, two in Kent—the Moncton and Buctouche and the Kent Northern,—and the Caraquet Railway referred to by the member for Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon). I admit, that we have offered to the owners of the Caraquet Railway an amount which is probably less than the road cost them. But the difficulty is that the Caraquet Railway to-day is practically impossible of operation; at least $2,000 or $3,000 a mile will have to be expended on the road in order to make possible the running of a freight train over it, let alone a passenger train. We are therefore compelled to approach this subject from the standpoint not of what the road cost, but of what is the lowest amount of money which will give the 25,000 or 30,000 people in that portion of New Brunswick the railway communication to which they are entitled. Although the amount which we have offered is practically in the form of a bonus, it is really more than the Government ought to offer, from a strict business standpoint. The member for Gloucester has given this matter more consideration, probably, than any member of the House, during the last ten or twelve years, and he is entitled to my views on the subject. I have certainly been very frank with him. I hope that the owners of the road running through his good county will see their way clear to accept our terms. Not one of these roads has made a dollar during the last ten years, if you take into consideration the amount necessary for replacements. They have made a little money—from $1,000 to $5,000 a year—but they have made it only by starving the roads and putting them in such a condition that they are now practically impassable. The question for these gentlemen to consider is whether they will hang on to a venture in which they have put a good deal of money and from which they get no revenue, or whether they will transfer them to the Government for a very small amount of cash from which they can get a revenue. Of course, if they will not take what we offer them, we will not buy. But we shall have to adopt some measure to keep these roads going. As long as I remain in this Government, those roads are going to run, in order that the people in that part of the province may get proper railway communication. If we cannot deal with these gentlemen in one way, we will deal with them in another. In any case, we are not going to make them a present of a large amount of money.

Mr. McKENZIE: How can the minister keep the roads going unless he gets money from the companies to operate them? He cannot take the people's money to run private roads.

Mr. CARVELL: Very strong powers are conferred under the War Measures Act. Anyway, I repeat, these roads shall run, and we will not pay the fancy prices they want for them, either.

Mr. TURGEON: I thank the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) for the frank statement which he has made and for his corroboration of what I have said concerning the wealth of the district through which the Caraquet railway runs and the necessities of the people in that part of New Brunswick. He says that these roads must be operated. I submit that the county of Gloucester has as much right to consideration at the hands of the Government in this respect as any other portion of the province. I shall not repeat what I have said on this subject. The minister knows the needs of the district, he knows the conditions, and I can only hope that this matter will receive his consideration, his attention and his sympathy. But if the Government cannot come to terms with the company, expropriation proceedings should be commenced and a board of arbitration appointed to determine the value. Then, if the company are to be the losers, let them be the losers.

Mr. CARVELL: We have offered the Caraquet Railway Company more money per mile for their road than we have offered the owners of any other branch line in New Brunswick. My hon. friend, therefore, may feel assured that no discrimination has been exercised against the railway in his county. I can go further and say that none of the seven roads is in as deplorable a state physically as the Caraquet railway.

Mr. TURGEON: I understand that the minister does not desire to discriminate. The Prime Minister pointed out only yesterday that when it came to acquiring and determining the value of large railway systems in which enormous amounts of money have been invested, arbitration was the best solution. This principle applies to small lines as well as the big ones, to a matter of $1,000 as well as to a matter of $1,000,000. The Department of Railways, in the interest of the people, should expropriate the road. The company have charters by which they are bound to operate the road, and they have received subsidies in order that they may be able to construct and equip the road so as to give satisfactory transportation facilities to that district. If the Government expropriate the road, the company will have to accept whatever sum is decided upon under the expropriation proceedings. If the Government should put the matter into the hands of Judge Cassels or Judge Audette, of the Exchequer Court—I care not which—or anyone else, the result will be satisfactory to the people and to the Government.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I was surprised to hear the Minister of Public Works speaking about acquiring branch lines. We have as a feeder for the Intercolonial the Témiscouata railway which, as the minister knows very well, is a paying road connecting River du Loup with Connors, New Brunswick. I remember a commission was some years ago sent down to the Maritime Provinces to investigate which lines should be acquired as feeders for the Intercolonial as being paying concerns for the road. If I am not mistaken, the Témiscouata railway was one of the best paying roads, and it should have been acquired at the time. I do not know why it has not been purchased. The farmers along that road are at present obliged to pay very high rates for transportation, and if the road was acquired by the Intercolonial, the people along the road would be benefited as well as the Intercolonial itself. I want to ask the Minister of Railways why that road was not acquired. He has in contemplation the purchase of branch lines which are not paying propositions. It is true the acquisition of those roads will be of benefit for the people, but they will mean an expense to the Intercolonial. On the other hand, the acquisition of the Témiscouata railway will be a paying concern as a feeder for the Intercolonial.

I wish to draw the minister's attention to a little matter in connection with the Intercolonial which is causing annoyance. This particular case will give him an instance of what is going on along the Intercolonial in my constituency. A fire started at Isle Verte on the Intercolonial some three years ago, and fences were burned. During those three years I have asked and written and done everything possible, but while the posts have been put up, the wire is rusting on the ground and the fence is not yet completed.

Mr. J. D. REID: Is that on the Intercolonial?

Mr. GAUVREAU: Yes. Last fall I took the trouble to go to the station, and I asked the roadmaster to put up the fence for the protection of the cattle, because the farmers did not dare to put their cattle there, as they might be killed by passing trains. The roadmaster said: We have no orders for that work; we have men for work on the tracks, but we have not labourers to do that work. Surely the Intercolonial can find labourers to fix a little piece of work like that. Although it is a small matter, it is annoying to the farmers and to the member, and we are, therefore, obliged to annoy the minister.

Mr. J. D. REID: What station is that at?

Mr. GAUVREAU: At Isle Verte, the chief place in the county of Temiscouata. I hope, when I get home on the 22nd day of May, after prorogation, I shall find that orders have been given to procure labourers to complete that small piece of work.

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not know whether the hon. member brought this matter to my attention before.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I would not bother the minister in regard to such a small matter as that.

Mr. J. D. REID: I am glad my hon. friend has brought the matter to my attention now. I shall take it up with the management and ascertain the facts and see why the work has not been done. I do not agree with the hon. member that he should not bring it to my attention. After three years there must be some good reason why they have not gone on with this work, and I agree with the hon. member that within that period there surely must have been a time when they could have got some one to do the work.

With reference to the purchase of the Témiscouata Railway, the hon. member says that that railway is kept in good condition and operated successfully, and that the people in that locality are well served by the road. I am not going around trying to buy railways. The trouble is that these railways that we are taking over are in such a condition that they cannot operate, they must close down unless assistance is given. We were compelled, therefore, as I stated a few minutes ago, to pass an Order in Council authorizing the Canadian Government Railways to operate them on their behalf.

Those railways are really going to close down unless something is done, and that is the reason why we are compelled to take them over. As the Témiscouata Railway is being operated successfully in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, we are quite satisfied that the company should continue to operate the road and make money out of it. If it is a paying road, the shareholders will not want to part with it.

Mr. GAUVREAU: What about the farmers?

Mr. J. D. REID: The farmers, as the hon. member states, are well served by the road, and so far as the rates are concerned, I suppose the Témiscouata railway is under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and, therefore, no exorbitant rates can be charged. My hon. friend probably feels that rates are lower on the Intercolonial. I think the rates are about the same on the Intercolonial as on other roads. If not, they should be, and so far as rates and protection from fire service on the Intercolonial are concerned, we are in about the same position as the other railways, and during this war we do not want to buy the Témiscouata Railway or any other road if they can operate without assistance from the Government.

Mr. COPP: I did not notice in the statement made by the minister any reference to the number of accidents and collisions on the Government railways, and the loss of life and the damage to property thereby occasioned, during the last year's operations.

Mr. J. D. REID: I have not those figures with me, but I could have them here when the Supplementary Estimates are up.

Mr. COPP: I think it would be well to have statistical information in regard to those matters. Referring to the minister's statement, I presume that in "construction betterments" includes improvements to station houses, railway yards, and things of that kind. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, replying to the hon. member for Gloucester, told us that he made a promise to the electors of New Brunswick during the last election that the branch lines would be operated last winter. I do not know how fully he has implemented that promise, but I do know that a number of the branch lines were not in operation throughout the winter, and I presume my hon. friend the member for St. John, who during the election campaign was forced to drive from Moncton to the county of Albert, will agree that the line running into part of his constituency was not very much in operation during that period. I am not blaming the Minister of Public Works or the Minister of Railways, but I should like to have the minister assure us that the main line of the Intercolonial at least will be kept in operation next winter. It certainly was not kept in operation last winter, and I presume the Minister of Railways will say that that was because they were short of motive power.

Mr. J. D. REID: We had all the motive power we wanted.

Mr. COPP: If that is so, the minister did not make a very great success of the operation of the road last winter. Of course it may have been impossible to do any better. I am not a railway expert, but I know that the conditions in our part of the province of New Brunswick were very unsatisfactory indeed. So much by way of general criticism.

Now I wish to call the minister's attention to what is going on at Sackville, which is the junction point of the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island railway that was recently taken over by the Government. That road was in bad condition when it was taken over, to connect up with Cap Tormentine and the car ferry running to Prince Edward Island, but improvements, which were very much needed, have since been made in order to handle the freight between Sackville and Cap Tormentine over this thirty-six miles of road. When communication was established last fall, the Railway Department was not in a position to handle the traffic. I suppose it did not realize how great the volume of that traffic was going to be. As my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island said, it perhaps little knew the great productivity of the province at the other end of the car ferry. At all events, the road was simply overwhelmed with traffic, and there was no place to put the freight cars. Passenger trains were held up for an hour at a time because the main line was blocked with freight cars. I am not complaining, because as I have said, no doubt the officials of the railway did not realize the amount of traffic that would come over the line. What I do complain of is that now, when preparations are being made for that traffic, when new sidings and roundhouses are being constructed, exactly the same thing is being done in the town of Sackville as occurred in the city of Moncton. The terminal facilities that are being provided are not one-quarter the size they should be to handle the traffic that will develop in a very short time. To-day, shunting engines and trains are holding up traffic in the principal streets of the town of Sackville. It is a nuisance already, and the Board of trade and the town council of Sackville are taking steps to remove the nuisance. The work that is being done there now will have to be thrown away in a few years, and new arrangements made for the traffic to go overhead or by subway. I tell the minister that his officials are only half doing the job, because the traffic, instead of decreasing, will increase year by year. I would urge the minister to have this matter investigated, because I can assure him that before the snow flies next winter delegations will be waiting on him to insist that something be done to overcome this nuisance of the trains crossing the main streets of the town of Sackville, and now is the time, before the Government has spent a large sum of money, to make adequate preparations for the traffic that will develop down there in the next two or three years.

There is another matter I wish to refer to, and I am sure the minister does not know anything about it. I was very much surprised, when I went home last week for a day or two, to find contractors already on the ground at Sackville excavating for an extension to the station house. Some seven or eight years ago the old station house was burnt down and a splendid stone building was erected in its place. Imagine my surprise the other day when I found that to provide additional accommodation the Government were excavating for a common wooden building as an extension to the beautiful stone station at Sackville. The stone building was practically fireproof, but now the Government are going to put up a wooden building and run the risk of it burning down the whole station. That seems to me most unbusinesslike. I am told—I cannot vouch for this, but I have no doubt it is true—that the Sackville Board of Trade went to the city of Moncton and interviewed the railway authorities there, and what do you think that delegation was told? I hate to repeat it, because I cannot realize how a member of any board of trade would listen to such a thing. The railway officials told them they were going to put up a wooden building now, and build stone around it at some other time. When I was leaving the station the other day I said to the man who was doing the excavating, "I suppose you are putting in a very solid foundation." He said, "No, it does not require a heavy foundation, because it is only for a small building." I said: "They are going to build stone around this?" He said, "Are they? That is all you know about it." That is what is going on. It is a small matter and the minister does not know about it probably, but it does seem a ridiculous proposition to build a wooden extension to a stone building. It destroys the beauty of the surroundings and I doubt if it will not cost more to build it with wood than to continue it with stone.

Mr. J. D. REID: I know nothing about the situation. I have never been in Sackville.

Mr. COPP: Come down with me when I go home.

Mr. J. D. REID: I shall make inquiries as to what they are doing there. I have not had an opportunity of going over the Intercolonial system, but as soon as the House prorogues, or within a few days afterwards, it is my intention to take a trip over the road and this is one of the things I will look into.

Mr. LEGER: I am not here to represent the speculators or the branch-line owners, but I am here to represent the people who are served by these branch lines. The answers given to the questions put before the Government were not altogether satisfactory to me, with the exception of the statement made by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) that these branch lines would be operated. I understood the Government had power to force these companies to run these roads to the satisfaction of the people and of the Government. If that is the case it will be satisfactory. The people who live from twenty-five to one hundred miles away from the Intercolonial are certainly entitled to some consideration on the part of the Government. I am not here to discuss politics, but I am here to discuss the interests of the people whom I represent, and who contributed their share to the building of the Intercolonial, which serves those living within a certain distance of each side of the road. But those living at a distance from the road and on the shores, farmers and fishermen who are trying to make a living out of their industry, should have the advantage of railway transportation in order to be able to market their products to the best advantage. They have to sell their products at a lower price because of the high freight rates. If it is left in the hands of the owners of these roads, and if nothing is done to better the situation, I cannot see how it is going to end. I would suggest that the Government take charge of these roads, as they have the power to take over any property that in the public interest it may be necessary for them to acquire. If they cannot agree upon the price they have a way of taking over these roads by expropriation. Let them, then, expropriate the roads. Whether people are engaged in fishing or agriculture, we are anxious to give them every encouragement. I believe it is the duty of the Government to take steps to serve the people throughout the country as best they can and in such a way as to promote their interest and the public welfare generally.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to criticise the Minister of Railways for his generosity towards the branch lines in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia—

Mr. McKENZIE: He has not touched Nova Scotia yet.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have heard discussions during every session I have been in Parliament about acquiring branch lines in New Brunswick. But my hon. friend does not move very fast. He remains in the Maritime provinces and does not seem to reach Quebec.

Mr. J. D. REID: I started at the eastern end.

Mr. LEMIEUX: You are not coming on the flyer. I happen to represent, concurrently with the county of Maisonneuve, the county of Gaspé, and I consider Gaspé as one of the Maritime Provinces. In the beginning of the last century, Gaspé was a province by itself. It was only by the Act of 1791, if I mistake not, that Gaspé was annexed to the province of Quebec, and for a certain length of time I think it was a part of New Brunswick. We had a governor in Gaspé at one time. It is a very large and a most beautiful peninsula. We have the Baie de Chaleur, another Mediterranean sea with the Alps in the background. If my hon. friend goes there next summer we will prepare a fine reception for him. Unfortunately we have no Monte Carlo for his enjoyment.

Mr. J. D. REID: I have been at Gaspé.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Government, at the time of Confederation, promised the Intercolonial railway to the Maritime provinces. They built the Intercolonial with the understanding that a branch line should be extended from Matapedia to Gaspé basin, a distance of 200 miles. In 1877 or 1878 the Government of Sir John Macdonald started a branch line from Matapedia towards Gaspé, built about 20 miles and then left it. The Government handed over that branch to a private company that was incorporated under the name of the Baie des Chaleurs Railway Company, and which had quite a history. That company built as far as New Carlisle and Paspebiac, a distance of 100 miles. The road was very poorly built, and the company left behind it, on both sides of the road, lots of debts. These are partly paid to-day, but there are many people rather dissatisfied with the fact that the company which has acquired the old road has not found it possible to pay the remaining balances. In 1899-1900 I induced another company to take over the charter and to build as far as Gaspé Basin. As in the old Northwest, where the Hudson's Bay Company was not too pleased to see the advent of white men and the progress of civilization, so in the peninsula of Gaspé, the firm of Robin Collas and company was not pleased to view the construction of the railway. For many years, indeed since 1867, they had prevented the Government from building a road, and had made all sorts of trouble for the company which finally undertook its construction. This firm did not want the local fishermen to have access to the other centres of the Dominion; in fact, it kept in bondage the fishermen of Gaspé and Bonaventure counties for over a century. That firm came to Canada before the British domination; it has prospered greatly and has accomplished a great deal in that section of the country, and all over the north shore, but it was opposed, for reasons of its own, to railway construction. In 1900, as I said a moment ago, I induced an English syndicate to construct the remaining one hundred miles, and that syndicate built a very excellent road in the English fashion—they had English engineers and they did not spare money. The syndicate spent about $3,000,000 on that one hundred miles of railway, which compares most favourably with the first one hundred miles. Unfortunately they had some financial troubles, and the bondholders took over the property, and leased the other road running from Matapedia to Paspebiac. I am pleased to say that the road has been well administered under Mr. Gordon, the present manager, who has succeeded in making both ends meet. However, the people feel that this road should be acquired by the Intercolonial, of which it is a feeder. As I said a moment ago, the road is admirably administered, the trains are running regularly, and under the present management the line is paying its own expenses, but the first 100 miles would have to be practically rebuilt, and this work ought to be done by the Government. While the present war conditions prevail, I do not wish to impose on my hon. friend's shoulders an additional burden, and I do not ask the Government to take over that road now, but there is on the statute book legislation which would enable that to be done. I hope that when the war is over and financial conditions have improved the Government will accord that section of the country what is due to it. There are a number of thriving industries in that district. First of all, we have the fisheries, then there is the pulp industry—which is developed to a considerable degree—and of late a group of Montreal financiers, I think it is the Lyall syndicate, have been exploiting a copper mine which was discovered some few years ago between Newport and New Carlisle, and which promises to create in that locality a very prosperous mining enterprise. If the Government intends to follow up the policy of acquiring branch lines— and I do not begrudge what is being done for New Brunswick and for the western prairies—it should not lose sight of the fact that the peninsula of Gaspé is entitled to consideration. For, let it be remembered, it is the oldest section in the country. When Jacques Cartier ascended the river St. Lawrence he planted a cross at Gaspé at a spot which I have visited several times. So it seems to me that if we are to consider the proprieties, the oldest spot in the country should be best served. But we are not so ambitious as to press that point. We realize that in view of the present war conditions we should not be unduly insistent, and we are willing to wait until the present great struggle is ended. But I would like my hon. friend the Minister of Railways to inspect that road some time this summer, and judge for himself of the conditions of that section of the country. It is the most interesting section of Canada, and I am quite sure that whenever the policy of acquiring branch lines is brought to a head, my hon. friend will make up his mind that the peninsula of Gaspé should receive his attention.

Another point and I shall have concluded. Some years ago an old gentleman, a friend of the Minister of Railways, named Paradis, was the owner of a sawmill in the vicinity of St. Joseph of Lévis, in front of Quebec. This old gentleman was very well off and very enterprising, and was engaged, as is the French Canadian custom, in raising a large family. He was mayor of his parish, warden of the county, and had once or twice been offered the Conservative nomination, but had declined because of business reasons.

One night a train passed his property and some sparks were emitted from the engine which destroyed the property, razing it completely. Between the evening and the morning this old patriot was completely ruined. He came to Ottawa and a commissioner was appointed to investigate the cause of the fire. Mr. Justice Audette, who was not then, I believe, in the Exchequer Court, was appointed commissioner. He made a report which I read two or three years ago, and he found that the fire had been caused by the sparks from a locomotive belonging to the Intercolonial Railway; indeed, he specified the hour of the night and gave the number of the locomotive. It was proven beyond the shadow of a doubt that the department was responsible. Now this old gentleman is very persistent I must say; he belongs to the Norman race.

Mr. J. D. REID: No doubt about that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He would not yield very easily. He is now eighty years old. The fire occurred eight or ten years ago. My hon. friend, I must say in good faith, after having listened to him, after having read the evidence and the report, offered him, I believe, $10,000. First, he was offered nothing, as usual, not by my hon. friend, but by his predecessor in office. Then he was offered, I think, $5,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: It was $10,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The old gentleman refused it. And this year, I am informed, my hon. friend, honest as he is, offered the old gentleman $20,000. The old man has again refused; he is more persistent than I am, because I think I would have accepted the $20,000. But his persistency shows the good faith and honesty of this old gentleman. He has been waiting all these years. It seems to me that my hon. friend should not wait until this venerable man goes down to his grave before a settlement is arrived at. And I hope that the Minister of Railways and Canals will see to it that a fair settlement is made and that the old man can return to Levis and live happy until the Lord calls him to his bosom. I leave it at that, expecting my hon. friend to settle this case as soon as possible.

Mr. J. D. REID: With reference to the first matter the hon. member mentioned.

Of course, the Gaspé railroad is operating and has not asked us for any assistance. I agree that after the war, when the proper times comes, we should look into the question of acquiring that road. I have been at Gaspé and know the locality. It is certainly an industrious place. I will take up the question when the opportune time arrives. With reference to the case of Mr. Paradis, as the hon. member has stated, this gentleman is very persistent. When I first had to do with this case, my predecessor had offered him $10,000. Mr. Paradis came along and I raised it to $12,500. Last year, when he was at me again, I raised it to $15,000. This year he came to Ottawa within the last two or three weeks, and I was willing to submit $17,000 or $17,500.

Mr. CARVELL: The cost of living is going up.

Mr. J. D. REID: However, I feel that it is a claim—

Mr. LEMIEUX: An equitable claim.

Mr. J. D. REID:—and it should be dealt with. But really the amount asked for by the old gentleman every time is so high that it is almost an impossibility to come down to any reasonable amount.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is his last offer?

Mr. J. D. REID: I think that $76,000 was what he asked me the other day.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Of course, he had a splendid property.

Mr. J. D. REID: I admit that he had a good property. I proposed to him the other day that I would submit this matter to a subcommittee of council, and consider it with some of my colleagues when we had time to go into the whole matter.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What does he say to that?

Mr. J. D. REID: He went away perfectly satisfied. It was an impossibility to deal with it before the session closed, so I told him that I would bring it before a committee of council and go thoroughly into the matter so that I could explain it to council, and then we would come to a conclusion as to what we thought was fair and just.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will you let me select the subcommittee?

Mr. MORPHY: How many acres is the old gentleman working, and what buildings were burned?

Mr. LEMIEUX: He was in the lumber business.

Mr. J. D. REID: The claim is for a very large sawmill, and a very, very large quantity of lumber. He claims that $45,000 represents the loss, and he has added interest at compound rates during the ten years or so. There is no doubt at all that Mr. Paradis lost at that time equal to about $45,000.

Mr. MORPHY: Why did the previous Government not adjust it?

Mr. J. D. REID: I think according to the law he could hardly claim it. It is hard to prove that the fire originated from a spark from an engine which passed at the time. A train passed through his property half an hour before the fire, and he could not prove that the fire was caused by a spark from the engine.

Mr. MORPHY: What did the commissioner find?

Mr. J. D. REID: He found that the fire was caused by a spark from the engine.

Mr. MORPHY: What did he find the loss was?

Mr. J. D. REID: He was not asked to bring in a statement as to the amount. If I remember correctly the commissioner was simply asked to report whether the fire was caused by a spark from the engine and it was to be left to the department to decide what amount they should pay. That is the way the case has remained ever since.

Mr. CARVELL: Perhaps I might explain. As the law stood at the time of the fire, under the Government Railways Act, the Intercolonial was not responsible unless the fire originated on the right of way and extended to the property destroyed. About two months, I believe, after this loss occurred, the law was changed to bring it into conformity with the general law of Canada. My hon. friend will probably remember that there was a case in Ontario between the Grand Trunk and another party whose name I have forgotten, which went through the courts, and in which it was held that the railway company was responsible. About two months afterwards, following out the decision in that case, the law was changed so far as the Government railways were concerned. Had that fire taken place two or three months later than it did, there would have been no question whatever about the old man's right to recover.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: In looking over the items for public works and improvements, I find that no amount has been provided for the works in Quebec city, although we are asked to provide many millions for works in different parts of the country. It has been said that the works in Quebec as well as other works throughout the country should not be proceeded with during the war. But surely some of the important works in Quebec city should be proceeded with. An agreement was made between the Federal Government and the city of Quebec in August, 1910, under which the city of Quebec handed over to the Government a property valued at over $2,000,000 in connection with the works in that city. I submit that these works are urgent and essential, in the interest not only of the city and the province of Quebec but of the whole of Canada as well. Large sums of money have already been spent on the terminals in Quebec for equipment of the Transcontinental and for the building of the Transcontinental shops. These shops have now been finished nearly two years, but are lying idle. Some time ago I learned with pleasure that the Government had decided to give contracts for the supplying of 7,500 cars for the Transcontinental railway. I hoped at that time that some of these cars would be built in the Transcontinental shops at Quebec, which were designed for the purpose of doing such work. But all the contracts were given outside; nothing was provided for Quebec. The citizens of Quebec and the board of trade of that city have sent many requests to the Government in this matter during the last few years, but nothing has been done. We had the pleasure of having in our city in October, 1913, the Prime Minister and his colleagues, Mr. Cochrane, Mr. Pelletier, Mr. Rogers and Mr. Hazen, who all conceded that these works were of great importance and should be proceeded with at once. On that occasion the Prime Minister laid the cornerstone of the St. Malo shops and of the works on the St. Charles river, and visited other important works. But all these works have been stopped and nothing is provided in the Estimates for their continuation. The city of Quebec is not asking for any favour. We are simply asking the Government to give that portion of the country its rights and to carry out the agreement made. At least a reasonable amount should be placed in the Supplementary Estimates to carry out some of the works, to provide equipment for the Transcontinental Railway at Quebec, to proceed with the terminal works, in order that the Transcontinental may take care of the great traffic from the West which should pass through Quebec. It is well known that two-thirds of the grain from the West is now shipped through United States ports instead of through Quebec or other Canadian ports, because of lack of proper terminal and other Canadian ports, because of lack of proper terminal and other accommodation. I ask the Minister of Railways to look into this matter and see that justice is done to the city of Quebec.

Mr. J. D. REID: I realize that the St. Malo shops would be much better if we had them working, but I could not see my way clear, under present war conditions, to spend a lot of money on these shops at this time when the work could be satisfactorily done in many other places. Matters in connection with railways at Quebec will have to be taken up and dealt with now that we have taken over the Canadian Northern Railway system. I have not had an opportunity yet of looking over the matter, but I shall be in Quebec within the next four weeks and will look into the whole situation there with a view to seeing what should be done in the interests of the railways as a whole.

Mr. PARENT: I congratulate the hon. member for Quebec County (Mr. Lavigueur) for having directed the attention of the committee to the needs of the city of Quebec, especially so far as the Transcontinental railway is concerned. It is stated in the report of the Department of Railways and Canals for the fiscal year 1916-7 that part of the line between Moncton and Winnipeg has been productive of good results.

The only thing for which I am sorry is that this report does not indicate which part of the line has the best showing. It does not show what that part of the line between Moncton and Quebec has been earning, or what the part of the line between Quebec and Winnipeg has been earning. The report says that the working expenses amounted to $7,206,922.20, and the gross earnings to $5,916,550.99, leaving a deficit of $1,290,371.21. If we take into consideration the remarks which have recently been made by the Prime Minister to the effect that most of the railways in Canada have been working under very unfavourable circumstances, due to war conditions, material and equipment of railways having doubled in price, the result obtained by that part of the Transcontinental is, after all, a pretty fair one. Fortunately, what the report does not contain has been obtained from the minister in answer to a question put to him by the hon. member for Quebec county (Mr. Lavigueur), and I find that the revenue on the line from Quebec to Moncton is $1,538,764, and the revenue on the line from Quebec to Winnipeg is $4,226,018.

Mr. J. D. REID: It cost about twice as much as that to operate it. There is a big loss.

Mr. PARENT: Some years ago I had a seat in this House when the question of the Transcontinental was very much debated, and there was a good deal of opposition to that part of the line from hon. gentlemen who were, at that time, sitting on the opposition side of the House. Remarks were made in particular to this effect, that the line running through the northern part of the province from Quebec to Cochrane would never prove a paying proposition. Since that line has been built it has opened up a very wealthy part of the province of Quebec, where thousands and thousands of settlers have already established themselves and where immense wealth in the way of pulpwood lies ready for the market. If this line has not brought better results, I think the minister will probably find that the reason is that the equipment is not sufficient to take care of all the traffic coming from that part of the country. The settlers of the Abitibi region have complained over and over again that it is impossible for them to ship their pulpwood. All along the line from La Reine, Amos, and the different settlements in that district, thousands and thousands of cords of wood are lying, unable to be shipped. If we had had a little more equipment, much more revenue could have been derived from that road. The revenue obtained by the road has been obtained without the railway having had an opportunity to meet either of the two purposes for which it was built. These purposes were, first, to decrease the cost of freight on wheat from the West, and secondly, to ensure ocean freight for our Canadian ports. Has this been obtained? I say without the slightest hesitation, no. The figures in regard to exports have not been given by my hon. friend from Quebec county, but I have a few here which I want to place upon Hansard. The exports of grain from Fort William and Port Arthur are as follows:

	To Canadian Ports. Bushels.	To United States Ports. Bushels.
For the twelve months ending December 31, 1914..	91,000,000	138,000,000
For the twelve months ending December 31, 1915..	88,000,000	117,000,000
For the twelve months ending 1st September, 1916.. 138,000,000		193,000,000

How is it that the line in question has not been equipped so that the grain of the West could have been shipped through Canadian ports? In my opinion, the Government which came into power in 1911 deliberately conducted matters so as to discredit this line against which they have always had a grudge, and they did not take steps to equip properly this part of the road, in order that the grain might be diverted to United States ports to the detriment of Canadian ports. Of the ports of Halifax, St. John and Quebec, the one that has most reason to complain is Quebec. We have year after year had promises from different Governments, and every time that the matter seemed to be about to come to a head, a change of Government occurred, and the new Administration immediately upset all the doings of the previous Administration. In 1911, the whole situation in Quebec was very clear and well prepared for the future of the city, when suddenly the Liberal Government went out of power and the new Government that took office afterwards changed the whole situation. We have that instanced especially in the case of the Transcontinental terminals at Quebec. As my hon. friend (Mr. Lavigueur), who is the mayor of Quebec, stated a few minutes ago, the city of Quebec in 1911 entered into a contract with the Government of Canada by which a beautiful property situated on the St. Lawrence front, a property which was valued at least $2,000,000, was handed over to the Transcontinental Commission for the very modest sum of $100,000, on the condition that the Government would spend in the city of Quebec a sum of not less than $2,000,000 in the way of repair shops and other equipment. The engineers of the Government and the engineers of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, which was vitally interested in the project, had given their consent to all those proposed improvements. They had decided that the shops of the Transcontinental would be on the heights of St. Foy. The land had already been prepared; a roundhouse had already been constructed; everything was settled; when suddenly in 1911 the Liberal Government went out of power and the Conservatives took office. At once the agreement entered into between the city of Quebec and the Transcontinental Commission was thrown aside. The whole project was changed and the shops were diverted from St. Foy to St. Malo, six miles from the main line. I am not complaining about the shops being at St. Malo, although the wisdom of that is disputed, but as they have been built there, the least we can expect from the Government is that the shops shall not remain idle. The shops were erected two years ago, yet they have no machinery in them yet. I say the shops should be working for the benefit of the Transcontinental Railway. The Prime Minister stated in a speech delivered in the city of Quebec in 1913—at which time the present Minister of Railways was in the Cabinet—that the shops would be of benefit to the Transcontinental and the city of Quebec. The only thing that was required to be done, he said, was to build a tunnel from the St. Lawrence water front through the mountain in order to reach the St. Malo shops. In order that there may be no doubt as to what the Prime Minister said at that time, I quote his actual words:

> The site originally selected at St. Foy will nevertheless be utilized in the first instance for a large through freight yard which is necessary at that point in order to provide for the distribution of cars on different roads. Moreover, a large handsome station has been completed at St. Foy as well as an eighteen stall engine house and every building necessary for the efficient operation of the railway. Between the Quebec Bridge and the Champlain Market a double track has practically been completed. There is also a connection with the Canadian Northern Railway at Cap Rouge, which permits entrance to the St. Charles side of the city, and which can be utilized for this purpose pending the completion of the tunnel that will connect the St. Lawrence waterfront with the new Union Station on the Palais site. While that tunnel is essential to the National Transcontinental railway for effective access to the Union Station and to the St. Charles side, it will be equally necessary to other great railway systems which will naturally require access to the great frontage terminal of the St. Lawrence.

The Prime Minister in those words pledged himself to the construction of a tunnel with a view to giving access to the St. Malo shops. I would ask any member who wishes to satisfy himself whether the pledge of the Prime Minister in this respect was carried out, to come to the city of Quebec and see conditions for himself. No tunnel has been built, and I venture to say that no tunnel ever will be built. I would urge the Minister of Railways to take a special interest in that matter, for there is no other city in Canada that would tolerate the situation that exists in Quebec at the present time. The shops are there without machinery and with no work for them to do; it is an intolerable situation. The minister can do what he likes with the shops. If he prefers to hand them over to the Canadian Pacific railway, which was apparently the intention in connection with all railway improvements in the city of Quebec, let him do so, and then we shall not have to complain, because the Canadian Pacific railway will use the shops.

Mr. CAHILL: I should like to ask a question as to the policy of the Government with regard to guarantees by the provinces. There was nothing in the Prime Minister's statement to indicate what action would be taken as between the provinces and the Dominion when the liabilities of the Canadian Northern railway were taken over. The province of Quebec comprises about one-quarter of the population of this country, and they have very little of the Canadian Northern liabilities either directly or indirectly, until the Government takes over the obligations of that road, and then, on a per capita basis, the province of Quebec would be liable to a quarter of the total obligations. The county I have the honour to represent built a road some years ago and gave a bonus, and is still paying a bonus, with something like $100,000 yet to run. They have now been saddled with an additional 15 per cent rate on their traffic; they are paying the bonus, and they will assume their part of the deficits when the obligations of the Canadian Northern are taken over. Now I think the Government should go into this whole question and determine what position the towns or counties or portions of a province that have bonused or are bonusing railroads will be in, what their relationship will be to the whole railway proposition, and in what relationship the provinces which have guaranteed bonds will stand to the Dominion as a whole. I hope it will not be adopted as the policy of the Government that they will assume all the liabilities of the different provinces that have been on a sort of spree in railroad building, to the detriment of other provinces that have not so many railroads. The province of Quebec, for instance, has only one mile of railway to every four hundred people. The Dominion as a whole has a mile to every two hundred people, and some of the western provinces have less than one hundred people to the mile. It would hardly be fair that the provinces should be relieved of all their obligations by way of guarantees unless it is the policy of the Government that when Quebec, for instance, or some other province, wishes to build a road they may guarantee bonds on the understanding that the Dominion Government will relieve them of the responsibility of their guarantee. Otherwise you will have, perhaps not the province of Quebec, but some other province, guaranteeing bonds in the future as in the past in the expectation that the Dominion Government will relieve them of the responsibility when it gets too heavy. I think that is a suggestion which should receive the serious consideration of the Government before developing in any way their railway policy.

Mr. J. D. REID: The Dominion Government must, of course, protect any securities that are against the Canadian Northern. As to the general policy of the Government the hon. gentleman cannot expect any announcement from me at the present time. When we sit down to consider the whole situation, questions of this kind will naturally arise, and during the recess we shall have time to consider them, and then at another session we shall be able to give more information on the whole situation. I would like to emphasize this point: When the Government takes over the stock it takes over the whole road and must assume any obligations that are against the Canadian Northern railway, and it will do that. If there are any claims against the Canadian Northern of any kind, they will have to be dealt with either by the courts, by negotiation, or by settlement if the accounts are fair and just. I do not think I could add anything to what the Prime Minister has said as to the general railway policy. We want to get a good board of directors, of able men, and lay the facts before them, and then the questions can be dealt with as they arise.

Mr. McKENZIE: I regret that the discussions we have on this side of the House seem to be regarded by hon. gentlemen on the other side only with Christian toleration. I see a somewhat amused and contemptuous smile on their faces when we talked about the Intercolonial and railway matters in the far East. I want to remind my hon. friends from Ontario and the West that they have no better customers in the world than the miners and steel workers of Cape Breton and the lumbermen of Nova Scotia, that their pork, beef, bacon, flour, farm implements and everything they manufacture goes down to these very excellent customers from whom they get their money and to whom they get their products by means of these railways. When we are discussing railways hon. gentlemen from the West and from Ontario must not suppose that we are discussing a matter in which they have no concern. We hear uneasy "hear, hears" about passing these items because they do not understand exactly the importance of the subjects that we are discussing. I congratulate the province of New Brunswick upon having a minister who looks after the interests of that province. I hope he will have some success in railway matters. I am sorry that in Nova Scotia it is left to an Opposition member like myself to say anything in the interest of that province. We have the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) but he is too busy, of course, to give any attention to such small details as the railway affairs of that province. We have the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) whose world affairs also are of such a character as to remove him from being concerned about such trifling matters as the accommodation of the people in the way of railway facilities. It, therefore, falls inevitably upon such men as the Opposition members, who have no very great power with the present Government, to get such votes and such considerations as are necessary for railway development in Nova Scotia.

We are now developing largely as railway owners in our country and the management and working of railways is a matter that every member should know something about. It is getting to be important. The minister tells us that we have something like 4,000 miles of road apart from the Canadian Northern railway.

Mr. J. D. REID: That is right.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is important for the people that we should have some conception of what we are doing. If this were a meeting of directors it would not be a very cheerful one. The directors and shareholders would have discovered that we were spending away up in the millions in the development and working of the road but that we have made no money. We are in debt. If we were ordinary directors and shareholders of a road we would have to put our hands down in our pockets to find money in order to make betterments and to run the road, and that would not be a cheerful prospect. However we are new beginners in this enterprise. I was never in favour of Government ownership; I am not in favour of it now; as I think private enterprise will do better in these matters. Particularly in colonization and development, will private enterprise and private energy do much better than Government ownership. But, by the force of circumstances, we are in this net and we must stay in it and make the most of it—that is the way I view it. While a great railway like the Canadian Pacific is being conducted privately we have something to compare our works with. It would be interesting for myself as a citizen of Canada and a member of this House to know how our expenses per mile of operation, for merely running the road, compare with the expenses of the Canadian Pacific. It would be interesting to know how our expenses for betterments, for keeping the road in repair, for rolling stock and all other requirements, compare with those of the Canadian Pacific. Everybody admits that their road is well managed and that it is well equipped. It is making money. It is in the same country side by side with ours, and there is no reason why we should not have just as brainy and as capable men to run our road as they have. I would expect the Minister of Railways to come to this House and make a favourable comparison between his railway and the privately owned line and to be able to show that he is making money. There is no reason why the Canadian people should not "make one hand wash the other," or should keep in debt to the extent we are in debt this year. Of course, we are new beginners and we have to pay for our experience. I do not wish to say anything disagreeable to the minister about the operations of this year. But I must say, in justice to the county and to the part of the province I represent, that we are not treated properly in railway development. We have heard about bad railways, poor railways, narrow gauges and roads which are not properly equipped. That is bad enough and it is to be hoped that something will be done to better that condition. But I come from an old county, the county in which the famous discoverer landed some three or four hundred years ago—Cabot is supposed to have landed in Victoria. We have had settlers in that county since then, but we have never had a mile of railway. My settlers and my people are 100 to 120 miles away from any railway. That is the condition—not a bad railway, which is bad enough, but no railway at all, which is worse. We thought that in 1911 we had the whole thing in our fist, that we were all ready to start building the road: The very first item that the minister mentioned to-night in connection with Nova Scotia reminded me of our old conditions. In 1911, the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government and myself were pulling in the same boat, happy friends. I had my railway and he had his. I helped him. He was then in Opposition. He got money for his railway and I got money for mine. The change of Government took place. The Prime Minister went on and built his railway, but he threw me to the wolves—myself and my railway. I do not think that was very fair comradeship or companionship. I have often chaffed him about it since, but he does not answer, and there is no answer for it at all. The money was voted for my railroad in the county of Victoria, just as it has been for the Dartmouth and Dean branch. But I was not prime minister, and the road in Victoria county was not built. The Prime Minister had the power to secure money for a very much poorer section of the country than is to be found in the county of Victoria. I was told at the time by the then Minister of Railways that something would be done. I moved a resolution in the House that the time had arrived when the non-railway counties in Eastern Canada should be provided with railways. That resolution was accepted, and is to be found embodied in the records. I have been keeping quiet since, but nothing has been done, and, to my surprise and consternation, a couple of years ago six or seven millions of money was invested in a new railway enterprise altogether—in the Quebec and Saguenay railway—and in a new part of the country. What justification was there to pass over Victoria county, where the enterprise was right in hand, and to undertake a project in a new county as to which nothing had been said about the need of railways at all, and spend this money as it has been spent, more especially in view of the fact that in the district referred to a railway is not needed half as badly as it is in my constituency? I think I have reason to complain that we have not been properly treated. We have a magnificent country in North Victoria, where there is the finest of fishing, and splendid agricultural land—in fact, everything that is necessary to make of it a great and prosperous district—but we have no railway accommodation, although every other part of Canada seems to be getting what it requires for development and receiving proper attention. While I do not hope for very much from anything I say to-night, I would not be doing my duty to my county if I did not once more impress upon the minister that we have been neglected. The minister remembers well that I am not talking of something which occurred since our party has been in opposition. He remembers well that I kept pounding away at the former Government, of which I was a supporter, until I got them to agree to the building of this railway, and also that I assisted in getting them to agree to build the Guysborough road and the Dean Settlement road. But the present Prime Minister got his own railway built, and threw the hon. member for Guysborough and myself, as I said before, to the wolves. I do not wish to pursue the subject any further, except to say that when we from Nova Scotia occupy time in talking about the Intercolonial and railway matters we have nothing to apologize for. There is one constituent of mine who pays $350,000 to $400,000 to the Government railways. If the minister will look into the freight accounts of the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, he will find that one concern pays something like half a million of money into the coffers of this railway, in addition to the large sums paid by other very excellent customers of the railway in that part of the country.

Now, there are a few other local matters that I wish to bring to the attention of the minister. Last year I spoke about our station at North Sydney. That is where the Newfoundland traffic is handled, as the minister knows. The trade with Newfoundland during the summer time, when the steamships on that route are able to run, is simply enormous. An immense number of passengers travel by that route, and there is a large amount of freight carried, and the money that goes into the coffers of the Government railway from the terminus at North Sydney must be very large indeed. Unfortunately, the station at North Sydney is a very small one, containing only one small room, and is not at all fit to accommodate the traffic of which I have spoken. I wish to impress upon the minister—and he will remember that I spoke to him last year upon the same subject—the necessity of providing better accommodation for the public. The existing traffic will amply justify whatever expenditure may be involved in making the accommodation more adequate. The minister will find, if he makes inquiry, that there are no modern facilities at the station for the needs of the public. The station is but a little bit of a place for a town of the size of North Sydney, and especially in view of the immense traffic which passes through it. As the member for that constituency, I have often felt ashamed that we did not have better accommodation.

The minister will also recall the fact that I have brought to his attention two or three times the need for better facilities at a place called McInnes' Harbour. In spite of the poor accommodation the man in charge has to stay there all the time, and I am sure that if the minister could see the place he would realize that it is not at all suitable. Accommodation for passengers is also lacking, and yet this is one of the places in the district which pays the road well.

I also spoke to the minister last year about the need of proper facilities for handling freight at a place called Christmas Island. At that point there is a large amount of freight, but no person to handle it, and no proper station house, and yet the traffic is one that pays well. I sincerely hope that the minister will give some attention to these matters to which I have drawn his attention. I am talking at a rather unseemly hour, owing to giving way to other hon. gentlemen who had representations to make, but I can assure the minister that I am very much in earnest in urging upon him the imperative necessity of meeting the needs of the people whom I represent. The fact of this being war time compels me to be brief, otherwise I would assure the minister that it would take him three weeks or more to get his estimates through the House.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member has acted rightly in bringing these matters to the attention of the committee, because they are now on record, and it will afford me an opportunity of looking into them thoroughly. I want to assure the hon. gentleman that since I have been administering this department I have been anxious to take the necessary time to make a trip over the Intercolonial railway and look into all such matters as he has spoken of from one end of the road to the other. Perhaps it was hardly fair on my part not to have carried out that intention before, but owing to Parliament being in session, it has so far been an impossibility. However, I have made my plans to take a trip over the Intercolonial, which will include a visit to Sydney. I wish to go to Sydney to see the works there, and also to visit other parts of Nova Scotia, which, as yet, I have not had an opportunity of seeing. When I go to Sydney I will discuss matters with the hon. gentleman and come to some conclusion with respect to some of the things he has mentioned, as well as any other points which need to be dealt with. If there are things that are really necessary, notwithstanding the fact, that this is war time, I will take them up and give them my best consideration. It is only the prevailing war conditions which prevent the Government from doing many things that we would like to do. However, the hon. member knows the situation as well as I do, and the difficulties which confront us. Nevertheless I am glad that the hon. member has ventilated these matters this evening, and I repeat that when I am in Sydney I will look into the whole situation. I shall be very glad then to discuss each and every matter that he may bring forward, and endeavour to determine exactly what we should do under the existing conditions.

Mr. PARENT: Does the item of $1,600,000 for the Quebec bridge include the amount of $1,000,000 supposed to be paid as a bonus to the St. Lawrence Bridge Company.

Mr. J. D. REID: It is only the amount to be paid to the contractor, the St. Lawrence Bridge Company, for building the bridge. No bonuses, other than building the bridge.

Mr. PARENT: I suppose my hon. friend remembers that there was a bonus of $1,000,000 to be paid to the contractor if the bridge stood up. Has that $1,000,000 been paid?

Mr. J. D. REID: No. This is simply to return the deposit and any little bills the Bridge Company has.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES FOR 1917-18.

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting Supplementary Estimates for the year ending March 31, 1918, was presented by Hon. A. K. Maclean (Acting Minister of Finance) read by Mr. Deputy Speaker to the House and referred to the Committee of Supply.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are these all the Supplementary Estimates?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They are the Supplementaries for the past fiscal year. The Supplementary Estimates for the current year will be submitted possibly tomorrow.

On the motion of Hon. J. D. Reid the House adjourned at 12.32 a.m., Saturday.

Saturday, May 18, 1918.

The House met at Eleven o'clock.

THE YUKON ELECTION.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery the original order of the result of the recount for the Electoral District of the Yukon Territory.

THE ALLIED FORCES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Lotbinière): I wish to draw the attention of the Government to this article which was published in the Montreal Star of yesterday, and which is entitled: "America will not agree to replace released troops":

> The War Department has declined to accede to French proposals whereby some of the French army would be released for agriculture or industries and be replaced at the front by United States troops. This was learned to-day to be the outcome of recent discussions of man-power.
> The Government feels that both France and Britain should increase, rather than diminish, their military forces and that they should not expect the United States to furnish soldiers to release Allied soldiers for industry.
> The recent revelations in the Maurice-Lloyd George controversy spell to Government authorities the significant fact that Britain had not radically increased her army in the past year. They believe she should have done so, and they think she and France should prepare to make further increases while the United States proceeds with its increase in overseas shipments.
> War Department plans contemplate getting 1,500,000 to 2,000,000 men overseas this year. But it is pointed out that in time the American shipments are likely not to exceed replacement needs.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member to summarize the article instead of reading it in its entirety, and then put his question.

Mr. VIEN: Just two lines more and I have finished.

> Hence, when the United States army reaches 2,000,000, it is likely not to go beyond that figure for some time, unless shipping facilities are much extended.

I wish to ask the Government whether they have any information as to the accuracy of this statement.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have no official information on the subject, except, of course, we have official information that the various classes in Great Britain have been combed and recombed over and over again in the desire to put into the fighting line every available man. We have been informed that that has been done to the extent of most seriously interfering with a great many highly important industries of Great Britain.

CORRECTION.—MR. RICHARDSON.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Springfield): I should like to call the attention of the House to an extract from an article published in the Daily Ontarion, Belleville, under date of Thursday, May 16. The article quotes an extract from Hansard in connection with the Bill respecting the Belleville-Prince Edward Bridge Company, to which my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) called attention. The article which is under the heading, "Who supplied the misinformation," contains the following extract from Hansard:

> Mr. Lemieux: Was Mr. Parliament, the local member for Prince Edward, a party to the arrangement?
> Mr. Richardson: He was a party to it.
> Mr. Lemieux: Did he accept the tolls agreed upon, and also the price?
> Mr. Richardson: He did.
> Mr. Lemieux: And the new conditions?
> Mr. Richardson: He accepted the price and the tolls. The ex-reeve of the municipality was also present and also agreed that the tolls were reasonable.
> Mr. Lemieux: Then the objecting parties were satisfied?
> Mr. Richardson: Yes.

The mistake that happened was this. There was some noise in the House, and when my hon. friend from Maisonneuve asked the question whether Mr. Parliament was a party to the matter, I thought he said "Mr. Porter," the hon. member for West Hastings, who asked me to take charge of the Bill during his absence while attending the assizes in his county. I regret to confess my ignorance, but I did not know that such a gentleman as Mr. Parliament existed, and thinking that my hon. friend said "Mr. Porter," I said, "yes." I do not know Mr. Parliament at all, and I wish to make this explanation in justice to him.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): I am very glad for the explanation given by my hon. friend from Springfield, because the day before yesterday I received a telegram from Mr. Parliament denying the statement made by the hon. gentleman, but I knew that a misunderstanding had occurred.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I see, according to the newspapers, he does deny it. There was another little inaccuracy. I stated that the matter had been submitted to the "Ontario" Government and that the Ontario Government had agreed to give assistance, but I find that the Hansard report says the "Imperial Government." It is easily understood that is an error.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is an obvious misprint.

CONNAUGHT RIFLE RANGE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GEORGE BOYCE (Carleton): A few days ago I placed a question on the Order Paper, and I thought that the answer I received was rather peculiar. Am I in order in saying a few words with regard to that.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may ask a question, but it is not in order to enter into a discussion. If the hon. member will put a question, he will be in order.

Mr. BOYCE: There were several questions. The first question was:

> What are the names of the parties who have Connaught Rifle Range rented for pasturing cattle?

The answer was:

> Robert Richardson.

The reason I asked the question was because I thought it was beneath the dignity of this country to turn this rifle range into a cattle ranch. The next question was:

> What is the amount paid for rent?

And the answer was:

> $925 per annum.

In answer to my question as to the duty of Mr. Holbrook, who lives on the range, I was told that he is caretaker and receives $90 per month, with free house and grounds. What struck me as very curious was that it should take $1,080 to collect $925. There must surely be something wrong.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is now proceeding to enter into an argument, and he is, therefore, not in order.

Mr. BOYCE: Am I called to order?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may put a supplemental question on the Order Paper and get his answer in that way.

Mr. BOYCE: There will not be time.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should proceed in the usual way and put a supplemental question on the Order Paper.

Mr. BOYCE: I do not want to be called to order, because I have not spoken very often.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member will have various opportunities, on going into Supply, or in Supply, to go into the matter at length. He is not in order in proceeding as he is doing now.

Mr. BOYCE: I shall just make one reply.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

FARMERS' DELEGATION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Lotbinière): Has the Prime Minister been handed a certain communication which was addressed to His Excellency the Governor General regarding the last convention of farmers held at Ottawa?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I understood it was to be referred to me, but it has not yet arrived so far as I am aware.

Mr. VIEN: Will the Prime Minister lay it on the Table when he receives it?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will make any necessary announcement in that regard at a later date.

HALIFAX RELIEF COMMISSION.

On the motion of Sir Robert Borden (Prime Minister), Bill No. 97, respecting the Halifax Relief Commission, was read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Act of Nova Scotia ratified:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The purpose of this Bill is merely to confirm an Act of the legislature of the province of Nova Scotia conferring certain powers on the Halifax Relief Commission, and also to provide that the accounts of the commission shall be audited by such persons as the Governor in Council may appoint on the recommendation of the Auditor General of Canada. The provincial Act conferred upon the Halifax Relief Commission power to make certain alterations in the streets of the city. My right hon. friend, who knows the city fairly well, will recollect that in the north end the streets run directly up a very steep hill from the water. It is proposed that as that district has been completely devastated, the commission shall have power to run certain of the main arteries of the city diagonally along the hill so as to secure a much better grade, and that for that purpose they shall have power to acquire or expropriate the land that is necessary for making these alterations. Those are the principal features of the Bill. The provincial Act confers upon the Halifax Relief Commission certain powers which could not properly, in the first instance at least, be conferred by this Parliament.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: As I understand the explanation of the Prime Minister, this Bill is simply to confirm, so far as our confirmation may be necessary, an Act passed by the legislature of Nova Scotia.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: And to provide that the accounts of the commission shall be audited.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When a decision has been reached by the Commission, which I do not at all criticise, will it be submitted to the Council?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Oh, yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I see by the newspapers that the Commission intend to do some modern town planning in Halifax, something which very generally occurs after a big fire in a large city. For instance, some years ago a fire destroyed the city of Trois Rivières, which is possibly one of the oldest cities in Canada. After the fire the city authorities decided to remodel the town plan and to have modern improvements, which have been of great benefit to the city itself. I suppose the Halifax Relief Commission will do something of the same kind. If so, a large expenditure will be involved, and I should like to know whether the Commission, which we can trust to act honestly and intelligently, will submit the proposed expenditure to the Governor in Council. Will Council have the final say before the expenditure is made?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Commission have always reported to the Governor in Council before taking any step that involves a considerable expenditure. One of their reports, which has been confirmed by Order in Council, was laid on the table of the House early in the session. Before proceeding further along the line which I have just indicated, the Chairman of the Commission came to Ottawa and made an oral statement to Council, in which he outlined certain proposals, and this will be followed later by a written report. As to expropriating the land, the opinion of the Commission is that very little expenditure will be occasioned; that is to say, the land acquired will pretty nearly, if not altogether, compensate for the land that requires to be expropriated. As far as town planning is concerned, if it is carried out under the direction of the Commission so that buildings and the material and labour for buildings can be contracted for on a large scale, it is believed the work can be done with much less expenditure than if it were undertaken by individuals. Furthermore, the improvement in the appearance of the town and the comfort of the people will be very decidedly enhanced.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If I might touch on a subject which is germane to the matter under discussion, I would ask my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if his department, after the revelations that were made at the investigation into the Halifax disaster, has taken drastic measures to prevent similar accidents in the future. I am told that the Halifax Pilotage Commission managed its business very badly, and that the minister has received reports tending to show that only by a miracle have similar accidents been averted before. As we are going to spend a very large sum of money to repair the damage that was done, and Canada will willingly bear this expenditure, yet, may we expect that the Department of Marine and Fisheries will exercise proper supervision over the pilotage system in the harbour of Halifax?

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine and Naval Service): I am very glad to give that information. The commission appointed some months ago made a very thorough investigation into the pilotage system at the port of Halifax, and I thought hon. members were all aware that after the report of that commission which I promptly laid on the table of the House, the pilotage system of Halifax was taken directly under the control of my department, bringing Halifax into exactly the same position in that respect, as the ports of Montreal and Quebec. I have appointed a very capable man as superintendent of the Halifax pilotage system in the person of Captain Lindsay, who has had very many years of seafaring experience and holds a master mariner's certificate. For a great number of years he had charge of some of the largest ocean-going steamers of the White Star line, and is most competent in every way. He has direct charge of the pilots of the port of Halifax, and he reports to the Department of Marine and Fisheries. The commission which is investigating the pilotage systems in this country is now on its way to the Pacific coast, where it will thoroughly investigate the system in vogue at Vancouver, Victoria and Nanaimo harbours, and if the commission reports in favour of placing the pilotage systems at these ports under a superintendent of pilots, as is now the case in Montreal, Quebec and Halifax, I can assure my hon. friend I shall see that that is done.

In regard to the handling of high explosives in the port of Montreal, I informed the hon. member some months ago that I had taken immediate steps to see that all high explosives were loaded many miles east of Montreal. Special sheds have already been constructed at that point and high explosives will be safeguarded in every possible way so as to avoid the recurrence of such a terrible catastrophe as occurred in Halifax. I have had drawn up stringent regulations, governing not only the handling of these high explosives at Pointe aux Trembles east of Montreal, but also the movement of munitions ships coming in and going out of the port of Montreal and while in the channel between Montreal to Quebec. These regulations are now in force and I can assure the hon. member that every precaution is being taken.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am very well satisfied with the explanation given by my hon. friend with the rider that he has ingeniously shifted the explosives from Montreal, where he resides and which he represents, partly to my own constituency of Maisonneuve. I do not know why these explosives should be shifted to Maisonneuve. At all events, I have full confidence in my hon. friend's regulations and I hope that extra precautions will be taken to safeguard the Pointe aux Trembles and Longue Pointe people against any possible accident. Since the castastrophe at Halifax I have heard any number of people in Montreal expressing their fear that a similar accident might happen on the island of Montreal, but I am satisfied that the regulations enacted by my hon. friend will prevent that.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: My hon. friend knows the location of the port of Montreal very well. I would not want him or any citizen of Maisonneuve to think that any high explosives are going to be loaded there. They are going to be loaded four or five miles below.

Bill reported.

On the motion for the third reading.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I forgot to ask my right hon. friend the Prime Minister if any limit was put on the amount to be expended at Halifax.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes. So far as this Government is concerned, there is a limit fixed by Order in Council. The sum amounts altogether to $12,000,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What was received from the various provinces and states? I understand there were large subscriptions made.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Speaking from recollection—I will not be sure of this—the total amount is in the neighbourhood of $20,000,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And these moneys are administered by this commission?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: By this commission.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the third time.

INSPECTION AND SALE ACT.

AMENDMENTS MADE BY THE SENATE.

On the motion of Sir George Foster (Minister of Trade and Commerce) that the amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 20, to amend the Inspection and Sale Act (Hay and Straw Inspection), be concurred in:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What are the amendments, please?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The first amendment made was in section 340, adding two standards for dyke hay. That was particularly for the Maritime Provinces. There was no such standard provided for in the Bill as it passed this House. On representations which were made from the growers of dyke and marsh hay in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, two standards for dyke hay were established, as follows:

(h) No. 1 Dyke shall be timothy and couch with not more than one-eighth of clover or other tame grasses mixed;

(i) No. 2 Dyke shall be timothy and couch with not more than one-third of clover or other tame grasses mixed, of fair colour, sound and well cured.

In the same section, in paragraph (i), the word "or" has been placed between the words "grassy" and "stained," so as to make it read "grassy or stained." In consequence of the addition of (h) and (i) in reference to dyke hay, there is a change in the lettering of the different subsections. After section 340E there has been added section 340F, which provides that:

"340F. Every seller of baled hay or straw in Canada shall affix to every bale of hay or straw sold or offered for sale, a tag having thereon plainly written and ligible, his name and business address, and the weight of the bale. Such tag shall be securely fastened to the bale and shall be of not less than one and one-half inches in width and three inches in length.

A penalty of $5 for each violation of this provision is attached.

Amendments concurred in.

SUPREME COURT ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of the Hon. C. J. Doherty, (Minister of Justice), Bill No. 99, to amend the Act of the present session intituled: an Act to amend the Supreme Court Act, was read a second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the chair.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the minister explain the purpose of this Bill?

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): The Committee will recollect that during the present session we passed an Act to amend the Supreme Court Act, and one of the provisions of that Act made applicable to the other provinces the restrictions upon the right of appeal contained in the Supreme Court Act with regard to the province of Ontario. After the Act had been passed, the suggestion came from some of the judiciary in the province of Nova Scotia, that it would deprive the parties in certain pending cases of the right of appeal; and the purpose of the present Bill is to add to the Act which recently passed, a provision that the particular section in question shall not apply to pending cases. I rather think that the weight of authority in jurisprudence leads to the belief that this provision is not necessary, and that the Act would not apply to pending cases in any event, but there can be no harm done in making quite clear that such is the intention of Parliament. I think it would be obviously unfair to deprive the man, whose action has already been instituted under a particular condition of the law, of a recourse to which he was entitled before he instituted his suit.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Since the appointment of ad hoc judges has been authorized by recent legislation, have any such judges sat in the Supreme Court?

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY: I must admit that I have not followed the sittings of the court, and I am not in a position to answer the question at present, but I will make inquiry and acquaint the hon. gentleman with the result.

Bill reported and read the third time.

CANADIAN PATRIOTIC FUND ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Doherty, Bill No. 98 (Letter V of the Senate) to amend the Canadian Patriotic Fund Act, 1914, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon.

On section 1—Objects of the corporation:

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the Minister of Justice explain the change made by this provision.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: The change consists simply in making it clear that the "residence" required, is residence on the part of the beneficiaries. Personally I have no doubt that the section as it stood meant residence on the part of beneficiaries, but from the way in which the phrase was constructed it was possible to suggest that the relatives residing anywhere, of a man who happened to be resident in Canada when he joined the forces, were entitled to the benefit of this fund. That is not what was intended, and that is not what was carried out, but as recently there has been a suggestion that that was what ought to have been done, it has been deemed desirable to make it perfectly clear that the fund is to be for the benefit of relatives of soldiers —wives, children, and so forth—resident in Canada.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not see the Acting Minister of Finance in his seat or my friend from St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) who is the chairman of the Patriotic Fund. I may say that the Canadian Patriotic Fund has accomplished wonders since the beginning of the war. To my own personal knowledge, the fund has extended its bounty, not only to the families in Canada, of our own soldiers, but also to the families of Belgian and French reservists. With these latter I am more especially concerned, because in Montreal I have had several interviews with members of such families, and the Patriotic Fund has always responded generously to the request for assistance made by them. The other day a question was mooted during the Budget debate by the hon. member for St. Antoine, and since then I have received a letter asking for my views as one of the incorporators of the Patriotic Fund—which possibly was sent all the other incorporators in Canada—regarding the future policy as to the Patriotic Fund. In other words, should the Patriotic Fund moneys be collected in future from the public, or should the Government inaugurate the imposition of a special tax upon the whole of the people of the Dominion for the purpose of maintaining this fund. I have answered unhesitatingly that after four years' experience of individual subscriptions, gathered from all parts of Canada, though it might be an excellent incentive to future generosity to depend upon the public, the Canadian Patriotic Fund was an organization which, in my opinion, should be supported by a special tax levied by the Canadian Government. It seems to me that it is only fair that the responsibility of caring for the families of our soldiers should be borne by the state.

It is not fair that a few individuals be specially singled out to subscribe and others ignored. Summing up my argument, I think that the levy of a special tax of one mill on the dollar for instance would be received with pleasure by the whole people of Canada. I know that many people in very ordinary circumstances have hesitated to subscribe because they thought their subscription was too modest, whilst the names of large subscribers were being paraded before the public. Every year a whirlwind campaign is organized in our large cities, and the names of the same large subscribers, with the amount of their contributions, are published. I do not say that our well-to-do people subscribe for the pleasure of parading their names before the public. Far be it from my mind to suggest such a thing. My contention is that it is not fair that only one class of the public should be publicly assessed for the maintenance of the Canadian Patriotic Fund. I hope the Government next session will accept as its policy the recommendation made this year by our colleague from St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames), the able chairman of the Canadian Patriotic Fund, and impose a special tax, small though it may be, to enable the whole of our people to share in the benevolent work accomplished by that fund. I do not make a special plea for the well-to-do classes or for the middle classes. But I cannot help stating that the people who are specially reached by the income tax and the business tax, and the various municipal and provincial taxes, are the same people who generally speaking, are providing funds for the Canadian Patriotic Fund. I must say too that the poorer classes have been very generous. They have subscribed anonymously and, after all, the anonymous subscription is perhaps the most worthy. I believe the country would be pleased to see a new policy inaugurated by which the fund would be maintained through a small taxation on the whole of the people. I was present in August, 1914, at the special meeting called by the then Governor General, His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught, when the Canadian Patriotic Fund was organized, and I have often thought of the remark made by the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) when his views were asked by His Royal Highness as to the method to be pursued in raising the moneys for that fund. Though the right hon. gentleman favoured the incorporation and organization of the Patriotic Fund, and though he said that the public, generally speaking, would respond magnificently to the requests made to replenish its coffers, yet he stated that before long there would be an urgent request on the part of the public that the assessments be levied generally by the state. The families of the soldiers are the care of the state, and it is its duty to see that they are maintained in proper comfort. I throw out these few remarks in the hope that the Government next session will adopt the views expressed by the chairman of the Canadian Patriotic Fund, and will adopt the wise policy of making the state responsible for the maintenance of the families of our soldiers who are in need.

Mr. MORPHY: May I have a word about this section? I quite agree with the principle enunciated by the last speaker, that the country at large should now take over the fund and provide for it. Looking at the meaning of this section, I am somewhat alarmed about it. I would like to ask the minister if I am to understand that the section means that the Patriotic Fund in future shall apply to the wife or family of every French reservist, every Italian reservist—

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, as it always has in the past.

Mr. MORPHY: —every Portuguese reservist—

Mr. DOHERTY: It will apply to the wife of every man who is fighting in the Allied armies—

Mr. MORPHY: —every Russian reservist—

Mr. DOHERTY: —if that wife is resident in Canada. And I may say it always has so applied.

Mr. MORPHY: I was not aware that it always had so applied. It seems to me that the Government should hesitate a little. This country will have enormous burdens to bear both through the Patriotic Fund and in every other way. I think Canada is pledging itself now quite prematurely, at least until we know the kind of immigration we will have. Are we to provide for every indigent of Europe, simply because of the fact that a soldier's wife happens to come here, probably sent here by the country in which she lives, to get rid of her, she probably not being the most desirable individual? The proposition staggers me. I do not think that legislation of this kind should go too fast. I would wait a bit. This matter can afford to wait. If the wife of every Italian soldier must be provided for by Canada, it will be an incentive to Italy to get rid of them and send them here and put them upon our fund. The same applies to those of every Allied force, including Russia. I speak full of patriotism, and in favour of this country doing what it can for our friends the allied nations.

This section might well stand until next session, when the future policy of the Government will be laid down and when Canada's needs in the matter of pensions will be better known. If the principle is laid down that the Patriotic Fund shall be paid to relatives of soldiers in any of the allied armies, how long will it be before pensions are paid on the same basis?

Mr. DOHERTY: The section that is being amended describes the objects of the association: to distribute among the wives, relatives and dependents resident in Canada of soldiers actually serving in the armies of the Allies. I do not pretend to give the exact wording, but there is no doubt that provision has reference to wives and relatives resident in Canada.

Mr. MORPHY: The amendment says, "who may become resident in Canada."

Mr. DOHERTY: "Resident in Canada" in the section as it stood was considered to apply to those resident in Canada not merely at the time the soldier went away, but also at the time the assistance was extended. This amendment is not creating an obligation on the part of the Patriotic Fund to pay money to every relative resident in Canada; it is simply conferring a power. It is true that if we created an obligation on the part of the fund to distribute its moneys among all relatives of soldiers in the allied forces who might come here, a flood of people might come to this country in order to obtain a share of that fund. But we are only defining the classes of persons to whom it is permissible to distribute the money of the Patriotic Fund. The hon. member suggested that some of those to whom money might be distributed might be most unworthy. I have no doubt that the administrators of the Patriotic Fund will not distribute their money to people of that kind. This amendment is sought by the administrators of the Patriotic Fund, and it is only to satisfy them that their understanding of the law is correct, and that it is permissible for them to give money to relatives resident in Canada of soldiers who themselves might not have been actually resident here when they enlisted.

12 noon. I do not think that we are exposed to the consequences which the hon. member suggests merely because we make quite clear what are the classes of persons to whom this money may be distributed.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Another provision in the Act of incorporation makes optional the giving of aid by the Patriotic Fund to any family. The organization is most elaborate. When a request is made by a family for aid, the Patriotic Fund at once sends a committee of two or three ladies to inquire into the circumstances of that family, and in many cases, for good reasons, aid is refused or delayed. Great care is taken to ensure that no aid is granted if it is not needed. The fund has been admirably administered in the district of Montreal. I said that some of the families of French and Belgian reservists had been helped by the fund. The consuls and their wives, together with members of the Patriotic Fund in Montreal, saw that such families of reservists who needed protection received it. Certainly no abuse was permitted in the administration of the fund.

Mr. TURRIFF: The point raised by the member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) is well taken, particularly if we have regard to the suggestion made by the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) a little while ago that the Patriotic Fund should be raised by taxation. That has always been my own view. I do not agree with the member for Maisonneuve that the wealthy are providing the great bulk of the money. The poor people of Canada have given much more largely in proportion to what they have than the wealthy people.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I said that the poor people had subscribed, but anonymously, and that it was not fair that only certain names should appear before the public. This taxation should be equalized, and it follows from this argument that the State should provide for the families of our soldiers.

Mr. TURRIFF: I agree with that. In all probability steps may be taken next session in that direction. If that is done, why should we tell the officers of the Patriotic Fund that they may pay out this money to relatives of soldiers of the allied armies who never lived in Canada? Why should such persons draw from the moneys raised either by voluntary subscription or by taxation from the Canadian people? Surely our obligations are piling up quickly enough and largely enough to suggest that if we attend to the relatives of our own soldiers through the patriotic and other funds, we shall be doing our full duty. I agree that the relatives of French or Belgian reservists resident in Canada who go to fight for the Allies should be looked after. But why should we burden ourselves with the responsibility of looking after relatives of Italians who join their army in their own country, and whose wives or families subsequently come to Canada?

The Minister of Justice says that this provision is not compulsory; that we are simply saying that the officers who handle the Patriotic Fund may assist those people. Why should we give directions at all in the matter? Why not leave the Act as it is at present? The Patriotic Fund is now, if necessary, assisting relatives resident in Canada of soldiers in the different Allied armies. Surely that is sufficient; but for us to give directions that such assistance may be given to a soldier's relatives who may come into this country in the future after he had enlisted in the Allied forces, is, to my mind, absolutely outside of our duty altogether, and we shall be making a great mistake if we pass this amendment.

Mr. DOHERTY: I should like to endeavour to make this matter clear. As the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) has pointed out, there is in the existing Act a subsequent provision which says that there is no right vested in anybody to get the money, and this section simply defines those to whom it may be permissible to pay the money. The principal object of this section is not to include, but to exclude, people. If the interpretation which the hon. member would like to see continued possible, remains possible, our Patriotic Fund will be liable, so far as there can be liability, or, at least, subject to claims being made—and such claims have been made,—that we should give aid and assistance to women and children and other dependent relatives living in all parts of the habitable globe, because the man at the time he enlisted was in Canada. Do hon. gentlemen think that is a more desirable situation, even if there were a question of obligation? As I said before, it is beyond possibility of doubt that whoever may be benefited, nobody is being given an absolute right to be benefited. Do hon. gentlemen think it is desirable that there should be in this country, for instance, dependent relatives of a British soldier, or a French soldier, or a soldier of any other Allied country which is taking part in this war, who are destitute, starving, and that this fund should have to say: We cannot give you anything; we have no power to give you anything? It is not a question of saying, what the hon. gentleman apprehended, namely, that any soldier's relatives who may flock in here will have the right to demand such assistance?

Mr. MORPHY: I never said anything of the kind. The minister is wrong. The minister knows that.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is what I understood to be the apprenension.

Mr. MORPHY: I think the minister is endeavouring to becloud the issue.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall leave that to the appreciation of the committee. If I am making that endeavour, I hope I shall not be successful. What I was endeavouring to point out, in order to pierce through the clouds—

Mr. MORPHY: The matter is quite clear.

Mr. DOHERTY: —that have been caused to circulate in the atmosphere, was that all that we are trying to do is to remove the suggestion that it may be impossible for the Patriotic Fund to assist dependents, actually resident in Canada, of our own soldiers, if it happened that such soldiers were not in Canada when they enlisted. You may have the case of a Canadian absent from Canada, because there are known cases of Canadian men who have enlisted on the other side and whose dependents are here, and it would not be impossible for it to be contended, if the other interpretation is necessarily right, that such relatives would not be entitled to relief. I hope to make the matter clear, notwithstanding the motive that is attributed to me, that there is no question of creating an obligation of any kind, nor of creating an absolute right of any kind. All that is sought to be made clear is that the Patriotic Fund is not precluded from assisting, is not in a position where it is impossible for it to do anything for the wives and children or other dependents residing in Canada of a man who is in the Allied fighting forces engaged in the present war.

Mr. MORPHY: The minister has sought to convey the impression that hon. members opposing the amendment have pretended to argue that a right is given. No one has argued that, and I think the minister might as well get that out of his head at once and get down to the proper meaning of the section.

Mr. McMASTER: The right is inferred.

Mr. MORPHY: It is, of course, inferred. It may or may not be exercised. The section reads:

> The objects of the Corporation shall be to collect, administer and distribute the fund hereinbefore mentioned for the assistance in case of need of such wives, children and dependent relatives as are or may become resident in Canada, of officers and men who, during the present war, may be on active service with the naval and military forces of the British Empire and Great Britain's allies."

That covers the whole gamut. It takes in the Japanese. A subject of Japan in the naval or military service of that country comes under the scope of this section. Will the minister tell me what Japan has done for Canada in the way of establishing a patriotic fund to take care of Canadians stranded in that country? The Italian is taken care of under this section. Has corresponding legislation been passed in Italy to take care of Canadians who may be forcibly detained there, unable to get home and compelled to seek a living in that country? Have the authorities in the loyal parts of Russia made a reciprocal provision to provide for stranded Canadians? Whence springs this unbounded generosity of the Canadian people that, in this time of stress, we must, for all time to come, put upon the statute books a provision which is heralded to the world that we, of Canada, are so affluent, and rolling in wealth, so unburdened by the stress of war, that we can say to the world: Send all your dependents here; we do not promise to take care of them, but we have a provision which says: If you are worthy, we shall take care of you? If it does not say that, it does not say anything. I object to the principle of the Bill being put forward at the present. This is no time for us to hold out these invitations to come here and get under the wing of the Canadian Patriotic Fund. Let me put this argument to the minister: The minister has argued that this section gives no right. Will he deny that, if there are 150,000 soldiers' wives and children, relatives and dependents, coming into Canada, and if they are deserving, this section means that they shall be helped? I submit it does. It would be cruel to argue in any other way. That being the meaning of the section, what I object to is the probable, and prospective burden Canada is assuming at a time which, far from being in affluent circumstances and untouched by the stress of war, we are straining every effort to assist our own dependent people.

At a time when our soldiers say they are not getting big enough pensions, when their widows say they are not being properly taken care of, when the dependents of our soldiers are none too well taken care of, I object to the principle of this Bill, which would launch us out on a scheme of indiscriminately taking care of every Italian soldier, every Portuguese soldier, every Japanese soldier, every French soldier, the soldiers, in fact, of all the Allied armies and their wives and dependent children. The principle is too altruistic, too premature. Let us wait a little. Let us see how our balance sheet stands and provide for those for whom it is our bounden duty to provide, before extending the scheme to others.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: The hon. member for Perth and the hon. member for Assiniboia object to the principle of this Bill. May I remind them that they have already agreed during this session to the principle of a Bill which goes a great deal further than this Bill? The Bill before us empowers the Patriotic Fund to assist the wives, children and dependent relatives of officers and men who during the present war may be on active service with the naval and military forces of the British Empire and Great Britain's allies. Earlier in the session we passed a Bill intituled "An Act respecting the Department of Soldiers Civil Re-Establishment, which created a department and set up machinery for the purpose not only of assisting the dependents of the allied soldiers during the war but of looking after the comfort and welfare of the soldiers of all allied countries, and their dependents, who have fought during the war, whether now resident in Canada or whether they come to Canada after the war. Section 5 of that Bill reads:

> The Minister shall have the management and control of all matters relating to the re-establishment in civil life and activities of all persons who have served in the naval or military forces of His Majesty or any of His Majesty's allies during the present war, and the dependents of such persons, and the administration of any statutes or of any regulations or orders enacted or made by the Governor in Council for such purpose.

When that Bill was before the House I took the liberty of drawing attention of hon. members to the fact that we were consecrating ourselves to a very serious principle indeed. I said we were entering into a very large contract in undertaking such a scheme, but the views I then expressed were not supported by any other member of the House, and everybody seemed to agree that this country should look after the welfare of all soldiers who have fought in the Allied armies during the war, whether they came to this country after the war or not. Surely there is a great deal less objection on our part to helping the dependents in this country of any of the soldiers of the Allied armies than to helping the dependents of soldiers who may not become residents of this country until after the war, and as I have already pointed out, this House unanimously agreed to do the latter when the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Bill was passed.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: It seems to me the objection taken to this Bill arises either from a misapprehension of the whole scheme of the Patriotic Fund, or from the fact that the gentlemen who raise these objections have not had very much experience with the practical administration of the Act. If the apprehensions of the hon. member for North Perth were justified, it would mean that the intention of the Act was that people should be assisted from the Patriotic Fund year after year, on and on and on, or as the hon. member expressed it, forever without limitation. The Patriotic Fund has as its expressed object the giving of assistance to relatives and dependents of soldiers only while they are on active service, and not beyond the duration of the war. As the Act has nothing whatever to do with assisting the dependents of soldiers or the soldiers themselves after the war is over that seems to cut away the ground on which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Morphy) built up his argument that we were assuming an obligation for which we would be responsible year after year without limitation. My understanding of the Patriotic Fund is that our implied obligation ceases, even in the case of our own soldiers, as soon as they are discharged from the army. Let me say, as one who has had something to do with the practical administration of the fund in Northern Ontario, that the very thing this clause seems to me to be designed to overcome has been a very great source of confusion in the past. Misunderstandings have frequently arisen as to whether we had the right under the Act to take care of the families and dependents of French or Italian reservists, for instance, who happened to be resident in this country, and I have always taken the ground that it mattered not whether the soldier was Belgian, French, Italian, or Japanese, if you wish, so long as he was fighting for the Allies in one of the the theatres of war and his dependents were domiciled in Canada.

Mr. TURRIFF: We do not object to that.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: The amendment to this Act cannot override the principle of the Patriotic Fund itself. It is simply interpreting what may be done under the Act. The operation of the Act at the present time, as I understand it, is confined to the relatives and dependents of men who are actually at war and does not go beyond the duration of the war, but if the hon. member for North Perth were correct and the operation of the Act was to continue indefinitely year after year I would certainly say that we must stop and consider, because in that case we could not undertake to pay suitable pensions to our soldiers and their dependents and help them from the Patriotic Fund as well and as a matter of fact we are not doing that now. I have had to deal with many cases myself where the contribution from the Patriotic Fund ceased immediately the soldier who was discharged from the army had his pension fixed.

Mr. DUFF: During the last four years I have had a good deal to do with the local committee of the Patriotic Fund in my county. It seems to me the section we are considering is not as clear as it should be. The Minister of Justice is a lawyer, and of course can interpret it correctly, but I am afraid the members of the local committees throughout the country, many of whom are not lawyers, will get into a great deal of discussion and then not know exactly what the clause means. I would suggest that the section read as follows:

> The objects of the corporation shall be to collect, administer and distribute the funds hereinbefore mentioned for the assistance in case of need of such wives, children and dependent relatives as are or may become resident in Canada, of officers and men who, during the present war, have enlisted in the Canadian military or naval forces and may be on active service with the naval or military forces of Great Britain or her Allies.

I think we should deal only with those who have enlisted in our own forces.

[Mr. G. B. Nicholson.]

Mr. McMASTER: I am thoroughly out of accord with what the hon. member for Lunenburg has just said, because his proposal would cut out the French and Belgian reservists.

Mr. DOHERTY: It would also cut out the British soldier.

Mr. McMASTER: In my county there was a French reservist, a man over forty, with a wife and a number of children, who was called to the colours. His family have been helped by the Patriotic Fund, and everybody is delighted to help them because they should be helped. I believe I express the feeling of the House when I say that we are all willing to take care of the families of the soldiers of our Allies who were resident in Canada at the time they left to join the colours. But this law goes a little further. It is true it does not oblige us to help the families of soldiers who have come in since the war, the heads of whose families may never have lived in Canada. To illustrate that, let me take the special case in my county. Suppose the wife of that French reservist had a sister living in France, and it is left to the generosity of the Patriotic Fund in Canada to take care of that sister and her children. She says: "I will move out to Canada and establish myself there." If they come they will be welcome, and any persons who want to help them should be free to do so, but the country should not assume, or infer, an obligation of that kind. The Minister of Justice is an old law professor of mine, and I would not set up my legal opinion against his for one moment.

Mr. BUREAU: Why not?

Mr. McMASTER: Because I am a modest man. There is no obligation stipulated, but there is an obligation inferred. If we create a corporation for the express purpose of distributing money among people who may become resident in Canada, although their fathers or brothers have never lived in Canada, we certainly invite people to come to Canada in the expectation of receiving some benefit from this fund. If the hypothetical woman, whom I have mentioned for the purpose of illustration, comes to Canada and establishes herself next door to her sister, in my county of Brome, would she not feel that under this law the Patriotic Fund should give her something? She would be quite reasonable in taking that view. It is a mistake to hold out any illusory hopes of that sort. I want to support the suggestion made by the hon. member from Saskatchewan (Mr. Turriff), whose constituency I have forgotten, but whose constituency I should have known because he was on our side of the House last year. He says that the Patriotic Fund should not depend on private subscription but on taxation. He is quite right. So long as the country raised its armed forces by the voluntary system, there was no reason why we should not raise money to help the relatives of soldiers through the voluntary system, but once we adopted the system of compulsory military service, surely it is only right that the same principle should be followed for the purpose of raising a fund to support and help the relatives of soldiers. As a matter of fact what is often urged is that conscription is a matter of taxation. You would never think of raising money for public purpose by private subscription. That was an argument used by the conscriptionist. This is a conscriptionist Government and it should be logical and consistent with itself. If we raise an army by compulsion, and if we raise money to look after the wives and children of the soldiers who are in that army, I would consider that to be an obligation of the state just the same as the soldier's pay is an obligation of the state. You should be consistent in this and raise the money required for looking after the wives and relatives of soldiers by taxation. The way the Patriotic Fund is raised now is largely a matter of certain people, representing no one but themselves, assessing their fellow-citizens. When a patriotic committee of rich and powerful people, many of them rich bankers, go out among the business people of a large city and collect subscriptions for the Patriotic Fund, they are not appealing to the spirit of benevolence. They are practically, in many cases, assessing their fellow-citizens and telling them, if you will allow a vulgar expression, to come across with a certain amount of money. I do not like that way of raising money by ordinary voluntary procedure. I think it best that money for State purposes should be raised by the State itself.

Mr. NESBITT: I am sorry I was not in when this Bill was introduced in order that I might have found out why this amendment was proposed. As far as I have heard, the Patriotic Fund has been well administered and has been working out very satisfactorily. This clause may be construed to mean that the Patriotic Fund may be continued after the man has returned. My hon. friend from East Algoma (Mr. G. B. Nicholson) pointed out that that was not the intention. My experience is the same as his. When the men return, get their three months' pay with their discharge, and get their pension, the Patriotic Fund no longer supplies them. I would like to say a word in reference to what the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. McMaster) has said as to the method of collecting the Patriotic Fund. I have long thought that voluntary subscriptions were largely a matter of coercion. In the section of the country from which I come we only once took up an ordinary voluntary subscription. After that we adopted the plan of raising the fund by municipal taxation. That plan has been very satisfactory, and it has been most satisfactory in so far as the administration is concerned. I absolutely agree with the suggestion that the fund should be raised by taxation. If the Dominion Government are in a position to collect a tax for it, they are surely the ones to do it. I do not think it should be called any longer a Patriotic Fund. I think the money should be given in the form of extra separation allowance in accordance with the number of children in a family as they do on the other side of the line. If there is a danger of this clause being misconstrued, as the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) says and the money paid to people who moved into the country after the war started, for the purpose of getting some benefit from this fund, or for any other purpose, or if there is a danger that it will be continued after the soldier gets his discharge, I would suggest to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) that he strike out the words "or may become" in the eleventh line.

That would clear the ground in so far as those who may afterwards become settlers in Canada are concerned. Then on the last line but one of the section, the words are used: "who during the present war may be on active service." I would suggest that we should strike out the two words "may be" and insert the word "are." The phrase would then read: "who are on active service." These are my suggestions, and in my judgment, they would overcome entirely the objection that I have heard made to the clause this morning. I think we are all proud of the way in which the Patriotic Fund has been administered, and the very small expense that has been incurred in connection with it. Altogether the work of the local committees who distribute the funds throughout the country has been excellent, as far as I have heard.

Mr. MORPHY: Suppose the soldier is not on active service, but is dead?

Mr. NESBITT: If the soldier is dead his dependents are awarded a pension by the Government. It is not the intention of the Patriotic Fund to provide for dependents of that class. When the soldier returns from active service and is discharged, he receives three months' pay, and that, to a certain extent, makes good the amount formerly contributed out of the Patriotic Fund, until the man is able to settle down to regular employment.

Mr. TURRIFF: There is one other reason why we should not pass this clause as suggested. I agree very largely with the remarks made by my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) that the provision under discussion might probably be further amended to make it more clear. We notice in the Press that sometime in the future there will probably be as many as three million American soldiers overseas. Under the proposed amendment the dependent relatives of such men who come to Canada, may be paid out of the Patriotic Fund. As is well known, people are crossing from the United States into Canada by the tens of thousands every year, even at the present time. Why should we direct payments to be made from the Canadian Patriotic Fund to the relatives of American soldiers who are overseas fighting the battles of that country as well as our own? They are our allies, it is true, and we are glad to have them and see them in the battle line, but the United States is just as well able to take care of the wives and children of its soldiers, as we are to take care of the wives and children of our own soldiers, and even better.

Mr. McMASTER: I beg leave to propose that the words "may become" in the eleventh line be struck out and the following words substituted therefor:

Were on the 22nd day of August, 1914.

If my amendment is adopted the section will read:

The objects of the corporation shall be to collect, administer and distribute the fund hereinbefore mentioned for the assistance in case of need of such wives, children and dependent relatives, as were on the 22nd day of August, 1914, residents in Canada, of officers and men who during the present war may be on active service with the naval and military forces of the British Empire and Great Britain's allies.

The adoption of this amendment would dispense with the necessity of the second clause of the Bill, which should be struck out.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Mr. DOHERTY: I would like to ask my hon. friend exactly what it is that he proposes? Does he intend that if the wives and children and dependent relatives were resident in Canada when the war broke out, but are now resident in the United States, they are to receive a payment from the fund? I think that the amendment which he proposes would have that result. Perhaps we might arrive at a better wording that would meet what I think is in the mind of the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Morphy). I do not want to misunderstand the hon. gentleman, and may I, without offence, state the impression that was created in my mind?

Mr. MORPHY: Yes.

Mr. DOHERTY: When there are clouds in the mind of the hon. member for Perth, it is because, in his opinion, I am trying to raise them. When there are clouds in my mind, it is my own fault—they do not come from anything the hon. member for Perth says. What I understood to be apprehended by the hon. gentleman was, that this provision might open the door to an influx of people—relatives of the soldiers of the different armies—with regard to whom there would exist—I understand he does not contend a right—a position as the result of which they might come forward and say: "I am within that description, therefore, you ought fairly to do something for me." Now I think that is quite likely, and I also want to avoid that as far as I can. On the other hand the Patriotic Fund administrators themselves—because I may say this is their Bill, and I was asked by them to have this legislation passed—wanted this one thing made clear: They wanted to be in apposition to say, for example, to a soldier's wife who has been living in the United States, "Our fund is not for distribution outside of Canada, but is for the benefit of those resident in Canada who are relatives of soldiers at the front, without distinction as to which of the Allied forces they are serving under. The people we want to take care of are the dependent relatives in Canada of those soldiers." and the reason we want to do that is that the people of Canada feel that when they have in their midst the dependent relative of a soldier, and that dependent relative is a resident in this country, after all, it is not becoming that we should leave that dependent relative to starve on the streets. That is the general idea of the matter. I am quite prepared to adopt any wording that will guard against an influx of people coming only for the purpose of getting upon the Patriotic Fund or creating a situation where they may claim it. I have endeavoured to find a wording that I might exclude, at all events, the idea of any invitation to people to come in for that purpose, and at the same time create a situation where the hands of the Patriotic Fund would not be tied—say, with regard to a woman, who, sometime since the beginning of the war, came bona fide into this country and who, perhaps, at the time she came in, was not in want, but has since come into want, and is the dependent relative of a soldier—and that the officials of the Fund should not be bound to say: "Because you only came here after the passing of the Act, or after the outbreak of the war, we can do nothing for you." That I concede might properly exclude the idea or intention to deal with anybody and everybody who chooses to become later on a resident of Canada. I am prepared to concede that the wording in that regard is a little objectionable. If we struck out the words "or may become" and substituted therefor the words "at the time of the giving of such assistance" resident in Canada, that might meet the case. I do not want to dispute that under that wording even it may be possible, it will be possible, for somebody who came in later to rank on this Fund if the circumstances are considered to justify it. But I think it best to exclude the idea of a general invitation to come in for that purpose. Now as regards the situation concerning the words "who, during the present war, may be on active service" to which exception is taken, I think we would meet any possible ambiguity in those words, and make it also perfectly clear that this assistance is to be while the active service continues, if instead of the words "during the present war may be" we substituted the words "actually on active service during the present war." I do not know how far that meets the case.

Mr. McMASTER: It does not—

The CHAIRMAN: The committee is getting out of order. Mr. McMaster has moved an amendment which is before the committee, which cannot be further amended until it is either disposed of or withdrawn. I would like to ask the hon. member for Brome if in order to permit of discussion he will withdraw his amendment?

Mr. McMASTER: Yes, I will withdraw it and move this amendment—

Mr. PARDEE: Might I suggest to the hon. member if the time should not be stated as from the time of enlistment instead of from a specific date? Why make it specifically the 22nd day of August?

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Is it the pleasure of the committee that Mr. McMaster have leave to withdraw his amendment?

Amendment withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN: The Minister of Justice moves that section 1 be amended by striking out in the eleventh line the words "or may become" and inserting in lieu thereof "at the time of the giving of such assistance." Also by striking out in the twelfth line the words "during the present war, may be" and inserting in lieu thereofthe words "actually are."

Mr. DOHERTY: The modification suggested is not "actually are." I thought I said "actually on active service." I do not want to say only the men who are today on active service, because we hope to have some soldiers in the future, and their relatives should be dealt with too.

Mr. NICKLE: Perhaps I might clear up this point by reading from the original Act of incorporation, so that the House will see the object of the amendment. Section 3 of Chapter 8 of the Statutes of 1914 reads:

> The objects of the corporation shall be to collect, administer and distribute the Fund hereinbefore mentioned for the assistance in case of need of the wives, children and dependent relatives of officers and men, residents of Canada, who, during the present war, may be on active service with the naval and military forces of the British Empire and Great Britain's allies.

When this section recently came up for careful consideration and construction, a doubt was raised as to what construction should be put on the words "residents of Canada." The question was: do the words "residents of Canada" qualify the words "officers and men," so that this meaning should be taken from the statute that "assistance in case of need" may be given to all those wives, children and dependent relatives of officers and men where the men have been residents of Canada at the time the war broke out, and thereafter. Or whether the construction was that this aid might be given to the wives, children and dependent relatives, residents of Canada, of officers and men who were actually engaged in warfare. The practical condition that had arisen was this: at the outbreak of the war and thereafter there were within Canada certain wives, children and dependent relatives of men, these wives, children and dependent relatives having been for some time residents of Canada, but the men never were residents of Canada. If we put the narrow construction on the section that the men must have been residents of Canada any time since 1914, the relief given to these female relatives would be illegally given, because the men never had been residents. It was to clear up an ambiguity.

Mr. McMASTER: How would it happen that the women were here and the men were not?

Mr. NICKLE: They were of the families of many men called to the British and the French colours. The families were here, and it just happened that the men did not come. The Patriotic Fund subsequently found themselves confronted with this difficulty: the pay of the French soldier is very trifling; the pay of the British soldier is not great. These women and children were in Canada, and they either had to be kept or they had to starve.

If the Patriotic Fund did not assume the obligation, the municipality in which they lived would have to do it, or these people would be left to starve. Those responsible for the Patriotic Fund did just what you or I would have done. They said: an unexpected condition has arisen; Canada is not going to let women and children want for food in this country when their male relatives are fighting for the cause in another army of the Allies. As I said when the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) interrupted me, in my judgment the section as it now stands, in law, is incomplete. As the words "residents of Canada" should qualify the words "wives, children and dependent relatives," it seems to me that a simple amendment would make clear all that has up to the present time been obscure. In section 3 the words "residents of Canada" might be made to follow the word "relatives," so that the section would read:

The object of the corporation shall be to collect, administer and distribute the Fund hereinbefore mentioned for the assistance in case of need of the wives, children and dependent relatives, residents of Canada, of officers and men who, during the present war, may be on active service with the naval and military forces of the British Empire and Great Britain's allies.

That would simplify the Act and make it as it is desired to be. I admit that the amendment which I suggest would not, on principle, meet the objection raised by the member for North Perth; that the right to claim aid might still be vested in a family who subsequently came to Canada. The difficulty that the draftsman of the Act now before the committee found himself in arose from the fact that by section 2 of the Act he endeavoured to make the law retroactive; and to make the statute speak from the second day of August, 1914, so he had to put in the words "or may become"; otherwise it would not be retroactive in the sense that he desired it to be.

Mr. MORPHY: Does the hon. member believe that unless the draftsman put in those words, he could not make the law retroactive?

Mr. NICKLE: It was because it was to be retroactive that he had to put them in.

Mr. MORPHY: I do not think so.

Mr. NICKLE: When lawyers differ, the only way to get a decision is to leave the question to the court. As it is now one o'clock, I suggest that the minister, during recess, take into consideration the suggestion which I have made and see whether it will obviate the difficulty which confronts the committee.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Doherty has asked for leave to withdraw his amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. DOHERTY: I beg to move:

That section 1 be amended by striking out the word "such" in the tenth line thereof and substituting therefor the word "the," also by striking out in the eleventh line the words "as are or may become."

Amendment agreed to.

Bill as amended reported, and amendments concurred in.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Doherty for the third reading of the Bill:

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: A number of prominent members of the House have urged the advisability of raising this fund by way of taxation. As my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) has pointed out there is a further reason at the present time why the Government should take that suggestion into consideration, and that is because we are sending men by compulsion to the front. Would the minister say what is the opinion of the Government as to raising this fund by taxation?

Mr. SPEAKER: As the minister has moved the third reading, he is not entitled to speak to his motion again, but I take it that it is the unanimous wish of the House that he may reply to the hon. member.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not in a position to announce any settled policy on this subject, but we do recognize that there is very much to commend the views expressed the other evening by the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) whose views have added weight from his relation to the Patriotic Fund; and after what has been said to-day in support of his views, hon. members may rest assured that so far as I am concerned the suggestion shall have earnest consideration with a view to settling on a course of action.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time.

THE YUKON ELECTION.

THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED.

On motion of Sir George Foster, the House reverted to the Order "Presenting Reports by Standing and Select Committees."

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Solicitor-General) presented the third report of the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, as follows:

The Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to which was referred the special return of the General Returning Officer to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery for Canada concerning the election of a candidate to serve in the House of Commons for the Yukon Territory, with power to consider the same and report their conclusions thereon, and to which was referred their second report for further consideration, presented with respect thereto the following as their third report:

Your committee have, pursuant to the resolution of the House of the 16th day of May, 1918, reconsidered their conclusions concerning the matters referred to in the order of reference of the 15th day of April, 1918, and at a meeting of your committee held this 17th day of May, 1918, the following resolution was adopted which the committee respectfully submit and recommend:—

Resolved, that the votes purporting to have been cast, counted and applied under Part IV of the Dominion Elections Act as shown in the special return of the General Returning Officer are properly applicable to the respective candidates to whom they have been applied, and that said special return be recommitted to said General Returning Officer with a direction that he do forthwith openly proclaim and return as duly elected a candidate to represent the electoral district of the Yukon Territory pursuant to the provisions of section 14 of said Act.

All of which is respectfully submitted,

H. Guthrie,
Chairman.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie, it was ordered that the report be taken into consideration on Tuesday next.

On motion of Sir George Foster, the House proceeded to the consideration of Government Orders.

INSPECTION AND SALE ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. T. A. Crerar, Minister of Agriculture, the House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution—Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend Part IX of the Inspection and Sale Act, chapter eighty-five of the Revised Statutes, 1906, relating to Fruit and Fruit Marks, and to provide more effectively for the marking and inspection and packing and repacking of fruit, and for the materials, dimensions and content of barrels, crates, boxes, baskets, and wood veener baskets, packed in Canada, or manufactured and offered for sale in Canada, on and after the first day of June, 1919, but authorizing permits to be issued allowing the use of packages of other sizes than those specified; and to prevent false representation as to the contents of any package; and, further, to provide that no person shall sell, offer, expose, or have in his possession for sale, any fruit unless such fruit conforms with the requirements, is properly packed, and the package is marked as prescribed, and such fruit is not diseased wormy or otherwise depreciated so as to be unfit for consumption; and that any person who carelessly handles, wilfully destroys or pilfers any fruit packed in any of the prescribed packages shall be liable to prosecution; and also to amend Part X of the said Inspection and Sale Act, relating to certain Staple Commodities, by providing that no person shall sell or offer for sale any potatoes, represented to be of Number 1 quality or Number 2 quality, unless such potatoes conform to requirements to be enacted and are of prescribed size, but subject to allowance for variations incident to commercial grading.—The Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. ROBB: What are the requirements to be enacted governing the sale of potatoes?

Mr. CRERAR: This does not mean the establishment, for potatoes, of any particular grades that shall be compulsory in their character. At the present time, there are no obvious grades or standards for potatoes in Canada. There are, however, dealers who, in selling their potatoes, describe them as No. 1 potatoes, and include under that designation any class of potatoes that they may care to include. The amendments proposed here merely provide that if a dealer does represent his potatoes to be of No. 1 character, they must conform with the description set out in the Bill to be founded on this resolution. It is not obligatory for him to have his potatoes conform with any standard, but we seek to make it obligatory that if he does represent his potatoes as No. 1 potatoes, they shall conform with the standard set out in the Bill.

Resolution reported, read the first and the second time and concurred in.

Hon. Mr. CRERAR thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 108, to amend the Inspection and Sale Act relating to fruit and fruit marks and potatoes.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY.

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Trade and Commerce—mail subsidies and steamship subventions—steam service between Canadian Atlantic ports and Australia and New Zealand, $70,000:

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is this service being performed at the present time?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This line has been subsidized for a series of years, but during the last year the service has been very much interrupted, the company not being able to get ships owing to requisitions made by the British Admiralty. We have, therefore, had to satisfy ourselves as far as possible with occasional sailings. During the last three or four months we have not been able to get any ships at all. The total subsidy for the preceding year was $140,000. I have cut that amount down to one-half, keeping this $70,000 in the Estimates, so that if circumstances prove a little more favourable, we may perhaps be able to get one-half the service if we cannot get the whole.

Ocean and mail service between Canada and Great Britain, $400,000:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The same remarks apply to this appropriation. The committee will see that, instead of $1,000,000 which was voted last year for that service, I have cut the amount down to $400,000, and it is problematical whether that amount will be spent or not.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What companies are in the service?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Chiefly the Canadian Pacific and the White Star, but there are one or two others.

Steam service or services between Canada and Newfoundland, $70,000:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is the usual subsidy and the same appropriation as last year. The service is between Sydney and Port aux Basques.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Is the service between St. John's, Newfoundland, and Summerside and Charlottetown included in this appropriation?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, that is a separate appropriation. This is an appropriation for service between the terminus of the Government railways at Sydney and the terminus of the Newfoundland railway at Port aux Basques.

Mr. LEMIEUX: A few weeks ago I noticed that there was a case before the court in St. John's, Newfoundland, in which the names of the right hon. the leader of the House (Sir Robert Borden), and even that of my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) were prominently mentioned. This is a case which arose out of a dispute—or shall I say a quarrel?—between Sir Robert Reid and one of the ministers in Newfoundland.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Might I ask my hon. friend whether that dispute had anything to do with the service between North Sydney and Pointe au Basque?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Absolutely.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I would ask my hon. friend if he does not think, that, in these warm and dying hours of the session, it would be better for us to go on with our business and leave these other little things, which cannot affect this vote in any way, until a more convenient day.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not intend to be long and there is a breeze coming into the House this afternoon.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is always a breeze when my hon. friend gets up.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am not breezy generally. The name of the right hon. gentleman was mentioned very prominently in connection with that case. It was stated that offers had been made to Sir Robert Reid by the Prime Minister and my right hon. friend to annex Newfoundland to Canada. The question of a subsidy was mentioned in connection with that policy. I do not know what happened with the case before the court but I noticed at the time that the name of my right hon. friend had been mentioned. Was he a party to such pourparlers between Newfoundland and Canada as regards this annexation scheme and, if he was, could he give the committee a statement concerning these pourparlers and also say what policy the Government intends to pursue as regards the annexation of Newfoundland?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend is a lawyer and has been a member of a government. As a lawyer he knows that when a case is sub judice, information concerning it is not a proper thing for public discussion, particularly in the House. As a former member of the Government he knows that certain things are better not discussed in public even if there be any foundation for them until they shall have become settled in some way by a conclusion, positive or negative. With these two premises I may say I have no recollection of having been caught in flagrante delicto, or in any other way, in reference to any such negotiations.

Steam service betwen Canada and the West Indies or South America or both, $250,666.66:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The committee will see that this vote has been diminished. The service is under contract, the contract was to run for five years, and it has not ended yet. Two of the vessels have been commandeered for war purposes. That leaves two on that route. It is not improbable that we will be able to get another vessel to go on that route sooner or later. I have made a certain cut in the amount, as we shall certainly not be able to use the whole amount, but I have provided what I think may be sufficient for the two vessels now running, as it is problemetical whether we shall be successful in getting another.

Steam service between Canada and South Africa, $73,000:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The same remark applies in part to this service. It has been interrupted. The Elder-Dempster line, which has been carrying it on, has had probably eighty per cent at least of its whole tonnage taken by the British Government for war purposes, and, beside, it has suffered many severe losses through ships being torpedoed and otherwise destroyed. We are, therefore, reduced to an occasional service. There is now in Canada a large amount of material ordered by South African merchants, which is awaiting transportation. But it has been impossible to get even sailing vessels to take that route. I have pressed the matter as strongly as possible upon the Admiralty, but, of course, the necessities of the war must have precedence. I have been able, however, to get the allocation of one vessel which will sail in June, and I may be able to get one a month or every other month. I have therefore kept $73,000 of the $146,000 as usable for the possible service this year.

Steamship service between Canada and Australia or New Zealand, or both, on Pacific Ocean, $180,509:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The service which we have been able to maintain up to the present time has been partly subsidized by New Zealand more largely by ourselves. Whether we will be able to keep on the whole service or not is very problematical; in fact, two of the vessels are under imminent commandeering prospects by the Admiralty. This is a very valuable service, and I have kept the vote on the supposition that we will be able certainly to keep part of the service and to secure the services of two ships.

Mr. NESBITT: Are any ships plying now between the Atlantic ports and Australia and New Zealand, and how are the subsidies paid? I suppose the appropriation for this service has been passed, but I could not hear the explanations that were made.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Payment is according to the trips made. With respect to the Australian service, there have not been any trips now for four or five months, the service has been intermittent. On the West Coast there has been a steamship service—that is, the steamships have made their trips regularly—which has been entirely satisfactory.

Steam service between Canada, China and Japan, $253,334.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Since this item was put in the Estimates of the four vessels which have been on this service the two Empresses, and they were the largest ones, have been commandeered by the British Government. There seems to be an immediate prospect of having those replaced. In order to keep the estimate as low as possible, and yet to provide for what may be necessary, I propose to take $53,333.34 from that vote and make it $200,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I read in a New York paper that the Canadian Government had made some proposals for a large number of Chinese to settle in western Canada? What truth is there in that statement?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is no truth in that statement. I beg to move:

That item No. 129 be reduced to the extent of $53,333,34 so that the item will read: "Steam service between Canada, China and Japan, $200,000."

Motion agreed to.

Steam service between Halifax, Canso and Guysborough, $5,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Has the contract been made for the present year?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, the "Scotia," the same vessel as before, is making the trips.

Steam service from the opening to the closing of navigation in 1918 between the mainland and Magdalen Islands, $18,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the contract been signed, and is the vessel now on the route?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: A boat is now on the route. The contract has been signed with Farquhar and Company, and the "Enterprise" is performing the service. She is the best, in fact the only boat, we could get. She is not as large as we would like, nor does she probably come up to the old standard of vessels that we had on this service. The contract, however, is in the hands of an excellent firm, and I think the service will be carried out as satisfactorily as it possibly can be under the circumstances.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was there not an arrangement made with Captain Farquhar that the "Enterprise," being too small a craft for the service, would not be put on the route this year, but that a larger vessel would be built and put into commission?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We have not made any contract, or entered into any arrangement for the building of another vessel. Shipbuilding at the present time is a pretty expensive operation.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understood from Captain Farquhar when he came here some weeks ago that he was ready to build a vessel if the department would give him a contract for a certain number of years.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think that is true if we could have agreed upon the price of the vessel, and given a long contract, but we are not doing that in any of these services. We have to feel our way and do the best we can.

Mr. McISAAC: Is there any steamer plying where the "Enterprise" operated last year?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No. The only thing that has been done so far is that I have communicated with the "Enterprise," and the "Enterprise" will be able and willing to call at a number of these ports, and might possibly be able to give a very good service at these ports. I am in communication with the company in that respect.

Steam service between Mulgrave and Guysboro, calling at intermediate points, $5,500.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The service on this line has been performed for several years by the "Robert Cann," which was a very good boat. She was withdrawn last year, and a much smaller boat was put on, the "Percy Cann." This boat is not suitable for the service; she is too small. I am not certain that the minister can find a better one at the present time. But it occurred to me that we will never be able to improve if we do not give notice prior to the expiration of the contract. Would it not be well if, three months before these yearly contracts expire, tenders were asked for, so that owners of boats might have a chance to come in? The matter drifts along until the 30th March, or whatever date these contracts run out, and then the contract is renewed with the old company, and no one knows anything about it. The department might perhaps be able to improve the service here and there by allowing others to tender, giving them ample time to do so, say three months prior to expiration of the existing contract. I ask the minister to consider that point.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In normal times I think that would be the proper course to pursue. In fact, we did pursue it before the war and asked for tenders. But during these times the route and the people on it may be thankful to get any sort of an old tub. There is not much chance for choice.

Steam service between Quebec and Gaspé Basin, touching at intermediate ports, $8,500.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would the minister explain the situation there?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The old boats, as my hon. friend knows, passed off from the service last year in the latter part of the season, and although every effort was made to get a suitable boat for this service, in the end we had to take Hobson's choice. We did get a vessel which would undertake the service between Quebec and Gaspé Basin. The owner is Captain Tremblay, I think, and the boat is a fairly good boat, and will probably carry out the demands of the service.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have you had an inspection made of the boat?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, and she is passed for the service.

Mr. PELLETIER: Was a contract signed for that boat?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Between Quebec and Gaspé Basin?

Mr. PELLETIER: Between the Government and Captain Tremblay?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. PELLETIER: I notice, Mr. Chairman, that you did not call item 175 for steam service between Quebec and Harrington and along the north shore.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We shall have two boats on that service which will carry out the service on the schedule of last year, going down to the extremist point and giving the usual and customary service. We have been able to get a second boat on that line. It is rather a superior boat, a better one than I had expected to get.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is that the "Elaine"?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The "Savoy" and "Elaine" will perform the service along that coast. I am very glad to have got two such satisfactory boats as the department has been able to obtain.

Mr. LEMIEUX: But you have taken the "Elaine" from the Gaspé route between Campbellton and Gaspé?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is true.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Why did my hon. friend come to that decision? There is quite a traffic on the Baie des Chaleurs. It is true that there is a railway on the coast, but the fishery business requires a boat in this section of the Bay, as there is a large traffic between New Brunswick and that part of Quebec. I understand that Mr. Evans, the proprietor of the Elaine, would have preferred to remain on the old route between Campbellton and Gaspé.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Several considerations come in there. In the first place, I was faced with the necessity of cutting down the total vote for steamship subventions and subsidies, and I have cut the vote down by nearly one half. The principles that I tried to base the deduction on were these: First, that the most important routes should be kept, and if it came up a question between a more important route and a less important, I should have to make the choice in favour of the most important one. The other principle was that where there was service by railway, the people would have to get along by railway service, and not indulge in the luxury of a double service. I realize there is some inconvenience in this arrangement; there are some ports which are a little distant from the railway, and which will be better served by having a vessel. But evidently we must come to a conclusion on the situation as it presents itself. The north shore service is not a paying service, as my hon. friend knows, but it is a necessary service. The people are there; they have no railways; they are dependent on water communications, and whether there were 150,000 people down there or 5,000, we have to maintain a service; therefore, as between the service between Campbellton and Paspebiac, and the service on the north shore, I had no hesitation, when I was able to get the Elaine, in placing her on the more important service of the two. My hon. friend will find in the report on mail subsidies and steamship subventions a statement of the traffic carried between Campbellton and Gaspé. It has diminished so greatly that the payment of the subsidy demanded is not justified.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Because the boat was not of the same tonnage as in the old days.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I doubt that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is no question of luxuries in that section of the country; what the people want is opportunity to transport their fish. The railway runs along the coast but it does not touch all the little harbours and consequently it cannot always be depended upon. I protest against the cutting down of this subsidy and I hope that when better times come my hon. friend will revise his ideas and re-establish this line between Campbellton and Gaspé. My hon. friend knows that Baie des Chaleurs is an attractive spot for tourists; there is no more beautiful section of the country in the whole of the eastern provinces. We must not discourage tourists from visiting that part of the country.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Nothing would delight me more than to see that route kept up; it is one of the scenic routes of our country. I myself have made the trip several times. But this is no time for tourists; in any case, tourists are not seeking that route at present. Moreover, you cannot get tourist trade unless you have a first-class vessel on the route. After the war is over, however, I hope that many things will come to pass.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The minister does not close the door completely, then?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Oh, no. I never close the door, even to my hon. friend.

Mr. MICHAUD: I agree with what the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) has said with reference to this matter. It is important that the steamer Elaine carry on the service between Campbellton and the northern part of the Gaspé coast. I have received a communication from a citizen of the town of Campbellton with reference to this subject, and submitted it to the minister, who sent me the following reply, dated May 15:

The Steamer Elaine has gone upon the North Shore, St. Lawrence route, from Quebec eastward and is not available for the Campbellton-Gaspé Service. The amount of freight offering during the last two or three years on that route has been so small that it is not considered advisable to continue the expenditure. Though some inconvenience will no doubt be experienced, there is a railway which runs along that shore which will give a fair service to most of the communities interested.

There is a great fishing traffic along that coast, and the steamer Elaine could render the best service. The cancelling of that steamer for the present summer would seriously affect the business in the northern part of New Brunswick and along the coast of Gaspé. We have not many facilities for exporting fish along the Gaspé coast; many places are not touched by the railway. I hope that the minister will revise his ideas, not next year, but now, and give us a service for the present summer.

Steam service between Rivière du Loup, Tadoussac and other north shore ports, $6,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is one of the services that I had to dispense with. The item seems to have got into the Estimates, however, and I move that it be struck out. The service referred to is between Rivière du loup, Tadoussac and other north shore ports. The vessels have deteriorated and changed hands. Last year we had no service because the vessels offering could not pass the examination necessary to entitle them to carry passengers. The whole amount of freight carried in one season on this route was only 142 tons. Had we retained the subsidy we could have bought all the freight, carried it on our backs to the different destinations, and still have had some money in pocket. I could not see that we should, in these times, spend that money on a service which was of so little real benefit. It is a convenience, but not a real necessity, as the freight service shows.

4 p.m.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is the minister paying subsidies to the Canada Steamship lines?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I was going to suggest that he make arrangements with the Canada Steamship lines——the old Richelieu Company—to have a vessel go to Rivière du Loup once or twice a week

Mr. BUREAU: Why? You have the cars there.

Mr. LEMIEUX: You have in front of Riviére du Loup the whole county of Charlevois, the river Saguenay, Cap-a-l'Aigle, Murray bay, and other important points. When the people of Rivière du Loup want to do business on the north shore they have to go the whole way around.

[Mr. Michaud.]

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: But the whole of the freight carried there in a season was only 142 tons. You could carry it on a wheel barrow.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The trade has not had a chance to develop there.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This subsidy has been paid for at least ten years. The service has constantly depreciated; more than 1,000 tons was never carried on that route, and now the quantity is reduced to 142 tons. I would rather hire some man to carry that in a canoe, thus saving the public a good deal of money.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: The hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau) is not in his seat. He is interested in this service, because it is in his riding. My hon. friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) said that the Canada Steamships Lines' vessels should not call at Rivière du Loup, because there is no work for them to do. He is entirely mistaken as to that, because they are calling there. Last year they called there at least twice a week. On their way up to Chicoutimi they stopped every Saturday at Rivière du Loup, and on their way back they stopped there on every Sunday. This subsidy was rather for the encouragement of winter navigation on that part of the St. Lawrence river. The little boat that was being operated on that line was doing the service every month of the year, and the new experiment was a very successful one. I hope the minister will see his way clear to restore this service in the near future in spite of what my hon. friend from Three Rivers says about it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would ask the minister to hold the matter open for a few minutes. I see the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau) is now in his seat.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Has the minister any good reasons for striking out this item?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have just been endeavouring to state them.

Mr. GAUVREAU: If the item is left in the estimates it will always be an inducement for some one to take steps to enter into a contract with the Government

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I want to draw to my hon. friend's attention the flagellations which have been given to this and former governments if they have put into their Estimates items which they do not purpose using. I am acting on the sense that has been drilled into me in part from the flagellations received from critics on the other side of the House. Such criticism is quite fair. We cannot stuff our Estimates. There is not the least hope in the world of getting this service put on, and, therefore, I do not want to carry the item in my Estimates. I shall, as my hon. friend suggests, keep an eye on the future, and if we can get a service which will justify a subsidy I shall be very glad to ask this House for an appropriation.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I shall take the drilling out of the minister by telling him that if the money is not spent, neither the Government nor any one else will be hurt, but if the item remains in the Estimates, it will be an intimation to some one that he should go to the minister and endeavour to enter into a contract.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Seeing that the ministers are so hard worked already, why should my hon. friend want to keep this molasses point out to attract all those who would bother the minister in regard to some old tub or other? You cannot get anything but a tub these days.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Am I to understand the minister will restore this item to its proper place whenever a suitable boat is found for the route?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: When sufficient grounds are given for the expenditure of money on this route, I shall be quite willing to ask the House for an appropriation.

Vote stricken from the Estimates.

Steam service from the opening to the closing of navigation in 1918, between Pictou, Mulgrave and Cheticamp, $7,500.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Has any change been made with respect to this route? I think it was the intention to drop Pictou.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The contract has not yet been signed and negotiations are still proceeding. My view was this—and I think it was approved—that the distance traversed between Pictou and Mulgrave was an unproductive part of the route, because, owing to the shallow water in the harbours along that coast, it was difficult for the boat to make uniform, stated calls. That being the case, a year or so ago, a small subsidiary vessel was given a subsidy to take over that part of the route, and I have put in the Supplementary Estimates an item for that service with the view of dispensing with the coal-consuming part of the voyage for small freight between Pictou and Mulgrave and putting the strength of the larger vessel on the traffic which goes and comes between Mulgrave and the north. That traffic, at certain seasons of the year becomes congested even with the two boats whose services are given. The matter, however, has not been settled yet.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I am in receipt of several letters asking that this boat touch at Prince Edward Island. I quite agree with the minister that the call at Pictou is not desirable. I never could see any justification for it, because the boat could not, according to the minister's statement, call at any other ports along that route. If the boat would make one trip to one of the Prince Edward Island ports it would be of more service to the people, because we have more business with the island than with Pictou. We have already Mulgrave as a port of call. There is another matter I should like to bring to the minister's attention, and that is the demurrage at the port of Mulgrave. I have had some correspondence with the department with respect to that, and there are two things I would like the minister to bear in mind. First, there is no railway communication with the northern ports. Secondly, navigation is only open for five months in the year. There is a very large population to be served north of Port Hood, and our difficulty is that in the fall of the year, from the first of September onwards, the steamer cannot make regular trips because there are no harbours on that coast. The steamer has sometimes to wait at Mulgrave two weeks in the stormy weather watching for an opportunity to put out, and it is a very great hardship that our merchants should have to pay demurrage on the goods that are kept at Mulgrave until the boats can go out. During the last two years, and this session again, I have had some correspondence with the department and they have replied that concessions have been granted in this respect. I am quite satisfied that that is correct, but the minister will realize that a very large amount of money is paid in demurrage, particularly on account of flour, which comes in carload lots in the fall of the year and has to stay at Mulgrave for two weeks at a time. Of course, the consumer has to pay an increased price on that account, and I would ask the minister to look into this matter.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I shall be very glad to.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I understood the minister to say just now that he was making provision for the continued service of the small gasolene schooner between Pictou and Mulgrave, calling at ports in the county of Antigonish. I think the minister has received some correspondence requesting an increased subsidy. I have here figures showing the cost of operation during the past year and the amount of freight and subsidy received, which I will give the House so that the minister can refer to them on Hansard. The total amount received, including the subsidy for the operation of this boat, last year was $2,878. The cost of gasolene and oil was $513.60, wages $960, victualling $320, insurance $100, repairs $423, other expenses, $60, deck and engine supplies, $74, depreciation, $90; making a total of $2,540.60, leaving a profit to the owner of $337.40. The boat is a good one, I am told, and worth perhaps $5,000 or $6,000, and the owner can hardly be expected to keep it in this service for the small profit he is making. The people along the coast fear that the boat will be withdrawn if an additional subsidy is not given to the contractor. The boat performs a very important service in a local way, as many of these people are twenty miles from railway communication and they grow a good deal of farm produce, it being a farming district. They have been urged, of course, to increase their production during the war, and this boat is the only means they have of getting their produce to market. I have received letters from some of these people asking me to urge the Government to keep the boat in operation so that they can get their produce to market. I understand the contractor is asking for another $1,000. If that is too large a sum, the minister might consider adding half that amount to the subsidy in order to retain this boat in the service for the present year. I would again impress upon him the importance of the service in a local way, because it would be a very serious matter for the people along that coast if the boat was withdrawn on account of the small sum that is being earned.

Mr. WIGMORE: I have received a number of letters and telegrams from different people in St. John with reference to the steamer run by Connors Brothers, from St. John to Dipper harbour, Chance harbour, and Mace's bay. Only this morning I received a telegram from Manchester, Robertson & Allison, of St. John, protesting against the withdrawal of the subsidy for the steamer. Connors Brothers say that if the subsidy is withdrawn they will take the steamer off the route. This is a very important service, because the people in Dipper harbour, Chance harbour, Mace's bay and other small places along that shore depend entirely on this steamer for getting their goods from St. John. If the minister has already decided to withdraw the subsidy I would ask him to reconsider the matter. I am not aware how much the subsidy is, but it is important that this boat be kept on the route, both from the standpoint of the merchants of St. John and the people living in the places at which the steamer calls.

Department of the Interior, salaries, $1,172,125.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: There is a very general idea that not much work is going on at the present time in the Interior Department, on account of there being no immigration, for one thing, and I think the minister should inform us whether it is not possible to reduce the numbers of employees and thereby curtail the expenses of his department. A few years ago an abnormal increase took place in the expenses of this department, under one of the minister's predecessors. Has the minister made any attempt to trim the Estimates this year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am surprised that any one should have the impression that there was not much doing in the Interior Department. There is a way of cutting down the number of employees, and that way has been found and acted upon. The number of employees has been very considerably reduced.

The estimates, instead of going up, have been going down. There has been a very pronounced reduction. Nor has the work been going down at the same time; it is being carried on with as great efficiency and in volume almost as substantial as in previous years. The total reduction this year is some $454,000. There were eighty-one employees taken off. They were connected with the immigration service. The Immigration Department has been created, and consequently the volume of immigration does not affect the Department of the Interior work in any degree; formerly it affected it very heavily. The Interior Department has twenty-five branches, including that of Soldier Settlement. The soldier settlement work, which is now added to the work of the department, is by no means an unsubstantial or negligible amount; it is a factor of great importance in the department, and so long as it is needed it must continue to be a factor of importance. This item is the regular appropriation for Civil Government salaries. The appropriation is $1,172,125, which is an increase of $42,400 over last year, but the statutory increase is $48,737.50, and it cannot be avoided. In giving last year's vote I have, of course, deducted that portion which is attributable to immigration work. Taking that off the figures for this year the statutory increase is lessened by $6,337.50.

Mr. MURPHY: On a previous occasion my hon. friend gave the House some information regarding the mining work that is being carried on by some branch of his department. Does the Mines Branch belong to my hon. friend's department?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is a Mining Branch of the department, under the immediate control of the chief clerk of the department, Mr. Rothwell. That branch administers the mines that are on Dominion Government property. If my hon. friend would care to make any remarks on this subject they would come properly under the appropriate estimates and we are a long way from that yet. The matter will be under Dominion Lands and Parks.

Mr. MURPHY: The Geological Survey is also under my hon. friend's department, is it not?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No; that is under the Secretary of State.

Mr. MURPHY: The Topographical Branch?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Topographical Survey and the Geodetic Survey are under the Department of the Interior, but not the Geological Survey.

Mr. MURPHY: Is it the intention of any of the branches to send out a prospecting or exploration party to British Columbia during the approaching season?

Mr. MEIGHEN: An exploration party is likely to make surveys although I could not say for certain as to that. If any hon. friend would tell me what parties he has in mind and where they are going, it is quite possible that I could give him the information that he desires. It is probable that there will be parties sent out by Dr. Deville, head of the Surveys branch. He is sending three parties into British Columbia. The estimates for that branch have been reduced from $776,300 to $496,300, a reduction of $280,000.

Mr. MURPHY: Now that we are at war I would like to ask the minister as to the character of the employment of the officials in the several branches and to ascertain how many are engaged in war work or in connection with the investigation of minerals required in the prosecution of the war. How many of those who are of military age can be dispensed with and how many should be retained?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think there is any one liable for military service who is sent out with these survey parties. At all events, not one has been since I have been in the department and no application has been made on my part for exemption for any one in the entire department. As to those who are doing work which is directly war work, it is a matter of what is meant by "directly." There are certain parties sent out under Dr. Deville who are surveying land with a view to ascertaining its suitability for soldier settlement and they are perfecting the maps for the Soldier Settlement Board, so that any one calling at the office of the board will be able to get a fair idea of any land or any district where he purposes going. Then we have parties who may be said to be doing war work under general survey work which I will describe when we come to the vote for Dominion Lands and Parks.

Mr. MURPHY: What I want to know is whether those who are to be sent out are going to do work of a general exploratory or academic nature, or if their work is directed towards the investigation of minerals, such as molybdenite, platinum and others which are important in the prosecution of the war.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The parties going out have been directing their attention to those matters.

Mr. J. READ: Does water-power inspection come under the minister's direction?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. J. READ: Is the department making any investigation in regard to the water-powers that exist in the tidal waters of the bay of Fundy with the view of ascertaining whether it is possible to harness that tremendous force of "white coal" that is now going to waste.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have an arrangement with the Government of Nova Scotia, whereby, in co-operation with the water-powers branch of the Department of the Interior, under Mr. Challies, an investigation has been under way for two years. That has to do with the water-powers of Nova Scotia but it doubtless would include the water-powers of the bay of Fundy. We are making an arrangement on similar lines with the province of New Brunswick, and a similar proposition has been made to us from British Columbia.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How many years does it take before the information so obtained will be of use to engineers in enabling them to decide whether there is sufficient water or not?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think that very useful information can be obtained from the Water-powers branch as to any powers in Nova Scotia and as to their availability and usefulness for commercial purposes.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is it published?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Whether it is published for Nova Scotia yet I do not know. Some of it is published but I do not know how full the report is. If my hon. friend would call upon Mr. Challies, or Mr. Johnston who is under him, he would get detailed information as to Nova Scotia water-powers and the same information would be available from the officers of the province of Nova Scotia.

Contingencies—clerical assistance, $28,000; printing and stationery, $45,000; travelling expenses, etc., $32,000.

Mr. MORPHY: How does the minister work out the amount of $32,000 for travelling expenses?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The item is the same as last year. The sum of $23,000 will be required to meet the expenses of the permanent officials of Ottawa who are travelling on Government business, and an amount of $9,000 will be necessary to cover the expenditure connected with telegrams, postage, subscriptions to newspapers, express charges, cab hire, a supply of drinking water and other small items relating to the Inside Service of the department in Ottawa. I think the same amount was voted last year, and I understand that almost all of it was spent.

Mr. MORPHY: Since we shall now have ten or eleven thousand miles of Government railway, will the Government officials still charge up railway fares as before?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The orders have been to use the Government railways wherever it is possible to do so. I do not think that will make any difference in the main, because my impression is—I do not know what the impression of my colleagues is—that it would not be wise to adopt the same principle as to Government railways as is adopted with respect to the franking of mail in the Post Office service, and that the Government railways should be credited with their real earnings.

Expenses connected with the Dominion Astronomical Observatory at Ottawa, $25,000.

Mr. MURPHY: Is this the usual vote?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it could be said to be. Last year the Astronomical Observatory, the International Boundary Commission, and the Geodetic Service, were all included in one vote. This year the services are divided so as to show the apportionment of money to each. This is the apportionment for the Astronomical Service at Ottawa. The vote is the same as last year.

Mr. MORPHY: Who is the chief of the Astronomical Service now?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Dr. Klotz.

Mr. MORPHY: He succeeded the late Dr. King, did he?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He succeeded Dr. King in so far as the Ottawa Observatory is concerned. Dr. King, however, had charge of all the branches that I have just mentioned. Dr. Klotz is just the chief of the one service.

Mr. MORPHY: Is he a permanent officer?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Expenses connected with the Dominion Astrophysical Observatory at Victoria, B. C., $7,500.

Mr. MURPHY: Will the minister be good enough to explain the item?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is a new item and it is the only increase in the total vote, the reason being that this is the first year this Observatory has been in existence.

Geodetic Survey of Canada—Investigations, triangulation, precise levelling, topographic and field astronomic work, etc., $112,005.

Mr. MORPHY: When is this branch of work going to be concluded?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It will occupy many years. The Geodetic Survey was undertaken a few years ago, and an organization was established to carry it out. This survey involves very many years of scientific work. I am inclined to the view that if we had anticipated the war we would have deferred the establishment of the organization. As it is established, however, we are carrying it on on such a scale as not to necessitate the disbanding of the organization altogether. It is a very important service, there can be no doubt of that. We are establishing points throughout Canada with that precise, scientific accuracy that will enable all engineering work, and all surveys hereafter to be related to those points, to be the better carried on and with a certainty that will dispense with litigation and get rid of many difficulties that heretofore all surveys have encountered. I may say that all countries are carrying on this work. The item is the same as last year.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I think this would be a suitable opportunity to bring to the attention of the committee a statement which has been handed to me, entitled "Memorandum re An Economic Route for Completion of Inland Deep Waterway" which is signed by a very eminent engineer of the city of Ottawa, Mr. Noulan Cauchon. I wonder if my hon. friend has heard of this project. Perhaps I might be permitted to read the memorandum so that it may be placed in Hansard:

Ottawa, 24th May, 1916.

Ottawa.

MEMORANDUM RE AN ECONOMIC ROUTE FOR COMPLETION OF INLAND DEEP WATERWAY.

The New Welland Canal.

Now that the Country is committed to and constructing the New Welland Canal, it follows as a logical consequence that the 25 (25-30) foot draft must ultimately be carried through to Montreal and tide water.

Pending this outcome the New Welland Canal appears as an unproductive load of $60,000,000 to ourselves, but of some benefit to our neighbours.

The St. Lawrence Canals—Deepening and Enlarging.

The St. Lawrence Canals are 14 foot draft. They begin at Cardinal and end at Montreal, embracing 45 miles of canals, including 18 locks. There are also about 68 miles of river stretches.

The principle upon which the St. Lawrence canals depend for their depth and their further deepening is that of lowering the bed of the locks and canals, and also where necessary of the channels in the river stretches as well. The St. Lawrence canals being mainly along an International Waterway, the surface levels could not be disturbed, I take it, without complications with vested interests and the United States.

Due to the foregoing conditions, I have estimated the cost of the deepening and the enlarging of the St. Lawrence canals and river stretches at about $150,000,000, as the construction work would be mainly under water work and much rock, of an expensive variety.

Deepening these canals necessarily entails "scrapping" existing works which have cost over $25,000,000, yet retaining their cost in the capitalization of the improvements.

As the opportunity is denied of retaining depth on the St. Lawrence, by dams, the alternative, the deepening and widening of the channels will accelerate the flow and cause earlier and longer low water.

Similar results have followed the continuous deepening of the St. Lawrence channel between Montreal and Quebec; the writer believes in barrages and locks to obtain depth there instead of continuing further deepening and also as a means of redeeming the evil results of the past methods.

Any tendency to lower Lake Ontario level would arouse United States protest and bring international complications; our own harbours on Lake Ontario would likewise be depreciated.

The Georgian Bay Canal.

The other alternative for a deep waterway from Port Arthur to Montreal has been the proposed Georgian Bay Canal.

The principle upon which the required depth in the Georgian Bay Canal is obtained is that of building dams and raising the level of the river, generally so providing the required depth not only in a channel but over a considerable width affording freer movement for vessels; a fairway.

The cost of the Georgian Bay Canal would now probably run to at least $150,000,000, due to the increased cost of living and of materials and the greater disturbance of established conditions.

The New Route.

I propose that the Great Lakes Route be accepted via the Welland to Cardinal at the head of the St. Lawrence rapids and canals.

I find that a deep canal can be, easily, carried through at Lake Ontario level from Cardinal to the vicinity of Ottawa, at which latter point it would require a 105 foot drop to the proposed level of the Ottawa river (say by three locks).

The canal on leaving the St. Lawrence would be through a 30 foot cut for three miles or so and then through level rich farming land as a level ditch following the contour of a gently sloping side hill.

The distance is about 50 miles from the St. Lawrence to the Ottawa, and would cost about $50,000,000. I am confident that the estimated cost would be much reduced on actual survey.

Using the Ottawa River—Ottawa to Montreal.

As already shown the attainment of the required levels in the Georgian Bay Canal, particularly in that portion of it which I propose to use, would be comparatively simple and inexpensive, due to its accomplishment mainly through the means of two dams and the consequent raising of the river levels.

In proposing the adoption of that portion of the Georgian Bay Canal from Ottawa to Montreal, I would draw attention to the fact that there are only five locks which with the two dams afford long stretches of uninterrupted fairway.

Moreover the cost of the Georgian Bay Canal from Ottawa to Montreal as given in the Government estimates of that scheme is about $30,000,000, and owing to the work being all included in a few structures, the margin of error in the estimates should not be very great. As to that portion of the Georgian Bay Canal which extends from Ottawa westward and includes such a great amount of rock work, there is of course a larger margin of probable increase in estimate, and under the present conditions I have therefore assumed the total cost of the Georgian Bay Canal at about $150,000,000 for comparative purposes.

Summary.

Comparative Approximate Estimate.

Alternatives:—
Georgian Bay Canal, 22 ft., or deepening St. Lawrence Canals, 14 to 22 ft.		$150,000,000
New canal from Cardinal to Ottawa, 30 ft.	$50,000,000
Adopting Georgian Bay Canal, Ottawa to Montreal	30,000,000
		$ 80,000,000
		$ 70,000,000
Saving of St. Lawrence Canals		25,000,000
Total advantage by new route		$ 95,000,000 to which may be added many millions from non-interference with the country's traffic during the busy seasons of several years.

The saving of the St. Lawrence canals, as mentioned would have the further advantage of leaving us with two routes from Cardinal to Montreal.

From the foregoing it is my opinion that the scheme which I have outlined would mean an economic saving to this country of over $100,000,000, better than by the deepening of the St. Lawrence canals or the building of the Georgian Bay Canal.

It would seem wise in the public interest to establish now by a preliminary survey the cheaper and thereby more likely and nearer fulfilment of our needs.

The required survey should cost about $20,000.

N. Cauchon.

Of course, a matter of this kind would specially pertain to the Department of Public Works. But the conclusions are rather addressed to my hon. friend (Mr. Meighen), because the country cannot commit itself at the present juncture to such a vast expenditure. The writer of this article, who is a well known authority, asks that preliminary surveys be made by the Department of the Interior. I would ask the minister to read this communication, which is now on Hansard, and submit it to the officers of the Geodetic Survey. Mr. Cauchon is of the opinion that the construction of this canal between Cardinal and Ottawa would save a tremendous amount of money and would solve the question of transportation.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Will the minister state approximately how many miles have been surveyed? What is the total amount of precise levelling done by the Geodetic Survey?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think there is a misapprehension as to the Geodetic Survey. To the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) I may say that the project which he read could not be taken up by the Geodetic Survey. The Geodetic Survey merely fixes the precise location of points, and surveying for other purposes is made with reference to these fixed determined points. The subject covered by the memorandum would come entirely under the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I know that. But the inception of the work is with the Geodetic Survey, on which the other surveys are based.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In so far as that is concerned, the Geodetic Survey now has work under way along the St. Lawrence, and, I think, has work under way at all points where it will be available for the surveys of engineers who may go out in pursuance of such a suggestion. But the initiative in this matter is with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell), and, with his well known views on economy in war time. I am afraid he is very likely not to embark on it at present. The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) asks as to the number of miles surveyed. There are no miles surveyed at all in the Geodetic Survey. It merely locates points. Surveys that are made longitudinally and latitudinally are made by the Topographical Surveys under Dr. Deville.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I have here the report of the Interior Department for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1917, and on page 24 I see:

> The total amount of precise levelling of the Geodetic survey of Canada is now over 9,700 miles, and about 2,800 standard bench-marks have been established.

I wanted to know if the number of miles had increased during the fiscal year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What my hon. friend refers to is the levelling. It is an item included in this vote, but it is known as "precise levelling." That is the mileage covered. He asks whether it is equal to last year's or not. Last year's amount equalled the previous year, and this year's it is estimated, will be about the same.

> Expenses connected with the survey and demarcation of International Boundaries including $1,000 to J. J. McArthur as International Boundary Commissioner, $60,495.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Has the department the same number of parties working on these surveys?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. The work is undertaken jointly by the United States and Canada. We have had the same number working this year as last. We have the same number as the Americans have.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Is this a necessary work to be performed during the war?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is pursuant to the Treaty, and is nearly completed. It is expected the coming season will see the completion of the survey and demarcation of the international boundaries.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Wnat will it cost to complete this survey?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This item completes it.

Mr. ROBB: A few years ago, the minister of the day made the statement that in the negotiations with the United States we were arranging for two hundred feet of a neutral zone to be used as a highway along the international line. Has any progress been made in these negotiations?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think so.

Government of the Northwest Territories—salary of Mr. George D. Pope as accountant to the commissioner, $300.

Mr. MORPHY: What salary does this gentleman get besides the amount mentioned here?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Pope is head of the Revenue Branch of the Interior Department, in which capacity he receives a salary of $3,300. Mr. Du Plessis, secretary to the commissioner, is under the Northwest Mounted Police Department, at a salary, I believe, of $2,300 or $2,400.

Mr. MORPHY: What extra work does he do for this $300? It is so small that it looks like a sort of Christmas box.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I really cannot give any information further than may be inferred from the name of his office. I assume that he conducts all the correspondence for the commissioner.

Government of the Yukon Territory, $185,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is a very radical reduction here of $135,000. In administration alone a reduction of $35,000 is effected, due to the reorganization of the whole administrative machinery of the Yukon. Large numbers of officers have been relieved of their duties, with considerable saving to the country. The following offices are abolished: commissioner, $12,000, excepting $3,000 which he received during the period of his enlistment; administrator, $6,000; registrar, $5,000; director of surveys, $3,500; mining inspector, $3,300; draftsman, $3,000; clerk, $2,700; clerk, $2,160; legal adviser, $3,500; mining recorder, $3,300; mining recorder, $3,000. Assistant gold commissioner, Whitehorse, $6,500, office continued; clerk, $2,400, office continued.

Mr. CAHILL: Has any provision been made for the men whose offices have been abolished?

Mr. MEIGHEN: All members of the original party which went up there got their aggregate leave of absence, that is to say, the holidays which had accrued, and were also paid their expenses. The Director of Surveys was simply stationed there. He is still in the department, but he does not get his Yukon allowance.

Dominion Lands and Parks—salaries of the Outside Service, $440,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is a reduction of $45,000, effected in this way: Seven Dominion land offices and twenty-two sub-offices in Western Canada have been closed and the work is being carried on by the staffs of the remaining offices, with some additions from those closed.

5 p.m.

Mr. CAHILL: Are any homestead lands now open for settlement by civilians?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, all excepting those reserved.

Mr. CAHILL: What lands are reserved?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Speaking generally, all lands within fifteen miles of any railway.

Mr. CAHILL: Is it the intention to continue to allow settlers to go on lands which are twenty, thirty or forty miles from a railway?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no embargo on that. A man can settle on any homestead land that is available, land that is surveyed and thrown open for settlement, if it is not held for soldier settlement or otherwise.

Mr. CAHILL: Would not this be a good time to put an embargo on the outlying lands instead of allowing people to settle anywhere out in the West, and then cry for railroads? The department should adopt some policy of directing the settlement of homestead lands.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The only way in which that could be effectually done would be to withdraw homesteads from entry and perhaps abolish the homesteading privilege altogether, and then sell lands only as may be thought wise. In this way men could not settle at far-away points and the obligation to build railways to those points would not be incurred. No decision has yet been reached on that subject.

Mr. CAHILL: Has it been considered.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The subject has been considered in a general way.

Surveys, examination of survey returns, printing of plans, $496,300.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: How many parties will be employed this year in the survey?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Thirty-seven.

Protection of timber in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, the Northwest Territories, and the railway belt in British Columbia; tree culture in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and inspection and management of Forest Reserves, $650,000.

Mr. ROSS: I should like to have a statement from the minister of what is being done in this connection. A report was laid on the Table last night, but we have not yet had an opportunity of perusing it. I understand, from a notice I saw in the press, that that report is in connection with this item. This is one of the most important branches of the work of the Department of the Interior. Not very long ago I had an opportunity of reading a report made, in December, 1916, I think, by a special committee appointed in Great Britain, consisting of some of the most eminent men. Their report dealt with this question of timber, and it was pointed out that after Russia and the United States, Canada was, so far as supplying timber to the British Empire was concerned, the third nation in importance. It was also pointed out that in recent years Great Britain had depended upon Russia for her supply of timber, as we were shipping most of ours to the United States. Great stress was laid upon the fact that for the defence of the Empire a sufficient supply of timber was most essential. In view of the fact that Great Britain can no longer depend upon supplies of timber from Russia, in view of the critical stage in which the war now is, and also in view of the importance placed upon the timber supply to the Empire, I should like to know what policy the department is pursuing in this matter. I see the item is not increased. In the report it was stated—I am speaking entirely from memory—that the governments of Great Britain and the overseas Dominions were in communication on the subject. What communications have been received by this Government? And what steps are being taken to follow the suggestions made in that report?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: The subject to which my hon. friend alludes has been under review, not by the department, but by a subcommittee of the Reconstruction Committee of the Government, the vice-chairman of which is the Hon. Mr. Maclean. I know that that subcommittee has made a preliminary report, but if it has made a final report no copy has been sent to the chief of the Forestry Branch. This appropriation is the same as last year. I could not see my way clear to make any reduction in it. More money is now required to do the same work as in previous years unless one can effect a better organization. That I am trying to do.

Mr. ROSS: I am not asking the minister to make a reduction in the amount. I am suggesting, in view of the situation in Great Britain, it might be wise to increase it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should like very much to do so, but I do not see my way clear. The importance of the work no one can over-estimate. The preservation of our forests means the preservation of one of the main assets of Canada. I do not think, however, that under present conditions we can justify an increased expenditure under this heading.

Mr. CAHILL: To what extent is tree culture being carried on?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the sum of $60,000 of this amount is attributable to that head. There are established in the West stations at which tree culture is carried on. The trees are, as a rule, given free to farmers who wish to use them. My hon. friend, knowing conditions in the West, knows that one is performing a real service when he increases the number of trees in the almost treeless plains.

Mr. CAHILL: Where are the stations located?

Mr. MEIGHEN: At Indian Head and Saskatoon.

Mr. CAHILL: Are those all there are in the West?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. CAHILL: There are none in Alberta?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Is there any co-operation between the department and the provincial forest services in regard to the protection of forests?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. I do not know that I can exactly define the extent of it. There are two main branches of our work.

Forest protection is carried on with considerable intensity in our own reserves, which are the reserves that we should exert our energies to protect. We carry on, not so intensively, another work in the other forests of the Dominion. Our duty is, in the main, to preserve the forests owned by ourselves. Nothing definite has been agreed upon in regard to co-operation with the provinces, although they are getting the benefit of some of our work. The provinces protect their own timber.

Mr. ROSS: Have any special precautions been taken in recent years for protecting the forests from fire?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. For instance, we are establishing a system of licensing whereby a permit must be obtained before any fire can be set on unpatented lands. The provinces are doing the same with regard to their lands, and we utilize their officials as far as possible. Then we have a patrol system extending through our whole forest area.

Grant to Canadian Forestry Association, $3,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is this for the annual convention of the Forestry Association?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is for the general work of the association, of which the convention is an important feature.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I think it is an excellent idea to give the association this small grant, because it is doing good work. I must say on behalf of my province that the Commission of Conservation has paid great tribute to the work performed by the Forestry Department of the province of Quebec. The Commission of Conservation in their last report state that Quebec stands ahead of all provinces in the matter of forest protection, and Sir Clifford Sifton in the same report pays high tribute to Mr. Piché, the forestry engineer of the province of Quebec. In fact, the other provinces, notably New Brunswick, have asked the government of the province of Quebec to loan Mr. Piché and his staff to organize the same service in their provinces. I think with a proper, up to date, organization in the different provinces we could save large tracts of forest from the fires that are caused by railway trains and by smokers cruising the forests. I hope the Forestry Association will continue its good work and that the department will substantially help it with a grant.

To pay expenses connected with water-power investigations and reports in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the railway belt in British Columbia, $144,000.

Mr. CAHILL: This seems a large item in these times.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is a reduction of $15,000 as compared with last year, although I do not think there has been any reduction in the volume of work carried on. I do not see how we could afford, even now, to neglect to procure all possible information about the primary sources of our power and make it available for capital, because there never was a time when water-powers were more needed than now, and there never will be a time when the development of our water-powers will mean so much to this country as within the next ten years.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Are these investigations carried on only in those provinces where the natural resources are owned by the Dominion Government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: While we give special attention to the water-powers that are owned by the Dominion, we make arrangements with the provinces to place our staff at their disposal on fair terms, meaning in every case a charge upon us. We have already made such an arrangement with Nova Scotia and are making a similar arrangement, I understand, with New Brunswick and are prepared to do so with any province.

For surveys and works under the Irrigation Act, etc., including $400 for P. Marchand as auditor of disbursements made by companies acquiring lands under the Irrigation system, $169,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would the minister leave an item on which I could discuss irrigation matters, as I have not the data with me now?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. We will leave one item.

Canadian National Parks, $300,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is this for the buffalo herds and such like?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This includes all the parks. We have over three thousand buffalo, and I believe the calf crop this year is estimated at between seven and eight hundred.

Mr. LEMIEUX: They multiply fast.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are doing very well.

Administration of the North West Game Act and the Migratory Birds Act, $18,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not remember just what was the scope of the Migratory Birds' Act passed a year or so ago, but I should like to call the minister's attention to a famous rock in the Gulf of St. Lawrence called Birds' rock. It is one of the most picturesque sights in the Gulf, and in normal times is visited every year by many tourists from America and even Europe, who go there to see the millions of birds—and there are literally millions of them. Some years ago some enterprising American and even Canadian business men started to kill the birds for use in ornamenting ladies' hats, and the eggs were stolen with a view to selling them. I do not know whether the Migratory Birds Act applies to those sea birds in the Gulf of St. Lawrence or not but I would ask my hon. friend to look into this matter and get some information in regard to it. It would be a sorry day if these bird species were to disappear from Canada. When I say that there are millions of birds on this rock I do not exaggerate. The rock itself is about the size of the grounds around this building and there is enough space on the top of the rock, which is about three hundred feet high, to enable the lighthouse keeper to live there. He has a cow or two and he can have a few hens on the rock, but all the sides of the rock are inhabited by these birds. When the steamer goes nearby it is easy to see these birds by the millions. Strange to say, the first people to protest against the destruction of these birds were the Boston people. They are very good people as I know. I remember having read in some publication in New England a protest against the destruction of these birds. The Migratory Birds Act should apply to sea birds as well as to land birds. Does my hon. friend know anything about this matter?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The rock to which my hon. friend refers, I believe, is called Percé rock.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Percé rock is another one; it is near the land and within Chaleur bay. As a matter of fact, some years ago there were many sea birds on that rock but they have been disappearing at a terrible rate every year, although there is still a large number there. The rock I have been referring to belongs to the Magdalen Islands group, about ten or twelve miles from Bryon island. There are three or four rocks at that place. This one is called Birds rock and from afar it looks like a big stone tower in the sea. It is about the size of these grounds; it is three hundred feet wide and of a round configuration and in the interstices of the rock around the edge there are millions and millions of birds of many kinds. Some people approach the rock but not on stormy days, because it is very difficult to land there. The sides are very steep and there is no shallow water around the rock. The lighthouse keeper is obliged to use a hoist for his provisions. When the steamer comes in the fall to take his family away, or in the spring to bring his family, they have to use a hoist; there is no other means of getting access to the summit. I believe that the Department of Marine and Fisheries should not allow the lighthouse keeper to use a gun for signalling purposes. Every time the gun is fired the birds rise in flight. It is a necessity I suppose and perhaps I should not object to it, but I do most decidedly object to the persistent destruction of these birds by parties coming from all parts of Canada and the United States who kill the birds for their feathers and take the eggs. The Government of Canada should protect this bird sanctuary.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Migratory Birds Act covers under its provisions all migratory birds, whether sea or land birds. The rock to which my hon. friend refers is Birds rock. I will have to introduce what I propose to say by reference to Percé rock. That being a natural bird sanctuary, negotiations were carried on with the Quebec Government for some time with a view of establishing it as such, the intention of the department being, first, that it should be so established provincially. But that not being accepted, we have tried for some time to have it so established under our own department. The Conservation Commission has also treated with the Quebec Government for some years to the same end, but so far without success; not that they are opposed to this being done but there has been some difficulty in securing the title. Options were taken but they could not get sufficient options to cover it all. While we have looked to the same end in connection with Birds rock very little progress has been made. The same situation applies to Birds rock as to Percé rock. The killing of migratory birds on this rock is now forbidden under the Act. The Quebec legislature has passed legislation which conforms to the legislation of the Migratory Birds Act, so that now any one will be committing a breach of the law who destroys birds there, and it is within the power of the local Government to enforce the law. Of course, it comes under the general provisions of the Migratory Birds Act as well, but it is made a bird sanctuary for the reasons I have given.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the department been in communication with the Quebec Government in regard to the matter?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If it is the intention of the department to make these two rocks sanctuaries for birds I would assist my hon. friend with the Quebec Government, because I think it is the wish of the people of Canada as a whole that these birds should be preserved.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is it the duty of anybody to see that the Act is enforced along the coasts of the Maritime Provinces?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Act is based on the principle of provincial co-operation, and as the provinces have jurisdiction it is the intention that each province shall pass an Act conforming to this Act and take charge of its administration.

Engraving, lithographing, printing and preparation of maps, plans and kindred publications of the Dominion, including necessary materials for same, $74,375.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the cause of the increase in this item?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is entirely due to the increased cost of paper.

Mr. BUREAU: Should not the expense under this particular heading be decreased? I understand that a great deal of the expenditure for lithographing and printing, and for the preparation of maps, and so on, heretofore, has been incurred by the Immigration Branch in its work of attracting immigrants to Canada?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is a different item altogether. This particular work is under the chief geographer. What my hon. friend refers to would be under the Natural Resources Commission. This particular vote consists of two divisions. The sum of $31,100 is the estimate of the chief geographer, which shows an increase of $600. What my hon. friend refers to has nothing to do with that. The next item is the estimate of the Superintendent of the Natural Resources Intelligence Branch, $35,000, which shows an increase of $7,675. That increase also is due entirely to a thirty per cent increase in the cost of printing.

Mr. BUREAU: Does not the expenditure for the preparation of maps showing the mining areas, the timber areas, etc., in Canada, come under the item of Natural Resources?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: Is not that part of the literature which is used by the Immigration Department?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. If so, it would come under the immigration vote. This is for maps and reports of practical value in placing before the public accurate, graphic evidence of the economic aspect of the natural resources of the Dominion; special attention being given to those resources the development of which is essential on account of the war. It is vitally necessary, in view of the economic conditions in Canada, that the Dominion be in a position to meet legitimate inquiries concerning these resources and their development. The present year has shown an increase of 107 per cent over the preceding year in the demand for information of this nature.

Mr. BUREAU: The other day I received a report which I have not yet had time to carefully peruse. It seems to be the report of the commission appointed by the Government to investigate the natural resources of Canada, its mining possibilities, and so forth. May I ask if that commission is the same as that now under discussion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know what commission my hon. friend refers to, unless it would be the Economic and Development Commission. If that is so that commission procured a great deal of its data from our Natural Resources Intelligence Branch, which is under Mr. F. C. C. Lynch.

Mr. BUREAU: To whom does the commission which I have reference to, report?

Mr. MEIGHEN: To the Prime Minister, at least that is my recollection.

Mr. BUREAU: Is he the minister in charge of that particular commission?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the commission referred to was appointed in something like the same manner as the Food Controller was appointed at first, and that it is reporting direct to the Prime Minister. I may be wrong, but that is my impression. There is a commission known as the Imperial Resources Commission, which I think is under Colonel Cantlie.

Mr. BUREAU: Can any of the information which is obtained from Mr. Lynch's branch be used by the commission under Colonel Cantlie, and is this an Imperial or a Dominion commission?

Mr. MEIGHEN: A Dominion commission. I think it is known as the Imperial Resources Commission.

Mr. BUREAU: So it appears we have triplicate commissions engaged in kindred work. There is the commission to inquire into our economic resources, another to inquire into our industrial resources, and the one that we are considering dealing with our natural resources. I suggest to the minister that money might be saved by handing over to these commissions the information collected by his department, so that it can be used by them in conducting their investigations.

Mr. MEIGHEN: While it may be true that the Imperial Resources Commission obtained information from the Natural Resources Intelligence Branch, they would not get from it all the information that is to be found embodied in their reports. I have seen some of the reports of that commission and they seem to me to be very valuable. The present vote is for maps. There is, for example, the homestead map of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, for which a vote of $7,150 is asked. This series of homestead maps is in demand more and more every year. There is a similar homestead map of Northern Alberta; an elevator map of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta; a serial map of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and, in addition, there are bank maps. These comprise a bank map of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, a bank map of Ontario and Quebec, a bank map of the Maritime Provinces, a bank map of British Columbia, and so forth. I may say that the hon. member can get access to these maps at any time, and they will show the position that every parcel of land is in—whether it is Crown land, or whether it is homestead land, and if so, of what character; whether it is alienated or not, and if it is alienated, whether it is cultivated or not; if it is not alienated, whether it is cultivated or not.

Mr. BUREAU: Are the maps printed each year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is the sixteenth edition of the homestead maps. I do not think the map I have just described was ever printed before until this year. I think Mr. Lynch has only completed those maps recently. The value of the information obtainable from them, and their clearness, is a real revelation.

Mr. BUREAU: Does that cover the three provinces of Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. BUREAU: Some of these maps were sent to me during the recess on which the homestead lands taken up and their character were indicated by shades of colour. I would like to know if the same map, showing the lands disposed of, is printed every year, and if so why the old "cut" could not be used, with appropriate markings to show what lands had been disposed of in the interval?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That doubtless is done with reference to the homestead maps, but the new maps were not intended for homestead maps. I think the natural resources map contains information that never was shown before.

Mr. BUREAU: In what line?

Mr. MEIGHEN: As to the cultivation, as to the purposes for which the lands are being used, and the purposes for which they are yet available.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: The hon. gentleman speaks of a Dominion commission under the control of this Government bearing the name of the Imperial Resources Commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Does not the minister think the resources of this country are primarily national resources, and that the good old name of National Resources Commission should be retained? What is the meaning of "Imperial Resources Commission?"

Mr. MEIGHEN: I may have the name wrong, but I do not think I have. I think the significance of it is entirely misapprehended by my hon. friend.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I do not like these names which mean nothing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They have no particular repugnance to me. The word "Imperial" there, if it is the proper word, would be intended to signify this: the resources of Canada, belonging to Canada solely, that could be used for the Imperial purposes of the war. It may be "Imperial War Resources Commission," I am not quite sure. But I think the word "Imperial" is used

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Is the hon. gentleman sure that it is intended only for the war?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. All the reports I saw in reference to that, I am sure, are only for the purpose of the war.

Mr. BUREAU: Even if they are only for the war, why not name it the Canadian Resources Commission? That would not prevent the resources of Canada being used by Great Britain—

An hon. MEMBER: Or by the Allies.

Mr. BUREAU: I think the point raised by my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) is well taken. If it is a question of the natural resources which we are to supply to the Allies, in the shape of ore or anything else, they should be furnished as coming from Canada, as Canadian and not Imperial. That will arouse a proper spirit, and make our people develop proper pride, and perhaps we may come closer together if the word "Canadian" is held more in honour.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I am glad the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) is now in his seat. As he is going to leave shortly for England, I am glad he has listened to the remarks that have just been made, and hope that he will make everybody understand that the resources of Canada are national resources, Canadian resources.

Mr. BUREAU: The same as all the rest.

Mr. ROWELL: I am glad to have heard the remarks of my hon. friend. I always listen to him with pleasure.

Mr. BUREAU: The listening is very easy. What impression has it made on the hon. gentleman?

Mr. ROWELL: Very favourable.

Mr. BUREAU: It is not the listening we care about, it is what will be the result of the listening when he goes over to the other side. We want to know what impression he is getting.

Mr. ROWELL: A very favourable impression.

Mr. MORPHY: While we are on this subject, I may suggest a compromise. We will call it the "British-Canadian War Resources Commission."

Mr. BUREAU: I take exception to that. I think there is an imputation in the use of the term "British-Canadian." We all know that what is Canadian is British. I object to that name being accepted.

Ordnance Lands, salaries and expenses, $1,695.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not know whether the minister has the information at hand, but if he has not, I take this opportunity of asking him if he would send me a letter regarding ordnance lands in Trois Rivières. I have tried to get exactly what the area of these lands is, situated in the centre of the city, where the public buildings are erected. I once made application to get a plan, but did not get what I wanted. I would ask the minister if it would not be possible to get a plan or blueprint showing the limits of this property.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will procure that and send it to the hon. member.

Sir SAM HUGHES: If I remember rightly, these lands are in charge of the Militia Department. Plans were sent to the hon. member once before, I remember looking it up. All the lands we hold there are the drill hall, the parade ground up on the hill, and some land on the hill.

Mr. BUREAU: What I received was a plan of the military camp, which is under the control of the Militia Department. But the land in the centre of the town, on the river front, was not indicated on that plan.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I thought it was.

Grant to Alpine Club of Canada, $1,000.

Mr. McMASTER: I would like to know what this club is and why it should be an object of public benefactions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That question occurred to me also when the item was under review. But it is thought that the grant is worth the money. It is much on the same principle as the grant to our parks. The advertisement which the mountains and scenery of Canada receive through the activities of the club is worth the money to this country, just on the same principle as by the tourist traffic encouraged the money spent on our parks is becoming more and more an asset and a profitable investment for this country.

Mr. McMASTER: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with care to the explanation made by the minister, but I must say that I cannot follow him in what he says. Mountain climbing is a sport of wealthy folk, and the Government propose to give, at a time of stress and strain like this, one thousand dollars to this club. I protested very strongly the other evening against a grant of $5,000 to assist in cultivating the habit of eating fish in Toronto, in other words a gift of $5,000 to the Toronto Exhibition, which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries told me was to be spent on fish dinners.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is a good thing for Toronto to eat fish.

Mr. McMASTER: That is not the question. What I would impress very strongly upon the minister is that the Government are asking the people of Canada for sacrifice, and are properly asking the people to economize in every possible way. What will the man on the small salary—for he is the man above all who is hit hard by present conditions—think when he hears that the Dominion Government has given $1,000 to a club of rich folk to climb mountains in the West? It may be quite proper to encourage this sport in time of peace, although I doubt it very much. I am not in favour of this artificial stimulation of the climbing industry or any other industry. In time of war this is an improper grant, and I hope the minister will follow the dictates of his own common sense by cutting it out altogether. If I can find a seconder I will so move, unless the minister feels he should cut it out. It should not be in the Estimates in the fourth year of a world war.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is this a grant to the Alpine Club or is it to support the Swiss mountaineers who are laying out paths all through the Rockies? I understand there are a number of Swiss mountaineers living in the Columbia valley, who are opening up pathways all through the mountains for the use of rich and poor. Is the grant for them or for the Alpine Club?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is a vote to the Alpine Club direct; it has nothing to do with the people referred to by my hon. friend (Sir Sam Hughes). The member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) is proceeding on a wrong hypothesis. The club is not an association of rich people. Indeed, one who has been active in its work is a poorly-paid Presbyterian minister. Others are school teachers.

Mr. McMASTER: If we make a special grant to the poor Presbyterian minister, I shall not object so strongly. But I do not like this grant to the club and I ask the minister to withdraw it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The vote is not in the nature of a charitable grant; it is in the nature of an investment. The work of this association is of an exploratory character and is of benefit to the country because of the advertising which it gives to Canada. They publish an annual report, which goes all over the world.

Mr. McMASTER: I move that this item be struck out.

[Mr. Lemieux.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suggest that this item pass, because it is part of one estimate, and if this item stands the whole estimate will have to stand. The member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) may bring up the matter he wishes to discuss under the Indian Lands estimates.

Mr. LEMIEUX: All right.

Amendment (Mr. McMaster) negatived on division.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If the hon. gentleman has any more estimates, let us take them now, and then adjourn.

Mr. McMASTER: Let us sit to-night and get through.

Mr. BUREAU: We can keep on until eight o'clock and then adjourn.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What is the proposal; are we to sit after six?

The CHAIRMAN: The understanding is that, by mutual consent, the Committee will sit until the Indian Lands estimates are passed, and that when the Committee rises the House will adjourn until Monday at eleven o'clock.

Soldiers' Land Settlement, $2,916,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is the first vote under the Soldier Settlement Act, 1917. The Soldier Settlement Board, appointed on January 31st last under the Act, consists of Mr. Samuel Maber, acting chairman, formerly head of the British Columbia Lands Branch of the Department of the Interior, who is serving on this board without extra salary; Mr. C. F. Rowland, and Major Ashton. Mr. Maber is an old officer of the department and was appointed in order that we might have the benefit of his wide experience and his excellent ability as a departmental officer. The activities of the board were first addressed to the taking care of such loans to returned soldiers as would be necessary to enable them to do their spring seeding. Very satisfactory results have been accomplished. Applications have been disposed of to the number of 272. The advances in loans amount to $341,558, an average for each settler of $1,256. The Dominion land agencies throughout the country have been made agencies of the Soldier Settlement Board in order to avoid the expense of a duplicated organization.

6 p.m.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have you adopted the famous Van Horne plan of radial colonies? Do you take the lands here and there without regard to the number of returned soldiers applying for them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We do not select the land for them. The soldier may settle on Dominion lands and get free entry. It is quite true that only a limited area of good land is available, but I think there is enough to enable the board to be very useful to the soldier, for a time at all events. So far the board has not encouraged settlement in communities. The soldier may buy his own land anywhere, or if he has land and can give the board a first mortgage thereon, he is entitled to a twenty-year loan at 5 per cent. This is the class of men who have so far chiefly availed themselves of the Act, although in some cases they have gone on unpatented homestead lands. I cannot say how many have made entries because our regulations have only recently been adopted. The machinery, however, is complete for taking care of entries made by returned soldiers.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka): Is it the intention of the board to allot this land at present? If the area of available land is limited, what will be done in the case of soldiers who return two or three years hence?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In governmental services we very seldom make arrangements for two or three years hence. It is sufficient to take care of the present and the immediate future. As a matter of general policy, however, it is my desire and the desire of the Government to work towards co-operative arrangements with the various provinces. Some progress has already been made to that end. We want to make arrangements whereby the assistance of the Dominion Government can be given to provincial plans and policies of soldier settlement, because we want to have regard to the fundamental principle of our constitution that the control of patented lands, civil rights and local administration is in the province.

Mr. NESBITT: Is there any intention of giving the soldier in the province of Ontario assistance to locate on land or in such business as he might carry on?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. We have not yet got our organization in Ontario. We had first to take care of those districts from which the demands for land came, or where there was an immediate necessity of providing money, but we are now engaged in the work of establishing an organization in Ontario. It will be available for all soldiers settling in Ontario who select, or who have, land in that province and can avail themselves of the privilege of the Act and give the Soldier Settlement Board a mortgage on their land. Any one so settling can get a loan of $2,500 if the value of his land warrants that being done. As to any scheme of soldier settlement generally, we hope, having in view the acquirement of land for the purpose, to work in co-operation with the Ontario Government.

Mr. CAHILL: What basis of security is the Government taking for the loans they have made to the 272 settlers? I was in the office of the Soldier Settlement Board some time ago, and from the regulations as outlined to me by one of the commissioners, it did not seem to me that the proposal was of any great benefit to the soldier. I understood the purpose was to advance to the soldier settler about fifty per cent of the value of his land or undertaking. He could borrow as much as that from any one, but he is, perhaps, getting it at a little better rate of interest than he would be charged by a loan company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He gets very considerable advantages. There is, of course, a limit to what can be done, because we must remember that the number of returned soldiers now is small as compared with what it will be, and that the standard of assistance set for one must be set for all. The soldier is entitled to get a loan, first of all on his soldier entry to which he does not get title. That loan nobody else can get. The soldier gets it at five per cent, repayable on the amortization plan in twenty years. He gets it without cost; he has no solicitor's fees to pay, as that is all taken care of by the board. And the soldier is able to get a larger per cent of the value of his property as a loan than would the ordinary settler.

Mr. CAHILL: What per cent?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It varies, depending upon the quantity of lands immediately available for cultivation, on the revenue bearing power of the property more than on its immediate value in the market. But I think as high as 70 or 75 per cent has been advanced.

Mr. MOWAT: The question asked by my hon. and gallant friend from Muskoka (Mr. Peter McGibbon) raises a question which I am not sure has sunk into the mind of either the minister or any other hon. member. My hon. friend has pointed to the time "when the boys come home." At the present time there are vastly greater numbers overseas than there are in Canada, and I am told there is a feeling overseas that the soldiers' interests should wait for consideration until the main body comes home. Here is a question again as to there being just so much available land, and it is very important that the Government should keep in mind that the main body is still overseas. As I understand the matter, soldiers are divided in feeling to some extent. Two returned soldiers have called upon me lately protesting against claims that have been presented by self-constituted champions of the returned soldiers.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who are they? Veterans?

Mr. MOWAT: These soldiers want the main considerations to wait until everybody is represented. I should like the House to keep this in mind when we are dealing with the returned soldier, that there is the quiet returned soldier and there is the one who meets with his fellows and passes resolutions which may be in his interest but with which the others do not agree. I do not know how far this difference extends, but it is there, and it is important for us to remember there are different kinds of returned soldiers and that they have different ideas as to what they want.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am at a loss to understand exactly what my hon. friend means by his language about the returned soldiers. Does he mean to say that some of them are so disreputable that we should not believe what they say? I understand there is a Great War Veterans' Association which speaks for the returned soldiers generally. Does my hon. friend mean to say that the Government should not listen to the claims of the veterans, but should wait until the other soldiers who are still overseas return to Canada? What the hon. gentleman states is all mythical.

Mr. TURRIFF: Did I understand the minister to say that when a soldier applies under this Act for a quarter-section he can take a homestead whether he has had one previously or not?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If he is entitled to a homestead, he gets one.

Mr. TURRIFF: I should like to know if any provision has been made so that a soldier can get a bonus of a few hundred dollars in lieu of applying for a homestead under this Act, and still have the right to borrow $2,500. I have had a long experience in the West of men going on land under the tutelage of associations, or governments, or colonization companies, and as a rule, those people have failed. When an association has placed people on lands in the West and advanced money and taken mortgages on their farms in nine cases out of ten, or in nineteen cases out of twenty, those people have failed. I do not say that a man who is a farmer and who takes land under this Act will not make a success of it, but the great bulk of them will not be farmers. I don't care what conditions hedge around the grant of $2,500, or what precautions are taken to see that the men buy the right kind of horses and implements, in two or three years these men, who are forty or fifty miles away from a railway, will have spent that money and mortgaged their land, and the Government will have to take the land back and the money will be gone. The soldiers who take up land under this scheme will cost the country a lot of money in the end, for many of them will not make good, to put it mildly. I think it would be better for the country and more in the interest of the soldier in many cases, to give him the option of a cash bonus. I would ask the minister to consider that suggestion in the hope that when we meet next session something along that line will be done.

Mr. MORPHY: This is the biggest question, I believe, that is before this country to-day, and I rather deprecate the idea of forcing it through like this. I think we should let the matter stand over until Monday to give hon. gentlemen an opportunity of expressing their views and hearing what the policy of the Government is in the matter.

Mr. NESBITT: I would suggest that if we are not going to thresh it out now we had better rise and come back at eight o'clock, because we all want to get away on Wednesday, and if we devote Monday to discussing this matter that will be so much time lost for other legislation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am quite prepared to make a statement of policy in so far as it is possible at this date to do so, and to give all the details that can be given. As to soldier settlement, there is only one statute now under which soldier settlement takes place. Provisions have been made with regard to a soldier taking an entry on Dominion lands, and on other lands, provisions have also been made for the administration of the Act, and the board is in active operation. We have entered into negotiations, which I think are virtually completed, with one province, looking to an arrangement whereby that province assumes supervision of its soldier settlement and receives financial assistance from the Dominion to enable it to take care of by far the greater portion of the financial obligations thus entailed. We have now under review similar arrangements with other provinces, and I am in hopes that we shall succeed in coming to an agreement. I believe that is the proper principle. I believe that by local administration you will get the best results both for the soldier and for the country. I do not think any good is done by merely making an advance to the soldier and placing him on the land. I thoroughly agree with the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff). I have seen too much of settlement both in Eastern and Western Canada, seen too many attempts to make men farmers by capital advances, to have much faith in that method ever making a man a success on the land.

Mr. MORPHY: Did the minister ever conceive the idea of the Dominion Government cultivating the land for the first two years and letting the soldier learn how to farm during that time, and receiving his pay, so that at the end of the period he could take the land over with some knowledge of farming? There are other policies besides that of the minister that I would like to discuss.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That method has certainly been thought of by myself. It has been given more than thought by one province. The province of Ontario has adopted the principle of provincial assistance, accurately described, I think, by my hon. friend. I make this suggestion to the committee: That having in mind the principle which animates my hon. friend from Parkdale (Mr. Mowat), having in mind the wisdom of not going too fast at the present time, having in mind the fact that the great majority of the soldiers are overseas, and that they should have a say in the final disposition of this property as well as those at home, I think it would be well to watch the development of the project in Ontario, to see how it works out, and what lessons we can gain from it, before committing ourselves to any particular policy. The scheme in Ontario is well under way, and I think that before the next session of Parliament we can form very intelligent conclusions as to the success of the enterprise, and whether or not it embodies sound principles of settlement. For the present I think it would be well to keep in mind the main goal of making the soldier settlement a success by personal supervision on the part of the board both as regards unpatented land and land owned by the soldier, and confine outside operations to an endeavour to make suitable arrangements with the provinces whereby they can carry on successful provincial schemes.

Mr. CAHILL: Would an arrangement with other provinces similar to that made with Ontario involve giving to the provinces their natural resources?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have no arrangement with Ontario. That province has not approached us in regard to the matter. Ontario has a policy of its own along the line stated by my hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Morphy), of taking an area of land, purchased or its own property, improving that area, and making individual settlements out of it by the utilization of soldier labour, paying the soldiers for their work with a view to selling them the land ultimately on terms.

Mr. CAHILL: An arrangement of that kind would be impossible unless the province had the land.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Or acquired it.

Mr. CAHILL: A province would hardly be likely to acquire land seeing the Dominion Government owns vast areas.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The province would not acquire land owned by us, but provinces that have full control or ownership of the land can bring the land under a scheme of co-operation with the Government.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Will it be optional for the soldier to come under a provincial or a Dominion scheme? Has he to take up land in a particular province? The Dominion lands are in Western Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We put no restraint on the soldier at all, but it is quite true we are able to offer greater inducements in the West because we own the lands there. On the other hand the provinces in the East can offer greater inducements if they wish, under their own individual policy, so I think the balance is about fair.

Mr. MANION: With the Dominion land agents mostly in the western provinces, would it not be rather difficult for a soldier farmer in Ontario to get a loan on his land?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That point is well taken, and we are intending to meet that difficulty by the establishment of offices in Ontario for the taking of soldiers' applications in this province.. We will have an inspector and a supervisor for that purpose.

Mr. MANION: In the near future?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the very near future.

Mr. MANION: I think it should be a Dominion-wide proposition.

Department of Indian Affairs—salaries, including A. S. Williams, Law Clerk at $2,900, $133,075; contingencies, $19,000.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: As we are dealing with the estimates of the Department of Indian Affairs, I wish to refer to a matter about which I spoke to the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen). It is in connection with certain charges against Mr. Taylor, now agent at the Crooked Lake Indian Reserve. Under the old system I had the patronage of the Government for seven years and I never in my life asked for the dismissal of a single individual, and never have I countenanced anything in that way. But I must admit that on the present occasion I feel that it is time that an official of the department who has not been dismissed should be dismissed, and I trust that the department will take some action in the matter. Last fall and winter I heard so many complaints about this agent, Mr. Taylor, that I thought it would be well to go into the case.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Where is he located?

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: A short distance north of Broadview near where I live. I therefore invited some of the people who were complaining of his actions to meet me at Broadview on a certain occasion. I asked Mr. Boyer also, the clerk of the agency, who was more or less conversant with what had been going on, to meet me there. I did not make any attempt to have a thorough investigation into the affairs in connection with the agency, but while I was satisfied that I had only touched the fringe of the wrong-doing of the agent I felt that I had heard enough to justify me in asking the department to immediately suspend the agent pending inquiry, to institute a thorough inquiry into his conduct, and also to recommend that the investigation be not placed wholly in the hands of Commissioner Graham. I did not wish then, nor do I wish now, to question the fact that Mr. Graham is a very competent official, but there were what appeared to me good reasons why Mr. Graham should not be the sole investigator in that particular case. The department provided for an investigation by Mr. Graham alone, but did not suspend the agent, thereby leaving the people from whom the evidence against him must mainly come under the thumb of the accused. That was not a correct principle. This investigation was, to my mind, anything but thorough. I believe, however, that the evidence brought out not only justified the dismissal of the official but made it the duty of the department to dismiss him. The Indian Act, section 42, provides among other things that:

No official or employee connected with the Inside or Outside Service of the Department of Indian Affairs . . . . shall without special license in writing of the Superintendent General trade with any Indian or sell to him directly or indirectly any goods or supplies, cattle or other animals.

Section 131 provides that in case of violation of the provisions of this section, the person so violating shall be liable to a fine equal in amount to double the sum received for the goods, supplies, cattle or other animals sold.

And, in addition to that, the costs of the prosecution.

Mr. Taylor admits purchasing the following goods from Indians:

1. Hide from Old Francis.
2. Hide from Kenowekesequake.
3. Pony from Stevenson.

He admits having made the following sales to Indians:

1. Horse to Stevenson, bought at $142, sold to Indian at $175.
2. Horse to Kenoweswanwetang, which he claims belonged to his father's estate.
3. Horse to Zac Le Rat. Mr. Sugden says Mr. Taylor bought this horse from him at $126. This is not denied by Taylor. The clerk says the books show the horse was sold at $160. This price is not denied by Mr. Taylor.
4. Horse sold to Angus Alex. Mr. Sugden says he sold this horse to Taylor for $120, and the clerk says the books show the horse was sold at $140. Mr. Taylor does not deny either of these prices.
5. Horse to Tom Shesheep. Mr. Taylor says this horse belonged to his father's estate.
6. Horse to Harry Favel. Mr. Taylor says this was one of his father's horses.

Here are nine, or if we count the two deals with Stevenson as one trade, at least eight, distinct violations of a very important provision of the Indian Act. It seems to me that the policy of maintaining an Indian Agent in charge of a reserve who habitually violates one of the most important provisions of the Act is one that cannot be countenanced by any one who wants to see the Department of Indian Affairs carried on as it should be. Mr. Taylor said:

I knew that the regulations prohibited me from dealing with Indians.

He showed nothing but contempt for the law and the department, shows little more respect for it in continuing in office an agent who thus openly and repeatedly violated one of the most important provisions of the Act under which he is working. Harry Cameron, the interpreter, who can hardly be accused of unfriendliness to the agent, in answer to a question says:

The agent often makes deals with the Indians, and I don't think he loses anything. I don't know how much he makes.

Neither do I know how much he makes nor is the department likely to know how much he makes until a more thorough investigation is held. The investigation, however, shows that in three of the deals referred to he sold for $475 horses that he had bought for $388, and so far as I can find the department has not punished him, or even asked for a refund of the difference.

Notwithstanding these many serious violations of the provisions of the Act, Mr. Graham in his report glosses them over by saying:

The Department's regulations state that no employee shall trade with the Indians, but I don't think that this regulation was intended to apply to employees purchasing berries, baskets, wood, water or hay for their own private stock on the reserve, and if not I cannot see that purchasing a hide to be used as a robe for one's family should be considered as exceptional.

Evidently Mr. Graham seems to think it is only in exceptional cases that law-breakers should be punished. I think it is only in exceptional cases that they should be allowed to go scot free. Further on he says with regard to those breaches of law:

There is no doubt at all but Mr. Taylor has been exceedingly indiscreet in his dealings with the Indians. He should have obtained permission from you before selling horses to them.

"Indiscreet" is a very gentle term to use in this connection. Still I suppose every law-breaker is "indiscreet." Speaking of Taylor's deal with Stevenson, Mr. Graham says:

I am satisfied there was no intention on his part to make anything out of the Indian.

This in face of the fact that Taylor himself says:

I consider I made $27.30 assuming the pony was worth $50.

And he does not appear from the evidence to question the fact that the pony he got from Stevenson in the trade was worth $50.

Mr. Graham, during the investigation, made this statement:

The late farm instructor Sugden states you have been in the habit frequently of using the Government blacksmith shop (at the agency) for repairing your own farm things, using coal and iron, the property of the department. Your own men and yourself did the work.

Mr. Taylor says in reply:

I do not remember working there myself, but my man used it two or three times doing private work.

No denial is made of the charge of applying the Government coal and iron to his own use. Mr. Sugden, in his statement, says that Mr. Taylor had his private threshing engine repaired in that way, but no notice of this was taken at the investigation. With regard to the tools said to have been taken from the Government threshing outfit, and afterwards found in Mr. Taylor's possession, that gentleman said, in answer to a question:

Yes, I had the tools, they are still in my car in the shed, I think.

Regarding the charges of using the Government blacksmith shop, the Government coal, and Government iron and tools, Mr. Graham says in his report:

Mr. Taylor admits his hired man used the Government blacksmith shop on two or three occasions doing private work. He also admits having used on his own motor, tools that belonged to the threshing outfit. It seems to me this latter charge is ridiculous.

It will be noticed that Taylor says, with regard to the tools: "I have the tools," while Mr. Graham softens it down by saying he had used them. The charge may, in Mr. Graham's mind, be ridiculous, but I am satisfied that had any one else appropriated the Government's property in this way, and had the fact come to Mr. Graham's attention, the offender would have been prosecuted for theft. I think these repeated breaches of the provisions of the Indian Act, and improper dealings with Government property should have insured the dismissal of the agent. I would not be taking up the time of the House, however, but for the fact that serious charges of immorality are made against this agent. I am satisfied that even the faint-hearted investigation held disclosed a state of affairs that called for his dismissal. It seems to me the House will agree that this is a very serious thing on the part of an Indian agent. We know that the Indians are somewhat susceptible people, and it seems to me that it ought to be understood at all times that no one should be employed in the capacity of agent against whose moral conduct anything can be said. I am told that these charges of immorality against Indian agents and officials are very common—in fact, I am given to understand they are levelled against all of them. That may or may not be true, but as far as regards the particular locality of which I speak—and I have been living there for the last thirty-five or forty years—this is the first time I ever heard any suggestion of the kind with respect to the Indian agents on the Crooked Lake or Assiniboine reserves.

Mr. Graham appears to recognize the incompleteness of the evidence forthcoming, but seeks to lay the blame on some one else. So far as I know I was the only person laying any charges, but Mr. Graham chooses to ignore me altogether, and the investigation was over before I knew it was being held. Mr. Graham tries to throw the responsibility for what happened on Mr. Boyer, the clerk, and says of him:

> He has had every opportunity to have witnesses at the investigation to corroborate the charges made by the Indians and others, but there were none, and it was only a case of one person's word against another's.

Now Mr. Boyer has advised me that on the day the investigation commenced, Mr. Graham and his secretary arrived at the agency about 2 p.m., and they said nothing whatever to Boyer about any impending investigation until about 5.30 p.m., when that gentleman was preparing to go to his home. Then it was that he received the first intimation that an investigation was to be held. He was instructed by Mr. Graham to be present at the office at 7 p.m., when the investigation was commenced. Boyer has assured me that it was never intimated to him that he was to be in any way responsible for the prosecution, or that he had any authority to call witnesses. Mr. Boyer appears to have had connection with only five charges. On three of these Mr. Graham finds the charges proved. On another, with regard to oats, he finds Mr. Taylor's actions irregular and unbusinesslike.

I dislike very much taking up the time of the House with regard to any matter of this kind. I dislike to find fault with any official of the Government, but I believe the situation is so serious there that the dismissal of this official is necessary. I do not propose to stand by while any official, in a locality so near to my home as this is, acts in the manner in which this official has acted, without raising my protest against it.

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: The case which the hon. member has brought to the attention of the Committee is well worthy of a considered reply. Shortly after I assumed office, certain complaints reached the department and reached myself, forwarded by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson) as to the conduct of this Indian agent. The complaints in question were not forwarded on the responsibility of the hon. member; he was simply a communicant to the department; the complaints were forwarded on the responsibility of one Boyer, who is clerk of the Indian agency, and were supported by his affidavit. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle asked in his communication that an investigation into the truth or falsity of the charges be made. I immediately ordered an investigation. The charges alleged in the main, immorality with Indian women. I appointed the most experienced inspector and one of the most highly valued and highly esteemed men in the service of the Government, Mr. Graham, to conduct the investigation. Beyond instructions to him to fully investigate the charge, no intimation whatever was given. Mr. Graham held his investigation, and heard Mr. Boyer, who was present throughout the proceedings, and Mr. Graham made a report from which my hon. friend has quoted. He found there were violations upon the part of Mr. Taylor of the regulations and laws of the department, as to dealing with the Indians. He found, however, that all charges on the other score were not proven. He recommended that the Indian agent be retained, but that he be reprimanded for his dealings with the Indians. He did not find that there was the slightest dishonesty or advantage taken of the Indians in respect of any of the dealings referred to. The report of Mr. Graham was concurred in by the deputy minister, and a letter was written to the agent, drawing his attention to the report and severely reprimanding him for the refractions of the law on his part. In that connection it was brought to my attention that minor trading, when no advantage is taken of the Indians, has been frequently indulged in by Indian agents, and to adopt a policy of dismissing every agent for breach of that regulation would be a very serious step. At the same time, the department disapproves of this practice, and has clearly made known to Mr. Taylor that he must cease entirely, whether he takes advantage of them or not, the practice of trading with the Indians in any way.

On the other more serious score, as I say the report cleared Mr. Taylor. It found that no charge whatever was proven. Mr. Taylor is a most efficient agent who produces most excellent results. Mr. Graham, as I said, is an investigator upon whom I cannot improve in the Indian service. I have accepted his report, concurred in by the deputy minister, and I propose to hold Mr. Taylor to the line of duty. If other charges are made by responsible parties they will be investigated. Mr. Boyer, by whom the charge was made, has resigned his post as clerk.

Indians—Ontario and Quebec, $81,775.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wish to offer my thanks to the Minister of the Interior for the aid given by the department to the hospital at Caughnawaga. The hospital has done much good on that reserve. I have, however, a favour to ask on behalf of the good lady who has charge of that hospital. There is a quarry not far from the hospital, leased to a certain individual whose name I forget. It is very annoying to the patients, most of whom are young women, to hear the noise from the quarry all day, and not only the noise, but there is also in summer a great deal of dust from the quarry. I would like the minister to give special instructions to the agent through Mr. Scott to stop the exploitation of the quarry near the hospital.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it being done by the agent himself?

Mr. LEMIEUX: No. The quarry has been leased by the department or the Government to a third party. A few years ago it was to a gentleman from Montreal, Mr. Giroux, I don't know who is the lessee now. My hon. friend can very well understand how annoying it is for the patients in the hospital to hear the noise from the quarry from morning until night, and to have the dust blown into the hospital whenever there is a slight breeze. The department has been exceedingly kind in the administration of this hospital and I would like the minister to give special instructions regarding this matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will call the attention of the deputy to it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is also another matter. The authorities of the hospital are obliged in winter to draw water from the river St. Lawrence. Last winter the man who carries the water from the river to the hospital nearly drowned himself on account of a break in the conduit system. My hon. friend knows that the current is very swift at that point, which is near the Lachine rapids. For a very small expenditure a well could be bored near the house which would obviate the necessity of going to the river in winter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will call the attention of the deputy to both matters.

Indians—Nova Scotia, salaries, etc., $24,300.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The agent at Heatherton in the county of Antigonish departed this life recently. Has the minister appointed a successor yet?

Mr. MEIGHEN: When did he die?

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Only a few weeks ago?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I have not.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: How will the selection of a new Indian agent be made?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The appointment will probably be made by the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the commission.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Will applications be received from persons desirous of filling the position?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Applications should be sent to the commission.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The agent who occupied this position some years ago is still at Heatherton. He was dismissed after the change of Government in 1911 in order to make room for the friends of the late administration. He had been a satisfactory officer. As this is not a partisan Government I thought that perhaps the six or seven years he has been out of office would be sufficient punishment for having voted Liberal, and that the minister might consider the question of reappointing him. I do not know whether it is in order to say anything, because now there is no patronage and I am not at liberty to write a letter to say that he is a good man. He held office for a number of years with great satisfaction to everybody and he was removed in 1911 with a host of others in Nova Scotia. I think he would take the office back if it were offered him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is his name?

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: John R. McDonald.

Mr MEIGHEN: I will look into the matter. The salary is $200.

Indians—Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and Northwest Territories, $508,149.

Mr. TWEEDIE: With regard to the Morley and Blood reserves in Alberta I think there are some matters to be taken up by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Shaw) and by myself. I presume we can discuss these later on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. KNOX: This appropriation is $50,000 less than last year. It is very unwise to cut down any of the appropriation in these provinces. We have a number of reserves in Northern Saskatchewan capable of producing foodstuffs at the present time. We have suitable land there and a large amount of cheap labour on the reserves. I do not wish to say very much on the subject, but I feel very strongly the importance of not reducing the appropriation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I quite agree with the hon. member. The reductions here will not interfere with that. We have a special vote for that purpose.

First Report of the Munition Resources Commission.—Hon. Mr. Burrell.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES FOR 1918-19.

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting Supplementary Estimates for the year ending March 31, 1919, was presented by Hon. A. K. Maclean (Acting Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the House, and referred to the Committee of Supply.

SENATE BILL.

FIRST READING.

Bill No. 107, to incorporate The United Canadian Insurance Company.--Mr. Stevens.

[Mr. Meighen.]

THE WINNIPEG STRIKE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: I have a question to put which is of some urgency, and as the Minister of Labour is not in his seat perhaps one of the other ministers might reply. The strike at Winnipeg seems to have developed into serious proportions, all the public services of the city being practically in a state of collapse. Is the Government in a position to say what measures have been taken to prevent the strike spreading; whether a compulsory investigation under the Industrial Disputes Act has been applied for, and if so, will it be granted?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Minister of Labour will be better able to answer as to some matters than I am, but I understand that a proportion of the employees have agreed to or applied for a board. With reference to the civic employees as a whole, my hon. friend will no doubt realize that the relations between the employees of a municipality and the municipality itself are a matter of provincial jurisdiction and provincial concern. We are advised by the law officers of the Crown that it is not proper for this Parliament to undertake to regulate the employment of civic officials, as that is a matter which must be dealt with by the provincial legislature, and by the municipality itself under the authority of the provincial legislature. The Government has received a good many communications on the subject. When asked to pass certain regulations, it has been pointed out to those who are anxious about these matters, that as far as civic governments are concerned it is both the right and the duty of the provincial legislature to make such regulations as they may see fit. Further than that, it has been pointed out that, under section 164 of the Criminal Code, any person who violates the provisions of a provincial statute is guilty of a misdemeanour and punishable as is in that section set out. With respect to the sympathetic strike alluded to, we have not absolutely full information. It is probable that it will be received in the course of the day. I should very greatly doubt, speaking without full consideration, whether persons, who carry out what is known as a sympathetic strike, would free themselves from the penalties imposed by the Order in Council passed early in April and popularly known as the anti-loafing law. That is a matter for the provincial authorities of Manitoba and the civic authorities of Winnipeg to consider and to act upon as they may be advised by their counsel.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not wish to set up my opinion against that of the law officers of the Crown, but might I be permitted to suggest that the Industrial Disputes Act does not make any distinction between provincial and other public utilities. The Act applies to all public utilities. I would suggest that it would be well if the Government could intervene in time to have a compulsory investigation so as to avoid the application of the criminal law.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not wish my hon. friend to understand that the Government have not been making any efforts to end the strike. My hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) has, in every possible way, lent his services to composing the differences which have arisen. More than that, on Friday evening last, I addressed a personal appeal to the head of the Trades and Labour Council in Winnipeg. I have not a copy of it before me at the moment, but later on in the day, if I have the opportunity, I shall bring it down and make the House acquainted with its terms. It is perfectly true that the Government has not seen its way clear to act upon some of the suggestions which have been presented to us but, apart from that, every effort that could possibly be made by conciliatory methods to compose this difficulty has been made. I hope my hon. friend will realize that. Further, it is hoped that, to-day or to-morrow, some more effective effort can be undertaken.

REPORT ON THE MILLING INDUSTRY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. NICKLE: Would the right hon. the leader of the Government (Sir Robert Borden) be disposed to advise the House as to whether or not it is the intention to lay on the Table, before the House rises, the report on the milling industry of which my hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) spoke some few days ago?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will ask the Minister of Labour in regard to it. He has not communicated to me recently on the subject, and I am not in a position to say at the moment.

ABOLITION OF TITLES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not know whether the intimation was given on Saturday, but I desire now to state that to-morrow we shall resume the debate in regard to the abolition of titles. Perhaps an intimation was given on Saturday to that effect?

Mr. NICKLE: My right hon. friend was good enough to tell me that it would be taken up to-morrow.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, but I do not know that I made a public statement. I desire now to inform the House that we will take it up to-morrow.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are to be indicated by an asterisk.)

ANTI-UNIONIST CANDIDATES.

Mr. CASGRAIN:

How many persons who were candidates against the Union Government at the last election have received appointments from the said said Government, since the said Government assumed office and abolished patronage?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL: The Government has no record of any such appointments.

REVISING BARRISTER, HANTS COUNTY.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY:

1. Was Percy Blanchard, of Ellershouse, Revising Barrister for the Constituency of Hants County in connection with the electoral lists for the last Federal Election?
2. If so, what amount did he receive as salary and expenses?
3. Is the said H. Percy Blanchard a practising Barrister of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia?
4. If so, where does he practise since going to Ellershouse, to reside?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. Yes.
2. $82.05.

3. No information.
4. No information.

CLAIM OF DR. L. FOISY.

Mr. SEGUIN:

What is the total amount claimed by Dr. L. Foisy for his services as returning officer for the Electoral District of L'Assomption-Montcalm?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL: Personal services, $266. Total claim for expenses of election, $2,937.70.

DEPUTY REGISTRAR KINGSTON, ONT.

*Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. Has Major H. P. Cooke, Deputy Registrar at Kingston, Ont., any staff of clerks, stenographers, typewriters, messengers, etc., working with or under him, at Kingston, Ont., in connection with the Military Service Act, 1917?
2. If so, what are the names, addresses and salary of such clerks, stenographers, typewriters and messengers, and nature of their employment, the date of their respective appointment, and is their employment temporary or permanent?
3. Does the Government, besides paying the salary of said clerks, stenographers, typists and messengers, make or grant any extra allowance for their travelling expenses, either in money grant or railway transportation or passes?
4. Is it the intention of the Government to increase or reduce such clerical staff?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Yes.
2. All the employment is temporary. List filed with the Clerk of the House.
3. No travelling expenses, money grant or transportation are paid to any member shown on list of Deputy Registrar's staff. Certain members shown on the Public Representative's staff, whose duties require it, are furnished with transportation to enable them to attend the sitting of the various tribunals in the district.
4. The staff fluctuates in numbers as the work increases or decreases. It is and has been reduced immediately the pressure of work permits.

APPEAL TRIBUNAL, BROCKVILLE.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Has one G. O. Aiken been appointed to the Appeal Tribunal at Brockville under the Military Service Act, in any capacity?
2. If so, in what capacity?
3. Who recommended, or was otherwise responsible for, this appointment?
4. Was Aiken sent from Kingston to Brockville? If so, why?
5. Is this the G. O. Aiken who was suspended from his position as Guard by the Warden of Kingston Penitentiary, who was later reinstated and then allowed to resign?
If so, what was the reason for his being suspended?
6. Why was the new position filled by Aiken's appointment not given to a returned soldier?

[Mr. Burrell.]

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Yes.
2. Local public representative at Judge Reynolds' Appeal Tribunal.
3. This appointment was authorized by the Registrar for the district.
4. Yes. He knew the district surrounding Brockville thoroughly, and there was no other local Brockville man available who was as generally valuable.
5. Yes. He was suspended owing to the complaint of a convict that he had used unbecoming language to him and had prevented him from performing work that another guard had ordered him to do.
6. There was no returned soldier on the list of applicants. Aiken's place as guard was filled by the transfer of R. C. Morris from the staff of watchmen.

J. B. PAQUET.

Mr. BOURASSA:

1. Has Mr. Laparre Marsan, Chief of Police of Lévis, received from the Government, instructions to dismiss J. B. Paquet, of Lévis, who was a watchman at the Lauzon Dock, and to replace him by one of his own friends?
2. If so, for what reason was J. B. Paquet dismissed?
3. If not, will this man be reinstated?

Hon. Mr. CARVELL: I think the hon. member will have to change the question, because I cannot understand what it means. The hon. gentleman asks if Mr. Laparre Marsan, Chief of Police of Lévis, received from the Government instructions to dismiss J. B. Paquet, of Lévis, who was a watchman at the Lauzon Dry Docks. The Chief of Police of Lévis has nothing to do with the men employed at the Lauzon Dock.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stand.

BISHOP FALLON'S MISSION.

*Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. Concerning the official visit of His Lordship Bishop Fallon to the front, is the Government aware that His Lordship is also going to Rome?
2. Are the trip expenses of His Lordship to both the front and Rome being paid by the Government?
3. If so, what amount has been paid to His Lordship?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. No.
2. Please see answers already given on May 1, pp. 1351 and 1352, Unrevised Hansard.
3. Nothing has yet been paid by this department.

ARMY MEDICAL CORPS.

*Mr. MURPHY:

Referring to the following item in John Bull, of March 2, 1918:—

"There is serious discontent among the Quartermaster ranks in the Canadian Army Medical Corps. A number of the men who have been in the Army since war broke out are still Honorary Lieutenants—whereas fresh men from Canada, who have never seen Service, arrive with the rank of Honorary Captain or Honorary Major. This is grossly unfair, and we are taking the matter up with Ottawa."

1. Have any representations been made to the Government regarding the alleged discontent in the Canadian Army Medical Corps?

2. If so, what action has been taken in the matter?

3. Has the Government received any other complaint regarding the Overseas Medical Service?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. No.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE.

*Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

1. Who are the members of the Government who will go to London this spring to take part in the Conference with the Imperial Authorities?

2. When will this trip be made?

3. What are the reasons for this trip?

4. Can the Government say what questions are going to be discussed in London, and who will act at said conference?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In reply to the first question an announcement will be made in due course. As to question No. 2 it is deemed inadvisable in the public interest to make any announcement. The answer to the third question is: For the purpose of attending the meetings of the Imperial War Cabinet and the Imperial Conference. In answer to the fourth question I may say that the subjects for discussion are confidential until after the discussion shall have taken place.

EXEMPTION TRIBUNALS—BONAVENTURE COUNTY.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

3. No.
4. Answered by No. 3.

CANADIAN WAR RECORD OFFICE.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR:

1. How many employees are on the staff of the Canadian War Record Office, London?
2. What did this branch cost during the calendar year 1917, for salaries, rents, printing and all other disbursements?

Major-General MEWBURN:

1 and 2. This information is not available in Canada, but is being requested, by letter, from the Overseas Military Forces of Canada.

MOTOR BOAT "HELENA".

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR:

1. What is the size of the Steamboat Helena, employed by the Customs Department at Sydney, N.S.?
2. What is her net tonnage?
3. Will the Government put this Service up for tender?

Hon. Mr. SIFTON:

1. The size of the motor-boat Helena is as follows: Length over all, 38 feet 10 inches; length water line, 36 feet; breadth extreme, 8 feet 2 inches; breadth water line, 7 feet 4½ inches.

2. The Customs Department has no record of the net tonnage. The displacement is 54 tons.

3. The question of calling for tenders will be inquired into.

CIVIL SERVICE LAW.

Mr. BURNHAM:

1. When the new Civil Service law takes effect, to whom will the general public address its letters of recommendation for office, etc., where such business is supposed to receive recommendations from no one in particular designated by constituencies for that purpose?

2. Is there any limit to the correspondence of that sort that may be received?

3. Will it all be officially replied to?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN:

1. The Civil Service law alluded to provides that persons shall be appointed to the public service after competitive examination. Letters of recommendation, therefore, would not appear to be of any particular use or advantage. If, however, it should be desired to send in such letters of recommendation, they might properly be addressed to the Civil Service Commission.

2 and 3. These questions are sufficiently answered by the reply given to No. 1.

MAJOR J. T. N. L'HEUREUX.

Mr. SAVARD:

1. Is Major J. T. N. L'Heureux, who has been on active service overseas, still attached to the Canadian Militia?

2. If not, for what reasons has he been retired?

Major-General MEWBURN:

1. No.

2. Major J. T. N. l'Heureux was retired in consequence of an investigation into matters connected with the 167th Overseas Battalion that showed that this officer's conduct had not been such as to justify his being continued as an officer of the militia.

HERMAN J. DAGER.

Mr. ARTHURS:

1. Is there a person named Herman J. Dager, employed in the Preventive Service of the Inland Revenue Department?

2. If so, when was he appointed, and by whom recommended?

3. What are his duties?

4. Is he holding any other position, and what are his salaries?

5. Where was his birthplace?

6. Is he a British citizen (a) by birth; (b) by naturalization?

Hon. Mr. SIFTON:

1. We have one officer of that name appointed as Food Inspector and Deputy Collector of Inland Revenue.

[Mr. Sifton.]

2. (a) Appointed D'y Collector class "B" October 6, 1898. Nothing on record to show who recommended him as Deputy Collector. (b) as Food Inspector May 6, 1907, recommended by H. R. Frankland, Collector of Inland Revenue, Toronto division.

3. Assigned to Food and Preventive work for the last three years.

4. Nothing on record in this department to show that he is holding any other position outside of Deputy Collector, class "B" and Food Inspector as D'y Col. class "B" $1,000. As Food Inspector $500.

5. Nothing on record.

6. "Canadian by adoption" is the information given by the return to the department dated October 7, 1898.

THE GRAND TRUNK—HON. CLIFFORD SIFTON.

*Mr. MURPHY:

1. Has Sir Clifford Sifton any authority to act in any capacity in England for the Government, or for any member thereof?

2. Have any communications of any kind been exchanged between the Government, or any member thereof, and Sir Clifford Sifton relative to the acquisition by the Government of the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railways? If so, will they be produced?

3. Has the Government or any member thereof had any communication with any banker, brokers or other financiers in London or New-York relative to the purchase or sale of the Grand Trunk or the Grand Trunk Pacific Railways or of the stock or securities of these railroads? If so, will the correspondence be produced?

4. Is the Government aware that at the recent annual meeting of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company in London, the Canadian Government was denounced for its intended confiscation of the Grand Trunk Railway? If so, what steps have been taken by the Government to correct this misapprehension?

5. Has the Government any knowledge of the sale or purchase of Grand Trunk stock or securities prior to or since the date of the said annual meeting of shareholders? If so, was there a depreciation in price after the said meeting?

6. With whom is the Government carrying on negotiations for taking over the Grand Trunk Railway System?

7. Is it the intention of the Government to settle the terms of taking over the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific railroads during the visit of the ministers to London this summer? If so, who are the ministers by whom these terms are to be settled?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN:

1. No.

2. No.

3. No.

4. Members of the Government have observed in the press despatches respecting the meeting of the shareholders alluded to.

It is considered that any supposed misapprehension would be sufficiently corrected by statements that have already been made in this House, particularly the statement made by the Prime Minister a few days ago.

5. No. The Government has no information as to the alleged depreciation in price.

6. Negotiations have been carried on with Mr. A. W. Smithers, chairman of the Board of Directors of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and with president Kelley, of the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

7. It is probable that the subject will be discussed during the visit of ministers to London. It is not probable that the negotiations will then be concluded. An announcement as to the ministers will be made in due course.

Mr. PHILIPPE FUROIS.

Mr. PARENT:

1. Does Mr. Philippe Furois, of the city of Quebec, occupy a position with or under the Canada Food Board or any other department and if so—
   (a) Since when?
   (b) What are his duties?
   (c) What salary is attached to the position?
2. Is the said Mr. Furois the one who was a Government candidate at the last election for the county of Bonaventure?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. Yes. (a) April 12, 1918. (b) Secretary and organizer for increased conservation in the province of Quebec. (c) $250 per month.
2. Yes.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. Is private custom work done at the Portsmouth Penitentiary by skilled convict workmen? If so, is any allowance made to said convicts for such work?
2. Were walnut chairs repaired and upholstered for P. Devlin, Immigration Agent at Kingston? If so, what was the cost to Mr. Devlin?
3. Were several articles of furniture made for and shipped to Mr. Dillon, Purchasing Agent for Penitentiaries? If so, what articles were shipped to Montreal and Ottawa for him, what was their cost, and by whom was it paid?
4. What articles were made or repaired and shipped to persons in Toronto, Renfrew, Ottawa, Kingston and New York, by whose order, to whom sent, and the amount paid in each case?
5. What articles have been repaired or made for the Rev. McDonald and for the Roman Catholic Church at Portsmouth, what amount was paid for such work, by whom paid and when?
6. What articles of furniture have been made and repaired during the past two years (a) for officials of the penitentiary, (b) for persons other than officials, with the name and cost in each case?
7. Were some statistics copied by one of the convicts for the United States authorities? If so, how much was paid by the United States for said work, and what amount was placed to the credit of the convict who did the work?
8. Have convicts been ordered to make articles patented in the United States, the sole right for the manufacture of which had been sold to a firm in Canada, and were convicts ordered to make working drawings of the same for future use?

Mr. STEVENS:

1. Has any person been appointed to the position, under the Minister of Labour, which was vacated recently by the resignation of Mr. O'Connor?
2. What is the new appointee's name, age, ordinary occupation, and has he been engaged on Active Military Service?
3. What experience has the new appointee had as (a) barrister, (b) accountant, (c) in retail business, (d) in wholesale business, (e) in manufacturing business or other lines of commerce?
4. What experience had Mr. O'Connor along the lines mentioned in Question No. 3?
5. Was Mr. O'Connor's selection to perform the duties of the position mentioned because of his qualifications as lawyer, accountant or former business man? If so, and if the qualifications of the new appointee are different, what is the object or intention of the Government in replacing him by one of different qualifications?
6. Was the Government satisfied with Mr. O'Connor's performance of the duties of the position mentioned? If not, will it indicate the particular causes of dissatisfaction? If satisfied with his services, has it made any, and what efforts to retain his services or to obtain them again under conditions more satisfactory to him? Does the Government know whether Mr. O'Connor would consent to resume performance of his former duties under any conditions whatever?
7. Is the statement in the Toronto Saturday Night, of date May 18, 1918, that "Dr. R. J. McFall has been loaned to the Food Control Organization to continue the work originated by Mr. O'Connor," correct?
8. Has any Order in Council been passed appointing Dr. R. J. McFall to perform in the same manner under the same circumstances, and under the same conditions the work which Mr. O'Connor previous to his resignation performed for the Minister of Labour? If not, how has the appointment of Dr. McFall been made, if made, and under what authority?
9. What salary and living allowance, or either, will the new appointee receive, and out of what fund and through what department of Government or under what Commission will he act?
10. Has the new appointee commenced services under the Minister of Labour, or at all, and when?
11. Will the new appointee act under direction of the Minister of Labour alone, and if not, under what other arrangement?
12. What will be the title of the office to be held by the new appointee?
13. Does the Government intend to merge any, and what, of the operations previously conducted by Mr. O'Connor with the same or similar operations of the Canada Food Board or of any other Board or Department of Government, and if so, for what reason?

Mr. SAVARD:

1. For how long was General Sir Sam Hughes Minister of Militia?
2. What were his total expenses, as charged to the country, for the time covering this period?
3. How many trips did he make to England or Continental Europe while Minister of Militia?
4. What was the total expense to the country for each trip?

Mr. SAVARD:

1. While in England did the Rev. Father Burke go on a trip to Rome at Government expense?
2. If so, what was the cost to the country?
3. Did the Rev. Father Burke, while in England, go to Salonica or Cairo at Government expense?
4. If so, what was the cost to the country?
5. Was Father Burke advised by General Sir Sam Hughes when making up his expense account for a trip to Rome, to eliminate the word Rome and place in its stead the words Salonica or Cairo?
6. If so, why was the then Minister of Militia anxious to suppress the fact that Father Burke had made an official governmental visit to Rome?
7. Was Father Burke granted leave of absence for the purpose of making a visit to Rome or elsewhere?

*Mr. KENNEDY:

1. How many returns have been made to the Minister under the provisions of Section 10 of the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916?
2. What is the total capitalization covered by these returns?
3. How many of these returns have been dealt with and assessments made therein as provided by Section 13 of the said Act?

3. How many farmers have enlisted from the Conuty of Durham, Ontario?

[Mr. Stevens.]

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. CHISHOLM:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, vouchers, accounts and all documents in any way referring to the expenditure of money in repairs on the Margaree Breakwater, by the Department of Public Works, during the years 1916-17 and 1917-18.

Mr. CHISHOLM:

For a copy of all accounts, vouchers, receipts, telegrams, particulars and correspondence of all kinds in any way referring to the expenditure of money by this Government at Friar Siding, under the foremanship of P. Doucette, during the months of October, November and December, 1917.

Mr. BROUILLARD:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and correspondence generally exchanged between the Government and Mr. Justice Duff, Central Appeal Judge, during the last election campaign concerning the application and the administration of the Military Service Act in conjunction with the Order in Council passed on December 3, 1917.

Mr. STEVENS:

For a return giving a copy of all letters, telegrams, vouchers, evidence and all other documents relating to an inquiry into the wages, conditions of labour, etc., of the shipbuilding industry in British Columbia and conducted by a Commission of which Hon. Justice Murphy was chairman, also copy of findings of said Commission.

THE ZINC BOUNTIES ACT, 1916.

On the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean (Acting Minister of Finance) that the House go into Committee to-morrow to consider the proposed resolution respecting The Zinc Bounties Act, 1916:

Sir SAM HUGHES: Without the slightest intention of finding fault, I wish to point out that members do not hear one-third of what is said. While the seats are fairly comfortable, it is very unpleasant not to know what is going on.

Mr. SPEAKER: In the case of formal motions of this kind, hon. members will hear the resolutions as read from the Chair.

Motion agreed to.

THE IMPERIAL CONFERENCE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Prime Minister said, in answer to a question put by the member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault), that a statement with regard to the Imperial Conference would be made in due course. May we know in advance when that statement will be made, whether any of the correspondence will be brought down, and whether we shall be informed as to the objects for which the conference is called?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will bring my right hon. friend's request to the attention of the Prime Minister.

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT ACT, 1918.

On motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean, Bill No. 81, to amend the Customs Tariff, 1907, was read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS PROFITS WAR TAX ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean, Bill No. 84, to amend the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, was read the third time and passed.

INCOME WAR TAX AMENDMENT.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN moved the third reading of Bill No. 85, to amend The Income War Tax Act, 1917.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Many business men and others affected by the Income Tax Act of last year experienced some difficulty in preparing the return which they were required to furnish to the Government. Some weeks ago I handed to Mr. Boville, Deputy Minister of Finance, a primer prepared by the Treasury Department in the United States, which furnishes all information arising out of the administration and application of their Income Tax Act. Quite unwittingly, many people have made errors in their returns, and if the department would prepare a primer similar to that sent out by the United States Treasury Department, those affected by the Act would be considerably assisted in the preparation of returns. Mr. Boville was struck with the necessity of such an official publication, the cost of which would not be very large. Last year some of the financial and trust companies and banks prepared publications of this kind for the benefit of their own patrons. I saw three or four of them, but they did not appear to be very complete. I think it would be good policy on the part of the department to have such a primer issued during the present fiscal year.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: I think that a publication of that nature is now in course of preparation. At any rate, my hon. friend's suggestion is a very timely one, and I shall convey it to the Minister of Finance.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I suggest that the department issue also a table showing the amounts paid under different incomes according to the new provisions.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: That is, for circulation outside of the House?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

INSPECTION AND SALE ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. T. A. Crerar, Minister of Agriculture, Bill No. 108, to amend the Inspection and Sale Act (Fruit, fruit marks and potatoes), was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—definitions:

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Has this Bill been distributed? I do not have it on my file.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It has been printed.

Mr. BUREAU: Is this part of the amendments that have been brought up by the Minister of Trade and Commerce as regards the Inspection and Sale Act?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No.

Mr. BUREAU: This is new legislation?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Entirely.

Mr. BUREAU: Who is the minister who has charge of this legislation?

Mr. CRERAR: Part IX of the Inspection and Sale Act, relating to fruit, fruit marks and fruit packages, is under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture, and these amendments refer only to that particular portion of the Act. They do not relate to the other matters that the Minister of Trade and Commerce submitted to the House.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not know how long this Bill has been printed, but it has not yet come to my notice. I have often heard the remark thrown across the floor of this House: Such and such legislation was submitted to the House and was concurred in by you. Why did you not raise an objection when it was brought before the House? The first reading of this Bill took place on the 18th of May, (that is Saturday last), and as we are supposed to observe Sunday, very little time has been given to us to look into the matter. I do not know anything about the importance of the legislation. I do not know whether it affects fruit growing, or fruit classification, or the marking of fruit, or the preservation of fruit. I am not an expert in regard to these matters, but I should like to have an opportunity of looking into the Bill. It is only fair that hon. members should have an opportunity of doing so, unless the minister makes a statement, giving us the details, and telling us what precautions have been taken to justify hon. members in letting the Bill go through without any further investigation on their part.

Mr. CRERAR: Legislation of this kind has been under consideration for two or three years.

Mr. BUREAU: How long has this Bill been submitted to the House for consideration?

Mr. CRERAR: The resolution has been on the Order Paper since the first of May.

Mr. BUREAU: When was the Bill distributed?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know when it was distributed. I have had a printed copy for a considerable length of time. During the winter there was held here a convention of representative fruit growers, some consumers, and also dealers in fruit. The result of the work of that convention is embodied in this Bill.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Where do the people come in?

Mr. CRERAR: The consumers were represented at the convention. In respect to section 319, the only important change is that which relates to the definition of the word "culls." In the section as it previously stood, the definition of "culls" was as follows:

"Culls" shall include fruit that is either very small for the variety or immature, or the skin of which is broken so as to expose the tissue beneath, or that is so injured by insects, fungi, abnormal growths, or other causes, as to render it unmerchantable.

The difficulty was this, that, no matter how scabby or deformed fruit was, it could not be classed as unmerchantable, and consequently there was a very wide range in the character of fruit that was classed as "culls." The amendment seeks to make that more specific, and provides, in later sections, for closer definitions of the grades. This is the section as amended:

(c) "culls" means fruit that is either very small for the variety, is seriously deformed, or has fifteen per cent or more of its surface affected by any of or by the combined injuries caused by apple scab (venturia pomi), insects, cuts, bruises or other causes, or the flesh of which is not in an edible condition, or the skin of which is broken so as to expose the tissue beneath.

[Mr. Bureau.]

It will thus be apparent that the purport of the amendment is more clearly to define what is a cull in the designation of this particular class of fruit.

Mr. BUREAU: Does the word "bruises" cover a case where the flesh would be partially uneatable, but where the fruit would otherwise be good? Sometimes you see part of a pear, say at the bottom end, if it has been standing, as big as a twenty-five cent piece or a fifty cent piece, uneatable, although the rest of the pear is perfectly good. The section states that the whole of the flesh should be uneatable. Would a case like the one I have cited by covered by the word "bruises?"

12 noon

Mr. CRERAR: I should think it would.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The Minister of Agriculture is deserving of every credit for bringing forward this legislation. The matters pertaining to this Bill have been under consideration by Ministers of Agriculture for some years past. Within the last few months there were brought here from different provinces representatives who were in touch with fruit conditions in those provinces; consumers were also brought here, and this Bill was framed under the supervision of all those parties.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What consumers were brought here?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I understand from the Department of Agriculture that representative consumers from different parts of the country were consulted in regard to this measure. Moreover, this legislation is in the public interest. Nova Scotia fruit growers, for instance, were unable to sell their apples in the United States owing to the standard size of their barrels not conforming with the regulations enforced in the United States. The standard barrel will be the same throughout the Dominion of Canada. The sizes of the different packages the same. In our western provinces over one thousand cars of apples put up in packages were disposed of last year at various prices.

The goods have to be packed in containers of uniform size, and in this way not only is the consumer protected, but the producer benefits from being able to sell his goods as up to a certain standard. With regard to peaches, plums, pears and other fruits, the baskets in which they are to be sold are standardized, and the consumer is protected, whereas in days gone by all kinds of packages have been sold at different prices, and it is the consumer that has been fleeced at every turn.

Mr. BUREAU: I did not wish to be understood as objecting to the Bill, and the very fact that I said I knew nothing about fruit growing should have convinced any one I was not taking exception to it. What I was objecting to was that we have not had time to look into the Bill, and I wanted to make inquiries and hear from those who understood this business before forming an opinion. I am perfectly in accord with the purpose of the Bill, but if I were a little wickeder I would say that the manner of bringing the Bill before the House looks like an attempt to railroad it through.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I see that all packages not branded according to the Act shall be forfeited. I think this would be unfair to the small dealers. For instance, a farmer who sells to his neighbour might be liable to a penalty under the law.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not think there need be any misapprehension on that point. It is a simple matter for the grower of fruit to stamp his name on the container. As I understand it, the small growers of fruit bring their produce to the market, where it is bought by dealers and shipped perhaps to other parts of the country. It is a simple matter to put one's name on a box by means of a rubber stamp, and I would repeat, this legislation has been asked for by the fruit growers themselves more insistently than by any other class.

Mr. MORPHY: Suppose a farmer with a small orchard of fifty trees and twenty barrels of apples, disposes of his fruit to a consumer at home. Has he to go to the trouble of branding the barrels?

Mr. CRERAR: I am of the opinion the Act would not apply in the case of one farmer selling to another right across the road.

Mr. MORPHY: Or to a man in town?

Mr. CRERAR: Not if he was selling direct to the consumer. I think the law would be reasonably interpreted in cases of that kind. The Bill is designed to cover more particularly the export of fruit from one district to another district.

Mr. MORPHY: I do not think the Bill is very plain on that point, and it may cause a great deal of inconvenience to the farmer and loss to the consumer also.

Mr. PEDLOW: The definition of fruit is: "Fruit shall not include wild fruit, nor cranberries, whether wild or cultivated." Why is wild fruit excluded?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know the precise reason why wild fruit was excluded, but I take it that it is because very little wild fruit is sold.

Mr. PEDLOW: Quite the contrary. Lots of raspberries, blackberries, blueberries and other kinds of wild fruits are traded in very extensively in Ontario.

Mr. CRERAR: The main provisions of the Bill aim at correcting the abuses that have existed in the past in connection with the sale of apples, pears and the larger varieties of fruit.

Sir SAM HUGHES: But the Bill does not cover retail transactions. That was the point I raised a moment ago.

Mr. PEDLOW: I should like to have the minister's definition of tomatoes. Are they a fruit or a vegetable?

Mr. CRERAR: The question is rather a poser, but I would call a tomato a vegetable rather than a fruit.

Mr. PEDLOW: Webster's dictionary defines fruit thus:

> Whatever is produced for the enjoyment of man or animals by the processes of vegetable growth; that part of plants, which contains the seed.

Tomatoes contain the seed, and therefore I contend they are a fruit, and not a vegetable, according to this definition.

Mr. SHEARD: What about a pumpkin?

Mr. MORPHY: And cucumbers?

Mr. McMASTER: I think the definition of "immature fruit" is so vague that it may cause no end of trouble to the department in administering the Act. The definition reads:

> "Immature fruit" means fruit not ripe enough for dessert purposes and which will not attain such condition after being picked from the tree, bush, plant or vine.

Now what are dessert purposes for one may not be dessert purposes for another. I presume that what the minister had in mind in framing this section was fruit so immature as to be unhealthy for consumption, and I would suggest the advisability of describing immature fruit as fruit unfit for human consumption or something of that sort, and then if the question arose in the application of the Act the testimony of a medical man could be given as to the fruit's fitness for human consumption. But as it is, one housewife might condemn a certain fruit for dessert purposes which another housewife would put on her table for dessert. I think the present definition is altogether too vague.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We shall have to standardize tastes.

Mr. McMASTER: That might be a very difficult matter.

Mr. CRERAR: We should get ourselves into a hopeless tangle if we endeavoured to get the consumers to agree on a definition of immature fruit. Immature fruit means fruit that will not attain, after packing, that perfection of ripeness that will permit it to be used for dessert purposes. I am not an expert in fruit, but I put the very question that my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) raises to the officials of my department, who, I believe, are very good officials, and who have a thorough knowledge of the business, and they gave the reasons I have just given here. Fruit may be picked before it is entirely ripe and will attain a mature condition after it has been picked. Such fruit as that is covered by this section. On the other hand, you could pick fruit that might be half green and that would under no condition attain maturity. This is the definition that fruit dealers who have studied the problem have made, and it is proposed as a means of preventing the sale of immature fruit.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not doubt the ability of the officials in the hon. gentleman's department to judge as to the different qualities of fruit, but whether they are qualified to give a considered opinion as to the effect of a statute is quite another matter. I would suggest to my hon. friend that if he substituted for the words, "for dessert purposes," the words "to be eaten raw without danger to health," he would be setting up a standard or criterion which would be possible of establishment. If it should be made to read:

> "Immature fruit" means fruit not ripe enough to be eaten raw without danger to health and which will not attain such condition after being picked from the tree, bush, plant or vine.

it would better serve the purpose.

Mr. MORPHY: If the minister agrees to that we will be getting into a worse muddle than ever. What is one man's meat may be another man's poison. I know lots of people who like to eat fruit on the raw side, which would be considered unfit by others. I do not see any better form than that in which the minister has put it. Let everybody judge for himself.

[Mr. McMaster.]

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The object of this clause is to put a stop to the sale of immature fruit on the market, such as plums and other fruit brought in possibly from the United States at an early period, which is certainly immature and not fit for consumption. Without some such provision as this, fruit of that description could be brought in.

Mr. BUREAU: Would my hon. friend from East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) tell us if this description "fruit not ripe enough for dessert purposes" applies to cooked or raw fruit? Somebody might buy fruit to make preserves or with the idea of using it after cooking. The question of quality, or standard of maturity, would depend on whether the fruit was to be eaten cooked or in its natural condition. I think that if we were to put in the words "for home consumption, whether cooked or otherwise," that would cover the case.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The word "dessert" does not quite convey the idea that the minister attributes to it. Fruit, in its natural state, is uncooked. Sometimes it is called "green." Green fruit is ripe fruit in the opinion of some people. If you were to use the words "fruit in its natural state" I think it would better meet the case. The word "dessert" is usually applied to fruit which follows dinner, whereas, this should apply to the fruit that you eat as a first course at breakfast. You would not call it "dessert" fruit if you used it in this way. It surely is intended to apply to fruit that you can eat without any bad effect upon the stomach. I would suggest to the minister that the words "fruit in its natural state" should be adopted because that will cover fruit whether it is green or cooked.

Mr. BUREAU: I would like to hear from our learned, scientific men who have the health of the people in their keeping and who look after all hygenic conditions.

Mr. SHEARD: I think the clause is all right. "Dessert" means ordinary fruit served after a meal in its raw, unprepared or uncooked state. I think that the gentlemen in the department who drew the clause drew it with a knowledge of what they were doing and with that interpretation in view. We do not ordinarily partake of dessert fruit in a cooked condition. This is raw fruit and cooked fruit is prepared or preserved fruit. It is preserved by boiling and under ordinary conditions it could not be served otherwise. In the cooking process you reduce the immature acids in the green, or partially ripe fruit, to an innocuous condition. When you take up the question as to whether it is unripe or not you open the door to enormous degrees of difference as between ripeness and unripeness. People could pick up the windfalls in the orchard or under the plum trees and sell them as fruit. I think the proper definition has been selected by those who understand the conditions and it is used to describe fruit abundantly ripened and as it is ordinarily served after a meal for dessert purposes.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not think it can mean that. It might be applied to fruit offered for sale for cooking. If my hon. friend (Mr. Sheard) believes that after the fruit is cooked all danger from eating it is gone, I suppose we must accept his opinion on that subject.

Mr. HENDERSON: The clause gives a classification to immature fruit, and consequently it is all right. The difficulty in shipping fruit a distance has been that there is a temptation to pull the fruit before it is sufficiently mature. After it is picked it will develop such a degree of flavour and maturity as will indicate that it is suitable for dessert purposes. We have found in shipping early apples to the West that people pull them before they have reached sufficient growth to continue developing until they have reached a state of maturity. This provision is to meet cases of that kind, and it does it, I think, very fully.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The fruit growers are well organized in different provinces. In the province from which I come, the fruit growers, for a number of years past, have been enforcing regulations as to the grading and marking of fruit. Has this Bill been submitted to the fruit growers, and have any objections been expressed to bringing it into force?

Mr. CRERAR: It was submitted to the fruit growers. I believe I stated earlier in the discussion that a conference of fruit growers coming from all over Canada, from Nova Scotia to British Columbia, was held in the month of February. They considered this matter for two days, and this Bill is the outcome of their deliberations. I believe that at that conference there were also present a few representatives of the consumers, particularly large companies of western farmers, handling fruits along with other commodities.

Mr. BUREAU: I understood the hon. member for East Lambton to say that one of the objects of this Bill was to prevent fruit from the United States being distributed in an unfit condition. I see that every package is going to be marked with letters three-quarters of an inch in height before it is taken from the premises in which it is packed. Suppose fruit comes from the other side of the line and is packed in an immature condition, I do not see this is any protection to the Canadian consumer. I do not see any protection so far for the Canadian consumer.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The fruit to which I refer has been coming in from the United States, and this practice has been followed for years back. Carloads of immature fruit have been brought in year after year from the United States and forced upon the Canadian market and it is a most unwise position for us to be placed in as a people.

Sir SAM HUGHES: How will this Bill prevent that practice?

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Because the American exporters of immature fruit will not be allowed to dispose of it in Canada except they conform with the regulations prescribed by this Bill. Not only has the practice to which I have referred been common, but some of our own fruit farmers, in order to get the advantage of the high prices, have been in the habit of shipping immature fruit from their trees and selling it as wholesome fruit when it is certainly anything but that.

Mr. BUREAU: My question had reference to fruit coming across the border in packages. I understood this Bill was designed to protect the Canadian consumer.

Mr. CURRIE: There is a law in the United States prohibiting the sale of immature fruit, but when the market over there is denied to the American exporters they ship the immature fruit to this country, just as they do with unmarketable veal and tubercular sheep and hogs.

Mr. BUREAU: Does the United States law prevent the exportation of immature fruit?

Mr. CURRIE: No.

Mr. BUREAU: Then where is there any protection for Canada?

Mr. CURRIE: The fruit grown in the United States is subject to inspection there.

When that fruit is rejected, it is shipped to Canada although some of it is unfit for hogs let alone human beings. In the same way they ship to Canada the carcasses of tubercular sheep and hogs that have been rejected over there. They are allowed to do that because the United States will not carry on an inspection for us or for any other outside country—their inspection is intended for the protection of their own people. The clause in the Bill is aimed at importations into Canada of that class of stuff.

Mr. BUREAU: I understand that perfectly, but is there nothing in the present Bill against the shipment of immature, or any other kind of improper fruit, from the United States into Canada?

Mr. CURRIE: That is the object of the Bill.

Mr. BUREAU: Not the section I have just read because it presupposes that the fruit has been shipped in bulk and packed again in Canada. The language of the section is:

> Every person who, by himself or through the agency of another person, repacks fruit—

And so on. I do not think there is anything in the Bill to create the presumption that if a man receives a package of immature fruit from the United States that he is creating an agency.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I see your point; how in practice is immature fruit from the United States to be held up?

Mr. CRERAR: I may point out to the committee that the purpose of this definition is to prevent the sale of immature fruit.

Mr. BUREAU: Fruit that is packed?

Mr. CRERAR: It is to insure that fruit that is immature shall be so stamped and marked so that the purchaser shall know what he is buying. Immature fruit is used very largely for making jams—it has a definite, specific use—but it has happened in the past that immature fruit, for instance, plums and grapes, have been shipped to remote points and actually sold as good fruit when it was not. The purpose of this definition is merely to make it quite clear that the shipper of fruit,if it is immature, must stamp his basket or package with a label so that the purchaser will know what it is he is buying.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Whether it is Canadian or American fruit?

Mr. CRERAR: I think it would apply to American fruit as well, but as to that point I am not absolutely sure.

Mr. MARSHALL: There are hundreds of cars of fruit shipped into this country from the United States, which fruit has to be picked on the green side or it would not be in the proper condition to use when it gets here. If the fruit is not picked until it is ripe, when it is shipped any distance it cannot be handled at all after reaching its destination. Our company have brought in a great many cars of different kinds of fruit for the simple reason that we cannot get it here—this country is not producing sufficient fruit. The fruit that we bring into this country, as I say, is picked on the green side, and by the time it reaches its destination in this country it is in a nice condition to handle. If we wait until the fruit has ripened on the tree and then have it shipped, when it reaches here it is in such a condition that we cannot handle it.

Mr. McMASTER: I draw the minister's attention to the fact that the word "Christian" is spelled with a small c throughout the section. That is not as it should be, and I suppose the minister will correct it.

Mr. McKENZIE: If it has any reference to the fruit dealers, I would object to the use of the word altogether.

Section agreed to.

On section 321 (3)—Package marks:

Mr. McMASTER: The paragraph refers to specimens of fruit "of not less than nearly medium size and some colour for the variety," etc. Should that not be "same colour."

Mr. CRERAR: "Some" is right.

On paragraph 321—subsection 7—Fruit unfit for use:

Mr. McKENZIE: This section provides that no persons shall sell or expose for sale any fruit in any "package" that is diseased, wormy or otherwise depreciated. Would it not be just as bad if the dealer had this diseased fruit in bulk, and not in a package? It would seem that he could have it in as bad a condition as he likes if it is not in a package, but that it is only when it is in a package that the law applies.

Mr. McMASTER: It seems to me that this section will affect the sale of fruit which is quite general at certain times of the year in certain sections of Eastern Canada. For instance, take the blueberry season: Young folks go out and gather blueberries, bring them in in pails, and sell them. The same thing is done in the raspberry season. Apparently "no person shall sell, or offer, expose or have in his possession for sale any fruit in any package"—even in an open package—intended for sale unless marked as required by this section. I do not think the minister intends that the village children who pick strawberries, raspberries or blueberries have to mark the package to dispose of them among their friends in the village.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: If the hon. member will look at paragraph (b) of section 319, he will note that it is provided that " 'fruit' shall not include wild fruit, nor cranberries, whether wild or cultivated."

Mr. McMASTER: That provision will protect the sale I have mentioned.

Mr. J. A. ARMSTRONG: This Bill does not refer to that.

Paragraph agreed to.

On paragraph 325—Fruit packages:

Sir SAM HUGHES: I observe that this Bill provides that all these fruits shall be sold in packages of a certain size, a made-to-order package, of specified length, width and depth, taper, etc. To my mind it is difficult to comply with that law. Why should these fruits not also be sold by the pail or by the bag, unless for wholesale or export purposes, when there would be some object in making a fixed size of package in which a commodity should be sold? For instance, in the following section I notice that currants shall be sold in containers of four-fifths of a quart, and that a pint box shall be four and three-eighths by four and three-eighths at top and bottom and one and seven-eighths inches deep, and so on. It will take a Philadelphia lawyer to interpret what all this means. We have been in the habit of selling these fruits in pails, baskets, bags, or barrels. I do not see the gain in this legislation, or the possibility of dealing with it. It is absolutely impossible for a small dealer throughout the country to sell his fruits in accordance with this Bill.

Mr. MARSHALL: I do not agree with the hon. gentleman. What we want is standard size baskets.

Sir SAM HUGHES: You are a wholesale dealer, and I am not.

Mr. MARSHALL: I am a large buyer.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am not selling to large buyers, and you are selling to me.

Mr. MARSHALL: Your neighbour wants to know what he is getting. If he is buying a standard basket, then he will know. I quite agree that this clause is a move in the right direction. I am a canner, and we are trying to standardize our cans all the way through, jam can, fruit can and vegetable can; we are doing that now, and I can see a great advantage by doing so. I do not see why the same thing should not apply to these fruits.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Let me give the hon. gentleman a concrete instance. Take a farmer living outside of Aylmer, who does not want to sell to large wholesale organizations, but to the retail merchant. By this Bill he is supposed to sell fruits in packages of specified dimensions. How will he get the baskets? Why should he not sell the fruit as he does now, in pails, or sell his apples by the bag, as he has been doing?

Mr. MARSHALL: I can tell you why. I think it is the small buyer we are looking after. The large buyer can take care of himself better than the small buyer. This is a protection to the boy, or the girl, or the housewife who buys one package of fruit. I cannot get away from that. I think it is a splendid move, and one in the right direction.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It is a move that these multi-millionaires invariably have against the poor, downtrodden boy and girl in the country. It is almost impossible for every farmer to have a package or measure of this kind at his disposal at all times. Time and again we have provided that bags of certain capacity shall be used and that certain products shall be sold in certain kinds of measures. This limiting the size and shape of every measure that articles are sold in is all piffle. For the wholesale trade, let the requirements be up to a certain standard; let the measure be described as a bushel, peck, quart, or pint. But under this provision, a farmer is violating the law if he sells fruit in a bushel which is an inch too long and a corresponding inch too narrow.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: This clause is in the interests of consumers. We have standard size barrels in Ontario. The people of Nova Scotia have the same, and they are unable to sell apples in the United States because their barrel is of such a size that it does not conform with the regulations in the United States. The small boxes in which cherries and berries and smaller fruits are packed are supplied by large manufacturers. It is very easy for the farmers to conform to certain regulations respecting the size of the packages. Fruit men throughout the country are anxious that these standard boxes should be in universal use.

Mr. FRASER: I take exception to this clause respecting the baskets. In the Niagara Falls district we have had for the past two years a basket manufactured of paper; it has no tacks in it. A large order has been received for the supplying of baskets of this kind to the British trade. It is one of the best baskets on the market. As long as the basket is of a standard size and of strong construction, I do not see that it makes any difference what shape it is.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Is the hon. gentleman referring to packages of fruit for export?

Mr. FRASER: No, to packages to be sold in our own markets.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: What is the objection to conforming with these regulations?

Mr. FRASER: Because this basket has no tacks in it; you cannot put tacks in the bottom of it.

Mr. HENDERS: Take the case of a village of 300 or 500 inhabitants around which there is a farming community. The farmers have small quantities of strawberries and apples to sell and it is a great convenience to them to be able to bring this fruit to town and sell it by the pint, quart or gallon. There is also an advantage to the purchaser, because he knows what he is getting; besides, he gets the fruit in convenient form. For shipping purposes it is all right to provide such a standard as is specified in the Bill, but some provision should be made to meet cases of the kind to which I refer.

Mr. CURRIE: Does not most of the trouble arise because in Canada we use an Imperial measure, while in the United States they use what is known as the wine measure? In the United States the strawberry box contains, say, a wine quart—we call it wine measure in this country—while in Canada we have the Imperial quart, which is one fifth larger. That places the Canadian dealer at a disadvantage, because in the United States they will not give him credit for the additional amount contained in his package. Are the measures spoken of in this provision with reference to pears, crab apples, plums, and so on, based on the number of cubic inches contained in a quart or in a peck as the case may be; or are they simply arbitrary measurements?

Mr. CRERAR: The Fruit Growers' Association have recommended the measurements here specified. Their aim has been to make the standards of Canada conform with those of the United States.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I think that the following provision of section 327 covers the objection of the member for Welland (Mr. Fraser):

> Every basket of fruit packed in Canada, for sale in Canada, and every basket manufactured and offered for sale in Canada, of other material than wood veneer shall be of such dimensions as may be specified by the Minister of Agriculture, and shall contain, when level full, as nearly as practicable, one or other of the following quantities.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is all right for the large dealers, but we are legislating not for the large dealers, but for the ordinary farmers. Half the fruit sold in Canada is disposed of by small farmers, who peddle it around in the villages and small towns. Under this provision, if a farmer sells a pail of cherries, that does not comply with the law, he is a criminal. That should not be, because the transaction is absolutely straight and square and fair. It is all right to provide that fruit for export shall be put in a package of a certain size, but when a man is selling in small quantities direct to the consumer, let him sell it in the most convenient way and for whatever he can get.

Mr. BALL: Fruit for export or for shipment to a point some considerable distance away ought to be put in packages, boxes or barrels, but when it is locally disposed of it is quite unnecessary to adopt the method suggested by this provision. Moreover, the added expense is unnecessary. The measurement, Imperial gallon, or any other measurement, is not, as I understand it, a consideration. The size of the boxes is defined. But for local consumption, it is unnecessary to go to the expense of putting up fruit in boxes or barrels, unless people wish to have it put up in that manner.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: If the hon. member will refer to section 326, he will see that it mentions the word "bushels." Subsection 2 says:

> Every wood veneer basket of fruit packed in Canada for sale in Canada, or manufactured and offered for sale in Canada, shall contain, when level full, as nearly as practicable, one or other of the following quantities:—

(a) one bushel;

(b) eleven quarts.

And so on.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The ordinary farmer who has, say, ten quarts of fruit knows that in the fruit season farmers and their wives come into the market with a pail of cherries, a pail of plums, a pail of apples, and so on. That is the half-basket. Why should such people be penalized because that is the custom they have always followed? They have only a small quantity of fruit. They are not wholesale dealers or multi-millionaires. I do not know that anybody will enforce this law with regard to them, but why should they be made liable to a penalty, made criminals according to the law, for selling in small quantities, as their ancestors have done for generations? If their pail does not conform with the exact measurements of the bushel measure as set forth in this legislation, such people would be liable.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: They are allowed to sell in that way.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Not as I read the section.

Mr. CRERAR: I realize that there is some force in the point raised by the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes). Possibly an exception might be considered in the case of a farmer or fruit grower who brings fruit into the market and sells direct to the consumer.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRERAR: That point, as I interpret this section, is not covered. On the other hand, if a fruit grower, no matter whether he be doing business in a large or a small way, is selling to a retailer who resells to the consumer, he should be obliged to sell in baskets or packages.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Or the retailer should be obliged to put the fruit into baskets or packages.

Mr. CRERAR: I think we should have to start a little further back than the retailer. I would suggest that this section stand, and I shall look into that point and bring it up again later on.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am very much obliged. The man whom I have in mind is not the fruit grower as such. I do not know what the definition of the term "fruit grower" is. But I mean the man who has a farm, behind which he has an orchard with some plum, apple and cherry trees, and who makes a few hundred dollars a year out of his fruit. There are thousands of such farmers throughout Ontario and the Maritime Provinces. Those farmers could not possibly comply with this legislation, and I want them to be protected from being made criminals under it.

At one o'clock the House rose.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. CRERAR: I beg to move to amend section 326 by striking out the words "issue permits" and substituting therefor the words "make regulations." This will cover the point raised by my hon. friend from Victoria.

Mr. SHEARD: Would it not be better to leave the section just as it is and add the words "make regulations?" That would enable the minister to cover any cases that came up.

Mr. CRERAR: I think my amendment is better.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not want to hold up the Bill at all, but there is danger in rushing through legislation in the last days of the session. This Bill, for instance, in my opinion will cause any amount of trouble to local sellers, and they will not put up with being inconvenienced in this way. What is the bushel mentioned here? Is it the same as the grain bushel?

Mr. CRERAR: Imperial measure.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is our standard grain bushel the Imperial measure?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It must be the same.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I mention that just to illustrate the difficulties the minister will be up against all over the country. If the two bushels are not the same, people will be selling wheat by one bushel and fruit by another, and it will cause any amount of confusion. I would suggest that the local men might dispose of their fruit to the retailer without having to comply with these provisions. What is to prevent my hon. friend from Elgin, for instance, buying all the stuff that comes along in pails, half-pails or quarter-pails, and having his men put it into packages? Let that be the business of the man who sells to the general public. I fully endorse the idea of having packages, but it will lead to all sorts of trouble to men who sell locally.

Mr. CRERAR: I would point out that wild fruit is excluded from the application of these provisions by the definition of the word fruit, and I think the amendment I have moved will cover the point raised by my hon. friend. I do not know whether he intends that those people in the Niagara district, for instance, who are growing fruit as a business and selling it as part of their regular farm product should be permitted to sell their fruit in packages to suit themselves.

Sir SAM HUGHES: No, I do not.

Mr. CRERAR: Then we have to meet the requirement of the farmer who raises a little fruit and may take it into the local town to sell it direct to the consumer. There is a provision in the latter part of this section:

That the said Minister may issue permits allowing any person or persons to use packages of other sizes than those specified in the foregoing section.

I have proposed an amendment to that, so that we may frame regulations to cover these particular cases.

Sir SAM HUGHES: All right.

Mr. BURNHAM: One remark made by the hon. member for Victoria strikes me as singularly appropriate, and that is that legislation like this, which is extremely desirable and brings this whole matter out of chaos into order, should be considered very carefully. For my part I venture to say this House should do as it did last year, adjourn to meet again in the summer. The men are sweating in the trenches; let us do some sweating here. Why should we try to get rid of our duties at the earliest possible moment and clear out of here as soon as we possibly can? For my part, I am not a farmer, and may not be doing very much here, but I would say, let us stay right here and do our duty fully.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Go and work on your farm.

Section agreed to.

On section 331—penalty for destroying or pilfering fruit:

Mr. McMASTER: This section says:

Every person who carelessly handles, wilfully destroys or pilfers any fruit packed in any of the packages prescribed in this Part shall be guilty of an offence and liable upon summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding twenty-five dollars.

It seems to me to be wrong to put careless handling on the same basis as thieving, for pilfering is thieving.

[Sir Sam Hughes.]

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It says, "not exceeding twenty-five dollars." A magistrate could fine lightly or up to the limit.

Section agreed to.

On section 337A—potato grades:

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is there anything in this section to prevent a man selling potatoes and letting the buyer grade them?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

INSPECTION AND SALE ACT AMENDMENT.

House again in Committee on Bill No. 19, to amend the Inspection and Sale Act (vegetables, eggs, food containers, firewood and cement)—Sir George Foster.—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 3 (360b)—Portland cement, net weight:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER moved:

That clause 360b be struck out.

Motion agreed to.

On section 4—Act not to apply to articles now in stock; date of coming into force:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is not necessary now, as it is included in the new clause 358 (d). I therefore beg to move that it be struck out.

Motion agreed to.

On section 5—Date of coming into force:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I move that there shall be substituted for that section the following:

This Act shall come into force in one year from the date upon which this Bill receives the Royal Assent.

Motion agreed to.

On section 2 (358 a)—Packages of food and containers to be marked:

On motion of St. George Foster, the Committee reverted to section 358a.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It will be remembered that when we were discussing packing or labelling of milk in bottles it seemed as though we ought to amend that clause otherwise it would be necessary for some permanent stamp to be affixed to or blown into the bottle. I propose to make that clear in the same manner as has been done in Acts of this kind in the United States. I therefore move:

That at the end of the 25th line, after the word "branded" there be added the words "or otherwise indicated on the outside or top or on a label or tag attached thereto."

This will make it easy to affix the label to the bottle or to attach an independent label thereto.

Mr. DECHENE: According to the amendment made by the minister to section 5, this Act will not come into force until one year after it has received the Royal Assent. But before that another clause was amended to provide that stock on hand would not be affected by the provisions of the Act. What is the use of amending the two clauses in this way if the Act is to come into force within one year after it has received the Royal Assent? His amendment would be useless, as far as I can see if it does not cover all the stock.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The amendment of which I gave notice to section 358 D provides that:

This Act does not apply to any articles held in stock by wholesale or retail dealers prior to the coming into force of the Act.

If, when the Act comes into force, he shall have a stock on hand, this Act shall not apply to it. That gives a wide privilege and at the same time it takes away any reason for discontent as to his having to remark articles which he may have in stock. Then the amendment proceeds to state other exceptions from the operation of the Act:

The provisions of this Act shall not apply.—
(e) To packages containing two avoirdupois ounces, or less, which packages shall be exempt from marking in terms of weight;
(f) To packages containing one fluid ounce, or less, which packages shall be exempt from marking in terms of measure.

These are very small articles, and it is not considered worth while to bother with them, or to insist on their being labelled with measurements, weights, or names.

(g) to any article the sale of which as regards the weight or marking thereof is already provided for under other statutes.

We do not want to duplicate the legislation.

(h) those food commodities which may at the time this Act comes into force, or which thereafter may be subject to any regulation or order of the Canada Food Control Board as respects the weight of such commodity or the weight or proportion of ingredients used in the manufacture of such commodity.

We do not wish to interfere with the work of the Food Board in making these changes and regulations from time to time. These are extraordinary regulations adopted by the Food Board and they are called for by the necessities and circumstances of war conditions. We do not bind them down by the letter of this enactment. But while the war continues and while the work of the Food Board is going on, this clause is necessary.

(i) those food commodities held in stock at the time that such regulations of the Canada Food Board referred to in paragraph (h) become inoperative.

That avoids the confusion and expense of relabelling, remarking, reweighing, and remeasuring the stock that may be on hand at that particular time.

Mr. DECHENE: This part of the Act applying to imported goods will interfere with the importation of food.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, it does not interfere with the importation of food.

Mr. DECHENE: It does interfere with it if we set up a standard in this country which is not the standard in the United States.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We must have our own standard.

Mr. DECHENE: The packers in the United States will pack in accordance with their standard and not in accordance with our standard, and there will be trouble in connection with the importation of goods packed in that way.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The importer will have the advantage of a whole year to order his imports and to see that they are packed according to these regulations. It is not necessary to wait for a year to put in the order.

Mr. DECHENE: This will have the effect of increasing prices if we do not have the same standard as they have in the United States. The packers in the United States will have to pack goods specially for our trade, they will have to charge for that, and it will mean higher prices to our consumers. All food products are high enough now. We are anxious to keep down prices and to reduce the cost of living, but by this legislation we are putting prices up.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not think that myself. The object of the legislation is to make it sure that the consumer when he buys shall know what he is getting and what he is paying for. It would be unfair, as my hon. friend will see, to have a lesser measure put up in bottles or packages in another country, say the United States, and have those bottles and packages come here and compete, on the same outward appearances, with a larger measure which our own packers and our makers put up. We simply guard ourselves in the interest of the Canadian consumer, that is all.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. KAY: When this Bill was previously under consideration in committee, the Minister of Trade and Commerce promised that he would exempt bottles filled with milk by the milk dealers, from its operation.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: An amendment relating to such bottles has been added to the Bill, and the amendment has been agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment to 358a which has just been adopted, adds after the word "branded" on line 25, the following words, "or otherwise indicated on the outside or top or on a label or tag attached thereto."

Amendment agreed to, and clause as amended agreed to.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I move

To amend clause 358 (d) by adding after sub-paragraph (c) the following words:

"(d) to any articles held in stock by a wholesale or retail dealer prior to the coming into force of this Act.

(e) to packages containing two avoirdupois ounces or less, which packages shall be exempt from marking in terms of weight.

(f) to packages containing one fluid ounce, or less, which packages shall be exempt from marking in terms of measure.

(g) to any article the sale of which as regards the weight or marking thereof is already provided for under other statutes.

(h) those food commodities which may at the time this Act comes into force, or which thereafter may be subject to any regulation or order of the Canada Food Control Board as respects the weight of such commodity or the weight or proportion of ingredients used in the manufacture of such commodity.

(i) those food commodities held in stock at the time that such regulations of the Canada Food Board referred to in paragraph (h) become inoperative."

Section as amended agreed to.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I move to strike out clause 2 dealing with the weight of eggs.

An hon. MEMBER: Who will take care of the eggs?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The hens will take care of them.

Amendment agreed to, and Bill reported and read the third time.

[Sir George Foster.]

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of the Hon. Mr. Burrell Bill No. 106 (from the Senate) to amend the Companies Act in various particulars was read a second time and the House went into committee thereon.

Mr. TURRIFF: What is the object in adding the last three words to the title "in various particulars"? It seems to me altogether unnecessary. Will the minister explain the object of the addition.

Mr. BURRELL: I do not think that I can offer any further explanation beyond the fact that there was another Bill put through the Senate recently which provided for an amendment to the Government Act. This is a Senate Bill.

Bill reported.

SUPPLY.

THE TAKING OF THE SOLDIERS' VOTE AT LAST ELECTION.

On the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. A. B. COPP (Westmorland): On Saturday last, I notified the Prime Minister that I intended to discuss on the first convenient opportunity a matter I considered of some importance, and as I have not heard from him, I presume it is satisfactory to him to proceed this afternoon. The matter, Mr. Speaker, I desire to bring to the attention of Parliament is in reference to the taking of the soldiers' votes in the elections held on December 17 last.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If my hon. friend will excuse me, it is stated that there was an understanding that this matter should not come up until to-morrow. The Prime Minister, especially, wished to be present. I am not sure whether my hon. friend expected, or understood, that he should receive word with reference to it. He says he has not, and, of course, that goes without saying. But if he has not, it was from a misunderstanding or some little neglect. The Prime Minister is engaged this afternoon on a very important matter with high authorities in connection with our defence. Under the circumstances, if my hon. friend would allow it to go over until to-morrow he would consult very much the convenience of the Prime Minister.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Prime Minister asked me to confer with him regarding the business of the House, and going over the various matters I informed him that we intended to bring up the matter of the soldiers' votes, about which my hon. friend from Westmorland had notified him. The Prime Minister told me that perhaps it would be more convenient for him to have the discussion to-morrow. I understand that the Prime Minister did not intend to take part in the discussion. I immediately notified my hon. friend (Mr. Copp) that he might be called upon to postpone his motion until to-morrow. Under the circumstances, we cannot refuse to accede to the request that the discussion of this matter be postponed, but in view of the fact that the time of the House may be well taken up to-morrow with the debate on titles, and possibly other matters. I suggest that if this motion be not proceeded with to-morrow afternoon, it be taken up on Wednesday morning.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am much obliged to my right hon. friend.

Mr. COPP: As I have said, I communicated with the Prime Minister regarding my intention to make this motion, and as I did not hear from him, I supposed that it was all right to go on with it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is understood, then, that if it is too late to take this matter up to-morrow afternoon, we shall proceed with it the first thing Wednesday morning?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee of Supply.

SUPPLY.

Trade and Commerce—Trade commissioners and commercial agents, including expenses in connection with negotiations of treaties or in extension of commercial relations; miscellaneous advertising and printing, or other expenditure connected with the extension of Canadian trade, $160,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has anything been done to implement the report made by the commission sent to France?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Since the commission made their report, congestion in France as well as on the seas has increased rather than diminished. The facilities which in normal times are used for the exchange of commercial products have been devoted to the transport of food, munitions and other war necessities. Trade has been entirely stopped in a great many lines and greatly interrupted in all. The commission made a thorough investigation and published their information in a very instructive way. Under the circumstances, it has not been possible to do more than that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The report is a splendid one.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It has been distributed broadcast amongst our traders, businessmen and producers. It is impossible to push trade with warring countries at this time, if we except trade in such commodities and articles as are necessary for the war. As these things are largely bought by the governments themselves, private business transactions between the inhabitants of all countries have been disarranged.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I suppose the same applies to our Russian business.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Worse.

Mr. LEMIEUX: A very interesting report was published by the department some time ago with regard to the possibilities of Canadian trade with Russia and Siberia. The other day I inquired whether the Government were aware of the denunciation by France of the Franco-Canadian Treaty. I have seen in the press that France has denounced all her trade treaties. In the British House of Commons the other day Mr. Bonar Law or Mr. Balfour said that as a result of the Paris Economic Conference, France had denounced all her treaties. The Prime Minister said, in reply to my inquiry, that he was not aware of any such denunciation. I wish now to renew my question. Our trade with France during the existence of the Franco-Canadian treaty was particularly extensive in connection with the importation to Canada of French wines.

Now that we have established prohibition in Canada, the French trade will thereby suffer to a large extent, although we can do business with the French people in other ways. It seems to me that, after the visit of that commission on the other side and by the report of that commission, we can, after the war, establish much closer trade relations with France. We should have, as they have in the United Kingdom, commercial agents not only in Paris, but in other large French cities, such as Bordeaux, Nantes, Marseilles, Lyons, and possibly Rouen. The war will have brought France and England so close to one another that this country should, by reason of its national traditions, help in maintaining the entente cordiale between France and England, and although sentiment and business are two different things, yet I believe a good commercial treaty and sound business relations will help to maintain the happy friendship that exists between the Mother Country and France.

I do not know if my right hon. friend has the latest figures as regards the trade between France and Canada, but the present large trade is, of course, due to war conditions. At the same time, one must admit that France has, during the present war, been an extraordinarily good customer of Canada. Our trade statistics will show that very plainly. Before the war the total trade, exports and imports, between the two countries was relatively small, but since 1914 we have become one of the great allies of France from the commercial standpoint alone, not to speak of other standpoints. We are now selling to France in the millions, whilst we ourselves continue to buy from France at a much lower figure. I do not expect that, in the years to come, our imports from France will equal our exports, neither do the French people expect that. But from my conversation with some of the French consuls in this country, I am led to believe that if the Government, in particular the Minister of Trade and Commerce, will help in this connection we may establish a buoyant, permanent trade with France.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: When the question with reference to the denunciation of treaties was put to the House by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) a week or so ago, no official information had reached the Government of the action that had been taken. Since that time official information has reached the Government, and France has given notice of the termination of all her treaties with all countries. With reference to Canada, as I suppose is the case with reference to other countries, the notice runs "from the 15th of May." One year after the 15th of May, the treaties will be denounced. But the statement is also made that in the denunciation of the treaties, it is not the intention of France to terminate favoured arrangements with those nations with whom she has had relations before, but that the denunciation of the treaties takes place in order to put France, under the altered conditions, in the position of making new arrangements with the different countries. France is not alone in respect to that action. Great Britain is following the same course, and so I imagine are most of the other nations.

4 p.m.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What about Japan?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I would, however, prefer not to give the reason for the denunciation of the treaties to be the basis which was laid down in the resolutions adopted by the Economic Conference at Paris; rather the resolutions adopted in that conference and the denunciation of those treaties arise from the very same circumstances—the necessity for our grading and rearranging commercial relations owing to the world-wide dislocation of trade brought about by the war.

We had commenced an excellent propaganda in Russia. We had one of our most expert trade commissioners at Petrograd, and a very bright and capable young man at Omsk. Both of those gentlemen had about a year or a year and a half of work in their respective localities, but the collapse of the Russian government in so far as carrying on the war was concerned, and the widespread confusion which took place thereafter, the utter congestion of trade transport inland and the almost utter lack of ocean transport, have made it necessary that both those gentlemen should be recalled from their positions. Mr. Just has lately arrived, fortunately safely, in England, and Mr. Wilgress is now at work for the department in the southern part of China, with his headquarters at Hong Kong. He will probably remain there until matters settle down in Russia sufficiently to enable him to take up his work again from anything like an advantageous position. All our trade commissioners have been interfered with in their work largely by the confusion of transport and of trade conditions.

At the same time they have been diligently at work gathering information and preparing reports, which are being distributed, and endeavouring in every possible way to prepare for the coming better period by keeping the relations between business men here and business men in those other countries as far as possible intact.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What about my suggestion that after the war more commercial agents be appointed in those large centres? I do not mean that my hon. friend is not doing the needful as far as Paris is concerned, although everybody who has travelled in Europe knows that the commissioners in Paris and London are not able to look after the trade of Canada, because Canadians abroad simply overwhelm their offices with requests for information of all kinds. It seems to me we should have—we had them in Germany before the war—agents on the continent and especially in France, at such places as Rouen, Lyons, Marseilles, Bordeaux, whose special business would be to develop the trade between Canada and France. One agent in Paris is not sufficient for the whole of France.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I quite agree, but the only thing that can be done at the moment is for the department to keep a watchful eye on what happens. One thing is quite certain, and that is that methods and opportunities for interchange will be very largely altered by reason of the war, and agencies in France may be taken advantage of which have not been available heretofore; such, for instance, as the Lyons' fair, which takes place every year and which will open up an excellent opportunity, when times become more normal, for representation of our wares to the representative business men of France, leading up to business connections. It is true that France is buying largely from us at the present time and selling comparatively little to us, but the balance of trade, while in our favour at the present time, is largely a fictitious one and does not represent anything permanent. In peace times the balance of trade was very largely in favour of France who sent us many millions of dollars' worth of goods more than we sent to her, so the balance is now righting itself. What will happen after the war will depend very largely upon the basic needs of France in relation to our sources of large supply. For instance, France ought to take from Canada a great amount of lumber and other material for reconstruction purposes. That is all being noted as carefully as possible by the department, and when the proper time comes these matters will all be taken up. In the meantime nothing can be done in the way of negotiations.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would ask the minister, if he attends the Imperial Conference, or if he does not, his colleagues, to look especially after the interests of Canadian trade. It is true that a Canadian business man abroad can always rely on the British consulates to protect him and give all the information he requires in his trade. But England is a nation of shopkeepers, be it said without derogation, and looks after her own business through her consulates. The question has been brought up on several occasions in the House. Perhaps it would be possible for this Government to have in those British consulates on the continent, and especially in France, Canadian attachés who would especially represent the interests of Canadian trade. Let my hon. friend understand me well; I do not wish to break the tie between the Mother Country and Canada, but this is a cold-blooded business proposition, and it seems to me that with all our natural and industrial resources we should do more in the after-the-war period to advertise our wares and our business than we have done heretofore. If we had Canadian attachés in the British consulates on the continent, I think our trade would certainly be the gainer. My hon. friend is quite correct in saying that in view of the world revolution going on our trade at the present time is largely fictitious, but even during this revolutionary period, by taking the tide which leads on to fortune, Canada can build up a trade in connection with reconstructing the devastated areas in France, for instance, which I think would be of lasting advantage to this country. Look at what the Americans have done. Two years ago a conference of American business men and capitalists was called in the city of Boston, and all American business and industrial concerns were invited to unite in an effort to capture all the trade that would develop in reconstructing the devastated areas of France. I do not know whether my hon. friend followed that matter very closely, but a copy of the programme issued by the association came into my hands last year. I cannot see why the Americans should get preference over the Canadians in this line of business. I do not know why our business men from Toronto, Montreal, and other large industrial centres should not reap the benefits American business men are enjoying. They are rebuilding the cities and towns and villages in France which have been recaptured from the Germans by the Allied armies. Only the other day I read a very interesting article to the effect that the Quakers, whose tenets will not allow them to take part with the combatant armies, are going to help the Red Cross and help reconstruct the devastated villages and towns.

(Sir THOMAS WHITE, Minister of Finance, having entered the House after a prolonged absence through illness, and being warmly greeted by hon. members),

Mr. LEMIEUX: I hope I express the feeling of the House in welcoming back our hon. friend the Minister of Finance. Mr. Chairman, I would ask my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce to take note of the few remarks I have made. They are made in earnest. It seems to me that with pluck and with true sturdy Canadianism we should at least equal the Americans in capturing war trade. I call it war trade because it is trade that has developed as a consequence of the war, but it will be lasting, because the reconstruction period will extend over a number of years. When once the Canadians have reached these markets it will be seen that they are the equals, if not the superiors, of others. My right hon. friend said a moment ago that some business men had already, by their own efforts, done a great deal towards capturing that trade. That is quite true, as I have found out myself. I have travelled all around the globe, and I have found that the Massey-Harris firm, for instance, have sold their implements in every part of the world. In Australia, Asia, Japan, France, Russia, all over the world, that Toronto firm have been able to secure permanent customers. It is for us, during the present war, to extend the ramifications of our trade as far as possible. I said a moment ago that business and sentiment were different things. But sentiment helps to foster business, and what I am asking the Minister of Trade and Commerce to do is to foster the business of Canada during the present war.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, may I remind the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Lemieux) that the Massey-Harris firm do almost their entire export trade from the city of Brantford, which I have the honour to represent, and not from the city of Toronto. Brantford has been the exporting centre of the Massey-Harris Company for many years. That is the place where the Harris firm originally was founded and carried on its business for many years before being amalgamated with the Massey Company. The export trade remains at the city of Brantford up to the present time.

I want to know if the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) has any information to give us as to how we can get along with our present trade rather than taking up the problem, which my hon. friend from Maisonneuve has so ably discussed, of trade after the war. I would like to know if the minister can give us any encouragement in regard to the shipping facilities that we may expect to take care of the little bit of foreign trade that is left? It is well known that the foreign trade we had with various countries apart from Great Britain, France, and Italy, has fallen away to very small proportions and for the little which is offering it is almost impossible to get shipping. Goods have been piled up in New York, Boston, and other American ports awaiting ships, that do not come to the Canadian ports for the most part at all, to carry these goods to such countries as South America, South Africa, Australia, and other outlying parts of the world which have been in the habit of trading with Canada. I know that until very recently shipping has been almost entirely unobtainable and that many firms which had taken orders with a view of having the goods delivered at any given time have found it almost impossible to carry out their contracts by reason of the uncertainty in regard to the supply of shipping that is offered. In some cases no shipping has been offered at all to carry these goods. We know the difficulties of the shipping situation. The war has caused a tremendous loss in tonnage, probably 6,000,000 tons last year, and naturally there will be a shortage both at the present time and in the immediate future. But I understand the minister has his hand from time to time on a little shipping that is available for carrying goods to different parts of the earth. I would like to ask him if he can give us any encouragement as to the outlook for the present season in regard to the carrying of any orders that may be on hand to the distant corners of the earth and particularly to Great Britain.

We know that munitions and foodstuffs must have the right of way but there are other very essential articles for the development of those wasted lands that should receive careful consideration and I trust that the minister is using his every endeavour to get as ample shipping in competition as it is possible to procure in these strenuous times in order that the trade of Canada may not develop entirely in a lopsided way with our neighbours to the south. We have been buying enormous quantities of goods in the United States, much more than we have been selling, and unfortunately there is a very serious discrepancy in the rate of exchange on that account. On the other hand, many countries of Europe would be only too glad to get those things that we have available for export, both foodstuffs and manufactured goods as well as products of the forests, mines and fisheries. I deem it essential that the minister shall endeavour, to the utmost of his ability, to provide the necessary shipping and to find transportation so that Canadian products may be delivered at their destination within a fairly reasonable time. I hope the minister will be able to give us some encouragement along that line.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Mr. Speaker, I wish I could give a larger measure of encouragement than it is possible for me to do. Taking our great lines of shipping, the efforts of the department have almost entirely been used to preserve what we had at the commencement of the war. Although it might appear to be only a sort of negative success, yet it is really a substantial one when you are able to keep the routes manned somewhere up to the capacity of pre-war times. But the necessities of the war are inexorable, and when it comes to a showdown as to whether commercial goods shall be carried or the necessities of the war, there is no ground but one that can be taken, and the war necessities prevail.

Take the communications on the eastern side between Canada and Australia. We had our monthly service carried on with regularity for a number of years, and a large trade developed along that line. For the last four or five months it has not been possible to get a single vessel, either sailing ship or steam vessel, for that route; and although the most persistent efforts have been made both by the company interested and by the department, there do not appear to be any more encouraging features now than three or four months ago.

On the western side we had a good service between Victoria and Vancouver and New Zealand and Australia, including some excellent freight boats. The Niagara and the Makura were vessels which would be an honour and pride to any steamship line or service, and the company's freight boats were good serviceable boats. One by one the freight boats have been taken away, and just within the last fortnight, although I have been able to keep to date the two vessels referred to on the route, in conjunction with efforts from New Zealand and Australia, they have been commandeered by the British Admiralty; and the best assurance the British Admiralty could give in return was to hold out a hope that two slower vessels would, as soon as possible, be placed on the route; so that there is not much encouragement in that direction at the present time. We may get those two vessels again, and we may not.

As to the China and Japan service, the big Empresses were taken off early in the war, and we had a maimed service for some time. Afterwards two of the Empresses were allowed to come back, and for the last year the four vessels have been plying regularly. Within the last three weeks two Empresses have again been taken for war purposes, and this morning I received word that a smaller, but yet a serviceable, vessel had been allocated to take the place of one of the Empresses, so that we shall have three boats on that service, according to present indications, for the remainder of the season.

With reference to the Trans-Atlantic South African Service, we have had the same ups and downs. The Elder-Dempster Company, as I stated here, have had more than eighty-five per cent of their vessels commandeered by the British Government, and they have lost a certain number outside of that. The company have done the very best they could to keep up the South African connection, but we have had months of intermission in the service, getting a vessel whenever possible. For the last three months there has been no vessel in this route, but within a fortnight I have received word that one has been allocated, and will sail in June for South Africa. This encouraging feature was somewhat modified, when the announcement was made that the vessel would not be able to take nearly all the freight which was offering—which is stored up in fact and offering—but the promise is given that as often as possible we shall get boats intermittently between South Africa and Canada. The South African Government is as strongly in favour of that as we are, and the efforts of both Governments are being used to that end.

As to South America, the situation is a pretty difficult one. We have no vessels running on that route from Canada and the arrangements which have been made owing to the war have combed out everything that is serviceable. We do get vessels going from New York occasionally, and have to make ourselves satisfied with what small freights we can get on those.

As to the West Indies, we had an excellent service of four vessels, but for the last two years it has been, I think I may say good naturedly, a real war to keep those vessels on. I have succeeded in keeping them on with the good-will of the Admiralty until the last month, when two of them have been commandeered, with a sort of indefinite promise that if any vessel, a slower one, can be allocated it will be—but there you are.

With regard to the Atlantic service, my hon. friend knows the circumstances as well as I do. Now here is the situation: There are ships building in Great Britain and the United States, to mention no other countries. Large tonnage is being put into construction in the United States as well as in Great Britain, but we must not hold our hopes too high on the reparation of the losses in tonnage by new building in the United States. The new building and the new launchings in the United States have in view the building up of an army which may go to five millions, or seven millions, or even to ten millions, every mouth of which has to be fed practically by transported grain and other foodstuffs from this side, and all the munitions of war necessary to go with the transport of those troops have to be provided for. That makes the man who thinks come to the conclusion that there will not be much alleviation for commercial freights in that respect, in so far as the coming year is concerned.

Now I have made a candid statement to the House. Everybody, I think, sees the difficulty and when you are right up against the statement of the Admiralty: is it the war or is it commerce, you have to give way to the absolute necessities.

Mr. DECHENE: I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the explanations made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce but there is one point that comes to my mind and to which I would like to invite the attention of the House. A very able report has been made to the Government with respect to an international or imperial bank that would look after the interests of Canada with other countries. I would like to know from the minister what has been done by the Government towards furthering the idea of incorporating a big bank that will take charge of international banking interests in connection with Canadian industries; a bank that will be posted on the commercial condition of every nation. For such an undertaking we would require a bulletin which will contain information of a more extensive character than those of the present weekly bulletin. I read the weekly bulletin published by the department with a great deal of interest, and I think it has already shown the way to increase our commercial interests. But we need more information relating to financial conditions and inter-exchange, to make matters easier for purposes of commerce. To-day I think we have only two banks to take care of our bills outside of this country, the Bank of Montreal and the Royal Bank, and possibly the Canadian Bank of Commerce. I would like to ask the minister if he knows what has been done towards adopting the report of Senator Nicholls and creating a bank of that kind?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think my hon. friend is on good ground when he says that the extension of trade and banking facilities must go hand in hand. Probably we have suffered in that respect as a young country. Our banks have been taking charge of our commercial affairs and ministering to them in this country, and in our rapid development I think our banks have had pretty nearly all they could do, and they have done their work on the whole excellently well. An example of where banking extension helps trade is shown in a small way in the West India Islands, where our commercial subsidies provide transportation and our banks undertake work of a financial nature. In fact, they are now, I think, the dominant banks in those islands. They have also made the beginning of a push into the South American continent. These matters, of course, must be left, both as to trade and financial facilities, with the people themselves very largely. It is unwise to ask the Government to attempt to do what financial and business men and manufacturers and traders have the first interest in doing, and can do much better than any other agency. The Government's work is to prepare the way by gathering and distributing information of the best and most reliable kind, and by doing what it can in the way of commercial subsidies, and in all ways to stimulate a knowledge and interest between our own and other countries. But the Government cannot start banks and cannot build commercial lines and put them on these routes. The business and the financial men of the country must co-operate if we are to be successful. And the Government will aid in every possible way that a Government can. My hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) cited the fact of an aggregation of United States business men for securing trade in France, and he might have said in other neutral and foreign countries. But it was the business men who aggregated themselves together, made the organization and adopted the methods. The operation was assisted and aided by the consular system and trade intelligence system of the United States Government. But the United States Government, having paved the way, and added its customary forces, the business men and the bankers themselves must go the rest of the gait. So it is with reference to our own people here. Just now I think my hon. friend will quite agree with me that our banks have about all they can do to carry the load upon their shoulders in Canada at the present time. Even if they had a little leisure time, and a little more strength, conditions are so confused in other countries that they do not lend themselves to the propagation of branch banks, or the establishment of parent banks. These things will have to wait, as so many others, until the war period is over and settled conditions begin to appear again. With reference to the allusion to the report and speech of a member of the other House, I am quite cognizant of the senator's good speeches and good work, and hope that it will bear fruit in an aggregation of capital which will tend towards the desired end, the same as is being done in Great Britain, but which is being done by the financial interests and business men themselves. At the present time the difficulties are so great for launching anything of that kind that our men may well pause before undertaking it.

Mr. BUREAU: I notice that this item reads: "Trade commissioners and commercial agents, including expenses in connection with negotiations of treaties or in extension of commercial relations." May I ask what treaty the minister has in contemplation to negotiate during the coming year? How much of this money will be used in negotiating treaties?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: None that one knows; yet as my hon. friend will see, the moment the war ceases these matters have to be taken up, and a portion of this vote is intended for any expenses which may be necessary with reference to possible negotiations. At the present time there are none in contemplation and none under way.

Mr. BUREAU: Does this vote cover the commercial agents located in various countries?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: All of the agents.

Mr. BUREAU: It covers their salaries as well?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: If the minister can tell us how much will be required for salaries, we will know what margin is left for the negotiation of treaties, so that we will have an idea of the importance to be attached to the negotiations.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Probably about $20,000 of that vote would be available for that purpose. Maybe less. But a good deal depends upon how things turn out and how our trade commissioners are able to work.

Bounties on lead and crude petroleum. To cover expenditure in connection with the administration of the Acts, $4,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: These are for the bounties on lead and oil, the usual vote.

Mr. BUREAU: There is a decrease of $1,000. Has production decreased?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The bounties on lead, as my hon. friend knows, if he has the Act in mind, depend as to whether or not the price of lead in the markets of the world falls below a certain amount. If it falls below a certain amount there is a bounty paid; if it keeps above that amount none is paid. The vote was not all spent last year. One cannot tell how the prices on lead will go. So we have to take a sufficient amount to carry us through if the lead price—I do not believe it will happen this year— should go down lower than the sum at which bounties would accrue.

Salaries, rent, wages and contingencies under the Canada Grain Act, $1,050,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We will let this item stand.

Mr. BUREAU: When will it be taken up?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: To-morrow, I hope.

Mr. BUREAU: I have received a pamphlet entitled, "Should the Canada Grain Act be Enforced." I suppose the minister has received a copy of it. I wish to put some questions with regard to this item.

Mr. ROBB: When the minister takes this item up, will he be prepared to give a statement of the expenses of operating and the revenue received from the terminal elevators?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will give all the information.

Item stands.

To provide for the construction, acquisition, leasing or expropriation of terminal elevators, $50,000.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This item follows the wording of the vote under which we built our terminal and interior elevators in the Northwest from the head of the Lakes to Vancouver, including the preliminary work with respect to the proposed elevator at Hudson bay. All these elevators have been finished except the one at Hudson bay. It is not proposed to do any work there during the present year, and no amount has been put in the Estimates for that purpose. This vote is to make provision for such expenditures as may be necessary to provide new machinery and equipment in the elevators that we already have. Last year $25,262 was spent under that head. You never can tell what may happen in the way of the breaking down of machinery in these elevators or the necessity for new machinery, and you have to have some money on hand to defray such expenses.

Mr. BUREAU: Do the grain elevators which are part of a railway system come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, in part.

Mr. BUREAU: Are the elevators at Fort William under the jurisdiction of the minister?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: Are they not part of the Canadian Northern system?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, not ours.

Mr. BUREAU: What distinction do you make between elevators inherited by this country through the Canadian Northern system and those inherited from the persons who constructed them?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Those inherited elevators of which my hon. friend has so happily spoken become the inheritance of the department which took over the railways and which has jurisdiction over the system of which the newly acquired lines form a part.

Mr. BUREAU: Would it not be better and more economical to put all these elevators under one management? I do not see why they should not all be under the authority of one department.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There may be two opinions on that point. In one sense it would be better if all grain-handling elevators were under one control and management. But circumstances arise which make it difficult to carry that principle into operation. I do not know that the expense is any greater in either case. For instance, the elevator in Quebec is operated by the Quebec Harbour Commission, a body which, in a sense, is an appointee of and gets its money under loan from the Government. The same applies to Montreal. The harbour commissioners operate their elevators in connection with the harbours over which they have jurisdiction. These elevators, however, come under certain regulations; in many of their relations they are not operated by the Canada Grain Board. The railway companies, in some way work their elevators on the general line of their traffic and consequently do what the Grain Board cannot possibly do. These elevators also are subject to the general regulations respecting warehousing, inspection and the like.

Mr. BUREAU: The inland elevators are fed by the railroads and the terminal elevators, such as those at Montreal and Quebec, transfer the grain from the cars to the steamers. Uniform regulations must be established respecting transhipment, shortages or leakages in the elevators, and so on. Why not have the whole system controlled by one department? These elevators are closely connected with the transportation question; they are practically intermediate between the railway systems and the steamship services so far as grain is concerned.

Why not let the Railway Department, which has under its control the transportation facilities of the country, have the management, control and oversight of all those elevators? I do not find fault with the minister, but I have had occasion before to make this criticism in the House, that there is some duplication or overlapping.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Not necessarily.

Mr. BUREAU: There are two authorities over those elevators. Those elevators can serve but one purpose, namely, to store the country's produce which is bought for export, and then to turn it over to the steamer that is to take it overseas, or the freight cars that are to take it elsewhere. The operations of those elevators should be uniform, and you cannot obtain the same degree of efficiency so far as uniformity is concerned, by having two departments controlling them, as by having only one.

Census and statistics, $100,000.

Mr. BUREAU: Is this for the new and famous department that has been inaugurated this session?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is, as I explained to my hon. friend when the Bill went through, not new and not altogether the same as the old one. It is the old, improved, reinvigorated and made more effective.

Mr. McMASTER: The mouldering branches are cut away.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There never were any mouldering branches, but new shoots have been put in. Just watch the new shoots shooting forth.

Dominions Royal Commission, $5,000.

Mr. BUREAU: What is this Dominions Royal Commission?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In 1912 there was issued by the British Government a Royal Commission, consisting of representatives from the self-governing Dominions and the United Kingdom.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is the Imperial Trade Commission?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The name of it is the Dominions Royal Commission. It is a Royal Commission, the Dominions and the United Kingdom together. It has been pursuing its investigations in all the self-governing Dominions and in Great Britain It has finished its operations and handed in its final report. By the way, some of those reports have been distributed. They are voluminous, because the subjects are wide, but they contain a mine of information that any man who desires to get a broad grasp of the trade resources and possibilities of the Dominion and of the United Kingdom together, would find invaluable. I have had a circular sent to the members and senators in connection with that report. It is folly to send such a voluminous report to a man who does not want it; but if any one feels interested in it and would like to have a set of the volumes, or, as there is a tabulation of them, if he would like to have any particular volume of the set, we shall be very glad to give it to him. This sum is for winding up what little expenses may remain.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Could the minister give, in a few terse sentences, a statement as to the action of the Government as regards the conclusions contained in that report? I had the privilege of receiving two of those blue-books, one concerning the trade with the Dominions and another containing the final conclusions of the commission. As the minister stated, no man who wishes to get a grasp of the world-wide conditions which that report embraces, can be without at least with the last volume in his library. This commission completed its work about two years ago. I met some of the delegates who passed through Canada at the time. Has the Department of Trade and Commerce taken any action whatsoever based on the conclusions contained in that report?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The hon. member mentions one of the volumes. There is another volume, which, I think, is equally important. There is not extant to-day a statistical statement with the same modernity, the same grasp and scope, as the statistics compiled and issued in that volume. Not only does it contain the best of the published statistics of each country, but it has those supplemented by actual investigations made by the commissioners themselves in all those countries, and special statistical tables with reference to different lines of production, resources and such things, which information does not exist in any other statistics.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And about the ports?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, about all those things. Besides that, there are in the addenda, most valuable and exhaustive reports upon most of the great lines of activity, given by eminent engineers and other eminent authorities, which reports lie there as a veritable thesaurus, a treasure-house of fact, which you could not get anywhere else. I make that statement here so that hon. members, who take an interest in those things, may have their attention directed to the report. That commission arose, as the committee knows, out of the deliberations and conclusions of an Imperial Conference.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In 1911?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Whatever was the purpose of the conference, whether it was to avoid a difficulty or whether it was to have a difficulty solved by a better medium than the simple cogitations of the members of the commission sitting in London for a few days or a few weeks, that commission started on a recommendation of the Imperial Conference of 1911. That report goes back to the British Government, and it will be submitted to the Imperial Conference when it next meets. Some of the suggestions of the Dominions Royal Commission have already been embodied, in whole or in part, in action which has already been taken by the British Government.

Mr. LEMIEUX: To what extent?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: But here again you come to a time of flux. For the reconstruction period, you have, in those statistics and in that information, the best and the only large fundamental basis of information which will be so valuable for reconstruction purposes. Everything is brought up to the commencement of the war when things became confused, and since when statistics are not of very great value so far as permanent and normal conditions are concerned.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When the time comes to take action on the recommendations of that commission and on the very valuable information contained in that report, the only difficulty that the minister will have to contend with will be the traditional quarrel between the English free-trader and the new protectionist school in England. That is very apparent in the deliberations of the commission. However, my hon. friend probably gave the only reason why no action has been taken when he said that as long as the war lasts it is difficult to take any action at all. Still, I might tell him that some very active industrial interests are at present at work in order to promote the ideas which at the time of the deliberations of that commission were mooted in favour of inter-imperial protection. I see that an association recently started in Toronto, under the name of the Reconstruction Industrial Association, has issued a circular the names on which are the best evidence that it is a protective association, or, to put it more clearly, an association for the advancement of protectionist principles during the period following the war. This Association, of course, has been very active during the war because it is due to the activities of these same men that the tariff has been increased by seven and one-half per cent.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Come off.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am not going to deliver a budget speech, but we are discussing trade and my hon. friend is evading the issue as much as possible. I am going to state that the Laurier Government had appointed in 1910 or 1911 to take part in the deliberations of that commission a man of the very highest qualifications, Mr. P. C. Larkin of Toronto, one of the most brilliant business men in the Dominion. Was it because Mr. Larkin entertained free trade ideas that his name was removed as soon as this Government came into office? He was replaced, I think, by my hon. friend himself.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, by a good free trader.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I know my hon. friend started as a free trader in New Brunswick and became a protectionist later; in the same way, perhaps, that he started as a good Canadian and ended as a strong Imperialist. Is it not possible to have from the minister a clear enunciation of the policy of the Government, as to the conclusions of that commission's report?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend, unwittingly I am bound to believe, conveyed an impression which I should not like to see left permanently on the minds of the committee. That commission was appointed and did its work with the idea and under instructions that neither free trade nor protection should enter into its work, and that idea was absolutely carried out in all the investigations and work of that commission. There were men on it who held different views with regard to tariffs and trade, but they never obtruded their opinions in the work of the commission, nor were other people allowed to discuss the merits of these subjects when any investigations were being carried on and the information was being gathered; and I think any hon. gentleman who peruses that report will find abundant evidence to support my statement. I am not going to take up the time of the House in any disquisitions upon past or future trade policies. We shall come to that by-and-by. I know that some of our friends opposite are burning hot for such a discussion, but let them bottle up their enthusiasm and come back perhaps a year after the war is over, when we will interchange views with regard to the matter.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend has perhaps read what the chief organ of the Government in the city of Toronto, the Toronto Globe, published on Saturday with regard to that association.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend having supreme control of one organ of the Opposition, is running away with the idea that other sensible men have organs. The Government has no organ; each member of the Government is his own organ, and all the members of the Government together is the Government organ, and if my hon. friend will pay due attention to that organ and not fritter away his time on what he considers to be Government organs, he will get along better.

West India cable, $38,933.33.

Mr. BUREAU: Is this a subsidy?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is a subsidy payment under the agreement entered into by Great Britain, Canada and the West Indian Islands, each paying one-third, with the object of cheapening and improving telegraphic communication with the Islands.

To provide for the development and extension of Canadian trade $150,000

Mr. BUREAU: May I ask what is the difference between the extension of commercial relations, for which we have just voted $160,000, and the extension of Canadian trade, for which we are now asked to vote $150,000?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The first vote has to do entirely with the maintenance and operation of the trade commissions. Although there is an item in that vote for commercial treaties, it has never amounted to very much in the way of expense up to the present time. The service of the trade commissioners is what is sustained by that vote. The latter vote, for the extension and development of Canadian trade by other means than the sustentation of the service of the trade commissions has been taken for two or three years. There was expended under this vote in 1916-17, $46,685; and in 1917-18, up to February 28th of this year, $40,431.95.

The committee will see that the vote is much greater than the amount expended in preceding years. I desire to keep the vote there, because of the agencies which at present can be used along the line of expansion of trade and commerce, and particularly as we do not know at what moment the war will end and peace will come, I want to have a sufficient vote to give the department the money necessary to enter vigorously into such methods and means as may be considered best to extend our trade when once normal conditions begin to come back.

I want to give the committee an idea of how the money was spent last year. I have inaugurated what I consider is a very important adjunct towards the development of Canadian trade, and that is the advertising of Canada through film work. A little while ago I issued an invitation to the members of Parliament to view an exhibition of films to give an idea of the kind of work in this line which is being done by the department. Those who were fortunate enough to see that exhibition will bear testimony to its excellence. The idea is to utilize these films for the purpose of advertising Canada. Whether the war is on or not that advertising work goes on. The film business was never more extensive than at the present time. The idea is to have films prepared of the processes of production and of scenery, which is a very large adjunct to the development of this country, and such productive facilities as lend themselves best to presentation on films and which catch most definitely and grip most effectively the attention of the man who is looking at the film. Last year we spent on films about $18,000. These deal with the following subjects and I am going to ask the committee to follow what I have to say in this particular. We have secured first-class films of the water-powers of Canada; of the water-powers tributary to Vancouver, two reels, the screening time of which is thirty minutes; those tributary to Calgary, one reel, screening time fifteen minutes; those tributary to Winnipeg, two reels, screening time thirty minutes; those tributary to Montreal, two reels, screening time thirty minutes; the hydro-electric system in Ontario, three reels, screening time forty-five minutes, and reels which present on the screen the harvesting, inspection, transportation and embarkation of grain in Canada. It carries you from the fields in the Northwest to the port of embarkation, showing the operations on the farm, in transit, through the elevators, into the steamships, across the lakes, into port, and unloading at the port. These are very realistic reels, and they represent one of the greatest industries in Canada, bringing before the eye a realistic picture and making an indelible impression as to the greatness and richness of the grain producing area of Canada. As to the water-powers, these are the great source of our future activity in Canada. Coal may be exhausted; our water-powers will not exhaust. You burn a ton of coal and it is gone. You use a volume of water for the production of water-power and your volume continues; there is no diminution of it. All these resources are shown. As a matter of fact one of these films has been in England this year. Dr. McLennan, who is engaged under the British Government in the production of nitrates in the Old Country at the present time, has had one of these films, and he has shown it to the most representative audiences in Great Britain, accompanied by a lecture of explanation. The object of it is to impress upon capitalists a realization of the magnitude of the water-power facilities and resources of Canada. It is an inducement to capital to come to this country, and is an exhibition of the splendid facilities and water-powers that Canada possesses.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister is enumerating the water-powers of Canada and speaking of the advantage of advertising these water-powers. I absolutely agree as to the wisdom of advertising them, but in the enumeration of those water-powers which are being shown he started with the West, came east, and then reverted to the hydro-electric system. What Montreal adjuncts did you refer to?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The powers tributary to Montreal.

Mr. BUREAU: What are they?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Those big powers that you have on the St. Lawrence.

Mr. BUREAU: Those alone?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, we grouped them by cities, taking those tributary to Vancouver, Calgary, Winnipeg and Montreal.

Mr. BUREAU: If you desire to show the best water-powers in Canada, they are not shown.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The best water-powers are shown. We have made a selection of the best in Canada.

Mr. BUREAU: Where is the St. Maurice river?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We cannot show them all.

Mr. BUREAU: That is the best in Canada.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We have shown Shawinigan.

Mr. BUREAU: Then you have the St. Maurice.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Then again, with a view to making the films interesting, we have introduced other features, and have prepared films for distribution throughout most of the countries in the world.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the name of the professor?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Dr. McLennan. He is a member of the Advisory Board of Scientific Research, has been lent to the British Government this year and is engaged over there with assistants from Toronto in a very important investigation.

Then we have arranged for what you might call the lighter, but still important, points in the representation of Canada. We have twenty-six copies of the "Banff National Park"; twenty-six copies of "The Great Natural Industries of Canada"; twenty-six of the Lake Louise region; twenty-six of the "Water-Powers of Western Canada," and I have given those already; twenty-six of "Through Canada from Coast to Coast" which affords the onlooker an idea of the journey from the Pacific to the Atlantic coast, showing the scenery, the big cities, the method of travel and so on. Others are "How Canada and the Farmers co-operate in the Great West" and "The Agricultural Opportunities of Western Canada." We have also been able to purchase of Mr. Byron Harmon, of Banff, six thousand feet of negatives. It is a fine negative of the finest bit of scenery that there is in Canada, and I think in the world, and we have bought it outright. Now what are we doing with those? We are circulating them through the theatres and film establishments of Canada, the United States, New Zealand, Australia, Great Britain, China and Japan to a certain extent, and there are some other countries where they would have been exhibited had it not been for operations being interfered with by the war. I want to read the first report that we have received with reference to those exhibitions. We have made a contract for the showing of them with a company, which company exhibits them through all the countries which I have mentioned.

The reports from our branch offices are beginning to come in week by week, showing the number of theatres in which your series appeared. We are very much pleased at the reception these films are getting by the theatre owners and bookings are very favourable. I am sure you will be pleased with them. The first nine weeks that Lake Louise was in service it appeared in 315 theatres. The first eight weeks that Banff was in service it appeared in 241 theatres. The first seven weeks that Natural Industries was in service it appeared in 227 theatres. The first six weeks that Western Water-Powers was in service it appeared in 199 theatres. The first five weeks that Coast to Coast was in service it appeared in 173 theatres. The first four weeks that Grain Raising was in service it appeared in 146 theatres. The first three weeks that Agriculture was in service it appeared in 94 theatres. The first two weeks that Eastern Water-Powers was in service it appeared in 60 theatres. When these are averaged up for the number of weeks that they have been in service, the averages will vary from thirty theatres to thirty-six and a half theatres per subject per week. This is not including the Dominion of Canada. We have not as yet received any reports from our Dominion offices. Of course it is entirely too early for reports from our England office and for the Australian reports considerable additional time is required. At the lowest possible estimate the first picture, Lake Louise, which has been in service for nine weeks, has been seen by 572,400 people. I think that three-quarters of a million would be more nearly correct but I would rather be a little more conservative.

There is every indication that these reports will continue favourable in the future. As soon as we get additional reports in any volume I will forward them to you.

I thought it well that the committee should know what is being done at a time when the war keeps us from doing almost anything else. The people crowd to these places, they look and they see, and they hear lectures delivered, of either longer or shorter duration, and they get an impression in a wonderfully vivid and comprehensive way, and at a minimum cost, which remains with them, and will, I think, inure to the very great advantage of the Dominion in the future.

Mr. DECHENE: Is it the intention to have any films taken of water-powers that are unharnessed?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We already have in our pictures unharnessed waters.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: How many years will be necessary to take observations of water-powers in order to give a reliable estimate of the horse-power available? For example, there may be a dry season when the observations are taken, and the following year the season may be such that the report would be altogether different.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That point is easily met. The waters are always there, and in your picture you have those waters —you cannot get away from that. There may be a little less water at one time than another, but the great volume of power is there. Then there is the legend which accompanies the film, and on that appears the statement in large letters of the extent of the water-power—the quantity which is being used, the development which is possible, and with regard to any unharnessed water-powers, the estimate, so far as one can possibly be made, of what those powers are capable of producing when harnessed. The difficulty that my hon. friend sees does not therefore exist.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: My question had reference to the unharnessed water--powers. I do not think it would be safe to base your calculations on the volume of water one year, because the following year the season might be different in character, and in consequence the volume of water very much less.

Bureau of Industrial and Scientific Research: —Salaries and Expenses, including printing and stationery, and the collection and distribution of information and for studentships, fellowships, special problems and forestry studies, $120,000.

Mr. McMASTER: I suppose the item has no reference to the hon. member for Three Rivers, who is a "Bureau" of industrial and scientific research every day?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That Bureau is unique.

Mr. BUREAU: The only thing on record in the House is that the member for Three Rivers was not a bureau of information, and that is on the authority of the late member for Dauphin, Mr. Glen Campbell.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If we had that "Bureau" in the Estimates I should think we would have to pay about $500,000.

Mr. BUREAU: Let the item be carried. I cannot do anything less after that. I was going to ask if the sum of $28,000 increase is in connection with sending young men on exploration for study every year? If so it is for a good purpose.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is for that purpose.

Mr. McMASTER: I would like to know what these scholarships and fellowships are.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: A report was laid on the table of the House the other day which contains a full exposition of all that has been done. That report deals with the fellowships and the work of the students.

Department of Immigration and Colonization: —Civil Government salaries, $123,117.50—Contingencies, $25,000.

The CHAIRMAN: When these Estimates were first brought before the Committee, it was found that they were incorrect as printed on page 18, and an amended page was printed and distributed to members through the Post Office. If any hon. gentleman has not this page, there are some typewritten sheets here for the convenience of members.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the minister explain the increase?

Mr. CALDER: There is an increase of $13,175—

Mr. McMASTER: I am sorry to have to tell the minister that we are unable to hear a single word he said.

Mr. CALDER: I was stating that there is an increase in the vote of $13,175. That increase is made up by an increase in the staff of two, the deputy minister and the minister's private secretary. These are the only increases in the staff. As was explained to the House previously, the officers in this department came over entirely from the Interior Department. These two extra officers receive a salary of $8,100. In addition to that, there are statutory increases of $4,625, and some small items amounting to about $400, which make up the total increase of $13,175.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Who is the deputy minister of the department?

Mr. CALDER: At the present time, Mr. Cory is acting as deputy minister.

Mr. LEMIEUX: A good man.

Mr. CALDER: He is the Deputy Minister of the Department of the Interior. When the Immigration Department undertakes the new work, which I hope it will some time in the not far distant future, I think it will be necessary then to have another deputy in charge. But until we work out the new policies that are to be brought into operation, I felt that it was just as well to let the department continue very much as it has in the past.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I suppose he is not drawing two salaries?

Mr. CALDER: No.

Salaries of Agents and Employees in Canada, Great Britain and Foreign Countries, $550,000.

Mr. EULER: I would like to ask the minister whether this vote includes the salary of immigration officials in the United States, for example, in the city of Philadelphia. I think there is a branch of the immigration service there. I would like to know what is the nature of the duties of such branches. For example, in Philadelphia, what does the man do in that particular branch?

Mr. CALDER: All of our agents, I understand, in the United States carry out very much the same work. We have agents located at something like eighteen points in the United States. The offices are established for the purpose of disseminating information with respect to the possibilities of Canada as a field of emigration. In addition to that, there are at all of our agencies a great many inquiries made with respect to many matters relating to Canada, and our officials are there for the purpose of furnishing persons seeking information with any information which it is possible for them to give. These offices are only established for the purpose of disseminating information regarding Canada.

Mr. EULER: It occurred to me that possibly at this time, when there is very little immigration, some of these offices might be discontinued. I am free to admit that it is quite possible that they may be doing effective work. But I would like to draw to the attention of the minister one instance at least, of an immigration officer who is, I think, rather exceeding his duties, that is the case of the officer at Philadelphia about whom I had a question on the order paper this morning, a man who took a most active and offensive part in the conduct of the elections, writing partisan articles in a paper of which he was formerly the editor. It seems to me that it would be the duty of the department to curb actions of that kind on the part of any official of the Government. I refer to Mr. Jaffray of Philadelphia.

Mr. CALDER: I may say, Mr. Chairman, that I thoroughly agree with what the hon. member has said. It is only recently that that matter was brought to my attention. I think it is very unfortunate that any officer in the position which Mr. Jaffray occupies should undertake to write articles to the press of the nature complained of in this House, and I certainly disapprove of any such conduct on the part of any official of the department. I have the matter under consideration and am endeavouring to get the exact facts.

With reference to the general statement that there is no work being done in the United States at the present time in the way of securing immigrants for Canada, I can assure the hon. gentleman that that is not correct. As a matter of fact, someting like 75,000 people came to Canada from the United States last year, and that is a very large number. And there is a possibility from the outlook at the present time that we will have even a larger immigration from the United States this year. As a matter of fact, our agencies are quite busy and doing good work there. Our work in the Old Country and in Europe has, of course, practically ceased. I might also say that, as regards our work in the United States, it is my intention during the year to have all of our agencies thoroughly inspected with a view to seeing what economies can be effected. I feel we can effect a good many economies in that direction, just as we will be able to do in Canada itself. We have a very large staff. A good many duties have been added to the immigration staff in Canada during the course of the last two years. Nevertheless I feel that if the matter is carefully inquired into we can utilize the staff as a whole on a much more efficient basis, and effect a good many economies. In so far as our agencies in the United States are concerned they will all be very carefully reviewed during the present season.

Mr. McMASTER: May I ask the minister whether any statistics are kept in his department which would enable him to advise the committee as to the number of immigrants which originate in the territory served by the different offices, and the cost of operating the offices from which the immigrants in question originate? If such statistics could be kept it would be of great assistance to the House in deciding whether these very considerable sums of money are really justified. Take the case of this Philadelphian agent, who writes offensive partisan articles for a paper in western Ontario; it would be interesting to know what his salary was and how many Philadelphians through his eloquence and persuasive powers were induced to come to Canada. And that principle, if followed in all the offices, would enable the minister to advise the House, and enable the House to judge, as to whether the country was really getting value for this money.

Mr. CALDER: I hardly think that these offices as at present constituted would be able to furnish that information. However, I shall take my hon. friend's suggestion into consideration.

Mr. McMASTER: We should have some check on these immigrants with a view to finding out where they come from. For instance, if we spent $10,000 on an agency in Pennsylvania and for three or four years no immigrants come to Canada from that state, the office in that state would not be worth the amount expended.

Mr. EULER: The suggestion that offices of that kind might be dispensed with arose from the fact that the gentleman spoken of, an official of the department, apparently does not devote all his time to promoting immigration and colonization for Canada. I am glad to know that the minister intends to look into this matter.

Mr. MURPHY: When was Mr. Jaffray appointed in Philadelphia?

Mr. CALDER: Within the last two or three years, I think.

Contingencies in Canadian, British and foreign agencies, and general immigration expenses, $550,000.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: How much of that is spent in Europe?

Mr. CALDER: I have not that information before me, but if the hon. gentleman is anxious to have it I will bring it down.

Mr. SINCLAIR: In a general way, what are these contingencies?

Mr. CALDER: The large items include: advertising, $240,000; printing, $45,000; expenses of our agencies in the United States, $100,000; expenses of our agencies in Great Britain, $50,000; location of settlers, $25,000; boundary expenses, $35,000; deportation expenses, $10,000, a total of $505,000. The balance is made up by a great variety of small items.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is this advertising in Canadian newspapers?

Mr. CALDER: In the papers of United States, Great Britain and, to some extent, Canada.

Mr. SINCLAIR: We are getting no immigrants from Europe; why should we spend so much money on advertising in Great Britain?

Mr. CALDER: Only a small amount of advertising is done there at present. Two or three years ago the expenditure on immigration work was about $1,900,000. A reduction of $800,000 was effected and this year we are cutting the expenditure down by a further $100,000. If we wish to undertake immigration work in Great Britain after the war it is necessary that we maintain our organization there, and that a limited amount of advertising be done in order to keep Canada's possibilities before the people of that country. During the present year I hope to be able to go to England with a view to finding out what the actual conditions are. I am advised New Zealand, Australia and the other dominions are carrying on a very active propaganda, and we may have to spend more money if we wish to secure the results after the war that every person in the country is looking for.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What staffs have you in Great Britain and in foreign countries?

Mr. CALDER: We have twelve offices in the British Islands. The total staff numbers about sixty, thirty-five of whom are in London. Most of these offices were opened many years ago. The staffs of all the offices have been cut down to a minimum. Our offices in United Kingdom—this applies particularly to the office in London—have been exceedingly busy during the last two years.

One can understand that, with the large number of Canadians overseas, there are a great many who frequent those offices The officers have charge of all the booking arrangements for those, apart from soldiers, who are coming to Canada, and at times they have been exceedingly busy and have had to add to their staffs in order to cope with the work which they are undertaking. As an illustration, I might mention a case that occurred not long ago. The British Admiralty sent word to the commissioner that they had a boat available for two or three thousand Canadians who might be anxious to return to Canada. Word had to be sent to all those people by wire. A very few hours after he had notified them the boat was cancelled, and he had to notify all those people that they could not get away. Later on another wire was received saying that another boat was ready, and that boat was also cancelled. That sort of thing is going on all the time, and as a result all our officers are kept exceedingly busy during these trying times.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Might I ask the minister if, in addition to endeavouring to secure immigration from the British Isles, the United States and some other countries, he will endeavour to bring Belgians to Canada? Only yesterday I received, from a gentleman at present in France, a letter stating that many of the Belgian refugees in France contemplated taking up land in Canada if land were available. I need not tell my hon. friend that the Belgian is a very desirable settler, not only for the prairies but as a market gardener. Wherever you find a Belgian around a city, you will find a splendid garden and a hard-working man, intelligently cultivating the land and supplying the market with garden produce. We have an opportunity of inducing many of those refugees, both in France and in England, to come to Canada, and I would advise the minister to look after that Belgian immigration. We know that Belgium is small in area and can hardly maintain the large population which it had before the war, and with all the patriotism that honours the Belgians, it is to be expected that thousands of them will prefer to come to the United States or to Canada to returning to their own country. I would advise my hon. friend to appoint a special agent to interview those people in England and France in order to capture our share of that most desirable class of immigration.

Mr. CALDER: The matter to which my hon. friend alludes will receive attention.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Administration of Chinese Immigration—salaries, $24,000, contingencies, $5,000.

Mr. BUREAU: I should like to know where the men are located for whom we are voting $24,000, and what their duties are.

[Mr. Calder.]

Mr. CALDER: The officials are located at Victoria, Vancouver, Union Bay, Powell River, and Chemainus, in British Columbia, and at Montreal in the province of Quebec. The total number of officials employed is twenty, and their duties are in connection with Chinese immigrants entering or attempting to enter Canada. It is their duty to see that the regulations and restrictions on Chinese immigration are complied with. There are seven officials in Victoria and eleven in Vancouver, including clerks and stenographers.

Mr. BUREAU: After what happened last year does the minister expect there will be a greater Chinese immigration this year than last? Is a patrol maintained on the border to prevent the smuggling into Canada of Chinese, and what officials are guarding against this smuggling? I understand there is an organization of detectives or other employees engaged in this work.

Mr. CALDER: We have about 200 or 250 inspectors along the boundary, and it is their duty to prevent any person, whether Chinese or not, entering Canada who is not entitled to come in under the law. Speaking offhand, I think last year there were about 16,000 rejections of intending immigrants to Canada, who were not permitted to come in under the law. I would imagine that all our boundary inspectors have been instructed to see that no Chinese come in who are not entitled to do so.

Mr. McKENZIE: I was told by an official of the department that after a certain date Chinamen were not allowed to enter this country. Are they still coming in?

Mr. CALDER: Yes. Some five hundred or so came in last year.

Mr. ROBB: Referring to the item of general immigration expenses, is it still the policy of the department to distribute among the schools of foreign countries, more particularly of Great Britain, the atlas that has been sent out a number of years showing the size and resources of the different provinces of Canada? I am told it was a very useful method of advertising our country.

Mr. CALDER: The policy is still being carried out in Great Britain, and to a lesser extent in the United States. After the war broke out we cut down our expenses in Great Britain, and as a result the distribution has not been as large as in former years. I intend during the present year to review carefully the whole question of the preparation and distribution of literature not only in Great Britain but in the United States as well. We have spent large sums of money in that direction, and I think every effort should be made to get as much value as we can from this class of expenditure.

Supplementary estimates 1917-18—Department of Immigration and Colonization—to provide for the salary of the Private Secretary from October 12, 1917, at the rate of $2,500 per annum, $1,176.06.

Mr. BUREAU: Will this private secretary be appointed under the new Civil Service Act? Under the old Act one who was already in the Civil Service could act as private secretary to the minister and be paid an additional salary not exceeding the sum of $600 per year. I see this man is to get $2,500. Will he follow the fate of the minister or be kept in the service when the minister goes out?

Mr. CALDER: His salary is included in the main estimates. He is in subdivision B of the first division.

Mr. BUREAU: Item No. 326 in the Supplementary Estimates is to provide for the private secretary at $2,500?

Mr. CALDER: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: The secretary for whom we are voting this salary now has no other official position in the department? This is to provide for the secretary of the minister?

Mr. CALDER: Yes.

Civil Government—Privy Council Office—salaries, $44,900, contingencies, $10,000.

Mr. BUREAU: I see.

1st division, sub-division A: Assistant clerk of Privy Council at $4,000.

Who is the Assistant Clerk of the Privy Council and when was he appointed?

Mr. ROWELL: Mr. Bennetts, who has been in the Privy Council office for over thirty years, and is one of the oldest officials in the office.

Mr. BUREAU: When was he appointed?

Mr. ROWELL: I do not know, but he was appointed long before I became President of the Privy Council.

Mr. BUREAU: There is the assistant clerk at $4,000, and another at $3,925. To whom does the latter item refer?

Mr. ROWELL: That refers to one of the clerks in the department, Mr. Mackenzie, who has been there for a great many years.

Mr. BUREAU: Then I see:

2nd division, sub-division A: one at $2,100; one at $1,850; one at $1.625.

I would like to know who these clerks are. Are they old clerks who are being increased, or are they new appointments? Take, for instance, four at $2,600 in the First Division subdivision B.

Mr. ROWELL: These four are old clerks in the department, and it is proposed to advance one, Mr. Belanger, a translator, from 2A to 1B.

Mr. BUREAU: Is that translator at $2,100?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: And the other clerks are at $2,600?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: What is the particular work that the gentlemen at $2,600 have to do that makes their salary larger than that of the translator, who is a technical man and requires special and greater knowledge than an ordinary clerk, in that he must know two languages to be able to be a translator?

Mr. ROWELL: The only reason I can give is that these clerks have been there a great many years, and have been advanced by the usual statutory increases until their salaries have reached this figure. The translator has been in 2A and because of the large amount of work he is called upon to do and the excellence of his work, I am advancing him from 2A to 1B. In the second division, subdivision 2, there is one clerk on the list at $1,150. That is an error. There are just four altogether and the details should only be given as to four.

Mr. BUREAU: Taking the second division, subdivision B, I find two at $1,300, one at $1,225, one at $1,175, one at $1,150, one at $1,100. Are there any new appointments among these?

Mr. ROWELL: There are no new appointments except one of the messengers. When we come to the Supplementary Estimates there will be another item in the first division of subdivision B, to provide for the salary of my private secretary, which was omitted by mistake in the Main Estimates.

Mr. BUREAU: What is the salary?

Mr. ROWELL: It is $2,800.

Mr. COPP: I would like to understand what is proposed in regard to that. I see in the Main Estimates, under Civil Government, an item:

Allowance for private secretary, $600.

I see a similar item in the estimates of all the other departments. Why is there a salary and an allowance provided? Why is it not all put under the heading of salary instead of having one vote under the head of salary and another under the head of allowance?

Mr. ROWELL: That appears to have been the custom for many years in all the departments of the Government, and it has been done here the same as in other departments.

Mr. COPP: We have a new man now at the head of this department, and we might very well change the old order of things and not continue to put in two items, one for salary and one for allowance. Why do you not put the item in at $3,400, so that we will know what the private secretary is really getting? When you find one item here for one amount and another item some place else for another amount it looks as if you were trying to smuggle it through. Why not put it all in one sum, so that everybody will understand what the private secretaries of the ministers are getting?

Mr. McMASTER: I would say that this is an excellent time to change the order which has hitherto obtained. I see that the minister bows his head; but as he was for some time associated with the reform party in Ontario I imagine he might make this reform in his department with propriety.

Mr. ROWELL: I will take it into consideration between now and next session.

Mr. BUREAU: I suppose I may be allowed without being called to order, to refer to the provision made in the estimates for the minister's private secretary. In the supplementary estimates for the year ending March 31, 1919, a sum of $361 appears and in the main estimates there is another sum for this gentleman. Now I ask the minister if his private secretary is a new appointment?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes, a new appointment.

Mr. BUREAU: What position has he in the Privy Council Department?

Mr. ROWELL: He is my private secretary.

Mr. BUREAU: In the law that we have just passed we have laid it down that a private secretary shall occupy that position only. But the minister is establishing a new rule according to the statement that he makes. This gentleman not only acts as private secretary but holds another official position in the department.

Mr. ROWELL: He is not performing any other duties. He is a clerk in the department; the same as any other officer, and draws the salary fixed in the Estimates the same as the private secretaries of all the other ministers.

Mr E. LAPOINTE: Then he does not come under the new rule laid down in the Bill which has just been passed?

Mr. ROWELL: He comes under the law as it stood at the time of his appointment.

Mr. BUREAU: May I ask what particular duties he is performing under the law as it stands now, because after all the Civil Service Bill has not yet been assented to and has not yet the force of law. He must be holding some position beyond that of private secretary, because he is described as a clerk in the first division subdivision B. Such being the case, may I ask, what work does he perform?

Mr. ROWELL: He performs work as my private secretary.

Mr. BUREAU: The practice hitherto has been that when a private secretary has been taken on he received an official position in the department. When the minister for whom he acted went out the private secretary reverted to that position and dropped the secretarial salary of $600 allowed to him. In this case I see that the private secretary is also a clerk in the First Division, Subdivision B although there is no work for him in the department. He was apparently appointed as private secretary to the minister and has nothing else to do; his services were not required until the minister entered the Cabinet and then only as private secretary. There is also a vote in the Estimates of $600 which brings this gentleman's salary up to $3,400. I cannot understand how that can be. If we were under the new regime as far as the appointment of private secretary is concerned I would say well and good, but the fact of putting an additional man in a certain grade, who is only required to act as private secretary to the minister, with the privilege of occupying the same clerkship after the minister retires or ceases to enjoy a seat in the Cabinet, when no need exists for such clerkship is not right and ought not to be entertained. I can quite understand under the old law appointing a man when a vacancy occurred to which he could revert when the minister withdrew from the Cabinet, but I cannot understand creating a position for one for whose services there is no need except as private secretary.

Mr. ROWELL: Let me say to my hon. friend that my private secretary takes the place of the Prime Minister's secretary who was in the Privy Council previously but who now goes to another department.

Mr. BUREAU: Where does he go?

Mr. ROWELL: The Prime Minister's secretary goes to the Department of State for External Affairs.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I understand the private secretary was appointed by Order in Council?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: The minister says that this gentleman is to act as private secretary. I suppose we may assume that his duties are in connection with the business of the department?

Mr. ROWELL: Quite so.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: He is paid a salary to act as private secretary to the minister but in connection with that hon. gentleman's public business?

Mr. ROWELL: Wholly in connection with his public business.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: So it would not be part of the gentleman's work to write political literature for the Toronto Globe and other newspapers, as rumour has it he does.

Mr. ROWELL: That is no part of his duties.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: And he is not paid a salary for that purpose?

Mr. ROWELL: Nothing whatever.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I must admit that I have read very well-written articles in the Globe under the signature of "Donald Hunt" and I was told that Donald Hunt was in reality the private secretary of my hon. friend. I do not know whether the report is true, perhaps the hon. gentleman can tell us as to that. I may add that the articles are very eulogistic of the hon. minister; he would blush if I were to read them to the committee to-night.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. BUREAU: No, we want an explanation from the minister. A question has been asked whether the private secretary to the minister is the man who writes under the pseudonym of "Donald Hunt."

Mr. ROWELL: I cannot furnish any information as to what my private secretary does out of office hours. He is responsible to me for the work he does in office hours. They are very lengthy hours and he serves very faithfully during that time. I make no inquiry as to his work outside of those hours.

Mr. BUREAU: That is a very nice way of shifting the question and I have been told that the hon. gentleman was rather shifty when he was cornered. The question is a very plain one: is "Donald Hunt" the man who is now secretary to the President of the Privy Council? That is a direct question, but I must put the question directly because I see the witness does not want to answer very readily. The committee will pardon me if the question is rather suggestive in its form.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. BUREAU: No it is not carried.

Mr. ROWELL: I can answer my hon. friend that I am not considering, nor is my department, who are the correspondents of papers throughout the country, or who the writers for those papers are and the names under which they write, I do not think it is pertinent to the particular matter under consideration.

Mr. BUREAU: I think the question is pertinent and that the hon. minister is not answering it. I think we are entitled to more courtesy than the minister has vouchsafed. The question is plain and direct enough and we ought to know, when we are paying the minister's private secretary $3,400 whether he is the man who writes in the Globe or any other newspaper. The minister can answer: "I do not know whether he is the same man or not." I do not ask the hon. gentleman if he is concerned in the matter, but I ask him if his private secretary is the same man. If so, I think we have something to say about it no matter whether this gentleman writes outside of his office hours or during his office hours. I think if there is solidarity amongst the members of the Government, there is also solidarity between the minister and his private secretary. The private secretary is so close to the minister that he knows exactly what is going on. The private secretary is inspired by the minister and anything that goes out to the press, when it is known that it is written by the secretary of the minister must have its weight and effect. When we ask the hon. President of the Privy Council whether "Donald Hunt" is the name under which his private secretary writes, I think it is not treating the committee as he ought to treat it for him to reply that he is not concerned in what the gentleman does outside of his office hours. The private secretary may do this work during his office hours and the hon. gentleman may not know it. He may be doing this writing while the hon. gentleman is sitting here performing his parliamentary duties, and I would not blame him for not knowing it. But if the private secretary and "Donald Hunt" are one and the same person we may have suggestions to make, so that the public will be satisfied that what goes out from "Donald Hunt" is the inspiration of a gentleman called in private life "Mr. Rowell" and who is called in this House "President of the Privy Council." We are voting money to this private secretary, and if that gentleman has a double mandate or a double position in the Government we want to know it. If he is writing articles in newspapers favouring a party or a man we are entitled to know it. And we want to know also whether or not he writes during office hours, and if it is during office hours the point is debatable whether or not he who gets the benefit of it, or the party that gets the benefit of it, should not bear part of the burden and unburden the country with so much of it as should be paid by the parties in whose special service this man employs so many hours a day. Either the minister knows or does not know, and we are entitled to an answer, yes or no.

Mr. ROWELL: Let me say first in reply to my hon. friend that I have never, directly or indirectly, inspired any article that has appeared under the name of "Donald Hunt" or any other, with reference to the work of my department or any branch of work. I have not the least objection, if the Chairman thinks that the matter is relevant to the item under consideration, to answer my hon. friend's question. I can say this: so far as my secretary is concerned, never to my knowledge has he written any articles during office hours, and I know he keeps very long office hours, often until midnight, in connection with the work of my department, the public work of the Government.

Mr. BUREAU: It is the right of any member of this House to ask questions of a minister putting through his Estimates. And as to the relevancy, when you ask us to vote $600 for a private secretary we are entitled to know, when we have any suspicion about the matter, the nature of the work that private secretary is doing. Whether or not the minister has inspired articles I do not care. Whether or not he knows about the articles being written, is not the question now. It may come later. We have asked the minister if the man who wrote in the Toronto Globe under the name of "Donald Hunt" was his secretary or not. The answer is very plain, because the question is very direct. The answer may be "yes" or "no," or "I ignore." Any of those three terms will give us satisfaction. And if the minister does not see fit to give the answer, we shall try to find some way to get it.

Mr. ROWELL: If the Chairman thinks it is a proper question, I shall be very glad to answer it.

Mr. BUREAU: What is that?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. minister has asked for my ruling. It is this: In voting a salary to a Government official, any member of the House certainly has a right to ascertain what are the duties performed by that Government official. On the other hand, I do think that every hon. member of the House should accept the answer given by the minister. I understood the minister to say that he did not know what the secretary did outside of office hours, but that he had not written these articles during office hours. That answer should be considered satisfactory.

Mr. BUREAU: Do you hold that when a member puts a question he is entitled to an answer?

The CHAIRMAN: He is entitled to such answer as any member of the Government may give.

Mr. BUREAU: Therefore, a member of the Opposition must stand here and be at the mercy or whim or caprice of the gentlemen who sit on the other side and have the administration in hand. Now, I have asked the President of the Council—I will change my question. I have asked him if he knows whether this man who writes under the name of "Donald Hunt" is the same man who is the private secretary to the hon. minister. I will ask him what is the real name of his private secretary.

Mr. ROWELL: My private secretary's name is Mr. Main Johnson.

Mr. BUREAU: Main Johnson. Has Mr. Main Johnson written in the Globe, to the knowledge of the hon. gentleman?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. BUREAU: Why "Order"? I am putting a new question. The Chairman has ruled that I am entitled to an answer when I put a question. Does the hon. gentleman know that Mr. Main Johnson writes in the Globe under the name of "Donald Hunt"? If he knows it, or if he does not know it, why not say so?

Mr. ROWELL: I understood from the Chairman's ruling that my answer already covered the question.

Mr. BUREAU: This is a new question.

Mr. ROWELL: Then I should say that it is a question for the Chairman to rule whether or not it is pertinent to these matters. It is for the Chairman to say.

Mr. McMASTER: I think that the question proposed by the hon. member for Three Rivers is a proper question, and I would suggest this: Suppose the gentleman in question, instead of writing from time to time, was turning out a series of popular novels, would it not be pertinent for this House to inquire whether it was compatible with the duty of the private secretary of a cabinet minister to spend his time also in literary effort? I think that would be a proper question. The difference between the question asked by the hon. member for Three Rivers and the hypothetical question put by me is merely a question of degree. And I would humbly submit that we would like the President of the Council, if his secretary, Mr. Main Johnson, is also this Mr. Donald Hunt, to state so frankly, and then it will be for us, if we think that there is any public interest prejudicially affected by the literary activities of Mr. Donald Hunt or Mr. Johnson to ask any other question. But before we proceed along this line it does appear to me that we are entitled to have a frank answer from the minister as to whether this literary character, "Donald Hunt," is the same gentleman who is in private life his most amiable secretary, Mr. Main Johnson.

The CHAIRMAN: Does any other hon. gentleman wish to say anything on the point of order?

Some hon. MEMBERS: What is the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN: I have been asked whether the question just put by the hon. member for Trois Rivières (Mr. Bureau) is a proper question. I have heard the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). Is there any other hon. gentleman desiring to say anything on the point of order?

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I submit that it is none of the hon. minister's business what his private secretary does when he is not employed by the Government. He has the same right to employ his leisure time in the way he chooses, as the private secretary of either the member for Brome or the member for Three Rivers would have. Because the private secretary of the President of the Council is employed by the Government is no reason why he is to become a serf, and must spend his leisure time in the way some member may dictate.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. member for East Algoma has just said that the secretary of the President of the Council is no more responsible to this House than the private secretary to the hon. member for Brome. That cannot be taken seriously, and it is not correct. A private servant is not in any way whatsoever responsible to this House, and that would be the position of the private secretary of the hon. member for Brome. The private secretary of the President of the Council is not only the servant of that minister, but he is the servant of this House and of the Canadian people. The Canadian people are paying him. The minister himself is a public servant, and those who wait upon him in connection with the duties of his office are public servants. It is the right of every man in Canada who helps to pay the salary of a public servant to know everything about him, what he does, what he publishes. If he publishes something that we consider to be prejudicial to the interests of Canada, we have a right to know about it and to bring him to account for it. The head of any department should not stand as a shield between any officer of the department and the public. The President of the Council must answer all questions put to him with regard to his own office; he must also answer on behalf of any public servants in his employ. In a word, we have a right to know everything about the services of any man who is in the service of the country.

Mr. SHEARD: It appears to me that the situation is this: the gentleman in question is employed as secretary to the President of the Council, to do certain work at certain hours and to the satisfaction of the minister. For that he is paid a salary out of the public funds and for that he is accountable to the President of the Council as a minister of the Crown, and to this House. We are at liberty to question his actions in his office as much as we desire, but we do not own him body and soul. Gentlemen opposite are trying to make a little political capital by asserting that some officials in the public service occasionally contribute to the public press, and that this gentleman is one. I am not familiar with his articles or with the trend of his writing, but I say this: as a broad principle, if we are to have first-class men in the public service, we as members of Parliament must not act as Paul Prys in connection with the private lives of such gentlemen. We have to extend to them broad liberties. We have to permit them to express their opinions in the public press in a free and unbiased manner. Unless we can show that they have used facts with which they have become familiar in the discharge of their public service, we have no right whatever to raise a question as to what they do after office hours, what they write, for whom they write, how they write, or to what journals they contribute. I agree with the view expressed by the member for Algoma East (Mr. Nicholson) that it is simply not our business. It is not the business of this House to inquire into the private actions, even in connection with newspapers, of public servants. It is beneath the dignity of this House to make these investigations with the view, apparently, to attacking the President of the Council in respect of some newspaper clippings that hon. gentlemen have secured from the Toronto Globe or some other source. Let us get on with the business of the House and not waste time with the discussion of these trivialities.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I disagree with my hon. friend (Mr. Sheard). The party that he follows took a very different view only a few years ago regarding the duties of public officials. Some 25,000 men were dismissed in Canada for partisanship—turned out of office simply because they said two or three words in favour of the Liberal party.

Mr. SHEARD: Are the articles complained of partisan articles? Is this a case of partisanship? So far as I know, that has not been shown.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: My hon. friend said that it made no difference what a public official did after hours; that he could do as he pleased. That is a new doctrine on the other side of the House.

Mr. BUTTS: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN: The member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) has the floor and is entitled to retain it unless he himself gives the member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Butts) permission to interrupt him by putting a question.

Mr. BUTTS: Will the member for Antigonish allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Certainly.

Mr. BUTTS: These 25,000 officials were dismissed by Blomfield Douglas under the Laurier Government—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member must not take advantage of the rules by rising to ask a question and then making a statement.

Mr. BUTTS: I beg your pardon, Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I was pointing out to my hon. friend (Mr. Sheard) that the doctrine that he expounded has not been accepted by the party which he now supports. On the contrary, they accept a very different doctrine; that a public official must not take part in politics; that he must not be a partisan, and that if he breaks that rule he is subject to dismissal. If that applies to ordinary officials of the Government, why should it not apply to a private secretary? If a private secretary chooses to write political articles after hours and to take a partisan position concerning any political matter, it is open to members of the House to question his right to do so. Gentlemen on the other side must agree with this—or else the Government have entirely changed their views with regard to the matter. I repeat that that doctrine has been laid down by the Government; that it has been held by them; that some have suffered under it. Has this doctrine now been abolished? Has a public official now no responsibility except during office hours? If the President of the Council says that an official of the Government has the right, after office hours, to engage in any partisan activity that he wishes to engage in, of course that is a different matter; but that is not the view that has been held hitherto.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Years ago it was discovered that the managing editor of the Toronto Globe was receiving half his pay—

The CHAIRMAN: The discussion is now confined to the point of order.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I was going to draw a parallel between this case and that one. It was regarded as all right then for the—

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think that would be quite in order. The hon. member may discuss the question after the point of order has been decided. The President of the Council was asked by the member for Trois Rivières if his private secretary had written certain articles in the Toronto Globe under a certain "nom de plume." The hon. minister replied that no articles had been written during office hours. The question was repeated covering generally the entire time of the said private secretary, both during and after office hours. The President of the Council required a ruling concerning the propriety of the question. I invited hon. members on both sides for their opinions and advice upon the point of order, and they have given very much assistance to the Chair.

The hon. member (Mr. McKenzie) who is leading the Opposition, gave it as his opinion that it was the right of any member of this House to probe the conduct of any official both in office hours and outside of office hours if that official did or published anything prejudicial to the interests of Canada. I took down the words at the time. The hon. gentleman went on to say that in that event it would be perfectly competent for the House to know exactly where and when such articles were written. The question of political partisanship was also introduced in the point of order. My opinion is that the conduct of any employee of the Government, in so far as his conduct outside of office hours is concerned, cannot be inquired into by a member of this House, unless, to use the words of the hon. member for Cape Breton, that employee is alleged to have done or published something prejudicial to the public interest. If that be the case, it is competent for the House to get all the details. I, therefore, rule that if the articles complained of are prejudicial to the public interest, the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) is in order. If the articles are prejudicial to the public interest the hon. member for Three Rivers should read the articles, and then ask the minister if they were written by his private secretary. Otherwise, all remarks and questions concerning the conduct of a servant of the State must be restricted to his official conduct.

Mr. BUREAU: I bow, Sir, to your ruling, and I shall not take exception to it because I do not intend to appeal. But I have another question to ask the minister. Perhaps this will throw some light on the situation. I see on page 12 of the Estimates, under second division, subdivision B, a total amount of $3,125 for 1917-18, and for 1918-19, $6,100, or almost double. Will the minister please explain the reason for that?

Sir SAM HUGHES: You told me, Sir, I might ask my question after the point of order was settled. Might I ask this question? Your decision practically resolves itself into this, that the Parliament of Canada may pay part of the salary of writers for the Toronto Globe. A number of years ago it was proved before the people of Canada that the editor in chief of the Toronto Globe was receiving one-half of his salary from the Peace Society of the United States which was found afterwards to be supported from German sources, and the other half from the Toronto Globe. I do not know whether it is now the custom of the Toronto Globe to have part of the salaries of its writers paid by the Government, as were formerly paid by the pro-German United States peace societies, but whatever the facts are, we should know them.

Mr. ROWELL: The hon. member for Three Rivers asked about the item being $6,100 this year as compared with $3,125 last year. The difference is this. There were two clerks in the Third Division, Subdivision A, last year, and the hon. member will notice there are none this year. The change means that those two clerks have been transferred to the other division. The clerks transferred are Mr. Miller and Mr. Olivier, who have been in the department for a very long time, and it is proposed that they be transferred from the Third to the Second Division.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: On page 595 of the unrevised Hansard appears the following question which I put to the minister:

Is Mr. Main Johnson employed in the Privy Council office or in some other Government department?

The answer was:

Yes. In the Privy Council as Private Secretary to the President of the Privy Council.

My second question was:

If so, was he appointed by the Civil Service Commission after competitive examination?

The answer was:

Is a graduate of University of Toronto and his appointment was made in accordance with the Civil Service Act.

There was laid on the table of the House to-day a copy of an Order in Council reading thus:

21st December, 1917.

The Board recommend that under the provisions of the War Measures Act, 1914, Mr. Main Johnson be employed as a temporary clerk in the Privy Council Office as Private Secretary to the Hon. the President of the Privy Council for a period of one year from the 12th of October, 1917, with salary at the rate of $2,800 per annum, chargeable to the War Appropriation.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: God save the King.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: There was another Order in Council:

The Board recommend that Mr. Main Johnson, private secretary to the Honourable the President of the Privy Council be, from the 12th of October, 1917, paid an additional allowance of $600 per annum for his services as such private secretary.

I would like to be enlightened on the subject, as the statement of the President of the Privy Council appears contradictory to the Order in Council which I have just read.

Mr. ROWELL: The Order in Council which my hon. friend has just read is the order under which Mr. Johnson was appointed as my private secretary, but the Civil Service Act to which my hon. friend has referred makes provision for such appointment. My hon. friend will 9 p.m. have in the answer to his question the reference to the section in the Civil Service Act. The form of the order is prepared by the Clerk of the Privy Council (Mr. Boudreau), who has charge of such matters, and it has been put through in the form he suggested.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Will my hon. friend explain by what process of logic or reasoning he can join together the War Measures Act and the appointment of his private secretary?

Mr. ROWELL: I suppose the same reasoning as applies to the private secretaries of the other new members of the Union Government would apply to mine. The formation of the Union Government was a war measure, and in the necessary provision for the organization of the Union Government, and for the appointment of the secretaries it was proper to use the powers given by the War Measures Act.

[Mr. Archambault.]

Mr. McMASTER: I understood your ruling, Sir, to be that if it were shown that the articles written by "Donald Hunt," who, I presume, is admitted to be the same gentleman as Mr. Main Johnson, were prejudicial to the public interest, they would be a proper subject of inquiry by this committee. A similar matter has already come up in the British House of Commons. A member of that House, Mr. J. W. Pratt, had occupied a subordinate position—

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member wishes to discuss the ruling given by the Chair he is not in order. He can only appeal from the ruling; he cannot discuss it.

Mr. McMASTER: I am not appealing from the ruling of the Chair; I am not discussing it; I am conforming with the ruling of the Chair. I wish to show that by British precedent, which should always be listened to in this House, articles such as this young gentleman has written are regarded in the Mother of Parliaments as prejudicial to the public interest, and this is the instance I wish to put before the committee. A certain Mr. J. W. Pratt was a member of the British House of Commons. He was also a Liberal Whip. He was a henchman and a strong party follower of Mr. Lloyd George, and he occupied part of his time in writing to the Liberal papers of Scotland letters in which Mr. Asquith was decried and Mr. Lloyd George was greatly eulogized. The matter came before the British House, where it was decided that it was an improper thing for a member of Parliament to write such letters. Now if it was an improper thing for a member of Parliament to write such letters it is a fortiori and in a greater degree, a more improper thing for the private secretary of a minister to write letters to the papers eulogizing that minister. I say that is a proper subject for inquiry by this Committee under the ruling which you, Mr. Chairman, have just given.

Mr. BUREAU: We are entitled to know what this gentleman does during his office hours anyway. I see by the Order in Council that this man is paid out of the War Fund, and I ask what special duties he performs for the President of the Council which have special reference to the war, outside, of course, of the great help the presence of the hon. gentleman, as President of the Privy Council, gives to the cause of winning the war by scaring the Kaiser. Is he paid out of the War Appropriation Fund for writing these articles, and will he cease writing them or did he cease writing them on the 1st of April, the date on which the money we are asked to vote begins to apply? From that date will his war functions cease, and he become just a civil servant as private secretary to the President of the Council? We voted $500,000,000 for the War Appropriation Fund, out of which this man's salary was taken, and we are entitled to know just what special work he has performed in connection with the war, and how long he has performed it.

Mr. ROWELL: The salary paid to my secretary up to the first of April of the present year will be paid out of last year's War Appropriation, the payment being under the War Measures Act. The salary which will be paid during the coming year will be paid under this vote, the same as the salary of any other civil servant occupying a corresponding position.

Mr. BUREAU: That does not answer my question. If he was paid out of the War Appropriation he must have been performing some duties in connection with the war. The minister surely is not going to lay down the principle that anything at all can be charged up to the War Appropriation Fund, whether it has reference to the war or not. I do not think that is a proper principle; there are grave objections to it. I repeat my question: What special duties was he performing in connection with the war, to be paid out of the War Appropriation Fund?

Mr. ROWELL: Up to April 1 of the present year he was performing the regular duties of private secretary to the President of the Privy Council. The matters dealt with by him are largely incidental to and out of the war. The bulk of my correspondence deals with war matters, but I frankly say that my secretary should now be paid out of the regular appropriation of this House and that is the reason his name appears in the estimates. He is in exactly the same position as the other private secretaries who, following the formation of the Union Government, were paid out of the war appropriation, as that was the only fund available and it was the proper fund at the time the Union Government was formed.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Some time ago the President of the Privy Council notified the House that he was sending out some weekly bulletins to assist clergymen in their afternoon sermons in the rural districts. Probably this young gentleman is engaged in furnishing that data.

Mr. ROWELL: No, my private secretary is kept busy with the work of the office, and has not time to aid in the work that interests my hon. friend so much.

Mr. COPP: I had always understood that when the Estimates were under discussion the head of the department whose estimates were being considered took the opportunity to give full information to the House in regard to the work of his department. Apparently the President of the Privy Council takes the opposite course, and feels it his duty to withhold information from the House.

Mr. ROWELL: I think I must challenge that remark. On any matter connected with the Privy Council office on which my hon. friend desires information I shall be pleased to give it in the fullest possible way, and if any information is asked for that I have not here I shall be glad to get it.

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend may be willing to give the fullest possible information, but certainly he has not done so. Instead of showing a willingness to give information, he has shown a willingness to withhold it.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think it is quite proper for the hon. member to impute motives to another hon. member.

Mr. COPP: I was stating the fact that he had not shown a willingness to give information. The minister has said that the Union Government was formed as a war measure, and that that accounted for the Order in Council under which his private secretary was appointed and paid his salary. If it was correct for the minister to pay his private secretary as a war measure up to 1st April, he has given no sufficient reason why he should not continue to pay him as a war measure. Is it right and proper for every member of the Government to pay his secretary and staff under the War Measures Act? If it was right then, it must be right now. Then why ask for this vote?

Mr. BUREAU: We are asked to vote $44,000, and for the first time in my experience in this House we are refused information by a minister of the Crown, who hedges himself around with the rules of the House and the protection of the chairman in order not to answer pertinent questions relating to his department. Since the beginning of the session the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) has been asked question after question, has been cross-examined and re-examined, and has always answered willingly. He had nothing to hide, and not only answered all questions that were asked, but volunteered to give further information. He said he was there to show what his department had done, and he was quite willing and glad to do it. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar), the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers), and every other minister has shown the same willingness. So why should the President of the Privy Council shroud himself in silence which our questions cannot penetrate? Is he ashamed of what is done in his department? Is he afraid to acknowledge the truth? Or what is the reason? This is the first time in eighteen years that I have seen the House get behind the minister, as my hon. friend from Toronto did, who says that this is a disgrace and that we ought to go on with something else. If there is any disgrace in this matter it is not upon our side, but it is that a minister of the Crown should hide behind the rules of the House to avoid answering a plain and courteous question. I say no minister of the Crown has a right to ask us to vote $44,000 and then dismiss our questions in a half-contemptuous manner by saying, "Oh, ask the chairman." If I ask questions about the minister's private secretary, it is because that official has been writing in the newspapers. The minister by his silence acquiesces in the statement that his private secretary was writing to the newspapers to boost him.

Are civil servants outside of office hours to be allowed to do anything they want to? We have, by his silent acquiescence, the admission of the minister that his private secretary, Main Johnson, is the Donald Hunt who is writing in the papers puffing my hon. friend. I am not willing to pass this item without registering my protest against such conduct.

Mr. JACOBS: I would like to know from the President of the Privy Council what the salary of Mr. Main Johnson is? I see an item in the Main Estimates:

Allowance for private secretary, $600.

Surely that is not all the salary that Mr. Johnson receives? We would like to know what his salary is.

Mr. ROWELL: If my hon. friend had been in the House a little earlier he would have heard the answer that I gave. In the Supplementary Estimates there is a vote for the private secretary's salary, omitted from the Main Estimates by mistake, of

[Mr. Bureau.]

$2,800 and there is in the Main Estimates an allowance of $600, making $3,400 in all.

Mr. JACOBS: I would like to know how this salary compares with the salaries of other private secretaries. Is it smaller or larger than the salaries of other secretaries?

Mr. ROWELL: I do not know how it compares with the salaries of others but it is less than he was getting before he came here.

Mr. JACOBS: Every one has to sacrifice something during the war.

Mr. ROWELL: Quite so.

Mr. JACOBS: Do I understand the minister to say that there are salaries larger than $3,400 per annum paid to the private secretaries of Cabinet ministers? In what departments do the private secretaries receive more than $3,400 per annum?

Mr. ROWELL: I do not know but my impression was that the Prime Minister's secretary got more than that and that the private secretaries of some other ministers got the same. I have not inquired as to what other minister's secretaries are getting.

Mr. JACOBS: I understand this is the first year Mr. Johnson has been employed as private secretary to a Cabinet minister. Does the minister consider that he should receive such a large salary the first year of his employment?

Mr. ROWELL: His work fully justifies the salary he is getting and he got more before he came here. The salary he is getting now is less than he was getting before and I consider that in the public interest his work as secretary of the President of the Privy Council is worth the payment that he is getting.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am not conversant with the details of this writing in the Globe, but any one who takes up the papers can see that there is a puffery bureau somewhere in connection with certain gentlemen in this Government. I do not mean to say that it is a puffery bureau only because you can see at a glance that it is a knocking bureau as well. I would like to know if these articles are censored by the minister before they go out and if only those are allowed to go out that are puffing up the President of the Privy Council and certain other favoured ministers and gentlemen, the Chairman of the Imperial Munitions Board, for instance, and knocking certain other gentlemen.

Mr. ROWELL: I have never seen any such articles.

Mr. JACOBS: I am interested in the literary efforts of Mr. Main Johnson; in fact, we in the House all enjoy them and we should be the last people to complain of them. I always look forward to reading Mr. Johnson's prose—also his poetry. It has been the custom to give employment to literary men in the public departments of the Government. We know that in England Anthony Trollope, the great novelist, was employed in the Post Office Department. Edmund Yates was also in the public service in England. The late Archibald Lampman was employed in one of the departments here as a civil servant. William Wilfrid Campbell and a number of others similarly occupied positions in the public service. I might point out that the English gentlemen to whom I have referred were noted novelists and when we read their fiction we know that it was written with no ulterior purpose. Their works were merely imaginative, whereas the secretary of the minister, I understand, assumes to publish articles as if they were actually truthful, and that is the difference between the English novelist and this Canadian writer.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I do not object to giving a preference to literary men in the Civil Service, as my hon. friend from George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) suggests, but I do not think the War Measures Act should be used in that way. The hon. gentleman says that Mr. Johnson has been appointed as his private secretary. It is not only as private secretary, but he has been appointed to the Civil Service at a very large salary, and that under the War Measures Act, I believe that if the services of the gentleman were necessary to the minister for the winning of the war he ought to be paid under the War Appropriations vote and not placed over the heads of other good and faithful servants who have worked all their lives in the Privy Council office and who see this gentleman coming from Toronto and getting a large salary when their promotion is postponed because of his entry into the service. I do not think this is fair. There are many other things which have been done under the War Measures Act. My hon. friend says that Union Government is a product of the War Measures Act. Many other things are products of the War Measures Act. We all hope that peace will be restored. Then, these things will disappear, but because of the manner in which Mr. Johnson has been appointed to the Civil Service, while the war will be over, while there will be peace in the world, Mr. Main Johnson, although a product of the war, will still be retained in the Civil Service and will be paid a large salary when other faithful civil servants are not getting the promotion they deserve. Certainly I think this way of using the War Measures Act, using the legislation which this Parliament enacted to promote war work, is open to strong criticism. I believe Mr. Johnson should be paid under the War Appropriation Act and not under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. ROBB: Just after eight o'clock tonight a member of the Government came over to this side and suggested to us that we might get the business through fairly early and that certain resolutions would be put through so as to enable members of the Government, who wished to go, to absent themselves from the House. The President of the Privy Council has set an example of hurrying on the work by raising points of order. I would tell the minister in all frankness that he would make considerably more progress with his Estimates if he followed the example of those other members of the Government who have preceded him with their Estimates. I think the record shows that we on this side have not been unreasonable, but we are entitled to fair treatment and when a fair question is asked we are entitled to an answer.

The minister himself has acknowledged that part of his staff is paid from the War Appropriation Fund, and that raises another question. I understand that the publicity campaign throughout the country is under the charge of the President of the Privy Council. I would like to know in this connection how much money was paid for advertising the famous Order in Council, exempting farmers' sons from military service, just prior to the last general election. We are told that that Order was put through about 3rd December last and that, under the direction of the President of the Privy Council, a considerable sum of money, running from $7,000 to $10,000, was spent. And we would like to know the exact amount so spent. The minister himself has introduced this question, and if we cannot get satisfactory information we will probe it to the bottom if it takes all night.

Mr. ROWELL: Might I say to my hon. friend that I have not refused to give information on any matter connected with the administration of my department. I shall be delighted to afford the committee the fullest possible information at my disposal in connection with the whole of the work of that department, and if I have not got it here I will try and obtain it. With reference to what my hon. friend mentions, the matter came up when the War Appropriation was before the House. I speak subject to correction, because matters arose while I was away during the election campaign, but my recollection is that it was not the Order in Council to which he refers that was advertised, but the judgment of Mr. Justice Duff on a test case, granting exemptions to farmers under certain conditions.

Mr. ROBB: The minister admits there was such an Order in Council?

Mr. ROWELL: There was an Order in Council, which has been before the House for weeks, dealing with the question of exempting agriculturists. Either the Prime Minister, or the Minister of Militia, laid that Order in Council upon the Table at the opening of the session, but I am quite sure that it was not advertised, or anything done in connection with it, by the Director of Public Information. That officer did, however, advertise in the papers of the country the judgment of Mr. Justice Duff in a test case, and I think the cost was about $7,000.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: Is it part of the duties of the minister's private secretary to write partisan articles, and has he received instructions to do so?

Mr. ROWELL: No, it is not part of his duties, and he has never received any such instructions.

Mr. JACOBS: Does the President of the Privy Council require two private secretaries to do his work?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes. He has a secretary and an assistant secretary, and it requires all their time to answer the correspondence that comes in, as well as to perform the necessary routine work of the office.

Mr. JACOBS: A double shift.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Was the assistant secretary appointed by Order in Council under the War Measures Act?

Mr. ROWELL: For the time being I do not recall the form of procedure followed in connection with the appointment. I know it was made through the Civil Service Commission, and it went through the Treasury Board in the regular way, but I do not recall the details. It is the Clerk of the Privy Council, Mr. Boudreau, who looks after these matters, and it went through in the regular way.

Mr. PELLETIER: If both the minister's secretaries are employed all the time in the work of the department, how do they enjoy the opportunity to write articles and poetry for the Toronto Globe?

Mr. ROWELL: I think my hon. friend could not have been listening when I told the committee early in the evening that no articles were written by my secretaries, or either of them, to my knowledge, during office hours for any paper.

Mr. PEDLOW: Do they write after office hours?

Mr. PELLETIER: The minister said a few minutes ago that his secretaries were kept busy from the time they went into the office until two or three o'clock the next morning.

Mr. ROWELL: No, I did not say that.

Mr. PELLETIER: What time do they have to write articles and poetry?

Mr. BUREAU: May I ask what is the total amount required to be voted by this resolution? There is a vote of $54,900 and at the bottom of the page I see "printing and stationery, and sundries".

Sir SAM HUGHES: Does it include the salary of Mr. Nichols?

Mr. ROWELL: No, that was included in the War Appropriation that was voted the other day.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That has slipped through, has it?

Mr. BUREAU: I want to know what "the sundries" are. There are so many things that come under that head just now that we would be interested in learning what they are.

Mr. ROWELL: The sundries are the same as last year, and for the same purposes.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not think we inquired about them last year. Anyhow, the conditions are not the same this year, and we want to know the details.

Mr. ROWELL: I do not think I can give my hon. friend the details now, but I shall be glad to furnish them when we take up the Supplementary Estimates. There is another item dealing with printing, stationery and all such supplies as are necessary for the carrying on of an office such as the Privy Council Office. The money is spent under the direction of the Clerk of the Privy Council.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I would like to know if the private secretaries of the other ministers are appointed by Order in Council, or if it only happens in the case of the secretary of the President of the Privy Council.

Mr. ROWELL: So far as I know the private secretaries of all the new ministers were appointed in that way. I know some of them were.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Then they did not have to pass a competitive examination under the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. ROWELL: Under the terms of the Civil Service Act private secretaries are not compelled to pass a competitive examination before the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. BUREAU: I asked the minister to give me an explanation of the $7,000 for sundries. His answer was—and I took it down so that there would be no misunderstanding,—that it was for printing and stationery and other expenses of the office which is under the control of the Clerk of the Privy Council. Now I ask him, in that case, why is there an item of $3,000 for printing and stationery?

Mr. ROWELL: I was referring generally to the item of $10,000 for contingencies. The sum of $3,000 is expressly for printing and stationery. My hon. friend is quite correct in his statement, and the sum of $7,000 forms the balance of $10,000 for contingencies. All I can say is that it covers the usual expenses in carrying on an office of that kind. However, I shall get the details from the Clerk of the Privy Council and will give them when we take up the Supplementary Estimates.

Royal Northwest Mounted Police—salaries, $22,300; contingencies, $1,700.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Does this item include the salary of the controller, Mr. McLean?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: What position does Mr. McLean occupy?

Mr. ROWELL: Deputy minister and controller.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Are any of the mounted police employed in connection with the Military Service Act?

Mr. ROWELL: There are some of the mounted police employed in that service in Western Canada; some of them are assisting the Dominion police out there; and there are a few assisting the Dominion police, I think, in the province of Quebec.

Mr. BUREAU: Is that so?

Mr. ROWELL: Some five or six. They are assisting in the West.

Mr. BUREAU: Would the minister tell us the present strength of the force? I understand that in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan many of the services heretofore rendered by the mounted police have ceased, on the ground and for the reason that provincial constables now perform the duties undertaken by the mounted police before the erection into provinces. Many of the men, I understand, have been released. How many now remain on the force, and what are the special duties now performed by those remaining? Are they kept near the Indian reservations?

Mr. ROWELL: I am very glad to answer my hon. friend. Some time after the war broke out, in view of the importance of carefully guarding the international border against possible crossing by hostile parties inspired by pro-German propaganda, and also to look after conditions in the Northwest, an arrangement was made with the Provincial Governments of Saskatchewan and Alberta whereby each of these Governments took over the work of providing their own police protection, in order that the mounted police might be released for this special and important work of patrolling the border and of keeping in touch with all elements of the population in Western Canada. At the same time quite a number of the force enlisted for service overseas. The number of the force, until this recent movement for enlistment as cavalry to reinforce our cavalry brigade in France, was about six hundred. The authorized strength is something over a thousand. When the request came from the overseas authorities that we should provide cavalry reinforcements for our cavalry brigade which has been operating in France, and which did such magnificent service during the great struggle commencing in March, we communicated with the Commissioner of the Mounted Police, intimating to him that this request had come for cavalry reinforcements, and the suggestion was made that if the Mounted Police cared to enlist as reinforcements for the cavalry they might go overseas at once.

Sir SAM HUGHES: As a body?

Mr. ROWELL: As cavalry reinforcements.

Sir SAM HUGHES: They were not to be allowed to go as a unit?

Mr. ROWELL: Not as a unit. It was the desire of the Police and the desire of the Government that they should go over as a unit, but the Government was not able to arrange with the overseas authorities that they should go over and go to the front as a unit. The Government did succeed in arranging that one squadron would go as a unit.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I may tell the hon. gentleman, what he probably knows, that the Government has everything to do with sending them over as a unit, and to the front as a unit. All they want is backbone.

Mr. ROWELL: In that branch of the service the Minister of Militia is the one who determines, subject to the approval of the Council, what shall be done on this side, and the overseas military authorities decide what shall be done overseas. The request that came to us was for cavalry reinforcements for the existing brigade, the ranks of which had been seriously depleted in the great March offensive, and that is what was immediately required. We have succeeded, however, in getting the authorities to accept one squadron of cavalry composed of men of the Northwest Mounted Police. The other men going over are going as cavalry reinforcements to reinforce the existing brigade in France.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is that why Colonel Perry resigned?

Mr. ROWELL: He resigned because they were not authorized to go over to the front as a unit. My hon. friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) asked the number of men in the force. We are transferring to the overseas draft 15 officers and 238 men. The Northwest Mounted Police has enlisted for cavalry recruits to go overseas 530 men, making a total of all ranks of 783 men who are now passing out of the hands of the Mounted Police to the military authorities to go overseas as cavalry reinforcements. I am under the impression that they will pass through Ottawa, and I hope they will detrain here. If they should do so before the House prorogues hon. members will be glad to see so splendid a force as they will present. It is a fine tribute to the courage and patriotism of the men in that force that when the suggestion was made that they should enlist as cavalry recruits every man in the force volunteered. Large numbers could not go because they were over age or otherwise not physically fit. That leaves on hand a force of 336 officers and men at the present time.

[Sir Sam Hughes.]

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: May I inquire if the position of controller is a new position created this year, or an old position?

Mr. ROWELL: It is an old position.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Is there both a deputy minister and a controller?

Mr. ROWELL: That officer is the same man; he is deputy and controller.

Mr. BUREAU: Does this vote of $22,300 include the salaries of the 336 men?

Mr. ROWELL: No. This is for Civil Government; this is the salary list of the office here. We will come to the salaries of the Mounted Police in another item.

Mr. BUREAU: Why should it take $22,300 for officials in Ottawa to direct 336 men who have their own officers? I know, Mr. Chairman, that the Mounted Police are very good men. There are no words of praise the minister can utter in favour of the Mounted Police that I do not at once endorse. I have had occasion to know them and meet them. It is on account of the high character of the force that it strikes me that having to pay, in addition to the salary of the minister who presides over them, $22,300 to look after 336 well trained, well disciplined, gentlemanly men, who are employed to enforce the laws of the country, is rather a large sum, especially when the officials are a couple of thousand miles away from the field of operations.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend must bear in mind that this is the staff that has been looking after 1,200 men. We are down to 336 men at the present time simply because we are sending overseas over 700 men.

Mr. BUREAU: Yet in spite of this dwindling, I notice that the appropriation is increasing instead of decreasing.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Does this item include recruiting charges?

Mr. ROWELL: This is simply the expense of the staff in Ottawa, and as I recollect the details the only differences are statutory increases to two or three clerks in the office.

Royal Northwest Mounted Police, $1,127,777.57.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: How many members of the force are employed in connection with the Military Service Act?

Mr. ROWELL: Less than ten in the East, I believe. I am not sure of the number, because some have enlisted and are going overseas with the cavalry reinforcements. In the West I should think that the number is less than fifty, but it varies from time to time as circumstances require.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Are they paid any additional moneys on account of that service?

Mr. ROWELL: No.

Mr. BUREAU: I notice that there is a decrease this year in the amount to defray the expenses of pay, subsistence, billeting, forage, etc. Is the decrease in proportion per capita to the decrease in the force?

Mr. ROWELL: The decrease is to some extent in proportion per capita. These estimates were made on the basis of approximately 600 men,—subject to this qualification; the cost of living has so vastly increased that the cost of maintaining the Mounted Police in the West is somewhat higher than it was last year. But the main difference between the estimates of last year and those of this year is the difference in the number of men.

Mr. McKENZIE: I assume that when these estimates were prepared it was not known that so many men were going overseas. Was this estimate made to provide for a larger number of men than are now on the force?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes. If the number does not increase, we shall not require the whole of this money, and it will not be spent. We shall spend only such amount as is absolutely required for the force engaged. When this estimate was prepared we did not know about the men going overseas.

Office of the Conservation Commission—salaries, $40,500.

Mr. BUREAU: We have several commissions whose duties seem to be similar to those of the Conservation Commission. We have a commission on natural resources, we have another commission to inquire into such resources as ores, etc., which might be manufactured into munitions. In fact, there is such a multiplicity of commissions that the ordinary public, if they want information, do not know which one to apply to. The Conservation Commission may be looked upon as the mother of commissions, if we leave out of consideration the Railway Commission. I suggest that the Government charge the Conservation Commission with the duty of studying the other commissions and ascertaining whether some of them could not be dispensed with or merged with others. Most of the information, if we except some minute details, supplied by the commission mentioned yesterday could be obtained from the various departments of Government. I do not make these remarks by way of criticism; I admit that the Government have had a good deal to do all at once. But now that we have Union Government—

Sir SAM HUGHES: And Union Opposition.

Mr. BUREAU: We have always had a Union Liberal party, anyway. It is about time that we had a union of these commissions. We ought to take the Commission of Conservation as our guide; we ought to ask that commission to see that the information which we obtain through these commissions is not duplicated.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Would not that be a combine in restraint of trade?

To provide for the expenses of the Conservation Commission, including $750 for C. Gordon Hewitt, as special adviser respecting conservation of game and wild life, $84,000.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: I should like to have an answer from the minister regarding the question put by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau).

Mr. ROWELL: I can only say that I shall carry my hon. friend's suggestion with reference to the work of this commission to the Prime Minister. But this commission at present has its hands full of very valuable and important work. As my hon. friend knows, there are the various branches, with water-power, forestry lands, public health, housing and other problems —and the commission is fully occupied in looking after those branches of investigation.

Mr. BUREAU: I am not criticising the Commission of Conservation. I am in favour of it and I thought it ought to look after the others. I see that for the commission with all its staff, including Mr. White and Sir Clifford Sifton the amount of the item is only $40,500. The item, which we are now discussing, which is for the expenses of the Commission of Conservation amounts to $84,000. The commission must be doing a good deal of travelling, if it costs twice the amount we pay them for their services to pay their travelling expenses. I would like to have an explanation of the item.

Mr. ROWELL: The civil government item includes the chief officials in the office of the Conservation Commission. The present item covers the expenses of the outside work, including the general office expenses, expenses of investigations into forestry, town planning and housing, water-powers, public health, fishery and game, agriculture, mining, and fire prevention, and the travelling expenses of the commissioners.

Mr. BUREAU: I would like to know if the first amount of $40,500 covers all the salaries of the employees of the Conservation Commission, or whether in the second item there are more employees included, or whether it is only for technical work and reports. I understand it costs money to publish the weekly and monthly pamphlets which we get and which are very interesting and useful. It is on account of the useful and great work of this commission that I think there is very little use for some of the other commissions which have been created.

Mr. ROWELL: This item of $84,000 covers what might be called the outside staff plus the expenses of investigation. The first item covers what may be described as the directing staff of the head office.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is the item of $40,500 included in the $84,000?

Mr. ROWELL: No.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Is the Conservation Commission under the control of the Privy Council in any way?

Mr. ROWELL: No, it is under the Prime Minister. I am taking these Estimates tonight at his request.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What are the names of the men who compose the commission?

Mr. ROWELL: The commission consists of twenty members appointed by the Governor in Council, of whom one from each province must be a member of the faculty of a university within such province. There are a number of ex officio members, viz.: the minister of each Provincial 10 p.m. Government charged with the administration of the natural resources of the province, and the federal Ministers of the Interior, Agriculture and Mines. I cannot give the names of the twenty appointed by the Governor in Council, but I can secure them for my hon. friend and give them to him if he so desires.

[Mr. Bureau.]

Mr. SINCLAIR: When do they meet?

Mr. ROWELL: They have an annual meeting, and they also have committee meetings.

Mr. SINCLAIR: They do not receive salaries?

Mr. ROWELL: No, they receive travelling expenses for attending the meetings.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Has the Chairman of the Commission of Conservation any control over the employees of that branch of the service, or is his position only honorary?

Mr. ROWELL: He is in control.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Who is the present chairman of the commission?

Mr. ROWELL: Sir Clifford Sifton.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Is he using the personnel of the commission for his political activities? The other day I read, I think, in Saturday Night, that he was the father of the Union Government. I would like to know whether he uses in any way the personnel of the commission for his paternal or generating activities.

Mr. ROWELL: I have not heard it suggested that he has. I am sure that is not the case.

Mr. DECHENE: What salary does he receive?

Mr. ROWELL: None.

Mr. McKENZIE: Eighty-four thousand dollars is quite a sum of money. I would suggest to the minister that the details in the item are rather meagre. Who is the responsible head for this expenditure, and under whose control is the money disbursed?

Mr. ROWELL: The representative head is, of course, the chairman. Then there is the assistant to the chairman, Mr. James White, who directs in the absence of the chairman and who is subject to the chairman's direction. The item of $84,000 is made up as follows:

General office expenses, including salaries of temporary clerks and travelling expenses	$17,400
Forestry, including investigations into the pulpwood resources of Eastern Canada and publishing the forestry reports	10,650
Town planning and housing, including salaries, travelling expenses and publishing reports	12,800
Water-powers, including salary consulting engineer, publishing reports, and office expenses	12,500

Public health, including salary of medical adviser, publishing reports	5,000
Fisheries and Game, salaries and publishing reports	2,600
Agriculture, including field and travelling expenses and publishing reports	5,200
Mining, including salary of mining engineer, travelling expenses and publishing reports	6,400
Fire prevention, including salary and travelling expenses and publishing reports	5,800
Commissioners' expenses attending annual and committee meetings	4,000
Miscellaneous reports	1,650
Total	$84,000

Mr. McKENZIE: To me it is a discovery that the Commission of Conservation has anything to do with hygienic conditions in the country, or with medical activities of any kind. There is, of course, a Board of Health in connection with the Department of Agriculture that looks after health in a general way, and there are also organizations in the different provinces which look after general health conditions, but I had thought that they rather exhausted every branch of medical research on the part of governments in this country. Perhaps it would be well for the minister to explain what is really done in this connection.

Mr. ROWELL: There has been a public health branch of the Conservation Commission for some considerable time, and Dr. Hodgetts, who is now in England, has been medical advisor to that branch. I know from my general knowledge of the work of the commission that they have made important investigations into questions of public health as affecting the whole country, as part of the conservation of our human resources, and they have published some reports, I believe they have looked into the question of the effect of tuberculosis on the life of the nation, the housing of the people, and the relation of housing to public health. I believe it was a result of their investigations into questions of public health that the commission decided to look into the problem of housing and town planning and brought Mr. Thomas Adams, the town planning expert, from Great Britain to take up that question in Canada. I may say in that connection that I once heard Right Hon. John Burns say he thought the most acute problem in Canada was the housing of our working people, and a problem to which we should devote most earnest attention if we were not to repeat the mistakes of the old land and some mistakes the cities of the United States had made. Town planning on sound lines, he said, was one of the urgent needs of our country. The Commission of Conservation has taken up that problem and has attempted to deal with it through the branch of which Mr. Thomas Adams is the chief. It is quite true, as my hon. friend has said, that there is a Public Health Branch in the Department of Agriculture, but it is pretty limited in its scope, and strong representations have been made to the Government from all classes of organizations urging that there should be a real Federal department of public health and the question is now under consideration, but so far no action has been taken.

Mr. McKENZIE: They cannot go too far in conserving public health and doing anything that is necessary along that line for the benefit of our people. What I would object to would be the possible overlapping and want of co-operation, with resulting inefficiency and waste of public money. Otherwise, I have no objection to the expenditure of public money for the benefit of public health, and particularly for the better housing of our people.

Supplementary estimates 1917-18 — Privy Council Office—contingencies, further amount required, $1,000.

Mr. ROWELL: This additional amount is required by reason of the fact that expenses in connection with the office of the secretary of Hon. Mr. Maclean and the secretary of the Hon. Mr. Robertson are charged to Privy Council contingencies. These ministers are not at the head of separate departments for which there are specific appropriations.

Mr. McMASTER: Is this in connection with the Post Office Department, for example?

Mr. ROWELL: No. My hon. friend will remember that Hon. Mr. Maclean is chairman of the Committee on Reconstruction, which is a sub-committee of the Cabinet, and therefore the expenses incidental to the office of his secretary are charged under Privy Council Estimates and paid out of Privy Council contingencies.

Main estimates—Arts and Agriculture—Patent Record, $30,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: I might tell the minister we had this item under fire last year. This money is expended in the publication of that big book that issues once in a while. It was stated by a great many hon. members in this House last year that they had very little use for the book, and I join that brigade myself. I have never got any good out of it, and unless there is somebody friendly to it I would suggest that $30,000 is too much to pay for it. Perhaps the minister would explain why such a big volume is issued at such a great expense?

Mr. CRERAR: I think there is some force in the criticism of my hon. friend. I have not so far got down to an examination of this particular expenditure, but it does seem to me that a reduction might possibly be made in it this year. I find that the cost of printing takes up practically the whole of this item, the distribution of the publication being free to members of Parliament and Senators, and to libraries in England, the United States and Canada. I would suggest that the item pass, and I will give it very careful consideration with a view to reduction before spending any money.

Experimental Farms—Maintenance of Central Farm, and establishment and maintaining of additional branch stations, $1,012,036.60.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I would like information about the station at Ste. Anne de la Pocatière. Last year the director of the farm had to rent adjoining land for the purpose of carrying on the operations of the farm. Is it the intention of the department to acquire additional land in order to make the operations of the farm successful?

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot say at the moment whether it is the intention to acquire additional land or not. We have found at several of the farms that it has been necessary to rent adjacent land mainly to secure feed for live stock that were being handled. There is an item in the Estimates to provide for additional land, and if more land is necessary at this particular place it is likely that more will be purchased.

Mr. VIEN: What is the reason of the increase in this vote?

Mr. CRERAR: The increase arises from practically three causes. An item of $40,000 for printing was omitted from the Main Estimates of last year and was included in the Supplementary Estimates. This year it appears in the Main Estimates. In addition, there is an item of $75,000 which we are expending in the growing of garden and field root seeds at the several experimental farms. Prior to the war practically all the garden and field root seeds used in Canada, which amounted to a very large quantity, were imported mainly from Belgium, Denmark and Holland. With the progress of the war the reserve supply has been cut off, and a year ago the director general of experimental farms, who had studied the situation, recommended that we should undertake in Canada to provide our own farms, as far as possible, with seed. It was difficult to get farmers throughout the country to undertake this work because they were not familiar with the methods of seed production and they lacked the necessary experience. It was decided to undertake this work at the experimental farms and stations throughout Canada. We have 350 acres under cultivation for this particular purpose and we hope to get enough seed to meet all our requirements next year. It is expected that the return from this will be greater than the expenditure involved when the proceeds from the sale of seed are realized.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Is it the intention of the minister to bring the employees of the experimental farms under the provisions of the Civil Service Act? I am not speaking of the day labourer but of the director, the superintendents, the chiefs of the different branches and all permanent employees.

Mr. CRERAR: I understand they will be brought under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Will the minister carry out the policy which has been announced by other departments of the Government, that there shall be no political patronage in the appointment of the labourers on these farms? I would like to know if that will be done at St. Anne's because, if it is, it will be quite a new experience there.

Mr. CRERAR: I can assure the hon. gentleman that this will be the policy of the department, and has been since last November when I personally gave instructions to the Director General of Experimental Farms that hereafter in the engagement of all men for work on the farms he should have regard strictly to the qualifications of the man for the position and not to any other consideration.

Mr. McMASTER: Was that direction given in writing or verbally in the manner in which the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid) gave directions?

Mr. CRERAR: It was given verbally, but there was no misunderstanding as to the character of the instructions.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: It would be necessary to make a ruling and send it out to all the experimental farms in order that it might reach the proper officers. I do not think a conversation with one man is sufficient. My hon. friend must remember that this question of political patronage has permeated the whole of the Administration for a long time and it cannot be expected that it will be changed by a simple conversation. There should be a ruling made by the minister and sent out to the experimental farms with instructions that it be posted up on the barn door, where any one can see it, so that everybody will know that that is the rule.

Mr. CRERAR: I will be very glad to do that if necessary. I gave the instruction to the Director General and he sent it out to all the superintendents of farms and farm stations, so he informed me, and I have no doubt he did so. I believe the superintendents of the various experimental farms will welcome the change and I have no doubt that policy will be carried out. If any hon. member has information that it is not being carried out I shall be very glad to have him inform me of the fact. As far as I am concerned I want efficiency to govern the operation of the farms. I am going as far as in my power lies to see that this policy is carried out.

Mr. McKENZIE: How many experimental farms are there in Canada, and where are they located?

Mr. CRERAR: There are experimental farms and stations at Charlottetown, P.E.I.; Kentville, N.S.; Nappan, N.S.; Fredericton, N.B.; Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere, Que.; Cap Rouge, Que.; Lennoxville, Que.; Spirit Lake, Que.; Kapuskasing, Ont.; Morden, Man.; Brandon, Man.; Indian Head, Sask.; Rosthern, Sask.; Scott, Sask.; Lethbridge, Alberta, Lacombe, Alberta, Summerland, B.C.; Invermere, B.C.; Agassiz, B.C.; Sydney, B.C.; and the Central Experimental Farm at Ottawa.

Mr. CAHILL: What amount of money has been expended at Kapuskasing?

Mr. CRERAR: The total estimate this year is $30,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Are the Government Experimental Farms doing anything in the way of increased production?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. Early in March instructions were sent to all the experimental farms throughout Canada that they were to pay particular attention to that object and direct their efforts as far as possible—while adhering, of course to the experimental farm work in which they are engaged—to the increasing of production, not only in cereals but in live-stock as well.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Can the minister state how many additional acres the experimental farms have under crop this year?

Mr. CRERAR: No, I have not that information. It would be impossible to secure it as yet because the seeding is not all done at these farms. I do not know that the increase along that line will be very great. I think that the increase probably will be greater in the raising of hogs and meat animals than cereals.

Mr. McKENZIE: This is a very interesting and important subject, because the experimental farm is capable of rendering great service to the country, and for that reason I would like to get a few ideas from the minister about its work. The principal purpose of the experimental farm should be to show the ordinary farmer how things can be done—how certain grains, for instance, can be produced, and how the best kind of cattle can be raised, at an expense within the reach of the ordinary agriculturist. I am afraid that if the Minister of Agriculture were to investigate the Experimental Farm here, which looks beautiful and magnificent in all its parts, and were to figure out what it costs for every ton of hay and every bushel of potatoes that is grown there, he would find that it is a very expensive work. I would like him, as a new man and endowed with enthusiasm, energy and youth, to introduce some new life into this idea of experimental farming and try to demonstrate to the people what can be done. I am afraid that the Ottawa Experimental Farm is carried on at too great an expenditure and on too large a scale. I would suggest to the minister that it would be highly beneficial to establish a number of small experimental farms or stations in places not so far apart. The Dominion Experimental farm in Nova Scotia is not of so very much good for the whole province. It is of benefit within a certain radius, but only for the comparatively few people who can visit and see it. If there were quite a number of these stations, consisting, perhaps, of only fifty acres of land, where the farmers of the entire locality could go and inspect what is being done, and in that way benefit by the experiments the Government is carrying on, it would be of the greatest possible value. We in Nova Scotia get a great deal of benefit from the Experimental Farm at Truro and the courses that it gives, and the farmers of the province are invited to go there and view what is being done. But if there were co-operation between the Federal department and the departments of agriculture of the several provinces so that these experimental farms, like the public schools, could be established all over the country, it would be much better.

Mr. BURRELL: I would like to say a word or two in answer to my hon. friend, but I do not want to detain the committee by any lengthy remarks at this late date of the session, although the subject is a very interesting and important one. The hon. gentleman seemed to imply that the system by which the experimental farms have been carried on was rather a mistaken one in that vast sums of money had been expended to very little purpose, and he hoped that my hon. friend (Mr. Crerar) would turn over a new leaf. I might say that I have very great confidence in the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar), and I have no doubt at all that he will accomplish a great deal of good. If he accomplishes more than I did as Minister of Agriculture it will be a matter of very great satisfaction to me. But I would like to disabuse the mind of my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) of what I think is a serious misunderstanding as to the functions of an experimental farm. No experimental farm could possibly pay if it were to fulfil its functions as an experimental farm. I quite agree with my hon. friend that a most useful work can be done by having what we should not, perhaps, call experimental farms, but demonstration farms, to show to the farmers the best methods of carrying on the ordinary farm work. An experimental farm, such as the one at Ottawa, involves the carrying on of thousands of costly experiments in order, perhaps, to evolve some one thing that may be of immense service to the country. Although I admit that at the Ottawa Farm there must have been hundreds of experiments that have cost this country thousands of dollars without any effect except to eliminate useless processes, there will come as the result of that work one experiment sufficiently established to pay for the whole of the vast outlay. If I wanted to give the House a shining and conspicuous example of the truth of my arguments it would be the results achieved in connection with the reproduction of cereals by which the Marquis wheat was evolved on the Farm, here, the production and dissemination of which I am absolutely confident has saved the country untold millions of dollars and paid ten times over the entire cost of experimental farms in Canada. I hope my hon. friend will pardon me for saying that.

Mr. CAHILL: How is it that the Dominion Experimental Farms never seem to take any prizes for grain or anything of that kind?

Mr. BURRELL: The function of the experimental farms is not primarily to exhibit products or take prizes, but to carry out experiments.

Mr. CAHILL: Evolve the best varieties.

Mr. McKENZIE: I did not say that the moneys in question were expended to no purpose. My hon. friend (Mr. Burrell) could not have heard me.

Mr. BURRELL: I apologize if I misunderstood my hon. friend.

Mr. McKENZIE: What I did say was that if my hon. friend in charge of the department wants to figure out, as the ordinary farmer has to do, what it costs to raise a ton of hay or a bushel of potatoes on a farm, he could not stay in the business very long. However, he is able to draw on the moneys of the country and can afford to make these experiments. The idea I meant to convey was that perhaps demonstration farms would better enforce practical lessons in agriculture on the average farmer, and that if we had more of these farms all over the country where farmers could go and see what is being done and benefit by the experiments, it would be better than simply having one big farm at some one place.

Mr. DECHENE: The idea that my hon. friend from Cape Breton North (Mr. McKenzie) has suggested has been carried out to a great extent in the province of Quebec during recent years. We now see along the highways in a great many parishes large placards indicating that a certain field is used as a demonstration farm by the Provincial Department of Agriculture. These demonstration farms have been of the greatest possible advantage to the farmers in the locality where they are established. Accurate records are kept showing how much it has cost to produce the crop that is being demonstrated, and this data as well as the crop itself is open to the inspection of the farmers in the neighbourhood. This system of demonstration farms which is carried on in the province of Quebec, and which has produced such good results, should be given earnest thought and attention by the federal authorities at Ottawa. Reference to the statistics of the province of Quebec will show the Minister of Agriculture, I think, that the wheat production in that province has made a great jump during the last three years, and the same with other crops. I think, perhaps, that if less money were spent on the beautifying of the farm here, and a greater expenditure made on practical work in the interest of the farmers, far better results would be achieved. I hope the Minister of Agriculture will give due consideration to the suggestion of my hon. friend from Cape Breton, and that a good many more demonstration farms will be established where the farmers can go and find out for themselves the practical results that have been obtained.

Mr. VIEN: I would like to tell the minister that it would be a good policy to establish demonstration farms in every parish if possible. I think also it would be good policy to place them under the Director General of Experimental Farms. Mr. Grisdale is a splendid public servant, and has done much to improve the experimental farms, and under his able management demonstration farms in almost every parish would help immensely. I represent a rural riding, and have often heard farmers from my riding express a desire to have a demonstration farm in every parish. It would not be money lost, and we might possibly spend less on large experimental farms and more on demonstration farms, because agricultural knowledge would spread much more widely because it would be more accessible to the farmers. I think we should also have under the management of the Department of Agriculture lectures on agriculture, much along the line followed by the provincial departments. Probably the federal and provincial Departments of Agriculture could cooperate, and the federal department might supplement the technical instruction given by these lecturers.

Mr. CRERAR: There is a great deal of force in the point advanced by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. It means, however, that there should be close cooperation between the federal and the Departments of Agriculture of all the provinces to accomplish the best results. I had it in mind to invite the provincial Ministers of Agriculture to a conference after the session to consider how the provincial and the federal departments can most effectively co-operate to get the best results from the moneys spent by both. Should that conference come about, the point raised by the hon. gentleman will doubtless be considered. I think there is a great deal to be said in favour of the small demonstration farm, located in the community, where the farmers learn by seeing what is being done. A farmer naturally and instinctively learns more readily through the sense of sight than he does through any other of his senses. The question is a large one of policy and will require a great deal of consideration by the department.

Mr. FAFARD: Is the minister aware that the crop from the experimental farm at Spirit Lake was $15,000 worth of pulpwood? It seems to me that it is folly that an experimental farm which cost over $20,000 should yield such a result. I know a little about this farm. The money was spent not for agricultural but for military purposes. Spirit Lake is a detention camp, yet this $20,000 is probably charged to the Department of Agriculture. There is only one family living on this farm. It seems to me that the money expended at Spirit Lake should be charged to the Militia Department, because it is not an experimental farm; it is a detention camp.

Mr. CRERAR: Of course, I have never visited the Spirit Lake experimental farm. I understand that considerable expense has been necessary to clear it up and make it suitable for cultivation, and I have no doubt that, after the land is cleared and the farm brought under cultivation a good many of the difficulties the hon. gentleman referred to will be overcome. This farm is located in a district which, I understand, is being settled, or is partially settled now, and its purpose is to supply information to the farmers in the district.

Mr. FAFARD: But the $15,000 received for pulpwood was turned over to the Militia Department and the money spent was for militia purposes. There are no farmers for miles around. A few years ago you could walk one hundred miles north, south, east and west and find no settlement. There are to-day only about forty families around there. I know the country very well.

Mr. COPP: I want to congratulate the Union Government upon having a practical agriculturist at the head of the department, if the minister is one, as I understand he is. I do not rise to oppose the appropriation, but I do want to make one or two suggestions. I do so hesitatingly, knowing that he is a farmer of repute, while I do not profess to be in that class. But I have paid some attention to the working of some of the branch experimental farms through the eastern section of the Dominion, and while I do not want to apply my criticism to all of them, what money is spent on a number of these farms I can say to the minister is a criminal waste of public money. Not one dollar of benefit is derived by the agricultural population from the working and operation of these farms. I am not asking that an extra man be employed, but if there is one good practical man now in his department, I would advise the minister to make that man a general inspector or superintendent, whatever he pleases to term the office, and send him through the country to get a personal report in regard to these farms. I do not know about the Central Experimental Farm at Ottawa. I have had the very great pleasure of visiting that farm several times. I spend Saturday afternoons there when the House is not sitting, and enjoy it immensely. I notice that a great many of the city people go out there and have a picnic.

I fail to see many farmers around there getting instruction. Of course, it is a great convenience to the people of Ottawa to be able to get green vegetables from the gardens, fresh bouquets from the greenhouses, and things of that kind; I am not finding fault about that. But it would be better to have a few small experimental stations in the different localities, which could more conveniently be visited by the people. In New Brunswick there is an experimental farm outside of Fredericton. It takes a man in my section of the province two days to get there and back. The purpose of an experimental farm is to give out practical information. I know some of the men who have charge of these farms. They are not practical farmers and never were; they simply have the job of superintendent at a fairly good salary. When I discussed this matter last year and the year before, the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Burrell) made reference to the splendid report that he had received from the superintendent of that experimental farm. Naturally, that gentleman would not make a report unfavourable to himself. We have deficits on these farms; we do not expect them to pay—indeed, the superintendents do not try to make them pay; they seem to think that the more money they can spend, the more expensive horses, harness and machinery they buy, the more the farmers will think of the experimental farm. Of course, the farmer does not know that at the end of the year there is a deficit of anywhere from $5,000 to $50,000 in the operation of that farm. I do not ask my hon. friend to reduce by one dollar the appropriation for the encouragement of agriculture, because if there is any industry or occupation that should be assisted in every possible way, it is agriculture. But I do suggest that my hon. friend make a study of the work done by these farms and see that money is not wasted. Very little good comes to the people from the operation of the Central Experimental Farm, or of the branch stations throughout the country. My hon. friend himself can visit these farms or send some one in whom he has confidence to inspect them and report to him as to the best method of making them really beneficial to people interested in agriculture. If he does so, I believe that he will get a report along the lines of the suggestion which I have made.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Coming as I do from one of the agricultural provinces of the West, I want to say to my hon. friend that my experience is quite different from his. We have an experimental farm in the town of Lacombe, Alberta. Under the management of a very able man, Mr. Hutton, that farm is doing a great deal of good to agriculture in my province. I have been there on many occasions. On one occasion I saw a colt only thirteen months old which weighed 1,300 pounds. I naturally conceived the desire to have colts of that size on my own farm, and others with me had the same feeling. Large excursions of farmers are made to this experimental farm station in order that they may see the very best work that can be done in agriculture as it is done on that farm. The Minister of Agriculture for that province, joining his forces with those of the Dominion Government, goes there frequently. Men well versed in many forms of agricultural pursuits go there and give addresses to large numbers of farmers and their female relatives. The farm sends out cultures for the production of certain kinds of clover and other things. I do not know about New Brunswick, but I do know that the people of Alberta generally value very much the experimental farm at Lacombe and that the farmers derive very great benefit from the various operations that are carried on there, and from the courteous replies that the superintendent of the farm will always make to inquiries sent to him about anything connected with agriculture. I am sure the member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp) will be glad to hear that in Alberta, at any rate, the experimental farm is doing good.

Mr. COPP: I am delighted that the superintendent of the farm to which my hon. friend (Mr. M. Clark) refers carries out his work along the lines mentioned. If all the stations were conducted in that way, possibly they would do a great deal of good. My experience is different from that of my hon. friend. Nobody encourages people interested in agriculture, to make excursions to these farms in the East to see the work that is done there. The minister will do well to see that every farm has a superintendent who will look after the work properly. I believe that it would be an advantage if farms were established in the smaller localities as rapidly as possible.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend's suggestion, which is a valuable one, must be worked out in co-operation with provincial departments of agriculture, I assure my hon. friend that the matter will receive close study during the interval between this session and the next, I do not concur with his view that these farms are of no practical value, I know that they are in the West; the member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) has given a striking illustration of that. I know, too, that such is the case in the other provinces. My predecessor in office gave an instance of the work done by the Central Experimental Farm in the development of Marquis wheat. With reference to the suggestion of the member for Westmorland as to the supervision of the farms, I had made up my mind to visit all these experimental farms during the coming summer. As I have never had the good fortune to travel east of Montreal, I shall certainly go the Maritime Provinces first and personally look into the suggestions that he has made.

Mr. PELLETIER: Has the Federal Government voted any subsidies to the Provincial Governments for the upkeep of some of the demonstration farms that have been opened?

Mr. CRERAR: Under the Agricultural Instruction Act a grant is given to the provinces, and I understand that part of that money is expended in carrying on this demonstration work and in the appointment of agricultural representatives in the various provinces.

Mr. PELLETIER: Some four years ago I wrote to my predecessor, Mr. Boulay, in regard to this matter, and as is well known, he and I did not altogether agree, and we do not yet. I asked him to endeavour to have a subsidy voted in the interest of the farmers, that is to say, in order to have demonstration farms opened up in different parts of the province. My riding is divided in two by a chain of mountains, and I asked him to have one in the vicinity of Matapedia and one along the river St. Lawrence. His first answer was that the climate and the soil along the St. Lawrence river were not good enough to establish a demonstration farm, so I wrote him stating that those were two reasons why we needed scientific farming. I had no answer to that last letter. I therefore wrote to 11 p.m. the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell), and he replied that he was prepared to assist the Provincial Government in opening up such demonstration farms. If at any time the minister should make up his mind to take up this matter, and if he should wish to take a trip through my riding, to see whether the climate and soil are such that demonstration farms should be located there, I shall be delighted to take him from one end of my constituency to the other.

Mr. KAY: How much is being spent at Lennoxville station this year? Will the minister give an outline of the work being done there?

Mr. CRERAR: The Estimate for the Lennoxville station for the present year is $36,000.

Mr. KAY: Are the buildings on the farm finished yet?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. KAY: Will they be completed this year?

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed that the dairy building will be finished this year, but probably not the others.

Mr. KAY: How much of this item is for purchase of livestock?

Mr. CRERAR: Four thousand dollars.

Mr. KAY: Does that cover all experimental farms?

Mr. CRERAR: For Lennoxville alone.

Mr. KAY: How much for all the farms?

Mr. CRERAR: I have the information here for each farm separately. I have not it totalled.

Mr. KAY: Is it the policy of the department to have excursions run to all the farms every year?

Mr. CRERAR: It has been the policy in the past to have that carried out, and it was carried out as far as it was possible to arrange excursions with the railway companies. It has been the practice to a very large extent in the West and in the East also.

Mr. KAY: Is it the intention to have any excursions run this year? I understand the Railway War Board has prohibited the running of excursions.

Mr. CRERAR: I believe the Railway War Board some time ago took the attitude that excursions should not be run to summer fairs. They have already modified that attitude, and those excursions to summer fairs will be run as usual. I cannot say whether they will extend that to cover excursions to experimental farms or not. They will have to be guided by existing conditions.

Mr. KAY: If my hon. friend will put the matter strongly enough before the board, I am sure they will be pleased to allow excursions to experimental farms. The minister will understand that excursions to experimental farms are more important than excursions to summer fairs.

Mr. DECHENE: When the farmers' delegation was in town the other day, how many of those four or five thousand farmers visited the experimental farm here? I was out there one day with a few of my farmer constituents, and there seemed to be only a few there. If only a few farmers visited the experimental farm on that occasion, it would be pretty hard to get them to take advantage of excursions to visit those farms.

Mr. CRERAR: That delegation did not come primarily to visit experimental farms, but the director states that several hundred of them visited it.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Has the department taken any cognizance of the fox fur farming which is one of the most important of the new industries of the twentieth century? It is second only to agriculture. The fur farming industry is a new departure in human industry.

In the early period of our race, when the limit of subsistence was so narrow, when our antediluvian forefathers lived by the chase, not even communal life could exist. After a while it was discovered that they could domesticate the wild boar that they hunted, and gradually he became our modern pig. They domesticated the buffalo, she became the modern cow. They domesticated the epohiccos and he became the modern horse. They domesticated the mountain sheep and goat and gave us our modern animals of those species. The limit of subsistence was widened so as to permit of our antediluvian forefathers forming themselves into tribes, and then internecine warfare ceased, because it was discovered they could produce better results by domestication than by hunting the wild animals. This widened the limit of subsistence ten-fold. After a while, they discovered that the grains and the grasses on which these animals had been living could in many cases be used for human food. Then horticulture and agriculture was born. That widened the limit of subsistence twenty-fold and enabled the generations succeeding our antediluvian forefathers to develop into nations, and so the world moved along, gradually evolving, and developing the natural resources that lay open to mankind. The solution of the problem of increased population, which always presses against the limit of subsistence, was found, in a measure, by the discovery of America. Our forefathers came across here and relieved the congestion of western Europe, and what was the result? Art, science, literature, learning, civil government, as if by magic, followed; then democracy, the thing we are fighting for to-day. After a while our own great continent was being filled up, and the people who came to Canada moved into the United States because the climate there was warmer, living conditions were easier, and the struggle for existence was less. But before this war broke out the time had come when the great areas of land in the United States were becoming filled up, and people were migrating to Canada in thousands and tens of thousands. What occurred almost providentially, as it were, at that time? The people in my little province discovered or inaugurated, if you will, the art of fur-farming. If you will follow the progress of our race and the developments that have taken place with the widening of the limit of subsistence, you will find that fox-fur farming is a new cult, and one which the people of northern climates must take into consideration. If you will look at the map of Europe, of Asia and of North America, you will find that the bulk of the land area that is unpeopled to-day is in this great northland. What is necessary in this great northland is warm clothing and fuel, and this particular industry has come into being from the necessities of the case, and it is up to the Department of Agriculture to take hold of it and see that it is developed still further. If we have a paternal Government let its paternalism be practical and along the lines of development. As I said in one of my discussions before in this House, overflowing population is largely the cause of the present war, and the great territory of North America and the immense territory of Canada can only be exploited by producing conditions that will enable the northern people to grow up in this land, and it is only in the northern lands that energy is developed, because in the southern climates enervation and all that sort of thing obtains. If we are going to produce a great race in this country, we have to produce conditions that will enable our people to take up these northern lands and live in northern latitudes and so develop.

Mr. CARVELL: Does my hon. friend think the Department of Agriculture could sell foxes for any better price than the farmers of Prince Edward Island can?

Mr. JOSEPH READ: The period of frenzied finance in the fox business is past, and the business is now on a commercial basis, and it ought never to have been on anything else. Originally the people who were interested in the fox business, like the people interested in western lands and British Columbia real estate, simply went after wildcats and went into a period of frenzied finance, but that is past and it is up to the Department of Agriculture to take up this question of fur farming and develop it to the end that our great country may be populated by a strong and virile population that will dominate the world with a glorious civilization.

Mr. PETER ROBERT McGIBBON: I had occasion a number of years ago to go on an excursion with a lot of other farmers to an experimental farm—I was a farmer then but I am not now—and my experience with experimental farms was not very good. I am glad to hear that in some parts of the world experimental farms are a success, but the farm I visited, which was near Ottawa, was not what it should be. The potatoes were eaten up with potato bugs until there was nothing but the stalks left, the grain was filled with weeds, and was sowed very late in the season. The cattle were extra good, and we farmers knew very well that they were fed at the Government trough; they were fed at our expense, and so it was easy to pour the feed into them. The great trouble at that farm was the patronage system. Every man about the farm, from the labourer up, was there because of the recommendation of the member for his constituency, and that made them very independent. They said: "We were sent here by So-and-So, and our boss cannot discharge us." So they did no work, and there was no one to hoe the corn. I am glad that in the present Minister of Agriculture we have a young man who is a capable farmer and will attend to his business. I know that he will go to these farms and see for himself how the work is carried on, and I know further, that if he will cut out the patronage system there the work will develop and progress as if the farm were run by private individuals.

The trouble in the East has been the patronage system, no matter what Government has been in power. I am not bringing politics into this because I must say that at the time I visited the Experimental farms they were under the Liberal regime. Now we have a young man at the head of affairs, he gave us a good explanation in answer to the questions that were asked him, and I am certain he will make a success of the experimental farms all over Canada. We must go on with farming and we must do everything possible to increase production.

Mr. ETHIER: I see there is an increase of $122,036.60 in this item for experimental farms and branch stations. Will provision be made for additional branch stations to encourage tobacco culture? Since 1903 there has been a special branch at the Experimental Farm under Mr. Charlan who has charge of experimental work in connection with the culture of tobacco. In view of the increase in the duties which were announced by the hon. Acting Minister of Finance in his budget speech on tobacco, and in view of this increase in the Estimates for experimental farms, we might expect the establishment of additional branches to encourage tobacco culture. We have an experiment station at St. Jacques and I think that is the only one we have in the province of Quebec.

Mr. CRERAR: There is one at Farnham.

Mr. ETHIER: Yes, and we have one at St. Jacques. There was a good start made in 1903 in connection with tobacco culture. The farmers of this section, who were anxious to cultivate tobacco, were encouraged to do so but since that time, as I had occasion to point out to the minister a few days ago, the efforts in this direction have diminished. Nothing has been done, and yet the duty on tobacco has been increased. No encouragement has been offered to the farmers who are cultivating tobacco. I would suggest that if it is the intention of the Government to maintain branch farms under the supervision of my good friend, the director of experimental farms, whom I see here, the Government might give him more power and might authorize him, out of this increased vote, to establish additional branches in the counties where tobacco culture should be encouraged and intensified. The tobacco industry is well known in such counties as Montcalm, L'Assomption, Jacques Cartier, Two Mountains, and Laval and it should be encouraged more than it is. We have only one station at St. Jacques and that is not sufficient. If it is the intention to take this away from the control of the experimental farm and to place it under the direct control of the department, very well; but if it is to be retained under the experimental farm I would ask the minister to give us, in the counties of Laval, Two Mountains, Montcalm, l'Assomption and Jacques Cartier two or three additional branches. Do I understand the Government intend to continue the station at St. Jacques? The tobacco industry is a good thing for the country and for our farmers, and it should be encouraged in every way possible.

Mr. CRERAR: There is provision for the extension of these farms, and the suggestion that a portion of the money voted shall be used for additional experimental stations to encourage tobacco raising will be taken into consideration.

For the administration and enforcement of the destructive insect and pest Act, $134,400.

Mr. VIEN: Would the minister tell us how the increase of $49,400 is made up? I do not know that the amount spent last year reduced the effects of the destructive insects and pests.

Mr. CRERAR: The increase is to provide for scouting work with a view of preventing the spread of the white pine blister, a pest that has threatened to destroy, to a very great degree, the white pine forests of Canada. A certain amount of investigation work has been carried on in conjunction with the United States Government in this respect, and it is designed to confine this pest to the localities in which it is at present found.

Mr. DECHENE: Has this pest established itself all over Canada, or merely in some parts of the eastern provinces? I am told that in our district balsam and spruce, and especially the young trees, have been attacked by some insect pest?

Mr. CRERAR: The pest alluded to is found in southern Ontario and in Quebec mainly south of the St. Lawrence river. Those are the localities in Canada where it is chiefly found. So far it is not known in Western Canada.

Mr. DECHENE: There are a great many places in the counties of Montmagny and Bellechasse where young trees have been attacked by some pest.

Mr. CRERAR: Pine trees?

Mr. DECHENE: Balsam especially and young spruce.

Mr. CRERAR: The white pine blister does not affect the spruce or balsam.

Mr. DECHENE: In the localities to which I refer balsam and spruce, especially the young trees, have been attacked by a blister.

Mr. CRERAR: It must have been something other than the white pine blister. I am informed that this particular pest affects only the white pine.

For the development of the dairying industries, and the improvement of transportation, sale and trade in food and other agricultural products, $155,000.

Mr. ROBB: As the Government is desirous of passing some resolutions before we adjourn I think the minister might report progress, because this item is an important one and is going to cause some debate.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would it be agreeable to pass a few more items, leaving one, with the understanding that there can be a general discussion upon it?

Mr. ROBB: The hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Kay) had something which he wished to discuss, but he seems to have left the Chamber. In the meantime perhaps this would be a fitting occasion for the minister to make a statement in regard to the dairy industry. There is very little use in spending a lot of money to promote the dairy industry, if the Government is going to pursue the same policy next year that it did during the present year, and that is withholding the feed supplies that are required in Eastern Canada. I have already drawn the minister's attention this session to the fact that the Canada Food Board, of which he is the chairman I understand, after fixing the price of bran and shorts at a very low figure, put in force regulations prohibiting the shipment of these feed stuffs to Eastern Canada. While we cannot do anything to repair the damage that was done last year, I think it is proper for the minister to make a statement as to what policy will be pursued next year.

Mr. CRERAR: The feed situation for livestock throughout Canada during the past winter was an exceptionally hard one. We were in the position that, had transportation been available, an abundance of corn could have been secured from the United States, and there would have been no hardship to any feeders in Eastern Canada, or, for that matter in Western Canada. The regulations that the hon. gentleman has referred to, which prevented for a considerable length of time the shipment of bran and shorts from the manufacturers in Western Canada to Eastern Canada was passed for two reasons; there was a severe shortage of feed in Western Canada and the farmers there who were short of feed, as their brother farmers in the East were short of feed, desired that they should be given the preference on bran and shorts manufactured in the West; and there was also the necessity of utilizing every possible freight car to carry wheat to the seaboard for overseas. The situation in Great Britain, France and Italy with respect to their wheat supplies, was serious throughout the past winter, as the hon. gentleman is perhaps aware, and the transportation facilities from Fort William east were taxed to their utmost to carry to the seaboard the wheat that in ordinary years would have remained in storage in Fort William until the opening of navigation. I appreciate very fully the seriousness of the situation that existed last winter and also the Department of Agriculture did what it could in the matter. As hon. gentlemen are perhaps aware—some of them at any rate—the department purchased large supplies of oilcake in New York and distributed some five or six thousand tons to the cattle feeders in Quebec, Ontario and the Maritime Provinces. The shipment of screenings from the Fort William elevators to the United States was prohibited, and the material in those screenings that was fit for animal feed retained in Canada. Had cars been available we could have secured thousands of cars of corn from the United States. However, owing to the transportation tie-up it was impossible to get them and the condition resulted that my hon. friend has referred to.

Mr. ROBB: The minister has dodged the real issue. What we require now is a statement from the minister as to the Government's policy for next year.

Mr. CRERAR: The policy of the department for next year will be the same as it has been for the past year—to endeavour to supply feed, if there is a lack of feed. In respect of the particular prohibition of the shipment of bran and shorts from Western Canada to Eastern Canada to which my hon. friend takes exception I do not see any reason why that prohibition should be imposed in the coming year unless the crop of coarse grains in Western Canada this season should be another failure, in which case, of course, it may be necessary to retain it. But I will see to it, as far as I am able to do so, that the condition that my hon. friend takes exception to shall not occur again.

Mr. ROBB: I want to follow the subject a little further, because the minister has not made a very satisfactory explanation to my mind. As to his statement that a shortage of cars prevented shipments from the West to the East, that will not go. The western farmer really, in his selfishness, kept that bran and shorts himself and bulled up the price of the oats and barley which the eastern farmer was compelled to buy. That was the outcome of it all. The western farmers kept the low-priced feed for themselves and an embargo was placed on bran and shorts by Mr. J. D. McGregor, of the Food Control Board, who himself is a large cattle owner. That prohibition absolutely debarred the western millers from shipping carloads of bran and shorts to the eastern dealers.

But there were lots of cars to ship oats and barley East. The western farmer kept this cheap mill feed. They fixed the price down low. If this policy is repeated the result will be that the western flour mills will be compelled to shut down, because the men in the East will not buy flour to keep the mills running unless they can get the equivalent feed. The result will be to cripple the industry of Western Canada. But leaving that altogether, I come to another issue that the minister raised. He has told us that they were providing screenings or the scalpings of the elevators, the weed seeds for eastern dairymen. This was a complete change of policy on the part of the Government experts of Canada. We have just passed Estimates to-night to provide salaries for our agricultural experts, the men who are giving advice to the farmers. No later than December, 1916, the minister's own department put out this circular to the farmers of Canada. The complaint had been made that the millers of Canada were mixing their screenings or scalpings in their feed, and it was having a very detrimental effect upon the animals using it. I will read this part of the circular, dated December, 1916, entitled "Memorandum re Weed Seeds in Mill Feeds":

> This is to advise you that a considerable number of samples of mill feeds and ground feeding stuffs are received from feeders, together with the usual statements that as a result of feeding them their cattle, hogs or poultry, and occasionally horses, are sick. In a few instances some animals are reported to have died.
> The investigations that have been made cover a period of several years, and provide an accumulation of evidence that would seem to establish beyond reasonable doubt that the fine weed seeds, particularly of worm-seed and other mustards, when contained in mill feeds or other ground feeding stuffs even in relatively small quantities, are unwholesome and frequently seriously injurious to the health of stock.

And this is the stuff that the minister was putting out, the scalpings from these elevators, which the department objected to the millers putting into the mill feed, which it claimed was injurious to live stock.

Mr. CRERAR: I think my hon. friend is under a slight misapprehension. The warning that was contained in the circular he has just read was undoubtedly well founded. But I wish to point out to him that at that time the general run of screenings from the elevators were shipped in bulk and ground in bulk. During the past year these screenings have been recleaned in the terminal elevators, and the black seeds, etc., referred to in the circular were extracted, and the resulting product, which was termed re-cleaned screenings, was the product upon which the prohibition of export to the United States was placed, and which was retained at home for feeding purposes. Since the opening of navigation, cargoes of the refuse screenings, these black seeds the circular in question takes exception to, have been shipped out to the United States. These re-cleaned screenings were shipped from Fort William under the supervision of the inspection department, and the standard sample that they were inspected to, was carefully selected by the officials of the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa, and did not contain weed seeds that would be detrimental to the stock using them.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: There was a circular delivered, I dare say, to most of the members of the House to-day from some one connected with this screening business in Fort William, claiming that the elevators were violating the Inspection of Grain law and were exporting screenings in a very large degree, millions of bushels in fact, from the elevators. Does the minister know anything about that?

Mr. CRERAR: The point is scarcely relevant to the item under discussion, but I will give the information. All our Western grain, when it is moving down to the terminal lake ports, is inspected in Winnipeg, and the Government inspector places upon it the dockage. When it enters the terminal elevators, it is the business of the operator to clean it to the standard set by the inspector. That means that a large volume of screenings from the grain is accumulated in the elevators. It has been the custom and the practice in previous years to ship these screenings to Duluth and other United States points. They had a market there which more readily absorbed that class of feed than our market in Canada. However, as I pointed out to the hon. member for Huntingdon, the regulations were enforced last autumn whereby these screenings had to be re-cleaned in the Fort William and the Port Arthur elevators, and the portion taken from them fit for animal food was retained in Canada.

Mr. ROBB: Will the minister say if there was a price fixed?

Mr. CRERAR: There was a price fixed of $35 per ton at the Fort William elevators.

Mr. McMASTER: I gather from the minister's reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) that there were possible conditions under which he would suggest that mill feed would not be shipped to Eastern Canada. I must take exception to that. Canada is one unit, and he is Minister of Agriculture for the whole country. And once the price is fixed, or even if no price is fixed, on mill products, then all parts of the country must get equal treatment, as one danger of fixing prices is that after you fix a price, and there is not enough to go around, you must take upon yourselves to make an arbitrary distribution. That is one danger in fixing prices. But I would take very strong issue with the minister if he will say that he is going to favour any one part of the country at the expense of another. He will probably say that the western mills are grinding this stuff, and therefore the western farmers should be entitled to it because it is made out of their product. My hon. friend from Chateauguay-Huntingdon says that would be all right if the western farmer would eat the flour, but his appetite does not go that far. Perhaps it is a work of supererogation, a painting of the lily or gilding of refined gold, to remind my hon. friend that he is Minister of Agriculture for the whole of the Dominion of Canada, and he must have a Dominion-wide appreciation of his own powers and his own position.

Mr. CRERAR: I can quite assure the hon. gentleman that I shall endeavour not to forget the fact that I am Minister of Agriculture for the whole of Canada, and I hope I am fair enough to endeavour to avoid any discrimination in the exercise of the powers of the department, against any portion of Canada. Possibly a condition might arise where it would be necessary to ship feeding stuffs from Eastern Canada to Western Canada. But there will be no discrimination against any part of Canada. I stated quite frankly that I did not feel like giving a definite, absolute guarantee to the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon that there would be no restriction of the shipment of bran and shorts from Western to Eastern Canada. I do not know what the conditions will be next year. But I lay this down, that there will be no discrimination so far as the administration of the department is concerned.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Will the minister see that the grain laws are carried out to the end that those who are producing feeds at Fort William are not debarred from getting the screenings from the elevator? A circular which I have received points out that the elevator people are sending the screenings to the United States and refusing them to the people who are making mill feed.

Mr. KAY: A moment ago the minister said that the price of screenings had been fixed at $35 a ton, Fort William. The Food Board have fixed the price of bran at $24 a ton, Fort William. As a feeder, I would rather have one ton of bran than two tons of these weeds. The price of shorts was fixed at $35. On what basis were the prices of these feeds fixed?

Mr. CRERAR: There was really no fixation of price of screenings, beyond this: the terminal elevators at Fort William had the situation placed before them and were asked to turn their screenings in at $35 a ton. They agreed to do so. I cannot say what consideration entered into the fixing of the price of bran and shorts; that was done by the Food Controller prior to any association of the Food Board with the Department of Agriculture. My own view is that, in relation to the price of other feeds, the price of bran and shorts was too low.

Mr. ROBB: The minister says that he does not know what consideration entered into the fixing of the price of bran and shorts. I will tell him the story as given to me by a man who was on the board which fixed the price. It was said: why do you want the price of this stuff fixed in bulk?—the trade is accustomed to buying it sacked, and the price should be fixed, to say the least, sacks included. Well, it was answered, the sacks cost $6 a ton and if you fix the price sacks included that will make it $6 higher. As we are on the eve of a general election, it would look better to fix the price at $24. I suppose that the price of screenings was fixed after the election, so that the same considerations did not apply.

Mr. TOBIN: On April 18 I put a question to the Minister of Agriculture:

> In reference to the Auditor General's Report for the year ending March 31, 1917, volume 1, page A-72, C. N. Lyster, Kirkdale, Quebec, care of bulls and stallions, $1,947.08, freight, $104.10.

In this case almost $2,000 was paid to a man named Lyster for taking care of a few bulls and stallions. He received fourteen bulls in one car—of these five were shipped to other districts, leaving him nine —and five stallions, for the care of which this country paid him $2,000.

Mr. CRERAR: When did this take place?

Mr. TOBIN: Last year. This has been going on for one or two years. Why should this live stock be sent to any individual farmer? The men who are paid large sums to look after live stock in the various districts throughout the country should see that these animals are well taken care of. When the animals are sent from one district to another, they should be put in good condition. If they are not in good condition, why should they not be sent to some of the experimental farms to be put in good condition? Mr. McClary who is in charge of the farm at Lennoxville, is a proper farmer; there is no better man in Canada. He runs the farm on a business basis and his work is appreciated by the people of the Eastern Townships. Imagine paying a man $2,000 to take care of a few bulls and stallions. Is it the policy of the department to continue that waste of money in the future?

Mr. CRERAR: The transaction my hon. friend refers to took place before I became associated with the department and I have no personal knowledge of it. The policy is to run the department as efficiently and economically as possible and to give the service that it is intended to give. The suggestion of the hon. member that these sires be wintered, if necessary, at experimental farms is a good one and will be taken into consideration.

Mr. TOBIN: The head of the minister's department of live stock in the Eastern Townships is Mr. Girard, whose headquarters are at Sherbrooke. The matter to which I refer has been drawn to my attention by different farmers in that district. It is a disgrace that these breeding animals should be unloaded at various places in such bad condition.

Mr. KAY: The Government have been urging the farmers to increase the production of live stock, especially of cattle and pigs. A large number of expert agriculturists were sent out to hold meetings to urge the farmers to increase production, and with this end in view advertising was extensively carried on in the farm papers. In those advertisements and through the speakers at all the meetings, the promise was made that the Government would see to it that the farmers had feed in abundance at a low price.

Mr. ROBB: That was before the election.

Mr. KAY: Yes, but even since the election they have kept up that propaganda. I have here a sheet of advertisements under the headings: "Large supply of hog feed available," "Government co-operation," "bran and shorts," "United States corn." This is sent out by the Dominion of Canada, Department of Agriculture. The advertisement in connection with bran and shorts reads:

> By licensing the flour mills, the Government allows a profit of twenty-five cents a barrel on the flour only—the bran and shorts are to be sold at cost, which ensures the farmer getting his feed at a moderate price. Steps have also been taken to prevent the adulteration of bran and shorts.

We would all be very much interested to know what steps have been taken to prevent the adulteration of bran and shorts, because adulteration has been very extensively carried on during the last winter.

I know of cases where feed sold as bran and shorts has been fed to pigs and cows, and where a large number of them have died, and the post morten held by the veterinary has disclosed the fact that the feed has been responsible for the death. The advertisement on United States corn reads:

> The United States has the greatest corn crop in her history—more than 600,000,000 bushels in excess of 1916. The United States will have a large surplus for export which will be available to Canadian producers. . . . The licensing system will not likely be used in connection with the 1917 crop which will be on the market about the middle of December, but the United States Government will exercise some form of control which will prevent speculation. In the meantime, any one in Canada can import American corn for any legitimate purpose, such as feed, by obtaining a license. Application for license is made through the Canadian Food Controller.

I do not wish to read all these advertisements of which there is a full page, and I have several more of them. The whole drift of these advertisements and of the meetings that were held was to make the farmer believe he would get plenty of good feed at a reasonable price. The poor farmer believed that promise of the Government just as he believed the promise in regard to non-conscription of farmers, and he prepared to increase the number of brood sows and the production of pigs during this year. What happened? Until late this spring no corn came into this country from the United States, and what corn came in then was badly damaged by heating. I do not, of course, hold the Government responsible for that. As regards bran, shorts and middlings, we have been told for a very long time that the Allies require all the flour that we can supply; in fact, that we must curtail our consumption of flour in order to ship flour overseas. The Canada Food Board has even passed orders restricting the quantity of flour which may be eaten. It is very difficult to convince any farmer or any other man in Canada who knows the conditions that there is any shortage of flour in this country. Every dealer or farmer who wishes to buy a car of feed is obliged to purchase 150 to 200 bags of flour in the car. If I wished to buy a carload of mixed bran, shorts, middlings and mill feed, and I wrote to one of the large mills for a quotation, the reply I would get would be that I would have to take in that car 200 bags of flour. I have no use for those 200 bags of flour, neither has a dealer any use for so much flour. Not only from the point of view of the farmer or dealer who did not want the flour, but from the point of view of the example which such action gives to the people of Canada, it is difficult to convince any body of people that there is a shortage of flour and that the consumption of flour should be curtailed when the millers are forcing flour into the hands of farmers and dealers against their wishes. I hold here carload quotations from some of the larger mills. This letter is dated January 31, 1918:

> We can book at present a few mixed cars of flour and feed for February shipment. However, the great scarcity of feeds forces us to ask for flour to be included in the cars. Our cars are made up somewhat as follows:
> 150 bags flour.
> 100 bags bran.
> 100 bags "Bullrush" middlings.
> 100 bags white middlings.

This is another letter, dated January 14, 1918:

> We require 200 bags of flour per car.

That was from the Ogilvie Flour Mills Company, Limited. This is another letter, dated March 19, 1918:

> 200 bags Standard flour.
> 100 bags "Bullrush" middlings.
> 50 bags white middlings.
> 50 bags bran.

And then there are 200 bags of some of those patent feeds which are made up from sweepings and dust and ground weeds, cobwebs, ground straw and that sort of thing. The minister should take up with the Canada Food Board the absolute necessity of making the millers retain their flour for shipment overseas. I have had several conversations with the minister in regard to this matter, and he seems to be under the impression that the mills have ceased putting flour into these carloads of feed, but I assure him that is not the case.

Mr. CRERAR: Are the mills still making that a condition of their sales?

Mr. KAY: Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: Will the hon. member furnish me with the names of the mills?

Mr. KAY: I was speaking last week to a dealer who has en route now a car which contains 200 bags of flour. I have seen other letters, and I can furnish the minister with them, but the local dealer says: "I am not going to let you have this letter, because if I do so, and if it comes back to the mills that I have given their name to the minister, they will never again sell me any feed flour; I must have the feed and the farmers are willing to buy the feed at the prices I ask." The dealer is compelled to get rid of the flour as best he can.

I saw another letter from one large mill that my friend had written to asking why they forced flour on him that he did not want. The mill replied that they did not want to force flour on anybody. That is perfectly true in a way, but the mill went on to say in their letter, "If you take two hundred bags of flour in your car we will ship your car at once. If you cannot take two hundred we cannot ship your carload of feed at all. We have not enough feed, and we will send you a few tons of bran and shorts at local freight rates." The minister knows very well how that would run up the price of feed to the farmer.

There is another matter. The price of bran and shorts in bulk was fixed last fall at Fort William. The dealer was allowed to charge five cents a bag, I believe, over and above his cost if he sold out of the car. A great many of the dealers on account of the shortage of feed have asked very much higher prices than the fixed price. Very often the dealer did not buy direct from the miller, but from a jobber. Now the jobbers have been able to sell straight carloads of feed; how I do not know, because no dealer can buy a straight carload of feed from the mills. The jobbers, however seem to have been able to do it and to sell to the dealer. In every case they charge four or five dollars per ton more for a straight carload of bran, shorts and middlings than if a certain number of bags of flour were included. The jobber himself has charged more than the fixed price for bran and shorts, but the farmer could not complain against his local dealer, because he was in the position where he had to have the feed and could only get a ton here and a ton there at a time, and if he complained that the dealer charged too much the dealer would give him no more feed. The live stock industry has been very, very seriously affected by the slackness or incompetence of the Canada Food Board in dealing with the question of feed stuffs. The farmer who believed the propaganda put out by the Board of Agriculture last fall believed he would be able to buy feed at a fair price, and largely increased the number of his pigs and dairy animals generally. When winter came he found he had a great many more animals than he was accustomed to have, and more than he would have had if it had not been for this propaganda, and when he could not get the feed he required he was discouraged. His faith in the Government and in the Department of Agriculture, to which he looks for protection, has been rudely shaken and very justifiably so. It is almost incomprehensible why the department should have allowed this situation to continue for so long as it has.

I should like to take up for a moment the question of why so much bran and shorts and mill feed has been allowed to be exported from this country to the United States during the last year. I have tried by questions during this year to find out from the Minister of Agriculture how much bran and shorts have been exported to the United States. I asked if the exportation of bran, shorts and mill feed to the United States was allowed, and if so, how much had been exported during the last six months, and he gave me a list of a few thousand bags which had been exported to the West Indies and Newfoundland and never mentioned the exportation to the United States at all. I put a further question on the Order Paper asking for the exportation to the United States, and after it had been on the Order Paper for some days it was changed to an order for a return. A day or so ago I asked the Minister of Customs when I might expect a return to that order and he professed to know nothing about it, and the Minister of Agriculture seemed to be in the same position. However, since then an hon. friend on this side of the House has got the information, so I will not bother my hon. friend further in that respect. I find that from August, 1917, to February, 1918, both inclusive, the value of bran, shorts and mill feed exported from this country was $3,666,784, of which $3,512,945 was exported to the United States.

Mr. CURRIE: What is the item before the House?

The CHAIRMAN: Item No. 48, as follows:

For the development of the dairy industries, and the improvement of transportation, sale and trade in food and other agricultural products, $155,000.

Mr. KAY: It is very difficult for a farmer to understand why, when we are so short of feed in this country, this Government which had prohibited the exportation of feed without a license should have allowed such a vast amount of feed to be shipped to the United States.

Mr. CRERAR: What time was this feed shipped to the United States?

[Mr. Kay.]

Mr. KAY: I will give the figures by months: August, 1917, $959,806; September, $406,091; October, $594,068; November, $806,904; December, $624,733; January, 1918, $182,563; February, $92,619.

Mr. CRERAR: What classes of feed were included in that?

Mr. KAY: Bran, mill feed, etc.

Mr. CRERAR: From what source did my hon. friend get his information?

Mr. KAY: From the Customs Department. I will hand the statement to the minister. I do not like to take up the time of the committee—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. KAY: My hon. friends are not farmers or they would be very glad to support me in a plea for better treatment of the farmer by the Government of this country. Some of our friends on the other side of the House are farmers, and some profess to be farmers, but we all know they have not stood up in the House this session for the rights of the farmers, so I am not at all surprised to find them wearying a little because it is getting late. I think the whole question of the farming industry has received altogether too little consideration from the House during this session The agricultural industry is the backbone of the country. We have been told on the excellent authority of the Government that the farmer is doing as much to win the war as the man in the front line trenches. We have been urged to produce and still urged to produce. A great many of the ministers seem to think that all a farmer has to do is to put his seed in the ground in the spring and that the good Lord alone will harvest it for him. Would the minister give the committee some explanation of how this feed situation has become as bad as it is and some guarantee to the farmers that, during next winter at least, steps will be taken by the Government to control, not only the price of feed, but the millers, that flour, which is needed overseas, is not forced into the country at the expense of the farmers and that farmers will be assured a sufficient supply of feed in order to produce the beef and pork necessary to supply our Allies? The dairy industry, unless it receives some convincing assurance from the Government, will be very much curtailed during next winter.

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Chairman, I followed with quite a considerable degree of interest the remarks of the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Kay). As far as the lack of feed for live-stock during last winter is concerned, I repeat that it was all due to the difficulty of transportation. At the time the campaign for greater hog production in Canada was embarked upon last autumn it was the intention of the Government—and the Government and the Department of Agriculture endeavoured to live up to that intention—to supply feed, or to see that feed was supplied, to the farmers who undertook the production of these hogs. The United States last year had the largest corn crop in their history. The farmers in Indiana, Iowa, Ohio and certain other corn-producing states could not market their corn throughout the winter months for the lack of transportation. I want to assure my hon. friend that the importance of the matter did not escape the attention of the department at Ottawa. Early in January I brought one of the largest cash brokers in Chicago, a man whom I know personally as a perfectly reliable man, to discuss the whole situation with me in Ottawa and I endeavoured to make an arrangement with him whereby corn might be purchased and shipped into Canada at the least possible margin. The situation which resulted, in consequence of winter storms and the desperate tie up of transportation in the United States, made it practically impossible to move the stuff. I do not think the Department of Agriculture should be held responsible for weather conditions over which they had absolutely no control.

Mr. KAY: How was it that we could ship so much bran to the United States if the railways were tied up?

Mr. CRERAR: I would like a closer definition of the item of "mill feed" that is at the head of the return which the hon. gentleman has handed to me. I do know that since last December the exports of bran and shorts to the United States were strictly under license from the Canada Food Board.

Mr. KAY: Not before December.

Mr. CRERAR: I think it was in December the licenses were first issued.

Mr. KAY: I think it was in August.

Mr. CRERAR: Not under the Canada Food Board. Their licenses, I think, were first issued in December. The return from which the hon. gentleman quoted was an earlier return than that which he referred to last and which I think stated correctly the amount of bran and shorts which was permitted to leave Canada under license. However, the point is one upon which there seems to be some doubt, and I shall take means of verifying my information at the earliest possible moment, and I shall convey any information I may get to the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman has also complained about the difficulty the farmers had in securing bran and shorts from Canadian millers and of the prices that dealers were charging for the bran and shorts they purchased. I have just this to say, that the Canada Food Board has passed certain regulations governing the prices that shall be charged by dealers for these commodities. It is not primarily the business of the Canada Food Board to enforce these regulations. When a regulation is passed it becomes the law, and it is the duty of the local authorities, or any other authorities who may be charged with the enforcement of law, to see that it is carried out.

Mr. VIEN: Is there still an embargo on the shipment of bran and shorts from the West eastward?

Mr. CRERAR: That embargo has been removed. Reverting to the point I was discussing, if the Canada Food Board are to protect buyers of bran and shorts against exorbitant prices on the part of dealers, they must be supplied at least with the names of dealers who are charging these prices. My hon. friend made a statement that there is a reluctance on the part of farmers to supply that information for fear that they will have difficulty in buying from their local dealer later on. That is one of the difficulties that is inherent in the enforcement of such a law as we refer to, made and created for exceptional conditions. The position of the mills in shipping bran and shorts to customers and insisting that a flour sale shall accompany a bran and shorts sale is clearly against the regulations and instructions sent out by the Canada Food Board. I repeat that if my hon. friend will give me the name of the mill he has made reference to, I will see that the necessary steps are taken to correct the condition of which he complains and to prevent a repetition in the future. Unless the name of the offending mill owner is given it is pretty hard to see how anything can be done. I want to assure my hon. friend that I realize—and I hope he will give me credit for my good intentions in this respect—the very great importance of seeing that those who are engaged in our dairy industry are supplied with the feed that they require for their stock during the winter months. I hope the same conditions will not obtain next winter as did obtain during the past winter. We can reasonably expect that we shall not have such a severe winter, and with normal transportation conditions I think there will be very little difficulty in supplying the necessary feed. If we should have another severe winter and there should be an almost complete tie-up of transportation, those are difficulties of course that are very hard to overcome.

Mr. ROBB: I want to say a word or two further before the minister gets away from this item. How does he expect to answer the complaint of the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Kay) as regards the millers compelling any person who buys bran and shorts to take the flour also, when his own department issues different instructions prohibiting the miller from shipping a straight carload of bran and shorts? These are the facts. Does the minister want the evidence?

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is surely mistaken.

Mr. ROBB: I will give the minister the evidence and clear the matter up. Here is a letter from the Western Canada Flour Mills:

Mr. CRERAR: Of what date?

Mr. ROBB: The letter is dated February 5, 1918.

Mr. CRERAR: I think I stated a moment ago, if I might be permitted to speak again, that these definite instructions had been sent out to the mills subsequent to that date.

Mr. ROBB: Just recently, I know all about it, within the last two or three weeks after the western cattle dealers were able to send their cattle out to grass. The letter to which I have just referred contains this statement:

> Re the other cars of bran referred to, we are very sorry to have to advise you that it was impossible for us to get this past the Food Controller in the West at the present time. He absolutely prohibits the shipment east of straight carloads of bran or shorts or even straight cars of mixed bran and shorts.

This is a statement from a reliable concern, as the minister knows well. Here is an extract from another letter dated April 23, also from the Western Canada Flour Mills:

> As far as we can see at the present time there is no more chance of this bran being shipped than there was some months ago, as no straight cars of feed are allowed to be shipped from any of the western mills to Eastern Canada.

Mr. SEXSMITH: It does seem to me that the Food Control Board is making a failure in the policy of endeavouring to control prices, because as a result of that control prices are not going down, but getting higher. In my district as a result of the attempt on the part of the Food Control Board to fix the price of bran and shorts the millers mixed eighty per cent of barley with bran, and what was supposed to cost us from $40 to $45 a ton actually cost $60 to $65. That is what they have been doing all the time, and the Food Control Board sitting in Ottawa has been issuing orders and not seeing that they are carried out.

Mr. VIEN: While we are considering the development of the dairy industry, I would draw the minister's attention to the prevailing conditions in the province of Ontario and elsewhere throughout Canada in relation to the necessary help to carry on food production. The minister has probably taken cognizance of the first report of the Committee on Agriculture, in which it is stated that in the dairying counties of Ontario there is a great demand for experienced help, not only in the dairying industries, but also in the farming industry generally, And the great demand for farm help exists all over the country. The chairman of the Agricultural Committee, acting upon its instructions, wired the several Ministers of Agriculture in Halifax, Fredericton, Charlottetown, Quebec, Toronto, Winnipeg, Regina, Edmonton and Victoria, asking them to inform the Committee on Agriculture by wire of the number of men and women immediately needed on farms as much for seeding as for harvesting. He has received many telegrams which are embodied in the report to which I referred, and which I may be permitted to quote.

Mr. CURRIE: The report in question has been placed on the table of the House, and has been dealt with by motion. Once that is done, it is not competent for the hon. gentleman during the same session to bring forward the document and discuss it.

The CHAIRMAN: I have paid very special attention to what the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Vien) has been saying, keeping in view the point raised by the hon. member for Simcoe. If the report had been laid on the table of the House and disposed of, I would have had no hesitation whatever in ruling that the point of order was well taken. But I am informed by the deputy clerk that the report in question, although laid on the table of the House, has never been discussed and concurred in.

Mr. VIEN: That was my opinion, and I know the facts to be as stated by the chairman. The answers to the telegrams sent out by the Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture came abundantly from all sources. One of these telegrams came from Winnipeg. It is dated April, 1918, and is signed by J. H. Evans. This gentleman informed the Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture:

Immediate demand is for experienced farm labour. Impossible to estimate immediate needs owing to uncertainty of drain made on farm hands by conscription. Basing estimate on last year's experience require ten thousand additional help for harvest. Domestic help problematical. Tremendous demand for experienced domestics but not for women farm help.

From Yarmouth, N.S., under date April 29, 1918, came this telegram from Mr. Cumming:

Seeding just begun. Farmers will reduce their cultivated crops in accordance with labour shortage but for maximum production there should be at least four thousand men available.

From Fredericton, N.B., Mr. J. P. Tweeddale wired:

New Brunswick cannot spare any man who is a farmer or farm labourer, if increased production is expected. With these men in the country last year hundreds of tons of hay fields, of oats and potatoes, were not harvested on account of scarcity of labour. We had farmers exerting every effort and would have splendid result. New orders re conscription farmers paralyzed the whole movement and unless positive orders issued from Ottawa insuring farmers that they will not be taken they will not produce enough to feed city populations. Large delegation farmers here yesterday, delegation going to Ottawa.

Another telegram from Mr. Marshall, Alberta, states that if there is an average harvest between six and seven hundred men will be needed.

Another telegram came from the Deputy Minister of Agriculture of the province of Saskatchewan, which reads as follows:

Your wire re labour: demand for men well met at present but new regulations Military Service Act will take from five to seven thousand men consisting of farmers, farm labourers and farmers' sons, or from every fifteen or twenty farms in Saskatchewan, as men even approximately as useful for production are not available, the effect upon our wheat production with seeding only about half completed can be realized.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman is dealing with a report on wheat production. We are now on a dairying item. I do not think it is competent for him to continue to discuss that matter. We are getting along late at night, and want to get away.

Mr. VIEN: Before you rule, Mr. Chairman, may I be allowed to say that this report deals not only with the labour required for wheat production, but it particularly states that in the dairying counties of Ontario there is a great demand for experienced help.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman should confine his discussion to the dairying industry; he should not discuss the part of the report dealing with wheat.

Mr. VIEN: The dairying industry, as much as the wheat industry, is covered in the report. Not only that, but if I may be allowed, I will say that the item under discussion reads: " For the development of the dairying industries, and the improvement of transportation, sale and trade in food and other agricultural products." And it seems that the trade in agricultural products and food will be greatly hampered if the production of food is diminished.

Mr. CURRIE: Mr. Chairman, this is dragging that subject in by the tail. The fact is that the report has nothing to do with that at all. The hon. gentleman has read all there is about the dairying industry.

The CHAIRMAN: Would any other hon. gentleman like to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SEXSMITH: I think the point of order raised by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Currie) is not well taken. If you are discussing the dairy industry, surely you have a right to discuss the food given to the animals. Throughout the province of Ontario just recently we are feeding flour to our hogs. That is a fact, and I want to ask the minister this: it seems to me that this food board—

Mr. CURRIE: Order. The hon. gentleman knows that that is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I beg your pardon, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The item before the Committee for discussion is, as every one will admit, a very general item, indeed. It covers the development of the dairying industry and the improvement, transport, sale and trade in food and other agricultural products. The scope of the discussion upon such an item is necessarily very wide, and, so far, I would hesitate about ruling that my hon. friend from Lotbiniere is out of order. I may say that he is coming perilously near the danger line, and I would ask him to assist the Committee in disposing of the item as early as possible by remaining well within the limits of discussion.

Mr. VIEN: I will surely abide by your ruling, and even by your suggestion. I refer hon. gentlemen to this first report of the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture, with which hon. members generally are not familiar. I had considerable difficulty to secure a copy of it. It is not printed or distributed, but it is most interesting. You will find other telegrams than those I have already read, from Mr. Riddell, superintendent of Trades and Labour in Ontario.

Mr. CRERAR: I think he is in the Ontario Agriculture Department.

Mr. VIEN: And another from the private secretary of the Minister of Agriculture of British Columbia. There is another from the secretary of the Department of Agriculture in Quebec. These telegrams are all to the same effect, that there is a considerable shortage of men for the farming industry all over this country. They are unanimous; these telegrams truly depict the situation at a date as late as April 29. And the Chairman of the Committee, the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders) concludes his report by saying:

> The Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization desires to express to the Minister its opinion that his presence at its meetings would afford assistance and gratification to the Committee and suggests that its discussions might also be interesting and helpful to his department.
> The Committee also entertains the opinion that suggestions for legislation considered worthy of the department's attention, if submitted to the Committee, would stimulate interest in its work and offer valuable matter for assistance to the department.

And then it was moved by the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson), and seconded by the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Lang) and carried:

> That it is the opinion of the Committee on Agriculture that the Minister of Militia should be requested to order (a) that actual farmers who have been called up shall be given leave of absence—

Mr. CURRIE: I want to ask whether that is in order.

[The Chairman.]

The CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. gentleman state the point of order?

Mr. CURRIE: The point is that the Military Service Act has already been discussed in the House, and the hon. gentleman is starting to discuss that matter.

Mr. VIEN: I am not discussing that.

The CHAIRMAN: Has the hon. member for Lotbiniere anything to say on the point of order?

Mr. VIEN: Nothing, Mr. Chairman, except that I am concluding the report before I come to the discussion of the item now under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN: In connection with the point of order just raised by the hon. member for North Simcoe, I beg to say that I will permit the reading of the report passed by the Committee on Agriculture and which has not yet been concurred in by the House. I may add that any discussion which might possibly arise out of that report relating to the Military Service Act or the Order in Council concerning the Military Service Act, I would consider to be absolutely out of order.

Mr. VIEN: The concluding recommendation in the report is:

> That no actual farmers be required to report until all others in the class affected by the Order in Council of 20th April, 1918, have been put in service; such leave of absence and delay in reporting to be conditional upon their actual employment in farming.

I think, Sir, that another very important document was sent to the Government at a very late date, as late as last week, in which the conference of farmers, recently held in Ottawa, embodied its views. I understand that they have sent that report to His Excellency the Governor General and that it has been referred by him to the Privy Council.

What steps has the department taken with a view to securing for the farming industry the men who are so badly needed? The evidence of this need was given by these gentlemen who met in conference from all parts of Canada, and is set forth also in the document to which I refer, of which my hon. friend must surely have a copy. The Prime Minister told us the other day that the document was on its way and that he expected it to reach his office shortly.

Mr. CRERAR: There was a sufficient supply of farm help to attend to the seeding operations; at least, the reports show that that was the case in Western Canada. Any disturbance of farming operations resulting from the recent amendments to the Military Service Act will have to be looked after in the most effective way that can be devised. The registration that is to be made by the Canada Registration Board will afford a great deal of useful information in working this problem out.

Mr. VIEN: Has my hon. friend taken cognizance of the conclusions arrived at by the last conference of farmers held in Ottawa, as embodied in the report to which I referred a moment ago? Has any action since been taken?

Mr. CRERAR: The time intervening has been short. My hon. friend scarcely expects that a policy could be mapped out in so short a time.

Mr. VIEN: Then my hon. friend has received the document of which I speak? He intimates that he has taken cognizance of it.

Mr. CRERAR: I have not received it, but I was present and heard the representations made by the delegation of farmers which was here last week.

Mr. VIEN: Has my hon. friend taken any steps to carry out or give effect to the conclusions embodied in the first report of the standing committee on agriculture?

Mr. CRERAR: Any announcement in that respect would be made by the Prime Minister.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Is the Government really considering the matter?

Mr. VIEN: What is the policy of the Government with reference to the farming interests concerned? Has the Government modified its views respecting the enforcement of the recent Order in Council calling even the farmers to military service?

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend can hardly expect me to answer that question. Any announcement of policy would of necessity come from the Prime Minister.

Mr. SEXSMITH: The Food Control Board passed an order early in the winter fixing the price of bran and shorts and leading the farmers to believe that they or the Government were going to prevent the millers from profiteering. The millers were allowed a profit of twenty-five cents a barrel on flour and were to sell bran and shorts practically at cost. It has been brought to the attention of the department that the millers are mixing bran and shorts with barley and selling the product at $65 a ton. That should be stopped, because they are making a greater profit now than they did before the price was fixed. Another thing. The farmers' clubs were buying carloads of bran and shorts and they were compelled to take a certain percentage of flour in each car. I have it on good authority that in some districts the farmers actually fed that flour to their hogs; they had more than they wanted. Now, another order has been issued, providing that if a farmer who lives within five miles of a village has more than six weeks' supply of flour in store, he must take the surplus to the man from whom he bought it. In order to get the bran or feed, these farmers' clubs were obliged to buy more flour than they wanted and now they have it on their hands. Whom are they to send it back to?

Mr. CRERAR: It is true that an order did issue from the Food Board a few weeks ago requiring those who had certain supplies of flour to return the surplus to dealers from whom they had purchased it. Undoubtedly that order worked a hardship on the farmers. The matter was drawn to the attention of the Food Board and and amending order has been or will be sent out in the immediate future requiring that farmers shall simply report to the dealers the stocks of flour that they have on hand. The end in view, of course, is to gather up as much flour as possible for shipment overseas to meet the pressing need there until the new wheat crop goes on the market. As to the feeding of flour to the hogs, there is this peculiar position: flour, bran and shorts mixed together was the cheapest food that a farmer could feed his hogs, owing to the price of barley and oats The price of wheat was fixed by the Board of Grain Supervisors last fall on the basis of $2.21, Fort William, while the price of oats and barley was not fixed. It was urged on the board that the price of oats should also be fixed, but it was rather difficult for Canada to take action in that respect unless similar action was taken by the United States. Although in some cases flour has been fed to the hogs, I think the practice has been by no means widespread.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: The reason why the price of oats went above the price of flour and wheat was because of the demand for seed.

Mr KAY: The minister asks me to give him the names of some millers who were forcing flour out with their cars. I name two: the Lake of the Woods Milling Company, and the Ogilvie Milling Company.

Mr. VIEN: Can we expect very shortly a definition of the Government's policy as to the supply of men for the farming industry? The minister stated that he could not tell us what change would take place or if any change would take place.

Mr. CRERAR: I would suggest that the hon. member direct his question to the Prime Minister at the morning sitting.

Mr. PELLETIER: Suppose we take the case of a farmer who is the owner of a butter factory and who is making butter and cheese. This man is of military age—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The question is certainly not in order. I have given my ruling that all matters connected with the Military Service Act cannot be discussed here. I have perhaps allowed one or two questions which are more or less out of order, but I must draw the line somewhere.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean, the House reverted to Routine Proceedings in order that certain motions might be made.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS.

Hon. Mr. Rowell (President of the Council) presented the third and final report of the Special Committee on Pensions.

Hon. Mr. Rowell moved:

That the report of the Special Committee on Pensions, which has been presented to the House this 20th day of May, together with the proceedings and evidence appended thereto, be printed forthwith and that rule 74 in relation thereto be suspended.

Mr. McKENZIE: When will the report be taken into consideration by the House?

Mr. ROWELL: At the earliest opportunity. I should think that it will be taken up on Wednesday in view of other business being fixed for Tuesday.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Acting Minister of Finance): I desire to accelerate on the Order Paper, Government notices of motion in reference to zinc bounties, and to providing ways and means to retire certain members of the Civil Service, in regard to which motions I gave notice this morning. With the unanimous consent of the House, I beg to move:

That the order made this day, for consideration in Committee of the Whole to-morrow of the resolutions respecting Zinc Bounties and Civil Service Commission be rescinded and the said resolutions be considered in Committee of the Whole forthwith.

[Mr. Kay.]

Motion agreed to.

ZINC BOUNTIES.

On motion of Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Acting Minister of Finance), the House went into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the provisions of The Zinc Bounties Act, 1916, chapter twenty-seven of the Statutes of 1916, be renewed and continued in force until the thirty-first day of July, 1920.

Mr. VIEN: Will the minister explain the resolution?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Under an Act of Parliament passed in 1916, it was provided that a bounty of two cents a pound be paid upon zinc produced in Canada, when the price fell below the standard price of zinc on the London market, which is the world market for that product. It was, however, provided in that Act that no bounty should be paid during the war, and that the amount, when payable, should not exceed $400,000. In 1915, after the beginning of the war, it was considered very desirable in the national interest that Canada produce a high-grade zinc. It was at that time not produced in Canada, and I hardly think in the United States, and it was particularly desirable for use in munition works. The Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of British Columbia was induced by the Shell Committee, and later on by the Imperial Munitions Board, to incur very heavy expenditures on capital account in erecting a plant to produce this high-grade zinc, and altogether they spent $2,500,000. It was represented to them that they would receive from the British Government and from some of the other Allied powers orders continuously during the war, so as to enable them to amortize the expenditures they had made in erecting their plant in order to produce this high-grade zinc. They did produce a very considerable quantity, about 30,000 tons altogether, for which they received 15 cents per pound. The price previous to that, in the earlier part of the war, was 40 cents per pound, and Canada and Great Britain have had the advantage of that reduced price brought about by the entrance of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company into the market. By reason of Russia's withdrawal from the war and by reason of the entry of the United States into the war, all orders for high-grade zinc will cease on the 30th day of June in this year.

1 a.m.

When the Consolidated Smelting Company embarked upon the enterprise of producing high-grade zinc, the Government of the day recognized it was in the national interest to pay a bounty under certain conditions, and now that the company is unable to sell its product to any of the countries of the world now engaged in the war, they claim that this assistance should be rendered to them now and for two years to come. The total amount to be paid as bounties will not exceed $400,000, the amount stated in the Bill. Seventy-five per cent of the zinc consumed in Canada is what is known as low-grade zinc; that is not the technical term, but the metal is low grade. It is, however, just as useful to the greater part of the trade as the high-grade zinc, and generally sells at seven cents per pound. The Consolidated Mining & Smelting Company anticipate that gradually they will be able to reduce their costs of the high-grade ore from 9 cents, which is the cost at the present time, to 7 cents. If they reduce it to 8 cents we shall only have a bounty of one cent a pound to pay, representing the difference between the present London standard price and the price they get on this side of the water. The main purpose of the resolution and of the Bill will be to accelerate the time within which they shall receive payment of this bounty. Upon the second reading of the Bill I shall be pleased to give any further information that is desired.

Mr. McKENZIE: What has been paid already?

Mr. MACLEAN: Nothing whatever.

Mr. FIELDING: There is no enlargement of the original appropriation?

Mr. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. VIEN: Is it the high-grade or the low-grade zinc that costs 9 cents a pound?

Mr. MACLEAN: The high-grade zinc that is now produced electrolitically by the Consolidated Mining & Smelting Company. They have been able, by the erection of a modern system of production, to reduce their costs from 40 cents to 9 cents.

Mr. VIEN: How is it that if it costs 9 cents a pound to produce, it sells for 7 cents a pound?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is the low-grade metal, which is produced much more cheaply and which is not so desirable for munitions purposes

Mr. VIEN: The higher grade zinc must sell for a higher price.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is no market for it at the present time except the Canadian market, and the Canadian market largely consumes the low-grade metal.

Mr. VIEN: Could we not sell it to the United States?

Mr. A. K MACLEAN: There is no demand for it in the United States as they are producing the ore in very large quantities themselves, and largely by virtue of the financial credits being given by Great Britain to the United States, Great Britain is obtaining her requirements from the United States. It was expected that large contracts would be received from Russia, but now that she has withdrawn from the war the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company do not anticipate any further trade with her.

Mr. VIEN: A further study of the subject may change my opinion, but it appears to me that if there is such a small market for this product it is scarcely a commendable policy to spend $400,000 to encourage such an industry. We might spend the money on something more productive.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My hon. friend must remember that it was of vital importance to national interests at the time this industry was started to produce a high-grade zinc in Canada. The industry was started on the request in the first instance of the Shell Committee, and upon request later made by the British Government. It was then the Canadian Government intervened, and sought to extend aid to the company in producing this high-grade zinc. Subsequently an Act of Parliament was passed providing for this assistance, so we are almost in honour bound to stand by the contract made with this company. The maximum to be paid will be $400,000, but I hope the amount will not meet that figure.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I understand the promoters of this Bill are monopolists, and while I am not going to oppose this measure to-night I give notice to the minister that when the Bill comes up for second reading we shall have to investigate. I understand that the ordinary mine owners of British Columbia, while they may not be opposed to this and probably will benefit by it to a certain extent, want other considerations besides a bounty on zinc and lead. I would draw the minister's attention to the fact that the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company and the Trail Smelter are practically one and the same thing and that the Consolidated produces practically all the ore in the East Kootenay district. The yearly figures are as follows: Paradise, 1,089 tons; Sullivan (zinc), (this is the Consolidated), 30,579 tons; Daly Burton, 34 tons; Hidden Treasure, 2 tons; St. Eugene, 257 tons; Providence, 30 tons; Sullivan, 229 tons; St. Eugene, 214 tons. So the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company practically own the whole shooting match as far as East Kootenay is concerned, and you might say the same thing of the whole mining industry of British Columbia with the exception of Rossland. The Miners' Association have been asking the Government for a duty of five per cent on zinc and lead coming in from the United States, and also for a Royal Commission to investigate the whole question of the Trail Smelter and the mining industries of that section of British Columbia. I would ask the minister to consult with his colleagues and see if he cannot agree when the Bill comes up for second reading to give the ordinary miners, the proletariat, a Royal Commission to investigate this whole question to find out whether it is not one giant monopoly which is sucking the blood of the common people of British Columbia. Unfortunately, the people of British Columbia are not represented to-day in this House by a single Liberal member, and they take their political life in their hands to go against this hydra-headed monster of monopoly.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN thereupon moved to introduce Bill No. 109, to provide for the payment of bounties on zinc produced and zinc ores mined in Canada.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

RETIREMENT OF AGED AND INFIRM CIVIL SERVANTS.

House in Committee on the following proposed resolution.

That it is expedient to provide that the Civil Service Commission shall forthwith prepare and submit to the Governor in Council for approval the names of all officers, clerks and employees who, owing to advanced age, failing health, or lack of experience or ability, or other cause, are not capable of rendering or do not render efficient service to the State, and should, therefore, be retired from the public service; stating the conditions under which each such officer, clerk or employee should be retired, including the pecuniary provision, if any, that should, in the opinion of the Commission, be made for any such officer, clerk or employee, and in each case the date recommended for his retirement; and for the pecuniary provision to be made for any such officer, clerk or employee, and for the determination of the amount to be paid, the deductions therefrom and the method by which the amount of such deductions shall be paid; and that upon approval by the Governor in Council of the recommendations of the Commission, such officer, clerk or employee shall be retired upon the date fixed and conditions specified, and any moneys required for such pecuniary provisions may be paid out of any unappropriated moneys in the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.—Hon. A. K. Maclean, Mr. Boivin in the chair.

Hon. Mr. FIELDING: It is too late to discuss the resolution, but when it comes up at a later time I would be glad if the minister would give us some further information. I do not know whether or not the House realizes that under this resolution we will be establishing a superannuation system. Years ago, not very wisely—I think it was one of the mistakes of our own Government—the superannuation system was practically abolished. Here we are going to re-establish it, not by a direct Act of Parliament, but we are going to leave it to the Governor in Council. The reasons may be very strong, and I am not opposing it, but I am only asking the House to consider what it means, because Parliament ought to have a clear conception of the very large order which the Government is receiving in this form.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 110, respecting Aged and Infirm members of the public service.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

On the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean for the adjournment of the House:

Mr. LEMIEUX: What business will be taken up tomorrow?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Supply.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 1.20 a.m., Tuesday.

Tuesday, May 21, 1918.

The House met at Eleven o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

OFFICIALS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. Speaker informed the House that he had directed the Clerk of the House to lay upon the Table his recommendation and the Clerk's report in the matter of the appointment of Mr. Marcel Gabard to the position of Official Reporter of the Debates of the House of Commons, in place of Mr. Alphonse Desjardins, superannuated.

Mr. RICHARDSON: May I ask, Mr. Speaker, whether this appointment dates from the beginning of next session or dates from now? One man is superannuated and you appoint another in his place.

Mr. SPEAKER: The record speaks for itself. I think it is the 18th of May last.

VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS AND JOURNALS.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (North Simcoe) presented the first report of the special committee to consider the consolidation of the Votes and Proceedings and Journals of the House as follows:

The Special Committee appointed to consider and report upon the question of consolidating the Votes and Proceedings and the Journals of the House of Commons beg to report that they have not had time to give full consideration to the matter. They beg to recommend, therefore, that the details connected with the work of such consideration be worked out during the recess by the Chief Clerk of Journals, Votes and Proceedings and Orders; and that a special committee be appointed at the beginning of the next session to fully consider the matter.

COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS.

Mr. H. M. MOWAT (Parkdale) presented the second report of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders as follows:

The Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders beg leave to present the following as their second report:

Your committee has had under consideration the petition of William Louis Scott and others for an Act of incorporation under the name of the British Canadian Insurance Company—in Bill B2 of the Senate named United Canadian Insurance Company—and also the report, dated 18th May, 1918, of the examiner of Petitions for Private Bills thereon, stating that the notice of application had only been published for three consecutive weeks in the Canada Gazette instead of five consecutive weeks as required by Rule 91.

As your committee has informed itself on the matter and had explanations made and is of opinion that no interests either public or private, will be prejudicially affected by the shortage of notice in this case, it recommends that the notice, as published, be deemed sufficient.

Mr. MOWAT moved:

That the second report of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders be concurred in.

Mr. CLEMENTS: Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens), I beg to move:

That Bill No. 107 Letter B of the Senate intituled an Act to incorporate the British Canadian Insurance Company be placed on the Order Paper amongst private Bills for second reading this day.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion as submitted by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Clements) is not an amendment to the main motion. It would be quite competent for the House to accept the motion to concur in the report, and subsequently for the hon. member to ask the leave of the House to submit his motion. But, it is not properly an amendment to the main motion at all. The report points out that although the notice of a certain Bill had not been published for five weeks, no public interests had been prejudiced thereby, and recommends to the House that the notice, as published, be deemed sufficient.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the motion?

Mr. SPEAKER: The main motion is that the second report of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders be concurred in and the motion, as submitted by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, is that the Bill referred to in this report be placed on the Order Paper among private Bills for second reading this day. It is not an amendment at all. The motion might be moved with the concurrence of the House. Of course it is understood that either of these motions can only be submitted by the unanimous consent of the House. I now put the motion moved by Mr. Mowat that the second report of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders be concurred in. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (West Peterborough): Have the Government taken into consideration the very great desirability of having the House adjourn instead of proroguing, in order that the members may show their genuine enthusiasm at this critical time by manifesting a desire to respond to any necessity that may arise after the Premier's return from Great Britain?

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Unanimously carried.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I really cannot say that the matter has been under consideration at the present time, but I will give my best attention to what my hon. friend suggests.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I did not exactly catch the tenor of the desire of my hon. friend from Peterborough.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is for an adjournment instead of proroguing.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: On Friday?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Whenever it comes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: As soon as the business before us is closed, the House has to prorogue, and we will all be glad to do so. I call the attention of my right hon. friend to the fact that Friday, the 24th instant, is Victoria Day, and a statutory holiday. I want to know if my right hon. friend intends that the House shall sit that day.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If the House cannot prorogue before that day I think we should sit.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Of course the House has the power to do what it sees fit, but I should think the law ought to be observed in this case, as in all other cases. The 24th of May is a statutory holiday, and should be observed.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Parliament has sat before on that day, and I think on the first day of July, as well.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Prorogue to-morrow.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I should say that under the circumstances we might observe the day better by attending to our parliamentary duties here than by adjourning from Thursday to Saturday.

REPORT ON THE MILLING INDUSTRY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. F. NICKLE: Would the Minister of Labour tell us whether or not it is his intention to lay on the table of the House, before prorogation, the report in regard to the milling industry?

[Mr. Burnham.]

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): The report, as soon as complete, will be placed upon the table of the House, and I expect that will be before prorogation.

MARINE TRADES STRIKE IN MONTREAL.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have received a telegram from the secretary of the Montreal Marine Trades Federation in which it is stated:

> Four hundred workmen employed upon construction of wooden ships under Government contract by the Fraser Brace Co., Montreal, men ceased to work Wednesday fifteenth instant. Firm promised men's demand of fifty cents per hour, nine hours' work day with overtime rates (The Canadian Vickers Co., have already signed a similar agreement, everything working in harmony). Fraser Brace refuse to sign. Men not working. Kindly use your good offices in effecting honourable settlement.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS: I have no information on the subject but I will inquire into it to-day.

CORRECTION—MR. G. B. NICHOLSON.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I would ask the liberty of correcting a figure which appears in my speech on the railway situation as reported in Hansard of May 15 on page 2114. Speaking with reference to the conditions of Canadian railways, I am reported as saying that it will cost the Canadian Pacific Railway $100,000,000 to get its grades between Port Arthur and Sudbury equal to those of the Canadian Northern between the same points. I am not sure that it is Hansard that is in error, but the figure there given is incorrect whether I mentioned it or not. Instead of $100,000,000 it should be $10,000,000.

On the Orders of the Day:

FISHERMEN AND MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): I wish to draw the attention of the Government to a matter which is of great interest in the Maritime Provinces. I refer to the cases of hardship among the fishermen on account of the recent changes in the Military Service Act. I have had several messages, but will read this telegram as a sample:

> We see by papers that the Government is doing quite a lot for the farmers, such as granting them leave of absence to put in their crops, etc., but there is nothing about the fishermen who fitted out extensively this spring, getting large supplies from the creditors for which they expected to pay with fish. Now that spring fishing has just started, why are they not allowed time to have the benefit of the spring's catch? Then they will square up accounts and have better courage to face the enemy. Kindly bring this matter to the attention of the Government and let the public know what is being done.

(Signed) DAVID FISH CO., per Fred David.

This matter, of course, is a question for the Government, and I have no doubt that there are cases of great hardship. I simply desire to ask the Minister of Militia who I observe is not in his seat just now, to take this matter under consideration.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: As my hon. friend has observed the Minister of Militia is not able to be here just at the moment. However, I shall make it a point to direct his immediate attention to the representation which the hon. gentleman has placed before the Government, and I shall ask him to give the best consideration he can to what the hon. gentleman has said.

CIVIL PAY OF MEN OVERSEAS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. M. M. TWEEDIE (West Calgary): I beg to call the attention of the House to a telegram which I have just received:

Mass meeting dependents Civil Servants Calgary held to-day protest Order in Council April second deducting civil pay men overseas. Consider same breach of faith. Petitions being forwarded by mail asking continuation of pay or return of men. Your earnest reconsideration requested.

(Signed) MRS. SPEECHLY, Committee, Mrs. Jackson,
Mrs. Rackham.

Mr SPEAKER: The hon. member is exceeding his privilege in reading such a telegram on the Orders of the Day. I have allowed considerable latitude owing to the circumstances that there is not opportunity for placing questions on the Order Paper at the approaching end of the session, but, in any case, the hon. member should not submit arguments.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In regard to the matter referred to asked by my hon. friend, I may say that this subject has been under consideration and it is anticipated that the Government will be in a position to make an announcement to-day or to-morrow with regard to it.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

CALLING OUT OF RURAL DRAFTS.

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Lotbinière): I am sorry that the Minister of Militia is not in his seat, but as the session is drawing to a close I shall put the question I intended to address to him, and I would ask the Government to reply as soon as possible. A few days ago the Minister of Militia stated that he had issued instructions to registrars that the men newly called to the colours under the Order in Council of April twentieth were to be ordered up from the cities first, and that the rural men would be called up at a later date. I am now informed that the registrars in the various districts have sent out indiscriminately, these notices to report, and these orders are to be complied with on very short notice, many of the rural boys being required to report on Thursday of this week. I would ask the Government to inform the House whether orders were sent to registrars to discriminate between rural boys and city boys, and now that the condition I have mentioned is known to the Government whether it is the intention to see that the registrars properly carry out their instructions?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not quite sure whether the hon. gentleman refers to those called out under the order directing men from twenty to twenty-two years, both years included, to report for duty. The orders were sent out that those in urban centres should be called first, and that the rural population should be directed to report later. The Minister of Militia and Defence told me that in some instances these orders have been misunderstood. I shall direct his attention to what my hon. friend has represented just now.

Mr. VIEN: For the information of the Government I may say that I am referring to the men from twenty to twenty-two years. I am informed this morning that men in some of the rural districts of Ontario, as well as of Quebec, were ordered to report on Thursday of this week. I would suggest to the Government that they take immediate measures to countermand the orders issued to these men by the registrars, so that the rural population will not be unduly disturbed.

THE YUKON ELECTION.

CONSIDERATION OF THE REPORT FROM THE COMMITTEE.

On the order being called for the consideration of the third report of the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, covering the Yukon election:

Hon. Mr. H. GUTHRIE (Solicitor-General) moved: That the third report of the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections—Yukon election—be adopted.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright): Mr. Speaker, this question has now been for some time before the Committee on Privileges and Elections and before the House. I am going to ask the House to be indulgent with me if I refer once again to the matter. I want to say right away that we are not intending in any way to try to prevent soldiers overseas who have voted from having their votes counted. On the contrary, we want full justice done to the soldiers overseas who have voted regularly and legally, and to have their votes entered as legal votes. On the other hand, the House has a very important task before it to decide and that question is whether we wish, through any misplaced sentiment, to place upon the records a position taken by this House which will stultify it for all time to come, and which otherwise will go down in the parliamentary history of this country as an act which we might not have committed if we had exercised saner judgment. Will you allow me, Sir, to begin at the very beginning of this question and really see what occurred in connection with the Yukon election.

The Yukon election was considered in committee on the Military Voters' Act, and I want the House to bear well in mind from the start that the Yukon electors were not caught by any technicality of the law. When the question was considered by the committee which was discussing in 1917 that portion of the Dominion Elections Act known as the Military Voters' Act, full consideration was given to the Yukon territory. Full consideration, Sir, I say, was given to the possibility of bringing the Yukon territory within the provisions of the Military Voters' Act. Full consideration had been given to it by the Government before any mention was made in this House of the Yukon territory, and when the question was brought up in the House, as I will show in a few moments, the Minister of Justice, speaking in the name of the Government, used this language: that it was either a question of deferring all the elections in Canada by one month or deferring the Yukon election for one month; that if the Yukon election was to be brought in under the operation of the Military Voters' Act then some system would have to be devised and the Government thought that it was better to defer the Yukon election, taking it away from the operation of the Military Voters' Act, than to adopt some new provision of law which might prove impracticable. That is a point which it is well to consider at the very outset: that if the soldiers overseas, as respecting those who would have the right to vote in the Yukon territory, were disfranchised they were disfranchised by the Government, after full consideration by the Government, and before any provisions respecting them were brought before this House then sitting in committee upon the Military Voters' Act. And, by no act of this House were they disfranchised except upon the proposal of the Government, which I intend to prove.

The Dominion Elections Act provided for a general election to take place on December 17. On February 26 the Government passed an Order in Council directing the general returning officer to make a special return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. A period of forty days from the election day is allowed within which to enter a petition to contest the election or to show cause why the return was not made. The forty days allowed to the candidates in the Yukon election would expire on March 9, 1918; it must be admitted that their recourse to the courts would expire on that date. But by the action of the Government in passing the Order in Council of February 26, both candidates, Mr. Congdon and Dr. Thompson, were prevented from making any application to the court by way of petition or otherwise. All proceedings were stopped; the character of the general returning officer was thereby immediately changed. The passing of that Order in Council had this effect: first, it suspended the discharge by the general returning officer of functions devolving upon him by Act of Parliament; second, it divested the recounting authorities of power to pursue recount proceedings under the same Act; and, third, it divested the court of the jurisdiction conferred upon it by the same Act. These results were accomplished by the fact that the Order in Council expressly prohibited the general returning officer from making a return. No petition could be filed until such return had been made save a petition complaining of no return—to which the general returning officer would have the obvious answer that he was prohibited from making a return by the terms of the Order in Council. That is the second point that I want the House to bear in mind while following me in the story of the Yukon election.

Part IV of the Dominion Elections Act is the Military Voters Act, 1917. Section 6 reads:

At the expiration of the time for nominating candidates the returning officer for each electoral district shall inform the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery by telegraph, or other expeditious means, of the names, addresses and descriptions of the several candidates who have been nominated. The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall thereupon transmit by telegraph to every officer in command—

And so on. The section concludes:

Presiding officers shall cause placards containing this information to be posted upon the bulletin boards of each battalion in all camps where the same may be possible and shall use all other reasonably available means to bring such information to the knowledge of the military electors.

It was absolutely essential, therefore, that that notice be given; that placards be posted up showing where and when the vote was to take place. In the official notification which the Government did give to the soldiers overseas the placard contained these words: "The Yukon Election Deferred." What other sense could be taken from these words than that the soldiers were not to vote in the Yukon election at that time, because the election had been deferred?

I wish to draw the attention of the House to section 8, the next section which bears materially upon this subject. After reading this section and the debate which took place when it was adopted by the House, I do not see how any one can conscientiously assert that these votes are legal. Subsection 1 reads:

Polls shall be held in such camps or other places, in Canada or elsewhere, as shall be assigned to the charge of presiding officers for the purposes of this part. Those held without Canada shall be maintained open during such sufficient number of days and during such hours as military exigencies will permit, but so that no polling shall commence before the day following that of the nomination of candidates nor continue after eight o'clock in the evening of the day for holding the poll within Canada.

The Minister of Justice, who had a great deal to do with this Act, will not say that any vote taken before nomination day was a legal vote. Will hon. gentlemen say that votes cast in contravention of section 8, before nomination day, are legal votes and must be counted? Must the returning officer be ordered—no discretion is given to him by the report of the committee—to declare them legal? You are assuming no light obligation when you instruct him to declare the vote legal when you do not conscientiously believe that the vote is legal. This is not a party question; it is a question for the mature deliberation of the House of Commons. Upon each member of the House will rest the grave responsibility. if you take this action, of having ordered the returning officer to declare a vote legal —not according to his judgment, but according to your dictation—which by the very wording of the Act is declared to be illegal. Subsection 3 of the same section reads:

In Canada, and, where conditions make it reasonably possible, without Canada, the deputy presiding officer shall give public notice of the time and place of an intended poll, and, in cases of polls to be held without Canada, a special notice to any person whose appointment as a scrutineer or deputy scrutineer has been communicated to him.

The last subsection, which bears upon this and which I wish to comment upon, is subsection 5 of the same section:

In any case where, for any reason, unless the vote of a military elector is immediately taken, it is likely that he may not subsequently be able to vote, the deputy presiding officer may take such vote otherwise than at a formally held poll, but such votes shall be so taken in the presence of the deputy scrutineers, or failing either or both, of a military elector or two military electors, who shall, together with the deputy presiding officer, sign upon the envelope in which the ballot is inserted a certificate that the vote was taken under this subsection and the reasons which made it necessary.

Mark well that subsection. By that subsection those votes would not be counted, but the returning officer will not have any latitude. He will be ordered by this report to declare those votes legal, because you gentlemen have studied the legality of the question, and you declare that according to your conscience, those are legal votes, and the returning officer must in consequence declare them so.

Mr. MORPHY: Not being on the committee, I am not familiar with all the details. Were the votes cast for the Government, or for any one by name, or how?

Mr. DEVLIN: The votes were cast as follows. I am reading from page 24 of the special report of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. This is the report of the special returning officer:

Paris, France.

We, the undersigned, special returning officer and clerk, who have counted the ballots hereafter mentioned for the electoral district of Yukon, do hereby certify as follows:

(a) The number of votes cast for each party or candidate is as follows:

Name of Party.	No. of votes.
1. Government	85
2. Opposition	10
3. Labour	—
4. Independent	—

Names of candidates, A. Thompson, F. T. Congdon.

(b) The names of the respective candidates for whom votes cast for a party were counted are as follows.

They were allotted.

1. Government, Alfred Thompson.
2. Opposition, Frederick Tennyson Congdon.

To Alfred Thompson were given the 85 votes marked for the Government, and to F. T. Congdon the 10 votes marked for the Opposition, and 3 votes were spoiled ballots, making a total of 98 votes. But that was only a portion of the votes that were cast overseas for the Yukon Territory. It is now a question of dealing with all the votes cast, and not only with the ones referred to in this report of the special returning officer. I could, perhaps, give my hon. friend (Mr. Morphy) a fuller answer by reading the special return of the general returning officer, but I do not want to take up unnecessarily the time of the House.

The next subsection to which I wish to refer is section 12, subsection 5, which is material to the case in point and which will also answer the question of my hon. friend. It reads:

A vote for a party shall be counted as a vote for the candidate or candidates who has or have been recognized, in the manner hereinafter prescribed, as the candidate or candidates representing that party in the electoral district to which the vote has been applied. Such recognition shall be made in the case of the Government party by the Prime Minister, in the case of the Opposition party by the leader of the Opposition, and in the case of any Independent or Labour party by the recognized leader of such party.

Then follow these words:

Within five days after the day of nomination, the Prime Minister, the leader of the Opposition, and the recognized leader of any Independent or Labour party, shall severally notify the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery of the names of the candidates recognized by them, and such notification shall forthwith be published in the Canada Gazette and communicated to the Assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. If a military elector votes for a party, and there is no candidate recognized as aforesaid as representing that party, his ballot shall be rejected, and the reason for the rejection shall be written and signed by the special returning officer and his clerk on the back thereof.

His vote shall be rejected. On the fifth day after general nomination day in Canada there were no recognized candidates for the Yukon Territory, because the nomination took place only at the end of December and voting was to take place on the 28th of January.

Mr. MORPHY: Does the hon. member not distinguish between the case of the Yukon where the election was deferred and a case where there was no election at all?

[Mr. Devlin.]

You must surely give the franchise if an election is ever held.

Mr. DEVLIN: I think I shall make that clear to my hon. friend in a few moments when I refer to the debate that took place on section 8, with which I was dealing a moment ago. I want to call his attention to this fact, and he will find it on page 5 of the special report of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery:

On the 5th day of January, 1918, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery for Canada published in the Canada Gazette, pursuant to section 12, subsection 5—

The very section I read a minute ago.

—of Part IV of said Act official recognition of the candidate Alfred Thompson by the Government party, and of the candidate Frederick Tennyson Congdon by the Opposition party.

That proclamation, therefore, was given on the 5th day of January, 1918, in accordance with section 12, subsection 5, which says:

If a military elector votes for a party, and there is no candidate recognized as aforesaid as representing that party—

And there was none recognized until the 5th day of January.

—his ballot shall be rejected.

I simply quote that to show by the Act itself that it is not a question of disfranchising soldiers now. It is a question of finding out whether the soldiers who voted for either of the candidates in the Yukon election prior to the nominations there should or should not have their votes counted. My hon. friend will remember that some 15,000 soldiers' votes were set aside on this and the other side of the Atlantic during the last election. You may say that that was disfranchising soldiers, that these soldiers, whether their votes were illegal or not, should have had their votes counted, because by the spirit of the law no soldier was to be disfranchised, and that is the argument that has been adduced in this House in connection with this very matter.

Mr. BURNHAM: It was considered necessary that the soldiers' opinion should be expressed. It is admitted now that the soldiers' opinion has been expressed.

Mr. DEVLIN: No, because the Government, by their legislation, prevented the soldiers from expressing their opinion. I want my hon. friend to follow me particularly in what I am about to quote, because I think he will then better catch the point. When the Military Voters' Act was up for consideration in this House and the debate on the most important sections, Nos. 6, 7 and 8, took place, in reply to a question by Mr. Carvell:

"How can they do that? The voting is to commence the day after nomination."

the Hon. Mr. Doherty, Minister of Justice, said:

The provision is that the vote may begin the day after nomination, but the obligation is imposed upon every presiding officer who holds a poll to give these notices.

What notices? The notices I have just read to the House as contained in section 6. They were absolutely essential. The minister goes on:

Though the period in which voting can legally be done extends from the day after nomination until the polling day the requirements of the statute with regard to the giving of notice must be complied with.

Those very words, "the statute must be complied with," constitute the main principle which was laid down in the Ethier case that was tried some years ago. The Minister of Justice reiterates the principle that the Act must be complied with. He does not at the time consider whether the vote given before nomination should be counted; he brushes that aside and says that only between nomination day and voting day can the votes be legally given. Now apply that to the Yukon election. Nomination day was at the end of December and voting day at the end of January. It was a deferred election, and placards were out in the camps overseas that it was a deferred election. I want to lay special stress upon this, and I know my hon. friend (Mr. Burnham), a soldier himself, will appreciate it. Here we have notice given to the soldier that the election for the Yukon was deferred. Here is the opinion of the Minister of Justice that no voting before nomination day would be 12 noon. legal, except in the emergency cases which are referred to by the statute and have no concern with the present case. The minister goes on to say that not only would such voting be illegal, but that the notice must be complied with; that is an essential. If there is any doubt as to the statute itself there is no doubt as to the spirit of the legislation.

May I recall for a moment to my hon. friend from Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) the speech delivered in this House by the Prime Minister the other day, which speech he no doubt heard and has read very carefully since. My hon. friend will find that throughout that speech the Prime Minister, who is an excellent and able lawyer, knowing that he had a bad case to deal with from a legal standpoint, attacked the weak point in a strong case and fought against that point all the way through. What was the gist of his argument? It was that there was no machinery by which this question could be referred to two judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario. He said that he had listened to the speech of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), and agreed with the major portion of it, but he found fault because neither the report of the committee nor the amendment did suggest that the Governor in Council should take any action. The Prime Minister knows perfectly well, as does every other lawyer in this House, that under section 60 of the Supreme Court Act the Governor in Council may refer to the Supreme Court for interpretation or opinion any Act of Parliament whether federal or provincial. But the Prime Minister does not say that. He goes on constantly arguing that there was no provision by which reference could be made to two judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario. That was a clever argument. Let me call attention to what he finally says:

Well, if we are to have special legislation, was it not the duty of the committee on Privileges and Elections to suggest that to us and to prepare a draft of that necessary legislation and report it to the House? Instead of doing that, they have brought in a report which I repeat is in its terms both impracticable and ineffective.

He does not say that the question is not open to doubt. He does not say that the question of the legality of the votes is not a question for reference to the Supreme Court of Canada, but plays on the words " not contained in the motion and report of the committee" in a very clever way, and then sits down. He does not commit himself to the statement that this question is not one for interpretation or decision by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. BURNHAM: I would ask the hon. gentleman to bear in mind the fact that the old strictum jus interpretation has been done away with.

Mr. DEVLIN: A lot of old things have been done away with.

Mr. BURNHAM: And we are permitted to decide the case according to the principles of justice and right.

Mr. DEVLIN: And legality.

Mr. BURNHAM: We want to see justice done though the heavens fall. I admit that the hon. gentleman is presenting a very fine argument but why should we not leave this question to the House?

Mr. DEVLIN: I am very glad to hear the hon. gentleman make the statement that he made a moment ago. The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) when sections 6, 7, and 8 were under consideration by the House, asked a question in these terms:

> Before six o'clock I asked one question about section 7. I understand that under that section there will be no deferred election in Canada.

To which the hon. the Minister of Justice replied:

> I moved an amendment this afternoon to except the Yukon Territory where it will be impossible to hold the election because the election list has to be prepared after the issue of the writs. A period of forty days is allowed for it, and if we were to try to bring in the Yukon Territory we would find that it would be impracticable.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve goes on and then the Minister of Justice again answers:

> As we have four weeks between nomination and election day, I do not think there is any need for deferring the election in any place but the Yukon. If it were not for the long delay in preparing the list in the Yukon, that territory would be included also, but we are forced to make an exception of it.

Mark well that this discussion took place under the very sections of the Military Voters' Act which are up now for consideration in this House. Then the Minister of Justice makes this statement:

> We went into the provisions of the Act and it seemed fairly clear that, in view of the long interval between nomination and election, there would be no substantial difficulty anywhere except in the Yukon.

Mr. Oliver comes into the debate and the Minister of Justice again says:

> The four weeks between nomination and election would not be sufficient for the preparation of the list. It seemed to us that the balance of convenience was in favour of deferring the election in the Yukon rather than delaying the elections all through Canada or devising a new system for the holding of elections in the Yukon.

Mr. Oliver still persists and the Minister of Justice says finally:

> As I said, we decided it was more convenient to defer this election than to delay all the elections in Canada or to make new provisions for all of this procedure in the Yukon.

I want hon. gentlemen opposite to remember these words. The question before the House was the giving of votes to the soldiers overseas. It was found that every constituency in Canada could have its election on the same day, but the Government, after due consideration of the question, decided that it would not be practicable for the Yukon Territory and that they would have to devise some new system. Instead of devising a new system they simply deferred the election and gave notice to the soldiers overseas that the election was deferred and that nominations were to take place one month afterwards and voting one month after that.

I feel that I have taken up enough of the time of the House in discussing this question but I want to call the attention of the House before I sit down, to the words of a man who held a very high position in the councils of the Conservative party in Canada. We know that there is to-day no Conservative party, that there is only a Liberal party and a Unionist party. But there were at one time a Liberal party and a Conservative party and the gentleman to whom I refer was the head of the Conservative party and also a very eminent lawyer. That man was Sir John Thompson who held the respect of all classes of citizens of Canada. Here are the words which he used, words which have already been referred to by my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) in reference to this question:

> But as soon as the question has been decided as to the qualification of the person so returned, the conduct of the returning officer, or the number of votes which were received, the conduct of the candidates, and every other question connected with the election, or with the conduct of the returning officer, has been relegated to the judiciary, and the House has always declined to exercise its functions and its power to interfere.

Mr. Speaker, that law referred to by Sir John Thompson is the law to-day as my hon. friend from Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) has reminded us many old things have disappeared but there is one thing that neither he nor I, nor any member of this House, wants to see disappear and that is that right and justice shall prevail over every party consideration. When a citizen of Canada comes to this House and claims justice, whether that citizen be a soldier or a civilian, he is entitled, at the bar of the House, to all the fairness and justice that has ever prevailed in the traditions of this Parliament or of this country or in the traditions which we have received from Great Britain and to which we cling so fondly. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, I ask my Unionist friends how they think this question would be dealt with by the Conservative party and if the Conservative party would not decide, without a moment's hesitation, to deal with it as Sir John Thompson dealt with a similar question and just as the question was dealt with in the Baird-King election case to which reference was made by my hon. frend from Dorchester (Mr. Cannon). In resuming my seat let me say that I am not asking for favour, or pity for either candidate; I am asking for justice and justice alone. I am asking hon. members not to make this a party question, for it is not a party question. Both candidates were pledged to conscription, both candidates were pledged to the support of the Union party; one called himself a Liberal-Unionist, the other called himself a Conservative-Unionist. But must the line be drawn as closely as my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) speaking in this House upon the question the other day, would have it drawn—that the one perhaps was a stronger Unionist than the other, and for that reason the one rather than the other should be declared elected by this House, and that the rules of justice and right should not prevail? I know, Sir, something about human nature. I know something about mankind, I know something about my fellow man. I know how strong party feelings may be, and how strong they may run, but back of party feeling there is something in the soul of every man, if you can only reach it, which rises above party and above petty action, and to that element of the soul I appeal to-day in presenting the amendment which I am about to present. I appeal to that better feeling in man so that he may forget party and do justice. I appeal to hon. members to do justice to themselves and do justice to the claimants for justice before the bar of this House. But in doing justice, Sir, do not ask the General Returning Officer to do a thing, if hon. gentlemen in their very souls do not believe that what they are asking him to do is right. I beg to propose, Sir, seconded by Mr. McKenzie:

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be struck out, and the following substituted therefor: That the special return of the General Returning Officer in respect to the Yukon elections be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada by the Governor in Council for adjudication and final decision, and that such decision be reported to the House of Commons for such further action as the House may deem proper.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The recommendation contained in the third report of the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections is set forth in the following words:

That the votes purporting to have been cast, counted and applied under part IV of the Dominion Elections Act, as shown in the Special Return of the General Returning Officer are properly applicable to the respective candidates to whom they have been applied, and that said special return be re-committed to said General Returning Officer with a direction that he do forthwith openly proclaim and return as duly elected a candidate to represent the electoral district of the Yukon Territory pursuant to the provisions of section 14 of said Part of said Act.

The special return referred to in the recommendation which I have just read, at clause eleven does apply the soldiers' votes to the two candidates according as they have been cast for the Government, or for the Opposition, and the votes which were given for the individual candidates are applied likewise. When this matter came before the Committee on Privileges and Elections for hearing, it was objected by one of the candidates that the effect of the Order in Council, which was passed in February last, had been to destroy the right of filing a petition in the courts under the provisions of the Controverted Elections Act. One of the candidates objected that a candidate was now deprived of bringing any election irregularity to the notice of the courts, and that no matter how great had been the contravention of the law in regard to this election, the effect of the Order in Council was to prevent any relief against it all. It appears to me that there was a good deal of force in that particular contention, and I may tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I had expected there would have appeared upon the Order Paper to-day notice of a Bill which the Government intends to introduce dealing with that particular aspect of the case. Through some omission, the Bill in question does not appear on the Order Paper to-day, but it will be there to-morrow. This Bill will provide, in the first place, for the extension of the time for filing a petition under the Controverted Elections Act for a period of forty days after the general returning officer has made his return.

Mr. FIELDING: Will that Bill apply to this case?

Mr. GUTHRIE: If the hon. gentleman will just allow me. In the next place, the Act makes the general provisions of the Dominion Elections Act, and amendments thereto, and of the Military Voters' Act of 1917, apply to the Yukon, and provides also that the soldiers' votes cast in the last election shall be counted, notwithstanding the time at which they ware polled. The Bill follows in the last cause, in general, the principle adopted by the Committee on Privileges and Elections. So far as the question of the time of polling the soldiers' votes is concerned, the finding of the Committee on Privileges and Elections is not disturbed, but so far as any other election irregularities are concerned, either candidate will have the right to file a petition in the courts under the Controverted Elections Act, as heretofore.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Has the hon. gentleman a copy of the Bill under his hand?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, I have a copy of the Bill.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to read it?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The provisions of the Bill, which contains just two clauses, are:

1. Notwithstanding the provisions of section twelve of the Controverted Elections Act, the time for presenting a petition in respect of the election of a member of the House of Commons for the Electoral District of Yukon, held on the twenty-eighth day of January, one thousand nine hundred and eighteen, shall be extended for a period of forty days from the date of the return of the General Returning Officer made in respect of such election.

2. Notwithstanding anything contained in the Dominion Elections Act or any Act amending the same, or in the Military Voters Act, 1917, chapter thirty-four of the Statutes of 1917, the provisions of the said Acts in respect to fixing the time for polling the votes of military electors shall apply and extend to the Electoral Districts of Yukon; and the votes of the military electors polled at the last general election for a member to represent the said Electoral District in the House of Commons and marked either for the Government or for the Opposition or for an individual candidate shall be duly counted for and applied to the candidate who has been recognized as the candidate representing the Government or the Opposition, pursuant to section twelve of the Military Voters Act, 1917, or to an individual candidate, in accordance with the marking of the several ballots, nothwithstanding the date or dates upon which the said votes were polled.

That is the Bill which it is the intention of the Government to introduce to meet the objection raised by one of the candidates when the matter was before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and the objection raised by my hon. friend who has moved the amendment to the motion before the House.

As chairman of the committee, I took no part in the discussions before the committee. But I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate which took place in this House on a former occasion when the House referred back to the committee its second report with regard to this matter; and I have also listened to the remarks of my hon. friend who moved the amendment in this House this morning. I cannot come to the same conclusion upon this case as that at which my hon. friend has arrived, either in regard to the law or in regard to the facts as they present themselves to me. I do not find the difficulty which some hon. members seem to find in placing a proper construction upon the terms of the Dominion Election Act and of the Military Voters Act. In my judgment, there is nothing to render the votes cast by the military voters, cast between the 19th November and 15th December last, invalid. In my view they are legally cast, although I grant that there is room for some difference of opinion upon that point.

It has been stated and argued that a nomination of candidates is an essential to an election so far as the military voter is concerned; it has been referred to as a pre-requisite. To my mind this is not so. The Act does not contemplate anything of the kind. The Act provides that in certain cases military voters may vote before nomination day. It only applies that section to those who may be leaving Canada, but section 16 of the Military Voters Act certainly contemplates a military voter casting his vote before there is a candidate. It says:

In case any military electors shall, at the time of or subsequent to the issue of the writs for a general election, be under orders to leave Canada prior to the day for holding a poll within Canada, the Governor General in Council may make provision for the polling of their votes, in the manner by this Part provided, on a day prior to their departure, and may modify the provisions of this Part relating to time or procedure in so far as may be necessary to render such polling possible.

I put this case to the House, Mr. Speaker: the writs for the last general election were issued at the end of October; the day fixed as general nomination day throughout Canada was the 19th November. I take the case of military electors ordered to leave Canada before nomination day, say on the 15th November, when there were no candidates. It is after the issue of the writ, and at a time before polling day. Section 16 provides that these military electors shall be entitled to vote at that time. There are no candidates. For whom can they vote? They can only vote "for the Government" or "for the Opposition." No nomination has taken place. I think one may assume that, in regard to that particular class of voters who might be under orders to leave Canada, Parliament intended that they should have the right to express their opinion in a general way, irrespective entirely of the question of who was the candidate. Another thing I would point out, Mr. Speaker, which influences the matter: that there is only one period of time mentioned in the law at which military electors may vote. That is in section 8 of the Military Voters Act, which says in regard to the polls:

> Those held without Canada shall be maintained open during such sufficient number of days and during such hours as military exigencies will permit, but so that no polling shall commence before the day following that of the nomination of candidates nor continue after eight o'clock in the evening of the day for holding the poll within Canada.

That is the only period at which military voters may vote anywhere. Now the Military Voters Act gave to the military voter the right to vote. We gave him the right and provided but one time wherein he must cast his vote. Why should a military elector of the Yukon not vote within that prescribed period? It is the only time. We are driven to it. There is no other conclusion. If a man is entitled to vote he must be entitled to vote at the only time laid down by the law wherein he can cast his vote, and that is between the day fixed after the general nomination and the polling day throughout Canada.

Then, Mr. Speaker, let me call your attention also to the language of subsection (5) of section 8, which applies to immediate voting. This must have been in the contemplation of Parliament when this clause was enacted:

> In any case where, for any reason, unless the vote of a military elector is immediately taken, it is likely that he may not subsequently be able to vote, the Deputy Presiding Officer may take such vote otherwise than at a formally held poll, but such vote shall be so taken in the presence of the deputy scrutineers, or failing either or both, of a military elector or two military electors, who shall, together with the Deputy Presiding Officer, sign upon the envelope in which the ballot is inserted a certificate that the vote was taken under this subsection and the reasons which made it necessary.

Note the language, Mr. Speaker, 'In any case, where for any reason, unless the vote of a military elector is immediately taken, it is likely that he may not subsequently be able to vote." Surely that covers the case of these military electors in the Yukon.

Mr. McKENZIE: Why?

Mr. GUTHRIE: If they did not vote at the time prescribed their votes would not be taken.

Mr. ROSS: What does the word "immediate" mean?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Unless he voted between the 19th November and the 17th December it is likely that he cannot subsequently be able to vote—he would not have another opportunity. Surely Parliament contemplated, when it passed that section, that all military votes, no matter from what riding, were to be taken within those two dates. It is the only period specified in any of our Acts in which a military elector can vote. If we gave the Yukon military elector a vote at all, he must vote within that prescribed period, or we did not enfranchise him. Now, the men did vote within that period. If their vote is irregular, I submit it is cured and section 18 is the validating clause. It says:

> The validity of any election shall not be questioned on the ground of any omission or irregularity in connection with the administration of this Part which has not affected the result of the election, or on the ground that for any reason it was found impracticable to record or to secure the vote of any military elector or any votes whatever hereunder.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The section says "which has not affected the result of the election."

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is, the validity of the election shall not be questioned on the ground of any omission or irregularity, in the first place; and in the second place by reason that it was found impracticable to record or secure the vote of the military elector. First, if the votes were cast and there were irregularities—that would not invalidate the result. And, second, if military electors did not have an opportunity to vote that could not be held to invalidate an election. That section was put there to cure irregularities. And, I submit it is operative under the present circumstances. To my mind the matter is not doubtful, but so many other opinions have been stated in regard to it that I am willing to say that there are two opinions upon the question. Listening, as I did this morning, with great care to the speech of my hon. friend who moved the amendment, I think, even on his own speech there was every reason why his amendment should not be adopted by this House. According to my hon. friend, the question is a very technical one. His argument was a very refined one. But we cannot, upon a refinement of argument, or upon a technicality, wipe out over 300 soldiers' votes. We gave them the right to vote; we specified only one time at which they could vote. We gave them special facilities for voting. We employed a special form of ballot to get over the difficulty of who was or who was not a candidate, and to allow them to vote for a party or for a principle. Our Act was an enabling, not a restrictive Act, and, because it was an enabling Act, we are entitled to give it the most liberal interpretation. We should not give it the technical or narrow interpretation which my hon. friend would have us place upon it. He urges that this House is no place to interpret or to consider the effect of the language of our Act; that the matter should be referred to the court. There is this difference between the interpretation by Parliament of its own legislation and the interpretation by the court of the same legislation. Parliament can look to the intention of the House when it passed the Act, gathering that intention from what took place and from the real purport and meaning of the enactment. On the other hand, a court of law is bound to gather the intention from the exact language which is employed in the statute. One is a legal, technical interpretation; the other is a broad, general interpretation, going to the real intention of Parliament when the Act was passed. No one can come to any other conclusion than that it was the intention of the House in passing this law that the military electors of the Yukon should vote. We only prescribe one time at which they may vote; by process of exclusion you come to the result that they must vote at the only time specified. I do not know that this Parliament has on many occasions interpreted its own statutes; perhaps it has on some occasions. The Imperial House has frequently interpreted its own statutes, though I have not found any that it has interpreted in regard to elections. The Ontario Legislature certainly has done so. For many years we had in Ontario a Liberal administration which stood very high in the regard of the people of that province. In the year 1898, when we had a general election, petitions were lodged against a great many of the candidates in Ontario on the ground that certain constables and persons who had allowed their premises to be used as polling booths for a fee had voted at the edection whereas under the Act they were disqualified from voting. The disqualification of all constables and owners of polling booths would have affected the result in a great many constituencies. It was not the intention of the legislature to disqualify every constable from voting—but there was the question, laid before the courts in concrete form. The legislature of Ontario, at a special session in the summer of 1898, interpreted their own law, declaring the meaning of their Act to be that constables and proprietors of polling places were not disqualified, and that that was the intention of the House when the Act was passed. Of course, the precedent of the Ontario Legislature is not binding upon this House, but the reason for their Act then was good and the reason for our Act now is good. I do not entertain the difficulty that some hon. members seem to have in discussing this matter. It is my view that the court would uphold the soldiers' votes; that, on the strict meaning and interpretation of the statute, the votes in question were validly cast. But I do not think that we should submit such a question of doubt and technicality to the courts. Now that the Government is prepared to allow petitions under the Controverted Elections Act to be filed by either candidate in respect of every question except the single one as to the time at which the votes were cast, the one substantial objection urged by the candidates or by any one on their behalf before the committee or in the House has been removed. I think, therefore that the report of the committee should be concurred in.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the case presented by the member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) in support of his amendment is so full, comprehensive and complete that I shall not add one word to what he has said. To do so would be simply spoiling an absolutely good case which he has sustained and supported at every point. I shall direct my observations for a few moments to the speech just made by the Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie).

Let me ask him, in the first place, whether there is such a thing as dividing an election into two parts? Did part of an election ever take place in this country on one day and the other part on another? I submit that such a thing was never known and that such a thing was certainly not contemplated when we passed the War-time Elections Act last year. The member for Wright quoted the remarks made by the Minister of Justice (Hon. C. J. Doherty) in reply to questions put to him as to how the election in the Yukon would be conducted. If it was then in his mind or in the mind of the Government that special provisions would be made for the taking of the soldiers' votes for the Yukon, or that part of that vote would be taken at one time and the balance at a later date, he would have so expressed himself. But he said nothing of the kind. He said: "We are deferring the election." What did that mean? Simply that the election was put off; that no part of it was to take place at the time. No specious form of pleading or argument of the Solicitor General can change that. If it were stated that the election for the city of Ottawa had been deferred, that would mean that the election for that district was put off; that it was not to take place on the same day as the others; that it was to be conducted later on a day to be fixed and under certain machinery provided for the purpose. The Minister of Justice said that the Yukon election was to be deferred, that a certain day was to be named by Order in Council, as provided in the Act for nominations for that district. That was done. In compliance with the Act, nomination day was on December 31, and the polling day was twenty-eight days thereafter. That was the day on which all the vote, not part of the vote, was to be taken for the Yukon.

There was nothing in the world standing in the way to prevent the vote, whether on this side of the Atlantic or on the other, from being taken on the 28th of January, 1918. I submit to hon. gentlemen who are lawyers, to any men of common sense, that it is the practice that mere physical inconvenience does not stand in the way of the application of the law. It has always been British justice and the principle of the British courts that physical inconvenience does not stand in the way, or that if physical exertion or the expenditure of money will enable the parties to comply with the law, it must be complied with. There was no physical or other inconvenience whatever that stood in the way of the vote for the Yukon Territory being taken on the 28th of January in all parts of the country just as it was taken in the parts in which the vote was polled upon that day. Could it possibly have been in the mind of the Minister of Justice, when he was making those pronouncements in Parliament, that votes could be polled before nomination day, and that such votes could mean anything at all? That is not arguable, and I am not going to say another word about it. The Minister of Justice said that the Statute must be strictly complied with. That is his version of the law as he is reported on Hansard. The matter is not left to haphazard. It is not left to any construction that I may put upon his words. He said that the Statute must be strictly complied with; that the notices must be given; that selection must be made of the candidates for the Government and for the Opposition; that that must be done at the proper time, and that no voting can possibly take place until after the parties are nominated, or until after nomination day. That being the case, the legal period for voting—I care not what we do in this House—was between the 31st day of December, 1917, and the 28th day of January, 1918. I suppose a majority of this House can distort that to something else, but such action is entirely contrary to every principle of justice, and is not in conformity with the proper interpretation of the Statute. The legality or illegality of this election must stand or fall by the condition of the law on election day in the Yukon Territory. The law existed then in a certain way, and polling should have been held in a certain way according to the law. If it was not held according to the law as it existed on that day, the election is void and declaration to that effect should be made by this House and a new election held. The Bill which the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) says he is going to introduce is not a fair Bill at all; it is retroactive legislation. What is the use of saying to a man: You can go to the court if you like, but I am taking mighty good care to pass legislation that bars your rights and takes away the point of law you want to argue; I am going to tie the hands and shut the mouth of the judge before you go to the courts; I shall let you go there, but that is all you will have for your pains, because I am going to legislate you out of court. If there is any sense of justice in regard to this matter, let the Government send the case to be tried in accordance with the law as it stood on election day. Then we shall accept the situation at once and not another word will be said about the matter. Let the parties submit their claims and let the case be tried; let the judge declare on the whole facts and the law, and then we shall have no fault to find. But we find fault that the Government or the Governor in Council interfered where they should not interfere; that they exercised a jurisdiction which they did not possess to take this matter out of the hands of the returning officer. I take the responsibility of saying that they had no jurisdiction to pass that Order in Council; they had no jurisdiction to take the jurisdiction, which rested in the returning officer, out of his hands and drag it into this House. If they made that mistake, they should take the earliest opportunity of righting the matter and putting it where it was before, absolutely free as it was on the 26th of February last, and they should say to the returning officer: Use your own judgment and let the parties go to the courts and stand or fall as the courts will interpret the statute and the rights of the parties as they stood on that occasion. Nothing else will do full justice to the parties, and nothing else will receive the full approbation of the independent and right thinking people of this country.

At one o'clock the House rose.

The House resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. FIELDING: Mr. Speaker, this question was fairly well discussed at an earlier stage and perhaps there is not much that is new that can be now added. I have no desire to engage in any lengthy debate or delay the proceedings of the House at this stage, but there are a few thoughts to which I should like to give expression before we are called on to give our votes on this really important question. A few days ago the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) entered a mild but well justified protest against the manner in which the soldiers' services were being exploited from time to time by persons who are not more devoted to the soldiers' interests than are ordinary people. He said:

> When a man in this House wishes to draw applause he simply has to refer to something that has been done on the Western front by the Canadians.

He might have gone a little further. We are all familiar with that very old and well-worn story of the legal profession where an eminent counsel who was asked to advise on a certain case endorsed on the back of the brief: "No case. Abuse the plaintiff's attorney." The story is very old, but sometimes helps to illustrate a thought. We have had a lot of that already in this House and we are going to have more of it. If a man has a bad case, if his argument is without a leg to stand on, all he will have to do, according to this new idea of the best way to influence public opinion, will be to appeal to the glorious story of Vimy Ridge and Ypres. We have had a lot of that already this session, and shall probably have more of it.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It is not a bad thing.

Mr. FIELDING: Not in its place, certainly. Nothing is too good for the soldiers who have acquitted themselves with great honour, to the glory of Canada and the glory of the Empire. But there are men in this House and out of it who, when they have no case to present, are quite ready to resort to pointing to what the soldiers have done.

There are two views to this question; that which is called by some hon. members the equitable view, and then there is the strictly legal, or parliamentary, view. Now, where the case is so clear as respects our statute law, so clear as respects our parliamentary law, and so clear as respects all our parliamentary precedents, it seems to me that these should be the prevailing considerations, and that we should have less reason to consider what might be called the equities of the case, even if we were satisfied that they should exist. The great issue in this matter, the main question from which we should not get away, is the precedent which has been established by long experience in this House, and which is sustained by the highest authority, that matters of controverted elections should not be determined by a partisan committee or a partisan body in this House, but determined by the courts. That is the great question, and any attempt to get away from that should be resisted, and any evasion of it, any half-qualifications concerning it, are not consistent with the best rules of parliamentary life. I think that the equities alleged in this matter are largely matters of imagination; I do not think they have foundation. These difficulties have arisen through the operation of what is called the War-time Elections Act. I suppose there are some members of this House who have a veneration for that document, but I confess that I am not one of them. If I desired adequately to express my mind on that subject I am afraid I should find that the very moderate language which I always endeavour to employ in addressing this House would prove insufficient for the purpose, and I should be obliged to fall back upon some quotations from the very vigorous speeches in this House and out of it of my Liberal friends who are now sitting in the Cabinet. The War-time Elections Act is the cause of this trouble. We are told that we must put aside precedents, put aside the statute, and consider what is called fairness and equity towards the soldier. Now, I want to say that the soldiers did not vote for Doctor Thompson; I want to emphasize that very strongly. The Prime Minister did the voting for Doctor Thompson. We are not proposing to disfranchise the soldiers. The worst that can happen is that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister will be disfranchised in that particular matter. What is my warrant for that statement? What was the issue at the recent general election? It was not the record of the old Government, we all admit that; we were told the old Government had ceased to exist. It was not the record of the new Government that had just been formed, for they had had no chance to make a record. What, then, was the issue? Surely I will be justified by every hon. member of this House, and especially by those who like myself are called Liberals, when I say that the one great issue was the question of conscription and co-operation in the carrying on of the war. I will let the Prime Minister himself define the issue. I find that in discussing the War-time Elections Act my right hon. friend spoke as follows:

> What is to be the issue in this election? The issue in this election is to be upon Canada's part in the war, upon the necessity of sending reinforcements to our men overseas, who are holding there the first battle line of Canada. The question is as to maintaining Canada's effort.

I agree with that statement of the Prime Minister. He correctly described the issue as we all understand it. Now, according to all the information we have upon that issue, Doctor Thompson and Mr. Congdon stood on equal terms. They were both conscriptionists; there was a Liberal conscriptionist and a Conservative conscriptionist, but they both stood, in the words of the Prime Minister, for sending reinforcements to our men overseas; both stood for Canada carrying on the war. That being the case, we talk of fairness and equity! Why should the right hon. the Prime Minister in that case and under these circumstances cast the soldiers' votes in favour of the Conservative conscriptionist to the disadvantage of the Liberal conscriptionist? That is the whole situation. I claim that when the Prime Minister cast those votes, because he had the power to cast them under the Act, in favour of Doctor Thompson and not for Mr. Congdon, he was not dealing fairly as between the two candidates who on that great and paramount issue occupied a place of equality. Therefore I say that the soldiers did not vote for Doctor Thompson. The soldiers voted for conscription, and that vote might have just as well been applied in favour of Mr. Congdon as in favour of Doctor Thompson, and I therefore say that if these votes are not to be counted you do not disfranchise the soldiers; you only disfranchise the Prime Minister himself.

Mr. BURNHAM: Did Mr. Congdon state that he intended to support the Government which alone would have the power of carrying out conscription?

Mr. FIELDING: I have not discussed the matter with Mr. Congdon, but the statement has been made repeatedly in this House and I have never heard it contradicted, that he stood as a conscriptionist.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. FIELDING: Of course if hon. gentlemen say it is not true——

Mr. DAVIDSON: It is not true that Mr. Congdon was recognized and endorsed by the leader of the Opposition, and received, as a result of that recognition, the anti-conscription soldier vote?

Mr. FIELDING: Does my hon. friend say that Mr. Congdon sought to be recognized by the leader of the Opposition?

Mr. DAVIDSON: The right hon. gentleman of all men would not recognize a candidate who was not willing to be recognized.

Mr. FIELDING: As between the two candidates I can understand that the leader of the Opposition might have a preference. But we must get back to the essence of the question. Did Mr. Congdon stand for conscription or not? If he did not, if he was opposed to conscription, then my point is not well taken; but if it be true, as I am told, that he stood for conscription, if it be true, as stated by the Prime Minister, and I confirm his statement, that conscription was the issue and not the merits of Tom, Dick or Harry, if that be the true issue, and if my friend Mr. Congdon was in favour of conscription, I say that he was as much entitled to those votes as my friend Dr. Thompson was.

But, we are told that there is too much technicality in this matter. We are told that we ought to deal with the great equities. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice says with great earnestness that he is not satisfied that this law is not valid. I think I ought to quote his exact words:

> I am far from admitting that under a correct or reasonable interpretation of the statute those votes should not be counted.

The hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie) confirms that and goes farther. In the first place, he claims that the vote should go to Dr. Thompson, and more than that he claims that if there be any doubt under one section there is another section which cures all the evil. These are two eminent lawyers. I need not say that I have not the presumption as a layman to question their judgment. But, if the Minister of Justice believes that this is a valid law, and if the Solicitor General believes it is a valid law, why in the world are they so anxious to keep it away from the courts? If they have complete faith in the validity of the law, as they say they have, they should jump at the motion of my hon. friend from Wright (Mr. Devlin) and submit the matter to the courts.

But the Minister of Justice, speaking with regard to the various methods that might be adopted in dealing with this matter, says that it would be "the most futile of remedies to send the matter to a tribunal which will be bound down to the letter of the law." The letter of the law? The letter of the law is the law itself and, if there is any difference between the letter of the law and the spirit of the law, surely the courts of the country are the best tribunals to establish the difference. The letter of the law? We have 230 odd members sitting in this Parliament all of whom have to submit to the letter of the law. What harm will there be if one gentleman representing the Yukon shall submit to the letter of the law? The letter of the law denounced practically by the Minister of Justice! What are we coming to? I have heard the Socialists of England and members of other organizations in Hyde Park, London, on a Saturday afternoon, proclaiming to the people that no one should pay any attention to the law. In New York I have heard the soap-box orators on the corners of the streets calling upon the masses of the people to show their contempt for the letter of the law. I have heard Socialistic speakers in the city of Montreal preaching the same doctrine. But now you have the same doctrine preached by the man who sits, as Minister of Justice, at the fountain head of justice. The letter of the law? Mr. Bumble says "The law is a ass." Mr. Bumble goes farther and says "The law is a idiot." Let the Bumbles everywhere rejoice; they are in good company now. They will rejoice when they come to find their views are precisely the same as those of the Minister of Justice.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that I regard the main issue to be: Is this matter to be governed by our law and our custom? I am paying some little attention to these questions which have been raised in the debate because I do not want it to be said I have ignored them altogether. We are told about technicalities. To most minds all law is a bunch of technicalities, and if there is one law which, more than any other, is a bunch of technicalities, that is the election law. We are asked to take very generous views of these things. A young man comes into the poll to poll his vote on election day. Everybody knows him, he is a bright young fellow, one of the finest fellows in the town. He gives his name and residence and he is about to get a ballot when somebody says: "Hold on, young man, how old are you, are you twenty-one years of age?" "Yes, substantially." "What do you mean by substantially?" "I am not actually twenty-one to-day but I will be twenty-one to-morrow." That young man should get a ballot because he will be twenty-one before the election proceeding is all over. You are going to shut him out of that right on a mere technicality. Later in the afternoon another man comes in, out of breath, two minutes after the hour fixed for closing the poll. He asks for a ballot and he is told: "You are too late." "Why," he says, "I have a vote, my name is on the list and surely you are not going to deprive me of a vote because I am two minutes late?" He says "The train was late; my carriage broke down; my wife was sick." But he can not get the right to vote. These technicalities are such as to prevent him from getting a ballot. The whole election law abounds in technicalities. The extraordinary part of it is that while the rest of us are supposed to be governed by technicalities, in this case we are to turn to the broader view, to set aside all precedent, all law, all rule or custom of Parliament, adopt a new principle, and give the seat to a gentleman who has not been lawfully elected.

I have said before and I repeat that the principle to be followed in this case is the one which, I believe, has been established by the law and custom of Parliament for a very long time. The principle which has been laid down beyond all question is that, except as to the matter of the qualification of a candidate, Parliament will not intervene in the trial of a controverted election; we had dark days in the old times when Parliament did deal with that question. I am not going to allude to that. We have come to better days. We have moved forward since the time away back in the dark days of fifty years ago when elections were decided by partisan committees and a partisan House. The views of Sir John Thompson have been quoted during the course of this debate but they are of sufficient importance to justify me in quoting them again. They deal with the essential principle of the whole question. Sir John Thompson was speaking in the famous King-Baird case in 1887. If ever there was a case where the equities were on one side and possibly the law on the other that was such a case. Mr. King had been elected by a majority of the votes. The question was raised at the eleventh hour as to his deposit. The deposit was made in good time but the point was raised that the deposit had not been handed in by his agent but had been handed in by another person. Surely that was a case in which all the equities were in favour of Mr. King. If there ever was a case in which Parliament should have intervened it was that; but Sir John Thompson said there was no question in that case for Parliament to deal with; that it was to be determined by the law, custom, and precedent of Parliament, and that Parliament must be guided by these. I have been indulging the hope that the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) who is the guardian of the laws and precedents of Parliament, would see the wisdom of adopting the views expressed by Sir John Thompson, not only because they were the views of Sir John Thompson, although that in itself had merit, but because of the intrinsic merit of the argument itself. Sir John Thompson spoke as follows:

> Twenty years ago in the Imperial Parliament the gravity of questions connected with Parliamentary elections, and the necessity of having them adjudicated upon by an entirely impartial tribunal, led the Parliament of Great Britain to adopt an Act which relegated to the judiciary of the country the disposal of all questions connected with controverted elections. Upwards of ten years ago a similar statute was not only adopted by the Parliament of Canada, but adopted by a number of the Provincial Legislatures.

> Since the change which I have referred to, and by which Parliament has renounced its rights to deal with the matter of controverted elections, there has been fully recognized in the various discussions that have taken place in the House of Commons this principle,—that everything has been transferred to the judiciary in connection with controverted elections, excepting the one question of the qualification of persons who have been returned to Parliament. The House, therefore, is still seized of the right to decide whether the Writ has been obeyed by the election of a person who is fit and proper to sit in that House. But as soon as the question has been decided as to the qualification of the person so returned, the conduct of the Returning Officer, or the number of votes which were received, the conduct of the candidates and every other question connected with the election, with the conduct of the Returning Officer, has been relegated to the judiciary.

I think I was warranted in assuming from the hon. gentleman's remarks that he recognized the propriety of leaving the case to the courts.

The King-Baird case was the subject of very keen party strife in this House, but I think I am justified in saying that the principles of parliamentary law then laid down by Sir John Thompson were not questioned by anybody. I must say, Sir, that I think that is the principle that should guide us in this case. This ought not to be a party question. I was sorry when the matter was before the House on the last occasion to see evidences of partyism on one side or another. I found that some hon. gentlemen who had not been in the House at all during the day, who had not heard the debate and probably paid little or no attention to the matter, were suddenly inspired to come in on one side or the other and cast their votes. And if there was any doubt as to the party character of the movement, that doubt was removed when an hon. gentleman rose after the division and said, "I am paired with Mr. So-and-So," and another said, "I am paired with Mr. So-and-So," and so on to the extent of half a dozen gentlemen on either side. Surely, Mr. Speaker, in the light of the troubles of the past, in the light of the struggles that great men have made to place this question of controverted elections upon a sound basis—surely in the light of all that, we ought not to feel happy at the idea that we are undertaking to deal with this question from the point of view of party division.

I do think, Mr. Speaker, that somehow a great mistake has been made in this matter. We talk about fairness and fair-play. Speaking this week in Montreal, Lord Reading asked the question: "What is the fundamental principle which makes the Englishman admired everywhere? It is his fundamental love of justice and fair-play." That is true. Whether it be in the field of sport, or in the field of business, or in the trials of the battlefield, the appeal to the Englishman to show fair-play is always responded to. The stirring words of Newboldt "Play up, play up, and play the game," appeal to an Englishman. Mr. Congdon has played the game boldly and courageously.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FIELDING: He came before a committee of this House and said: "I believe I am lawfully elected, I believe I have a substantial majority of the electors of this constituency, I believe I am entitled to my seat in the House; but in view of questions that have been raised, if I am elected, I will resign and submit myself to the electors of the Yukon." That is fair-play. That is the kind of declaration of fair play which will appeal to the soldiers on the battlefield, if one may allude to them at all. That is the kind of declaration of fair play that is apt to meet the view of every man. "Ah," said the Minister of Justice, "that should not be; if you have another election the soldiers will not have their votes." Well, whose fault is that? There is an electoral vacancy to-day in the county of Glengarry, and we shall soon have, I presume, a by-election there. The soldiers from Glengarry that are overseas will not have votes. That must be right because it is the law that my hon. friend made, and if it is no great harm to disfranchise the Scotch electors of Glengarry who happen to be overseas, what harm could it be if we had an election in the Yukon and had to disfranchise the Yukon soldiers who are overseas? If my hon. and respected friend, the Minister of Justice were called to-morrow to his heavenly reward, there would be a vacancy in St. Ann's, Montreal, and the Irish soldiers from St. Ann's who are now over at the front would have no vote. That must be right, because the Minister of Justice made the law. Now if it would be no wrong to cut out the votes in a by-election of the Scotch electors of Glengarry, or the votes of the Irish electors of St. Ann's, what great wrong could it be if the votes of some of the Yukon electors overseas were also cut out? But I will go beyond that argument. If my hon. friend the Minister of Justice thinks that is not giving the soldiers a fair chance, I will make this suggestion: Let the Government take steps to order a new election. Let them give ample time, let them give time enough to have the soldiers in every part of Europe notified, and give them a chance to vote, not for the Government or the Opposition, but for the man. Let them vote for the man for whom they want to vote.

Let the Government take time; there is lots of time between now and the next session. Mr. Congdon has played the game fairly. He has offered to resign. Take his offer, accept the proposal, order a new election, and let the two men fight it out. Give time for the soldiers overseas to vote. Pass your special Act here and qualify them to cast their votes. Although you would not give votes to the Irishmen of St. Ann's and the Scotchmen of Glengarry, give votes to the Yukon men, and let us have fair play. That is the kind of fair play, that is the kind of spirit that will appeal to the nation.

My hon. friend, the Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie), has given us an intimation to-day of what the Government are going to do. What is it they are going to do? They are going to bring in an Act by which they will slam the door in Mr. Congdon's face, and then invite him to come in. That is the effect of what the Government proposes. Mr. Congdon was in possession of his rights as a petitioner at the close of the Yukon election some day towards the end of January last. If you do not want to give Mr. Congdon the seat, respect his rights as they stood at that time. Surely that is a fair and reasonable proposal. But if it be proposed now to pass a Bill which will practically bar the door to Mr. Congdon, and then invite him to come in, that is not fair play and that is not playing the game as it should be played.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, the subject that is now before the House was under discussion in virtually the same form and with virtually the same purpose some few days ago. At that time I had the honour of addressing the House, and in what I say this afternoon I shall add very little to the material presented then. What I shall say, though, shall have particular reference to the speech that has just fallen from the lips of the hon. member from Queen's and Shelburne (Mr. Fielding). The hon. gentleman was a member of this House for many years prior to 1911. Those of us who recall his performances in those days will have cause to regret that though his reputation as an impassioned orator may not have suffered by his deliverance to-day, we cannot remember and recognize the sound, logical debater in the speaker of this afternoon.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Other hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: I do not go so far as to say that the hon. gentleman's performance was shameful, in many respects it was creditable, but it was not a sound, logical deliverance, and it was not a fair deliverance. The hon. gentleman argues that it matters very little whether the soldiers of the Yukon are disfranchised or not, and he supports that by several allegations.

In the first place, it is well he argues that, because that is the issue, that and nothing more. If the course that the hon. member suggests, and which the amendment which we are now discussing proposes, is to be adopted, that course invites the possibility of the permanent, irrevocable disfranchisement of 325 soldiers of the Yukon territory. It is because it invites that possibility that I oppose that amendment and have opposed the principle from the beginning. I can assent to no proposal which in any way admits that possibility under any circumstances whatsoever. The hon. member says we have to do it because the law, even the technicalities of the law, say so. I do not know that the technicalities of the law say so. But I say this that whether it does or not the duty of Parliament is to see that it does not, even though the law must be changed. The hon. member says it matters very little, because both of these candidates were conscription candidates, and that was the issue; consequently, he says, the vote of the soldiers overseas in that Yukon election might just as honestly or fairly, no matter how they marked their ballots, be counted for Mr. Thompson or Mr. Congdon. I am surprised that the hon. member should argue that in the determination of the rights of the constituency, even of the candidates in the constituency, we should take into account the political view of these candidates. If we are to take that consideration into account, in the sense that because their political opinions were one on the main issue it did not matter how the soldiers votes went, then I am ready for him on that controversy. The hon. member may be right when he says that each of them, at some time or the other, supported conscription. But this I do know that one of them consistently supported conscription in principle and practice, and took the only course that could enforce conscription. The other, though he may have in theory supported it, took the course which would ultimately defeat conscription. Did he support the conscriptionist leader of a government? What is to be thought of the opinions of a candidate supporting conscription who takes the course that is destined to defeat the object he professes to have in view? Mr. Thompson is recognized by the leader of the Conscriptionist Government. Mr. Congdon is recognized by the leader of an anti-Conscriptionist Opposition. Does anybody in this House, in honour to his own mind, even dream for a minute that any of the 293 soldiers overseas who voted for the Government intended that their vote should be cast for a man who opposed the Conscriptionist Government, for the man who was recognized as the candidate of an anti-conscriptionist leader? Does any one for a moment dream that any one of these 293 men who voted for this Government would not have been outraged if his vote had been cast in favour of the candidate who opposed this Government and supported the leader who wanted this Government destroyed? Consequently, what is there in the contention that it did not matter how the soldiers' votes were cast? It mattered just as much how these soldiers' votes were cast as it did matter how the votes of the men at home were cast, and just as much as it mattered how the votes of the 300,000 soldiers were cast in the last election. Oh, but he tells us, "that is a technicality, a technicality that must stand; we cannot cure a technicality, no matter what the object to be gained is." I never heard that doctrine supported by a member of the standing of my hon. friend from Queen's-Shelburne before—that Parliament could not cure such a technicality if it did no injury in the process; that it could not cure any technicality of the law if by doing so it would prevent injustice. I never knew that Parliament's hands were tied like that. The hon. member himself has sat in this House and loosened the bands that tied Parliament in similar cases. Does he remember that not very many years ago, when he was a distinguished member of the Government of the day, a Bill was introduced in this House to declare elected a candidate whose seat was in peril by a technicality of the law? Does he remember that the member for West Huron at that time was declared elected by the returning officer, and that it was afterwards found that he was a guarantor on a bond for some post office liability, and consequently that the seat of the member for West Huron was in peril? Did the hon. member then get up and discuss the soapbox orators in the city of London and New York who dared to defy the majesty of the law, and those who suggested that Parliament should go back and cure that technicality and prevent the injustice that would be done to Mr. Lewis if he were to be unseated for that cause? No. He was the spokesman for the Government, the member of the Government who supported the Bill, and rightly supported the Bill, to cure the technicality and declare the member for West Huron elected. So, if only soapbox orators and Hyde Park declaimers are the men who are ready to cure technicalities in the law, where these technicalities do injustice, then my friend from Queen's-Shelburne must take his place with them, because that is where he stood at that time. He has made reference to the King-Baird case. I gather from his words that that case was something like this: A deposit was made by the candidate and some irregularity through a technicality occurred—I do not know the case, but I gather from the words of the hon. member that on account of this technicality the seat was imperilled and Parliament was asked to cure that technicality. Parliament refused. I do not know that Parliament was justified—I do not know the circumstances—but if the circumstance my hon. friend presents is the only one, I would say Parliament was not justified. There is this that distinguished the King-Baird case from the present case: If Mr. Baird was unseated through an irregular deposit, an appeal could be made to the electors, because that meant an appeal to the same electors who had voted before. But an appeal to the men of the Yukon does not mean an appeal to the same electors who voted before at all; it means an appeal to four-fifths of the electors and the disfranchisement of the other fifth, the most deserving of all. You cannot cure a technicality then by an appeal to the constituents of the Yukon.

Mr. FIELDING: Why not?

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend suggests that we should go to the constituency now. He knows that the soldiers' votes cannot be taken in a by-election, not one of them can be counted by the law as it stands. To get the vote of the soldiers now we should have to chase through all the countries at war, and even if we had only to go through France and Flanders alone would be to commit an outrage on those soldiers—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, my hon. friends opposite laugh—

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. BUREAU: It is laughable, too.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Their regard for the war is measured by their laughter.

Mr. McMASTER: I rise to a point of order. That is a gratuitous insult to every man in this House, and I ask the hon. minister—

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not so take the remark of the Minister of the Interior, but I would ask him to withdraw it if it was so meant.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I say, and I repeat, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Don't look so pale.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then I would state it, for the purpose of making a repetition—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER: I made the statement that I did not take the remark of the hon. the Minister of the Interior as an insult; that if I had, I would ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. McMASTER: May I say a word, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. McMASTER: I rise to a point of order. I ask your permission, Sir, to speak to the point of order. The minister said that the laughter which he elicited from this side in response to one of his remarks was the measure of our interest in the war.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER: It is applauded now from the other side. The inference was, Sir, that members sitting on your left did not take the same interest in the war as members sitting on your right. That is a gratuitous insult to every member on this side of the House, and I will not allow it to pass unchallenged.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the remark can be interpreted in that way, I should be the first to ask the minister to withdraw it. I feel called upon to ask him to say that no such meaning was conveyed by his remarks.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not question the interest in the war of any individual in this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I said calls for no apology and no withdrawal. I do not question the interest in the war of any hon. member. But there are ways of measuring interest in the war, and I do think that one who seriously suggests that our forces at the front should be disorganized to the extent of withdrawing 325 men from various points all over the fighting area in order to repeat the vote of the last election does not realize what the necessities of the nation are.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The one who says that does not seriously understand his responsibilities as a member of this House. It is all right for Mr. Congdon to say: I am ready to resign. Under ordinary circumstances that answer might be taken and it might be possible to cure the defect, as in the King-Baird case, by an appeal. But as the law stands to-day it is practically impossible to take the vote; that impossibility has been recognized by this House itself. Why was the War-time Elections Act made applicable only to a general election, and not to by-elections? Because it was a practical impossibility to take the soldiers' vote in a by-election, and it would be an injustice to our fighting forces, for all the purposes that would be served, to subject them to such disorganization as would result from the taking of the vote of the soldiers in a by-election. That was the decision of this House; why should it be reversed in a single case? In fact it cannot be reversed in a single case; consequently the offer of Mr. Congdon, supported by the member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) leads to the possibility of the permanent and irrevocable disfranchisement of 325 soldiers, if by any chance the court should find that under the strict and literal meaning of the Act the votes cast before nomination day in that special constituency were illegal. I do not say that it means that or that it does not, but I am not prepared as a member of this House to take the responsibility of committing to any court or any man the possibility of disfranchising 325 soldiers from the Yukon. I will not take into account the possibility of doing it, either directly or by a circuitous route —and that is all the difference there is between the two suggestions. You do it directly if you disfranchise them now and declare Mr. Congdon elected; you do it circuitously if you disfranchise them now, have a by-election and elect Mr. Congdon on the vote that votes for him and cast aside the vote that votes against him. There is no difference whatsoever in principle; it is only a difference of method. Because I am not ready, as a responsible member of Parliament, to take any course which permits of that possibility, I cannot support the amendment.

If in the ordinary sense this were to be a controverted election, certainly the court is the place to try the case, in so far as the courts can try it and do justice. A Bill is before the House, or will be, whereby the right of protest on all subjects that possibly could be in dispute in an ordinary controverted elections case will be restored. It appears that that was taken away by the commitment of this case to the committee on Privileges and Elections. It was not the intention to take that right away. The case was committed because Mr. Congdon raised a legal question, and this method was adopted of solving it. There was no intention to take away any right of protest. That right is restored and protest may be entered in any fair and proper case—namely, on any charge of fraud, or to decide whether any votes were fraudulently obtained or whether anything else was wrong in connection with the contest. Surely that is all that should be covered in any commitment to the courts. We should not commit to the courts—because it is the right of Parliament, not the right of the courts—the question of the permanent enfranchisement or disfranchisement of a considerable portion of the population of any constituency. It is right to safeguard that franchise and if there is no practical method of restoring it surely it is our duty to make good and valid the measure of franchise which those 325 men were able to exercise and did exercise.

The House divided on the proposed amendment of Mr. Devlin, which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. TURGEON: I was paired with the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Loggie). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. DOHERTY: I was paired with the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. CLEMENTS: I was paired with the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Molloy). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Unless the vote of an hon. member be challenged according to the rules, I doubt either the wisdom or the necessity of announcing pairs in the House, inasmuch as through an arrangement made by the whips, pairs are now recorded on Hansard.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, this question was discussed in the House last week, and it has been further discussed to-day. I do not rise for the purpose of repeating arguments which have already been adduced, but I intend to make a few remarks which I shall conclude by moving an amendment to the motion now before the Chair. Let me first draw the attention of the House to the wording of the Order in Council of February 26, 1918, which directed the General Returning Officer to abstain from proclaiming elected the candidate who might have appeared to him as having received a majority of the votes legally cast at that election, and which ordered him to file a special return which is now submitted to the House. Section 1 of the regulations made by virtue of that Order in Council reads:

4 p.m.

The lawful disposition of certain ballots purporting to have been polled under said Part IV of the said Dominion Elections Act having become a matter of difference, it is now with respect thereto provided that the special returning officers and their clerks shall comply with all the provisions of section 12, subsection 4, Part IV of the Dominion Elections Act, but that the General Returning Officer shall not declare any candidate to have been elected, to represent said Yukon Territory.

Therefore, there can be no discussion nor argument as to the causes or motives or raison d'être of the Order in Council. The difficulty was purely a legal one, it being stated that the matter of difference was the lawful disposition of certain ballots purporting to have been polled under Part IV of the said Dominion Elections Act. The House should remember this when dealing with this question. The Government accordingly by virtue of this Order in Council made regulation No. 3, which reads:

The General Returning Officer shall, with respect to the elections in said electoral districts of the Yukon Territory, and Nelson, make to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery a special return fully disclosing the conditions and showing the result of the polling and such return shall be put before the House of Commons for its consideration and for such action by it as may be deemed necessary or proper according to the circumstances.

What were the effects of that Order in Council? By virtue of sections 13 and 14 of the Military Voters' Act, the General Returning Officer was substituted for the returning officer for the electoral district of the Yukon for the purpose of proclaiming elected the candidate who, according to the provisions of the law, had obtained a majority of the votes legally cast at that election. The duty imposed upon him was imperative. That duty is prescribed by section 184 of the Dominion Elections Act, and sections 13 and 14 of the Military Voters' Act. Section 13 reads:

The general returning officer shall be substituted for him—

That means the returning officer for the constituency.

—and shall act in his place and stead as returning officer in respect of the said election.

Section 14 reads:

The General Returning Officer shall add the number of votes given for or applicable to the respective candidates in each electoral district, as disclosed by such statements, to the votes given for the candidates as shown by the certificate of the returning officer made pursuant to section 13 of this Part, and shall openly proclaim and shall return pursuant to the provisions of section 211 of Part III, as being duly elected a member or members to represent such electoral district in the Commons of Canada, the candidate or candidates found to have the greatest number of votes.

Therefore, the General Returning Officer has to exercise his own judgment in the matter. He has to apply the law. It was part of his duty to interpret the law. He had the right to take legal advice if he found that necessary; but he was the officer appointed and designated by statute to decide as to the validity or legality of the ballots which were disputed, and his decision could be challenged only by either candidate before the tribunals of the country. The Governor in Council intervened and prevented the course of the law from being followed. The effect of the Order in Council of February 26th was manifold. In the first place, it prevented a public officer from fulfilling a duty and accomplishing a task which was imposed upon him by a special statute of this Parliament. Secondly, it prevented the authorities entrusted by statute with recounting the votes when requested by one of the candidates to do so, from proceeding with such recount. In fact, Mr. Congdon, one of the candidates, applied for a recount, and sent to the General Returning Officer a telegram which will be found on page 23 of the special report of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and on page 24 is a copy of the telegram which was sent in answer by the General Returning Officer, and which reads:

Fred T. Congdon, K.C.,
Dawson, Yukon Territory.

Governor General in Council having by Order in Council directed special return of Yukon elections proceedings to Parliament as result your contention that Military Voters' Act does not apply to Yukon election must respectfully decline obedience to Justice Macauley's order as being made without jurisdiction.

(Sgd) W. F. O'Connor,
General Returning Officer.

In the third place, this Order in Council deprives the losing candidate of his right to protest the election, which right is guaranteed and provided for by statute. So the provisions of the law have been set aside, and the equal rights of both candidates under those legal provisions, and the still greater rights of the whole people of Canada in seeing that the election of each and every member of the House of Commons shall be made according to well established rules and principles, have been utterly disregarded as a result of the Order in Council of February 26. That Order in Council was and is illegal. The Governor in Council had no right to adopt it, he had no power to virtually annul the provisions of both a general and a special statute respecting elections in this country, simply for the purpose of electing a supporter of the Government. By what authority was that Order in Council passed? The authority is stated in express terms in the Order in Council itself, which reads as follows:

> His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State and with reference to Sections 89, 90 and 91 of Part III of the Dominion Elections Act and to Sections 7 and 8 of Part IV of the said Act and with respect to the deferred election of a member to represent in the House of Commons the Electoral District of the Yukon Territory, and to the postponed election of a member to represent in the House of Commons the Electoral District of Nelson, in the Province of Manitoba, is pleased under authority of Scetion 19 of Part IV of the Dominion Elections Act, and Section 6 of the War Measures Act, 1914, to make the following regulations and the same are hereby made and enacted accordingly:—

Sir, I contend that neither of those two statutes could empower the Governor in Council to pass that Order in Council. The War Measures Act was never enacted for the purpose of enabling the Government to tamper with the election laws of this country. It was enacted in order that in cases of emergency, when Parliament was not in session, the business of the war could be carried on, without summoning Parliament, for the benefit of Canada and her Allies. Now, was it necessary to the success of the Allied armies, was it necessary for the winning of the war, that a member for the electoral district of the Yukon should be elected as a supporter of the present Government, and that in order to accomplish this end the statutes and the laws of this country should be set aside? Section 19 of Part 4 of the Dominion Elections Act, which is the Military Voters' Act, reads:

> For the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this Part or supplying any deficiency therein, the Governor in Council may make such regulations, not inconsistent therewith, as may be deemed necessary.

There is nothing there which gives the Governor in Council power to make regulations that would supersede or prevent the operation of the statute as it was passed. First, only such regulations could be made as would give effect to the provisions of the statute, and in the second place, no regulations could be made that would be in any way inconsistent with the provisions of the statute.

I believe I have shown that the Order in Council not only is not consistent with the provisions of Part 4 of the Dominion Elections Act, but actually cancelled those provisions and made them null and void. Moreover, any regulations made under Section 19 of Part 4 could only be made before the election had actually taken place, and not after the election for the purpose of electing the candidate wno happened to be favoured by the Government. No wonder the Government felt this Order in Council could not be passed under the authority of section 19 of the Military Voters' Act, and therefore invoked the authority of the War Measures Act. But two wrongs do not make a right or, as we say in French, "Deux noirs ne font jamais un blanc." From the day that Order in Council was passed on February 26 up to the present time all things done in connection with the Yukon election have been done illegally, and I claim that this matter is illegally before the House to-day. The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) said last week when this question was before the House that we had no right to refer it to the Supreme Court by way of resolution. What right, I would ask, has this Parliament to elect by way of such a resolution as is now before the House a member of Parliament to represent the electoral district of the Yukon? What moral or legal right have we to set aside a statute? What right have we to let a partisan majority substitute itself for the courts of the country, and virtually to change the law by a mere resolution of the House, when that change moreover is retroactive in its effect? What right have we to declare by resolution that votes given at a time when there were no candidates nominated must be considered legal and valid? I believe that in view of the vote that has just been taken there is only one fair, just and legal way for us to act and that is to order a new election for the electoral district of the Yukon. I cannot see any serious objections to carrying out that proposal, which would be fair to all parties, and put both candidates on an equal footing. Of course, I foresaw the objection which was raised a few minutes ago, namely, "What are you going to do with the military voters? Do you want to disfranchise our brave boys at the front?" As my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) has said—perhaps I am going a little further than what he actually said, but the meaning is the same—every time our friends opposite have any illegal or doubtful expedient to propose they should shield themselves behind the gallantry of our Canadian soldiers. The Minister of the Interior has just sat down after playing that chord with all the art and science of a virtuoso, and everybody knows that he is a Paderewski in that line. I do not yield to any one in my desire to give the franchise to the brave boys of the Yukon. Let then vote at this new election. That should be easy enough. The name of every man who registered his vote for the Yukon district in the election last December is inscribed on the back of the envelope containing his ballot. There are lists of all the men who voted at this election and it would be an easy matter to organize the machinery for the purpose of enabling them to register their votes at a new election. When such a course was suggested before the committee it was said by the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) that the British authorities might object to the vote being taken. If it was possible in the month of December last to register the votes of 300,000 men, how is it impossible in the months of May or June to register the votes of 300 men?

Furthermore, this Parliament must have something to say in regard to the Canadian army. We must have some control of our own soldiers. If we have not we have been deceived in the grossest way. If our soldiers are simply a part of the British army, without any direction or control on our part, if Canada is not fighting in this war as a self-governing, autonomous country, then the Military Service Act and the principle of compulsion which it involves would constitute the extreme limit of serfdom.

I submit that a new election is nothing but fair to the soldiers from the Yukon because they have the same rights and privileges as those which were enjoyed by the soldiers of other constituencies. Those who want to treat the Yukon soldiers unfairly and to deprive them of the rights which we gave to their brother soldiers at the last election are not those who ask for a new election. Those who refuse to give them the privilege of knowing who the candidates are who solicit their votes, who compel them to vote blindly while the other soldiers are treated in a different way, are the ones who are depriving the soldiers of their rights. Mr. Congdon has been a resident of the Yukon for many years. He has occupied many public positions in that territory. He has represented that constituency in the House of Commons. Every soldier at the front, who has gone from the Yukon, knows Mr. Congdon. They all know his ability, his standing, his qualifications, his loyalty to their interests, to the interests of the constituency, to the interests of Canada and to the interests of the British Empire and they are entitled, they have the right, to know that Mr. Congdon is one of the candidates when they register their vote in an election in the Yukon Territory.

Some time ago the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) and the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) complained very bitterly because the list of candidates which was posted in certain military camps in England did not contain the names of two soldier candidates who were running for constituencies in the province of Ontario. They described that condition of things as most unfair. What do they say of a condition where no candidates have been nominated at the time the actual voting took place? I am really surprised that those gentlemen siding with the other side of the House when the vote was taken a few minutes ago. It must shock the sense of justice of some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to act as the Government require them to do in the present instance. It must shock their sense of justice to be a party to doing away with the statutes and the courts of justice for the purpose of giving a seat in this House to a supporter of the Government. It must shock their sense of justice to listen to the argument as it was put forward the other day, when the matter came before the House, and when an hon. gentleman said that he, himself, having benefited by the votes of soldiers, he could not do otherwise than vote in favour of another one profiting by the same vote. Another hon. gentleman undertook to question the Unionist principles of Mr. Congdon, saying that they were too elastic, too flexible, and that Mr. Thompson was a much safer man to elect as a supporter of the present Government. To those gentlemen on the other side of the House who still believe in Liberalism, who believe in justice and fair play, who believe in the equality of all citizens before the law, I can fairly appeal and ask their support for the amendment which I am going to move. The election of a member for the Yukon Territory by a partisan majority in this House is, under the circumstances, the quintessence of Toryism. I cannot believe that this temporary union with the Tories is sufficient to prevent some—I say some—hon. members opposite from looking at that matter in its true light. If it is, I can justly apply to them these words of Robert Burns:

> Or like the snowfall in the river,
> A moment white—then melts forever.

I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau):

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

The report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections be not concurred in, but that this House is of the opinion that the seat for the electoral district of the Yukon Territory is and should be declared and considered vacant, and that writs be issued for a new election in the said Yukon Territory, and that legislation should be at once adopted for the purpose of enabling the military voters who are entitled to vote in the said electoral district to register their votes at the said election.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say one or two words in regard to the motion which is just proposed by my hon. friend (Mr. E. Lapointe). The legislation which was passed at the last session, comprising both the War-time Elections Act and the Military Voters' Act, had regard to the right of the men at the front to exercise their franchise, notwithstanding the fact—more than that, because of the fact—that they were fighting the battles of this country over yonder in France and in Belgium. Let me grant for the purpose of argument, and only for the purpose of argument, that there were two oversights in that legislation—one the oversight of failing to provide for a deferred election in the Yukon, or in any other constituency where it might possibly happen that the election would have to be deferred, as it had to be deferred in Nelson. That was one oversight, in the Military Voters' Act, we may grant for the purpose of argument. The other oversight was the failure to make provision for the filing of election petitions at a date which would ensure the right of any man who was a defeated candidate at that election, or any man who desired to present a petition, to bring the matter before the courts of this country and have it determined. The report of the committee before the House at the present time relates solely to the Yukon Territory, but it restores each one of those rights. It seeks to repair those two oversights. It seeks to repair the supposed oversight in respect of the franchise of the men from the Yukon who were in the Canadian army overseas. My hon. friend the member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) will not for one moment pretend that he, or any member of this House had it in mind, that those men should not exercise their franchise. The hon. gentleman will not tell the House that he, or any member of the House had it in mind that if an election were deferred by reason of unforeseen circumstances, the men from that constituency who happened to be overseas should be deprived of the right to exercise their franchise. My hon. friend, (Mr. E. Lapointe) does not venture to take issue with me in that regard, and I know that he agrees with me. Well, then, is that, or is that not, an error which this Parliament has not only the right, but the duty, of repairing? And that is all that is proposed in the resolution now before the House.

But there is something more: If in the Yukon, or anywhere else, any man who, under the ordinary law of the land as contained in the Dominion Elections Act, would have the right to file a petition against the return of the successful candidate, is deprived of that right, it is proper that that right should be restored. Therefore we propose that that right shall be restored to the unsuccessful candidate in the Yukon, or to any other man in the Yukon who would have the right to present an election petition. That is what it comes down to in the end. The argument of my hon. friend at its best is that there was an oversight in the Military Voters' Act. Let that be repaired. There was an oversight also in not preserving the right to file a petition for the purpose of contesting the election. Let that oversight also be repaired. This matter will then stand before Parliament and before the people of this country precisely in the way that Parliament intended when the legislation in question was passed.

Now my hon. friend the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) has spoken of this question as being dealt with in a partisan way. I do not desire it to be dealt with in a partisan way, and I hope my hon. friend will acquit me of that intention. I might say in that connection that the case of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) was brought to my attention early in the session. It was pointed out that he was in precisely the same position as Mr. Lewis—that by reason of having signed a guarantee for a person who had a contract with the Government, he came technically within the law which would prevent him from sitting in this Parliament. I said at once, "It seems to me doubtful whether the Act really means that, but you can assure the hon. member for Lunenburg that if that question is seriously raised in the House, or in the courts, I am prepared to go before Parliament with a Bill declaring that notwithstanding any such enactment he shall have his seat in Parliament." I stand precisely by that declaration to-day. I might be overriding a technicality in the law in doing so, but I am prepared under such conditions to override such a technicality in the case of any hon. gentleman on either side of the House. And after all, my hon. friend the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) will remember there is a very wise and very grave saying: "The law killeth, but the spirit maketh alive." It is the spirit of what was intended by the legislation enacted at the last session of Parliament that we are keeping alive in this case. My hon. friend (Mr. E. Lapointe) is somewhat shocked that Parliament should have anything to do with this question. Does he not realize that his vote in this House, along with the vote of about two hundred other gentlemen, kept him in his seat for a year after the time when otherwise he would have ceased to be a member of Parliament?

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Much against my will.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend seeks to evade the issue by saying that it was done against his will. That is an extremely unsatisfactory answer. If he thought the legislation was not right he should have stood up and voted against it. By his silence he voted for that legislation, and he kept his seat in Parliament for a year beyond the term for which he was elected. I am not saying that by way of reproach, because I myself proposed the motion, and I thought it was a wise and just proposal under the circumstances; but if my hon. friend intends to cast discredit upon Parliament, by reason of the action proposed at the present time, his hands are not absolutely clean in that regard, and that applies also to two hundred and twenty other gentlemen who were members of the late Parliament.

Mr. BUREAU: It was in a moment of weakness that we yielded to you.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friends on the other side in a moment of weakness are endeavouring to controvert the just proposal which the Solicitor General has submitted. There was a moment of weakness on the other occasion, my hon. friend (Mr. Bureau) says. Let me suggest to him that he is also yielding to a moment of weakness on the present occasion.

Mr. BUREAU: We yield very often.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The opportunities are not so frequent now as formerly. Well, I cannot put it better, according to my view than in the manner indicated a moment ago: That there was an oversight, let us say, on the one side, and there was an oversight on the other. Such being the case it is not only the right but the duty of Parliament to repair them both, and that is what the Solicitor General proposes by the motion which he has submitted.

Mr. J. ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères): If neither the Government nor the Opposition had endorsed the candidates, as happened in other constituencies, or if, on nomination day, on the 31st of December, there had been only one candidate who was elected by acclamation, would the Yukon soldiers' vote in that case have been applied to any other constituency?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Certainly not.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Then the soldiers from that constituency would have been disfranchised?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Not at all; no more than the soldiers or any other electors would have been disfranchised in any constituency where there was an election by acclamation.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: They would have been disfranchised.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Not at all.

Mr. JOSEPH READ (Prince): I would have been pleased to support the original motion if it had been a fair one, and, if it had gone to the extent of repairing the wrong perpetrated by the Government in passing the Order in Council, which took the rights from these candidates which they now seek to restore; or if the Bill my hon. friend the Solicitor General has proposed to the House did not eliminate the very controversy at issue as it eliminates that part of the point in dispute which refers to the validity of the soldiers' vote. My contention is—and I look at this matter absolutely from a non-partisan and independent standpoint—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I am not like some of my hon. friends on the opposite side of the House who sit down and let them drop worms, shingle nails or sparables or anything else into their mouths if they were young robins! The point I want to make is this: that the record of the soldiers' vote that has been sent to the returning officer here is not the correct return of the soldiers' vote, and I want to show hon. gentlemen why and how. In the first place, the principle of representative government involved in the election of a candidate to represent a constituency has been based upon the personal equation, upon the individual. The War-time Elections Act was the first piece of legislation which violated that principle and changed the principle to a vote for a certain party or against that party, "for the Government" or "for the Opposition." But I understand they re-considered that sweeping change in the principle of election, and put in the Act the right of the voter to vote for an individual. They not only did that, but when they made their official ballot they provided a blank for that particular purpose on the very top of the ballot. The very first principle then involved in the Military Voters' Act, so far as the soldier was concerned, the very first principle recognized by the late Parliament, was that the individual candidate was the first factor on the ballot to receive the attention of the elector. But as there was no candidate in the field when the election took place, it was impossible for the elector to write the candidate's name on the ballot with the result that the returns were all wrong. It is not the same result that would have obtained had a nomination taken place before the election. This is a case where the election took place before the nomination, and where the name of the candidate was not known and could not be put in the first blank provided on the ballot to receive it. But if the Government will undertake to allow us to put in the new Bill that the whole matter can be referred to the court, including the question of the validity of the soldiers' vote, I have no objection to the motion. Otherwise I must vote for the amendment.

5 p.m.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: But if that is refused, I cannot do anything else than vote for the amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Lapointe).

The House divided on the proposed amendment of Mr. E. Lapointe, which was negatived on the following division:

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Solicitor General) moved for leave to introduce a Bill respecting the election held in the electoral district of the Yukon.

Mr. SPEAKER: This Bill, of course, can be introduced only by unanimous consent of the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Next sitting of the House.

Motion stands.

ORDER IN COUNCIL ON HEREDITARY TITLES.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: By the leave of the House I should like to lay upon the Table a copy of the Order in Council of 25th of March last respecting titles. It has already been read to the House, but it has never been formally laid upon the Table.

HEREDITARY TITLES IN CANADA

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House proceeded to Public Bills and Orders for the purpose of resuming the adjourned debate with respect to the resolution of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) respecting titles (resumed from April 8, 1918).

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): When this motion was last under consideration on the 8th of April, the hon. member from Springfield (Mr. Richardson) moved the following amendment:

> That the word "hereditary" be struck out from the Resolution, and that the third paragraph thereof conclude with the word "Canada" in the ensuing line.

And then, as explained by the hon. member for Springfield on that occasion, the result of that amendment, if carried, would be that the motion would read:

> We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty praying that Your Majesty hereafter may be graciously pleased to refrain from conferring any titles upon Your subjects domiciled or living in Canada.

Before moving the adjournment of the debate, I ventured to point out to the members of the House the far reaching effects of that amendment if it should be carried, and at the conclusion of my brief remarks, I moved that the debate be adjourned, and it is now resumed upon that motion. I am still of the opinion that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Springfield goes too far, and I am still of the opinion, which I expressed to the House on the 8th of April, that the concluding portion of the motion of the hon. member for Kingston ought to be eliminated. It has been suggested to me that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Springfield might be amended so as to pray His Majesty to refrain from conferring any hereditary titles upon persons domiciled or living in Canada or any titles other than such terms, distinctive of variations of naval and military rank, as are necessary or customary for the purposes of His Majesty's naval or military forces. Even if that form of resolution were adopted, it seems to me it would carry the proposal beyond what is desirable at the present time. For example, we have in Canada, under the authority of the Crown, acting under the constitution, certain distinctions which are recognized and which would have to be withdrawn if the motion passed in the form which my hon. friend proposes.

I find that the word "title" is defined in the dictionaries as "an appellation of dignity, distinction or pre-eminence," and I find also that under the authority vested in the Crown there are certain appellations which have been in force from Confederation down to the present time, which I think have not heretofore been found in any way prejudicial to the public interest, and which would have to be withdrawn if the motion which my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson) proposes should be passed by this House and by the Senate. That House, it must be remembered, is a recognized part of this Parliament, and has a voice in such matters.

The Lieutenant Governor of a province is designated by Royal authority as "His Honour," Privy Councillors in Canada are by Royal authority designated as "Honourable," and that during the term of their life. The Solicitor General of Canada is by the same authority designated by the title "Honourable." Senators of Canada, by the like authority, are designated by the title "Honourable," but only during their office, the title not being continued afterwards. The Speaker of the House of Commons during the tenure of his office is entitled under Royal authority to the designation of "Honourable." The Chief Justice of Canada, the judges of the Supreme and Exchequer Courts of Canada, and the Chief Justices and judges of the Superior Courts of all the provinces of Canada are by Royal authority entitled to the designation of "Honourable" while they hold office. The same authority provides that upon the recommendation of the Governor General the title may be continued to them after they have resigned from office. The Presidents and Speakers of the Legislatures of the province are styled "Honourable" during their tenure of office. The Executive Councillors of the provinces are styled "Honourable" while in office. Legislative Councillors in any province are not to have that title except those who were appointed before Confederation.

The amendment proposed by my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson), as I pointed out, would prevent recognition by the Crown of the service of men serving in the military forces of Canada, and if adopted it would create what seems an invidious distinction between men who are serving in the Canadian Army Corps beyond the seas and the men who are serving in the forces of the Empire from other dominions. I think even the hon. gentleman who proposes the motion would agree that a man who has earned the Victoria Cross or any other of the distinctions conferred by Royal authority in recognition of valorous service at the front should be recognized, if he belongs to the Canadian army corps to the same extent and in the same manner as if he belonged to the forces of any of the other dominions of the Empire or of the United Kingdom.

But in the suggestion put forward, it is proposed that military distinctions shall be continued, and that all other distinctions in this country shall be discontinued. I suggest to hon. members that it might be worth while to consider carefully before this Parliament embarks upon such a policy. Our country, I hope, and more than hope, I believe, is not embarking upon the path of being a great military nation. We are fighting in this war in order that war may end. We are not fighting that our Empire may embark upon the project of becoming a great military power. We want to bring it about that the menace of war shall cease. It does not seem to me appropriate that we should continue designations of distinction solely to those who have served in military or naval forces. There may be persons in this country who have rendered valuable public service to Canada in other spheres of national activity. If we adopted the proposal of recognizing only service of a military or naval character we would be very much following the example which Germany has given to the world. So I would suggest with all due respect that perhaps we have gone for the present, by the Order in Council which has been laid on the Table to-day, about as far as it would be wise for us to go without further consideration, and I have myself prepared an amendment to the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Springfield. The sub-amendment which I thus propose to move, reads:

That after the word "Canada" referred to in the said amendment, the following words be added,

"Except in accordance with the principles enunciated in the Order in Council approved on the 25th day of March, 1918, and laid upon the table of this House on the twenty-first day of May, 1918."

In order to make my proposal perfectly clear, I shall read to the House the Address as it would be if the sub-amendment which I have just now proposed, should be adopted:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty praying that Your Majesty hereafter may be graciously pleased to refrain from conferring any titles upon Your subjects domiciled or living in Canada, except in accordance with the principles enunciated in the Order in Council approved on the twenty-fifth day of March 1918, and laid upon the table of this House on the twenty-first day of May, 1918.

In order that I may make the matter still clearer to hon. gentlemen, I shall read, not the whole of that Order in Council, because I read it in my remarks on the 8th of April last, but just the portion that sums up the conclusions which Council reached and which, when approved by His Excellency the Governor General, have been forwarded to His Majesty's Government:

1. No honour or titular distinction (saving those granted in recognition of military service during the present war or ordinarily bestowed by the Sovereign proprio motu) shall be conferred upon a subject of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada except with the approval or upon the advice of the Prime Minister of Canada.

2. The Government of the United Kingdom shall exercise the same authority as heretofore in determining the character and number of titles or honours to be allocated to Canada from time to time.

3. No hereditary title of honour shall hereafter be conferred upon a subject of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada.

4. Appropriate action shall be taken, whether by legislation or otherwise, to provide that after a prescribed period no title of honour held by a subject of His Majesty now or hereafter ordinarily resident in Canada shall be recognized as having hereditary effect.

I should add that it is my intention, so long as I am called upon to discharge the duties now incumbent upon me, to see to it that whenever any honour of any character is conferred upon my recommendation, the reasons on account of which the honour is conferred shall be publicly stated at the time when the honour is announced. That is the course which, I understand is to be followed in the United Kingdom and I think it eminently desirable that it should be followed here.

There is another consideration which I submit to the House and it is this: His Majesty's Government have to take into consideration, of course, the relation of this proposal not only to Canada but to all the dominions of the Empire and they have asked us, in a respectful and courteous way, that the whole subject be brought under discussion during the coming summer when certain of the Canadian ministers are to visit the United Kingdom. It seems to me that as the Order in Council has been passed and has been communicated to His Majesty's Government, the delay that would ensue between this session and the next session, when the matter might be taken up again, if desired, ought not to stand in the way of our acceding to that respectful request. I do not imagine that the public interest will suffer by any action taken before Parliament shall assemble again. The Government of this country will then be in a position to announce to Parliament the result, of their conference with the Imperial authorities in respect to this subject. So, I would suggest to my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson)—and I hope he will accept this suggestion— that the sub-amendment which I have proposed be accepted.

There is just one further consideration which I omitted to mention, and it is this: If the amendment in the form proposed by my hon. friend on the 8th day of April last, or in the form since suggested to me, were passed, I think it would have the effect of preventing any minister of the Crown or any other person in Canada, from being appointed to His Majesty's Imperial Council. Appointment to the Privy Council carries with it the designation of "right honourable" and the terms of the motion as proposed on the 8th April, and of the motion as suggested to me since, would prevent the appointment of any person domiciled, or living, in Canada to His Majesty's Imperial Council, if I understand the terms of the motion correctly.

I venture to submit that we have made a very important advance by the Order in Council passed on the 25th May last and that this matter might very well stand at that until there has been consultation with the Imperial authorities. If it is thought that a further step should be taken in the immediate future, that step can be taken in five, six, or seven months from now when Parliament assembles again.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (Peterborough W.): In approaching this question I first of all desired to assure myself that the right hon. leader of the Opposition would not consider a vote upon it as a vote of want of confidence, so I asked him if we were all free to express our opinions without any such dire consequences attaching themselves, and he said most distinctly, Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. BURNHAM: I am aware of what the people of Canada think; they are sick of the whole titles business. I would, with all humility, have been perfectly content that during the prevalence of this disastrous war this question should have stood over for a more convenient season, but when such a distinguished gentleman as the right hon. leader of the Government has laid an amendment before this House and requires a vote upon it, he has precipitated the issue. He has called for a decision in this way and therefore we must go to it. It is now a question of titles or no titles; and I do not see that those members of the House who have steadfastly set their faces against these distinctions, if such they can be called, can be blamed for taking up this matter seriously at this juncture. But they can be greatly blamed if they do not respond to this invitation of the Prime Minister and say once for all what they have to say, and abide by the consequences.

The people of this country have been greatly stirred over this question. It is not for us to recapitulate the pros and cons, the arguments, one way and the other. They have all been recited at length, the people understand them, we all understand them, and therefore I would proceed in the most respectful way to take up the latest phase of the question, and that is the one enunciated by the right hon. the Prime Minister himself. First of all he says:

> I think even the hon. gentleman who proposes the motion would agree that a man who has earned the Victoria Cross or any other of the distinctions conferred by Royal authority, in recognition of valorous service at the front should have authority if he belongs to the Canadian Army Corps to the same extent and in the same manner as if he belonged to the forces of any of the other dominions of the empire, or of the United Kingdom.

Well, I am not, by any means a great lawyer, but I did not know that there was any title of honour attached to the Victoria Cross—in fact, I am well aware, having looked up this matter at length when I compiled my little volume on "Canadians in the Imperial service," that there is no distinction attached to it. It is an iron cross which the winner is entitled to wear, and that is all. And the greatest distinction connected with that cross is that the possessor wears it without blazoning to the world that he is the winner of it. He simply is entitled to it, and in the modest wearing of that distinction he finds a satisfaction which all brave and great hearts must prize.

Then the Prime Minister in his speech dealt with the question of military distinction. I understood from him that if we brought in a measure to take away titles it would affect the titles attached to military men. Now I understand from the right hon. Prime Minister that if we do confer these distinctions we shall give rise to a military caste. Therefore, he has given us an extremely strong argument that all classes shall be treated alike, whatever that treatment may be. I think with that everybody throughout the country will agree.

The Order in Council, which is the basis of the amendment, says in paragraph No. 1:

> No honour or titular distinction (saving those granted in recognition of military service during the present war or ordinarily bestowed by the Sovereign proprio motu) shall be conferred upon a subject of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada except with the approval or upon the advice of the Prime Minister of Canada.

Now it is the Prime Minister of Canada who gives that advice, and he gives it because he thinks that in so doing he represents the opinion of Canada. If he found out, however, that he is not representing the opinion of Canada, of course he would not give any opinion at all. Now we wish to show him, and I think the people of Canada wish to show him, that they do not wish him to give any advice, or anybody at all to give any advice, with regard to conferring titular distinctions upon Canadians. The Order in Council, I submit, completely begs the question, since we do not want to do what is suggested by it at all.

Paragraph No. 2 says:

> The Government of the United Kingdom shall exercise the same authority as heretofore in determining the character and number of titles or honours to be allocated to Canada from time to time.

That is what we do not want to do. We do not want these titles to be allocated to Canada at all. The procedure, doubtless, has been to draw up a string of titles representative of the powerful, the mighty and the rich, and even the greedy, transmit that list from Canada to London, ask the people there to put their names on it, and then send the list back here to meet the expression of the will and opinion of the people of Canada with regard to the conferring of honours upon those to whom honour is due. I think it is only necessary to consider that procedure for a moment to see that it is an absolute caricature, it is an impossibility. The people do not want titles bestowed, they do not want any procedure provided for their continuance.

Now I heard the Prime Minister say:

> There is another consideration which I should like to submit to the House, and it is this: His Majesty's Government have to take into consideration, of course, the relation of this proposal not only to Canada but to all the dominions of the Empire and they have asked us, in a respectful and courteous way, that the whole subject might be brought under discussion during the coming summer when certain of the Canadian ministers are to visit the United Kingdom.

Quite so. Now is our time. Let us instruct our delegates. Do not postpone it. Since we have to adjudicate upon it, let us say with a distinct voice to our delegates, "As for Canada, believe me, Canada is dead against it; we do not want it." If, however, our delegate goes to London, and does not know the decision arrived at by the people of Canada through their representatives in this House, how can he possibly be expected to give any advice upon it that is worth the paper it is written on? Now is our time to make that excuse impossible. The excuse is done away with. We have the opportunity now. The Prime Minister continues, "It seems to me that as the Order in Council has been passed and has been communicated to His Majesty's Government, the delay which would ensue between this session and the next session, when the matter might be taken up again, if desired, ought not to stand in the way of our acceding to that respectful request." It ought not. The conference has requested an opinion. Let us give it to them. Further, the Prime Minister says, "I do not imagine that the public interest is going to suffer by any action taken between this date and the time when Parliament shall assemble again and when the Government of this country will be in a position to announce to Parliament the result of their conference with the Imperial authorities in respect to this subject." Why, it is just the reverse. We want to announce to the Imperial Conference the opinion of Canada with respect to this subject. We are not going to take our instructions from them. If the people of the Old Country want to get down on their knees and continue the lickspittle business, let them do it. If the Australians must have titles, hit or miss, let them have them. As I understand it in Canada we want to be a democracy. If possible we want to eliminate as far as possible all these meretricious things such as titles and humbugs of every kind. Now is our time. Let us announce, not only to the Old Country but to the world, in the politest, most respectful and humble way, in fact, crave them not to encumber us with titles, because we do not wish them. In doing so, we do not wish to offend the people of the Old Country. Far from it. Let our politeness be excessive, if necessary, but do not throw our principles to the wind because somebody else may be offended, and do not let us act as if we had no convictions in this matter, and could not originate an idea without thinking of what somebody else thought about it. That stage of life in Canada, I am sure, has long since passed. Our soldiers and great men—including the great men who sit on the front benches to-night—have established a condition of nationhood in Canada and for Canada which make us above all this petty business. Boosting some men, who may be merely railway swindlers or cement merger experts, into the seats of the mighty, and letting the poor people, whose voice could not be heard, because they do not wish to be heard, whose lives are the very fruit and flower of virtue, leaving them to die in obscurity because we do not know any better than to let them die and prefer others instead of them; such a condition of affairs in a highly educated country such as this is insupposable and is certainly intolerable. Let me repeat: on account, Mr. Speaker, of the Prime Minister's having asked us for a decision to-night, and having demonstrated by his speech that he must be instructed as we want him to be instructed, and as he can express our wishes, no man in this world better, and in view of the fact that the leader of the Opposition says, "Go to it; this is a matter for the general benefit of Canada, and the Opposition will take no advantage of it whatever"—in view of all that, let us make this decision; let us instruct the Prime Minister that it will be better to postpone this whole question than to committ the dreadful faux pas of going to London and expressing the opinion of Canada in any way equivocal or unequivocal in favour of titles, when, as a matter of fact, we want to be let alone and do not want titles. I am persuaded that the people of this country will not have them.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Springfield): When this question was first introduced by my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle), I was of the opinion that his resolution, in that it merely asked for the cessation of the granting of hereditary titles, did not go far enough, and after the debate was continued on that motion for some time I got the impression from the remarks made by various members that the desire of Parliament was that we should cease granting all titles in future. I listened with very great interest to the declaration of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that, so far as his title was concerned, he would be delighted to throw it on a bonfire in the market-place and have it consumed. I was delighted to hear an expression of opinion of that kind, and in the hurry of the moment I prepared an amendment calling for the abolition of all titles. I was going to ask the House to agree unanimously to the substitution of a more carefully worded amendment than the one which I hurriedly threw into the arena on the spur of the moment. But my right hon. friend the leader of the House (Sir Robert Borden) thinks that my amendment goes further than the House would wish to go. I do not quite agree with the right hon. gentleman, because I believe, with the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham), that the entire country is heartily sick of titles. I come from the great West, where I have lived for over thirty-five years, and I believe that I am not going too far when I say that the idea of titles is practically an offence in the nostrils of the people of that country. Titles have been conferred upon some very unworthy people in the Dominion of Canada, but that is not the main objection to the continuance of this practice. The people do not believe in titles. Now, when we have the opportunity and the question is before the Parliament of Canada representing the people, I feel that it is the bounden duty of every member to express his opinion by his vote. I am persuaded to express that opinion more strongly because of the declaration of the leader of the Opposition that he does not propose to make this in any sense a party question; he throws it open so far as he and the party that follows him are concerned, and thus throws it open to every member to express his opinion. Therefore, I believe the duty presses itself upon every member of the House to speak his mind through his vote at this time. And I cannot help but be persuaded, from the conversations I have had with a great many members of this House, that this House almost unanimously believes that the conferring of titles is an evil in this country. Apart from a desire to support the Government or a party, members almost unanimously are in favour of wiping this thing out at this time. As I said in the few remarks I addressed to the House when this matter was first brought up, I believe that the time has come, particularly in view of the struggle through which this world is passing, when, if we are not going to have a new heaven, we are at least going to have a new earth. The idea of titles will grow more unpopular daily, and I believe we could not do better at the present time than wipe titles off the slate for all time to come. The right hon. Prime Minister has suggested in his amendment to the amendment that the matter be left to the nomination of the Prime Minister. That, of course, would be a great improvement on the system which has prevailed in the past, because we know that titles have been given over the head of the Prime Minister and over the heads of the advisers of the representative of the Crown in this country. That is an intolerable state of affairs, and even if the amendment to the amendment carries we shall have made an important step in advance. In doing so we should be representing the people of the country and the best interests of all concerned. We wish to build up in Canada a real democracy. What need we care about precedent? Let the people who constitute this premier nation of the Empire take the lead for once. Let us say what we believe should be done. If the Australasian colonies or other portions of the Empire choose to follow suit, all the better; but let us have the credit of taking this important step towards the building up of a real democracy.

When this matter was first brought up in the House the circumstances connected with the conferring of titles were referred to as leading to corruption. No statement, however, was made by any of the speakers to the effect that such corruption had prevailed in Canada. On that occasion I had a case in mind and I had intended to mention it to the House. A prominent man in the West who is well known to almost every one who has participated largely in the public life of this country told me personally that he had been offered a knighthood if he would pay $10,000 for it. When I was in Winnipeg a few days ago I discussed the matter with one of this gentleman's friends, who said: "Why, he told me the very same thing; I understand that he has told a number of people." I do not wish to emphasize the point; I simply want to show that the conferring of titles has been made the subject of corruption in the political life of our country. We ought to strike it a deadly blow when we have the opportunity.

The reference of the Prime Minister this afternoon to the danger of depriving members of the Senate, of the Federal Cabinet and of provincial Governments of the prefix "honourable" was an unhappy one. As a mattter of fact, these are not real titles; they are simply appellations of courtesy. If we adopt this resolution or my amendment, members of the Senate, of the Federal Cabinet and of provincial Governments will still be called "honourable," and judges will be called 'Your Lordship." These are merely appellations of courtesy and will continue.

The Prime Minister spoke also of the danger of creating a military aristocracy in this country. My proposal is that no knighthood shall be conferred on any military or naval man who has distinguished himself. The V.C., the D.S.O., and other awards of that kind, are merely military distinctions, and will continue. To meet the objection made by the Prime Minister in this respect I recast my amendment, and if the amendment to the amendment is voted down I purpose asking the House to allow me to substitute the following for the amendment which I originally proposed:

That all the words in the first paragraph of the address after the words "or any" in the fourth line be struck out and that the following be substituted therefore:

"Titles other than such terms distinctive of variations of naval and military rank as are necessary or customary for the purposes of Your Majesty's naval or military forces."

The resolution as amended will then read as follows:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty praying that Your Majesty hereafter may be graciously pleased to refrain from conferring any hereditary titles upon Your subjects domiciled or living in Canada, or any titles other than such terms distinctive of variations of naval and military rank as are necessary or customary for the purposes of Your Majesty's naval or military forces.

I believe that if that amendment is adopted, it will cover the entire ground. You have sat in the Chair, Sir, during the last two months and you know how the soldiers are exploited on every possible occasion. Gentlemen hold up their hands in holy horror and say: "Do not interfere with the militia of this country." As I said the other evening, I believe that all members of the House are thoroughly impressed with the great debt that we owe to the soldiers who have fought and bled on the plains of Europe and who are today fighting and dying for the liberties that we enjoy. Please God, we will all try to do our duty by the returned soldiers and by those who have fought for us, and we will honour and revere the memory of those who have fallen. But let us not, because of these considerations, refrain from doing our duty on this occasion. It will not add anything to the stature or to the glory of any Canadian soldier who has fought for our liberties if a knighthood is conferred upon him. As the Prime Minister said when we first debated this question, no distinction of honour conferred by King or Empire can add anything to the dignity of manhood or to the glory of any achievement on the battlefield. You cannot find anything greater than the real dignity of manhood. Gladstone, Chamberlain, a whole galaxy of the greatest statesmen who have figured in British history, were content to be plain "Mr." Why should the people of this country wish to be more titled than Gladstone? Why should they desire any titular distinction?

I wish to read an extract from the last issue of Truth, that great organ of democracy published in London. The writer says:

> The absence of Canada from the lavish colonial distributions of the Order of the British Empire has now been explained by Sir Robert Borden with a frankness which the Downing Street announcement lacked. He was asked to prepare a list of recommendations, but, considering other business more urgent, he did not do so.

What a splendid tribute that is to the Prime Minister of a country such as Canada. The article continues:

> The bearing of this observation lies in its application to our War Cabinet, which has dedicated not a little of the time and talent of Lord Curzon (to say nothing of the labours of the secretarial staff) to this kind of foolery.

"This kind of foolery." Fancy an expression of that kind coming right from the centre of the British Empire:

> Nor is this all. It seems that Sir Robert Borden's Government has formally requested that in future no hereditary titles whatever shall be conferred upon any one ordinarily resident in Canada, and that other titles or honours (save for military service in the war) shall be conferred only with the approval of the Canadian Prime Minister.
> As to existing hereditary titles in Canada or the hereditary titles of persons hereafter settling in that country, the Canadian Government proposes that after a prescribed period they shall not be recognized. The emigrant peer or baronet will, therefore, have to abandon his escutcheon. I suppose that constitutionally these proposals are an interference with the prerogative of the Crown. But they are backed by a practically unanimous public opinion in Canada, some day perhaps we shall become equally sensible in this country.

Let Canada set the example to the old Mother Country. Surely the idea with respect to titles and distinctions that exists in the mother land, is an abhorrence to all free, democratic people. After all, are not all men born equal? They may not be equal in ability, but before the majesty of the law they are equal. Why should we, in this young nation, which is trying to set an example for democracy and to stand for all advanced ideals, tether ourselves for all time to the idea of titles? I do not know when the precedent was established, but this is a time when we ought to strike down precedents if they are wrong, and I appeal to this House to let the people of Canada exercise, through their members who represent them in Parliament, the real and almost unanimous opinion from the Atlantic to the Pacific that the time for wiping out all titles has arrived.

Mr. A. R McMASTER (Brome): Mr Speaker, as I had the honour of seconding the motion concerning titles which was moved about a month ago, in a most able and eloquent speech by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), I may perhaps detain the House for a few minutes in expressing the views which I hold upon the amendment moved by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson). When the hon. member for Kingston and myself proposed to do away with hereditary titles, we felt we were taking the shortest possible steps in the right direction, and it was a great pleasure to me to find that the House was prepared to take a longer step in that direction and therefore I purpose voting for and supporting the amendment moved by the hon. member for Springfield and voting against the amendment to the amendment moved by the Prime Minister. I am not unaware, nor unappreciative, of the advance which the amendment to the amendment moved by the Prime Minister indicates. It indicates first that there is a unanimous public opinion in Canada against hereditary titles—and that is a good thing. Secondly, it enunciates the principle that the Prime Minister and the Government of the day should, and will in the future, be responsible for the creation of all titles. But I want to take a step further; I do not want us to be creating titles in this country at all. We have our own political evils to fight against, why perpetuate, why sanction an abuse from overseas?—for the giving of titles in the Old Country is admitted by all in that country to be a great source of political corruption. Let us get rid of it altogether.

Just a word as to the arguments advanced by the Prime Minister against the amendment of the hon. member for Springfield. The Prime Minister says that this will interfere with Canadians accepting the office of Privy Councillor, because a Privy Councillor is known as "the Right Hon." Mr. So and So. In the first place, I would think that the argument used by my hon. friend from Springfield that the title "Right Honourable" is merely a courtesy title, will apply. But even suppose it will not apply, is a Canadian who is given the distinction of being made a Privy Councillor any bigger man because he is called "Right Honourable?" Surely one of the biggest men in the whole world to-day is proud to be known as "Mr." Woodrow Wilson. You do not add anything to a man's stature, nor to the consideration which is felt for him by informed people by calling him "Sir" or "Lord" or anything of that kind. I rather fear that John Morley has gone down in the scale by calling himself "Lord" Morley, and the name James Bryce signifies a bigger man than "Viscount" Bryce. They have not added anything to their stature, socially, intellectually, or in any other way by accepting those titles. The Prime Minister seems to find difficulty in the fact that it has been customary to call our judges "Lords," or to address them as "Your Lordships." This is purely a matter of custom, of courtesy. I remember, shortly after I came to the Bar, that in the province of Quebec, we changed our mode of addressing our Court. We had formerly addressed the court as "Your Honour," and subsequently we addressed the court as "Your Lordship," and I do not think that made the slightest bit of difference. I do not think they were treated with one atom more of resepect, and I doubt if the judges were one whit better or worse after they were called "Your Lordships." The Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), who was a judge of the Superior Court of Montreal at that time, will be able to bear me out in what I say.

There are other courtesy titles. We have in this country the extraordinary spectacle of certain dignitaries of a church being called "Your Lordships." Men who follow the Founder of our religion, who washed His disciples' feet, are addressed as "Your Lordships." If that term disappears, then we shall be returning to proper first Christian principles.

I do not purpose detaining the House at any length. The burden of proof, in this House and in this country, is upon those who advocate the continuance of titles of any sort or kind. We do not seek to interfere with calling a man "captain" or "commodore," if he is in the army or navy. Nothing of that sort is suggested, and an argument founded on that is trying to draw the proverbial herring across the trail. The question before the House is this: Do you want in future to have a system by which the leader of the Government, for reasons best known to himself, can put handles to certain of His Majesty's subjects living in Canada, or are you against that? I am against that, and I am going to vote with the hon. member for Springfield.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): Mr. Speaker, I think it is a great misfortune that the three proposals before the House could not be submitted to us separately. The presentation of three motions on this subject is rather embarrassing. It is, I think, a pity that we could not be allowed to vote on the motion of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) against hereditary titles as a distinct proposition. I think we shall all agree that we should probably have on that question a unanimous vote. At all events, I have heard no expression of dissent. Then if we come to the motion of the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson), I am inclined to think, from the widespread endorsement of it, that the vote on that will be pretty nearly unanimous. But I do not think it will be unanimous. I have not any very strong opposition to it myself, but it goes a little further than I am disposed to go, and I do not think at present I will support it. Possibly there may be others who feel in the same way. Then we come to the third proposition, that of the right hon. leader of the Government. I regard that as objectionable for several reasons. I was glad to hear the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) say that he had discussed the matter with the Prime Minister, and that this was to be an open question.

Mr. BURNHAM: No, it was the leader of the Opposition I spoke to, and he assured me he would not make it a party question.

Mr. FIELDING: I have heard that one or two excellent members of the House are not a little worried over the motion of the Prime Minister, being afraid if they vote it down the Government might have to resign. On these terms I would not like to see the motion voted down. I am not always able to agree with everything the Prime Minister proposes, but if it was a question of turning out the Government, I would not vote to turn them out. The House is strongly behind the Government; there is no doubt about that, and I am not so sure that hon. members who sit on the left of the Chair are very anxious to succeed the Government just now. I do not think they have very much reason to desire that. When we see the members of the Cabinet rushing from pillar to post from hour to hour and day to day, pestered with a thousand and one different things, how in anybody's name could any one envy them the job? However that may be, I see objection on the merits of the motion of the Prime Minister. I dislike very much the idea of coupling the Order in Council with the action of this House. Let the Order in Council stand for what it is worth. There is a great deal in it that has met with the approval of the House; perhaps it is entirely approved, but I think it is very desirable that the Order in Council should stand by itself and that the Parliament of Canada should express its conclusion, whatever it may be, entirely separate and apart from the Order in Council. An Order in Council, after all, is an order of the ministry of the day, and while I do not suppose such a thing would happen, another Government in power at any distant day could repeal that Order in Council. Therefore, I think the motion of the Prime Minister, in which he mingles the Order in Council and the other motions here, ought not to be approved.

There is another thing mentioned in the Order in Council which rather grated on my nerves. The right hon. Prime Minister, in that Order in Council, indicates that knighthoods, or honours, or whatever it may be, are to be conferred upon his recommendation. It seems to me that is a little too much emphasis laid on the office of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister is the channel of communication between the Cabinet and the Governor General, and in that sense he is brought into close relations with his Excellency the Governor General, but, after all, this country is not governed by the Prime Minister, but by the Cabinet and Parliament, and any attempt to give to the Prime Minister in his individuality a special power in these matters, except as he is the representative and exponent of the Cabinet, would, I think, be a great mistake. For these reasons I shall feel obliged to vote against the amendment of the Prime Minister, but I do hope it will not be regarded as a non-confidence matter, because, as I have already told the House, I do not want to turn out this Government. I do trust that we are going to have absolute freedom of thought and of discussion in these various matters, and while there is no question of the desire of the House to stand strongly behind the Government of the day, we are going to exercise our freedom on all the questions that come up. I think that is important, and I am sure the ministers of the Crown will think none the less of us for making that assertion of our independence.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I had the opportunity on a previous occasion to make known the views I hold on this subject, and I would not rise at all this evening were it not for some words which fell from the lips of the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) this afternoon. My right hon. friend, in speaking to the motion, coupled with it the title of "Honourable," which has been bestowed on some classes of His Majesty's subjects in this country, members of the Privy Council of Canada, for instance, members of the Senate, and some of the judges. Such titles, if titles they can be called, are not at all affected by the present motion. These titles exist by Royal letters patent, and they will continue to exist whether this motion passes or not until, upon petition of this Parliament, or upon proprio motu of the Sovereign, the Crown chooses to withdraw these letters patent. Therefore, we can dismiss altogether that aspect of the case.

With regard to the motion of the Prime Minister, that these titles should be conferred upon the recommendation of the Prime Minister to the Crown, for my part, if I were a Conservative member, I would hesitate very much before voting for such a motion as that, because if these titles have any value at all in the eyes of those who accept them it is because they come from the Crown, from the supreme authority of the King. But if they are going to be conferred upon ministerial responsibility on the advice of the Prime Minister they are no longer the gift of the Crown, but simply the gift of the Prime Minister, the gift of a subject like myself but who for the time being is in supreme authority. I repeat, it seems to me the very idea is destructive of the honour which may be involved in these distinctions, and for these reasons alone I think the motion of the Prime Minister ought not to be accepted.

With regard to the effect of this motion if it were voted down, it having been moved by the Prime Minister, I quite agree with my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) that such a vote would not involve a change of Government. For my part I will say at once that I do not make it a party question, and when my hon. friend from West Peterborough, (Mr. Burnham) asks me if I intend to make it a party question I would say no, it is not for me but for the Government to do that. But I have understood all along that the Government did not intend to make it a party question. At all events, without any such understanding, if the motion of the Prime Minister were to be voted down I can tell my hon. friend from West Peterborough and every one else in this House that I think I know my business as a party leader too well to be tempted under such circumstances to assume office. I do not want anything of the kind, and I do not contemplate anything of the kind. I do not want to bring about a ministerial crisis on this question. There is a great deal of discontent and irritation among the people over this question, but I am sure no one in the country would want to make it a party question if it were to involve a change in the Government. If there is to be a change of Government some day, as many people hope there will be by the providence of God, it will be upon a more serious question than this and one in which the people of the country take a deeper interest. I look upon these proposals as a step in advance of an educated public opinion. All these titles will gradually lose their value as people become more educated and more democratic, and, for my part, my plan and my disposition is very plain. I shall vote against the motion of the Prime Minister; I shall vote for the motion of the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson), hoping it will carry, and if it is defeated I shall vote for the motion of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle).

Hon. A. L. SIFTON (Medicine Hat): There does not appear to be any very great difference of opinion between the members of the House who have spoken on this question as to what is the desirable result. There does, however, appear to be a very considerable difference of opinion as to the proper means of getting there, and the five or six hon. gentlemen who have spoken have all apparently rather a different idea as to the proper course to be followed.

We have had three motions which are all possible and none of which would do any grave harm to the country at large, and we have had a little difference of opinion expressed by some hon. members of the House in regard to the best way by which our object may be accomplished. In the first place, I would not like to vote for the original motion in a House in which the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was the leader of the Opposition and in which the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden was the leader of the Government, eminent statesmen who, probably for good reasons, for reasons best known to themselves, have seen fit to accept titles at the hands of their Sovereign. I do not think it would be nice for us as members of this House under circumstances of that kind to say that no title of this kind should be given in the Dominion of Canada.

I thoroughly agree with the gentlemen who have spoken in regard to hereditary titles, and there is a strong reason for the position that has been taken upon this question. There is a reason why hereditary titles should not be drafted upon the democratic feelings of the people of Canada. It was due to this reason, and some other things, that have taken place in regard to various titles given in this country, that the Order in Council which has been laid on the table of the House was passed with a view to providing a way in which to approach this subject in a constitutional manner. I fail to see the strength of the idea that this Order in Council should not be backed up and supported by the members of this House, and the hands of the Government strengthened along the line of democratic feeling that it is endeavouring to persuade the British Government to give effect to in reference to the Dominion of Canada.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) took the same stand practically a number of years ago. A copy of the letter that was written in regard to this question by his own Government was read to this House upon the same occasion that this Order in Council was read, and the Order in Council is just along the same lines, but a little stronger than the action which was taken by the former Government. If the members of this House can see their way clear not to weaken it but to strengthen it so that the Order in Council may be transmitted to the Colonial Office in England with the support of a united House behind it, the House will have done a great deal more to carry out the idea which is the foundation principle of that order than if they separated it and made two distinct propositions for the Government to consider.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. NICKLE: If nobody else wishes to speak I would like to exercise my right to close the debate.

Rt. Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the various expressions of opinion upon the subject now before the House. I have had my own thoughts while this discussion has been going on. I am bound to say, in the first place, that I stand by and thoroughly agree with the Order in Council which has been laid before the House and which was the reasoned judgment of the Government as to the step that might be taken at this time in regard to this question. I am told by different members of the House—and I do not want to impugn their authority at all—that the country is greatly stirred up over this matter. Well, I take leave to think that the country is not widely and largely paying very much attention to this subject at the present time. I know it is easy to think that one's own opinion is the opinion of everybody else in the country, but when we start out on that line we are apt to get a rude shock and to be disappointed in that belief. As I say, I have not seen in the country at large any determined agitation or any deep feeling in regard to the bestowal of certain distinctions and honours by the Crown of the Empire upon people in this country.

There is, I think, a very deep and wide feeling amongst the people against the importation of hereditary titles to this country. If a title or honour is given at all fairly, through proper methods and in an organized and orderly way, it is given to mark some act, some quality, some phase of character, some activity, in the person upon whom the honour is given. There is a basis for that. There may happen to be cases in which, through lack of judgment or information, or otherwise, the distinction has not been well bestowed, but the raison d'être for the bestowing of the distinction is that which I have stated—it is to mark the approbation of the State itself intimated through its head. There is a basis and a good ground for it. But I need not say that I think it is foreign to all Canadian ideas, that because that mark of approbation has been given for a particular phase of character, or activity, or act of excellence, there is any reason why it should descend from father to son and from that son to his son. Therefore, I am absolutely opposed to hereditary titles in this country and I would be just as much opposed to them if I were in any other country.

We talk a good deal about being democratic in this country. Well, democracy is in the air all the wide world through and it is a pretty bold thing for any one man, or any one country, to set himself, or itself, up as par excellence, the example of democracy. I go to France, I go to Great Britain, I go to Italy, I go to other countries, and I find that democratic principle and feeling always in varying currents and in different degrees. But in some of these countries I have named it is even more radical, I think, than the average democratic opinion is in this country. I go to the United States and I find the very same kind of feeling. Yet, in all these democratic countries, or nearly all of them, you find honours and distinctions. If you really come down to the heart and essence of the matter, do you not weaken your case when you make the argument for the doing away with the bestowal of these marks of distinction by the Crown upon persons in Canada and yet in the very same breath admit that no matter if royalty, or the head or symbol of the State, ceases to give them, distinctions, even in this country, will always exist?

For I think my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson) said that we would always call the judges "Your Lordship", and we would always call the senators "Honourable", and we would by courtesy, if not by patent, have our distinctions even in this democratic country. That goes to the very root of the matter, to my mind. If we are true democrats—and if to be true democrats we must have a dead level in which no hill is higher than the other, no mountain top goes higher into the blue than the other—then we cannot have these courtesy titles any more than we can have patented titles. And so it seems to me that we may well revise some of our ideas, probably, with reference to this matter of a democracy being dead against all distinctions and marks of difference. We are all born free and equal, it is very commonly said. So we are. But you may put a nation to the birth and have all its sons born free and equal, and before the end of a generation has been reached you will find distinctions of all kinds and of all grades. Human nature is built that way, and it is impossible to escape the general verdict of humanity and the absolutely evident trend of human progress by trying to keep everything onto a dead level of uniformity. Men will be different, excellencies will appear, activities will develop, and the mark of appreciation and approbation in one way or another will be differently placed according to the degree of evolution and of progress. There is no feeling more widespread in humanity than the desire for approbation, for appreciation. It is in the infant from the time that it begins to take cognizance of its parents, and the approbation of the parent is decidedly looked for and is desired by the child as it grows up. It goes with the child from the home into the school, and the very essence of the progress and work of school life is that the deserving and the studious, the one that is applying himself to the acquisition of knowledge is largely influenced by the desire for appreciation and approbation. That is not vanity, that is one of the springs of human progress. That is one of the motives which makes the world climb higher. I do not care how much a man may profess, or how humble a name or a profession he may write upon his brow, the man is not worthy of being called a man unless, having done good work, he feels glad to be appreciated for that work. Now, does it harm the man to be appreciated? Whether it is the public approbation of his town, of his community, of his country, or whether it is the word of the Sovereign of the State, which marks the majesty and which is the symbol of the whole State, that puts that mark of approbation upon him, it is only a difference in degree—it is not a difference in essence at all. Now if that is a general feeling in humanity—deeply inset in it from the very birth of humanity until the present, and which will remain as long as humanity struggles along into an upward course of betterment and of amelioration—if that is so, it is absolute folly to talk about doing away with distinctions, for there will still be these public valuations: First by the family, second by the community, thirdly, by the State, and afterwards by the Empire—as the service and the action become widely known—and that stamp of appreciation will cling to the individual. It may be made known by a label, it may be by the tongues of the thousands who acclaim the action and applaud the characteristics of the man; but it may be made known also by a word of the ruler of the State—it is all the same in essence, it is different in degree, that is all. But that is an absolutely necessary coincident of the progress of the world, to my mind, and we cannot cheat ourselves by the idea that we will get away from all valuations, that we will sink to one common level and there will be no distinctions at all.

Now, my argument, or my statement, may be connected in some men's minds with the idea that I am standing up for an honour which has been conferred upon myself. Well, I do not think that need affect the argument; I think I may go on with my argument just in the same way. Perhaps it may be well to say that I never sought the distinction, that it came to me after thirty years of very considerable effort and public work, and that when it did come I did not feel that I was one single iota better than before the honour or the distinction was given. But I will confess—what any honest man will confess—that I did feel deeply the mark of the honour that was given, because it united me to the head and to the heart of the country that I love and to which I had given some of my effort. It was not King George that tagged me, it was the country of my birth—the Empire out of whose loins I sprang, that aggregation of units which existed, lived, struggled, and died for a thousand years, and has built itself a name and a character that shall endure. I felt that the hand of that past, present, and future was laid on my shoulder, and that the words were said to me, "Well done; it is for something you have done for your country, and which goes afterwards to those that succeed you." I was not made any worse, I was made better—a better servant of the State, linked by a tie that did not before exist. That is my honest confession, and any man, I think, who has gone through the same experience, and has really, in part, deserved what he got, has felt exactly the same way.

Now there will be abuses of everything. Some one made the assertion here to-night that if we could not have a new heaven we could have a new earth. We have got to get out of heaven to get rid of the distinction.

Mr. BURNHAM: How does the hon. gentleman know?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The hon. gentleman, with his usual incisive inquisitiveness, wants to know how I know. How does he know that he is a Christian, if he is? How does he know what he believes? How does he know the Christian doctrine and tenets? He draws it from the Book of God, from the Bible, which is the charter of the faith of our Christian religion, and the Bible, from one end of it to the other, talks of differences and of hierarchies in heaven as well as upon earth. But what I started out to say, and to remind my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Burnham), was that he would not get rid of distinctions when he gets to heaven—it is against fair-minded, fair-play work, that there should not be distinctions.

For instance, my hon. friend, who may get into Heaven by the very skin of his teeth, having done many things that are naughty and comparatively few that are good, and another hon. gentleman who has been a saint from his youth up and has done no naughty things and an immensity of what is good, would my hon. friend have the face to take the same high seat in Heaven as he?

Mr. BURNHAM: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have the absolute argument on my hon friend. His own conscience is testimony to the fact that there are grades, and he would not aspire to the higher grade, because he felt that he was unworthy. It is no argument against titles and distinctions because they may be sometimes unworthily bestowed. That is where the human factor comes in, and the human factor is apt to make these mistakes. But I would not admit that a system which is as wide as the world, as distributed as nationalties are distributed, as persevering and constant as a force of action in this world and in these nations as anything else well could be—I would not undertake to say that the whole experience in the course of the world had gone on a delusion, and that it was a delusion, and that we at this present time are just beginning to find it out. I am not making an argument that the world may not for a long while have remained under delusions with regard to certain things. But I think there is something from the world-wide situation that teaches us that there is more in this maybe than we would think of at first sight and before giving it most mature consideration. I do not want to weary the House with what I have to say. I have not much more to say. I think the House will be wise if it will come to one conclusion, to support the Order in Council which has been passed, and which does away with hereditary titles and affirms the doctrine that the Canadian people shall be the supervisor of its own distinctions. Having done that, I think we will have gone forward a long way, and that would be my mind. Every other man has his own mind and has a right to it.

Mr. JEAN J. DENIS (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, up to the present juncture I have taken no part in this debate for several reasons. The main reason is because I thought it preferable to leave the discussion of this subject to more highly talented members, although I have been, and am, thoroughly in accord with the proposer of this resolution. However, I cannot refrain from making some very brief remarks on the sub-amendment proposed by the right hon. the Prime Minister. As I see it, and as it has just been explained to this House, if this sub-amendment should carry, titles in the future will be conferred upon the recommendation of the Prime Minister; and consequently the Prime Minister will virtually be conferring titles himself. Everybody in Canada will be well aware of that. Should any one receive a title from overseas, the first impression that will strike him will be that he has received a title upon the recommendation of the Prime Minister; in other words, that the Prime Minister has given him a title. And this person will, of course, be aware that if he owes gratitude to any one, he owes it to the Prime Minister for the title he has received. Therefore, we are only shifting the title conferring powers and instead of leaving it to the Imperial authorities to confer titles, we are leaving it in the hands of the Prime Minister of Canada. I am not alluding in any way to the personality of the hon. the Prime Minister, but in accepting such responsibility the Prime Minister, whoever he may be, will certainly not improve his position before the people of Canada. The matter goes much further. We have passed a Bill in this House this session abolishing patronage. Well, this is patronage. If we leave it to the Prime Minister to distribute titles, is not that patronage? Is not the title of "Sir," or any other title, just as much patronage to many people as a position in the Civil Service? It is nothing more nor less than patronage. And the Government—well, not even the Government, but the Prime Minister—will have it in his power to distribute the patronage of titles. So I say that we are not improving our position by any means, and I think it is beneath the dignity of any country to leave it to its Prime Minister to beg titles from England. As it is now, the titles come from the other side, and they are supposed, at all events, to come without recommendation. It has been stated to-night that titles have been given over the head of the Prime Minister. I am not sorry for that. Titles are a gift that we do not want, but at all events they are supposed to come from the highest authority in the British Empire. Now it is proposed that it will be the Prime Minister of Canada who will send a request to England asking that Mr. So-and-So in Canada shall receive such and such a title. I say that is beneath the dignity of this country. By adopting the amendment moved by the Prime Minister we would not be improving the situation; we would be making it far worse than it is now. For these considerations, Mr. Speaker, I think that if any proposition now before the House should be defeated, it is the sub-amendment of the Prime Minister. I would rather see the amendment or the main motion itself defeated than to see the sub-amendment carried, because in so doing we would be making the position worse than it is now. For that reason I will vote against the sub-amendment.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): I am sorry that I was not in the House at the time of the introduction of either the resolution or the amendment, and that I did not hear any of the discussion on this question. I did start to read the speech of my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle), but had not got very far before I was called away to something else, and, unfortunately, was not able to return to it. Therefore, I speak with some ignorance on the question as it goes to the House. But I have thought it over considerably, and I am opposed to hereditary titles in this country under any possible excuse. This is a democratic country, and we should not have hereditary titles here. So long as we are under the British Crown I am not opposed to the conferring of life titles as a reward for very distinguished service in the public interests of the country.

If the King wants to honour a man who has given distinguished service of any kind, political or otherwise, to his country, I do not see why he should not do so. But the reckless distribution of titles which has been going on for the last few years is absolutely absurd. I may add that some men in the country who have performed great public service carry their titles properly and are a credit to the community. But, from what knowledge I have of the subject, I should think that titles should be conferred only on the recommendation of Parliament. Parliament should know whether or not a man has rendered such service as to warrant his receiving a title. Then, if Parliament recommends it, I see no reason why he should not receive it. I do not know what the resolution is or what the amendment is, and I shall have to become better acquainted with them before I can give an intelligent vote. In the meantime, I think it is but right that I should give my views to this extent. There are times when it is perfectly right for the Sovereign to confer titles upon people who have given distinguished service to the country.

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston): Mr. Speaker, when I introduced this subject to the House over five weeks ago, I was actuated by a three-fold motive. First, I desired to project in the House a discussion on the constitutional aspect of the question. Second, I desired to bring to an end the practice of granting hereditary and what I have termed reflective titles in Canada. Third, I desired to direct attention to the anachronism of titular distinctions in Canada and the abuses which would probably arise from a continuance of the practice of granting recognitions which gave privileges without carrying responsibilities and duties.

As the Prime Minister said in the speech that he delivered to-day and also in the speech that he delivered when the motion was first heard, the whole national tendency in Canada has been to the recognition on the part of the Crown of ministerial responsibility. My attention was first directed to the subject in 1912, I think, when the member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) introduced a Bill into the House which, on the occasion of its second reading, was discussed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). If I understand the English language, the Minister of Trade and Commerce in his speech on that occasion, clearly enunciated the doctrine that the granting of titles was entirely within the control and prerogative of the Crown and that, viewing the matter from his point of view, he thought that the House of Commons had nothing whatever to say in the matter and was not justified in expressing an opinion. The language used by the Minister of Trade and Commerce at that time was as follows:

> I have not very much to say upon this question, except that I think the bestowment of honours comes from the source of all honours, that is, the King; and that we must allow the King to have unrestricted scope as to the selection of persons upon whom to bestow these titles of honour.

If that means anything, it means that the Minister of Trade and Commerce enunciated the doctrine that the prerogative of the Crown was to be exercised without constitutional limitation and without ministerial responsibility. As I said on the 8th of April, when I introduced this resolution, that principle is not satisfactory to me as a Canadian. I made up my mind in 1912 that if suitable opportunity ever offered itself I would again bring the subject before the House for discussion and, I hoped, decision. I have listened with great interest to the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to-night. I always listen with interest to his addresses; they are couched in language of singular force; they are perfect treatments from his point of view on the subjects that are under discussion. Looking at the matter from the point of view of the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he gave utterance to the words which I have just read, I quite understand how he was moved, by obtaining the recognition of his Sovereign, to the feeling that he was drawing nearer, as he expressed it, to the heart and the Throne of the Empire. But when he takes into consideration the evidence I laid before the House when last I spoke on this subject of the gross corruption that characterizes the granting of titles in England at the present day, I do not think that he can, with reason, say that the titles which are granted to-day carry with them the honours to which he refers. I admit that down deep in the hearts of us all there is a desire to do the right thing. But, Sir, I am not of that school of thought which believes that men do the right thing so that they may have the recognition of their fellowmen. I believe that the true standard by which a man should be judged is not whether he does that which at the time has the approval of his fellows, but whether he does that which has the approval of his conscience. I am not much given to speaking on religious matters; I do not profess to be very much of a biblical student. But when I heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce speak to-night about whether or not there should be gradations of rank in Heaven, I was reminded of that part of the New Testament which tells us of the thieves who hung on the cross with our Saviour between them, and of our Saviour saying to one of them: "This day shalt thou be in Paradise with me."

If a man is repentant for the things that he did which he should not have done and that he left undone which he should have done, I should be sorry to think that when the day of final reckoning comes he would not get equal forgiveness with the man who, perhaps, from his early days had lived as a man should live. I judge a man not so much by what he actually does as by the temptations that he has overcome; as by the resistance that he has shown to the temptations that may have surrounded him. I am not moved, therefore, for the reasons which I have given, by the arguments advanced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I do not believe that the recognition given by the granting of titles is an incentive to action in most men, because if it were, most men would become absolutely indifferent and would settle down selfishly in life. There is no man in this House, there is no man in Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific, who cannot give, as the former Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) said a short time ago instances by the score of men equally worthy of recognition as those who have obtained the recognition of the Sovereign. When you analyse the thing to the last word, it is not recognition by the Sovereign at all; the Sovereign probably knows nothing whatever, except so far as the information may be conveyed to him by another, of the merits or demerits of the man to whom the recognition goes. Thousands of people in Canada have within the last few years given faithful service never expecting recognition. Many who never expect a title and never had any reason to do so are just as sincerely and honestly bound to the heart and the Throne of this Empire as those who may have enjoyed the distinction that the Minister of Trade and Commerce enjoys. If the recognition of a title was the thing that moved men to duty, what would the 30,000 men who to-day lie dead in Flanders' fields have thought if they knew that death was to overtake them before that recognition could be given? They did their duty because it was their duty.

It is a pernicious doctrine to preach in this country that recognition is the reward of virtue. What should be preached in this House and in this country is this: that virtue is its own reward, and that man should act from a conscientious motive and not that he may obtain recognition from an extraneous source. As I was going to say before I was led—I shall not say astray—aside by the argument of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) the whole tendency of constitutional practice has been along the line of recognizing ministerial responsibility. In 1876 the Hon. Edward Blake secured the recognition that the Department of Justice should have the last word in regard to clemency. In 1902, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, then the leader of the Government, submitted to the Colonial Secretary a note to the effect that he desired to be consulted or to have the determining voice as to those who in Canada should obtain recognition. True, his claim was not recognized, but he laid down, in language clear and forcible, what he called and what we now recognize to be the true constitutional practice. In 1916, the right hon. leader of the Government told us that when the British Government decided to commandeer our shipping, representations were made to the British Government that this should not be done without the consent of the Canadian Government, and the principle was recognized by the British Government that Canada had the right to speak and must be considered in the matter. Again in 1918, by the Order in Council to which the Prime Minister has made reference, the Prime Minister and the Government of to-day laid down the principle that hereditary titles and all other titles shall be granted only in the event of the Prime Minister consenting to the bestowal. I want to say this for the Order in Council of the Prime Minister, if I may be at liberty to comment favourably on an Order in Council that has been drawn up by or has had the approval of the First Minister: In my opinion, it is one of the finest and most dignified constitutional documents that any country could desire. It lays down, in a way that cannot be contradicted, the true position that I think every Canadian should take in regard to the position that our Government, the Government of an overseas Dominion, should take in the administration of the affairs of the Dominion.

I said that the second point which I desire to bring before the House and the principle that I desire to have admitted was that hereditary titles should no longer be granted to domiciled Canadians. I do not think I need elaborate the argument further, because, since this subject was introduced into this House, I have not heard, either on this side or the other, one favourable word said in regard to hereditary titles. Every one admits that they have no place in Canadian life. I think we all admit that they have lost their position in the British constitutional system, and that to-day they constitute a privilege without a corresponding burden or obligation. In regard to this second point, when last I spoke in this House, I directed attention to the fact that I wanted reflected titles also put an end to. I said that, in my judgment, much of the desire for recognition had its inception in the desire of the wives of certain men for social pre-eminence and social priority. In replying to me, the Prime Minister said that, in his opinion, the term "lady," as applied to the wife of a knight, or the wife of a baronet, was purely a title of courtesy, and he did me the honour of saying to the House that I differed with him on that conclusion. He also said that he had not the time nor the inclination to dig further into the law or the regulations. Having more of desire and also more of time, since the debate of April 8, I have gone somewhat into the question, and I want to be absolutely fair to the Prime Minister and say that in the discussion I think we break on a basis of fifty-fifty. As far as my researches have taken me, I have reached the conclusion that the title of "lady," as given to the wife of a knight, is a title of courtesy, but that the title of "lady," as given to the wife of a baronet, is hers of right. If the House will permit me, I shall read a few notes that I have prepared so that I may speak with greater exactness than if I spoke without them. The Prime Minister was quite right in saying that many of the dictionaries did lay down the principle that the wife of a baronet or a knight is commonly spoken of as "lady," but the customs—this is not from the dictionary; this is the result of my researches—and privileges and duties of knighthood go so far back into the Middle Ages that it is difficult to make these distinctions justly—that is whether the title is of courtesy or of right. Chaucer, in his works, speaks of his knight as having a maiden "to lady and to wife." Perhaps I should say for the benefit of the House that the word "to" is not used as a verb; it really means "for." What Chaucer says is this, that a knight has a maiden "for a lady and for his wife." The expression "my lady" was commonly used toward any one of gentle birth, whether married or unmarried. For example, in Chaucer's Prologue, the Prioress is addressed as "My lady Prioress." Knights, apparently, did not often marry out of their class, so that this form of address was not acquired by marriage, but simply continued. Occasionally, however, the old ballads speak of a knight marrying a girl not of gentle birth and "making her a lady;" in such a case the form of address would naturally follow the change in class. All this tends to support the contention that, as far as a knight is concerned, his wife's title is one of courtesy, not of right. But when we come to the term "lady" as applied to the wife of a baronet, we are on entirely different ground. If the Prime Minister has the time and the inclination, if he will turn to the works of John Selden, who wrote a book, entitled, "Titles of Honour," published in 1614, he will find the following:

> The title of baronet became a new erected distinct title under our present Soveraigne,—

That was James I.

> —who, for certain disbursements towards the Plantation in Ulster, created divers into this dignity and made it hereditary. The particulars of the patent shall instruct you.

He goes on to give the Latin, evidently quoting from the patent. I translate:

> We have ordained, saith the King, built up, constituted and created the position, degree, dignity, name and title of a Baronet within this our Kingdom of England to last for all time . . . . And that he shall have precedence in all writings, sessions, and salutations before all Knights, as well of the Bath, as Knights Bachelors . . . . And that their wives and eldest sons respectively have like precedence. That they should be impleded and sue by the addition of Baronet. And that to the name of them, and the heirs males (sic) of their bodies, in English speech and in all English writings, this addition should be prefixed, namely in English, Sir. And that their wives have the titles of Lady, Madame, and Dame. And that neither our Heirs nor Successors shall ever build up, ordain, constitute, or create within this our Kingdom of England any other degree, order, name, title, dignity, or position less than or beneath the degree, dignity or position of Barons of this our Kingdom of England which will be or can be superior or equal to the degree and dignity of the aforesaid Baronets . . . .

That, I think, substantially proves that the title "lady," as given to the wife of a baronet, is a title of right, and that, therefore, the last clause of my resolution is founded on law and has merit, in that the baronet's wife enjoys that title as of right. If any member of this House is interested in securing within Canadian history an incident to prove that social jealousies have been engendered by titular distinctions, I would suggest that he refer to the "Reminiscences of Sir Richard Cartwright" published a short time ago, from which he will learn that a certain lady of royal birth at one time resident in Canada crossed the path of a certain Prime Minister of this country; there were differences of opinion as to whether the royal personage or the wife of the Prime Minister should have priority at certain social functions.

[Mr. Nickle.]

The Prime Minister, speaking on April 8th, admitted very frankly to the House that true worth in England was not shown by social priority, and he was equally emphatic in saying that great wealth was no advantage to a man If I understood the Prime Minister aright he made it clear to the House,—I am not saying he did it consciously,—that I had said I thought great wealth was of advantage to a man. Mr. Speaker, nothing in the world was further from my thoughts, and I do not think a reading of my remarks will convey that impression. What I laid down and endeavoured to emphasize was this: I feared that if we had a system of hereditary titles in this country it would lead to the practice of primogeniture. That is, a practice would grow up in this country by which the wealth of a rich man would be settled on the eldest son so that the title might be maintained with dignity, and I deprecated anything of that sort, and urged on this House that such a practice should not be the vogue, because I felt that wealth should be divided among all those who had the privilege of accepting it from the man who had gone before.

The Prime Minister also said in the remarks he made in reference to my speech that the time might come when if I attained the woolsack some talented and eloquent lady of this House might rise and make objections to my being addressed as "His Lordship." I remember a story told of Sir John Macdonald, who being desirous of getting rid of a certain colleague of his had him appointed to the Bench without the gentleman being aware of the promotion, and a few hours later meeting the gentleman on the street, he stopped him and congratulated him in these words: "I congratulate your Lordship upon your being appointed to the Bench." But I must say that when the right hon. leader of the Government spoke of my being addressed as "His Lordship," it was the first time I had reason to assume he was anxious that I should be translated from this House.

The Prime Minister, in alluding to my remarks on the 8th of April, I think resented something I had said in reference to the corruption in England that was attendant on the granting of titles. He took the position, if I correctly understood his remarks, that it was not the business of this House to pass any opinion on the political institutions of Great Britain. I have great respect for the judgment of the Prime Minister. I realize that we have in him one of the ablest constitutional lawyers in Canada, but, Sir, I cannot see eye to eye with him in regard to this matter, because so long as we are united to the Empire as one of the overseas Dominions, and my fervent prayer is that we may be long united, it is a matter of the gravest interest to us how political institutions in the old country are managed, and if the Upper House in England is being strengthened—possibly I should not say strengthened—but if the Upper House is having additions made to it by men being appointed who secured their appointment in ways that are not proper, then I say that we as one of the overseas Dominions have a right to express our dissatisfaction with that method of procedure.

But, Sir, the Prime Minister, in replying to my remarks, was very careful how he expressed himself. I listened with great care to his remarks that evening, and I have read them since with greater care. He was careful not to say that he did not think what I had said was true. The position the Prime Minister took reminded me very much of the position of the Irishman who was charged with an assault. Two witnesses were produced who swore most emphatically to the details of the assault and made it abundantly clear to the court that the Irishman had committed the offence. When the Irishman was asked to stand up and say if he could give any good reason why sentence should not be passed upon him, the Court said to him: "Two witnesses have conclusively proved that they saw you commit the assault." To which the Irishman replied, "Be jabers, I could get you a hundred who didn't see it." That seemed to be the attitude of the Prime Minister. I had read from the record of the House of Lords' debates to show that corruption was rampant in England. I did not ask the Prime Minister to believe it on my say-so, but I asked him to believe it because I submitted this information as set forth in the record of the House of Lords' debates, and as I said a moment ago, the Prime Minister did not deny it, but he did seem to think I had gone a little outside the record. But for the reasons I have just given I think my remarks were not altogether out of place.

To-day the Prime Minister in speaking seemed, if I may use the expression without being offensive, to blow up a grotesque and hideous figure which he immediately proceeded to knock down. What he said, if I understood him correctly, was this: that the resolution of the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) meant that titular distinctions were only to be given to those who had done army or naval service. He then directed attention to the horrible militarism of Germany, and asked the hon. member for Springfield if it was his intention to build up such a system in Canada. The Prime Minister emphasized that he was opposed to anything of that sort being done, but, Sir, I submit that an analysis of the resolution of the hon. member for Springfield will show beyond a shadow of a doubt that the resolution does not bear the construction the Prime Minister put on it this afternoon, probably, in his hurry, not having had the opportunity of giving to it the full consideration that it deserved. The resolution of the hon. member for Springfield reads as follows:

> We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty praying that Your Majesty hereafter may be graciously pleased to refrain from conferring any hereditary titles upon Your subjects domiciled or living in Canada, or any titles other than such terms distinctive of variations of naval and military rank as are necessary or customary for the purposes of Your Majesty's naval or military forces.

There is not one single word said in that resolution in regard to non-hereditary titles being confined to those who have done service in the military or naval forces. What the hon. member for Springfield laid down as a principle was this: That no titular distinctions should be conferred on any man, and that the only titles we should recognize are those that are expressed in such terms as to set out the different degrees of naval and military rank and which are customary for the purpose of His Majesty's military and naval forces; in other words, for the purpose of army and navy discipline men in the forces should be given the titles of Captain, Major, Colonel, and so on, but titles outside of these such as Knights or Barons should not be conferred. That is one angle from which criticism has been levelled at us, but I should like to draw attention for a moment to another angle.

Criticism has been levelled at us to this effect; that if titular distinctions were to be given naval and military in the other dominions and Great Britain, it would be unfair not to confer the same distinctions on Canadians in the naval and military forces. There is an interesting White Paper that was brought down in England a short time ago. I got this information from the April number of the Nineteenth Century, and the Nineteenth Century shows that that White Paper says:

A Parliament White Paper issued on the 29th of October, 1917, contains a return of all hereditary honours granted since the 4th of August, 1914:

(a) To members of the House of Commons 39
(b) To members of the Civil Service 5
(c) To officers of His Majesty's Naval and Military Forces who have been on active service during the war.. 7

Of the seven Naval and Military honours, three were accounted for respectively by the Duke of Teck, Prince Alexander of Teck, and Prince Alexander of Battenberg, while two more were given to military members of Parliament, viz., Major the Honourable E. E. T. W. Fiennes, M.P., and temporary Lieut.-Col. H. Webb, M.P. leaving only two which were granted to mere professional sailors and soldiers, whose sole claim to recognition was fighting for their country.

That would lead you to believe that the principle that military and naval men should have distinctions conferred upon them is not being recognized in Great Britain at this time.

The Prime Minister, in his address this afternoon, held up the horrible example of Germany. We hold up Germany as the horrible example in regard to everything. If I understood correctly the Prime Minister this afternoon, he laid down the principle that if military men were to get titles and all others were to be excluded, the militarism of Germany would be introduced into this country. But, before I leave that I want to make this point clear. I do not believe that, if titles are discontinued in respect to the civil population, titular distinctions should be given to those who have done great service to the country in the military and naval spheres of the war. All should be treated alike. If you are going to lay down a principle for one class, you should lay down exactly the same principle for another. In my judgment at the present time the whole thing should be swept away and we should not have any titular distinctions at all.

The Prime Minister alluded to the conditions in Germany, and I should like to read, for the edification of the House, a few words of Ambassador James W. Gerard from his book "My Four Years in Germany." It is an illustration of how the German nation has been managed by the aristocratic classes by the creation of titles and the granting of decorations. I will read from page 114 of Mr. Gerard's work:

> One of the most successful ways of disciplining the people is by the Rat system. Rat means Councillor, and is a title of honour given to any one who has attained a certain measure of success or standing in his chosen business or profession. For instance, a business man is made a commerce Rat; a lawyer, a justice Rat; a doctor, a sanitary Rat; an architect or builder, a building Rat; a keeper of the archives, an archive Rat; and so on. They are created in this way: first, a man becomes a plain Rat, then, later on, he becomes a secret Rat or privy councillor; still later, a court secret Rat, and, later still a wirklicher or really and truly secret court Rat to which may be added the title of Excellency, which puts the man who has attained this absolutely at the head of the Rat ladder.
> But see the insidious working of the system. By German custom the woman always carries the husband's title. The wife of a successful builder is known as Mrs. Really Truly Secret Court Building Rat and her social precedence over the other women depends entirely upon her husband's position in the Rat class. Titles of nobility alone do not count when they come in contact with a high government position. Now if a lawyer gets to be about forty years old and is not some sort of a Rat, his wife begins to nag him and his friends and relations look at him with suspicion. There must be something wrong in his life which prevents his obtaining the coveted distinction and if there is anything in a man's past, if he has shown at any time any spirit of opposition to the Government, as disclosed by the police registers, which are kept written up to date about every German citizen, then he has no chance of obtaining any of these distinctions which make up so much of the social life of Germany. It is a means by which the Government keeps a far tighter hold on the intellectual part of its population than if they were threatened with torture at the stake.

Then, at page 118, Mr. Gerard says:

> Besides the Rat system there is, of course, the system of decorations. Countless orders and decorations are given in Germany. At the head is the Order of the Black Eagle; there are the Order of the Red Eagle, the Prussian Order of the Crown, the orders, "Pour le Merite," states there are also orders, distinctions and many others, and in each of the twenty-five States there are also orders, distinctions and decorations. These orders in turn are divided into numerous classes. For instance, a man can have the Red Eagle Order of the first, second, third, or fourth class, and these may be complicated with a laurel crown, with an oak crown, with swords and with stars, etc.

That proves conclusively that if there is anything to be learned from the German system it is that we should keep free the democracy of this country from the granting of titular distinctions.

Now, Sir, I do not think there is much more that I should say on this question. In my original presentation of the case, I endeavoured to deal with the historic side of it. Before this House there are three propositions. The first is that introduced into the House by myself that all hereditary and reflective titles should be done away with and that by an humble address we should ask His Majesty to make no further grants of hereditary titles to people domiciled in Canada.

Mr. BUTTS: Perhaps my hon. friend would allow me to ask a question——?

Mr. NICKLE: Yes.

Mr. BUTTS: I mean to put a question to the right hon. the Prime Minister.

Mr. NICKLE: You may ask me a question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman for South Cape Breton and Richmond (Mr. Butts) certainly has no right to interrupt otherwise than to ask a question of the hon. member who has the floor, but with his permission.

Mr. BUTTS: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will give me permission?

Mr. NICKLE: I am quite willing to answer any question the hon. gentleman cares to ask me.

Mr. BUTTS: Perhaps if the right hon. the Prime Minister——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman is entirely out of order in asking a question of the Prime Minister at this stage.

Mr. BUTTS: I will not ask it then, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. NICKLE: The second proposition before the House is that laid down by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson). He lays down the proposition that no titles of any class or kind shall be granted to domiciled Canadians. When I spoke on this question on the 8th of April, I said that in my judgment it would be wise to go as far as the hon. member for Springfield has gone, but I did not believe the House was sufficiently far advanced to warrant me in introducing such a motion. For that reason I did not introduce that motion, but I am prepared to say to-night that, if the amendment to the amendment moved by the Prime Minister is lost, it is my intention to vote for the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Springfield. The third proposition that is before the House is the amendment to the amendment moved by the Prime Minister. I am at one with the hon. the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in realizing the difficulties that confront hon. members in coming to an intelligent conclusion as to how they should vote on these conflicting resolutions. Perhaps each has in it something that will appeal to a member and each may have in it something that is objectionable to him. The third proposition, which is enunciated by the amendment to the amendment of the Prime Minister, is that the Order in Council passed by the Government be approved in reference to hereditary titles and that we shall establish the principle that there shall be responsibility on the part of the Prime Minister for any title granted, whether it is hereditary or otherwise. In other words, the Prime Minister, in his amendment, says the Government, by its Order in Council, has said that, if the Colonial Office and the British Government are willing, there shall be no further hereditary titles in Canada. But if the British Government are willing to go that far, we want them to go one step farther and say that the Canadian Government, through the Prime Minister, shall be responsible for all titles less than hereditary titles granted to any resident of this overseas dominion.

Therefore, it is my intention, in the first place, to vote against the amendment to the amendment as moved by the Prime Minister, when it comes to be voted on, because it does not go far enough, in my judgment, to purge from our system of government all titular distinctions. But if the amendment to the amendment as moved by the Prime Minister carries, then, when the Speaker puts the question to the House "shall the motion as amended have the concurrence of the House?" I intend to vote for it, because if I cannot get a whole loaf of bread I am willing to take at least a slice. And if I cannot get the abolition of all titular distinctions, then I want to have it established for this country that titular distinction is granted on the advice of the Prime Minister of the country, and is not granted on the advice of what I, with all respect, term an irresponsible Governor General. When I use the expression "irresponsible Governor General," I mean a Governor General not directly responsible to the people of this country. In other words, as far as my desire goes, it is that the resolution of the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) be sustained. But if that resolution, or amendment, cannot be carried then my desire, as expressed by my vote, will be that the responsibility for titular distinction shall be on the man who, for the time being, is Prime Minister of this country.

Mr. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): I regret that at this late hour I feel it necessary that I should say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. NICKLE: Before making my speech I asked whether there was any other hon. member who wished to address the House. I was under the impression, when I rose to speak, that I was closing the debate.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend is entirely mistaken; he is not closing the debate. The hon. gentleman has spoken upon the amendment, and the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) has a perfect right to be heard, as I understand it.

Mr. NICKLE: I only want to put myself right. Before I rose to speak I discussed the matter with Mr. Speaker, and if I misunderstood him it is my misfortune, not his fault.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think there can be any possible doubt at all in the matter. We are not speaking on the original motion, but on the amendment which has been moved. The hon. member who has just risen to speak is, therefore, perfectly in order.

Mr. MANION: I regret that I did not speak before the hon. member for Kingston made his remarks. I did not catch the meaning of the statement which he made at first, but I now understand from him that he thought he was closing the debate. However, I am not going to take up the time of the House for more than a very few moments. My reason for speaking at all is that I should like to put myself on record and explain the position that I intend to take in this vote.

In the first place, I think that in the speeches which I have heard to-day there has been a good deal of what I thought—I may be wrong—was confusion of ideas. I I submit that the word "title", the word "decoration" and the word "order" are not the same—that is, they have not the same signification. The Prime Minister in his remarks spoke, I think, as if he looked upon them in the same light—and he may be correct. I do not wish to differ from his judgment, which is a more mature judgment than mine. But I feel, and I have felt ever since the first debate on this subject took place in the House, that a great many mistakes had been made in the discussion of this question. A title, to my mind, is a name given such as the title "Sir" before the Prime Minister's name. That is, it is an appellation of honour given for some cause or other. The definition of the word "title" as given by the authorities—and I may say that I looked the matter up when the discussion on this matter first took place—is an appellation of dignity, distinction or preference given to persons. The definition of "decoration" is any badge, such as a medal, cross of honour, and so on, bestowed for distinguished service; and an "order" something akin to it though an order may confer a title. However, I am distinguishing particularly between decoration and title. For example, there are in this House to-day a number of men who have won decorations, and there are also in this House a number of men who have—I perhaps should say won—at any rate, who have been given titles. And yet, I think, they are two distinct things. Their title contains the "Sir". I believe that the amendment of the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) deals particularly with the title "Sir"—that is, with baron or baronet or knighthood—but the decoration such as V.C. gives no title. Private Tommy Atkins, when he is given that decoration for particular bravery on the field, or for saving somebody's life, is still Private Tommy Atkins, although given the highest decoration in the power of the King. The same with the D.S.O., and the Military Cross, and a number of other decorations. I will try to prove my argument in this way: The Republic of France is perhaps as democratic a country as any country in the world. France confers no titles, but it confers many decorations, for instance, the croix de guerre, the legion of honour, and many other decorations, which are given for bravery. And yet the only titles in France to-day are the titles which have been bestowed under the old regimes, such as, count and countess. I have seen a few of those notabilities over there, but I think there are very few titles in France. I understand from inquiries made in that country, that many people take the title of count or countess without anybody caring whether they have them or not—they do not have to have such titles conferred upon them. However, I wished to make that point clear in the first place, because I do not think that the abolition of titles would be the abolition of decorations at all. I believe the great republic to the south allows decorations to be conferred upon its soldiers at the front, and already the republic of France, and I believe our own great Empire, has conferred decorations upon some of the American soldiers. Yet I have never heard, and I do not believe it is permitted, of any American being allowed to accept a knighthood from the Government of England.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think Mr. Gerard had a knighthood conferred upon him.

Mr. MANION: I do not think Mr. Gerard uses it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think he is referred to in his own country by the title of "Sir" but I believe he has had the distinction conferred upon him by the King.

Mr. MANION: The Prime Minister gives one exception, and I believe he is absolutely correct in his statement. But I do not believe that Mr. Gerard is given the title in his own country, and I do not believe that the United States permits its citizens to accept such titles, at any rate, not as a general thing.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is the rule in every country—that no one is allowed to accept a decoration from another country except by permission of the executive authority of his own.

Mr. MANION: I believe that the Prime Minister will not state that there have been many cases such as Mr. Gerard's. I know of no other.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not know of any others.

Mr. MANION: I do not believe there are any others. Now, a few words in regard to the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). I am afraid I am speaking at greater length than I intended, but I shall not occupy much longer of the time of the House. The Minister of Trade and Commerce mentioned that every man of this country, and every man in the world, who had any pride, desired approbation or appreciation for works that he had done. The minister said the man would hardly be a normal individual, or something to that effect, if he did not desire such approbation, and I heartily agree with him. But I do not agree that the approbation of the world is the same as the conferring of title, such as the giving of a baronetcy or a knighthood. The minister spoke of the different ranks in heaven. Of course, even the Minister of Trade and Commerce has to surmise in regard to the ranks in heaven, because many of us have different ideas from him in regard to heaven, and maybe many different views with respect to the ranks there.

Now before I close, let me say that I wanted to make my position clear on this question before the vote is taken. I regret very much that I felt it necessary to put myself right before this House as to why I intend to vote in a certain way when this vote is taken. I wish to say that, generally speaking, I agree absolutely with the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) and the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) that not only hereditary titles but all knighthoods should be abolished in this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: And the reason that hon. members on your left may not cheer me so heartily is because I am not going to support this abolition this year, because I do not think the problem has been sufficiently discussed and considered to have it properly solved at the present time. I believe the hon. member for Springfield is right. But I believe there should be a much greater discussion and consideration of the subject before a vote is taken to turn out this Government, which I believe this vote would mean.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MANION: I have heard "noes" from my right but not from my left. I repeat that I believe that this Government was elected for the purpose of carrying out the Military Service Act and sending soldiers to the front. I do not believe that it is the duty of this Parliament, of men who are elected as I was with that specific purpose in view, to turn out this Government on such a question as this without due consideration. If after due consideration this question comes up again, if it comes up in the next Parliament, I am willing to say here to-night, that if the hon. member for Springfield moves this motion I shall be willing to support it at that time.

Another point I would offer as a suggestion is this: that the Prime Minister should consider the question of not giving any more titles—I should not say giving, because he does not give them—but so far as he is able preventing the conferring of any more titles upon the people of this country until this subject has had further consideration in this House. That is a suggestion I lay before him for his consideration. There is one point I wish to make before I sit down, a point in regard to naval and military titles. I do not agree that there should be titles given only to naval and military men in this country. I agree absolutely with the Prime Minister in that. We should not make a military caste to stand over and above the other people of this country. While we are fighting to put down autocracy in Germany, we do not want to create a military aristocracy or autocracy in our own country. I do not believe that the military should be given titles any more than any other class. But I do believe that for deeds of valour the military should be given decorations. I am going to support the amendment to the amendment as moved by the Prime Minister, for the reason that I do not think that the amendment of the hon. member for Springfield has been given sufficient consideration and discussion in this House to pass upon it. It would confuse us, and would confuse what the members of this House really wish to have done.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Could I get the unanimous consent to offer—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has already spoken on the sub-amendment. Is it the unanimous wish that the hon. member should speak?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I hear the word "no?"

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am very sorry, but the hon. member for Springfield has not the unanimous consent.

Mr. RICHARDSON: A moment would have done.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. J. A. CAMPBELL (Nelson): A point arises from a statement made by the last speaker (Mr. Manion), which I think it is in the interest of the House to have cleared up. I do not know whether or not he was making the statement for the Government when he said that a vote against the amendment to the amendment meant a vote of want of confidence. And we all know what that would mean. I was pretty clear, Mr. Speaker, as to how I should vote on this subject for a long time before it was argued in this House. And I may say that my attitude towards the Government is also clear. It is in accordance with the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Queen's and Shelburne (Mr. Fielding) this evening. We do not wish to see a change at this time. We have confidence in this Government in connection with the general business they have in hand. But we think they have possibly made a mistake in taking such a definite part in this matter. The question now before the House, I understood, Mr. Speaker, is one introduced by a private member, and I have always looked upon it as a private matter, and that the Government would not be affected in any way by any vote on this question. If I am wrong, many hon. members share the same opinion. Consequently I think it is not out of place to ask that members in this House be advised definitely by the Government as to what is the significance of this vote. If it is in effect a vote of want of confidence I can do only one thing. There is, on the other hand, no question as to where I stand so far as the matter at issue is concerned. I am absolutely in favour of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Springfield. We are, therefore, in a difficult position, and we should know, and we have a right to know, exactly where the Government stands on this question.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If by the leave of the House I may be permitted to say a few words, I shall make the matter perfectly clear so far as I am concerned. The subject was taken very fully into consideration by the Government at different times. We spent three or four weeks in reaching a conclusion as to our recommendations through the Governor General to His Majesty the King and to the Government of the United Kingdom. We dealt with it according to the light that we had. And when the motion of my hon. friend the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) came before the House, I took the House absolutely into my confidence, told them of the discussion that we had had, and of the conclusion that we had reached. I said that the Government of the United Kingdom, regarding some of the matters in the Order in Council as of very grave import, had asked us for an opportunity to discuss the whole subject, because undoubtedly it has relation to its ultimate effect not only to this Dominion but to all the dominions of the Empire and to the United Kingdom as well. We reached a certain conclusion, and it has been stated frankly and clearly, as far as I was able to state it frankly and clearly, to the House. I can only say, so far as I am concerned, that if the House does not propose to accept the course which I have asked them frankly and with much respect to take, I should consider that I am relieved from my duty of carrying on any longer the Government of this country, and I should ask His Excellency the Governor General to seek other advisers. It seems to me that a somewhat peculiar course has been pursued by some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House in inquiring of the leader of the Opposition as to whether or not this motion was to be treated as a motion of want of confidence. My understanding of the course to be pursued on such occasions is that the leader of the Government should be asked with regard to that question, and I cannot quite understand the reason why there should have been resort to my right hon. friend on the other side of the House to learn how I should regard a motion of this kind. However, the course has been taken, and it is entirely in the judgment of the House to determine what course they propose to pursue in the matter. So far as I am concerned my course is absolutely clear and open.

Mr. Nickle having risen,

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson) has the floor.

Mr. NICKLE: With the unanimous consent of the House—

Mr. SHEARD: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the unanimous wish of the House that the hon. member have leave to proceed?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. NICKLE: With the unanimous consent of the House—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has not the unanimous consent of the House.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Go on.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I understand that the Prime Minister is willing to let the member for Kingston make a personal explanation.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am satisfied, yes. I would ask the House to permit it, if the hon. gentleman wishes to make a personal explanation.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member for Kingston have the privilege of making this explanation?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. NICKLE: When the Prime Minister was speaking he turned in my direction as if it were I to whom he alluded when he spoke of an hon. member on this side having this evening asked the leader of the Opposition if this were a party question.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I was not referring to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. NICKLE: Then I have nothing further to say.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Was the Prime Minister referring to me?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I was referring to the member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) who stated that he had sought that advice.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): I would not have taken part in this debate but for the fact that the member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) was not allowed to say a few words that might have been said. I seconded the amendment of the member for Springfield because I believed that it was along right lines—and I am sure that eighty per cent of the members of this House hold the same view. I agree that the Government have some rights, but I do not think that the rights of private members should be entirely ignored, and if they have not been entirely ignored, they have been very much so. The member for Springfield offered a bona fide amendment and I, in bona fide manner, seconded it. This is a private matter, not a public matter; it has nothing to do with the carrying on of the war. This Government have been elected to carry on the war. I for one am certainly not going to vote any want of confidence in the Government; I am not going to vote against them in anything that they do to work out a plan for carrying on our part in the war, even though I think they are mistaken. I shall follow that course until I change the views which I now hold concerning the advisability of retaining this Government in power. If the amendment to the amendment is voted down it will not mean a change of Government, because even if the Government resigned they would come back again; they are the only Government that can command a majority in this House. But I do not think that we should be placed in a false position because in honour bound, and in order to be honest with ourselves and with the people, we vote against the amendment to the amendment. I do not think that we are being treated fairly. While I want to give the Government every bit of fair play that is coming to them, I do believe that private members also have the right to fair play, and I do not think that the member for Springfield and myself are getting it.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): It may be worth while, Mr. Speaker, to go back to the conclusion of the debate when this matter was first before the House, so that we may understand exactly what we had a right to expect from the Government and what this House is now receiving from the Government.

When this matter was first brought before the House there were two motions on the Order Paper, one in the name of the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), and the other in the name of the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle). By arrangement between those two hon. gentlemen the debate was initiated by the member for Kingston and upon his motion. As the debate proceeded and as the practically unanimous opinion of this House was voiced, the member for Springfield, in order to give expression to what seemed to be a stronger opinion within the House than that embodied in either of the motions to which I have referred, introduced an amendment. The Prime Minister asked the member for Springfield not to press his motion, in terms which gave the House to understand that the Prime Minister was in agreement with the general purpose of the amendment and, indeed, with the spirit also of the motions and of the speeches that had been made on that occasion. Then an agreement was entered into which the members of this House expected would be carried out, and the result of which we had a right to expect would be placed before us in terms to-day. Let me refer to the language of the Prime Minister on that occasion. He said:

> In view of the fact that we have had no notice until to-night of the proposal which has been put forward by the hon. member from Springfield, I think the House might very well consider the question a little more.

After the Prime Minister had made some further remarks, the discussion proceeded:

> Sir Wilfrid Laurier: If the debate is to be adjourned, will my right honourable friend give us a day to take it up again?
>
> Sir Robert Borden: Yes.
> Mr. Richardson: Probably the right honourable, the leader of the Government, would prepare a resolution worded in such a form as might be acceptable to the House, and if so, would be perfectly willing to accept it in place of my amendment.

There the matter ended for the time being. We had every reason to expect, in view of the terms of the debate which took place on the occasion to which I have referred and of the agreement that had been come to between practically both sides of the House and every hon. member in the House, that when the matter came up again a resolution would be placed before us embodying the unanimous opinion of the House. Such, in any event, was what I expected; such, I thought, was the resolution to be presented to-day. When the resolution was presented I inquired of the three pioneers of democracy in this debate, the member for Brome, the member for Kingston and the member for Springfield, whether the resolution as presented met their views. I was astonished to find not only that it did not meet their views, but that they had not been consulted, so far as I understood, regarding it. Hence the confusion—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend understood very erroneously if he understood that, because I discussed the matter with these three gentlemen during the forenoon.

Mr. MURPHY: Of to-day?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON: The Prime Minister is correct; he did send us a copy of the resolution this morning.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: And consulted with my hon. friends, too.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Yes, and conferred with us.

Mr. MURPHY: Then, the intimation given to me was not exactly correct. In any event, whatever took place took place to-day. Be that as it may, the resolution presented to-day did not meet with the approval of the three hon. gentlemen who were the conspicuous figures in the debate on the previous occasion. The House, therefore, was thrown on its own resources and was not given the benefit of that leadership and direction which it had a right to expect. That, in view of the stage which we have reached in the session and of the business which we are supposed to have on hand, was bad enough. But the turn given to the debate this evening by the speech of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Sifton) surprised me still more. Up to the time that hon. gentleman spoke I thought that there was perfect agreement within this House as to the desirability of abolishing titles in general. But when that hon. gentleman spoke and took very strong ground against the arguments advanced by my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson) and my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle), it became evident to me that, however the Ethiopian may have been concealed until this evening, there was a "nigger in the woodpile" somewhere, and the darky soon manifested himself in the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), and later on in the speech of the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion).

Mr. MANION: There was no "nigger in the woodpile" so far as my speech was concerned. I spoke absolutely off my own bat, without consultation with any one.

Mr. MURPHY: Then I exclude my hon. friend from the reference, but still I think it is remarkable that he was in such perfect unison with the two members of the Government, particularly in view of some hurrying and scurrying that we saw on the opposite side of the Chamber after the Minister of Customs had spoken. I, of course, accept my hon. friend's statement unreservedly.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MURPHY: I am perfectly serious. I would not take any exception to any statement that my hon. friend would make, because I have too much regard for him. The question resolves itself into this—Are we serious about this question of titles? Do we want to abolish titles, or do we not? My hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Levi Thomson) said a few moments ago, and said truly, from his patriotic and unselfish standpoint, in meeting the ridiculous contention that this amendment is in the nature of a want of confidence motion, that this matter has nothing to do with carrying on the war, and I understood him to say, if he did not say so in as many words, that for that reason he would not be influenced by any argument of that kind. I am not so sure that this discussion has nothing to do with carrying on a certain phase of the war, as it is being carried on in this country. I am not so sure that a number of people, who play at carrying on the war for the sake of getting the titles that such play may bring them, are not responsible for the sudden volte face on the part of the Government. Therefore, I say to my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle and to other hon. members like him that, while from their point of view this matter certainly has not and cannot have anything to do with the carrying on of the war in the proper sense of the term, I am not so sure that it has not something to do with the methods pursued by some people who pretend that they are helping to carry on the war. Otherwise, I am completely at a loss to understand the attitude taken by the Government this evening. I do not want to say or do anything to prevent unanimity on this question. But what are we going to have if the Government persists in this course? What position are hon. gentlemen going to be placed in who have declared themselves as they have declared themselves upon this question? What position will the hon. member for Springfield, the hon. member for Kingston, and other hon. members occupy if the Government persists in taking the position they apparently intend to take? It is not treating the House properly; it is not treating the private members of the House fairly, to take this attitude upon an occasion of this kind. I would point out to my hon. friend from Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) that, while he expressed the view to which he gave utterance a few minutes ago when he stated that if the matter came up next session he would vote for a motion similar to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Springfield, there is nothing to prevent him from voting for it now, since he has said that he approves the principle of it.

Mr. MANION: I said, with proper discussion, which I do not think this subject has had in this House at the present time.

Mr. MURPHY: I do not know what more discussion a subject could possibly have unless we were to devote unnecessary time to it. I have intervened only for the purpose of showing the point we had reached when the matter was up before, and the opinion that was general amongst the members of the House upon the adjournment of the debate upon that occasion, that it was the intention of the Government to bring in a resolution that would express the unanimous opinion of the House. If, however, the Government has seen fit to adopt other methods, then hon. members are left to their own resources and will have to take their course accordingly.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree that the subject under discussion is really regarded as one of primary importance in the country, nor do I think that it has merited the whole time of 235 men that has been given to it in this House. Naturally some one will retort: Why are you still further discussing it? I do not think members of this House will regard me as a prolific speaker, at all events this session, if I bore them for a few minutes to express my attitude towards this question. I would not have spoken had it not been for the remarks of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) who moved the original motion and the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Murphy). In the first place from all this discussion it is manifest that the House is unanimous in its opinion that hereditary titles are entirely repugnant to the genius of the people of this country. We have that at all events in common, nor do I think that this sentiment would find anything but the heartiest response from one end of Canada to the other. I wish to touch for a moment or two on some of the remarks made by one or two of the former speakers on this matter. The hon. member for Kingston took occasion to animadvert—I do not think that is too strong a term—upon the speech and arguments made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) in the House to-night on this subject. To my mind his criticism and animadversions were entirely beside the mark. He seemed to assume that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was arguing that the only way to get great and good things done in this world or in any other world was to give a reward for them. I did not so understand my right hon. friend. I understood him to plead—and I think rightly so—as to the universality of distinctions of some kind in the human race, and I think any one will be very foolish to deny that. I did not understand him to lay such stress upon it, that he denied the doctrine that all of us who are men should hold that the greatest incentive to high work is a man's high purpose in life and not the hope of reward that may come to him from his fellowmen. I am quite sure the Minister of Trade and Commerce would, of all men, approve Seneca's saying that the best reward for doing a good thing is the having done it, and every man who is a man would assent to that without stopping to argue it for a moment. I will say this for the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that I have never heard a man make a more manly statement on a subject which has been one of very great criticism and animadversion during the course of this debate, and take the manly stand that he has in regard to the personal relations of himself to this question of titles. I wish to say further, speaking my personal view, that as regards this one of our colleagues who has now reached three score years and ten—I am sure he does not mind my mentioning this—in the long and honourable service of his country, we think that not only has he a right to such distinction as his Sovereign has given him, but he gives as much honour to the title as the title gives to him. My hon. friend from Kingston hoped that the Prime Minister would have time to read some author in the sixteenth century on some various phases of this question. I presume my hon. friend must have some little conception of the enormous strain on the time and energies of the Prime Minister in this frightful time of war through which we are passing. If he has not, I can assure him that those of us who are working in close touch with the Prime Minister and who know something of the hourly and daily duties and anxieties that are sapping strength every month and every year, do not marvel that he has no time to read and study other things, but marvel that he has time and strength to attend to the pressing duties of the hour. My hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle) was rather critical of the Old Country. He stated that in his view—if I am wrong, he will correct me—if we should see anything wrong in the institutions, methods and policies of the Old Country in regard to their domestic affairs it was eminently proper that we should step in and criticise and help put them right.

Mr. NICKLE: As my hon. friend asked me to correct him if he was wrong, I must say that he has not correctly quoted me.

Mr. BURRELL: If I am wrong I must retract.

Mr. NICKLE: What I said was that so long as we constituted a part of the Empire, and I hoped we should long so remain, we were within our rights in criticising the formation of other Houses that could pass legislation affecting us.

Mr. BURRELL: I do not wish to misquote my hon. friend or to misunderstand him. When we start a line of criticism on affairs that, after all, are primarily the affairs of the people of Great Britain, who are in very truth a democracy, we should remember that the people of this country would be the very first to resent criticism by people in the Old Country of our institutions and practices and policies. However, I shall not dwell on that.

It is certainly right that we should not encourage, and we are not encouraging, the bestowal of hereditary titles in this country. It is equally to be desired that we should discourage any form of special recognition in this country when that recognition is not properly and worthily earned and lived up to. But I would like to say, and I think it is time somebody spoke a little on this subject, if we are to discourage these things it seems to me it is also time that we should discourage the tendency toward national and individual pharisaism in this country on some things. There is certainly ostentation and pride and meanness wrapped up with titles ill-earned, and everybody regrets that, but ostentation and pride and meanness and selfishness are not necessarily linked to titles, and we need only cast our eyes around the world and seach our own hearts to find a lot of other things of that kind which we might make as big an effort to discourage as we are making to discourage these other things. It is well, I think, that every one of us should bear in mind that good old saying of Butler's, and not

> Compound for sins we are inclined to,
> By damning those we have no mind to.

Amongst our national tendencies, there is a tendency to legislate ourselves into virtue. There used to be a time when a man could be honest without getting on the housetops and shouting to his neighbour that he was honest. We took it for granted that he was honest and I think it is just as well that we should look at ourselves and our methods and legislation to see if we are not going along that road in a somewhat dangerous manner.

Something has been said about this being a private matter, and some of the last speakers rather complained that the Government had not, perhaps, treated them quite fairly. I do not quite see how this can be considered a private matter, although I can understand the viewpoint which would regard an academic discussion as a matter for members' private or individual opinion, but the House I am sure will remember this. In the first place, the Prime Minister and the Government which he is leading were endorsed by the people on December 17 in a very clear and unmistakable manner to carry on all the national affairs of this country. There was no mistake about that mandate. Even my hon. friends opposite well recognize it, much as they lament it. The Prime Minister and his colleagues, since December 17, have had to give attention to a great variety of matters, and in spite of the special strain imposed upon them, and especially on the Prime Minister in these days, this question of titles was given that thoughtful, earnest consideration which the Prime Minister always gives to any question of public or semi-public character. It must not be forgotten that nine days before this House met, this matter had been discussed and the Order in Council referred to had been framed, and therefore it is so far from being an absolutely private matter that the Government officially through the Prime Minister had put itself on record to the British authorities in this particular matter of titles, and therefore it ceased to be any longer a private matter, and could not be regarded as private simply because a resolution on the matter was introduced by a private member. I would point out to the members of this House that never has any Government in this country or any Government in any of the self-governing dominions gone so far in expounding its mind and explaining its convictions to the British authorities in regard to this matter as this Government has gone. That being the position—this is not exactly in the realm of private questions on which any member, should or should not vote, just as he liked, but is rather one of those questions, perhaps of minor importance, of which the Prime Minister and his Government had taken official cognizance and had expressed their best mind to the authorities in the old country. Under such circumstances, and especially as the leader of the Government himself moved the amendment, an adverse vote, if carried, would jeopardize the larger question and policies which the supporters of the Government themselves stand for. I am sure that however much individual members may disagree on certain phases of this question, or whatever views they may hold, they will in the main believe that this Government has gone a long way towards clearing the air and expressing the views of the people of this country on this question, and that when the Prime Minister gets over to England, following the Order in Council that has already been sent, a great deal will have been accomplished to achieve the purposes for which in the main all the members of this House stand.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I had not the privilege of being in the House when this question was first under discussion on April 8, and nothing was further from my mind than saying anything on the subject as recently as eight o'clock this evening. But in view of some of the statements made I do not feel I could in justice to myself give a silent vote on this question. I have been sent here by the people of my constituency to support the Union Government in carrying on this war. Consequently, there is no other course for me to follow but to support the amendment of the right hon. leader of the Government. I am sure, Sir, I little thought this question was going to assume the serious aspect it has, and that such serious consequence would result if this amendment were voted down by the House. Although I am in duty bound to support the Government, I think, in view of the statements that have been made by the right hon. Prime Minister and a number of the members of the Government, it was rather unfortunate this matter was not referred to in the speech from the Throne. We would then have had some intimation as to the attitude of the Government with regard to it. I do not consider the question of hereditary titles a very serious matter. It is one that has been in the minds of the people of this country for a great many years. But at this very moment a revolution is taking place throughout the world. Conditions are not what they were six months ago, and conditions will never again be what they have been in the past. It is only a day or so ago that we heard from members of the Government statements with regard to those engaged in the public service of this country. While I listened to the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) delivering his eloquent address here to-night and while he was pointing out the reasons why rewards should be granted for public service, I could not help but feel that perhaps the question of titles might have been relegated to the Civil Service Commission in whose hands we have placed so much responsibility. I am a little surprised, in view of the splendid results that are expected from that commission, that this question should not also have been handed over to them. As for myself, I am absolutely opposed to the granting of titles to people in this country as has been the custom in the past. It is something that is entirely foreign to the disposition and ideas of the people of Canada. It is not in keeping with the cause for which we are contending. Surely, when the civilization of the whole world is at stake, when the liberties and freedom of the people are so wrapped up in the issue for which we are fighting, the day for the conferring of titles, through the leader of the Government or through any other source, has passed. That is my attitude on the question. I wanted to say these few words in explanation of the vote which I will likely record in the course of a few minutes.

[Mr. Sutherland.]

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of the abolition of titles of all kinds. I am also in favour of prosecuting the war to a finish. I am prepared to accept the promise of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) that this matter will be taken up at the Imperial Conference. I hope that in the meantime no titles will be conferred on any Canadian, and if any titles are granted before the next session of Parliament when this matter comes up my position may be entirely different. In the meantime, I think, with a well known labour member of the British Parliament, that it is our business to get on with the war.

Mr. F. F. PARDEE (West Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to say anything had it not been that my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy) referred to the "pioneers" in this question of titles should be conferred upon residents of Canada to say a few words upon this subject. My attitude to-night is the same as it was at that time. I then suggested that no more titles should be conferred upon residents of Canada except for cause, and I am exactly in the same frame of mind now. In the old days titles were granted, when they were granted, for cause. They were granted for some national service, they were granted to outstanding figures in our national life. But it does appear to me that of late titles of all kinds have been conferred without any apparent reason. This even applies to the titles that are bestowed upon lawyers. In the old days it was regarded as a most distinct mark of approbation that one who practised law should be given the title of K.C. To-day the title of K.C. is granted not for merit by any manner of means, but wholly and solely for political purposes. I will not say that this distinction has entirely fallen into disrepute to-day, but it is valued much less than it was in former days. We have had titles turned out almost with a treadmill. Scores of men have been made knights, not for national service, not for service in any particular way that required the recognition of the state as a whole but for purposes entirely foreign to those considerations and for activities or achievements that do not deserve the slightest recognition or approbation. We are to-day engaged in the greatest war in history. Men have risen not only to the heights of national but of international fame, and they stand out in the world's history. I refer to Poincare, Wilson and Lloyd George, three of the greatest names that stand before the people to-day. To-day these men are pre-eminent figures in the world's affairs. They, like that greatest of men, William Ewart Gladstone, were content with the simple title of English, French or American gentlemen. So it should be in this land of Canada. The whole spirit of the people of Canada is adverse to the granting of titles, unless, as I said before, it is for some national service. However, I am glad to know that the ball has been started, and that like a snowball it is increasing in volume and force. This Government and future Governments will know that the people of Canada are distinctly and entirely opposed to the granting of any more titles in the way that they have been granted in the past. The people of Canada will insist that if titles are to be granted they shall be granted for outstanding services to the State or in recognition of conspicuous ability. We have had the assurance of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) this afternoon, I am glad to know, that this matter will be taken up at the conference about to be held in England. Those of us who do not approve of what has been going on in the past have the distinct promise of the Prime Minister that the conference will deal with this matter, that they will inquire into it, and that the authorities who have to deal with the granting of titles will be given notice that, as far as the people of Canada are concerned, and as far as their representatives in this House are concerned, titles shall only be granted to those who have merited them.

Mr. H. P. WHIDDEN (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, I think that all of us realize that titles will have to go in Canada. I am not sure that our disposition of titles is going to determine our final democratic spirit. I agree with the resolution before us; I agree with the amendment, and I agree with the amendment to the amendment. I cannot vote for them all to-night. I agree with the motion as an expedient beginning. I agree with the amendment as the goal to be reached, but not now. I believe in the amendment to the amendment as the natural thing to vote for, not by way of private members on this side of the House apologizing for the right hon. leader of the Government (Sir Robert Borden), but because the amendment to the amendment is suggested in view of the action taken prior to the assembling of this Parliament, in view of the fact that in war time, when democracy is reconstructing itself in the consciousness, not only of the Canadian people, but of all people who are alive to-day, certain prejudices, especially among the allied group of British nations included in the Empire of which we are a part, must be respected, and in view of the fact that we must not forget to recognize those true relationships which cannot be ignored in such a time as this.

I believe in supporting the amendment to the amendment, because we are assured by the right hon. gentleman who has submitted it to the House that a fair and full opportunity will be given for the discussion of this whole question within a few weeks—in which discussion the representatves of all the other dominions, and of the Motherland, as well as the worthy representatives of this country, will participate—and in that discussion the Canadian representatives will adequately state what we are thinking and what we are expecting, and what we hope to see a little later on. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that when Parliament reassembles, and if more time is needed for the consideration of this question, it will be afforded in the interval and we shall be in an even better position to vote for the amendment which has been placed before us during the present session, or for some resolution which will carry out the purpose and the spirit of that amendment. There is no need to apologize for supporting a course that to-day is the only one to be pursued, and I wish to say that as a private member of this House, occupying a seat on the Government side, and as a Canadian democrat, and the representative of a democratic constituency, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I can conscientiously and intelligently support the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. T. M. M. TWEEDIE (Calgary W.): I desire to say but a very few words upon this subject. First of all I think that the present Government should be congratulated upon the Order in Council which has been passed and the recommendations which have been made to the Imperial authorities in regard to the question of the bestowal of titles in this country. Strong feeling has been aroused in Canada, principally in connection with titles which were of an hereditary nature, and the people have placed the stamp of their disapproval against all such titles in this country.

Let me quote the third and fourth clauses of the Order in Council relating to this matter:

No hereditary title, of honour, shall hereafter be conferred upon a subject of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada.

Appropriate action shall be taken, whether by legislation or otherwise, to provide that after a prescribed period no title of honour held by a subject of His Majesty, now or hereafter ordinarily resident in Canda, shall be recognized as having hereditary effect.

I do not believe that it would have been possible two or three years ago in this country for any government to have taken such drastic action in regard to the conduct of the Imperial Government, or of the Sovereign, in connection with this matter. The Canadian Government have not only indicated their disapproval of hereditary titles in Canada, and placed themselves upon record in regard to it, but they have pledged themselves to enact the proper legislation, or take such a course as may be necessary to eliminate the hereditary feature from those titles in this country. I believe that public sentiment in Canada is moving very rapidly along this line, and that the country as a whole has no belief in the recognition of such titles. I believe that there are but few supporters of this idea in the Dominion. The Canadian people generally are educated and enlightened, and the conditions under which titles can survive and thrive are not to be found upon Canadian soil. While we congratulate the Government upon taking the steps which they have taken in connection with the matter of hereditary titles, we also think they must come to the realization that the whole sentiment of Canada, and more particularly the sentiment of Western Canada, from which I come, is absolutely opposed to the recognition of, or the bestowal of, titles of any kind upon any individual citizen. I think it is very fortunate that this discussion has taken place before the Prime Minister and the other members of his Cabinet go overseas. The result will be that when they come to discuss this question in London it will be with a full knowledge of the sentiment which exists throughout Canada, which they must have gathered from the debates which have taken place in this House. I believe that the day is not far distant when these titles will be banned from Canada. My view is that there is no room for such things in any part of this country. I intend to support the amendment to the amendment which was moved by the Prime Minister, but I think this matter can be safely left in the hands of himself and his colleagues when they come to take it up and discuss it with the Imperial authorities. My chief desire in speaking was to impress upon the Prime Minister again before he leaves the country, that, in my opinion, the whole sentiment of the Dominion is against the bestowal of titles upon Canadian citizens.

Mr. ROBERT H. BUTTS: It is a little difficult for me to understand why this discussion should have taken up so much time. What difference does it make to the average person whether they call me "Sir Robert" Butts or "Bob" Butts? If His Majesty, or the Premier of Canada made me "Sir Robert," down among the coal miners I should still be called "Bob" Butts, so that, "a rose by any other name will smell as sweet." At the same time there is a serious side to this question. If a Canadian should so distinguish himself—if, for instance, the right hon. leader of the Government and the right hon. leader of the Opposition have so distinguished themselves in the administration of the affairs of the country—that His Majesty the King sees fit to confer upon them the title of "Sir," what harm does it do? It is a distinction which lifts that man above the ordinary sphere of life; it recognizes his services to the State, and it hurts nobody. Then why in the world do we have all this loud talk about titles? I cannot understand it. Here we are over two hundred men assembled in Ottawa to legislate for this country, having a somewhat serious outlook, and yet we are spending hours talking about this trifling affair, when the world is in the greatest travail that it has ever experienced. Surely we ought to think a little bit more seriously about the situation that at present confronts the world.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Mr. Speaker, if the House would allow me a word of explanation—

Mr. SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON: When I proposed this amendment I had no conception that it was a question which might in any way precipitate a crisis in the country. I had no conception that the Prime Minister of this country would stake the existence of the Government on the issue. I was elected as a supporter of the Union Government, and I would much prefer to resign my seat here to-night than to jeopardize the existence of the Government. In my parliamentary experience in the old days, I understood that when a private member introduced a resolution members of the House on both sides were perfectly free to vote for or against it according to how it appealed to them. It was in that sense that I viewed this resolution of my friend the hon. member for Kingston, and I was thoroughly in favour of abolishing, particularly, hereditary titles. But when I observed the general opinion of the House that all titles should go on the scrap heap, I thought to myself: "Here is your opportunity, member for Springfield, just throw the monkey wrench into the works." And I must confess that, after all the fuss that has been raised over this, I will be disposed to hesitate before mature consideration of the consequences of an apparently entirely innocent and well-meant action. There is one thing, however, that I am well satisfied with. Member after member has arisen in this House and declared that titles must go. Where would that place myself and other hon. members if we forced the issue by voting against the Prime Minister's amendment? I think we are absolutely safe in concluding from this time forth that they are on the scrap-heap, and on the scrap-heap they go. The point I wish to emphasize is this: the right hon. leader of the Government has stated that if the amendment to the amendment moved by him fails to carry, his resignation will be in the hands of the Governor General. I was elected by an immense majority to come down and support the Win-the-War Government. I am free to say that there is no man in this country, in my judgment, as fit to lead this Government as is my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. I am free to say that I have sat behind this Government during this session with the greatest satisfaction. I have seen this Government implement its promises to this country one after the other —prohibition, Civil Service reform, Woman Suffrage, and so on all down the line. And I am delighted with the record that this Government has made. But I do not wish as a member, misunderstanding what the result of a simple amendment regarding titles would be, to take the responsibility of driving this Government out of power, and I do not think any member on this side of the House would desire that responsibility, and if I did so, I could not go back to Manitoba and face my constituents who elected me by such a tremendous majority to come here and support Sir Robert Borden and the Win-the-War Government, a Government composed of the best elements of both parties of this country.

I have come down here to support that Government, and I am delighted with the record that it has made. But when my right hon. friend the Prime Minister stands up in this House and before this country and says on this question of titles: if my amendment to the amendment fails to carry I shall resign—and the Government would be out, and the country thrown into chaos as a result. I am not prepared to take the responsibility. I am perfectly willing, in view of the promises that have been made, that titles from this time forward are as dead as Julius Caesar, to withdraw my amendment, with the consent of my seconder.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Do I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member has the right to withdraw his amendment without the unanimous consent of the House? I am not willing to give my consent.

Mr. SPEAKER: It requires the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I refuse to give my consent.

House divided on the proposed amendment to the amendment of Sir Robert Borden:

PAIRS.

The chief whips announce that there are no pairs on the foregoing division.

Mr. ROBB: I desire to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that the member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) who is in the House, has not voted.

Mr. RICHARDSON: The reason why I did not vote was that the House declined to accept the withdrawal of my resolution, and the Government had an abundant majority without my vote. I was not quite sure what position I should take, and when I do not know what position to take, I do not take any.

Mr. TREMAIN: I was paired with the member for Inverness (Mr. Chisholm). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment to the amendment.

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is now on the amendment as amended.

Mr. FIELDING: May we have the amendment in its present form read? We are a little muddled as to how the matter stands.

Mr. SPEAKER: The amendment of Mr. Richardson, seconded by Mr. Thomson, is as follows:

> That the word "hereditary" be struck out from resolution and that the third paragraph thereof conclude with the word "Canada" in the ensuing line.

The amendment to the amendment, having been adopted by the House, now stands as part of the amendment.

Mr. FIELDING: Including the words which you have just read from the original amendment?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes. The amendment to the amendment is now added to that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The resolution of the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) is in the following words:

> We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty praying that Your Majesty hereafter may be graciously pleased to refrain from conferring any hereditary titles upon Your subjects domiciled or living in Canada—

I understand that that resolution is now affirmed, and that the words of the Prime Minister's resolution are added thereto.

Mr. SPEAKER: The word "hereditary" is omitted, and superimposed on that are the words of the amended amendment.

Amendment to the amendment agreed to, and motion (Mr. Nickle) as amended agreed to.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, Bill No. 106, to amend The Companies Act in various particulars—Mr. Burrell—was read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

On the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean for Committee of Supply:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is nearly twelve o'clock. Does the Prime Minister not think that we should adjourn?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We have not accomplished very much; I thought that we might go on for a while.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We have accomplished a great deal. It is understood that to-morrow the first Order will be the motion of the member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp) on going into Committee of Supply?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I should be glad if he would go on to-night. If he does not, we will move the House into Committee of Supply to-morrow.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: To-morrow morning?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, if he does not care to go on to-night.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No.

Mr. BUREAU: Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister to what hour he intends to keep the House sitting?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I really do not know; it will depend upon how we feel. If we continue to be as fresh as we are at present we might keep on until half past twelve or one o'clock.

Mr. BUREAU: We sat until twenty minutes past one this morning. Hon. gentlemen opposite can obtain some relief by taking three shifts, but we are here all the time. I think we should adjourn at twelve or half past twelve.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We will say half past twelve, if my hon. friend does not feel in good form.

Mr. BUREAU: I feel in good form, but I do not feel like being imposed upon because we are less numerous on this side of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) in his seat, but I wish to give notice that at the earliest opportunity I shall direct the attention of the House to the expropriaion case of the King v. Belanger in the Supreme Court.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee of Supply.

Allowance to J. B. Challies, a member and secretary of the Lake of the Woods Technical Board for services rendered since March, 1914, $500.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Challies has performed very efficient services, and this allowance has been recommended by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne), who is the Chairman of the Board.

Arts and Agriculture—towards the encouragement of cold storage warehouses for the better preservation and handling of perishable food products, $25,000.

Mr. PARENT: About May 8, I put on the Order Paper a question which was answered yesterday. From that answer I found that Mr. Philippe Furois, of the city of Quebec, had apparently been appointed to a very important position. That position, from the answer given on Hansard was that of secretary and organizer for increased conservation in the province of Quebec. The position is apparently an important one, because Mr. Furois receives a salary of $250 a month for that work. I have nothing to say against Mr. Furois personally. Probably the Government found that it was necessary to give him remuneration of some kind for his services, because, in the last election—he was a candidate for the Union Government in the constituency of Bonaventure—but that I shall leave aside. The term "secretary and organizer for increased conservation in the province of Quebec" is not quite clear to me, and I should like to get some information as to his duties. As I did not find that out in the answer that was put on Hansard, I tried to secure some information outside. I have discovered that Mr. Furois is attending particularly to the conservation of fish and is endeavouring to popularize the consumption of fish, especially in the province of Quebec. Whether that information is correct or not, I do not know, but that is my information. The minister, I think, might have answered my question somewhat more clearly. The duties of Mr. Furois, as I understand it are as follows: First, to see that a good supply of fish is maintained;

12 m.

secondly, that the fish is reasonable in price; thirdly, that the fish is in good condition and kept in a sanitary manner. If that be the case, possibly Mr. Furois has all the qualifications necessary for fulfilling the duties imposed upon him. He has run in a constituency the shores of which are washed up by the river St. Lawrence. The county of Bonaventure touches the Gulf of St. Lawrence, in which any quantity of fish can be found. More than that, he has been in the real estate business all his life, so he probably knows all about fish, so it may be a good appointment. But what I want to call the particular attention of the minister to is this, that in the city of Quebec for the last two or three months the attention of the department and of the Food Board has been especially directed to the fact that the price of fish in that city and its environs has been so high that it has been practically impossible for any man of ordinary means to attempt to buy it. The department and the Food Board have had offers from men like Mr. Carroll, of the Daily Telegraph of Quebec, who, acting in a truly patriotic fashion, offered his services gratuitously to the department and to the country with the view of popularizing the consumption of fish, not only in Quebec, but throughout the rest of Canada. Further, Colonel Talbot, who for a good many years represented the constituency of Bellechasse in this House, and who is well known to a few hon. members, offered his services without remuneration for the very purposes that I mentioned a moment ago. At one time the Food Controller said that Col. Talbot's services would be welcomed and that he would receive word one day or another that his services were required; but there was so much delay that that gentleman, after a while, got so tired of corresponding with the Food Controller that he thought fit to send the following letter, which I would like to place before the minister so that he will know the feeling of a man who has offered his services without remuneration, when the minister has seen fit to appoint a man like Mr. Furois at a salary of $250 a month:

Sir,

I have been waiting in vain for your many proposals and offers to mature into facts. I am now thoroughly convinced of what I surmised from the beginning and what I told to Mr. Carroll on our return to Quebec about the composition of your Board of Control and Fish Committee. You are a bunch of well selected four flushers paid according to your ability at bluffing. Your game costs the country $200,000 a year. What a lot of fish this amount would buy for the poor people. With such a government of autocrats and millionnaires as this country is now cursed with one should not be surprised at anything. It is quite evident that besides talking, the only work you do is reading letters, dictating answers and giving advice gathered from different points where you have found good men patriotic enough to do your work for nothing. The 34 stenographers you employ, being no doubt overworked, you can save yourself the trouble of answering this letter as you cannot even follow a correspondence properly.

This letter was written by a man who is experienced in public life, is well known to a good many members of this House, and has been overseas. He offered his services without remuneration to the Canada Food Board with a view to increasing the fish consumption in this country, but his services were declined and Mr. Philippe Furois, the defeated candidate in the last election in the county of Bonaventure, was appointed in his stead at a salary of $250 a month. I am not complaining about Mr. Furois, and I know that having given the facts to the minister he will take them into his consideration and I can leave the matter to him.

Mr. CRERAR: The appointment of the gentleman referred does not come within the Department of Agriculture. He was appointed by the Canada Food Board, I understand. I did not know there was such a gentleman in existence until a question on the Order Paper was brought to my attention a few days ago. I do not know what the capabilities of Mr. Furois are for the position he holds, but I presume the chairman of the Canada Food Board would satisfy himself that he was well qualified. I shall look into the matter.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Had patronage anything to do with it?

Mr. CRERAR: I knew absolutely nothing about the appointment, but as I have already said I shall be glad to bring this matter to the attention of the chairman of the Food Board.

Mr. PARENT: I am quite convinced the minister knew nothing about it personally, or I should probably never have brought the matter up in the House. The gentleman this letter is addressed to is Mr. H. B. Thomson, Food Controller, Ottawa, and I believe the Food Board is under the administration or supervision of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. CRERAR: The Food Board reports to Council and carries on its business with Council through the Minister of Agriculture, and that is about the extent of the jurisdiction of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. McMASTER: The minister does not suggest that he is not the minister responsible to this House for the dealings of the Food Board?

Mr. CRERAR: Oh, no.

Exhibitions, $25,000.

Mr. KAY: What exhibitions are included?

Mr. CRERAR: As hon. gentlemen are, perhaps, aware, it has been the policy of the department for a good many years to be represented at international exhibitions in various parts of the world, the last one in which we took part being at San Diego, I believe. This work has largely ceased since the war broke out, but the vote is retained to keep in existence the organization that was built up during several years to carry on this work. This money is required to pay the salaries of the officials.

Mr. PEDLOW: While the war is on could not this branch be dispensed with, or the officials be engaged in some other branch of the Service?

Mr. CRERAR: It is really a question of policy. It has been thought wise for a good many years now for Canada to be represented at these exhibitions, and I think it would be unfortunate to break up an organization that is skilled in the handling of this work.

Mr. KAY: Do I understand there will be no grants to exhibitions this year?

Mr. CRERAR: I was stating that the members of the staff are practically all engaged in other branches of the Service, but their salaries are still paid out of this vote.

Mr. PEDLOW: That is carrying out the suggestion I made a moment ago, but the salaries are still charged up to the Department of Agriculture. Why not charge them to the departments in which the men are working?

Mr. CRERAR: That is merely a matter of book-keeping.

Mr. PEDLOW: But why not show the true state of affairs?

Mr. PARENT: Has the minister received a request from the corporation of the city of Quebec for a grant to the annual exhibition held in that city in September?

Mr. CRERAR: I believe such a request has been received, but any money granted for that purpose would come out of the vote under the Live Stock Branch.

Mr. PARENT: It is immaterial to me what branch it comes out of, but I wanted to know whether a grant would be made by the Government to the Quebec exhibition this year.

Mr. CRERAR: No such grant would be made out of this vote, which is to pay the salaries of the exhibition staff.

Mr. KAY: In previous years, under this vote, there has been a grant made to special exhibitions. I am glad to hear the minister state that it is not to be continued this year. I had, earlier in the session, a resolution on the Order Paper urging the Government to prohibit the holding of exhibitions this year for the purpose of increasing and conserving labour on the farm. Unfortunately, this resolution was not reached and it was withdrawn. I put that resolution on the Order Paper because I was firmly convinced that production was of paramount importance during the war and that there was a great expenditure and loss of time and labour in attending exhibitions. I calculated that at least 5,000,000 days of labour are lost on the farm by farmers attending fall exhibitions in this country, by the transportation of livestock and by the travel of the people in order to attend exhibitions. But inasmuch as the Government, by their recent Order in Council affecting the Military Service Act, seem to indicate that production is not of paramount importance, I will have nothing further to say in this regard at the present time. I am very strongly in favour of exhibitions in normal years. They have done a great deal for agriculture and for promoting the livestock industry. But I think that in the interest of greater production they should not be held during the war. I offer that suggestion, although it will not be possible to carry it out this year. In case, next year, the Government should decide that production is of paramount importance, I would suggest that they prohibit the holding of fall fairs.

Mr. GLASS: I cannot see it from the same angle that my hon. friend (Mr. Kay) does. I do not agree with him in what he said with reference to any reduction in the assistance or support given to the holding of fairs throughout the country. He says that the object of withholding or reducing the grant is to enable the farmers to increase production. I do not think his reasoning is at all logical, because I do not know of anything that has done more to stimulate production or to encourage intensified farming than the fall fairs. I think the House and the country can be congratulated on the fact that the resolution that the hon. gentleman had on the Order Paper has not been presented and that his wishes have not prevailed. I call the attention of the committee to the fact that the experience of recent years in extending these fall fairs, even to the pupils in the schools, has proved most effective in stimulating the agricultural industry and increasing production. I refer particularly to township fairs where the competitions have been among the younger element and the school children. We have had competitions in production in my part of the country which have brought out products that have outclassed anything that the farmers have been able to produce in this country. On one occasion we had an acre production competition. The object of this competition was not to see who could grow the best potatoes, fruit, or products of other kinds, but to see who could produce the greatest amount of value from an acre of land. In connection with this competition, three boys, side by side, in the township, produced an average of about 500 bushels of potatoes to the acre. They produced that at 40 cents per bushel, and they had a profit of over $168 per acre over labour and everything else. The results obtained by those boys demonstrated to the farmers the fact that they were not getting the greatest production out of the ground. School children, in connection with these little exhibitions that are held, are being taught how to organize and to work their small plots of ground set apart for them on certain portions of the farm. Since these fairs have been established they have had a most stimulating and encouraging effect upon production and intensive farming. I should be sorry to see the Government take any steps that would result in withdrawing any encouragement from these exhibitions. I did not understand the minister to say that it was the intention to reduce these grants. There has been for a number of years past a grant given by the Dominion Government to exhibitions which have a prize list aggregating a certain maximum—I think, $10,000. I hope it is not the intention of the Government to reduce that encouragement to exhibitions.

Mr. BOYCE: It would be a very great mistake to do anything that would offer any discouragement to the agricultural industry at the present time. There never was a time when it was so necessary to get all we possibly can out of the soil. This applies not only to crop production but to the live stock industry as well. Nothing stimulates the live stock industry like the competitions at these exhibitions. I am not speaking as one who is not interested, because I have been a farmer all my life; I have attended these exhibitions, and I think they are a very great benefit to the country generally. If you break them down now you will be put to a great deal of trouble and expense before you can revive them and put them on the footing that they at present occupy. I must congratulate the Government generally on the great assistance that they have given to the agricultural and live stock industries. I trust the Government will give very serious consideration to the question before favouring any proposal that will result in the discouragement of these exhibitions, because they are the very best agencies we have in stimulating production and encouraging the development of the resources of this country.

Mr. MOWAT: While it may probably appear presumptuous of me to intrude on the domain of agriculture, I would like to felicitate my hon. friend from Missisquoi (Mr. Kay) upon dropping his motion. However well known my hon. friend may have been in Ontario before he introduced his motion, I can assure him that he became even better known in all quarters of the province after he had given notice of it. We have in Toronto an exhibition which we look upon as a liberal education for the people of Ontario, and when it is learned that that hon. gentleman has abandoned his resolution the many people who are interested in that exhibition will be very pleased.

Mr. KAY: I do not wish to sail under any false colours. The hon. member from Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) must thank the Government, and not me. It is only because the Government does not favour production that I have withdrawn my resolution.

Publications Branch, $30,000.

Mr. GLASS: I suppose this item is for the publication of pamphlets in connection with the department. I sometimes think, in reference to the publication of information given out by the department, that very much more effective and speedy work would be accomplished if the agricultural press were used. For example, in connection with the regulations which have been promulgated by the Food Board in reference to the matter of food, I had the situation illustrated to me when the farmers' delegation were here a short time ago. In the district from which I come dairying and generally mixed farming is carried on. The farmers in that district, responding to the urgent demand of the Government to increase the production of hogs, had made arrangements for increasing that production this year, and they were guaranteed that an ample supply of feed would be available. However, we know that in all parts of the country great difficulty has been experienced in that regard, and the facts have already been given to the House, that in some places the farmers were compelled to take a percentage of flour from the millers in order to get a certain quantity of bran and shorts. In fact, the situation is reaching the stage that in some localties in the West the farmers cannot get either bran or shorts; they have the stock on their hands and cannot feed them. The farmers whom I met wanted to know where they could get corn and oil cake. As a matter of fact the Dominion Government have made every provision for putting the farmer in touch with the market for corn, and they also had under their control supplies of oil cake, but the farmers did not know anything about it. Announcement of the Government's plans was made in an Order in Council, or in some other way, but it was of no use to the farmers because they did not know anything about it. If matters of that kind were published in the agricultural press, and that press was more generally used for the publication of announcements that are designed to quickly reach the farmers, much better results would be accomplished, and a good deal more speedily. The Agricultural Gazette which has been published in the past, I think might well be dispensed with altogether. I do not think it reaches those that it is intended to reach, because it is not producing any beneficial effects. I wish to impress upon the minister that the reports which are intended to reach the farmers quickly do not reach them through the ordinary bulletins as now published and circulated and, as I say, more effective results would be achieved if the agricultural press were used for the publication of matters of this kind.

Mr. PARENT: I would call the attention of the minister to the fact that in the province of Quebec the farmers are not generally aware that there are such publications as the department is distributing. I would suggest to him that he publish an advertisement in every newspaper in the province announcing that bulletins will be supplied to any one who asks for them. In that way he is likely to secure very beneficial results. I have no complaint to make of the bulletins which he issues—they are very interesting and very much appreciated—but the trouble is that they are only distributed by members to their constituents in very small numbers, whereas if they were more largely circulated, greater benefit would result to the country at large.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the minister would consent to item No. 59 with respect to the administration and carrying out the provisions of the Agricultural Instruction Act, being allowed to stand so, that a general discussion might take place upon it in the event of any member wanting to talk upon the subject of agriculture, it would be well to pass the rest of the items.

Mr. DAVIS: Advertising in publications, in my opinion, would not be as effective as the sending of educative pamphlets to every public school throughout the Dominion.

Mr. CRERAR: I shall be very glad to keep in mind the suggestions that have been made by hon. gentlemen to-night, with respect to the distribution of these pamphlets, some of which suggestions, I think, have a good deal of merit.

Mr. KAY: Would the minister tell us what is the cost of publishing the Agricultural Gazette?

Mr. CRERAR: It is $25,000 a year.

For the development of the live stock industry, $600,000.

Mr. McCREA: The Department of Agriculture has an office in Sherbrooke in which I think some five or six individuals are employed, and I would like to ask the minister if he is thoroughly informed as to what these people are doing. I think it would be well for him to inquire into the running of that office and see if full value is being given for the money spent. I am of the opinion that the staff there is supposed to buy and distribute thoroughbred stock but the class of stock they have been handling has been of a very poor class, and I think there has been more speculation going on than anything else. I am not here, however, to make charges; I simply call the attention of the minister to the fact that it would be wise to look into the running of that office and ascertain whether he is getting full value for the money expended.

Mr. CRERAR: I stated last evening, when we were considering some other items in the Estimates, that I have not yet had an opportunity to go very fully into the work of the department. As hon. gentlemen will appreciate if they reflect for a moment, it is a very large department, and embraces a great many activities. I tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCrea) that the matter which he has brought to my attention will be closely scrutinized. I aim, as far as possible, at getting efficiency in this department. And I do not intend for one moment that officials shall hold jobs unless they are giving service for the money they are getting.

Mr. McCREA: I appreciate very much the distribution of a good class of live-stock, but I also am aware of the damage that can be done by distributing livestock that is not very good. And I am inclined to believe that there is speculation going on.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I notice that there is a decrease of $100,000 in this item as compared with last year, and the cost of pure-bred animals has increased fully one-third during that time. I am afraid the hon. gentleman who has just spoken will not be getting the quality of animals he expects if the distribution is to be kept up while the estimate is being reduced by $100,000. I think that is the reason why the animals in many cases are not as satisfactory as he would like them to be. You may get a pure-bred animal, but it is impossible to get one of high standard and really up-to-date from a progressive farmer at the price that has been fixed. The department has set a fixed price for pure-bred animals. Consequently, you cannot expect to get animals of a high standard, with the estimate being cut down by $100,000 and the price going up. In many instances, the prices are almost double what they were two years ago. What proportion of these animals are distributed in the various provinces? For instance, can the minister give any estimate as to the number of animals placed in the province of Ontario during the past year?

Mr. CRERAR: I shall give the hon. gentleman the information; it is available.

Mr. KAY: Do I understand that this amount is entirely devoted to the purchase of pure-bred sires?

Mr. CRERAR: No. It is for the general livestock industry, the purchase of livestock, cattle, horses, swine and sheep; grants to agricultural fairs, which were referred to a short time ago, are also included in this vote.

Mr. KAY: How much is to be applied to agricultural fairs this year?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I do not ask the minister to supply the information now but any time in the near future will do just as well.

Mr. CRERAR: The appropriation for agricultural fairs for this year is $80,000 for the whole of Canada.

Mr. KAY: How is it to be distributed and where?

Mr. CRERAR: It is distributed to the fairs throughout Canada which qualify under the regulations governing the grant laid down by the department. The principle on which it is operated is that the local fair board shall contribute a certain amount of money; if they reach that amount then the department will supplement it with an additional grant.

Mr. KAY: Does that apply to any fall fair throughout Canada?

Mr. CRERAR: It applies to any fair which will meet the conditions laid down by the department.

Mr. PEDLOW: This grant is on the same basis which has obtained heretofore? There is no change in the basis?

Mr. CRERAR: No. The conditions under which this grant will be given this year are the same as last year with the exception that the general grants are cut down twenty-five per cent.

Mr. KNOX: I would like to put myself on record as saying that the grant to the fall fairs is made to those that have previously paid out $6,000 in prizes for livestock. That means that large fairs have no difficulty in complying with the regulations, whereas the smaller fairs cannot come up to that. I suggest that some other system be adopted, whereby the small fairs shall be given some assistance.

Mr. PEDLOW: What is the idea of cutting down the grant twenty-five per cent?

Mr. CRERAR: Economy.

Mr. PEDLOW: Does the hon. minister think that is wisdom in view of the fact that these fall fairs are an encouragement to greater production? I think it is wise to increase, rather than decrease, these grants, if you want to encourage the farmers to produce.

Mr. CRERAR: There are quite a number who agree with the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Kay) that these fairs should be cut out altogether. We have tried to strike the proper medium and balance between the two ideas.

Mr. CAHILL: How does the number of animals this year compare with previous years. Has the department as many horses or cattle for distribution, and are they buying any this year?

Mr. CRERAR: The department anticipate that there will not be as many distributed this year as in former years. Of course, the distribution has been going on for a number of years, and the demand to a certain extent has been met. In addition there is difficulty in getting sires of the proper type.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: There were some left in Dorchester county.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The appropriation for fall fairs uses up only $8,000, consequently there is $592,000 of this vote left.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Minister of Agriculture said $80,000 was set aside for fairs.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There is a decrease of $100,000 in this item compaired with last year, and the minister says this is done for the sake of economy. In view of the condition of the livestock industry of Canada at this time, if there is one place where economy should not be exercised it is here. I do not think this is the right time to practice economy so far as the livestock industry is concerned. This industry was never in a more critical condition, in our country or in the world than at the present time. If there is one item in the Estimates which should not be reduced, it is this one. It should be increased.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The vote is for the same amount as the actual expenditure under this item last year.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That would indicate that the whole amount voted in the previous year has not been spent. As the increase in the cost of these animals is so much greater at the present time, even with the amount of last year's expenditure not nearly so many animals can be distributed this year as last year.

This is one branch of the department that ought to be encouraged. Splendid results have been obtained through the distribution of male animals throughout the country. Few of these animals have been distributed throughout the older districts, but settlers in the newer districts who, perhaps, have not the means of purchasing these animals welcome the opportunity of getting them in this way. A great stimulus is thus afforded to the live stock industry, which was never so much in need of a stimulus as it is to-day. After the war there will be greater demands for pure-bred live stock than there ever was before, and the encouragement of the live stock industry will amply repay the Government for any expenditure they may make in that line. I regret that there has been a reduction of $100,000 in the estimate for this purpose this year.

Mr. CRERAR: While the vote last year was $700,000, of that amount $105,000 was not expended. Consequently, the estimates for the present year are about equal to the total expenditure of last year.

Mr. PEDLOW: Why do you make a reduction of twenty-five per cent in the grant you give to the fall fairs?

Mr. CRERAR: In order that we may have more money to meet the request of the member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) with regard to the purchase of higher-priced sires.

Mr. KAY: If this item carries, may we discuss the live stock industry when the estimates come up again?

Mr. CRERAR: It may be discussed on the Supplementary Estimates.

To enforce the Seed Act, to test seed for farmers and seed merchants, to encourage the production and use of superior seeds, and to encourage the production of farm and garden crops, $165,000.

Mr. VIEN: I move that we adjourn.

The CHAIRMAN: It is customary for the hon. member leading the Government or the hon. member leading the Opposition to move such a resolution as that. But, if the hon. member (Mr. Vien) insists, I will put his motion that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. VIEN: I do not insist.

The CHAIRMAN: There was an agreement with the hon. gentleman who is leading the Opposition that item 58 should be passed before the committee rises.

Mr. McKENZIE: I propose that we put everything through except item 59, which had better stand so that there may be a general discussion on it.

Mr. GLASS: Yesterday I attended a convention of the flax growers in Toronto. When the subject of flax was under consideration in the House on a previous occasion, I drew the attention of the minister to the fact that seed imported into Canada—some say from Siberia, some say from Japan—was being distributed by Colonel Wayland under the direction of the British Government for the purpose of growing seed to reproduce flax in Ireland and in Great Britain next year. In Ontario, Quebec, and all the other provinces where fibre flax is grown, a reputation has been built up for the production of high-grade flax fibre seed. Nobody knows anything about this seed which comes from Siberia, or from Japan, as the case may be; we do not know whether it is pure seed; we do not know whether it can grow fibre; we do not know whether it will be good even for linseed oil; it is simply a gamble, an experiment. This seed is being distributed throughout Ontario, Quebec and the western provinces and is grown side by side with our own product by the farmers who are growing seed from Ontario flax. The seed to which I have referred is distributed free on the understanding that the recipient shall return the amount given him for seed, and when the crop is harvested he is guaranteed $4.50 a bushel for the balance. If a farmer is growing a ten-acre field of Colonel Wayland's seed and, alongside of that, a ten-acre field of our own fibre seed, and Colonel Wayland offers him $4.50 a bushel for the former and the Irish market offers $10 a bushel for the latter, what is to prevent the farmer from mixing these two seeds in order to get the larger price, thus damning the reputation which it has taken years to build up? Our standard fibre seed should be kept separate from any other and, when sold in the British market next year, should be sold for what it is—Canadan flax fibre seed; and this other seed, which nobody knows anything about, should also be sold for what it is. This matter was thoroughly discussed at the meeting yesterday afternoon. The flax men of the country are greatly alarmed at the possible results of the distribution of this seed. They have passed a resolution which will be sent to the minister to-day, setting forth their views and urging that he take such steps as may be necessary to protect the reputation that the Canadian people have built up with regard to their flax fibre seed.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. J. D. REID: On the Order Paper there are two or three small Bills that should take only a very short time to pass this House. There is one Bill, No. 70, to consolidate and amend the Railway Act. A good many hon. members from the West; in fact, members on both sides of the House say that this Bill should remain over until next session. If the House wishes this Bill to remain over, it should take but a very short time to pass the other three Bills. There are quite a number of Estimates yet to be passed. From what I can judge, it is the desire of hon. members on both sides of the House that we should, if possible, prorogue on Thursday, the day before the Queen's birthday, and I simply wish to suggest that perhaps after our debate on Wednesday, we might sit late in the evening and get the Estimates through if possible. If we could agree on both sides of the House about working late Wednesday night, we might be able to prorogue late on Thursday evening. So far as the Government are concerned, we would be very willing to facilitate matters, if members on both sides of the House would agree to that proposition.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I should not like to commit the Opposition. I understand the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition have some sort of an agreement. In the morning, before the Orders of the Day are called, if the minister will renew his request, we might come to some agreement.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Reid, the House adjourned at 12.55 a.m., Wednesday.

Wednesday, May 22, 1918.

The House met at Eleven o'clock.

RETURN OF MEMBER FOR YUKON.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery a certificate of the election and return of Alfred Thompson, Esq., for the electoral district of the Yukon.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE—SUPPLY OF LABOUR.

Mr. R. C. Henders (Macdonald) presented the following report from the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization:

> Your Committee have had before them for further consideration the question of labour in connection with agriculture, and how it best can be applied until the end of the war. Sub-committees appointed to consider the matter have gone very carefully into it, as well as other matters of equal importance, and have made their several reports which your Committee adopted and agreed to report the same herewith for the information of the House.

CONCURRENCE IN ORDERS IN COUNCIL

Sir GEORGE FOSTER moved that the Orders in Council laid on the table of the House on the 2nd April, 1918, be concurred in. He said: The Orders in Council which have been issued and laid on the Table form a long list of two pages. They are formal to a certain extent, but the law requires that these Orders in Council when passed shall be laid on the table of the House within a certain time. I think they are not law until they are so laid on the Table of the House, and thereafter if approved by the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: These Orders in Council, as I understand the law, have to be submitted to the House and ratified by the House.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: So I would suggest that my hon. friend allow his motion to stand until to-morrow.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stand.

OFFICIALS OF THE HOUSE.

APPOINTMENT OF MR. MARCEL GABARD AS OFFICIAL REPORTER.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER moved:

That the recommendation of his honour the Speaker, laid upon the Table of the House on the 21st instant, respecting the appointment of Mr. Marcel Gabard to the position of official reporter of the Debates of the House of Commons, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Copy of Order in Council P.C. 1129 dated 11th May, 1918, Amendments of Defence of Canada, Order 1917, section 22A re Ships' Lights.—Hon. Mr. Ballantyne.

Copy of Order in Council P.C. 1102, dated 10th May, 1918, Amendments of Defence of Canada, 1917, section 23C, re Fitting and Supplying Vessels registered in Canada with defensive armaments.— Hon. Mr. Ballantyne.

Annual Report of the Trade of Canada, 1917.—Sir George Foster.

Return of amounts paid the Toronto Globe and the Toronto Star respectively from January 1, 1917, and April 1, 1918, for all services between said dates.—Hon. Martin Burrell.

Return of quantity of bran, shorts or mill feed exported to the United States by and without license between August 1, 1917, and February 2, 1918; also the firms in Canada to which licenses have been granted and the quantity in each case.—Hon. Martin Burrell.

BILL RESPECTING THE YUKON ELECTION.

On motion of Hon. Hugh Guthrie, Bill No. 112, respecting the election held in the electoral district of Yukon, was introduced and read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall said Bill be read a second time—now?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Next sitting of the House.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 113, to amend the Bills of Exchange Act.

He said: This is a very simple amendment, but it is considered of very great importance from the point of view of the banking business of the country. It is to amend the present provision to the effect that no protest of a bill of exchange can take place until three o'clock in the afternoon by substituting half-past two. It is represented by the bankers generally that as a result of the large number of their employees who have been called away for military service, it is very difficult for them indeed to have the necessary work after the closing hour of the bank done in the day by the employees who are with them, and that it would mitigate that inconvenience very greatly if it were possible for them to close banking hours at half-past two instead of three o'clock. If the House would be disposed to give consent to the introduction of the Bill without notice—which, of course, would imply the waiving of the rules as to the different readings—I would beg for leave to introduce Bill No. 113, to amend the Bills of Exchange Act. Of course, I understand that if it cannot be dealt with in that way, it cannot be dealt with at all.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understand that the Bill of which my hon. friend has given notice of his intention to introduce, is, as represented, a very important one. It has been represented to me also that the banking staffs have been so depleted by the necessities of the military service that it is impossible for them to do their work within the usual hours. Therefore the Bill becomes a public necessity. It can inconvenience nobody. It is simply to provide that bills of exchange may be protested at half-past two instead of three o'clock.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Does it make half-past two the closing hour of the banks?

Mr. DOHERTY: That would be the practical effect.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

EXTENSION OF LEAVE TO BANK CLERKS.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): I desire to ask the Government, in view of the reply given the farmers regarding the exemption of their sons of ages twenty, twenty-one and twenty-two, if it is true that an arrangement has been made whereby bank clerks of these same ages, who were to report for military service on June 1, or July 1, have been granted exemption up to January 1, 1919, and if it be true that the reason for granting such exemption to these bank clerks is that these boys will be required to help in the next Victory Loan?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Minister of Militia is not at present in his seat. I will confer with him, and give my hon. friend the information he asks for at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. MURPHY: Later in the day?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

ADMINISTRATION OF MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

Sir SAM HUGHES (Victoria): In The Ottawa Journal this morning I observe two articles, I do not propose to read them, pointing out a charge that in the Naval Service Department the Military Service Act has not been properly administered. I take the liberty of drawing the attention of the Government to this matter.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In what respect?

Sir SAM HUGHES: That officers are exempted who should go. The articles speak for themselves. I take the liberty of drawing the attention of the Government to this fact, that nothing will break up the Military Service Act quicker than any attempt not to give even-handed justice all round.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: With regard to the same subject of the application of the Military Service Act, the Minister of Militia some days ago informed the House that conscripts would be allowed leave of absence to complete seeding. I have to represent to the Government that at the present time in certain parts of the province of Quebec, and I presume also in the Maritime Provinces, seeding is now at its most active period. Men are being required to report at Ottawa, coming say from the county of Labelle, which compels these men to travel via Montreal necessitating four days to make the trip. This, of course, means that they lose very valuable time in the seeding season. I call the attention of my right hon. friend to the matter.

[Mr. Murphy.]

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I shall consult with the Minister of Militia with respect to this matter, which is one of detail, and information will be given later on in the day.

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Naval Service): In answer to the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) in reference to the editorial that appeared in this morning's Journal, respecting a clerk in the Department of the Naval Service, I wish to say that I shall have the matter very carefully looked into, and I shall be glad to-morrow, or possibly this afternoon, to give the hon. member the information for which he asks.

Mr. H. A. FORTIER (Labelle): Is it the intention of the Government to have the only support of a widowed mother, and the only son of a family, exempted from military service? Is it also the intention of the Government to send new instructions to the registrars, especially to the registrar of Military District No. 3, where farmers and sons of farmers have been called up at the same time as men from the cities and towns? I am speaking particularly of the county of Labelle, where hundreds of farmers have been called up at the same time as men from the cities and towns, and have been obliged to report, and have actually reported, to the great detriment of the farming interests of that county?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I shall have to make to my hon. friend the same answer as I made in regard to the other two questions. When I have an opportunity to see the Minister of Militia, I shall draw his attention to the question, and the information will be given later on.

PARLIAMENTARY PROCEDURE—MEMBER TO VOTE WHEN IN CHAMBER.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, by your leave I want to call your attention to a point of parliamentary procedure which was called to your attention yesterday, but on which you did not give any ruling. Your attention was called to the fact that the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) did not record his vote. The rule of the House is that, if the Speaker's attention is drawn to the fact that a member did not vote, the Speaker will call upon him to record his vote. I was quite familiar with the rule, but I did not have it under my hand, and it would have taken some time to find it. As the House was rather impatient, I thought I would defer the matter until to-day. In Bourinot, fourth edition, at page 381, there is this statement:

> If a member of the Commons who has heard the question put does not vote and the attention of the Speaker is directed to the fact, the latter will call upon him to declare on which side he votes; and his name will be recorded accordingly.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question had not previously arisen in my experience as a member of the House or as Speaker. I am inclined to the belief that the authority as cited by the right hon. member has reference to the practice in the British House of Commons. I am not at the moment in a position to give a positive, considered decision upon the point of order, but I shall take the earliest opportunity of consulting the authorities and of advising the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There are not many such cases, but I recollect one case which the rule was applied. I do not know if the Minister of Trade and Commerce recollects it. I cannot state the precise occasion, but the division was that rule applies in Canada as well as in Great Britain.

MARINE TRADES STRIKE IN MONTREAL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Has the Minister of Labour any information to give to the House in regard to the strike in Montreal?

Hon. Mr. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): The leader of the Opposition yesterday asked me concerning a labour dispute in the firm of Fraser, Brace Company, Montreal. I was not at that time prepared to give him a detailed statement of the situation. I find that we were advised Monday evening of the strike, and we at once instructed our fair-wage officer there to take the matter up. He had succeeded in settling a similar dispute with the Canadian Vickers Company, and getting an agreement signed. We are now advised that the only point in dispute with the Fraser, Brace Company is that while they have agreed by word of mouth to adopt the substance of the agreement made with the Canadian Vickers Company, they have refused to sign an agreement to that effect. That is the only matter that is left unsettled. Our man is doing the best he can to effect an agreement.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Have the men yet resumed work?

Mr. CROTHERS: I think not.

THE WINNIPEG STRIKE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): As the newspapers announce that a member of the Government has gone to Winnipeg in connection with the strike there, I would like to ask if the Minister of Labour has any information to give to the House in regard to the matter.

Hon. Mr. CROTHERS: I have nothing from Winnipeg this morning except what appears in the public press. I have had for several days two influential labour leaders working in co-operation with the civic committee and the members of the city council, and I am in hopes that they will succeed in effecting an adjustment. The last advice I had from one of them was yesterday morning when he said that progress was slow, but that he had hopes they would succeed in reaching a satisfactory settlement.

Mr. MURPHY: Where is that co-operation in progress—here or in Winnipeg?

Mr. CROTHERS: In Winnipeg.

RESOLUTION RE SUSPENSION OF HABEAS CORPUS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (North Simcoe): I do not know whether I am in order or not, but there is on the Order Paper a resolution, No. 4, standing in my name. I do not expect that resolution will be reached during this session, and I wish to drop it.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not competent for the hon. member to do so except on motion of the leader of the Government. It would be advisable for the hon. member to confer with him.

CIVIL PAY OF CIVIL SERVANTS OVERSEAS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. N. W. ROWELL (President of the Council): The Prime Minister stated yesterday that an announcement would be made to-day with reference to the civil pay of civil servants serving overseas, and I now wish to read to the House the operative part of an Order in Council passed on the 21st of May dealing with this matter. The members of the House will recall that there are three classes into which the civil servants who are now serving with the military forces might be divided: Those who went overseas in the early part of the war received both their civil pay and their military pay. At a later day an Order in Council was passed providing that those who enlisted after that date should receive whichever pay was the larger of the two, civil or military, and then, when the Military Service Act came into operation, an Order in Council was passed providing that civil servants enlisting after that date would receive their military pay only. By the Order in Council of the 5th of April, 1918, those Orders in Council were all modified so as to provide that, after the date fixed in that Order in Council, civil servants would receive only their military pay. The present Order in Council repeals the last Order in Council and substitutes the following provisions:

1. The above mentioned Orders in Council—

Those are, the first Order in Council which provided for both civil and military pay for those who enlisted in the earlier part of the war; the second Order in Council which provided for the larger pay of the two for those who enlisted subsequently, and the third Order in Council which provided simply for the military pay:

1. The above-mentioned Orders in Council shall continue to apply in respect of any person in the civil employment of the Government absent upon service with the forces of His Majesty or of any of His Majesty's Allies and who

(a) is now serving in any theatre of actual war outside of the United Kingdom, so long as so serving, or

(b) is now or who may be hereafter in the United Kingdom and who has served in such theatre of actual war outside thereof and is there detained by reason of wounds or disease received or contracted in such service, so long as so detained, or

(c) is now or who may be hereafter in the United Kingdom and who has served in such theatre of actual war outside thereof and has suffered from wounds or disease received or contracted in such service and is undergoing preparation in a reserve battalion for return to said theatre of actual war, or

(d) is now in the United Kingdom and who has served in such theatre of actual war outside thereof for at least one year and has been brought back to the United Kingdom for military duty and is still required for military duty there.

2. A prisoner of war shall be deemed to be serving in a theatre of actual war outside of the United Kingdom and shall come within the provision of Clause (a) of section 1 of this Order.

3. All other persons in the civil employment of the Government absent upon service with the forces of His Majesty shall from and after the 15th day of July, 1918, receive only military pay, anything in the above recited Orders in Council to the contrary notwithstanding.

4. Any person in the civil employment of the Government absent upon service with the forces of His Majesty, or any of His Majesty's Allies, shall be entitled upon the conclusion of the latter service, to be restored to his position in the civil employment of the Government, if he remains qualified to discharge the duties appertaining to that position.

5. The Order in Council of April 5th, 1918, (P. C. 811) is hereby revoked and cancelled.

The net result of this Order in Council is to continue the existing Orders in Council in force in respect of all civil servants now serving in the forces of His Majesty or His Majesty's Allies except those in Canada and those in the United Kingdom who have not seen real service at the front.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Those who are at the front continue to receive their civil pay?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes, and also those who have been wounded at the front and are in hospitals in Great Britain; those who have been wounded and have been discharged from hospital and are preparing to return to the front, and those who have served a year at the front and are now in the United Kingdom on military duty and are required to remain there.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is this a new Order in Council?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes, repealing the one passed on the 5th of April.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I would suggest, for various reasons, that the word "honourable" be placed before the word "wounds" in the Order in Council so that it will read "honourable wounds or disease."

Mr. BUREAU: How many men who enlisted with the direct promise of the Government that they would receive both their civil and their military pay will be affected by this Order in Council? How many will be deprived of their civil pay and how many will continue to receive both civil and military pay as was promised them by the Government when they enlisted?

Mr. ROWELL: I think about 1,500 enlisted and came under the operation of the first Order in Council entitling them to receive both civil and military pay. I should think that the great majority of these will, under this Order in Council, continue to receive both civil and military pay. If they do not, it is because they are serving in Canada or Great Britain and have not served at the front for a definite period. The order clearly covers all who have rendered real service at the front.

Mr. BUREAU: That is not an answer to my question. Knowing the great care with which everything is done by the President of the Council, I want to know how many men will be affected by this order? It is the number that I want to get at.

Mr. SPEAKER: I remind the House that we are on the Orders of the Day, I have allowed extreme latitude to hon. members in the putting of questions and even entering upon a discussion, owing to the fact that we are approaching the end of the session. But there is a limit to all things, and I ask hon. gentlemen not to widen the breach unduly.

Mr. BUREAU: I did not intend to infringe on the rules. It is only the shiftiness of the President of the Council, who refuses to answer, that causes the insistence.

THE ANTI-LOAFER LAW.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): I desire to direct the attention of the Government to an abuse which is occurring in connection with one of the numerous Orders in Council—that whereby the idle are to be impressed into work. It has come to my attention that in Montreal recently the police have been rounding up those idlers, and, among them, have taken in the net a number of returned soldiers who have only lately come back from the front. It would appear to be just that these men should not be regarded in that fashion; that if they have recently returned from the front they should be allowed to remain idle for a few weeks without subjecting themselves to the danger of being put in jail and herded with criminals and other undesirable idlers. Instructions might be given to those who are enforcing this Order in Council that soldiers recently returned from the front should be given a few weeks' grace, so to speak, in which to readjust themselves.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): It is regrettable if mistakes are made by those charged with the enforcement of this law, as of all laws generally, and if innocent persons, such as returned soldiers, are arrested. I may point out, however, that the enforcement of this law, as of all laws of that nature rests in the hands of provincial, and, through their delegated powers, of municipal authorities. If the police of Montreal are exercising any undue zeal or making mistakes of that kind, it is a matter to which the attention of those in authority over them might very well be called. I shall make inquiry, however, whether there does exist on the part of these gentlemen any such undue zeal, or whether any action has been taken by them that it would be proper to draw to the attention of those in authority over them.

CANCELLATION OF SEPARATION ALLOWANCE AND ASSIGNED PAY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. B. MORPHY (North Perth): I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Militia to a matter of public importance respecting the policy of his department. A soldier overseas, on the complaint of his wife, who lives in this country, was charged with bigamy and was sentenced by the overseas authorities to two years' imprisonment. I wish to read a letter which his wife received from General J. H. Langton. I am purposely omitting the names, but I want to read the letter so that the minister will have—

Mr. SPEAKER: If this is an individual case I would suggest that the hon. member send the letter to the Minister of Militia in the ordinary course and have the matter attended to in that way. No question of policy is involved?

Mr. MORPHY: With all due deference, I submit that an important question of policy is involved. The Government have cancelled the separation allowance and assigned pay of this woman and her children because her husband happened to make a mistake. If that is not a matter of public importance I do not know what is. I should like the Minister of Militia and Defence to make a note of it and let the woman have her pay and allowance.

THE MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

MILITARY POLICE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. P. R. DuTREMBLAY (Laurier-Outremont): I would ask the Government whether military police have been substituted for federal police in the rounding up of draftees in the district of Montreal. I have been informed that an Order in Council has been passed transferring this work from the Department of Justice to the Department of Militia and Defence.

Mr. DOHERTY: There has been no such Order in Council as my hon. friend mentions.

PURCHASE OF FARM TRACTORS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Agriculture): A few days ago the leader of the Opposition inquired if there had been any report from the Hon. Mr. Dunning in respect to the purchase of farm tractors through the Canada Food Board. While no formal report has been made, Mr. Dunning has orally reported the results of this work The whole one thousand tractors purchased have been sold, and a few additional ones have been secured to fill orders that have come in over and above the one thousand. The reports we have received from the district where a good many of these tractors have been in operation are to the effect that they are proving satisfactory.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would suggest that it would be well for the House to have a full report as to the application of the money expended.

Mr. CRERAR: I shall be glad to have such a report prepared and submitted. The tractors have been mainly distributed in Ontario and the three prairie provinces.

CIVIL PAY OF CIVIL SERVANTS OVERSEAS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. N. W. ROWELL: In reply to the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) I have no further information beyond what I have given as to the number of men who would come under this Order in Council. The fullest possible information has been given my hon. friend, and may I thank him for the courteous and characteristic way in which he is in the habit of putting his questions?

Mr. BUREAU: It is very easy for my hon. friend to say that he does not know the number, instead of telling the House how many men will come under the Order in Council. The hon. gentleman, by simply repeating what he has already said, implies that I did not understand him, which I did. I thank him for his reference to my courtesy, and will have the pleasure of calling again.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

THE MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

REPRESENTATIONS FROM THE FARMERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (North Simcoe): In common, I suppose, with other hon. members, I have received many telegrams from the farming community which would lead one to suppose there is going to be some modification of the recent Order in Council drafting young men between the ages of twenty and twenty-two inclusive. These communications urge us to bring pressure to bear on the Government, the farmers apparently having the idea that there is to be some modification of the Order in Council. I would ask the leader of the Government if that is so or not, so that we can answer these communications intelligently.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Just as soon as information on the question preferred by my hon. friend can be given, it will be announced to the House. The matter is under the consideration of the Government.

VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS AND JOURNALS.

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: May I remind my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) that yesterday he presented the report of the special committee appointed to consider and report upon the question of consolidating the Votes and Proceedings and the Journals of the House of Commons. I would remind my hon. friend that if he does not make some motion with regard to it, the report will simply be pigeon-holed.

PRIVATE BILLS.

The House in Committee on Private Bills, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

THE UNITED CANADIAN INSURANCE COMPANY.

Bill No. 107, to incorporate the United Canadian Insurance Company—Sir Herbert Ames—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—incorporation:

Mr. BUREAU: May I ask the Chairman of the Banking and Commerce Committee, to which this Bill was referred, to give an explanation?

Sir HERBERT AMES: By the unanimous consent of the House, in order to ensure the passing of this Bill, it has been placed on the Orders of to-day. It was passed by the Banking and Commerce Committee this morning, having been unduly delayed because of the necessity of changing the name of the company as it first appeared asking for incorporation, namely, the British Canadian Insurance Company, as that name had already been appropriated by a company authorized by the legislature of the province of Quebec. Hon. members who were in this House four or five years ago will remember that there was what might be called a model or standard Insurance Bill passed by the Banking and Commerce Committee, and afterwards ratified by this House, and since that time the condition has always been imposed upon any company desiring incorporation that their Act of Incorporation should conform with the model or standard Bill. The Bill before us does not deviate by a single word from the model Bills which we have passed through this House on many occasions during the last two or three years incorporating new insurance companies. The only thing that would strike any one is the fact that section 1 incorporates a firm of Ottawa lawyers as an insurance company.

Owing to the illness of one of the incorporators and the difficulty of getting the signatures, it was found impossible to get the signatures of the men who are really behind this Bill in time for it to pass this session. I am informed that the real promoters of the Bill are H. S. Durkee, P. F. Wright, J. Kendall, O. S. Wood, and A. G. Creelman, all well known citizens of Vancouver, whose signatures could not be obtained in time. Consequently, the formality has been adopted of putting the Bill through in the name of the firm in which Mr. W. L. Scott, K.C., is a chief member. That was the only point of criticism. The Banking and Commerce Committee and the department were satisfied on that point and the Bill was unanimously passed this morning without amendment.

Mr. BUREAU: Do I understand that this incorporation is sought to replace another company and was there any objection to the name? Do I also understand that there was no objection before the Banking and Commerce Committee and that it went through unanimously?

Sir HERBERT AMES: The hon. member (Mr. Bureau) does not quite understand what happened. The Bill, as it was first passed in the Senate was to incorporate the British Canadian Insurance Company. Before the Senate it was pointed out that there was already a company under that name that had been incorporated by the Legislature of Quebec. Objection coming from that source, the original promoters of this Bill undertook to alter their name. That has caused the delay. This Bill would have been through the House before this had it not been for that fact.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Would the hon. gentleman (Sir Herbert Ames), who is the chairman of the committee, be good enough to give us any reason why the House should take up this Bill without a copy of it in our hands or any other information? I do not think this Bill should go on for a second.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Copies of the Bill are procurable and may be distributed if desired.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I think these gentlemen ought to know what the rules are with regard to signatures and, if they have not got them in, this House should not be asked to adopt the procedure that is proposed here.

Sir HERBERT AMES: The main object of the Bill is to incorporate this company to enable it to do hail insurance before the present heavy crop in the western provinces is subject to danger of destruction by hail.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I thought these gentlemen came from Vancouver?

Sir HERBERT AMES: That is the excuse offered for asking that this company be immediately incorporated. I understand from the promoters that there is British capital ready to be placed behind the company to the necessary extent to enable them to do a hail insurance business.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I thought this was a Vancouver company?

Sir HERBERT AMES: It is.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What has it to do with crops?

Sir HERBERT AMES: There is no reason why any Vancouver, Toronto, or Halifax company should not be incorporated to do hail insurance or many other lines of insurance in the Dominion. The members of the committee understand that there is a great variety of insurance business, and that when a new insurance company is incorporated, it is compelled to indicate the order in which it shall do the different classes of insurance; for instance the first, the second, the third, the fourth and so on. It is compelled to have a certain amount of capital subscribed and a certain amount of capital paid up before it can undertake the first class of insurance business, a certain amount of capital paid up before it can undertake the second class of insurance, and so on with regard to the third and the fourth classes of business. A company oftentimes does six or eight different kinds of business, and it increases the amount of subscribed capital and the amount paid up in proportion to the increase and extent of the business carried on. This company, at present, desires to engage in hail insurance. It will be extended, if it can secure the necessary capital, to fire insurance, cyclone insurance, and other classes of insurance. The promoters are anxious to be incorporated early so that the company can take advantage of the very large crops which are expected in the West, to engage in hail insurance.

Mr. MORPHY: Is this company now doing any other insurance than hail insurance?

Sir HERBERT AMES: The hon. gentleman will find that in clause 5 of the Bill.

Mr. MORPHY: I have just got a copy of the Bill now.

Sir HERBERT AMES: My hon. friend will find that it is incorporated to do ten classes of insurance, one after another as its capital and deposits increase.

Mr. MORPHY: May I ask the hon. gentleman whether or not there are companies in the West doing what is known as an exclusive hail insurance business? If so, I would like to know whether he thinks it is fair to put in competition with them a company dealing in various classes of insurance. The reason I ask that question is that complaints have come from well known insurance companies that American insurance companies have come into this country and employed the profits they are making on other branches of insurance to enable them to give lower rates than the Canadian insurance companies can give for hail or weather insurance. I just raise the point as to whether there would be anything unfair in that clause as affecting the rights of thoroughly weather and hail insurance companies operating in the west.

Sir HERBERT AMES: I am informed by the promoters of the Bill that the first board of directors will all be Canadians and that the shareholders will be Canadians and persons residing in Great Britain, where they expect to secure a portion of their capital. As to the other question of hail insurance, perhaps some of the ministers from the West, probably the hon. the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar), or the hon. the Minister of Customs (Mr. Sifton), or the hon. the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Calder), could explain better than I about hail insurance in the West.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Do I understand that this company is now in existence and has been carrying on business in any of these capacities?

Sir HERBERT AMES: No.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I think it is most extraordinary that a firm of lawyers in the city of Ottawa should get a charter like this. What is to prevent them from going out into the open market and selling or hawking about that charter? It is a very peculiar transaction and I do not think the House should agree to it.

Sir HERBERT AMES: We were assured in the committee this morning by Mr. W. L. Scott, who is a well known and responsible lawyer of the city of Ottawa, that he had no direct interest in it further than a lawyer working for his clients, that he had no intention of selling the charter or doing anything of the kind, and that he was securing it for these gentlemen whom I have mentioned at their request. He put before the committee proof of the fact that he was acting merely for them in his capacity as a parliamentary agent.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Did he show urgent need for this Bill?

Sir HERBERT AMES: He convinced the committee to that effect.

Mr. FIELDING: Do the rules of the House require the signatures of the applicants for a charter?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: Is it not possible to get by telegraph the authority of these gentlemen to use their names?

Sir HERBERT AMES: That authority was put before the committee this morning in the form of telegrams from Vancouver. The signatures of these five gentlemen whom I have mentioned were all in the petition and everything is perfectly regular as far as that is concerned. We were shown this morning telegrams from these five gentlemen that I spoke of, authorizing the use of their names as directors and shareholders of the company.

Mr. FIELDING: It might meet the point raised if, in place of the names of the legal gentlemen, the names of the actual promoters were inserted. What is to prevent that?

Sir HERBERT AMES: There would be no objection if the House deems it advisable to put in the names of the five Canadian gentlemen whose names I have given. That was discussed in the committee this morning, the only objection being that it would require the Bill to go back to the Senate, and it might possibly fall by the wayside before prorogation. It would be quite in order for the House to insert the names of the five gentlemen, thus making ten altogether, of whom five, at least, are well known Canadian citizens.

Mr. FIELDING: It is the practice in the case of letters patent under the Joint Stock Companies' Act for solicitors to take out charters and only the names of the solicitors, their clerks and stenographers are used. But I think that in the case of a parliamentary application it has generally been considered advisable that the real promoters of the enterprise should have their names in the Bill. I have no doubt that the proceeding is all right, and I am quite sure that the name of Mr. Scott is a guarantee of good faith, but if the names of the real promoters were put in the Bill it would be desirable. I do not say any more than that.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I understand that facts have been brought out this morning that were not disclosed before the Banking and Commerce Committee. The statement that the chairman has given about a change in the name of the company was never presented to the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Yes, it was.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am informed it was not.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Everything mentioned by me this morning was brought out before the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Mr. NESBITT: What is complained of may be irregular, but it is a very common practice in taking out letters patent and no harm has resulted from it, and no harm will result in any event. I did not raise any objection in the Banking and Commerce Committee and I do not propose to do so now. I do not see why the Bill should be delayed at all for the reasons assigned.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 1 carry?

Sir SAM HUGHES: No, lost.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried.

On section 2--Provisional directors.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Surely, Mr. Chairman, you are going to accept the proposition of the hon. member for Queens and Shelburne (Mr. Fielding) in regard to the substitution of these gentlemen's names. It is a very dangerous practice to insert the name of a firm of lawyers into a Bill in the manner proposed. This jobbing in parliamentary charters is an old practice round Ottawa, and I certainly think it should not be encouraged by this House in the closing hours of the session. The crop might be hailed out anyway before these gentlemen are ready to operate this year, and we may possibly save money by not passing this Bill. It strikes me, and has always done so, that proceedings such as this at the tail-end of the session are very peculiar—they resemble a deathbed repentance. I think this Bill should stand over until next session, and in any event the names of the other gentlemen interested should be added. I would go further and say substitute their names for the names of the lawyers which appear in the Bill. The lawyers in question form a large firm and it takes a lot to keep them going.

Mr. CALDER: I might say that, speaking for the province of Saskatchewan, in so far as hail insurance is concerned, it does not make any difference whether this Bill goes through or not. If the Bill passes, the provincial authorities will see to it that the company is properly organized, has the proper standing, and afford the necessary capital proper security before they will allow it to do business in that province.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is the rule of all the provinces.

Mr. CALDER: It is the rule in Saskatchewan, and I understand it is also the rule in the province of Alberta. In some of the western provinces they have had somewhat unfortunate experiences with regard to these hail insurance companies, as a result of which the law was put into such shape that no company can do business unless it has proper standing and provides the proper security.

On section 6—increase of capital:

Sir SAM HUGHES: Has the Minister of Immigration and Colonization read clause 6 of the Bill, and is he satisfied with it?

Mr. CALDER: I have not seen the Bill.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It strikes me that the increase of capital provided for in that clause for each line of business is rather light.

Sir HERBERT AMES: The increases are such as appear in other Bills that have been adopted, with the single exception of burglary insurance, where the capital is made $20,000 instead of $10,000, since the liability is regarded as slightly greater than it would otherwise be. With that exception, the increases are the same as have been granted in the case of about a score of other Bills.

Mr. CURRIE: I agree with what has been said by the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton, and I would like to say further that this Bill does not seem to have been distributed to all the members. I also wish to call the attention of the Clerk of the House to the fact that the Printing Bureau appears to have sent an insufficient number of Bills and papers to the House in certain cases. For example, the other day when the Supplementary Estimates arrived there were not sufficient to place a copy of each in the box of each member, as custom and usage requires. In the present case there are apparently only a few copies of the Bill obtainable, and there has not been one placed on my file. If, as has been stated, this Bill was at first given a wrong title, the proper procedure would have been to send the petition to the committee, where the change could have been made and the Bill would then go through in proper form. I have in mind the case of a number of gentlemen in British Columbia who got into trouble over an insurance Bill, in consequence of which the Bill in question was thrown out by the committee. I would like to know whether those gentlemen are associated with this Bill, and if so, whether they are trying to get through an objectionable Bill in the dying hours of the session? If we are going to adhere to parliamentary procedure I think the objections raised to this Bill will be fatal to it. Had the proper procedure been adopted in respect to this Bill the names of the promoters would have remained on it. Instead of that the Bill was withdrawn for some reason, and a new measure introduced, which contains the names of certain lawyers. I hardly think that is fair to the House.

Sir HERBERT AMES: The hon. gentleman is under a slight misapprehension in this matter. This Bill was considered by the Private Bills Committee and the Banking and Commerce Committee of the Senate when it was pointed out that the name of this company had been already used in another case. The Banking and Commerce Committee of the Senate thereupon arranged for a new title and reported to the Senate that it was advisable to have the existing name changed. That necessarily caused some delay in the Bill coming from the Senate and accounts for it arriving here at a somewhat late period. When the Bill reached this House its title was exactly as printed, "United Canadian Insurance Company" (E2). There has not been any change in a word or a syllable of the Bill since it first appeared in this House.

Mr. CURRIE: What is the reason the names of the original promoters do not appear on the Bill?

Sir HERBERT AMES: The names of the original promoters were not attached to the original petition, owing to the illness of the person to whom that petition was entrusted, when it was presented to the Senate in sufficient time to appear in the Bill. This is the explanation that is given to us.

I may say that the Banking and Commerce Committee were unanimously satisfied of the bona fides of Mr. W. L. Scott and his associates and felt that there would be no danger in granting a Bill of this character. It was shown to us that there was very urgent need of additional hail insurance facilities in the western provinces this summer, where the crop is the largest and most valuable ever put in the ground; and that it would be advisable to permit another company to do business there this summer along these lines.

Mr. McKENZIE: It strikes me that this very important Bill comes to us in a very hasty way, and at a time when we are not able to give very much consideration to it. It may have been very seriously considered in the Senate, and it may be all right. But the insurance business is a very important business, second to banking, I suppose, perhaps the most important business that any body of men are permitted to carry on in this country. When we are authorizing people to carry on insurance business in this country, we should know something about it. I would like to ask the Acting Minister of Finance in whose department these matters particularly lie, if he is satisfied that this concern is a strong, reliable set of men, and that if busineess is put in their hands the interests of the country are safe? The hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization has suggested a point of law on which I am not at all satisfied. He says that there is a guarantee for the people of Alberta against the operations of such companies by reason of the protections that local laws give them.

As a lawyer, I am not satisfied that the local legislature could estop an insurance company chartered by this House from doing business in the province of Alberta. If there is a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada to that effect I shall be very glad to hear it. But it strikes me that there is no jurisdiction in the local legislature to estop the operations of a corporation chartered to do business by this House all over the country. There may be, but I am not familiar with it. And if that is the only protection which the people of Alberta and the different provinces have, I am not satisfied. And I am not satisfied that sufficient time has been given to this Bill. I agree entirely with the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) that there is no such haste about it, and that this Bill could very well stand over.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not want to hold up the Bill except on square lines. I call attention that it is not printed in French. And as an ardent lover of the French language, the House is entitled to have this Bill printed in French. Furthermore, I would ask the opinion of the Minister of Customs, who is reputed to be a shrewd lawyer, well up on matters affecting this class of insurance in the West, and upon the question of rates. I would like an opinion from him in that regard.

Mr. SIFTON: The Minister of Justice gives the legal advice for this Government, and I would not for a moment wish to infringe upon his prerogatives. I have no legal advice to give in regard to the constitutional privileges as they are affected by this particular Act. I do not think it will lower the rate of insurance any. I do not think it will make any difference so far as that is concerned. There are lots of hail insurance companies in the western provinces. However, I have no objection to any new company. I have never known any of these companies who are prepared to do business with farmers on any better terms than the others. They are all alike when it comes to doing business.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In answer to the question put to me by the member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), I have given no personal attention to the Bill; but I am assured by the officers of the department that it is in no respect objectionable. The Bill in its terms follows the standard clauses usually inserted in Bills incorporating insurance companies. Some Bills have been introduced in the past in the very same terms. I do not see any objection to this Bill.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is it a bona fide company, that is the point? Where is there any evidence that this is a bona fide company? A firm of lawyers may wish, inasmuch as the law business is not very brisk now—

Mr. McMASTER: Louder.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am glad to see my legal friend pricking up.

Mr. McMASTER: I would like to hear what the gallant member is saying about the profession.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The point I want to make is this. I am only looking at one aspect of the case—we must look at it from every aspect. Business being a little dull in law offices possibly, a legal firm might take up the incorporation of such a company. They get up a charter of this kind. We have had instances in Canada where charters have been passed in this House and hawked around for sale. This Bill has all the earmarks of that sort of a charter. Surely if a number of gentlemen —I did not catch the names; they were muttered in an undertone,—from Vancouver are so solicitous in looking after the farmers of the Western prairies, why did they not get this Bill down in time? They have had all summer to look into this matter. They are coming down at the eleventh hour, without even the signatures of the parties, and the legal firm are getting them by telegraph. The thing looks fishy on the face of it. It can very well stand over for another session; there is no great rush. Furthermore, the number of functions inserted would require a considerable amount to be put up for going into classes of insurance other than hail insurance. These things, to my mind, are altogether insufficient.

Mr. McMASTER: I was a member of the Banking Committee which sat on this matter this morning. I would tell this Committee that Mr. Scott, who is a lawyer of standing in Ottawa—

Sir SAM HUGHES: Are not all lawyers lawyers of standing?

Mr. McMASTER: No, they vary. There are, sad to say, lawyers who do not rise to the general high level maintained by the profession. I have heard of newspaper men of the same sort, and doctors of the same sort.

An hon. MEMBER: And soldiers.

Mr. McMASTER: Oh, no. Soldiers are always noble and great, of the very highest calibre. I would like to say this: I do not see why we cannot pass this Bill. Mr. Scott assured us that it was a bona fide Bill, that his clients in Vancouver and Victoria were bona fide people of responsibility. He showed correspondence to that effect. Under these circumstances, I would ask the hon. and gallant member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes), with that disregard of red tape which was a distinguishing characteristic of his in days gone by, not to insist on red tape now, but as we are all desirous of going on with more important business we might possibly be allowed to pass this Bill and get on to other matters. I speak with all of the deference and respect due from a young member of this House to an old member like my hon. friend.

Mr. MORPHY: I would ask the hon. member in charge of the Bill if the preliminary proceedings, the notices in the Canada Gazette, were taken in the names of these men, or the names of the proposed bona fide promoters?

Sir HERBERT AMES: I understand they were issued in the name of W. L. Scott and his associates.

Mr. MORPHY: That is a rather suspicious circumstance to me.

Mr. CURRIE: I think the answer—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MORPHY: If the original proceedings and notices were put through in the names of these incorporators, it does not look very feasible that men who really were the bona fide incorporators at the inception of the movement would lend the scheme out to the use of other names. That is suspicious to my mind, and makes me wonder if somebody has been putting one over on the hon. member who is in charge of the Bill. I think Mr. Scott is a reputable gentleman, but it must be noticed that he is one of the promoters, and it sounds a little like a man praising himself in a measure, when all the information the Banking Committee receives has been received from one of the promoters himself. If the Bill from its inception was put forward in the name of this firm of solicitors, it is a strange thing to me; it does not show good faith. The excuse is given that the actual signatories could not be obtained because the men in question are in Vancouver.

[Mr. McMaster.]

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Signatories to what?

Mr. MORPHY: The petition. These pretended incorporators must have made up their minds weeks ago with regard to this matter. They must have entered into a memorandum of agreement to form the company; their names must be on all the preliminaries. Yet the names of Ottawa lawyers are given here as the promoters of the company. It does not look like good faith; it looks like a policy of huckstering charters.

Mr. CURRIE: If the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) had been in the House for several years he would have known that some trouble has been experienced with companies from Vancouver. Last session we had a very bad case. A charter was obtained some years ago in this form and the parties who received it started out to get a large number of subscriptions. It was ascertained that a large amount that had been paid in as subscriptions had been taken by way of commissions. Nothing was left but a shell for the creditors of the company; and the company never went into operation. I do not object to charters being granted to promoters in Vancouver but we should look into the bona fides of these cases. The member from the section of the country in which this company is to operate should be in his place to speak on behalf of these incorporators and to say that they are all right. If any member from Vancouver or British Columbia does that I will withdraw all objection.

Sir HERBERT AMES: The member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) is really the promoter of the Bill; but he is not here to-day.

Mr. CURRIE: His name does not appear on the Bill.

Sir HERBERT AMES: It is a matter of record that he is the promoter of the Bill in this House.

Mr. CURRIE: Somebody ought to be here to explain the matter, because the case of last year, to which I referred, was a flagrant one. There is also the principle of charter-mongering, to which I object. This is a very important insurance company; their powers are almost as wide as Lloyd's, and we should not be obliged to accept simply the ipse dixit of the Ottawa lawyers whose names have been given. If the Secretary of State (Hon. Mr. Burrell) will say that the Bill is all right, we will let it go at that

Mr. BURRELL: Frankly, I know nothing whatever about the Bill. If, however, the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) knows the promoters of the Bill, I should think that would be sufficient.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would the public receive any greater protection by the fact that the member for Vancouver is the sponsor of the Bill? What difference does that make? The public must be protected by the insurance laws of the country and their proper administration by the Insurance Department.

Sir SAM HUGHES: We have rules in this House that we are asked to observe, and I always observe them to the utmost limit of the law, even when they are stretched beyond the point of endurance. This is one case in which the rules should be carefully observed. I know the business men of Vancouver pretty well and I should like to hear again the names of the promoters and to know what business they are engaged in. It looks fishy, to use a not very decorous expression; it looks peculiar to see the names of the promoters of this Bill furnished from a law office in Ottawa. The names of the men from Vancouver are telegraphed, not sent by letter; the whole thing looks peculiar, to say the least.

Sir HERBERT AMES: I shall be glad to give the names again. H. S. Durkee, who, I understand is a railway man; P. F. Wright, grocer; J. Kendall, whose designation I cannot give; O. S. Wood, who, I think, is a lawyer, and A. G. Creelman, contractor. If the hon. member will refer to the Orders of the Day of May 20th he will find that Bill 107 (letter E of the Senate) an Act to incorporate the United Canadian Insurance Company was introduced that day by the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). The Bill was unanimously passed this morning by the Banking and Commerce Committee, and I am in charge of it for the member for Vancouver Centre.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Does the Secretary of State know whether these gentlemen are in good standing in Vancouver?

Mr. BURRELL: I know Mr. Creelman; I do not know the other gentlemen, although I have heard their names occasionally. I knew Mr. Creelman as a contractor in the Kootenay railroad district; he is a man of some substance.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I remember the Bill referred to by the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie), which came before the committee last year. Some men from Vancouver—apparently in good standing, so far as the committee knew—had applied some years ago for a charter to do an insurance business. The charter was renewed once, and they came back for another renewal last year. It was brought out at that time that the company had secured $70,000 or $72,000 in subscriptions and has squandered $63,000 or $64,000 of that in commissions. They were insisting on having the charter renewed in order that they could prosecute some of the stockholders for certain amounts which the company claimed were due them. That application was thrown out of committee. No evidence has been furnished this morning to satisfy this committee that the Bill now under consideration should be passed this year, in the dying days of the session. No doubt it has been applied for in the ordinary way, but I do not see why the promoters could not have had their names in long before this. Now, in the dying days of the session, it is asked that this Bill be put through. I do not think we should stand for it; I think it should be laid over.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I observe that an hon. gentleman from Vancouver (Mr. Crowe) has entered the chamber. Perhaps he can give us some light on the status of these gentlemen. A Bill has been introduced in the dying days of the session; it is not yet even printed in French.

The promoters of this Bill are a firm of lawyers in Ottawa. At the last moment, we are informed that a number of gentlemen in Vancouver, who had not time to send their names here by letter, telegraphed their names, being anxious that they should be put in as the promoters of this Bill. The whole thing is irregular, and I am anxious to know the status of these gentlemen. Their names are: H. S. Durkee, P. F. Wright, J. Kendall, O. S. Wood and A. G. Creelman. Are these the men who are now supposed to be the promoters of the Bill, but who had not time to mail their application to get it here so as to comply with the rules

Mr. CROWE: I do not know anything about the Bill before the House, but I know several of these gentlemen, and I can vouch for them. Mr. Creelman is a large contractor in Vancouver, a very wealthy man. Mr. Wood is a man of A1 standing. Mr. Durkee is in the jewellery business, but I do not know what standing he has. Mr. P. F. Wright is in the furniture business. I can vouch for three of these gentlemen; the other two I cannot vouch for because I do not know them.

Preamble agreed to, and Bill reported.

On motion of Sir Herbert Ames for the third reading of the Bill.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Does not the rule of the House require that this Bill shall be printed in French?

Mr. SPEAKER: That objection cannot be taken at this stage. It has to be taken at an earlier stage.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I raised the objection at an earlier stage.

Sir HERBERT AMES: At the opening to-day the House gave its unanimous consent that this Bill should be placed upon the Order Paper.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

WAR TRADE BOARD.

*Mr. PROULX:

1. Is Sir George Foster, Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Chairman of the War Trade Board?
2. If so, did he select and appoint the members and the staff thereof?
3. If not, by what other members of the Cabinet were these selections and appointments made?
4. What are the names, salaries and ordinary places of residence of the members and staff of the War Trade Board?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. Yes.

2 and 3. The members of the War Trade Board were selected and appointed by the Governor in Council, of which the Minister of Trade and Commerce is one. The staff were selected by the board, the certifications made by the Civil Service Commission and appointments made by Order in Council.

Goth, stenographer, $60, Carleton Place; Miss M. Vallillee, stenographer, $60, Ottawa; Miss A. Jones, stenographer, $60, Ottawa; Miss F. Casey, stenographer, $70, Ottawa; Miss G. Evans, stenographer, $60 Ottawa; Miss J. Dunbar, stenographer, $75, Toronto; Gerald Latreille, messenger, $30, Ottawa.

Canadian Export Department: W. P. McKay, chief, $200, Ottawa; F. D'Ornellis, assistant, paid by Customs, Ottawa; M. H. Ryan, assistant, $125, Renfrew; J. Byce, stenographer, $80, Ottawa; G. V. Jamieson, stenographer, $90, Ottawa; B. Roberts, stenographer, $75, Montreal; D. Casey, clerk, $70, Montreal.

Metals Department: H. D. Bayne, chief, paid by Customs, Toronto; E. M. Russell, assistant, $175, Montreal; T. C. Hosking, inspector, $150, Montreal; Wm. Gilchrist, inspector, paid by Customs; Henry B. Timleck, stenographer, paid by Customs, Brockville.

British Priority Department: A. E. D. Holden, chief, $200, Montreal; Miss M. Morel, assistant, $60, Ottawa; Miss L. Owrid, stenographer, $70, Almonte; Miss M. A. Jones, stenographer, $65, Ottawa.

Telegraph and Telephone Department: G. H. White, telegraph operator, $238.66, Montreal; I. Rusland, telephone operator, $55, Ottawa; Albert Guneau, messenger, $30, Ottawa.

Members' stenographers: Miss E. Imerie, $80, Westmount; Miss W. P. Corner, $90, St. Lambert; Miss L. McMurty, $80, Kinburn; Miss C. T. Henderson, $80, Ottawa; Mrs. A. M. Keats, $80, Ottawa.

Messenger Department: Frank Randall, $40, Ottawa; Henry Albert, $30, Ottawa; Jos. De Granpré, $30, Ottawa.

War Economies: Lester M. Green, $300, Toronto.

Inspection Department: T. M. Forrest, $208.33, Montreal; C. L. Wise, $200, Toronto; Miss E. H. Tomkins, stenographer, $80, Ottawa.

The former residence of each official is mentioned. The present residence of each official is shown, except Mr. Wise, who is in Toronto.

The members of the board are allowed travelling expenses, and in addition a living allowance at the rate of $10 a day for the days spent in Ottawa.

HALIFAX DISASTER CLAIMS.

Mr. BOURASSA:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to pay, in the near future, the workmen who have worked at Halifax, and for whom a statement of wages due has been lodged with the Department of Finance on the 26th of March last?
2. If so, when will the Government pay said wages and thus relieve a situation that is causing great inconvenience to many of these workmen?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. The Department of Finance is not aware of any claim such as is mentioned in this question having been filed.

2. The Government disclaim any liability as to the payment of wages in connection with the Halifax disaster, and accordingly they do not propose paying any such claims.

WELLAND CANAL PAYMASTER.

*Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. Is it true that serious discrepancies were found in the accounts of the paymaster of the Welland Canal?
2. If so, what was the amount of money involved?
3. What reparation has been made, and by what means?
4. How far back have the defalcations extended?
5. By what means were the defalcations carried out?
6. Were other persons involved with the paymaster? If so, who?
7. Does the department intend to take action?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This question has been standing for some time, and to-morrow is the last day when we shall have an opportunity of having questions answered.

Hon. J. D. REID: I shall have the answer to-morrow.

Question stands.

QUEBEC MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. CANNON:

1. Who secured the contract for carrying the mails from St. Odilon de Frampton to Mount Fir Grove, Robson and Poulin?
2. When was the contract given, and how much is it for?
3. Were there any tenders called?
4. If so, what were they, and how much were they for?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. In order to cover the post offices mentioned, it is necessary to give the particulars of two mail contracts, namely: Fir Grove and Frampton (via Mount Robson and Poulin), contractor, D. Lacasse; and Fir Grove and St. Odilon (via Cranbourne), contractor, A. Laflamme.

2, 3 and 4. Fir Grove and Frampton contract awarded after invitation of tenders to D. Lacasse in November, 1912, at the rate of $930 per annum. The tenders received were: Joseph Audet, Frampton, $935 per annum; Damase Lacasse, Frampton, $939 per annum; Desiré Audet, Frampton, $940 per annum; Hector Lacasse, Frampton, $945 per annum. Damase Lacasse subsequently reduced his tender to $930 per annum. Fir Grove and St. Odilon contract was arranged in August, 1915, with A. Laflamme at the rate of $174 per annum without tenders being called for.

EXEMPTION TRIBUNALS.

Mr. SAVARD:

1. Have all the judges presiding at Exemption Tribunals in Chicoutimi and Lake St. John been paid?
2. If not, who are those who have not been paid?
3. When will they be paid?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. All accounts received have been paid.
2. Benjamin Boudreau, l'Anse St. Jean, and L. Bouchard, l'Anse St. Jean.
3. Accounts when received will be promptly passed for payment.

ROSS RIFLE FACTORY.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR:

1. Has the Government expropriated the Ross Rifle Factory in Quebec?
2. If so, at what cost was the expropriation?
3. What was the object of the Government to expropriate the said Ross Rifle Factory?
4. What does the Government intend to do with the said factory?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. Yes.
2. The cost has yet to be determined by the Exchequer Court of Canada.
3. For reasons fully given by the Government to Parliament at the time, February 2, 1917, and contained in an Order in Council then presented.
4. Under consideration.

SENATOR BRADBURY.

Mr. D'ANJOU:

Referring to the answer given by Mr. McCurdy to a question reported on page 1169 of Unrevised Hansard for 1918:—

1. In what rank did Lt.-Colonel G. H. Bradbury serve in France?

2. In what regiment did he serve in France?
3. Under whose command did he go to France?
4. Was he wounded? If so, what is the nature of his wounds?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL: Definite information is not available in Canada, but is being requested by letter from the Overseas Military Forces of Canada.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT—MR. ALLEYN TASCHEREAU.

Mr. D'ANJOU:

1. What salary or remuneration is Mr. Alleyn Taschereau, Registrar for the application of the Military Service Act, entitled to for his services as Registrar?
2. How much has the said Registrar received to date for such services?
3. Is the said Registrar entitled to a fixed sum for travelling expenses? If so, how much?
4. Is the said Registrar entitled to the use of an automobile at the expense of the country for the performance of his duties as Registrar?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. $300 per month.
2. Total of $280 for service from 3rd to 30th April, 1918.
3. No. Any actual disbursements are refunded on presentation of a proper account and vouchers.
4. No.

OTTAWA NAVAL ENLISTMENTS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

How many have enlisted for service in the Navy, from the city of Ottawa, since April 1, 1918?

Hon. Mr. SIFTON: Seven.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT—DENTISTS.

*Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. Is it a fact that appointments are being made to the Dental Corps of persons who are not graduate dentists and have had no experience in dentistry?
2. Are such appointments made for the purpose of evading the military service regulations and to secure Safety First positions?
3. Has the Minister of Militia received any complaints on this score? If so, were they from Ontario?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. All officers appointed as operators are graduate dentists. Quartermasters are not graduate dentists, but men who have had special training in supplies. Other than these, there are no officers in the Canadian Army Dental Corps. Non-commissioned officers and men are not graduate dentists.
2. Non-commissioned officers and men are men who have special training, or else men not in the classification for overseas service.
3. No.

[Mr. Burrell.]

VICTORY LOAN.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. In connection with the Victory Loan, was there any commission paid directly or indirectly to what was known as the "Special Names Committee"?
2. If so, what amount was so paid, and to whom?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT—EXEMPTION OF FARMERS.

*Mr. SAVARD:

1. What interviews were had, or communications exchanged with Mr. Justice Duff, prior of his judgment as Central Appeal Judge in the test case of the farmer applicant in December last immediately following the declaration by the Minister of Militia, that farmers would be exempted from military service?
2. Will such correspondence be produced?

Hon.Mr. DOHERTY:

1. The only interviews or communications exchanged with the Central Appeal Judge in relation to his decision in the Rowntree case, decided on December 6, 1917, were in the ordinary course of official business. No communication passed directly or indirectly between the Central Appeal Judge and the Minister of Militia or any other member of the Government on that subject; and if the Minister of Militia did make any declaration such as that described in the question, before the date of the decision, no such declaration and no declaration by any member of the Government entered into the considerations upon which the decision was based.
2. Yes.

159th and 227th BATTALIONS.

*Mr. SAVARD:

1. Have the 159th and the 227th Battalions been recruited in the Sudbury districts?
2. Are the said battalions composed largely of French Canadians and Catholics?
3. Of the 262 men of No. 3 (O.C.) Company of the 227th Battalion who left for Camp Borden were 212 enrolled as Catholics?
4. In the two battalions mentioned how many command officers are Catholics?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. Headquarters of 159th and 227th Battalions were Haileybury and Hamilton, respectively. Enlistments from Sudbury districts were included in each.

2 and 3. Information as to denominations was not maintained by Battalion formation.

4. Neither of the Commanding Officers of the Battalions mentioned above were Roman Catholics.

LIEUT.-COL. A. T. THOMPSON.

*Mr. CAHILL:

1. Is Lieut.-Col. A. T. Thompson, enlisted with the 114th Battalion, as a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Force?
2. If so, when did he join, and where has he since been located?
3. Has he since his appointment in the Canadian Expeditionary Force been under pay to this date?
4. If so, what amount of pay per day does he receive?
5. Has he since the date he joined or was appointed to the Canadian Expeditionary Force been continuously under pay?
6. What is the total amount of pay to date received by him, or still owing to him?
7. Since he joined the Canadian Expeditionary Force, or was appointed thereto, has he been granted leave of absence without pay? If so, for what purpose, and between what dates?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. Unless he has been struck off in England, and this department has not been notified, he is still a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Force.
2. 29th February, 1916. Canada and Overseas.
3, 4, 5, and 6. This information is not available in Canada, but it is being requested, by letter, from the Overseas Military Forces of Canada.
7. No record of his having been granted leave of absence without pay.

MAJOR EDMUND SWEET.

* Mr. CAHILL:

1. Is Major Edmund Sweet, enlisted with the 215th Battalion, a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Force?
2. If so, when did he join, and where has he since been located?
3. Has he since his appointment in the Canadian Expeditionary Force been under pay to this date?
4. If so, what amount of pay per day does he receive?
5. Has he since the date he joined or was appointed to the Canadian Expeditionary Force been continuously under pay?
6. What is the total amount of pay to date received by him, or still owing to him?
7. Since he joined the Canadian Expeditionary Force, or was appointed thereto, has he been granted leave of absence without pay? If so, for what purpose, and between what dates?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. Unless he has been struck off in England, and this department has not been notified, he is still a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Force.
2. Sixth of March, 1916. Canada and Overseas.
3, 4, 5 and 6. This information is not available in Canada, but is being requested by letter from the Overseas Military Forces of Canada.
7. No record of his having been granted leave of absence without pay.

DR. BURCHARD'S REPORT.

Mr. J. F. REID:

1. Has the Board of Grain Commissioners forwarded to the Government any report from Dr. Burchard, Dominion Chemist, re investigation of milling values of grain, and other matters connected therewith?
2. If so, when will report be ready for distribution to members of this House?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Board of Grain Commissioners have forwarded to the Government a report from Doctor Burchard, and it is being considered whether that report should be made public at the present time. Before it would be safe to give the conclusions to the public, investigations extending over a large area and occupying a considerable time would have to be made.

FORESTRY BATTALION OFFICERS.

Mr. FAFARD:

Is it the intention of the Minister of Militia and Defence to weed out the officers of the Forestry Battalions and to send them overseas for service in France?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL: There are no forestry units at present in Canada, the battalions having proceeded overseas, the depots having been demobilized, and the officers disposed of.

ALLEGED EVASIONS OF MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

* Mr. LEDUC:

1. Is the Minister of Militia and Defence aware that a number of people are trying to evade the Military Service Act by enlisting in the Overseas Training Corps of the University of Toronto, where they remain six, eight and even twelve months before being sent overseas?
2. Is the minister aware that men have been at Burwash Hall Overseas Training Corps Barracks in Toronto since October last and are not yet ordered to leave for the front?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1 and 2. No; will inquire.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR:

1. How many officers of the Permanent Corps, Canadian Militia, are employed in Militia District No. 11?
2. How many of such officers have seen overseas service in the present war?
3. What is the pay and allowance of these officers?
4. Has the officer in charge of the School of Instruction at Work Point seen overseas service in this war?
5. Must officers returning from the front who have received their promotion in the field, take a course of instruction under the officer referred to in Question 5, before their commission can be confirmed in the Canadian Militia?

6. How many officers now on the Establishment of the 5th Regiment have seen overseas service in the present war?

7. Is it the intention that such officers who have not seen overseas service shall be given an opportunity of seeing such service and that their places filled by returned officers?

8. How many (a) Warrant Officers, (b) Non-commissioned Officers, (c) Privates, in the Permanent Corps of the Canadian Militia employed in Militia District 11 have not seen overseas service in the present war?

9. Has the Assistant Judge Advocate General in Militia District 11 had any military experience?

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. How many persons are employed in the office of the Registrar under the Military Service Act, in Quebec?

2. What is the salary, and what are the duties of each member of the staff?

3. To what town does each member of said staff belong?

4. How many, if any, of these persons have commissions in the Militia, and how many have been at the front or have offered to go to the front, what is the name of each employee and the date of his appointment?

5. Upon whose recommendation have the members of said staff been appointed?

* Mr. LEDUC:

1. What positions or appointments have been given to Mr. F. H. Chrysler, K.C., of Ottawa, by the Union Government, and how much has been paid him to date?

2. What position does Mr. Chrysler hold in connection with the Military Service Act? What is his salary?

3. How much money was paid Mr. Chrysler by the Liberal Government from July, 1896, to October, 1911?

MR. WILLIAM K. TROWER.

Mr. MURPHY: The Minister of Trade and Commerce, in reply to the question by my hon. friend from Prescott (Mr. Proulx), as to the names and salaries of the members and staff of the War Trade Board, to-day handed in a list in which the name of Mr. William K. Trower appears as general secretary of the board at a salary of $6,000 a year. May I inquire who William K. Trower is?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He is the secretary of the War Trade Board.

Mr. MURPHY: Who was he before his appointment?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He was Mr. Trower.

Mr. MURPHY: What occupation?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He was a business man of good repute.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. MURPHY: He must have been, to receive such a salary. Where was he in business?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In Montreal.

SUPPLY.

THE TAKING OF THE SOLDIERS' VOTE AT LAST ELECTION—AMENDMENT BY W. COPP.

On the motion of Sir George Foster that the House go into Committee of Supply:

Mr. A. B. COPP (Westmorland): The question I propose to discuss has reference to the taking of the soldiers' votes during the last general election, both in Canada and overseas. Those of us who were in this House during the sessions of 1915 and 1917 will well remember the attention that was paid to the Act giving the soldiers in Canada and overseas the right to record their votes at any general election in the Dominion, whenever that might be held. In the year 1915 there was a strong probability that a general election might be brought on before another session, and the Act I have referred to was passed giving the soldiers the right and privilege of exercising the franchise. The election was not held that year, and in 1917 a new Act was passed, amending the Dominion Elections Act and giving the soldiers the right to vote for or against the Government and for or against different candidates. As I propose to refer to a number of instances bearing on the different sections of the Military Voters' Act of 1917, I shall put a few sections of the Act on Hansard. Section 3 says:

(1) Every military elector shall be qualified and entitled to vote at a general election.

(2) If he can state the electoral district wherein he last continuously resided during at least four months of the twelve months immediately preceding his appointment, enlistment, enrolment or calling out on active service, or so particularly specify a place or places within an electoral district whereat during such period of time he so resided that such electoral district can therefore be ascertained, he shall be deemed an elector of the electoral district so stated or to be ascertained, and his vote shall be supplied thereto.

(3) If he cannot state or so specify an electoral district or place wherein he has so resided for the time and within the period mentioned in subsection two but can state an electoral district or so specify a place within Canada wherein he has at any other time resided, he shall be deemed an elector of the electoral district so stated or made ascertainable and his vote shall be applied thereto.

(4) If he cannot, because of non-residence or otherwise, so state or specify, he shall be deemed an elector of, and his vote shall be applied to, such electoral district as he may indicate.

(5) No person shall be entitled, because of anything in this Part contained, to vote more than once at any election.

Section 5 says:

(1) Whenever the Secretary of State of Canada shall so direct, a sufficient supply of ballot-papers in the form A of the Schedule, and of envelopes for holding the same, with certificates in the form B of the Schedule printed thereon, and of all such forms and instructions as are ordinarily supplied to returning officers, modified to conform to the provisions of this Part, shall be delivered, (a) by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to the officer in command of any Canadian forces in Bermuda, or in any other place without Canada but in North America, and to such Presiding Officers as shall have been appointed to arrange for the holding of polls in Canada; and, (b) by the Assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to such Presiding Officers as shall have been appointed to arrange for the holding of polls in the United Kingdom or on the continent of Europe.

(2) Such ballot-papers and envelopes shall be safely held by such officers in command, respectively, until receipt from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery of notice of the appointment of Presiding Officers for the camps under such officers' command, whereupon they shall deliver such ballots and envelopes to such Presiding Officers in such quantities as may be necessary, and return any surplus, with a statement in writing of the disposition of all thereof, showing names and quantities, to the General Returning Officer at Ottawa.

(3) The printer shall, upon delivering the ballot papers to the Assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, file in his hands an affidavit setting forth the description of the ballots as printed by him, the number of ballots supplied by him, and the fact that no other ballot papers have been supplied by him to any one else.

Section 9, in part, reads as follows:

(1) The manner of voting without Canada under this Part shall be as follows:—

(a) Voting shall be by ballot;

(b) The ballot-paper shall be in the form A in the Schedule;

(c) The voter shall answer under oath, before the Deputy Presiding Officer, the questions set forth in the certificate which is form B in the Schedule. Such certificate shall be endorsed on the envelopes referred to in section five of this Part;

(e) The ballot-paper shall be marked in the presence of the Deputy Presiding Officer and deputy scrutineers present, or military electors acting in their stead, but in such manner as not to disclose to them or to any other person any marking thereon. The voter shall fold the ballot, place it in the envelope, securely close the same and hand it to the Deputy Presiding Officer, who shall then and there, in the presence of the voter and deputy scrutineers present, or military electors acting in their stead, place it in the ballot-box;

Now, I want to refer to the form of oath as contained in Form B and which is as follows:

Form B.

These are the sections of the Act and the forms to which I proposed to refer in my observations in regard to the taking of the soldiers' vote during the last election.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. A. B. COPP (Westmorland) resuming: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at one o'clock I had just placed before hon. members of this House the sections of the Military Voters' Act to which I purpose to refer particularly during my argument. We all remember that at the time of the passing of that Act it was unanimously agreed by all the hon. members of this House that every effort should be made to give to the soldiers who were fighting for our country the opportunity of voting in the election that was about to be held. We all remember also that during the discussion that took place in committee hon. gentlemen on both sides carefully considered each clause of the Bill, and it was unanimously agreed that every safeguard that could be framed should be thrown around the measure to prevent the possibility of any fraud occurring in connection with the taking of the soldiers' vote. I well recall, Sir, the feelings that I entertained during that discussion, when certain of my hon. friends who are to-day on the other side—particularly my hon. friend from the county of Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell), now the Minister of Public Works in the present Government—took a very active part in that discussion. I am bound to admit that, while I had a very high regard for the acute and ingenious legal mind of my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) I was somewhat convinced that he was over apprehensive as to the frauds that would be attempted in connection with the taking of that vote. But, Sir, now that I am in possession of the facts, I am satisfied that my hon. friend instead of being too careful and over apprehensive, did not foresee one-tenth part of the frauds that actually could be committed in connection with polling the soldiers' vote. I shall not occupy the time of the House by quoting, on the present occasion, the remarks of my hon. friend and of other hon. gentlemen on the occasion referred to. I would suggest, however, to those who want to get the facts of the matter, and who now do me the honour of listening to my remarks, that if they will turn to the Revised Hansard of 1917, pages 4796 to 4870, they will learn what was in the minds of hon. gentlemen when the Military Voters' Act was being discussed in this House in Committee of the Whole.

After the Bill in question had been passed through committee and moulded into law the soldiers' vote was duly taken in this country, as well as overseas, and allocated, and, Sir, quite a large number of hon. members of the House now occupy their seats by virtue of the soldiers' votes cast on that occasion. For that reason it is only fair to ask the House to listen to some facts which I propose to lay before it as reasons why an inquiry should be instituted, and investigation made into the circumstances under which the soldiers' vote was taken, and that the results of that investigation should be placed before the country. While the vote was being polled in Canada it came to my knowledge that irregularities were occurring. Shortly afterwards, and after the soldiers' vote had been taken overseas, I received numerous letters from soldiers who furnished me with information which convinced me that frauds, irregularities and election crimes had been committed. On the receipt of that information I deemed it to be my duty to make further inquiries and endeavour to learn, as nearly as I could, the nature of those frauds. I started my inquiries and have received information, affidavits and statements, of the truth of which I have not the slightest doubt, and which convinces me that such irregularities were practised in connection with the taking of the soldiers' vote in Canada and overseas. I therefore venture to take up the time of the House this afternoon in order to place before Parliament and the people of the country the nature of those irregularities and frauds which, to my mind, prove beyond peradventure that a conspiracy existed in connection with the allocation of those votes with the object of destroying the effect of the elections that were being held. Accordingly I have prepared some charges which I now propose to present to the House in proof of my contention that grievous irregularities and frauds were committed.

From information which I have received I have reason to believe, and do believe on my honour as a member of Parliament:

1. That in the recent election a carefully organized conspiracy existed by which extensive frauds were perpetrated in connection with the soldiers' votes.

2. That the aforesaid fraudulent conspiracy was particularly operative in the electoral districts of Kings and Queens, Prince Edward Island; Cape Breton North and Victoria, Richmond and Cape Breton South, Cumberland, Digby, Annapolis and Pictou, Nova Scotia; Westmorland, Restigouche and Madawaska, Kent and Northumberland, New Brunswick; Brome, Sherbrooke, Chambly-Vercheres, St. Ann's, Montreal, St. Antoine, St. Henri, St. Lawrence and St. George, Stanstead and Wright, Quebec; Algoma East, Bruce North and South, Essex North and South, Hamilton East and West, Huron South, Kent, Leeds and Brockville, Lennox and Addington, London, Middlesex West, Nipissing, Ontario South, Ottawa, Oxford South, Peel, Prince Edward, Russell, and Welland, Ontario; Calgary, Edmonton, and the Yukon.

Mr. H. B. MORPHY (Perth, N.): I did not hear the hon. gentleman mention his own county where he got a majority of the soldiers' votes. Does the hon. gentleman claim there was fraud committed in that case?

Mr. COPP: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. I mentioned Westmorland, my own county.

Mr. MORPHY: I did not hear the hon. gentleman read it.

Mr. COPP: I have that county on my list and I read it. (Continues reading.)

3. These frauds were directed and practised by responsible officers of His Majesty's Canadian Forces, co-operating with Deputy Presiding Officers and poll clerks appointed under the authority of the Crown.

4. That military electors were officially advised how to fill in Form B on the back of the envelopes containing their ballots in order to successfully and fraudulently place their votes in constituencies other than those in which they were legally entitled to vote.

5. That evidence will be submitted by me to a Commission of Inquiry establishing the fact that there was an organization to transfer a large fraudulent vote to certain selected constituencies in order to overcome the legitimate vote of the said electoral districts.

6. That in certain of the said constituencies a fraudulent soldiers' vote was polled largely in excess of the legitimate military franchise.

7. That throughout camps in Great Britain the answers to questions in Form B on the back of the ballot envelopes were filled in by commissioned officers and non-commissioned officers outside the polling booths instead of being filled in by the military electors, or the presiding officers inside the polling booth, and the said envelopes were given to the officials recording the votes without the said questions being addressed to the said voters by the presiding officers.

8. That Opposition scrutineers were prevented from attending certain polling booths while the military vote was being recorded.

9. That the representative of the Opposition was forcibly removed from a polling booth and arrested and confined in a camp prison during the period when a large fraudulent vote was being recorded in the said polling booth.

10. That ballot envelopes partially filled in, signed and sealed by the Deputy Presiding Officer, and each containing a ballot marked in favour of the Government, were in circulation with the blank space left open for the insertion of the name of a military voter, as a means of facilitating the perpetration of the frauds hereinbefore mentioned.

11 That military electors were canvassed by superior officers in direct contravention of the King's regulations and orders, and were directed how they should mark their ballots.

12. That military electors in non-combatant regiments were threatened with transfer to fighting line regiments if they did not mark their ballots for the Government in the presence of and in the manner prescribed by the Deputy Presiding Officer.

13. That military electors who at first refused to vote as they were directed, but afterwards did so under compulsion, were, nevertheless, removed to regiments proceeding to the fighting line.

14. That military electors were not afforded facilities for the proper observance of the secrecy of the ballot as provided by Section 9, Subsection E, of the Military Voters Act.

15. That scrutineers appointed on behalf of the Government were sworn in as scrutineers for the Opposition by Deputy Presiding Officers in polling booths where extensive frauds were practised owing to the Opposition not having bona fide representatives therein.

16. That election campaign literature which was dishonest and untruthful was circulated among the military electors with the authority and by the direction of Lord Beaverbrook, and that the said Lord Beaverbrook was an active participant in the hereinbefore mentioned fraudulent practices.

17. That Lord Brooke formerly Commander of the Canadian Forces was also a participant in the said fraudulent practices.

18. That letters mailed through the Canadian Army Branch of the British Post Office, addressed to military electors in which was enclosed campaign literature on behalf of the Opposition, were opened, and the said literature was removed therefrom before the said letters were delivered to the military electors, to whom they were addressed, and the delivery of the said letters were also systematically delayed by the said Post Office authorities.

19. That ballot boxes and bags contained a number of ballot envelopes tightly folded together in parcels or wads too large to have been inserted in the said bags or boxes through the proper aperture, and, in addition, bearing dates showing that the votes had been polled not on the same day, but at intervals of time.

20. That the contents of these ballot boxes or bags which thus appeared to have been fraudulently tampered with were, contrary to the provisions of the Election Act, allocated and counted in the United Kingdom to the number of 15,000 votes under instructions from the Assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

21 That several thousand ballot envelopes were fraudulently endorsed and the votes allocated to constituencies other than those in which the said military electors were entitled to vote.

22. That military electors were systematically persuaded to give answer for endorsation on their ballot envelopes setting forth residence in constituencies in which they did not reside, and upon which declaration of domicile their qualification to vote was based.

23. That fraudulent votes were recorded for the electoral district of Cumberland, N.S., by Captain H. M. Burke, Deputy Presiding Officer at Ashford, County of Kent, Eng., in which voters declared their residence to be Springhill, Tignish, Joggin Mines, Shulie and Nappan, Pugwash, Oxford and Amherst, whose domicile was, in fact, in some one of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, Ontario and Quebec.

24. That similar conditions to those referred to in the preceding paragraph prevailed in the polling booth presided over by Lieut.-Col. C. M. R. Graham, of the 156th Battalion, Whitley, in which military electors whose domicile was in other parts of Ontario and Manitoba, together with a number of subjects of the United States were induced to falsely declare their residence to be in Brockville, in the electoral district of Leeds.

25. That at the said polling booth in the presence of the said Lieut.-Col. C. M. R. Graham, Deputy Presiding Officer, it was arranged that the votes of the military electors whose surnames commenced with the letters ranging from A to H should be polled in the electoral district of Grenville, and the said votes were so polled after the said electors had been induced to falsely declare their domicile to be in the town of Prescott, in the electoral district of Grenville.

26. That a large number of citizens of the United States voted in the electoral districts of Peel, Digby and Annapolis, St. Annes, Que., Prince Edward County, Ont., North Essex, Bruce North, Edmonton, Cape Breton South, and Richmond, St. Lawrence and St. George, Ottawa, Brome, Renfrew, Laurier and Outremont, Wright, Cape Breton North and Victoria, Pictou, Westmorland, Cumberland, Leeds, Yarmouth, Hants, St. Antoine and Port Arthur and Kenora.

27. That military electors voted twice in the same polling booth.

28. That Deputy Presiding Officers gave military electors two ballots in direct violation of the Election Act.

29. That military electors voted on behalf of and personated other military electors.

30. That after military electors had voted ballot envelopes were fraudulently re-endorsed so that the votes of the said electors were transferred to electoral districts other than the constituencies indicated by the said electors in their reply to questions 6 and 7 in Form B.

31. That persons were fraudulently allowed to vote by Deputy Presiding Officers with knowledge that such persons were not qualified under the Election Act.

32. That a large number of Canadian officers fraudulently voted in electoral districts other than where they were entitled to vote.

These are the charges I make and which I propose to discuss, and I shall give some facts and evidence to the House to prove the truth of them. The House will readily understand how meagre is the opportunity afforded to a member of the Opposition to gather up information. But I have made endeavour to get sufficient information to establish to this House a prima facie case of a conspiracy which I believe existed on the part of some person or persons to illegally and improperly elect members of the Unionist Government to Parliament in certain constituencies.

I wish now to refer to charge No. 3: that these frauds were directed and practised by responsible officers of His Majesty's Canadian forces co-operating with Deputy Presiding Officers and poll clerks appointed under the authority of the Crown.

I hold under my hand the nominal roll of voters at headquarters No. 51 district C.F.C., Inverness, England. The name of the deputy presiding officer is given as Lieutenant-Colonel J. Glenn, address Indian Head, in the province of Saskatchewan, whose signature is attached to this list, certifying to the post office addresses given. Lieutenant-Colonel Glenn himself voted in Prince Edward county, Ontario, although his home address is given as I have stated. I give a list of persons who voted in Prince Edward County, Ontario, together with their home addresses, as endorsed by Colonel Glenn:

Mr. CURRIE: Were these votes counted? What is the use of bringing in a complaint if they were not counted?

Mr. MURPHY: That is not the point. The fact that the fraud was prevented does not excuse those in the conspiracy who perpetrated it.

Mr. COPP: I am not discussing that phase of the subject at this moment. I am giving to the House a list of the officials and persons, according to a signed statement whose home addresses were as I have read them, but who voted in Prince Edward constituency, Ontario.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman is giving the House the impression that these men voted and that their votes were counted. Everybody knows that these votes were not counted. A man may give his address as Ottawa, being the place where he enlisted, whereas his actual home may be in Prince Edward Island. That is no evidence that his vote was not correctly given.

Mr. MURPHY: Thirteen thousand of them.

Mr. COPP: If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Currie) wishes to put a question I shall answer it to the best of my ability. I am trying to give the facts to the House clearly and honestly, feeling that it is my duty to do so. I shall discuss later the aspect of the question referred to by my hon. friend. Lieutenant-Colonel Glenn, the deputy presiding officer, had this signed list before him when the vote was taken and must have known that the votes of the persons to whom I have referred were placed in a constituency in which they had no right to be placed.

I want to show the extent to which deputy presiding officers in England ignored the Act and permitted envelopes containing soldiers' votes to be placed in the ballot boxes with several of the answers required by the law not given.

Lieutenant R. R. H. Beaton, deputy presiding officer, Sunningdale, Ontario, permitted 133 envelopes, with questions 6, 7 and 8 not answered—one envelope only gave an answer to question 6—to be alloted to Prince Edward county, Ontario.

Lieutenant-Colonel G. G. Corbett, deputy presiding officer, permitted 274 envelopes to be placed in his ballot box for various constituencies in Ontario, out of which 174 did not answer questions 6, 7 and 8.

Major Cecil M. Roberts, deputy presiding officer, Bramshott camp, England, voted 609 envelopes. With the exception of 36, the entire poll was marked "cannot state" in reply to question 6. These votes were allocated to the constituencies of Essex, Bruce, Middlesex and Nipissing.

Lieutenant J. T. Allen, deputy presiding officer, permitted 237 votes to be polled for Ontario, out of which approximately 160 did not reply to questions 6, 7 and 8.

Captain H. J. Dennis, deputy presiding officer, polled a total of 808 votes, out of which 513 did not reply to questions 6, 7 and 8.

Out of a total of 589 envelopes placed in the ballot box of Major A. P. Gillis, deputy presiding officer, in only 314 were answers given to questions 6, 7 and 8.

Lieutenant-Colonel Malone, deputy presiding officer, 208th Battalion, polled a total of 766 envelopes, out of which 541 did not have answers given to questions 6, 7 and 8.

Under the supervision of Lieutenant J. R. Hayden, deputy presiding officer, 1,240 envelopes were polled at the regimental depot, practically all of which represented English-speaking soldiers. Out of this number, 1,200 did not answer questions 6, 7 and 8. 999 of these envelopes were placed in Quebec constituencies.

The following are among the deputy presiding officers in whose polling subdivisions election frauds were conspicuously and systematically perpetrated, as is clearly established by documentary evidence now in my possession:

Major McGowan, Bramshott.

Lieut.-Colonel McQueen, Hospital.

I have placed these names on Hansard in order to show that it was not in an individual or isolated case that those frauds were committed, but that they were committed in practically every camp in which the votes of soldiers were taken. Deputy presiding officers, if my information is correct and I have no doubt of its correctness, —committed frauds and conspiracies simply to defeat the will of the people of the Dominion of Canada in the election held on the 17th of December, 1917.

I want to refer to the statement I made in regard to Charge No. 7. To prove that charge, I am going to read to the House some affidavits which I hold in my hand. The first is an affidavit made by Louis Edmund Guillet:

1, Louis Edmund Guillet a captain in the 150th Canadian Infantry Battalion of the fifth division of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces do hereby solemnly and sincerely declare as follows:—

1. I was duly appointed in writing Deputy Scrutineer by William Thomas Rochester Preston under and for the purposes of the Military Voters' Act 1917.

2. At or about 11.30 a.m. on Monday the 3rd day of December, 1917, I attended at the polling booth at Witley Camp at which polling booth the military electors comprised in the 125th Canadian Infantry Battalion were to register their votes for the pending Canadian election. I attended in my capacity as deputy scrutineer and I duly presented to the deputy presiding officer the document appointing me deputy scrutineer.

3. Prior to the military electors entering the said polling booth for the purpose of voting they had already received from some person in some place other than the polling booth the envelopes with the questions printed thereon known as form B of the Military Voters' Act, 1917, and in nearly every instance the answers to the said questions in the said envelopes had been filled in when they entered the said polling booth to vote.

4. The military electors handed the envelopes so filled up and signed, to the deputy presiding officer who administered the oath and took the vote. I called the attention of the deputy presiding officer to the fact of the envelopes being filled in before the voter entered the polling booth and I asked the deputy returning officer where the answers were being written out and signed and he replied "in the company's offices". He also stated to me that after reading over the Act he considered this way of proceeding to take the vote to be the correct one.

5. On the same day, Monday the 3rd December, 1917, I attended at the polling booth at Witley Camp at which polling booth the military electors comprised in the 156th Canadian Infantry Battalion were to register their votes for the same election. The same proceeding was being carried on at this polling booth namely, the military electors entered the said polling booth with envelopes already filled in outside the said polling booth, the oath was administered and the votes taken. I saw amongst others Lieut. Mason of the 156th Battalion attached to the 14th Canadian Infantry Brigade enter the polling booth with the answers to the printed questions on his envelope already filled in outside the said polling booth.

[Mr. Copp.]

6. On the same day, 3rd December, 1917, I attended as deputy scrutineer at the polling booth at Witley Camp at which polling booth the military electors comprised in the 14th, 15th and 16th Canadian field ambulance sections were to register their votes for the said election, I saw several military electors enter the said polling booth with the answers to the questions on their envelopes already filled in and this had been done in another room and not in the said polling booth, I pointed out to the deputy presiding officer the votes were being taken not in compliance with the Act of Parliament and objected to his acting in this manner. The deputy presiding officer then called in two clerks who then proceeded to write out the answers of the military electors on their envelopes. The deputy presiding officer then asked the military electors the questions and read out the written answers himself.

7. On the same day 3rd December, 1917, at about 3 p.m. I attended as deputy scrutineer at Witley Camp at which polling booth the military electors comprised the 208th Canadian Infantry Battalion were to register their votes for the said election. I remained until 3.30 p.m. when the polling booth was closed. During this period about twenty military electors recorded their votes, they all brought into the said polling booth their envelopes with the answers to the printed questions thereon filled in outside the said polling booth and the deputy presiding officer in each case administered the oath and recorded the votes.

8. On the following day the 4th December, 1917, I again as deputy scrutineer attended the last-mentioned polling booth and the military electors were voting in the way described in the preceding paragraph hereof. I then asked the deputy presiding officer to put the following questions to each military elector, "Were you in Canada when you enlisted" and "How long have you lived there" but the deputy presiding officer refused to put the questions to the said military electors who afterwards came in to record their votes.

9. On the morning of Monday, the 3rd December, 1917, I attended at the polling booth at Witley Camp at which polling booth the military electors comprised in the 160th Canadian Infantry Battalion were to register their votes for the said election. I attended as deputy scrutineer and produced the document appointing me deputy scrutineer. No voting took place during the forenoon of that day. I attended at the same polling booth on the 4th December, 1917, when voting was being carried on in the following manner. Each military elector was handed his envelope with the printed questions thereon which he took out of the said polling booth and filled in the answers in an adjoining room or office and he then returned to the said polling booth when the deputy presiding officer administered the oath and recorded his vote. Shortly before 1.30 p.m. on Tuesday, the 4th of December, 1917, accompanied by the said William Thomas Rochester Preston, I again attended at the said polling booth. I identified the said William Thomas Rochester Preston to the said Lt.-Col. W. P. Malone as the person appointed as scrutineer by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Canadian Opposition but the said Lt.-Col. W. P. Malone denied the right of the said William Thomas Rochester Preston to remain in the said polling booth during the polling and ordered the said William Thomas Rochester Preston to leave the said polling booth which the said William Thomas Rochester Preston refused to do and thereupon the said Lt.-Col. W. P. Malone called into the said polling booth the sergeant of the special guard and ordered the sergeant to bring in the guard and remove the said William Thomas Rochester Preston from the said polling booth and thereupon the said sergeant requested the said William Thomas Rochester Preston to leave the said polling booth which the said William Thomas Rochester Preston refused to do and thereupon the said Lt.-Col. W. P. Malone ordered the said sergeant to take the said William Thomas Rochester Preston to the guard house which he accordingly did assisted by the guard.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true and by virtue of the provisions of the Statutory Declarations Act, 1835.

(Sgd) Louis Edmund Guillet.

Declared at Witley Camp in the county of Surrey this 17th day of December, 1917, Before me,

Mr. Arthur Heywood,

A Commissioner for Oaths, etc., for use in Province of Ontario.

The next affidavit is as follows:

I, the undersigned, No. 417601, Eugene B. Bastien, R.Q.M.S. in the 150th Battalion C.E.F., Witley, declare the following knowing that the said Declaration has the same effect as one taken under oath:

The third day of December of the year nineteen hundred and seventeen (3. 12. 1917) acting as electoral agent for the polls of the 5th Division, I visited the following polls: Batt's 156, 161, 198, 208, 185 and A.S.C.

I first went to the 156th Battalion and notified the electors' agent, S.S.M. McKinnen, that the envelope containing the ballots were sealed in advance, before entering the poll, or at least filled in advance after the information I had. S.S.M. McKinnen told me that he knew about it and that an order had just been given to correct that mode of proceeding.

In poll of the 198th Battalion I, myself, noticed a soldier handing to the O.C. an envelope sealed before entering said poll the O.C. taking and putting said envelope in the bag placed there to that effect.

In the polls of the 158th and 208 Battalions, I could not get access to those polls and was told to get away.

DECLARED at Westminster in the County of Middlesex in the United Kingdom this nineteenth day of December, A.D., 1917.

Eugene B. Bastien.

Before me,

W. T. R. Preston,

A Commissioner for Oaths, etc., for use in the Courts of Ontario.

Mr. SHEARD: Can the hon. gentleman tell me where the 150th Battalion came from and who its commanding officer was?

Mr. COPP: I cannot say, but I could get the information for my hon. friend. It was a Canadian regiment, at all events.

Mr. SHEARD: Is it not a fact that the 150th Battalion was from the province of Quebec and was commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Barre?

Mr. GAUVREAU: That does not alter the case at all. We know what you have in your mind.

Mr. COPP: I do not know where the battalion came from, and I do not care. I am simply giving the facts.

Mr. CURRIE: Before whom were these oaths taken?

Mr. COPP: Before Mr. N. Arthur Heywood.

Mr. CURRIE: These are not affidavits under the law.

Mr. COPP: I will leave that legal point to my hon. friend.

Mr. CURRIE: I am lawyer enough to know that.

Mr. COPP: The other affidavits are as follows:

In the matter of the Dominion Elections Act as amended and affected by the War-time Elections Act, 1917, and the Military Voters' Act 1917.

And in the matter of the Election (1917) for the House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada.

And in the matter of the Military Voters for the purpose of the above Election.

I, William Brennan, a Corporal in the 185th Canadian Infantry Battalion of the 5th Division of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces do hereby solemnly and sincerely declare as follows:—

1. I was duly appointed in writing Deputy Scrutineer by William Thomas Rochester Preston under and for the purposes of the Military Voters Act, 1917, to the 134th Canadian Infantry Battalion.

2. On Monday, the 3rd December, 1917, I attended at the Polling Booth at Witley Camp at which polling booth the Military Electors comprised in the 134th Canadian Infantry Battalion were to register their votes for the pending Canadian election. I attended in my capacity as Deputy Scrutineer and I duly presented to the Deputy Presiding Officer the document appointing me Deputy Scrutineer.

3. I attended at the same polling booth on the 4th, 5th and 6th days of December, 1917.

4. Prior to the Military Electors entering the said polling booth for the purpose of voting they had already received from some person in some place other than the said polling booth the envelopes with the questions printed thereon known as Form B of the Military Voters Act, 1917, and in every instance on the said 3rd, 4th and 5th days of December, 1911, the answers to the said questions on the said envelopes had been filled in outside the said polling booth. On the said 6th day of December the answers had only been partially filled in when brought by the military electors into the said polling booth for the purpose of voting.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true and by virtue of the Statutory Declarations Act, 1835.

DECLARED at Witley Camp, in the County of Surrey, this 17th day of December, 1917.

Wm. G. Brennan.

Before me,

N. Arthur Heywood,

A Commissioner for Oaths for use in the province of Ontario.

In the matter of the Dominion Election Act as amended and affected by the War-time Elections Act, 1917, and the Military Voters' Act, 1917.

And in the matter of the Elections (1917) for the House of Commons for the Dominion of Canada.

And in the matter of the Military Voters for the purposes of the above elections.

I, William Brennan, a Corporal in the 185th Canadian Infantry Battalion of the 5th Division of the Canadian Expeditionary Force do solemnly and sincerely declare as follows, being supplementary to my previous declaration made on the 17th day of December in this matter.

At the polling booth referred to in my aforesaid declaration on the first three days of the voting, December 3rd, 4th and 5th, the deputy presiding officer or his clerk asked no questions of the men as provided for in Form B of the said Military Electors Act but simply swore them and handed them their ballots, but after that date, December 6th, 7th and 8th, questions were asked by the deputy presiding officer of the voter, as to his name, regimental number and whether the voter was a British subject, but these questions had been previously filled in outside the polling booth.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true and by virtue of the provisions of the Statutory Declaration Act, A.D., 1835.

DECLARED at Westminster in the County of Middlesex this 8th day of March, 1918 .

901401, William G. Brennan.

Before me,

W. T. R. Preston,

A Commissioner for Oaths for use in the Courts of the province of Ontario.

In the matter of the Dominion Elections Act as amended and affected by the War-time Elections Act, 1917, and the Military Voters' Act, 1917, and in the matter of the Elections (1917) for the House of Commons for the Dominion of Canada and in the matter of the Military Voters for the purposes of the above elections.

I, Wilfrid Docity Gaston Patenaude, a Sergeant in the 150th Canadian Infantry Battalion of the 5th Division of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces do hereby solemnly and sincerely declare as follows:

1. I was duly appointed in writing a Deputy Scrutineer by William Thomas Rochester Preston under and for the purposes of the Military Voters' Act, 1917.

2. On Monday the 3rd of December, 1917, I attended at the polling booth at Witley Camp at which polling booth the military electors comprised in the 161st Canadian Infantry Battalion were to register their votes for the pending Canadian elections. I attended in my capacity of Deputy Scrutineer and I duly presented to the deputy presiding officer the document appointing me a Deputy Scrutineer.

[Mr. Copp.]

3. Prior to the military electors entering the said polling booth for the purpose of voting they had already received from some person in a place other than the polling booth the envelope with the questions printed thereon known as Form B of the Military Voters' Act, 1917, and afterwards the envelopes were brought in by an orderly from some outside office, three at a time, all filled in and handed by the orderly to the deputy presiding officer, who then signed them before the military electors came into the polling booth The secretary who was sitting near the deputy presiding officer examined the envelopes and made some entries on a sheet of paper. The military electors were then called in by name and each asked to swear that the answers to the questions were true. During the time I was at the polling booth about 750 voters recorded their votes in this way, and out of that number only about six looked at their answers written on the envelope before taking the oath. In several instances the military elector was handed his ballot and envelope while he was being sworn and in these cases he had no time to read over his answers on the envelope before taking the oath.

4. The deputy presiding officer in one case only asked any question of the military elector, viz: that of Private R. P. Garvey, No. 844495, who stated in answer to a question that he was an American citizen. I made an objection, and the deputy presiding officer then asked Private Garvey if he had enlisted in Canada, to which no reply was given, and the deputy presiding officer then turned to me and said, "Any one enlisted in the Canadian Army has a right to vote."

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true and by virtue of the Statutory Declarations' Act, 1835.

DECLARED at Witley Camp in the County of Surrey this 17th day of December, 1917.

W. D. Patenaude, Sgt.

Before me,

N. Arthur Heywood,

A Commissioner for Oaths for use in the province of Ontario.

In the matter of the Dominion Elections Act as amended and affected by the War-time Elections Act, 1917, and the Military Voters' Voters' Act, 1917.

And in the matter of the Elections (1917) for the House of Commons for the Dominion of Canada,

And in the matter of the Military Voters for the purposes of the above elections.

I, William McCoy, a Sergeant in the 150th Canadian Infantry Battalion of the 5th Division of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces do hereby solemnly and sincerely declare as follows:

1. I was duly appointed in writing a Deputy Scrutineer by William Thomas Rochester Preston under and for the purposes of the Military Voters' Act 1917.

2. At 9.30 on Monday, the 3rd day of December, 1917, I attended at the polling booth at Witley Camp, at which polling booth the Military electors comprised in the 125th Canadian Infantry Battalion were to register their votes for the pending Canadian election. I attended in my capacity of Deputy Scrutineer and I duly presented to the deputy presiding officer the document appointing me a Deputy Scrutineer.

3. Prior to the military electors entering the said booth for the purpose of voting they had already received from some person other than the polling booth the envelope with the questions printed thereon known as Form B of the Military Voters' Act 1917, and in nearly every instance the answers to the questions on the said envelopes had been filled in by the military electors when they then entered the said polling booth to vote.

4. The envelopes were then handed by the said military electors to the deputy presiding officer, who thereupon administered the oath as provided by the Acts, merely asking if the questions on the envelope were truly answered. The deputy presiding officer, after administering the oath, handed to each military elector his ballot paper. Each military elector then marked his ballot paper on the top of a box which was placed on the opposite side of the desk at which the deputy presiding officer sat, and which box was the only accommodation provided for the purpose, resulting in the fact that the voting of the military electors was not secret but was visible to those present in the polling booth.

5. About 11:30 a. m. on the said 3rd of December and whilst the said poll was proceeding in manner hereinbefore described, Captain Guillet, a deputy scrutineer, came to the said polling booth and in my presence pointed out to the said deputy presiding officer that the procedure hereinbefore recorded did not comply with the Act of Parliament, but notwithstanding the said objection the said deputy presiding officer continued to conduct the said polling in the manner hereinbefore recorded.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true, and by virtue of the provisions of the Statutory Declarations' Act 1835.

DECLARED at Witley Camp, in the County of Surrey, this 17th day of December, 1917.

And in the matter of the Military Voters for the purposes of the above elections.

I, Murdoch Edward Faulkner a Quarter-Master-Sergeant in the 185th Canadian Infantry Battalion of the 5th Division of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces do hereby solemnly and sincerely declare as follows:

1. I was duly appointed in writing a Deputy Scrutineer to the 185th Canadian Infantry Battalion by William Thomas Rochester Preston under and for the purposes of the Military Voters Act 1917.

4. Prior to the Military Electors entering the said polling booth for the purposes of voting they had already received from some person in some place other than the said polling booth the envelopes with the questions printed thereon known as Form B of the Military Voters Act 1917 and in every instance on the above dates the Military Electors brought in their envelopes with the answers completely filled up and this had been done outside the said polling booth.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true and by virtue of the Statutory Declaration Act 1835.

Declared at Westminster in the County of Middlesex this 19th day of December 1917.

(Sgd) M. E. FAULKNER.

Before me W. T. R. Preston, a Commissioner for Oaths etc. for use in the Courts of the Province of Ontario.

In the matter of the Dominion Election Act as amended and affected by the War Time Election Act 1917, and the Military Voters Act 1917.

And in the matter of the Election (1917) for the House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada.

And in the matter of the Military Voters for the purposes of the above Election.

I, Thomas D. Macfarlane of 17 Victoria Street, London, S.W. Manufacturers Agent do hereby solemnly and sincerely declare as follow:

I was duly appointed in writing Deputy Scrutineer by William Thomas Rochester Preston under and for the purposes of the Military Voters Act, 1917, to act for and on behalf of him in the Polling Sub-division throughout the United Kingdom.

On Monday the 3rd December, 1917, I attended at Polling Booths in Whitley Camp particularly at the polling booth wherein the 156th Canadian Infantry Battalion of the 5th Reserve were to register their votes for the pending Canadian election, and I attended in my capacity of Deputy Scrutineer at the said polling booth.

On my arrival at the outside of the polling booth I saw officers and non-commissioned officers canvassing the men who were paraded in line waiting to vote and filling in the envelopes Form B for and on behalf of Military Electors and I found that a number of electors were entering this said 156th Battalion polling booth with the envelopes in their hands duly filled up. I accordingly entered the polling booth and announced to the Deputy Presiding Officer, Lieut.-Col. Graham, that I attended in my capacity as deputy scrutineer for the Opposition and I immediately directed his attention to the improper procedure then in vogue at that polling sub-division whereby the envelopes being part of the ballots were being improperly completed out of his possession and in the possession of persons outside the polling booth who were filling in the answers to the questions for Military electors who proposed voting thereon.

While I was present in the said polling booth one voter who had entered with his envelope duly filled up as hereinbefore stated was in the act of voting when I protested that the statements contained in the envelope must be filled in in the presence of the Presiding Officer and the scrutineer who was present for the purpose of learning and knowing what statements were being sworn to. The Presiding Officer informed me that this was unnecessary and voters were being sworn that the statements contained in the envelope were correct. I then requested the scrutineers for the Opposition to make a note of all such votes recorded under these conditions and to enter a protest in each and every case, and demanded from the Presiding Officer that he note the protest of the official scrutineer for the Opposition.

I afterwards proceeded to the headquarters of the camp to interview the General Officer Commanding, Brigadier-General Hughes, who was not present. I therefore informed Colonel Parson who was acting on his behalf, and protested against this violation of the law which I had witnessed at said polling booth of the 156th Battalion. I also called upon the General Officer Commanding, General Meighan, of the Bramshott Camp, and informed him of what I had witnessed at the Whitley Camp. He at once issued an order that no such procedure would be permitted within his district and each Deputy Returning Officer was notified accordingly. I immediately communicated with the said William Thomas Rochester Preston the facts concerned with this improper procedure at this polling sub-division as well as others within the Whitley Camp area.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be correct and by virtue of the provisions of the Statutory Declarations Act, 1835.

Declared at Westminster in the County of Middlesex this 22nd day of December, 1917.

(Sgd) T. D. Macfarlane.

Before me

(Sgd) W. T. R. Preston,

A Commissioner for Oaths for use in the Courts of the Province of Ontario.

Mr. SHEARD: Is the W. T. R. Preston, who, I understand, appointed the gentleman who made that affidavit the same W. T. R. Preston before whom the affidavit was sworn to?

Mr. COPP: I want to give my hon. friend (Mr. Sheard) all the information I have. Mr. Preston was appointed as agent for the Opposition to look after the interests of the Liberal party in connection with the overseas vote and he appointed different scrutineers to be present at the military polls when the vote was being taken.

Mr. SHEARD: They swore to the affidavit before the same gentleman?

Mr. COPP: The same gentleman. (Continues reading):

In the matter of the Dominion Election Act as amended and affected by the War Times Election Act, 1917, and the Military Voters Act, 1917.

And in the matter of the Elections (1917) for the House of Commons for the Dominion of Canada.

And in the matter of the Military Voters for the purposes of the above elections.

I, Hugh Patrick McKinnon, a Quarter-Master-Sergeant in the 185th Canadian Infantry Battalion of the 5th Division of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces do hereby solemnly and sincerely declare as follows:

1. I was duly appointed in writing a Deputy Scrutineer to the 156th Canadian Infantry Battalion by William Thomas Rochester Preston under and for the purposes of the Military Voters Act, 1917.

2. On Monday the 3rd December, 1917, I attended the polling booth at Witley Camp at which polling booth the military electors comprised in the 156th Canadian Infantry Battalion were to register their votes for the pending Canadian election. I attended in my capacity of deputy scrutineer and I duly presented to the Deputy Presiding Officer the document appointing me a Deputy Scrutineer.

3. I attended at the same polling booth on Tuesday and Wednesday the 4th and 5th December, 1917.

4. On each day prior to the Military electors entering the said polling booth for the purposes of voting they had already received from some person in a place other than the said polling booth the envelopes with the questions printed thereon known as Form B of the Military Service Act, 1917, and in nearly every instance the answers to the questions on the said envelopes had been filled in by the military electors or some one on their behalf when they entered the said polling booth to vote. After objection was raised by Mr. Macfarlane and myself on the 3rd December, the questions relating to residence were asked by the Deputy Presiding Officer but in a few instances the answers had been only partially filled in.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true and by virtue of the Statutory Declarations Act, 1835.

Declared at Westminster in the County of Middlesex this 19th day of December, 1917.

(Sgd) H. P. McKinnon.

Before me

(Sgd) W. T. R. Preston,

A Commissioner for Oaths, etc., for use in the Courts of the Province of Ontario.

In the matter of the Dominion Election Act as amended and affected by the War Time Election Act, 1917, and the Military Voters Act, 1917.

And in the matter of the Elections (1917) for the House of Commons for the Dominion of Canada.

And in the matter of the Military Voters for the purposes of the above elections.

I, Duncan Syd Carmichael, a Lance-Corporal in the 185th Canadian Infantry Battalion of the 5th Division of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces do hereby solemnly and sincerely declare as follows:

1. I was duly appointed in writing a Deputy Scrutineer to the 104th Canadian Infantry Battalion by William Thomas Rochester Preston under and for the purposes of the Military Voters Act, 1917.

On Monday 3rd December, 1917, I attended at the polling booth at Witley Camp, at which polling booth the military electors comprised in the 104th Canadian Infantry Battalion were to register their votes for the pending Canadian election. I attended in my capacity of deputy scrutineer and I duly presented to the Lieutenant at the door of the polling booth the document appointing me a deputy scrutineer. He took this said document into the polling booth and he refused to allow me to enter the said polling booth and the voting continued without my being allowed to be present as a scrutineer on behalf of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Opposition. The reason given to me by the said Lieutenant for refusing me admittance was that the Deputy Presiding Officer of the said polling booth had no official information of the appointment of the said William Thomas Rochester Preston as Scrutineer.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true and by virtue of the Statutory Declarations Act, 1835.

Declared at Westminster in the County of Middlesex, this 19th day of December, 1917.

(Sgd) Duncan S. Carmichael.

Before me

(Sgd) W. T. R. Preston,

A commissioner for Oaths, etc., for use in the Province of Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, I have placed these affidavits before the House for the purpose of showing that these cases were not a few individual and isolated ones, and to demonstrate the manner in which the taking of the soldiers' vote was conducted in the Mother Country—those soldiers whom we spent our time here pledging ourselves to protect, and that advantage was taken by officials appointed by somebody—whoever was responsible for that election—to commit these wrongdoings. I have brought this matter to the attention of the House for its consideration, and I feel that the time occupied in doing so is amply justified when I present such facts as these.

Now I wish to refer to clause 8 of the charges alleging

That Opposition scrutineers were prevented from attending certain polling booths while the military vote was being allocated.

That has been covered in part by the affidavit of Mr. Guillet which I have already read, and also in the last clause of Mr. Carmichael's declaration which I have just finished reading:

I want to place before the House another affidavit dealing with the charge that the scrutineer of the Liberal party was forced out of a polling booth and the vote taken in said military polling booth without any representative of the Opposition being there, as provided by the Military Voters Act:

In the matter of the Dominion Election Act as amended and affected by the War Time Election Act, 1917, and the Military Voters Act, 1917.

And in the matter of the election (1917) for the House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada.

And in the matter of the military voters for the purposes of the above election.

I, William Thomas Rochester Preston of "Kempshott", London Road, Norbury, in the county of Surrey, England, do solemnly and sincerely declare as follows:—

1. Pursuant to the Military Voters Act 1917 I was appointed scrutineer for and on behalf of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Canadian Opposition in respect of the military voting to take place in the United Kingdom of Great Britain for the pending election of members to the House of Commons for the Dominion of Canada, and I have duly complied with all the provisions of the said Act appertaining to a scrutineer.

2. Notice of my said appointment was duly published in the General Military Orders issued by General Turner, commanding the Canadian Expeditionary Forces in London, and as scrutineer I have visited the polling booths at Witley Camp on several occasions with the approval of the commandant of the said Fifth Division, Brigadier General Hughes.

3. Pursuant to the power vested in me under the said Military Voters Act, 1917, I duly appointed (inter alia) the following persons as deputy scrutineers:

(a) Sergeant Patenaude of the 150th Canadian Infantry Battalion.

(b) Lance-Corporal D. S. Carmichael, of the 185th Canadian Infantry Battalion.

(c) Q-Master H. L. McKinnon, of the 185th Canadian Infantry Battalion.

(d) Corporal M. D. Kennedy, of the 185th Canadian Infantry Battalion.

(e) Corporal W. C. Brennan, of the 185th Canadian Infantry Battalion.

(f) Q-Master M. E. Falkner, of the 185th Canadian Infantry Battalion.

(g) Captain L. E. Guillet, of the 150th Canadian Infantry Battalion.

(h) Sergeant McCoy, of the 185th Canadian Infantry Battalion.

4. From each of the said deputy scrutineers I received from time to time complaints of illegalities sanctioned and committed by the Deputy Presiding Officer at the polling booths at which they respectively attended in their capacity as scrutineers. At my request the said Deputy Scrutineers have made legal declarations of some of the said illegalities.

5. In addition to the illegalities referred to in the preceding paragraph many more illegalities of a similar nature have occurred legal evidence as to which is now in process of being collected.

6. As an illustration of the high handed illegal treatment to which I and some of the Deputy Scrutineers appointed by me have been subjected by certain of the Deputy Returning Officers, I desire to record the following facts:—

On Tuesday morning the 4th December 1917 I attended the said Polling Booth at Witley Camp wherein the Military Electors of the 208th Canadian Infantry Battalion were recording their votes. I had previously been informed that on Monday the 3rd December 1917 the day preceding my regularly appointed Scrutineer Captain Guillet in the said polling booth had been refused permission to remain during the voting. I produced letters from Lieutenant Colonel Purney the deputy of the clerk of the Crown in Chancery establishing my identity to the Deputy Presiding Officer Lieutenant Colonel W. P. Malone but he refused to acknowledge my right to be present and ordered me to withdraw from the said polling booth and on my refusing to comply with his directions he declared the poll to be closed.

7. Having ascertained that the said poll was to be reopened in the said polling booth at the hour of 1.30 p.m. on the said 4th December 1917 I returned to the said polling booth accompanied by Captain Guillet of the 150th Canadian Infantry Battalion of the 5th Division of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces one of the Deputy Scrutineers appointed by me as aforesaid and he in my presence and in the presence of the said Deputy Presiding Officer the said Lieutenant Colonel W. P. Malone identified me to the said Lieutenant Colonel W. P. Malone as Mr. W. T. R. Preston the Scrutineer appointed by the said Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Canadian Opposition under the said Military Voters Act 1917. The said Captain Guillet had previously complained to me that he had been prevented from remaining at the said polling Booth by the said Deputy Presiding Officer Lieutenant Colonel W. P. Malone. Notwithstanding the production by me of the said letter from Lieutenant Colonel Purney and the identification of me by the said Captain Guillet the said Deputy Presiding Officer, Lieutenant Colonel W. P. Malone denied my right to remain in the said polling booth during the polling therein and ordered me to leave the said polling booth which I refused to do, and thereupon the said Deputy Presiding Officer the said Lieutenant Colonel W. P. Malone called in to the said polling booth a sergeant of the special guard which was in attendance and ordered the said sergeant to bring in the guard and remove me from the said polling booth. The said Sergeant then requested me to leave the said polling booth which I refused to do and thereupon the said Deputy Presiding Officer the said Lieutenant Colonel W. P. Malone addressing the said Sergeant said "Remove this man and take him to the Guard House". Accordingly the Sergeant seized me forcibly and removed me from the said polling booth and accompanied by the said Sergeant the said guard with fixed bayonets conducted me to the Guard House and placed me in an inner room used as a detention cell where there were incarcerated a number of soldiers, charged with military offences. I was detained in the said Guard House for a period of about two and a half hours when, escorted by a guard under command of an officer I was marched to General Headquarters a distance of about one mile where I was received in the first instance by Major Green and who was astonished to hear of the treatment to which I had been subjected. At my request in confirmation of the facts heretofore declared to by me as to my arrest I received through the said Major Green a memorandum in the following terms:

"To the 13th Canadian Inf. Batt.

4, XII, 1917.

"Mr. W. T. R. Preston who has been officially appointed a Scrutineer in connection with the Dominion Elections (Vide D.O.C.R.O. 2842) has permission to enter polling booths within this Camp area.

(Signed) Major Green,
D. A. A. & Q.M.G.
5th Canadian Division.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true and by virtue of the provisions of the Statutory Declarations in this behalf.

(Signed) W. T. R. Preston.

Declared before me at Ottawa in the County of Carleton this 21st day of May, 1918.

(Signed) D. C. Ross,
A Commissioner for Oaths.

Mr. Speaker, that affidavit, together with that part of the affidavits of Mr. Guillet and Mr. Carmichael that deals with this particular matter, proves beyond question paragraph 8 as set forth in the charges.

The next charge, No. 10, refers to the questions on the envelopes being partially filled in and signed and sealed by the deputy presiding officer, and each containing a ballot marked for the Government being in circulation for the perpetration of the charges hereinbefore mentioned. I hold in my hand an envelope, under Form B, signed by Lieutenant W. C. Bryan, deputy presiding officer. This envelope is an exact copy of an envelope that was found during the counting and allocating of the soldiers' votes in England. The ballot within was initialled and the envelope, with several of the questions answered, was signed by the deputy returning officer, but the name of the soldier voter was left blank.

I now wish to read an affidavit made by W. D. Spence, in regard to this:

In the matter of the Elections for the House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada holden in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, December 1st-17, 1917, under the provisions of the Military Voters Act, A.D. 1917.

I, William David Spence, of the City of Calgary, in the Province of Alberta, Canada, accountant and Special Returning Officer in the matter herewith, make oath and say:

That in my capacity as Special Returning Officer I received from ballot box 152 an envelope sealed with the following endorsements thereon, the answers being to questions (2) "Pte."....(3) "21st Alberta Reserve" (4) "Yes" and second part of question 4 "No". "Dated this 10th day of December 1917, (Sd.) W. C. Bryan, Lieut.-Deputy Presiding Officer."

Upon opening the envelope I found a ballot therein marked in compartment (2) "I vote for the Government" with a cross heavily marked in lead pencil.

I make this Affidavit on my soul conscientiously believing the statements herein to be true by virtue and under the provisions of Act of Parliament passed for this purpose A.D. 1835.

W. D. Spence.

Sworn before me in the city of Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, England, this sixth day of March, A.D. 1918.

(Sd.) W. T. R. Preston,
Commissioner for taking oaths,
&c., &c., &c.

That goes to prove, Mr. Speaker, that there was an effort made, and not only made, but carried into effect, that envelopes were taken and filled in and signed by a returning officer with the name of the elector left blank and the ballot placed inside the envelope marked "for the Government" for the purpose of finding the name of some elector that could be written in at the last moment, and the envelope placed in the ballot box. This is another irregularity, another fraud, in the conspiracy to defeat the will of the Canadian people in the elections.

Mr. Speaker, the next charge (No. 11) is:

That military electors were canvassed by superior officers in direct contravention of the King's regulations and orders, and were directed how they should mark their ballots.

I have here a statement—not an affidavit or declaration—made by a gentleman who has already given an affidavit, Mr. T. D. Macfarlane, one of the scrutineers for the Opposition in that election. It reads:

As your representative in the United Kingdom as scrutineer, I beg to report conditions as I found them through the northern part of England at hospitals where Canadian votes were taken, also at Canadian hospitals and other centres.

At the first southern General Hospital, Birmingham, in charge of Capt. J. M. Suttie, Deputy Presenting Officer for the Union Government, I found votes were taken in the various wards, envelopes filled and prepared for the voter in the presence of other voters and instructions given to the voter where to mark his cross, indicating the space opposite Union Government. This applies also to the 21st Southern General Hospital, the First Birmingham War Hospital and the 2nd Birmingham War Hospital under the direction of Lieut. C. E. Haywood, presiding officer.

I next visited the Canadian Discharge Depot, Buxton, presiding officers—Lieut-Colonel A. R. Hanson, Capt. A. Maclean, Lieut. F. W. Lock, Capt. A. D. Gordon, Lieut. C. E. Field.

Mr. BUTTS: Perhaps my hon. friend would allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. COPP: Go ahead.

Mr. BUTTS: What percentage of the votes of the soldiers in the trenches did you get in Westmorland?

Mr. COPP: Mr. Speaker, I may say to my hon. friend that if he will consult the returning officer's return, which was brought down, and of which I think he has a copy, he will find exactly the number I received from the soldiers in France.

Mr. BUTTS: I have it here.

Mr. COPP (reading):

I interviewed a number of the soldiers at the depot and from all I learned that a general canvass had been made with a view of arranging voting and the placing of districts in which votes would be applied; among the number canvassed was a young man of 19 who gave me his name as Malcolm, of Vancouver, who joined the Artillery at Victoria, B.C. He mistook me for a representative of the Union Government and gave me the following information: That all of them were supporting the Union Government, and that a large number of them had arranged that their votes would be applied in whatever constituency they were required at the last moment and said they were to be applied in Quebec, but the district would not be selected until they knew where these votes were needed in order to defeat an Opposition candidate.

I also interviewed a soldier in the Canadian army who said that when in Canada he lived at Oxbow and Alameda, Saskatchewan, but left there in 1906 and lived in America until he joined the Army and that he was requested to name Wentworth as the district in which his vote would be recorded.

At the Crescent Hotel, Buxton, where I was stopping, the proprietor and a guest were discussing the Canadian Election Act. I was brought into the conversation by a reference from the guest who inquired of me if elections were conducted in Canada on the same lines as they were carried on here. These men stated that the arrangement enabled the soldier from any part of Canada to register his vote where desired by the Presiding Officer, when I replied that the voter was only entitled to a vote for the candidate in the district in which he had lived. In answer to this guest informed me that he had discussed the matter with officers in charge of the voting; this was verified by the proprietor of the hotel in which they said that officers of the Canadian army informed them that by this method they were going to defeat any candidate they chose, and the whole subject appeared to be a huge joke to the officers discussing it. It appeared to be common knowledge of residents who came in contact with officers or other members of the Canadian army.

I also visited the two Canadian hospitals at Buxton and in conversation with voters I learned that the general arrangements of conducting the vote for the Union Government were so pronounced that those desiring to vote otherwise could not do so fearing detection and disapproval of the Staff generally. At most of the Canadian hospitals and other places conducted by the Canadian officials there was an absence of the necessary list of candidates posted; but in nearly every case there was the usual literature for campaign purposes posted on the gates and on the building—one of these posters stating that "Germany was praying for the defeat of the Union Government—Vote for the Union Government and furnish recruits to relieve our men at the front".

I visited two British hospitals in Manchester where Canadian soldiers voted. A similar condition to the Birmingham hospital was carried on there.

I also visited a number of Canadian Lumber Camps in Inverness district, including 107, 110, and 121. The polling had taken place in all these camps before I reached there, but in conversation with various soldiers a general impression in almost every case was the necessity of supporting the Government by which they were employed.

From the Canadian Camps I went to Aberdeen and there visited the Old Mill Hospital which only contained a very small number of Canadians. One Canadian, by the name of Emery, stated that there was no choice of candidates as the Deputy Presiding Officer informed him in which space to make his cross—opposite the Union Government. I also visited the 1st Scottish General Hospital, Aberdeen, and found pretty much the same conditions.

I then visited the 1st Scottish General Hospital in Edinburg. Polling had been completed and the information regarding the conduct of the voting was on the same lines as the other hospitals. This also applies to the 3rd and 4th Scottish General Hospitals of Glasgow.

At Buxton, hereinbefore mentioned, I was credibly informed by soldiers and civilians that on the Sunday prior to the voting at Buxton that the Chaplain connected with the Canadians stated during the service that some people might say that he had no right to advise them how to vote, but for such people he "didn't care a damn", that he was doing his duty in advising every soldier to vote in support of the Union Government.

Throughout the entire district covered by me in the north of England and Scotland as well as districts nearer London, I found a prevailing existence of coercion and a feeling of fear of detection of being discovered in supporting the Opposition and in many cases was told by Liberals that they must not be seen in my company as it would be serious for them if detected as they knew the feeling of the officers whom they were under in regard to those who were not supporting the Union Government.

If a Court of Inquiry is held sworn testimony can be furnished to corroborate all the statements made herein.

Yours sincerely,

T. D. Macfarlane.

That is the statement in regard to charge No. 11. Charge No. 12 was:

That military electors in non-combatant regiments were threatened with transfer to fighting line regiments if they did not mark their ballots for the Government in the presence of and in the manner prescribed by the Deputy Presiding Officer.

I have on that, Mr. Speaker, two affidavits, which I desire to place before the House to prove to what lengths the presiding officers and those in charge of the taking of the soldier's vote in England would go for the purpose of carrying their point. The first affidavit is as follows:

I, the undersigned, No. 2245479 Pte. Darcy D., make the following statement:—

While a private with the 403rd Forestry Battalion, at Sunningdale the Adjutant of the same Battalion called me in his Office and told me: "Darcy, you are going to vote and in this Battalion the vote is an open vote.

Now I want you to vote for the Government or else, you will have to go from here." I answered "I will vote for Laurier for in the past I always voted for Laurier and every member of my family and more than that I am against conscription." The Adjutant told me: "I am giving you an order to vote for the Government and hurry up vote here (pointing the reserve space No. 2 in the ballot): If you refuse to vote here as indicated, you will be transferred to an English infantry battalion, and more than that you can be punished." So I had to vote for the Government against my will.

After having read the said statement and knowing that the above declaration has the same effect as one taken under oath, I have signed.

(Signed) Dona Darcy,

Witness,
E. B. Bastien.

198th Canadian Infantry Battalion.

[Mr. Copp.]

Here is another affidavit in proof of the same statement:

I, the undersigned, No. 2245525, Pte. Audy, make the following statement:

While a private with the 43rd Forestry Battalion at Sunningdale the Adjutant of the same battalion called me in his office and said to me "Audy, are you going to vote for the Germans or for the Government?" To that question, I answered, "Sir, I am going to vote for Laurier." The said Adjutant then said: "If you do vote for Laurier, you will immediately be transferred to an English infantry battalion; you know that you are afraid of an infantry battalion by the fact that you cannot drill." I answered: "Sir, you can send me anywhere you like, but I am going to vote for Laurier just the same . . . you can put me in the clink if you care to do so, but you cannot change my vote and I am going to vote for Laurier." Then the adjutant sent me back to my hut. After a few minutes, Sergeant Lalende came to see me and addressed me in this way: "Audy, do not make a fool of yourself; vote for the Government, and everything will be all right and you will stay with us." I answered "You can do and they can do what they like, but I am going to vote for Laurier." Sergeant Lalende then took me to the adjutant's office and this last gentleman told me: "You know that there is nothing like a secret vote here. The vote is an open one and you are going to vote here (pointing out the reserve space marked No. 2 on the ballot). The adjutant giving me an order, I was forced to vote and I did vote for the Government. After that, the said adjutant told me, "Now, Audy, get ready, for you are already transferred to the 156th Battalion, where I am now." The same intimidation was given to many soldiers for getting their votes for the Government and some of them were transferred to some infantry battalion.

After explanation made to me of the said declaration and knowing that the said declaration has the same effect as one taken under oath, I have signed.

(Signed) Joseph Audy,

Witness,
E. B. Bastien.

156th Canadian Infantry Battalion.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have shouted themselves hoarse in eloquent speeches on behalf of the young men who have gone to the front to fight the battles of the Empire and to save Canada from the Hun; yet, according to this evidence which I have submitted, their agents have taken these soldiers by the throat and forced them to vote according to the will or caprice of an officer overseas, notwithstanding the fact that the soldiers in question wanted to vote for Laurier.

This charge is that military electors who at first refused to vote as they were requested, but afterwards did so under compulsion, were, nevertheless, removed to infantry regiments proceeding to the fighting line. That charge is substantiated in the two affidavits which I have just read. In these cases officers forced certain soldiers to vote in favour of the Government, intimating that if they did not do so they would be transferred to fighting battalions. Then, when these soldiers under coercion did vote for the Government, the officers did not keep faith with them, but transferred them to fighting battalions. How is it that the Deputy Presiding Officer can thus transfer these men to fighting battalions and send them into the front line trenches, unless he is in league with the Canadian Headquarters Staff in London.

The next charge is No. 14: that military electors were not afforded facilities for the proper observance of the secrecy of the ballot, as provided by section 9, subsection (e) of the Military Voters' Act, I wish to refer again to that part of the Military Voters' Act, because it was in the mind of members of this House when that Act was passed that the same secrecy should be observed in the taking of the soldiers' votes as should be observed in taking the votes of civilians in this country. The clause relating to secrecy is as follows:

> The ballot paper shall be marked in the presence of the Deputy Presiding Officer and deputy scrutineers present, or military electors acting in their stead, but in such manner as not to disclose to them or to any other person any marking thereon.

The law, therefore, distinctly provides that the ballot shall be marked by the elector himself in such a way that no one can see what mark is being made. In the declaration which I have read I think I have proved, Sir, that the spirit and letter of the law in that respect have not been carried out; that secrecy was absolutely thrown to the winds; that the soldiers were not permitted to give a secret vote as provided by the Act.

The next charge is No. 15: that scrutineers appointed in behalf of the Government were sworn in as scrutineers for the Opposition by deputy presiding officers in polling booths where extensive frauds were practised owing to the Opposition not having bona fide representatives therein. I have a statement to submit to the House with regard to that. The Act provides that the Opposition and the Government have the right to appoint deputy scrutineers and these scrutineers have the right to attend the different military polls held where the votes of the soldiers are being taken. Let us see how fairly this provision was carried out. I submit that this is but another link in the chain of conspiracy which was carried on to win the last election. I wish to read the following documents:

Dominion of Canada.

Military Voters' Act, 1917.

Appointment of Deputy Scrutineer.

By virtue of the powers vested in me by the Military Voters' Act, 1917, I hereby appoint No. 9421, Act.-Sgt. Burrows, A.R., as my deputy.

(Signed) A. T. Thompson, Lt.-Col.
Scrutineer.

Dominion of Canada.

Military Voters' Act, 1917.

Appointment of Deputy Scrutineer.

By virtue of the powers vested in me by the Military Voters' Act, 1917, I hereby appoint No. 2304031, Act.-Sgt. Dow, J. N., as my deputy.

(Signed) A. T. Thompson, Lt.-Col.
Scrutineer.

I want hon. gentlemen to remember the names of these men appointed as deputy scrutineers: one was Sergeant Dow, and the other was Sergeant Burrows. The following oath was taken by Deputy Scrutineer Dow:

Oath to be Taken by Deputy Scrutineer or Military Elector Representing Party.

I, the undersigned, J. N. Dow, a Deputy Scrutineer or Military Elector (as the case may be) under the Military Voters' Act, 1917, representing the Opposition Party, do swear that I will keep secret the votes cast by any of the voters at the polling stations at which I acted as such representative.

So help me God,

Sworn before me at Knockando this first day of December, 1917.

(Signed) George D. Blackadon,
Capt. O.C., 106 Coy.
Deputy Presiding Officer.

The same oath was taken by Sergeant A. B. Burrows:

I, the undersigned, A. R. Burrows, sergeant, deputy scrutineer or military elector (as the case may be) under the Military Voters' Act, 1917, representing the Government party, do swear that I will keep secret the votes cast by any of the voters at the polling stations at which I acted as such representative. So help me God.

Sworn before me at Knockando this First day of December, 1917.

(Sgd.) George D. Blackadon,
Capt. O.C. 106 Coy.
Deputy Presiding Officer.

The point to which I desire to draw the attention of the House is that Lieut.-Col. Thompson, who was a recognized scrutineer and representative of the Government in taking the overseas votes, appoints two men to act as scrutineers, one of whom is sworn in as representing the Government, and the other is sworn in as representing the Opposition, fraudulently to get over the Act which provides that the Government can have a scrutineer and that the Opposition can have a scrutineer. It is abundantly evident that that was a link in the conspiracy to ensure that the Opposition party had no legal authorized scrutineer or representative in the different polling booths where the soldiers' votes were being taken.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Did I catch the initials of Lieut.-Col. Thompson as "A.T."?

Mr. COPP: Yes.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Does the hon. member know who he is?

Mr COPP: I do.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Col. Andy Thompson?

Mr. COPP: I know him well.

Sir SAM HUGHES: A member of this House for years; a gentleman of high standing.

Mr. COPP: I am not discussing the high standing of the gentleman. I am not here to discuss or to debate, or to say an ill word of any individual; I am placing before the House the facts as I have them; and if Lieut.-Col. Thompson—I care not how high his record is, nor how long he sat in this House—took part in a conspiracy to defeat the will of the people of this country, he is not worthy of being sent to represent the Government in looking after the taking of the votes of the soldiers overseas. I have no doubt of the truth of the evidence which I have under my hand, and it is true, that Lieut.-Col. Thompson, under the Military Voters' Act, under which authority he was acting at that time, had no authority and no right to appoint scrutineers to represent the Liberal party. It was beneath the dignity of any honourable citizen, to thus appoint a representative to act on behalf of the Opposition party led by my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), particularly when Lieut.-Col. Thompson was overseas representing the Government party to which my right hon. friend was opposed.

The appointment of another deputy scrutineer reads:

By virtue of the powers vested in me by the Military Voters' Act, 1917, I hereby appoint Harry Stevens, corporal, as my deputy.
(sgd) A. T. Thompson, Lt.-Col. Scrutineer.

Let me see what the oath says:

Oath to be taken by deputy scrutineer or military elector representing party.

I, the undersigned, Harry Stevens, Corporal, a deputy scrutineer or military elector (as the case may be) under the Military Voters' Act, 1917, representing the Opposition party, do swear that I will keep secret the votes cast by any of the voters at the polling stations at which I acted as such representative.

Sworn before me at Buxton, Derbyshire, this 29th day of November, 1917.

(Sgd.) Philip Burnett,
Deputy Presiding Officer.

This is a soldier who was appointed by Lt.-Col. Thompson, who represented the Government . That was another case where Lt.-Col Thompson appointed a scrutineer who was afterwards sworn in as scutineer for the Opposition. I am not here to say what was Lt.-Col. Thompson's intention when in these appointments he appoints two scrutineers, one sworn in as representing the Opposition party and the other sworn in as representing the Government party. I am here to place that fact before the House, and I appeal to every hon. member here who wants to be straightforward and honest in winning an election: Would he feel that he was doing the right thing if he went into his opponent's constituency and appointed a scrutineer to act for his opponent and look after his interests during an election campaign or during the polling of the votes in that particular constituency on election day? That is not his prerogative; that is not his right, and I cannot come to any other conclusion than that any gentleman who takes such a course is abusing his right and privilege for the purpose of endeavouring to make it appear to the presiding officer that the Opposition party, as well as the Government party, was being represented when, as a matter of fact, only one party was being represented, and that was by men who were appointed and sworn in by and at the instigation and request of Lt.-Col. A. T. Thompson, who was representing the Government and not the Opposition.

I come next to charge No. 16:

That election campaign literature which was dishonest and untruthful was circulated among the military electors with the authority and by the direction of Lord Beaverbrook, and that the said Lord Beaverbrook was an active participant in the hereinbefore mentioned fraudulent practices.

We have already heard in this House during this session a statement by the leader of the Opposition, speaking on the Address, when he referred to the taking of the soldiers' votes and the literature connected therewith and exhibited to this House a photograph that had been taken of a polling booth on which were election posters directing the electors how they should cast their votes. As that phase of the case will be taken up by some other hon. members who will follow me, I shall not take up the time of the House in referring to it, as that would only mean repetition. I am not going to discuss that phase of the question any more than to say that the information I have and the literature I have seen convince me beyond a doubt that that statement is absolutely correct.

In reference to the next charge, No. 17:

That Lord Brooke, formerly Commander of the Canadian Forces, was also a participant in the said fraudulent practices.

I have not personal knowledge as to Lord Brooke's domicile before he went overseas during this war; I only have the information from friends. I understand that Lord Brooke was a resident of and domiciled in Calgary, Alberta; but I find from a record that Lord Brooke, a gentleman whom I do not know but who, from his name, I would judge is a man of some substance and standing—he received his title anyway before this matter came up in discussion yesterday—did not vote in the constituency in which I am informed he lived, but he voted in Provencher, in the province of Manitoba, a constituency in which he had no legal qualification to vote. I only give the House the information I have. I do not personally know what his domicile was; but if he was domiciled in Calgary before he went overseas, he had no right under the Military Voters' Act to select a constituency in the province of Manitoba wherein to cast his vote, and if he did so, that must have been for one purpose, namely, because he thought his vote in that particular constituency in the province of Manitoba would be of more benefit to the Government party than his vote in the city of Calgary.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What is the rank of Lord Brooke?

Mr. COPP: Brigadier-General Lord Brooke.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is right. He never lived in Calgary.

Mr. CURRIE: Lord Brooke is domiciled in Great Britain and he enlisted there. He is the son of the Earl of Warwick, and he has a perfect right under the law to vote in any riding, wherever he designates. I do not think my hon. friend should drag that gentleman's name into the discussion.

Mr. COPP: If my hon. friend will possess his soul in patience, he will have all the opportunity possible of replying to me. I am trying to put this on Hansard as carefully as I can, but I shall be pleased to give all the information I can to any hon. member.

Mr. CURRIE: There is a rule of the House that no hon. gentleman can rise in his place and impugn the soldiers.

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend has no right to interrupt me in my argument.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Westmorland has the floor and may not be interrupted to put a question to him, except with his permission. I do not know of any rule such as that to which the hon. member (Mr. Currie) has referred.

Mr. COPP: I have no desire to avoid answering any question, but I trust my hon. friend will not think me discourteous if I go on with my argument.

Sir SAM HUGHES: On what authority does my hon. friend say that Lord Brooke was located at Calgary?

Mr. COPP: I do not say anything of the kind. I said I had been told by a number of persons that Lord Brooke's domicile was in the city of Calgary, and I therefore contend that he had no right under the Military Voters' Act to cast his vote in the constituency of Provencher, in the province of Manitoba.

The next charge is as follows:

That letters mailed through the Canadian Army Branch of the British Post Office, addressed to military electors, in which was enclosed campaign literature on behalf of the Opposition, were opened, and the said literature was removed therefrom before the said letters were delivered to the military electors, to whom they were addressed, and the delivery of the said letters was also systematically delayed by the said post office authorities.

The evidence I have on that point is that envolopes containing letters and literature were mailed in the city of London to the soldiers who were in the different camps there and also in France. These letters were returned after the election, some of them marked "Unknown" and others marked in different ways. But strange to say, the envelopes had been opened and the literature extracted and then the envelope sealed up again. If the post office system in London is anything similar to the Canadian system, an odd letter might go astray, but surely it is not chance when such a large number of letters, all mailed to people of the same class, should be returned. But that is the information I have, and if it is true, it is but another link in the chain of conspiracy prevailing at the time the soldiers votes were being taken. I wrote a number of letters myself in the month of November last to military electors from my constituency, and while I did not get replies from all, I got replies from a large number of soldiers, and almost without exception they said that they had not received the letters until two or three, and in some cases ten, days after the election.

Mr. DAVIDSON: What date in November were the letters sent?

Mr. COPP: On the 7th.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I had a similar experience.

Mr. COPP: That does not in any way detract from the statement I have made. As I have pointed out, these letters containing literature were returned, and not only that, but in every case the envelopes had been opened and the literature extracted, so I do not see how it could be all chance work. It seems as if there was some prearranged plot by which the literature was to be extracted, and if that is so, I say it is a shame and a disgrace that the post office, which is the channel through which the people of this country communicate with their relatives overseas, should be made a part of a conspiracy to defeat the will of the Canadian people in an election.

Now I want to refer to charge No. 19:

That ballot boxes and bags contained a number of ballot envelopes tightly folded together in parcels or wads too large to have been inserted in the said bags or boxes through the proper aperture, and, in addition bearing dates showing that the votes had been polled not on the same day, but at intervals of time.

We know that the ballot box or bag was described in the Act, and that in the top of the ballot box there was an aperture through which the votes had to be placed. I have not had the privilege of seeing one of the bags that were used overseas, but I presume some similar aperture was provided, and I have affidavits here from a number of individuals which go to show that large numbers of envelopes containing ballots and when found in the bags were folded together, the parcel being of such a size that it was impossible for them to have been placed in the bag through the aperture. Let me read the affidavit of Lemuel E. Prowse:

In the matter of the elections for the House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada held in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, December 1st, 1917, under the provisions of the Military Voters' Act, A.D. 1917.

I, Lemuel E. Prowse, of the city of Charlottetown, in the province of Prince Edward Island, in the Dominion of Canada, Merchant and special returning officer under appointment by the Governor General in Council, make oath and say:

1. That on the 26th day of January I assisted with my poll clerk, P. J. Bernard, in opening ballot bag No. 182 commonly termed a ballot box, for the purpose of counting the said ballots in connection with the said election and believed, from the appearance of the contents of the said bag or box, that the parcels of envelopes and ballots had not been legally inserted in the said bag or box, and with the said P. J. Bernard signed a certificate in the following words: "We, the undersigned, agree that the unused ballots in this bag appeared in such large rolls that in our opinion they could not have been inserted into the bag by the small aperture."

The term by "the small aperture" means the aperture provided in the top of the bag under the provisions of the Act of Parliament governing this matter.

I make this affidavit on my soul conscientiously believing the statements herein to be true by virtue and under the provisions of Act of Parliament passed for this purpose A.D. 1835

L. E. Prowse.

W.T.R.P.

Commisioner for taking oath for use in the province of Ontario, Canada.

Another one, Mr. Speaker, is an affidavit made by William David Spence:

I, William David Spence, of the city of Calgary, in the province of Alberta, Canada, accountant and special returning officer in the matter herewith, make oath and say:

That in the matter of a ballot box or bag No. B 174 of which polling subdivision Major W. Graham Cunningham, 1st Canadian Cavalry Depot, East Sandling, and which said bag I assisted in opening on the 28th day of January, 1918, which had been formerly protested as having appeared to have been opened and which was subsequently ordered to be opened and the contents allocated to the proper constituencies by Lieut.-Col. Purney, I found that the contents of the said bag contained parcels of tightly folded ballot envelopes which could not possibly go through the aperture in the top of the bag provided under the provisions of the Military Voters' Act. One of these said parcels taken from the bag and tightly folded together was as follows:

Reginald H. Dessey, 52447, dated December 6th, 1917; Chas. Croft, 71794, dated December 6th, 1917; Arthur G. Weeks, 186798, dated December 11th, 1917; Arthur Fenn, 1431, dated December 5th, 1917.

There were four ballot envelopes tightly folded together and impossible to be inserted in the bag through the aperture provided for that purpose. Two of them were dated December 6, one December 11, and another December 5, three different dates and these ballots were all folded together. What story does that tell to the members of this House, what story does it tell to the people of this country, what story must it tell to the soldiers overseas whom we did our best to protect and whose votes were simply taken and put into the bag or box illegally? Will the Canadian people believe that the soldiers' vote was taken in accordance with the spirit and letter of the Military Service Act?

Another parcel folded in like manner contained the following envelopes:

Herbert Hunt, 460750, dated December 7th, 1917; Archie M. Penny, 420772, dated December 7th, 1917; Fred F. Fletcher, 115062, dated December 6th, 1917; Fred Jones, 172022, dated December 7th, 1917.

There is another bundle bearing two different dates, one the 6th and the other the 7th December.

Another parcel tightly folded together contained the following ballot envelopes:

John V. Bateman, 1001054; Alex. S. Deacons, 871023; David Home, 1249; James Cox, 875175; Wm. McMorran, 115480; Edward H. Birch, 210877; Jos. F. LeFontaine, 34360.

There were seven ballot envelopes tightly folded together in one parcel and impossible to be inserted in the bag in the proper and legal manner. Further:

That on the date aforesaid I further assisted in opening bag or box 51 of which Major Armand Smith, Witley Camp, was deputy presiding officer. That the said bag contained parcels of ballot envelopes folded together tightly and too large to be inserted in the aperture provided by law in the top of the said bag, that one of the said parcels contained the following ballot envelopes:

E. S. Clarke, 721721, dated December 14th; G. B. Cowper, 874413, dated December 7th; G. A. Nelson, 460585, dated December 12th; C. F. Thompson, 186257, dated December 12th; C. Moore, 71411, dated December 12th; G. T. Bell, 187753, dated December 14th; T. C. Perry, 874602, dated December 8th.

There were seven different envelopes tightly folded together and containing votes recorded on four different dates. It is for this House to decide what that story tells. Further on:

—and the said bag also contained the following tightly folded ballot envelopes:

G. N. Barnes, 871720, dated December 12th; G. T. Edgcumbe, 418279, dated December 8th; G. H. A. Lawford, 110307, dated December 12th; W. Daniels, 85161, dated December 12th; R. J. Welch, 748085, dated December 7th; D. Mort, 24866, dated December 12th; E. Beaulaen, 417231, dated December 12th; J. Durnais, 1021252, dated December 14th; P. T. T. Brant, 346801, dated December 14th.

Eight more envelopes tightly folded together bearing different dates and again too large to be inserted in the proper aperture according to the Military Voters' Act.

—and on the same date aforesaid I assisted in opening ballot box or bag No. B 68 of which polling subdivision Major W. L. Hutton, 8 Risbon Barracks, Shorncliffe, was the deputy presiding officer, and this said bag also contained parcels or packages of ballot envelopes folded tightly together but too large to be inserted in the aperture provided by law, among the said packages were the following:

T. F. Moulton, 1258169, dated December 8th; J. W. Wright, 3151, dated December 2nd; G. Wheeler, 135895, dated December 2nd, and also the following folded in one parcel:

W. R. Harvey, 859344, dated December 1st; Capt. A. B. Roberts, dated December 1st; Capt. E. Bartlett, dated December 1st; M. O. Lupsom, 1102429, dated December 2nd. and the said bag also contained the following ballot envelopes in one parcel tightly folded together:

C. Robertson, 526721, dated December 2nd; G. A. Penton, 469325, dated December 2nd; H. W. Whartman, 835139, dated December 2nd; A. G. Hoonan, 400128, dated December 2nd; E. R. Hicks, 528742, dated December 1st; and also the following in the same condition:

J. R. Jeffery, 439121, dated December 3rd; J. E. Taylor, 521180, dated December 2nd; and that I was also present in the opening of ballot box or bag No. 182 of which polling subdivision Major S. M. Fisher, No. 16 Canadian General Hospital, Orpington, was deputy presiding officer, and that unused ballots were taken out of the said bag perfectly flat and also ballot envelope rolled together in such large parcels that they could not possibly have been inserted in the aperture provided by law. One of these said parcels consisted of the following:

S. R. Cockerill, 316043, dated December 4th; William A. Taylor, 760690, dated December 4th; Baretna Adorft, 766746, dated December 5th; Thomas F. Shea, 722026, dated December 6th; and the said bag also contained another parcel which I casually observed tightly folded containing the following ballot envelopes:

H. L. Boston, 791184, dated December 1st; Gaius W. Horwood, 624881, dated December 1st; Walter White, 841957, dated December 4th; Sachimars Thoracka, 697031, dated December 4th.

All the dates given in the above statements were written and taken down in the order in which they appeared when the parcels were opened.

I make this affidavit conscientiously believing the statements herein to be true by virtue and under the provisions of Act of Parliament passed for this purpose A.D. 1835.

Another one is an affidavit by Arthur Hersey of the city of Montreal. He says:

I, ARTHUR H. HERSEY, of the city of Montreal, in the province of Quebec, in the Dominion of Canada, appointed by Governor General Order in Council, special returning officer in the matter herein, make oath and say:

That in my capacity as special returning officer I assisted in opening ballot box or bag No. B 294, of which polling subdivision Captain G. A. McNaughton, 122nd Company, Canadian Forestry Corps, was the deputy presiding officer. On the 29th day of January, 1918, when the said bag was opened I found that it contained parcels or packages of ballot envelopes folded tightly together but too large to have been inserted in the legal aperture in the top of the said bag, in one package tightly folded together were the following envelopes:

Charles Kersey, 2198414; Lucine Buschard, 1012696; Josiah Kenway, 2198420; Lieut. Charles F. Carnegie, John P. Fritz, 1013705; W. C. Paige, 2198432; Alfred Hardy, 297368; James Turley, 2198432; W. J. O'Connell, 2157373; Vincent J. Ramsay, 108145.

There were ten ballot envelopes all folded together and too large to go into the aperture as provided by the Act.

I make this affidavit conscientiously believing the statements herein to be true by virtue and under the provisions of Act of Parliament passed for this purpose A.D. 1835.

Commissioner for taking oaths for use in the Province of Ontario, Canada.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Would the hon. gentleman give me the name of the official before whom this affidavit was made?

Mr. COPP: W. T. R. Preston, commissioner for taking oaths for use in the province of Ontario.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Is the hon. gentleman aware that to take an affidavit such as he has read is a crime under a provision of the Criminal Code of Canada?

Mr. McKENZIE: It is a declaration; it is not an affidavit.

Mr. DAVIDSON: He referred to it as an affidavit.

Mr. COPP: I am not here to answer any cross-examination questions put by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davidson).

Mr. MURPHY: Grant an inquiry and we will have Mr. Preston before it too.

Mr. COPP: I am putting the facts concerning these charges before the House. If my hon. friend thinks it is a crime to do so, or if he thinks there is ground for bringing a criminal action against me, he is well aware of his rights in that regard.

Mr. DAVIDSON: The hon. gentleman misunderstands me. I do not accuse him of any crime. What I say is that he, as a lawyer, should know that any official that prepared and took affidavits such as he has read is committing a crime under the provisions of the Criminal Code.

Mr. COPP: If the hon. gentleman will look through the Criminal Code he will find that no crime is committed in making a declaration.

Here is another affidavit by Mr. Guillet:

In the matter of the Elections for the House of Commons for the Dominion of Canada holden in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, December 1st-17, 1917, under the provisions of the Military Voters' Act, A. D., 1917.

I, Louis Eugene Guillet, Captain in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces and Deputy Returning Officer herein, make oath and say:

That on the 25th day of January, 1918, in my official capacity I assisted in the opening of bag or ballot box No. B. 300, in the presence of Major Sweet, an appointee as poll clerk of the Unionist Government, of which Poll Captain J. E. Cameron, 112th Co., Canadian Forestry Corps, was the Deputy Presiding Officer. Several packages of ballot envelopes folded tightly together were taken out when the bag was opened, and I made efforts to insert some of the said packages or parcels of envelopes in the legal aperture for the insertion of the said ballot envelopes and it was impossible to insert them. It was agreed between Major Sweet and myself that the said parcels had not been inserted in the said bag through the before-mentioned aperture, and the bag was accordingly laid aside under the plea that it appeared to have been opened.

On the 26th of the said month of January I assisted in the examination of ballot box or bag No. 246, the neck of which was open sufficiently wide to allow Dr. Elliott, the Returning Officer for the Union Government, to put his arm in and extract the contents therefrom, and I accordingly agreed with the protest of the Opposition scrutineer that the bag in this respect gave evidence of having been opened, and Dr. Elliott also agreed on the facts as to the state of the bag, and it was accordingly reserved for future consideration.

I make this affidavit on my soul conscientiously believing the statements herein to be true by virtue and under the provisions of Act of Parliament passed for this purpose A. D. 1835.

Sworn before me in the city of Westminster, in the County of Middlesex, England, this 6th day of March, A.D., 1918.

(Sgd.) L. E. Guillet.

(Sgd.) W. T. R. Preston.

Commissioner for taking Oaths for use in the Province of Ontario, Canada.

That evidence goes to prove, Mr. Speaker, that the ballot bag was open to such an extent that Mr. Elliott, the Union Government representative, was able to put in his arm and extract ballots therefrom. If that is true, hon. gentlemen will see how easy it would be, and it is a natural conclusion to come to, that the bag was in such a condition that after it had been closed it was a comparatively easy matter for any one to fold up envelopes and insert them.

I now wish to read another affidavit going to prove these statements, and it is that of A. A. Dickson:

In the matter of the Elections for the House of Commons for the Dominion of Canada holden in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, December 1st-17, 1917, under the provisions of the Military Voters' Act, A.D., 1917.

I, Archibald Anderson Dickson, of Harrow, in the County of Middlesex, Special Poll Clerk in this Matter, solemnly and sincerely declare as follows:

That I was present at Westminster at the opening of bag or ballot box No. B. 99 on the 16th of January, A.D., 1918, of which Polling Subdivision Lt.-Col. M. E. B. Cutcliffe, 125th Canadian Infantry Battalion, Witley, was acting as deputy presiding officer. That package of ballot envelopes were taken from this bag or box in too large numbers to be inserted through the aperture provided by law, and that one of these packages closely folded together contained the following ballot envelopes duly endorsed as hereunder:

P. Pesine, 7, voting East Toronto; C. J. Furler, 197,569, voting Simcoe Centre; A. E. Allen 643206, voting North Essex; W. Wood, 772481 voting Brantford; J. Spencer, 772966, voting Brantford; B. Scott, 237683, voting E. Toronto; J. H. Walsworth, 270622, voting Brantford; H. Donaldson, 772896, voting Brantford; E. H. Force, 772683, voting Brantford; J. Borthwick 770009. voting Brantford.

Here is a list of ten voters, whose envelopes being together, it would have been impossible for them to be legally inserted in the ballot bag, and several of those then were voting in the same constituency.

That I was present at the opening of ballot boxes in this matter on the 17th of January A.D 1918, when ballot box 163 was opened of which Capt. H. J. Dennis, 25th Reserve Battalion Bramshott, was deputy presiding Officer, and parcels of ballot envelopes were taken from the said box or bag folded together in numbers which could not be inserted through the aperture provided by law, and that one of these said parcels contained ten ballot envelopes rolled together, the endorsation thereon being dated respectively December 3rd, 4th, 5th and 6th, 1917. and another parcel of ballot envelopes consisted as follows, each duly endorsed as herein stated.

Alfred C. D. McGregor, 654304, dated December 7th; Martin B. Roy, 654209, dated December 4th; Samuel Mayourok, 417068, dated December 17th; Robert Smith, 177597, dated December 5th. And that all the dates given in the before-mentioned parcels of ballot envelopes are stated herein in the rotation in which they appeared in the said parcels.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true and by virtue of the provisions of the Statutory Declaration Act, A.D. 1835.

(Signed) A. A. Dickson,

Declared at Westminster in the County of Middlesex this 8th day of March, A.D., 1918, before me.

(Signed) W. T. R. Preston,
A Commissioner for Oaths for use in the Courts of the Province of Ontario.

That is the evidence, Mr. Speaker, that I have to give to the House in regard to that matter.

Now then, as to paragraph 20:

That the contents of these ballot boxes and bags which thus appeared to have been fraudulently tampered with were, contrary to the provisions of the Election Act, counted and allocated in the United Kingdom to the number of 15,000 votes under instructions from the Assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

In support of this charge I have a memorandum signed by W. E. Elliott, deputy presiding officer, and W. B. Spence. Mr. Elliott, I understand, was the representative of the Union Government, while Mr. Spence represented the Opposition. This memorandum contains an agreement at which they arrived as to the condition of the bags and boxes, which was left to Lieutenant-Colonel Purney for his decision That is to say both agreed as to certain facts and the matter was referred to Lieutenant-Colonel Purney for his decision as to what should be done.

Memorandum for Lieut.-Colonel Purney.

A difference of opinion exists between certain officials appointed to count the Military Vote, respecting certain bags of envelopes containing ballots.

The following facts are agreed upon, respecting bags:—

Bags No. 218, 417, 352, 106, 201, 420, opened Wednesday, January 9th, or Thursday, the 10th. Rolls of ballots containing two's, three's, four's or more, were found closely rolled together, too large to have been inserted through the opening on the top of the bag.

These bags were locked before opened by the officers, but whether or not there was any space within the chained opening through which papers might have been inserted, we are not prepared to state. There was not anything in the external appearance of any of the bags to lead us to believe that they had been opened.

Bag No. 153 was opened on Friday, January 11th. Bag was locked before opened by the election officers. Rolls were taken from it which were too large to have gone through the aperture on the top. These rolls consisted of ballots closely rolled together, of different dates, one roll of ballots was dated December 7th and 10th, and another roll of six ballots had at least four different dates. We are not positive as to how tightly the opening of the bag was secured by the lock and chain.

Bag No. 155 opened on Monday morning, January 14th. Lock and chain examined before opened and found not tightly closed, and opening could be made size of two fingers. Rolls of ballots taken therefrom in three's, four's, and sixes. These rolls could not have been inserted through the aperture on the top of the bag.

Bag No. 102, opened Monday morning, January 14th, Colonel Purney being present. Lock and chain were examined carefully before opened and found tight and closely locked, and a few ballots were taken therefrom. Rolls were found closely folded together, three, four, and more together in rolls, which could not have gone through the aperture on the top of the bag.

It is contended on the one hand that the opening which might be made in the neck of the bags through the chain being loosely locked, would allow the folded envelopes to be placed within the bag through such an opening, and on this account the suggestion that the boxes have been opened for an improper purpose, is not justified.

On the other hand, it is contended that as the envelopes which were folded together could not be inserted in the bags through the small flap covered aperture, the conclusion is justified that the said boxes come under the clause of the Act which declares that the contents of certain boxes shall not be examined, and that therefore the ballots therein shall not be counted.

Signed on behalf of Special Returning Officers.

W. Elliott,
W. D. Spence,

January 16th, 1918.

Mr. Elliott represented the Government, and Mr. Spence represented the Opposition. The Special Returning Officers and clerks at London were obliged to proceed with the allocation, counting, etc., of these votes on the order of W. P. Purney, in spite of the fact that there was an agreement by the representative of the Government and the representative of the Opposition that these parcels of envelopes that were folded together and bearing different dates were in such numbers that it would be impossible for them to be inserted in the bag in the proper legal way through the aperture in the top of the bag or box. Lieut.-Col. Purney makes a decision as follows:

I decide that you are obliged to proceed with the allocation, counting, etc., of the contents of all the Ballot Bags mentioned in the foregoing statement of facts.

W. P. Purney,
Asst. Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, for Canada.

Dated at London, January 16, 1918.

Afterwards, the 15,000 votes thus cast were counted and allocated, which had been taken from the bags which the representatives of the two political parties were agreed had not been placed in the bags in the proper legal manner through the proper aperture. They must have been inserted in some illegal and improper way, because that was the agreement signed by both representatives, yet the special returning officers were forced to count and allocate these votes to the amount of upwards of 15,000 upon the order of Lieut.-Col. Purney, who gave his instructions in that regard. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a statement which shows how the votes were allocated. Out of those 15,175 illegal votes 70 went to Prince Edward Island; 1,634 went to Nova Scotia; 688 to New Brunswick; 1,092 to Quebec; 7,043 to Ontario; 1,316 to Manitoba; 910 to Saskatchewan; 1,044 to Alberta; 1,364 to British Columbia. And fourteen, Mr. Speaker, which I claim to be illegal votes, were counted yesterday to bring my hon. friend from the constituency of the Yukon into this House.

I also desire to read a list of protested bags of a few in the province of Manitoba, with the names of the returning officers:

[Mr. Copp.]

In addition to the foregoing Protested Bags, a special affidavit, in duplicate, was made by A. A. Dickson with reference to bags No. 99 and 163, identified on Mr. W. T. R. Preston's Memorandum Book by the initials A.A.D. These bags contained bundles of ballot envelopes tightly folded together numbering as many as ten, several of them being of different dates. The bundles were so large that the hand holes only would allow them to be put into the bags.

This goes to prove, Mr. Speaker, the statement I have made in regard to the illegal and improper allocation of these votes. Several thousand ballot envelopes fraudulently endorsed went into the bags. I have in my hand a list that I shall not attempt to read, but to which I wish to refer briefly. Here are a number of constituencies, and I start with the constituency of Kent, New Brunswick. Thirty-three votes were allocated and transferred to the county of Kent, N.B., and from the actual residence, which I have under the signature of the men themselves, not one in the whole list of the 33 voters ever had a domicile in the province of New Brunswick. Coming from that province as I do, I am almost prepared to pledge my word that not one of the men ever put a foot in the county of Kent, yet 33 of these gentlemen selected the county of Kent in which to apply their ballots. Why? Were they free agents? They go to the province of New Brunswick to select a constituency when they do not know the candidates or the county. Probably if the truth were known they did not know that there was a county of Kent in the province of New Brunswick until they were told by some man in authority where they should cast their vote, and what constituency they should elect to transfer that vote.

Going a little further, I find that 145 electors transferred their votes and selected Prince Edward county, Ontario, as the place where they should vote. And not one of them gives his residence in the county of Prince Edward. Why were these votes allocated there? Is it possible that 145 honest military electors who wanted to cast their vote for or against a certain candidate would select the county of Prince Edward, Ontario? I do not go quite so far as to say in regard to these men, what I did in regard to the county of Kent, N.B., that they had never heard of the county of Prince Edward. But they never had a domicile there, according to their own statement. Yet that vote was transferred to the county of Prince Edward. I will read a few names of the men who voted in the county of Prince Edward: Henry R. Honeybone, Regina; W. Mercer, Toronto; Edgar T. Girling, Calgary; F. H. Wills, Star City, Sask.; Paul Greenwood, Edmonton; Joseph E. Page, Blind River, Ont.; Eugene Dubois, Montreal; W. V. Hepburn, Winnipeg; George Vagos, Halifax; Percy Lowe, Nova Scotia; H. M. Labowski, Manitoba; C. E. Woodbridge, Salmon River, B.C.; William B. Cass, United States subject. Then follow men from Toronto, Nova Scotia, Montreal, another American subject, Toronto, Indian Head, Ottawa, Calgary, Peterborough, Saskatoon, St. Johns, P.Q., Fort Frances, Ont., London, Ont., Edmonton, Greece, Windsor, Laprairie, Port Arthur, Winnipeg Restigouche, N.B., and so on.

That is a list, Mr. Speaker, taken at random, of these men whose domicile is not in the county of Prince Edward. Yet 145 of them, for some unaccountable reason or other, transferred their votes to the county of Prince Edward. Would it not naturally arouse suspicion in the mind of an innocent man that there was some particular reason why these votes should go to Prince Edward county, and that the reason was that the constituency might be considered to be in doubt, and might well need a few extra votes to make sure of the election?

Mr. TWEEDIE: Would the honourable member mind handing me the names of the Calgary men?

Mr. COPP: I read them at random. I will give my hon. friend a number of them.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. gentleman could not give them all; it would take too long. There are thirteen thousand of them.

Mr. COPP: The only ones from Calgary that I observe by glancing hurriedly over the list are Edgar T. Girling and William Deane.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Is the hon. member aware that on the civilian vote in Prince Edward County the Government candidate had a majority of over one thousand?

Mr. COPP: Whether I was aware of that or not, the presiding officer in England was not aware, when the vote was taken, what the majority would be. It was very nice to have all these votes on hand in order that they might be slipped in in case of emergency.

Take the county of North Huron. They gave this constituency eighteen votes. Among the places of residence of the soldiers voting there I find the following: Lambton East, Waterloo South, Seaforth, Clinton, Wingham, United States, Port Elgin, Goderich, Trenton, Stellarton, Toronto. I may point out that I could give thousands of other cases of this kind; I have had opportunity of collecting information respecting only a few of these allocations.

Sixty-five of these votes were transferred to the constituency of South Huron. Some of the domiciles of the soldiers are given as follows: Nova Scotia, Moosejaw, Saskatoon, Battleford, Montreal, Goderich, North Huron, Auburn, Wingham, Trenton, Winnipeg, Vankleek Hill.

Ninety-six votes were transferred to the constituency of Kent, Ontario, and in not one case was the residence given as in that constituency. The following are some of the soldiers' domicils given: Toronto, Northern Ontario, Toronto, Saskatchewan, actor between Vancouver and Halifax—I suppose this gentleman thought he had better vote in Kent, Ontario—Toronto, Sorel, Montreal, Edmonton, Regina, London, Norfolk, United States, Oxbow, Saskatchewan, Pt. Leir, Quebec, New York, Albert, Victoria County, East York, Brockville. All these voters were domiciled outside the county of Kent.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Is the hon. gentleman aware that the Government endorsed no candidate in the county of Kent?

Mr. COPP: The Prime Minister endorsed no candidate in Westmorland either, but similar attempts were made to have votes transferred into that county. The Prime Minister, either because he did not appreciate the qualities of the candidate chosen by the Conservative party in the county of Westmorland, or because of some other reason with which we are not acquainted, did not endorse the candidature of his friend in that county. In any case, the presiding officer who directed the soldiers in this case to transfer their votes to the constituency of Westmorland, did not know that the Prime Minister had not endorsed a candidate in that electoral district.

I know of twenty-four votes that were transferred to Westmorland county. Evidently the powers that be were kind to me, although they might have put in five times twenty-four without materially affecting the result. And where did those twenty-four come from? The county of Westmorland is hardly known in many portions of the world; yet an American citizen voted there. I find on the list another American citizen, and still another. A gentleman from Prince Edward Island came over and voted in my constituency. Others were from the following places: Guysboro, Saskatchewan, Montreal, United States, Chatham, Australian citizen, and so on. Is it not peculiar that twenty-four gentlemen who probably never heard of the county of Westmorland, or of your humble servant, or of his opponent, whom the Prime Minister did not see fit to endorse, should record their votes in this constituency?

I suppose the county of Northumberland is more famous than the county of Westmorland, because I know of sixty-three electors who transferred their votes to Northumberland. The following are some of the domiciles: United States, Butte, Montana; South End, Ontario; 73 Annette street, Toronto; 1166 South street, Regina; 779 Dufferin Road, Toronto; Valcartier; Ville St. Pierre, Quebec; Hamilton; Brandon; Camp Hughes, Manitoba; Valcartier; Saskatoon; Estevan, Manitoba; Moosejaw, Belleville; Waterville, Quebec; Lloydminster, Saskatchewan; Amherstburg, Ontario; Russian, Sussex; Edmonton; Battleford; Magog, Quebec; Winnipeg; Broad avenue, Toronto; Saskatoon; Dauphin, Manitoba; North Bay, Ontario; Calgary; Russian, Valcartier; Winnipeg; N.B.; Portage la Prairie; Qu'Appelle; Scotch Town; High Banks; Macleod, Alberta; Saskatoon; Yorktown, Saskatchewan. These gentlemen, realizing the ability of the candidate of the Government in that locality, I suppose, decided that they would like to record their vote in the county of Northumberland, N.B.

Now we come to the constituency of North Cape Breton and Victoria, represented by my friend in front of me (Mr. McKenzie). I know of seventy-one military electors who allotted their votes in that constituency, but not one of them stated that their domicile was in that part of the country. I quote a few of the residences as given: Lake Loon, St. John, United States, Brampton, Ontario; United States; Halifax; Bridgetown; Lockeport; Saskatchewan; Saskatoon; London, Ontario; Vancouver; Moosejaw; Arcola, Saskatchewan; Moosejaw; Wainwright; United States; Valcartier; Cornwall, Ontario; Glace Bay; Colchester county; Halifax; Dauphin, Manitoba; Pictou, N.S.; Halifax; Colchester; United States.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Who gave my hon. friend this list?

Mr. COPP: If I had time I could read hundreds of lists which I have under my hand. The names have been given by the electors over their own signatures giving details as to their residences, etc. I only refrain from doing that, because I do not want to take up too much of the time of the House; but if my hon. friend asks for the information, I can tell him that I have here information that would keep me speaking until 12 o'clock to-night, and I can give the statements and affidavits to prove every statement I have made.

Mr. BUTTS: Will my hon. friend allow me to ask a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

An hon. MEMBER: Let him ask it?

Mr. BUTTS: I wonder if my hon. friend knows how long he has been inflicting this punishment upon the House?

Mr. COPP: I can say to my hon. friend I do not know, and I do not care. I stand upon my rights in this House, and I purpose taking what time I deem necessary to put my case before this House. My hon. friends, by asking questions, are only extending the time. I have the information here, and all I ask of the Government is to grant an inquiry, and I shall provide the evidence satisfactory to my hon. friend in regard to every case and every statement I make.

We now come to the county of Leeds in the province of Ontario. Leeds is better known by the soldiers overseas than some of the other counties, because I have found 138 of the military electors overseas cast their votes in the constituency of Leeds. Not one of them gives his residence or his domicile as being in that county. The following are some of the domiciles: Sydney Mines, N.S.; Guelph, Fergus, Ontario; Edmonton, Alberta; Victoria, B.C.; Valcartier, Toronto, Montreal, Sussex, N.B.; Vancouver, Kelowna, B.C.; Kamloops, B.C.; Maniwaki, Quebec; Bull River, B.C.; Prince Rupert, B.C.; Montreal, (a Russian); Halifax, N.S.; St. John, N.B.; Glace Bay, N.S.; Sussex, N.B.; Winnipeg (a Russian); Moncton, N.B.; a stray one from my constituency, Edmonton, Alberta; Amherst, N.S.; Charlottetown, P.E.I. I am picking out only a few of the hundreds of names which I have here of men whose votes were transferred to constituencies in which they had no domicile, in which they never resided, but who selected those constituencies for only one purpose. One can come to only one conclusion, that that was for the purpose, as I have said several times already, to offset a possible adverse vote in those different constituencies to which those votes were transferred.

In South Bruce 48 voted on the same ground, without one giving his residence as in South Bruce. Some of their domiciles are as follows: Toronto, Montreal, Tisdale, Manitoba; Toronto, Weston, and so on.

In North Bruce we find 46 votes transferred in the same manner. Some of the domiciles of the men voting in North Bruce are as follows: Battleford, Sask.; Vernon, B.C.; Montreal, a United States citizen from Saskatoon, Wright, Quebec.

Mr. BURRELL: Is the hon. member reading a list of military voters who gave their place of residence, and in No. 9 indicated where they wanted to vote?

Mr. COPP: I am reading from a list of the names of military voters whose residences I have obtained from the official nominal roll of the Militia Department. In this manner I found out where their proper residences were. I have the statement of where their votes were cast, and I am telling the House that if they voted in North Bruce, their proper residences and domiciles were in other constituencies altogether, and they should have voted in them.

Mr. BUTTS: Might I ask the hon. member another question?

Mr. COPP: I do not want to be discourteous to my hon. friend, but I think he is only detaining me.

Mr. BUTTS: The only thing, Mr. Speaker, is—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member (Mr. Butts) can ask a question only with the permission of the hon. member who has the floor. I understand the hon. member who has the floor has refused that permission.

Mr. BUTTS: Well, I would ask the hon. member if he would give me the permission.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BUTTS: He will not allow me to ask a question?

Mr. COPP: I do not like to have it put in that way, that I will not allow the hon. member to ask a question. I do not want to be discourteous to the hon. member, or to any other hon. member, but I do not think this will get us further along. My hon. friend can put his question after I have finished my argument. He simply wants to interrupt me, and that is all.

Mr. BUTTS: I am not seeking to interrupt; I am asking for information.

Mr. COPP: Will my hon. friend kindly wait and ask me his question when I have finished my remarks?

Mr. McMASTER: He will have forgotten it by that time.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. This discussion between hon. members concerning their rights to ask a question of each other is absolutely out of order, and I would ask the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp) to continue his speech.

Mr. BUTTS: I bow to your ruling.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Keep on bowing.

Mr. COPP: If my hon. friend (Mr. Butts) will keep his question in cold storage for a while he will have an opportunity of asking it. I want to refer to one or two other matters. In regard to the votes transferred in East Edmonton, the number that I have been able to look up is so small it is not worth while taking up the time of the House to go into that matter. There were 69 votes transferred to Cape Breton South, and some of the domiciles are as follows: Medicine Hat, Alberta; London, Ontario; Lethbridge, Alberta; Tignish, Cape Breton; Aldershott, N.S.; Vancouver, B.C.; Mawata, Sask.; Lethbridge, Alberta; Saskatoon; Winnipeg; Calgary; Vancouver; Toronto; Colchester; Ingersoll, Ontario, and so on.

In the same way I know of 129 votes transferred to the constituency of Ottawa in the province of Ontario. The voters came from all parts of the world, so far as I can see. Some of their domiciles are: Montreal; Toronto; Renfrew, with kin in Newfoundland; Victoria, B.C.; Valcartier; St. John, N.B.; Billings Bridge, Ontario; Calgary, Alberta; Montreal, Quebec; a United States citizen from Windsor; Vernon, B.C.; Calgary; Glace Bay, N.S.; Annapolis, N.S.; Saskatoon; Halifax.

There were fifteen votes transferred to the constituency of South Renfrew in the province of Ontario. Some of the domiciles are: Montreal; Valcartier; Smiths Falls; Ottawa; Toronto; Renfrew, and so on.

I have found 32 votes transferred to the constituency of Digby and Annapolis in the province of Nova Scotia. Some of the domiciles are: St. John, N.B.; a United States citizen from St. John, N.B.; Kingston, N.B.; another United States citizen from St. John, N.B. Hence you find a Union candidate in one constituency taking a vote from another Union candidate in another constituency.

58 votes were transferred to the county of Wright in the province of Quebec. Some of the domiciles are: Toronto; Montreal; Winnipeg; Delson Junction, Quebec; Montreal; Little Current, Sask.; Prince Albert, Sask.; Montreal; Sussex, N.B.; Calgary, Alberta; Little Harbour; Shelburne county, N.S.; Valcartier; United States Navy, Cote St. Paul; Burlington, Kings county, N.S.; Yarmouth, N.S.; 603 Gerard street, East, Toronto; Portage la Prairie, Manitoba, Indian Head, Sask.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Will the hon. gentleman give me the names of those who voted in Digby and Annapolis?

Mr. COPP: I do not wish to read the list again, but I will show it to my hon. friend. Thirty-six votes were transferred to Westmount and St. Henri, the electors not being domiciled or resident in that constituency. The same is true of St. Ann's in the province of Quebec, where forty-one votes were transferred. I have only given a partial list of the electors whose votes were illegally transferred to constituencies in which they were not domiciled.

I now want to refer to charge No. 22:

That military electors were systematically persuaded to give answers for endorsation on their ballot envelopes setting forth residence in constituencies in which they did not reside and upon which declaration of domicile their qualification to vote was based.

The statements I have just read prove that charge. Lieut.-Colonel Glenn and some ten or fifteen others were persuaded to give answers for endorsation on their ballots envelopes setting forth residence and constituencies in which they did not reside and upon which declaration of domicile their qualification to vote was based. The domicile qualification under the Military Voters' Act was two-fold; it provided that if the elector had been resident in a certain locality for four months of the twelve months prior to voting he was properly domiciled. Not one of these ten or fifteen men who voted with Lieut.-Colonel Glenn, according to a statement signed by Col. Glenn, were domiciled in the county of Prince Edward, in the province of Ontario, and yet they were allowed to vote contrary to the whole spirit as well as the letter of the Military Voters' Act.

I said a moment ago that some hundred votes had been transferred to the county of Northumberland in the province of New Brunswick. Since I made that statement I have had placed in my hand a list, which I am convinced is absolutely reliable, showing that 350 votes were illegally transferred to the county of Northumberland. These voters had no qualification whatever to vote in that county, and yet their votes were transferred, and for what purpose? Was it because they appreciated the ability of the hon. gentleman who so ably represents that constituency in this House? No, it was not for that reason. It must have been because those who had charge of the campaign down there realized that the Union Government policy was not very much favoured in that constituency, and so these 350 votes were transferred from the noble, patriotic and high-minded motive of supporting the hon. member who now represents that constituency in this House.

The next charge is No. 23:

That fraudulent votes were recorded for the electoral district of Cumberland, N.S., by Captain H. M. Burke, deputy presiding officer at Ashford, County of Kent, England, in which voters declared their residence to be Springhill, Tignish, Joggins Mines, Shulie and Nappan, Pugwash, Oxford and Amherst, whose domicile was, in fact, in some one of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, Ontario and Quebec.

That charge can be substantiated by a list I have here, but as a list of these votes will be given to the House in another way I shall not take up the time of the House by reading the list I have.

The next charge is No. 24:

That similar conditions to these referred to in the preceding paragraph prevailed in the polling booth presided over by Lieut.-Col. C. M. R. Graham, of the 156th Battalion, Witley, in which military electors whose domicile was in other parts of Ontario and Manitoba together with a number of subjects of the United States were induced to falsely declare their residence to be in Brockville, in the electoral district of Leeds.

I have here a list of people who were induced falsely to declare their residence to be in Brockville, in the constituency of Leeds, and who voted there. I will give the names of the residences of these people: Merrickville, Ont.; Messina Springs, U.S.A.;

Renfrew, Ont.; Bury, Que.; Renfrew, Ont.; Lyndhurst; Renfrew, Ont.; Mille Roche, Ont.; Kemptville, Ont.; Spring Valley, Ont.; Renfrew, Ont.; Whitney, Renfrew county, Ont.; Renfrew, Ont.; Montreal, Que.; Frontenac, Ont.; Toronto, Ont.; Renfrew, Ont.; Winnipeg, Man.; South Lake; Acton (Halton county), Ont.; Merrickville, Ont.; Renfrew, Ont.; Toronto, Ont.; Weyburn, Sask., and then there were four four others who voted who were United States citizens. I have ascertained that not one of these electors had resided, or was domiciled, in the county of Leeds, yet they all voted there.

The next charge is No. 25:

That at the said polling booth in the presence of the said Lieut.-Col. C. M. R. Graham, deputy presiding officer, it was arranged that the votes of the military electors whose surnames commenced with the letters ranging from 'A' to 'H' should be polled in the electoral district of Grenville, and the said votes were so polled after the said electors had been induced to falsely declare their domicile to be in the town of Prescott in the electoral district of Grenville.

The affidavit I wish to read in that connection is as follows:

In the matter of the elections for the Dominion of Canada holden in Great Britain Dec. 1-17, 1917.

I, William Thomas Rochester Preston late of Norbury in the county of Surrey, England, make oath and say,

That I was present at the opening of ballot box No. 101 at the city of Westminster, London, January 21, 1918, which said ballot box contained the votes recorded by Lieut. Col. C. M. R. Graham, of the 156th battalion, Witley.

That at a subsequent date when the envelopes from the said box containing the ballots were being allocated to constituencies in the province of Ontario and at which allocation E. R. Dewart, Esquire of Toronto, and quarter-master Sergeant McKinnon, special returning officers, were also present, I checked over the votes recorded by the said Lieut. Col. Graham as being entitled to vote in the town of Prescott, and the said lists of votes contained surnames only beginning with letters between the letters A and H of the alphabet.

And from other evidences of fraud in connection with the said polling booth and which have since been corroborated, I verily believe the said list of voters is improper, unreliable and fraudulent.

I make this declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true and by virtue of the legislation enacted in this behalf.

(Sgd) W. T. R. Preston.

Declared before me at Ottawa this 21st day of May A.D. 1918.

(Sgd) D. C. Ross
A Notary public,
in and for Ontario.

Evidence is accumulating that subjects of the United States who had joined the Canadian Expeditionary Forces were organized to vote at the elections in direct contravention of the Military Voters' Act. A large number of citizens of the United States voted in the electoral districts of Peel, Digby and Annapolis, St. Ann's, Que., Prince Edward County, Ontario, North Essex, Bruce North, Edmonton, Cape Breton South and Richmond, St. Lawrence and St. George, Ottawa, Brome, Renfrew, Laurier and Outremont, Wright, Cape Breton North and Victoria, Pictou, Westmorland, Cumberland, Leeds, Yarmouth, Hants, St. Antoine and Port Arthur and Kenora. At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. COPP: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I had just completed reading a list of military electors who had given their answers to the questions on the envelope, and had declared that they were United States citizens, but who nevertheless voted in a number of constituencies throughout the Dominion. That was to prove charge No. 26 that a large number of citizens of the United States had voted in the following Canadian constituencies: Peel, Ontario; Digby and Annapolis, N.S.; St. Ann's, Quebec; Prince Edward, Ontario; North Essex, and Bruce North, Ontario; Edmonton East, Alberta; Cape Breton South and Richmond, N.S.;

St. Lawrence and St. George, Montreal; Ottawa; Brome, Quebec; Renfrew, Ontario; Laurier and Outremont, and Wright, Quebec; Cape Breton North and Victoria, and Pictou, Nova Scotia; Westmorland, New Brunswick; Edmonton W., Alberta; Cumberland, and Yarmouth, Nova Scotia; and Leeds, Ontario.

I want to read another list on the same matter of citizens of the United States, non-resident voters, who answered No. 5 on the ballot envelope in the negative. There were twenty on the list in question, all of whom voted in the Yukon electoral district. Their names are:

NON-RESIDENT VOTERS IN THE YUKON WHOSE VOTES WERE COUNTED.

Name.	Number.	Where enlisted or answer to question 5.	D.R.O.
Pte. Frederick B. Blooms.	528407	No.	Thomas Grembell.

Pte. Oscar Petterson	523435	No.	Thos. Grembell.

The above well illustrates the injustice done to the Yukon; all the above voters were allowed their votes, though none of them answered either the 6th, 7th or 8th clause on the envelope. The answers in the 3rd column were made to question No. 5. The voter placed his vote under 9. This also is a good sample of all the constituencies where there were hard fights put up. Thousands of envelopes were marked this way, and I contended they should all be thrown out, but was ruled against.

(Sd.) W. R. Hearn,
Scrutineer for Canada.

These men all answered Question No. 9 and selected the constituency of the Yukon in which to cast their ballots.

Now, it seems to me that when such a number of non-residents answered Question No. 9 and selected the Yukon as the constituency in which their ballots should be counted, there is at least a very strong suspicion that some person in high authority influenced, advised and directed how those ballots should be cast.

The next paragraph in the charge No. 27, to which I refer is that military voters had two ballots in the same envelope. That military electors were permitted to vote more than once is established by the following statement:

J. R. Cattanach, 928607, voted twice in Leeds. (Capt. H. J. Denis, Deputy Presiding Officer.)

J. J. Connolly, 249437, residence Dingwall Ave., Toronto, voted twice. (Lt.-Col. Malone, Deputy Returning Officer.)

Rees Jones, 501219, Halifax, voted twice. (Capt. J. H. Johnstone, Dep. Presiding Officer.)

Clarence A Coleman, 684026, 18th C. M. G. Co. voted twice. (Major Brownlee, Deputy Presiding Officer.)

J. Edwards, 2497986, voted in Arthabaskaville, Dec. 5th and Dec. 10. (Capt. McLean, Deputy Presiding Officer.)

Wilfrid Boyle, 672606, voted December 2nd and December 4th. (Lt.-Col DeRosiere, Dep. Presiding Officer.)

Lieut. P. S. Whitehead, R.F.A., voted twice on December 7th. (Major Shore, Deputy Presiding Officer.)

E. Green, 469050 voted in Fernie, B.C., and in Cumberland, N.S.

M. Bonlick, 716016, voted twice in Nova Scotia.

J. G. Fraser, 514325, voted twice in Nova Scotia.

C. J. Tracy, 90150, voted twice in Nova Scotia.

J. J. Wall, 534442, voted twice in Nova Scotia.

W. L. Doane, 50916, voted twice in Nova Scotia.

W. W. Bell, 2005073, voted twice in Nova Scotia.

E. C. Sandy, 2574317, voted twice in Ontario.

E. S. Barney, 66951, voted twice in Ontario.

R. W. Leach, 803022, voted twice in Ontario.

Daniel O'Leary, 1015603, voted twice in Yukon.

C. B. Conway, 2303915, voted twice in Yukon on December 12th, (Capt. J. H. Johnstone, Deputy Presiding Officer).

Sergt. A. J. Horne, 1037702, 127th C.F.C. 14th Avenue, Vancouver, voted twice in British Columbia.

Mary Stewart Walsh, Nursing Sister, voted twice December 3rd. (Major Chown, Deputy Presiding Officer).

Clarence L. Goodyear, 249765, U.S.A. citizen, voted in North-York, and this regimental number was voted in Bruce North in the name of D. R. W. Burrows.

Lt. Col. Claude Harding Hill, D.S.O., voted Halifax twice, December 10th. (Lt. E. Jones, D. P. O.).

Cadet Peter J. Macdonald, 52023, voted twice in Sydney, N.S., December 10th. (Lt. E. Jones D.P.O.).

Those are only a few of the instances that I have been able to gather in my investigation of the facts in connection with the ballots cast by military voters at this election. While I am able to submit only a few individual cases to the House, there can be, without doubt, abundant evidence accumulated to show that thousands of such cases occurred during the election.

In connection with charge No. 28, that the Deputy Presiding Officer gave military electors two ballots in direct violation of the Elections Act, that is established by the following list of envelopes which contained double ballots:

Each of these envelopes containing votes cast by the names I have mentioned, contained two ballots. The Act distinctly says that only one ballot shall be given to a voter when he goes into the poll to cast his vote. While I have only one page containing some forty or fifty of these names, undoubtedly it will be found on investigation that there are a very large number of others who had two ballots given to them when they went to cast their votes in the election. It might very well be said: "Well, the extra ballot was not meant to be given." That may be very true. But we know there was a systematic effort made according to the list I have, because there are only three or four different presiding officers in the list I have given the House, and when eight or ten or twelve different voters were going into those polls and getting two ballots from the same deputy returning officer and putting them into an envelope, it could not be considered to be a mistake that two ballots were put in instead of one. I can readily understand, in our own elections here, where you go behind a screen and get the ballot paper and put it in the envelope, how two ballots might be picked up off the shelf or table, being closely stuck together. But it is beyond me to understand why in that particular place, and at the taking of these votes in that polling booth, that large number of envelopes would have two ballots enclosed in them. And it could have been only for one purpose, that is with the expectation that it might be possible when these envelopes were opened that there might not be representatives present for both parties, and in that case the ballots might have been counted; and a very criminal breach of the election law would have been committed.

The next charge is:

That military electors voted on behalf of and personated other military electors.

The next charge is No. 29:

Pte. Rickett voted in Leeds for E. T. Taylor, 170, Toronto.

Pte. Lake voted in Leeds for J. F. Christie, 943, Toronto.

Pte. Mejsken voted in Leeds for W. H. Easton, 639218, Merrickville.

Pte. Flynn voted in Leeds for J. Whitfield, 640222, Winnipeg.

N. Robinson voted in Leeds for Mark Norman, 49475, Toronto.

J. Wyper voted in Leeds for Harry C. Bull, 84108. Galt, Ont..

J. Dawson voted in Leeds for Chas. G. Ashdown, 106063, Winnipeg.

G. A. Rutherford voted in Leeds for Robt. C. Hughes, 410311, Ottawa.

D. J. McLelland voted in Leeds for J. G. McKay, 4150079, Glace Bay, N.S.

G. H. Hill voted in St. Anne's for Alex Macdougall, Winnipeg.

J. Parkin voted in St. Anne's for Harold Robinson, Toronto.

A. Lambert voted in Prince Edward for W. Campeau, 243238, Laprairie, Que.

L. Domoseai voted in Prince Edward for Percy Insley, 27624, Valcartier, Que.

H. Atkinson voted in St. Lawrence & St. Geo. for L. Morgan, 41724, Valcartier.

J. E. Jeary voted in Ottawa for Robt. Cleland, 487327, Killean.

E. Monney voted in Ottawa for F. Lalonde, 410524, Cornwall.

R. J. Huffman voted in Ottawa for Clarence Huffman, 644061, Orillia.

A. King voted in Ottawa for L. S. Cormack, 86049, Winnipeg.

E. G. Gilmour voted in Ottawa for Thos Bootland, 41, Ottawa.

W. Mitchell voted in Westmount & St, Henri for A. Laliberte, 26220, Montreal, Que.

Anson McEwan voted in Queens, P.E.I., for Jas. S. McBeth, 712161, Charlottetown;

That list proves to me that there was personation in the conduct and carrying on of the election; and the military voters whose names I have given here voted on a number that did not belong to them. For that reason, it was an illegal vote, because on the ballot envelopes the elector was asked: Your number; your rank; your name. A list was there before them; and though these voters that I have mentioned are few in number, to be sure, yet that only goes to show that an attempt was made, and effectively carried out, whereby military voters personated other voters, and thus an illegal vote was cast and recorded for the Government in these cases.

The next charge is No. 30:

That after military electors had voted ballot envelopes were fraudulently re-endorsed so that the votes of the said electors were transferred to electoral districts other than the constituencies indicated by the said electors in their reply to questions 6 and 7 in Form B.

I have a list here showing the procedure by which votes were switched to constituencies other than the ones indicated by the military electors when taking the oath before deputy presiding officers. According to the Military Service Act, these questions were to be answered under oath. We find a large number of envelopes in certain constituencies with the electoral constituency, in answer to question 9 filled in by the voter and said envelope signed by the deputy presiding officer. Afterwards, the name of the constituency selected by the elector, or in which he was qualified to vote in accordance with the answers on the envelope, was erased and the name of another constituency entered thereon. After the soldier had selected his constituency, as is possible in question No. 9, if questions 6, 7 and 8 are left unanswered, and the constituency was placed there apparently in good faith by the soldier, and after he had retired from the booth the name of the constituency was erased and another one written in its place. I cannot conceive, Mr. Speaker, of any other reason why a number of envelopes should be found in that condition unless that was systematic fraud practised on that occasion. There was not even an initial to show that the change had been made in the presence of the soldier.

Here is a list of a few names:

Milan Pankovitch, 132807, enlisted at Montreal, voted at 5th General Hospital, Liverpool. Lieut.-Col. S. C. Hart, deputy presiding officer. Envelope was endorsed that voter resided in Montreal South. This endorsation was struck out and Cashwell, Sherbrooke, Quebec, was inserted.

Howard S. Allen, Sergeant, 1030430, endorsed his envelope as residing at Fredericton, N.B., and the vote was transferred to Cumberland, N.S.

Horace McNutt, 715004, gave his residence as Cape Breton North and Victoria, which was struck out and Cumberland, N.S., inserted.

Louis Klitzner, Duluth avenue, Montreal, marked to Quebec South.

W. T. Brennan, 283488, Shelburne, Queens, N.S., endorsation changed to Halifax.

Alex. McDougall, 931427, Tremont Hotel, Nelson, B.C., changed to Antigonish, N.S.

J. W. Herron 875458, Bowsman River, Manitoba, struck out and Ottawa inserted.

Captain H. S. Thain, Sundown, Alaska, struck out and Lambton West inserted.

W. P. Draffen, 628130, Vernon, B.C., struck out and Lambton West inserted.

Major James K. Lawson, Spadina avenue, Toronto, struck out and Lambton West inserted.

Fred W. A. Fordham, Hamilton, changed to Lambton West.

George Riordan, 437331, 9 Doris street, Toronto, changed to Calgary.

J. J. Lyons, 1045701, Windsor, Ontario, changed to Cape Breton North and Victoria, N.S.

W. J. Richardson, 410387, Cornwall, Ontario, changed to Cape Breton North and Victoria, N.S.

H. C. Lockwood, 73336, residence given as Port William, Kings County, N.S., changed to Hants, N.S.

A. Walcott, 334029, residence LaSalette, changed to London.

P. F. Gray, 799679, Herman street, Montreal, changed to Toronto, W.

W. Polak, 294962, Halifax, changed to N. Wellington.

F. Benck, 294945, Winnipeg, changed to N. Wellington.

R. R. Emden, 2203696, Vancouver, changed to Prince Edward County.

G. C. Kelly, 880590, Frankford, Ont., changed to Chatham, Ont.

Ray Strand, 288856, residence Winnipeg, changed to N. Bruce.

C. J. Burns, 20807, residence Vancouver, changed to Toronto, W.

Anson McEwan, 712161, endorsed his envelope as residing in Queens, P.E.I., and vote was changed to Kent, N.B.

Elmer McKay, 712172, Queens, P.E.I., changed to Kent N.B.

Alfred G. Daniels, 712061, Queens, P.E.I., changed to Kent, N.B.

Cecil M. Thomas, 713174, Queens, P.E.I., changed to Kent, N.B.

Captain G. W. Stornaway, Queens, P.E.I., changed to Winnipeg, Man.

Captain W. F. Kennedy, endorsed ballot envelope giving residence at Springfield, N.S., changed to Halifax, N.S.

Fred L. Evans, 718063, residential endorsation Gravel View, Manitoba, changed to Mount Forest, Ontario.

Ambrose Ambeau, 757808, Hamilton, residence struck out and South Bruce inserted.

N. Povogozruk, 1087277, Montreal, residence struck out and Prince Edward County inserted.

Charles Peter, 1045616, Windsor, residence struck out and N. Renfrew inserted.

Adam Leeman, 712025, endorsed his ballot as residing Saskatchewan, and voted in Kent, N.B. (Major Cecil Roberts, deputy presiding officer).

In these cases the constituency named on the ballot envelope, which the soldier had given as his domicile and in which his vote should have been counted, was struck out and another constituency inserted, as I have read. I can come to only one conclusion, that that was done after the soldier had answered the questions, and that it was done without the soldier's knowledge or consent.

With reference to statement No. 31: that persons were fraudulently allowed to vote by deputy presiding officers with knowledge that such persons were not qualified under the Election Act, the following ballot envelopes were marked as entitled to vote in Ottawa by Lieutenant F. W. Lock, Casualty Depot, Buxton, deputy presiding officer, although the residence of the voters was endorsed on the envelopes by the electors as appears in the following list:

G. Jones, No. 23153, actual residence, Nashwaak, N.B.
L. Summer, 457575, 302 Burgess St., Montreal.
J. A. Cooper, 195630, Warsaw, Ontario.
J. H. Goodridge, Alberta.
J. Mowat, 874718, Manitoba.
T. S. Short, 109600, Toronto, Ontario.
H. Hamlett, 1078269, Montreal, Quebec.
J. Hall, 163015, Toronto, Ontario.
A. Lafrance 417308, Montreal.
C. Vezina, 919432, Verdun street, Montreal.
F. D. Ullman, 455017, Prescott, Ontario.
W. Cooping, 657098, Toronto, Ontario.
F. C. Wareham, 408548, Thornton, Ontario.
A. Smith, Saskatchewan.
H. F. Speakman, 211210, Manitoba.
H. W. Jollimore, 283518, Liverpoll, N.S.
H. Smith, 252792, Saskatchewan.
A. L. Gray, 148589, Manitoba.
S. R. Wood, 809039, Alberta.

This is a short list, but I think it is sufficient to show the House that very grave irregularities and frauds were practised in this respect.

The following is a list of military electors who gave their residence as Fort Albany, James Bay, Ontario, but whose envelopes were endorsed as voting in Ottawa:

Robert Linkletter, Patrick Katabrawbit, George Kiaki, Joseph Okeman, James Knach, George Farries, John Keeach, Jacob Swanson, D. Okitego, Thomas Sutherland, James Farris, Albert Metch, John Jakagon, W. Katakawbit, Peter Swanson, Thomas Goodwin, Thomas Noah, Joel Wesley, Charles Tomacartick, N. Chakasum, Isaac Goodwin, Joseph Poney, Peter J. George, Peter Jackagon, S. Sutherland, James Katakawbit, John Iserkoff, David Iserkoff.

Following this point further, I have already referred to Lord Brooke, whose residence was Calgary, but whose vote was transferred to Provencher, Manitoba. Lord Beaverbrook, formerly Sir Max Aitkin, M.P. in the British House of Commons, who was nominally in charge of the Canadian War Record publication in London, voted in Northumberland county, New Brunswick. Other illegal votes accepted by deputy presiding officers were as follows:

Amy G. Cassels, civilian, C.A.M.C., Montreal (Lieutenant-Colonel W. L. Watt, deputy presiding officer).

Mary Stewart, civilian, C.A.M.C., Brantford, Ontario; (Colonel Macpherson, deputy presiding officer).

Caroline Larose, Brome, Quebec; (Lieutenant J. M. Douglass, deputy presiding officer).

Ethel Mould, wife of Mould, 20550, voted in Leeds, Ontario, whereas her husband's residence was given by himself on his own envelope as Lindsay Block, Winnipeg (Lieut. J. M. Douglass, Deputy presiding offiver). It was contended that his wife had no vote.

Gwendolyn Read, wife of Captain G. R. Read, voted in Nanaimo, B. C. (Lt. J. M. Douglass, deputy presiding officer).

Mrs. Scatterwood, married woman, not in Canada for several years, was allowed to vote.

Frances G. Renwick, Women's Army Auxiliary Corps—not Canadian—voted (Captain Gimblett, Deputy Presiding Officer.)

Marjorie Mallam, resident of Acton, N.W. London, visiting King George's Hospital, Waterloo, when the poll was opened, was persuaded by a chaplain to vote because she "was kind to Canadian soldiers," and did vote.

Miss E. G. Ferris, an attendant at the Navy and Army Canteen, voted (Major Shore, Deputy Presiding Officer.-

Nora Lucas, wife of Lt. G. P. Lucas, South Wales Borderers, voted in West Toronto (Lt. J. M. Douglass, Deputy Presiding Officer.-

Dorothy O. McLaren, attendant, Canadian Red Cross offices, voted in Ottawa (Lt. J. Oxhed, Deputy Presiding Officer.-

Ethel L. Robertson, attendant, Canadian Red Cross offices, voted in Ottawa (Lt. Maxted Deputy Presiding Officer.)

Catherine McGrath, Dorothy Outerbridge, Mrs. Walter Barwick and Clare Georgina McKendrick voted in Ottawa in the same way.

Laura C. McKendrick, British Red Cross; Mrs. W. S. H. Simard, Military Massage Corps; Catherine Taylor, civilian, born at Clinton, Ontario, voted in King's county, N.S.

Lenora Draper (née Paterson), British V.A.D., certificate A149566; Mrs. Vera McNally, wife of Major McNally, Deputy Presiding Officer, British V.A.D., 148th Detachment, voted in Prince Edward, Ontario.

Jean M. Boney, British Red Cross, voted in Richmond and Wolfe, Que.

Jean Isobel Coloquon, British Red Cross, voted in Richmond and Wolfe, Que.

Martha Vadenias, United States subject, voted in Laurier and Outremont, Que.

Marguerette Allen, Montreal, voted.

Mrs. Mary Theodora Kayle, wife of Lt. H. O. Kayle, voted.

Gwenneth Gertrude Mason, British Women's Army Auxiliary Company, voted.

R. Martin, 213728, admitted United States citizen, allowed to vote by Lt. A. Provost, Oxford.

I have a few other names here, but I shall not take up any more time in reading them.

I now will read a statement of Canadian officers who voted in constituencies other than those in which they were entitled to vote:

Name.	Residence.	Voted in
Lt. H. D. Anderson	Vancouver	Yukon.
Capt. W. B. Allen	London, Ont.	Russell.

* This list does not give Capt. Pain's residence. He may have been entitled to vote in Ottawa.

There is not one officer on this list whose vote has been cast in the constituency in which he resided before going overseas, they voted in other constituencies, without qualification and absolutely against the letter and spirit of the Military Voters' Act.

Mr. Speaker, I have placed before the House and the country the facts which I desired it my duty to make known. I can assure you, that I do not bring this matter before the House for any personal feeling I have in the matter, or any personal feeling I have against any hon. member in this House, nor do I so because the overseas vote or the soldiers' vote in Canada made any difference in my election or anything of that kind. This information, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, came to me from soldiers themselves in answer to letters that I had sent to them and that were not delivered until after the votes had been cast. They stated to me that the letters were not delivered until after the vote was taken. They gave me a number of illustrations of irregularities and frauds that had been committed in the polling booths where the military electors went to cast their ballots under the Military Voters' Act that was passed at the last session of Parliament. Being prompted by those letters, I commenced to make some inquiries. I made those inquiries in the best possible way I could. I made investigations; I compared, where that was possible, the nominal rolls of the officers and men. I satisfied myself that gross irregularities took place in the taking of the soldiers' votes, and frauds and election crimes were committed in regard to the taking of that vote. The opportunity afforded me of investigating matters was indeed meagre and, in a great measure,

I had to secure a good deal of information from hostile witnesses, but nevertheless I secured that information and I believe it to be true. When I pieced together the different portions of evidence that I had gathered, I was satisfied that gross irregularities and frauds had been perpetrated in the taking of the soldiers' votes. I said at the outset that, when the Military Voters' Act was going through this House, it was stated that just such frauds and irregularities as these would be the result. Those apprehensions were well grounded, and I think I have given absolutely convincing evidence that the irregularities that were feared have taken place. I have taken up a great deal of the time of the House in presenting this argument.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COPP: I realized that this task would be unpopular with hon. gentlemen opposite, but when one has a matter of this kind to bring before Parliament and the country one must make an argument such as he would make before a court of law, and it should be in sequence as far as possible. I have endeavoured to do that. I did not undertake this duty to gain the plaudits of hon. gentlemen around me, nor did I shirk it because it would be unpopular amongst hon. gentlemen opposite. I knew that the duty devolved upon me or some other member on this side of the House to bring the facts before the public. I have undertaken that responsibility, and I leave it to the country to judge whether or not I have done my duty. Before taking my seat I beg to move:

That an investigation be held conducted by a judge of a court of superior jurisdiction, assisted by two counsel, one to be selected by the Prime Minister and the other by the leader of the Opposition, to examine into the taking and counting of the military votes cast in the last general election, with power to order the production of all cables, telegrams, correspondence, toll books, nominal rolls of regiments and papers and documents of all kinds, and with power also to summon and examine witnesses, except soldiers whose attendance at the inquiry would interfere, in the opinion of the judge, with their military duties.

Mr. SPEAKER: The amendment is not in proper form. I presume the hon. member intends to move in amendment to the motion for Commitee of Supply "that the Speaker do not now leave the Chair."

Mr. COPP: Yes.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, it would have been a pity if the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp) who states he has not shirked his duty—and I am quite sure this House will be confirmed in that view, if he conceived it to be his duty to make a speech of this kind, seeing that he has taken four hours to deliver it—it would have been a pity indeed if he had forgotten the principal part of his speech, in which he desired to move for a committee of inquiry on a matter in respect of which, I submit, he has given no reason at all why a committee of inquiry should be appointed. However, I do not want to dwell on that.

In the first place I would ask my hon. friend, who has brought this matter up at such great length, what on earth was the good of bringing it up, and stating what he has stated at this particular time? He has talked a great deal about fraud and crime. I am not sure that it is not a crime perpetrated against this House on the night before prorogation to take up four hours of the time of this House in trying to prove a case which he has not begun to prove. If there had been a situation where the mandate of the people, coupled with the mandate of those who are Canadian citizens across the seas, had been of so undecided a character that there was doubt in the minds of this nation whether or not this Government should be supported in its policies, I could quite understand that with the feeling of soreness, perhaps, that all people and all parties have when they are defeated in an election they might bestir themselves and say, "Well, this is a very narrow margin; possibly something has been going on against the law; let us pursue the matter and see if we cannot turn the scales." But that was not the case here. The case here is that without a single soldier vote overseas or in Canada, this Union Government and its policies has been so absolutely and so substantially endorsed that there has been no question as to a mandate from the people of Canada, and it is rather amusing to hear my hon. friend express his horror at the desperate things that have been going on, and the pain it has given him. Personally I did not see any great evidence of pain when the hon. member was bringing up this matter in the way he has. Throughout all his speech there is not only an admission that he attacks the political side of this thing—political in the sense that all politicians understand, namely, the methods and practices of those not holding office, but who are desirous, nevertheless, of returning their party to power—but there is also an implication or plain charge that the administration of this Election Act by the officials appointed for that purpose has been of a deplorable character. Before saying another word, I resent in the strongest possible way the imputations that have been cast by the hon. member on the character of the officers who have carried forward this election in Canada, in England, and in France, and I think the best answer I can give my hon. friend after his four hours' speech would be this: that he has not said, practically, a single word or made a single charge in regard to the administration of the Act and the running of the election in France or in Canada, but has confined practically all of his criticisms and charges to the conduct of the election in England. I would point out to this House what many members know, that there have been the same administration, the same rulings and decisions, and practically the very same methods, in France, in England, and in Canada. In France we have had no complaints; in Canada we have had virtually no complaints. Indeed, my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) himself commended the way in which the general returning officer, Mr. O'Connor, had conducted election affairs in Canada. Mr. Langlois, the gentleman appointed by the right hon. leader of the Opposition to take chief charge in France, commended Colonel Purney, the Assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery overseas, for the way he had conducted affairs so far as France was concerned. My hon. friend attempts to show that things were conducted in a different way in England from that in which they were conducted in Canada or France. That charge is absolutely without foundation. Mr. O'Connor had charge of the administration of the Act and the conduct of the elections in Canada, and was constantly in touch, every day, by cable with the Assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery overseas, Colonel Purney.

Colonel Purney himself was part of the time in England and part of the time in France, and he was directing operations in France as well as in the United Kingdom. What have these gentlemen got to say about this man? I do not need to say that I do not propose to discuss Mr. O'Connor's personality in this House—that is something that we are not discussing now, but I do not think there is an hon. gentleman present who will deny Mr. O'Connor's undoubted ability or that any one would charge him with having done or assented to anything to which you might apply the term crooked in connection with this election. I shall speak of that later on. I may say that Mr. O'Connor himself has stated that, as general returning officer, in England, France or Canada, not a single case of impropriety in this election has come to his knowledge. That statement is borne out by Col. Purney, the Assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in England. By implication, Col. Purney is placed under suspicion. He happens to be the President of the Great War Veterans' Association, and is it a blemish upon his character, or an undesirable thing, that he should be selected to serve his country when he is incapacitated for further work at the front. Is it an undesirable thing that this returned soldier and President of the Great War Veterans' Association should be put in charge of this important work, and why should it be regarded as a blemish if he is qualified in other respects; especially as there is no evidence furnished by the correspondence or presented from any source to show that Col. Purney has not lived up to the spirit and letter of the law and performed his duty in an absolutely efficient and satisfactory way?

I have said that the same rulings and decisions that have governed the elections in Ottawa, and in Canada generally, have governed the whole of the cases in England and in France. I intend to take up some of these matters in detail later on. My hon. friend, of course, will not surely expect me to follow him through all the thirty-two articles of faith, or the thirty-two charges which he has made before this House. I would rather imagine that he would not expect me to do that. I tried to follow as closely as I could the bulk of his speech or his arguments. I had a little difficulty, I must confess, because during the course of his four-hour argument, two hours or two hours and a half were taken up in the reading of lists of names which was not necessary, because the argument based upon them was absolutely fallacious and he could have saved the House a good deal of time and the King's Printer much expense if he had refrained from reading those lists.

I will touch on some features of his remarks as far as I was able to follow them. They practically came down to a series of charges which are vague in character, but which, in the main, might be classified as charges of irregularities, fraud and conspiracy. I do not think it will be unfair to say to my hon. friend that if he has done nothing else he has earned a distinction which I am sure no one will be disposed to deny him. We abolished titles last night, or we are supposed to have done so, but I think I can assure my hon. friend that he has fairly earned the distinction of delivering a speech which, by reason of its turgidity and length, has rarely been equalled in the House, and by which he very successfully emptied the benches on his own side as well as on ours. He accompanied that speech with a large number of affidavits. I suppose there is something in the old saying that the truth can be found even in an affidavit sometimes. You must partly estimate the value of an affidavit by the source from which it comes, and by the motive of the person who subscribed it, or by whom it is submitted. Some of these affidavits have been coupled with the name of Mr. W. T. R. Preston, whose history in connection with election work is well known. I shall not deal with that phase of the matter now, but I intend to refer to it a little later on. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that while no charge is made in regard to these matters in France or in Canada, where Mr. Langlois and Mr. Ahearn were acting, it is significant that we have charges coming from England, where Mr. Preston was the representative of the Opposition party.

Let me take up some of the points to which my hon. friend referred. In the first place he picks out the names of persons who voted in places where they did not reside, or tried to vote. He mentioned Prince Edward County, Ontario, he named Col. Glenn, and many others and he stated that they had been allowed to vote in places where they did not reside. I would call the attention of the House to the questions contained in Form B of the Military Voters' Act and with which hon. members are very familiar. Question 6 is:

Specify the names of the place or places in Canada (giving streets and numbers where possible) whereat you last continuously resided during at least four months of the twelve months immediately preceding your appointment, enlistment, enrolment or calling out on active service.

Then he said that these gentlemen not having answered these questions satisfactorily, their votes were allocated to certain constituencies under Question 9. There has been a very great misconception in the public mind as to the question of whether a man could allocate his vote to a particular constituency. I think I am simply stating the truth when I say that a tremendous number of people did believe, or were led to believe, both civilians and soldiers, that because a man was a military voter he had the right to allocate his vote to any constituency he liked. I can add to that with some confidence that my hon. friends on the other side of the House were the ones who industriously circulated that idea. In my own province that statement was deliberately circulated by the Opposition stating that that was what was meant by the Act, that that was what was being done, and would be done. It is no small wonder, that they having circulated that statement and it having appeared in their press, that many men did honestly believe that a man, because he was a military voter, had the right to place his vote in any constituency he pleased.

I want to show the fallacy of the general argument based on this misconception that my hon. friend presented. If the voter's residence was given under Questions 6, 7 and 8, if he desired to vote some place else under Question 9, the vote was always allocated where his residence was given and it was not allocated to a constituency in which he might express a wish to vote in. None of these votes that my hon. friend disturbs himself so much about went astray or could possibly go astray in so far as the real residence of the voter was concerned. I would like to also say that if Questions 6, 7 and 8, as to whether a man lived in a certain place and if he had lived there for four months preceding enlistment remained unanswered, and if he did not specify his place of residence and he was put under Question 9 to choose a constituency, that vote was invalid. I would like to speak about this for a moment because, I must confess, I think there may have been honest confusion on the part of the military voters in regard to these questions, Nos. 5, 6, 7 and 8.

5. Were you in Canada when you were appointed, enlisted, enrolled or called out in active service .....

6. Specify the names of the place or places in Canada (giving streets and numbers where possible) whereat you last continuously resided during at least four months of the twelve months immediately preceding your appointment, enlistment, enrolment or calling out on active service .....

7. State if you can the electoral district wherein such place or places in which you so resided are situate .....

Electoral district .....

Province .....

8. If you cannot specify as required by question No. 6, or state as required by question No. 7, then state in what electoral district or place within Canada (giving street and number where possible) you have resided at any other time than is referred to in question No. 6.

Now take the case of a man coming to this country from the United States—we will say, a British subject,—and enlisting in the city of Quebec, Montreal, or anywhere else, having those questions put to him and then going into camp, we will say at Valcartier. When that question is put to him asking him to "specify as required," knowing that he was not in any sense of the word a resident in Canada, he might naturally omit answers to questions 6, 7 and 8, and might consider himself entitled to answer with respect to No. 9, as to where he desired to vote. And I know perfectly well that some scrutineers themselves held that view. But my hon. friend (Mr. Copp) argued, or appeared to argue, that a whole lot of such votes were allocated, although the answers to these questions were omitted. I want to point out to him—though no doubt he knows it,—that when questions 6, 7 and 8 were not answered, the Government and the general returning officer took the view that if a man enlisted in Canada and went into camp here, although he was not living in the Dominion before, he became, for the purposes of this Act, a resident of Canada, and it was desirable to put him down in the electoral district where he happened to enlist, because it was not desirable to have a tremendous number of these votes allocated wherever a man might choose. At all events that is the ruling which was given, and, therefore, in regard to the cases as to which my hon. friend manifests such distress—

Mr. MURPHY: By whom was the ruling given to which my hon. friend has referred?

Mr. BURRELL: That ruling was given by the general returning officer and by Colonel Purney, and was followed out.

Mr. MURPHY: My hon. friend is mistaken.

Mr. BURRELL: No, I am absolutely right.

Mr. MURPHY: The general returning officer had nothing to do with giving the ruling. The Order in Council passed by my hon. friend and his colleagues calls upon the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to give the ruling, not the general returning officer.

Mr. BURRELL: A decision was given by the proper authority, and the Assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery overseas gave that ruling.

Mr. MURPHY: The general returning officer had nothing to do with it. The clerk of the Crown in Chancery here gave the ruling and the assistant clerk of the Crown in Chancery overseas followed it.

Mr. BURRELL: The ruling was given and absolutely followed, that is what I am contending for.

Mr. MURPHY: All right.

Mr. BURRELL: Therefore, the argument of my hon. friend, who seems to contend that all these votes where questions 6, 7 and 8 were not answered should not have been given, is absolutely beside the mark, because none of those ballots were allocated at all. In fact, in England, out of 104,000 votes which were cast, 17,000 ballots were rejected, and rejected largely because of that very reason. Indeed, I think there were a great many men who, perhaps, suffered an injustice by being done out of their votes. Furthermore, the candidates concerned, who did not receive the votes of those men, who honestly believed they were entitled to vote, were adversely affected. At all events, rightly or wrongly, that rigid interpretation of the law to which I have just referred was given, so that the number of men I have mentioned were not permitted to vote, and in France there was about the same proportion. In Canada alone no less than 19,000 votes were rejected, and very largely for the reason I have indicated.

I would also like to point out another fallacy indulged in by my hon. friend and to indicate to him that the fulminations and the heat which he displayed, and the fiery indignation into which he worked himself on this point, were entirely wasted energy. He argued—and if he is sincere I can only say it shows great ignorance on his part of the actual facts of the case—that it was the deputy presiding officers who allocated all these votes in, as he says, this improper way. That is what I understand the hon. gentleman to argue—that the deputy presiding officer allocated these votes although he should not have allocated them—thus implying grossly improper proceedings on the part of election officials in this matter. Now, as every member of the House knows—or many members do—the deputy presiding officers had absolutely nothing whatever to do with allocating the votes; they were simply there for the purpose of receiving the votes; and the allocation was done by the Assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in England; by Mr. O'Connor in Canada, and by the gentleman appointed for the purpose in France. The allocation was carried out according to the merits and facts of the case, and according to the law, and in the presence of two men, one of whom was appointed by the Union Government and the other by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. I cannot see where all the indignation manifested by my hon. friend enters at all on this subject; I think his whole case falls to the ground.

Now let me deal with another charge that the hon. gentleman made. He spoke several times about improprieties in connection with the ballot envelopes. He argued that there were improper things going on because of military voters in England filling out their envelopes before they came to the polling places to vote, and that the whole thing was extremely irregular. He alleged that a lot of this occurred at Witley in particular, and also in connection with the 156th Battalion under Lieutenant Colonel Grant. Well, that is true enough. It is not true that the ballots were filled out before the electors came to the polling place, but it is true that some were filled out before the men actually came into the polling room. As a matter of convenience some of them were filled out at Witley in an adjoining room, but, let me observe, under the Presiding Officer and sworn to and attested by him. After all, I do not know that there is anything illegal about that. It is true, it may not have been a literal or full compliance with the Act, and that it was afterwards discouraged by Colonel Purney, who stopped it; but after all, what does it amount to? The Act requires that the voters shall come to the Deputy Presiding Officer and answer certain questions that appears on the envelope as to whether they were resident in Canada, and so on. The voter was supposed to swear to those answers, and then the certificate was attested by the Presiding Officer. I would ask, however, what is the difference between a Deputy Presiding Officer giving the voter an envelope and getting him to fill it in himself and then returning and handing it in and the Presiding Officer himself seeing that the envelope is filled out. What is the difference between putting the oath to the voter as to whether his answers are correct or not, and putting the oath to him before he filled out the envelope. The man gave his oath that those were his true answers, and I cannot see anything in that contention but a matter of hair-splitting. Although, it is true, it was not a strict compliance with the law it was only done for a short time, and done under proper supervision. Surely my hon. friend would not argue in any conceivable way that that was improper, or in any real sense an illegal proceeding? To say that that constituted evidence of a dark, dangerous, sinister conspiracy on the part of people unknown, I think would be a very far-fetched idea.

While on the envelope question my hon. friend waxed eloquent because envelopes had been put in which had not been properly filled out, or filled out before the voter went to the poll. I think that is what my hon. friend argued, although I do not want to do him an injustice. He held up a white envelope at that time.

Mr. COPP: No, I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BURRELL: Very good. If my hon. friend held up an official envelope I have nothing to say. If he had held up a white envelope it would be perfectly natural because a large number of white envelopes were used by both parties for instructional purposes, many of which, through ignorance or dishonesty, were put into the various polling bags, but were rejected and destroyed at the final count. I certainly thought that was one of these envelopes.

Mr. MURPHY: Will my hon. friend say where these envelopes were used for instructional purposes?

Mr. BURRELL: I think they were used in England and Canada and by both sides I am informed. My hon. friend in the course of his remarks animadverted on the case of United States citizens voting. Here he again seems to scent some evidence of a dark and deep-laid conspiracy to get them to do improper things. In the first place, no United States citizens, as he knows, can vote under the law, although here again it was industriously spread throughout my province that this Act was so intricate that it allowed United States citizens to vote in an election. I am sure everybody who knows anything about it should know that no United States citizen could vote. It is true that if he filled out in the answer to No. 5—first of all he has to say whether he is a British subject, and if he said he was, and answered No. 5: "Were you in Canada when you enlisted?" in the negative, then I maintain he was within the law in answering No. 9. I am not pronouncing on the question as to what would be done if a United States citizen deliberately perjured himself by saying "yes" in answer to question No. 4, "Are you a British subject?" That is a different point altogether. The onus of that must rest on the individual. But as far as the election officers go, and as far as the administration of this Act goes, there is absolutely not a shadow of impropriety in regard to such a charge about United States citizens voting.

Now, I wish to come to another criticism which my hon. friend made, and that was in relation to Colonel A. T. Thompson, who is very well known and very much liked by a great many men on both sides of the House, and who formerly sat as a member of this House, and was a very strong and pronounced supporter of my right hon friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) for years. I might say in this connection that the gentlemen who were appointed as chief scrutineers by my right hon. friend and by the Prime Minister, and who are by implication assailed through the speech of my hon. friend, were these:

In France, Major Gibson, representing the Government as chief scrutineer in the whole of the United Kingdom, Colonel A. T. Thompson; in Canada, Mr. John F. Orde, K.C., who is well known here. The leader of the Opposition appointed in France Mr. Godfroi Langlois, who is well known; in England, Mr. W. T. R. Preston, who is also well known; and in Canada, Mr. W. R. Hearn. I do not think that any man in this House would care to say what my hon. friend in his speech this afternoon said, that however high a standing Colonel Thompson may have had, he allowed this most deplorable conduct in the selection, for that is the effect of his charges. He said that Colonel Thompson appointed two scrutineers, one for the Opposition and one for the Government, and thereby misled everybody, and worked in a Government man masquerading as an Opposition man and did a great injury to the party of my hon. friends opposite. My hon. friend surely knows that Colonel Thompson, as chief scrutineer, does not appoint an Opposition scrutineer and assign him to a particular place, because the whole inference of my hon. friend's remarks was that at a certain polling place Colonel Thompson had put in two men, one a Government man and one an Opposition man to work in a particular poll.

Mr. COPP: If I may be permitted: I said that Colonel Thompson appointed two scrutineers, and that the presiding officer swore one in as a scrutineer for the Opposition and the other as a scrutineer for the Government.

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend cannot get away from the fact that he impugned Colonel Thompson in that respect. Because, when he was interrupted by the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) he got rather heated about it, and certainly left the impression in my mind, and in the minds of hon. gentlemen on this side, that Colonel Thompson had done something very dark. Colonel Thompson was the chief scrutineer for the whole of the United Kingdom and the Channel Islands, and, as anybody who has anything to do with elections knows, he had to issue hundreds of certificates for the appointment of scrutineers, and he would issue them by the hundred. He would not always know where these certificates went. He might issue them with a name, and again it might possibly be left in blank. He does not appoint these scrutineers to go to a particular place. Here is an Opposition and a Government man. That man goes himself and takes his oath before another officer as to whether he is an Opposition scrutineer or whether he is a Government scrutineer. And upon that man and upon that officer who takes that oath is the onus of saying whether that man is an Opposition or a Government man. It is quite conceivable, to one whose mind is not so full of dark suspicions as my hon. friend's, that in the issuance of hundreds of certificates to scrutineers, mistakes should occur. If I wanted to get highly suspicious, I might as well argue that one of these certificates was filled in by my hon. friends opposite for the purpose of saying that this was a cooked-up case. I do not want to assume such things. It is very much beside the mark that my hon. friend should draw the deduction from such a slender hypothesis as this that Colonel Thompson, as a Government officer, has been behaving in a highly improper way.

My hon. friend followed that by the remark that Mr. Preston, the chief scrutineer appointed by my right hon. friend who leads the Opposition, had been maltreated in England, had not been dealt with properly, and that he had even been arrested at one time. Well, I am afraid that Mr. Preston was arrested; I cannot deny that. As a matter of fact, what happened was this: Mr. Preston was the only civilian who was operating as an election officer of any kind practically, in Great Britain. They were all military men, and every one of them in uniform. And Mr. Preston appears at some military camp and states that he is Mr. Preston and is a scrutineer, and does not produce anything to show that he is. As I understand it, he had the papers on him, but would not produce them. And the military authorities, in times like these, when civilian gentlemen, whom nobody knows, assume that they are something, and take no steps to show that they are, the military also, like my hon. friend, entertain suspicions, and perhaps even better founded than his. Apparently they entertained some suspicions of Mr. Preston and put him in jail, and I understand he was in jail for five or six hours. Nothing very serious happened, except, I have been informed, that Mr. Preston was a little disturbed in his mind. I understand one of his fellow-prisoners was a jolly little Irishman, and, during the course of that brief incarceration, there were steps heard outside, and Mr. Preston asked in some apprehension what this thing was, and was told: "Don't worry yourself, it will soon be over; it is the firing squad."

My hon. friend next brought up a lot of charges which I must confess I had very great difficulty in following. His voice, while it rose at times to great passion and fervor, sometimes sank so low when he was reading that bewildering list of names, that I could scarcely hear him. As nearly as I could follow him, he was charging that there were a lot of votes transferred to different places such as Prince Edward county or elsewhere where they did not belong, and to Northumberland, and he read out, in fact, several pages of these things. He seemed to think that something terrible had been done; that this was further conclusive evidence of the deep-laid conspiracy which he was so fond of rolling under his tongue. But let me point out that in each case the vote was allocated to the place indicated on the envelope as the residence, not to the place where the man might want to vote or was trying to vote and should not. A widespread impression prevailed among the soldiers that they could elect what constituency they should vote in. Take the case of Prince Edward County, for instance. It is conceivable that a great many men in the battalion of their officer, Major Hepburn, who was a candidate for Prince Edward County, even if they did not belong to that county would have the impression that they could vote in the county of Prince Edward and would do all they could to persuade all the other fellows to vote there too if they could. But that does not imply that they did so.

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, they did.

Mr. BURRELL: Their votes were not allocated there if they gave their residence as somewhere else.

Mr. MURPHY: They voted there.

Mr. BURRELL: Was the vote allocated to that constituency if the residence was given as somewhere else? Not at all, it was rejected.

Mr. MURPHY: Not all. Practically the whole battalion voted there.

Mr. BURRELL: If in filling out the envelope a man chose to vote in Prince Edward County, although he gave his address as somewhere else, certainly the vote would not be allocated to that constituency, because in all cases the rule was followed that where the man had lived, the place which he gave as his address, there his vote was allocated. I make that statement with the absolute assurance that I speak the truth. My hon. friend implies that he did not get from the envelopes these names of electors whose votes, he alleges, had been allocated to other constituencies than the place of residence named. Well, if the address was on the envelope, the vote went to the constituency thus indicated. If it was not on the envelope—and I do not know where else my hon. friend could have got it—the vote did not count; if questions 6, 7 and 8 were not filled in, it was rejected. In England and in Canada 36,000 votes were rejected; that is quite a large number.

The hon. member said that about 350 votes had been allotted to Northumberland County. It is possible that 350 votes were rightly allocated to that constituency; he did not give us any evidence on that point.

The hon. gentleman said also that an examination of box 101 revealed the fact that from A to K a number of votes went to the county of Leeds, and then from L to Z a number of votes went to the county of Grenville. He spoke of this as further evidence of the existence of that deep conspiracy. If a thousand votes from A to K went to Leeds and another thousand from L to Z went to Grenville, there might be reasonable ground for alleging conspiracy, but it might happen that half a dozen or eight or ten votes from A to K should go to Leeds and half a dozen or eight or ten to Grenville. If my hon. friend bases his charge of conspiracy on such slender material as this and the other points which he has dealt with during his speech of four hours, all I can say is that his charge is not very well founded.

The hon. gentleman intimated also during the course of his remarks—this shows that he cannot be very accurate, though here again I am subject to correction—that two votes with residences given as Clinton and Seaforth were allotted to South Huron. I always had the impression that Clinton and Seaforth were in South Huron.

My hon. friend made another charge. He implied that the post office officials under the direction of this Government, or of the Canadian military authorities in England, had permitted parcels to be opened, literature to be extracted therefrom and other literature to be substituted in the place of that taken out. Any literature carried in the mails of the United Kingdom—I assume that is what he referred to—is not under the direction of this Government or of the Canadian military authorities, but is purely under the English Post Office system. The hon. gentleman will stretch the credulity or the imagination of the House if he seeks to make hon. members believe that the British postal authorities would lend themselves to the free opening of parcels in order that certain campaign literature might be substituted for that which was being carried in the mails. Of course, if it had actually happened and there were any alleviation for the circumstance, one might almost be forgiven for saying that a better kind of literature would be put in than what my hon. friend's friends were sending. My hon. friend's friends can give us all pointers in the matter of campaign literature, both as to its character and the manner of its distribution.

I will touch upon that a little further before I get through. They employ clever and devious means of getting literature around. The House might be surprised to learn that Mr. Preston's son-in-law circularized a large number of the non-commissioned officers and men throughout Great Britain, in the camps and elsewhere, asking their name, rank, place of birth; inquiring whether they had lived in Canada, how long, and so on. And what do you think he told them? He said that these circulars were being sent for the purpose of making "historical notes." Well, to quote the words used by the member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Butts) last night, "A rose by any other name would smell as sweet."

I wish to touch upon another matter on which my hon. friend laid a good deal of stress and on which his friends and the chief scrutineer in England, Mr. Preston, also laid stress—the alleged irregularities in connection with the ballot bags. He asserted that all kinds of ballots had been folded together and put in the ballot bags; that they had been put in one time, not in a proper way, and that they were of different dates. As this matter has been the subject of some discussion, I wish to deal with it somewhat fully. Charges also were made in respect of the envelopes from different camps. It was intimated that the officers at these camps, as well as the higher election officials, must have been cognizant of this. As evidence of the spirit in which Colonel Purney, Assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery overseas, conducted his operations, I wish to read a letter which he sent to the special officers whom he was to assist by instruction and advice concerning the election laws, and so on, in the various polilng places. It is as follows:

Dear Sir,—

If it were possible I would visit all points where voting at the ensuing Dominion election will be carried on. My chief objects in making such visits would be to satisfy myself without actually interfering with the work of the officials at the polls, that they have:

1. A thorough knowledge of the Military Voters' Act and of the work they are carrying on.

2. That every effort is being made by them to give every military elector in their district a chance to vote.

3. That the instructions which have been sent out by me have been absolutely followed.

As it is physically impossible for me to make this visit personally I have asked for the services of officers to assist me in this work. You have been detailed to me as one of them and I would like you to understand that in carrying out your work you must be strictly non-partisan, not doing anything that could possibly be construed as being campaign work. The least departure from this necessary provision would mean your instant return to duty.

I would also like you to make it known throughout your district that you will be available to all officials conducting the election within your area, for advice and instruction.

It is my desire that the full vote be polled and if there is any carelessness or a disposition on the part of any official not to do this, you must report it immediately to this office.

I do not wish you to take from these blunt instructions, which I must necessarily give you, any inference that I have anything but the fullest confidence in your ability to do the work which I have appointed you to do. That is farthest from my mind. If I had not the utmost confidence in your willingness and ability to assist me in the heavy work which is imposed upon me, I would not have called upon you. It is, however, incumbent upon me, situated as I am, to lay down hard and fast instructions, such as I myself have to follow in the prosecution of my work, for those who are sharing my responsibilities.

I hope to make a hurried trip to the various districts where the votes are being polled.

That, I think, will commend itself to the House as a proper spirit in which the chief and responsible officer should address all the men who are carrying on those elections.

Irregularities were charged in reference to the ballot bags and envelopes, and the charges were especially directed to certain matters that went on at Witley Camp. The officer in charge at Witley Camp is Major-General Hughes, who is known to many members in this House, and when the matter was called to his attention, he wrote this letter:

With reference to your letter of December 6th, 1917, enclosing a copy of a letter addressed to you from Mr. W. T. R. Preston.

The 158th Canadian Infantry Battalion which he refers to is not in this area and there is evidently a mistake either in the designation of the battalion or in considering that it is in this area.

I have, however, referred Mr. Preston's letter to the Deputy Presiding Officers of the 125th Canadian Infantry Battalion and the 208th Canadian Infantry Battalion, and have received from them in both cases, definite assurances that there was absolutely no irregularity in the polling of the votes taken by them.

Colonel Malone of the 208th Canadian Infantry Battalion mentions the fact which he has already reported to me in my military capacity that a civilian, who claimed to be the Mr. Preston in question, interfered with the taking of the vote at his polling booth, and that he is now of the opinion that the letter addressed to you resulted from his action at that time.

Colonel Malone further states that he is prepared to state and prove that the polling in his Battalion was conducted in accordance with the Military Voters Act, that he took no part in any manipulating of votes, and that no such thing existed in the Battalion to his knowledge.

Colonel Cutcliffe states that he knows of and took no part in any conduct to manipulate votes in this area. He states that the poll in his Battalion was conducted in accordance with the provisions of the Election Act and makes a categorical denial of the suggestion that there was any violation of the Election Law in his poll.

Might I say in regard to all those officers and in regard to the matter as to opening of the bags, that every officer was indignant, and had a right to be indignant, at the broad insinuation, unbacked by any substantial proof, that he had been conniving at improper work and conduct in taking the soldiers' vote at the front. Many affidavits have been taken. I shall not read as many as my hon. friend (Mr. Copp). I shall read this one in connection with the ballot bags:

I, Henry Percy Gorst, Deputy Presiding Officer for the 3rd C.C.D., Seaford, Sussex, having a personal knowledge of all matters hereinafter referred to, make oath and say as follows:

(1) I did not possess the key of bag No. B 218—

This is one of the bags which was thrust on one side because, it was stated, it had been manipulated.

—and it was not opened at any time during the time it was in my custody as Deputy Presiding Officer. When the poll was closed, said bag was under lock and key, or under charge of the quarter guard.

(2) All the ballots which were inserted in said bag were inserted by me through the slit made for that purpose.

(3) I am of opinion that envelopes rolled for the purpose of being placed in the ballot bag, would become unrolled and would be flattened out by the weight of other ballots.

(4) As far as my poll is concerned, everything was strictly carried out in accordance with the Military Voters Act, and in accordance with instructions issued by the Overseas Clerk of the Crown in Chancery for Canada.

Sworn to at London in the County of London, this 10th day of January, 1918, before me.

Walter Jarvis, H. P. Goret,
A Commissioner for Oaths. Major.

That is a sample of many others, and I should like to say that, from my examination of the documents in question and from listening to my hon. friend's remarks, I have absolutely failed to see that there was any sufficient evidence in connection with this matter to impugn the honour and good faith of a large number of His Majesty's officers in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces who were trying to do their duty. I shall, however, speak a little more about this matter of the bags because a good deal of stress has been laid upon it by my hon. friend. There were cases submitted. There was nothing to indicate in many cases that the bags had been opened. It was urged that the best proof that they had been tampered with or opened was the fact that a number of those envelopes that were put in had become unrolled, flattened out and folded together, and looked, therefore, as though they had been put in at one time and subsequently to the proper day of voting. It is quite obvious that, as soon as envelopes containing ballots were dropped into a bag, they would become unrolled, and that many would gradually fit or fold together, as bags were hung up and, after the voting, put aside for weeks probably with other bags of considerable weight on the top of them. Naturally in such a case a number of the envelopes would become pressed or folded together. In any case if a deputy presiding officer had allowed a few envelopes to collect, folded them together and inserted them in the bag at the same time, and even did so (not through the very small aperture provided for that purpose, but pushed them through the chained and locked mouth of the bag, which might not have been perfectly tight), there would have been nothing decidedly illegal about that, as all such instructions in the Act as to how the envelope should be inserted, etc., were directory only. It would have been permissible to put the envelope in an open bag, or through the opening if a chained and locked bag. The instructions were not compulsory. But, however, there is no reason for believing that every envelope was not inserted through the aperture made for that purpose. I want to put this on record. When a few bags had been laid aside on the grounds above stated, Colonel Purney caused the deputy presiding officers affected to be brought to London in order that the facts might be ascertained.

But this became a habit, and in England Mr. Preston, or other gentlemen acting under him, began to urge that every bag looked as if it had been tampered with, and they not only objected to those bags being counted, but went the length of insisting that every bag should have the reason for its having been thrust aside marked on it; further that the bag should be opened and that there should be marked on every envelope the reason for that bag having been set aside as being no good and even that the envelopes should be opened and the ballots so marked. If that practice had been pursued there would have been no such thing as an election and Parliament would not have sat here until the summer. The thing was so absurd and obviously for the purpose of delay that I do not wonder at the Overseas Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in London becoming impatient. He took advice on this matter, because he could see where it was leading to, and he sent this telegram dated January 22, to Mr. O'Connor, General Returning Officer, in this country:

PRIORITY.

W. F. O'Connor, c/o Secretary of State, Ottawa.

Special Returning Officers and Clerks in London disagreed as to the allocating of several bags. Reasons given under section 12 sub-section 8 because after said bags had been opened and examined rolls of ballots were found therein in three's, four's and sixes' which apparently had not been inserted through slits provided in section 2 (A). The exterior appearance of said bags was not questioned. The matter was submitted to me in accordance with your Order in Council and I decided that the contents of bags should be allocated. Preston and the Opposition Special Returning Officers and Clerks questioned the validity of my decision and of said Order in Council. They however, have reluctantly agreed to accept it but purpose endorsing the bags and every envelope contained therein with their objections and reasons, etc. They also intend to put the same endorsement on ballots to identify them. This will prolong the allocating indefinitely. I have endeavoured to handle the situation diplomatically and have succeeded in many points but the same vital disagreement between the parties still exists and unless something drastic is done immediately there will be a deadlock which will seriously handicap the expedition of the work in hand and prolong it indefinitely. Preston and several of the Opposition Special Returning Officers are doing everything they can to delay proceedings. Others are trying to hold on to a good job as long as possible and are raising every imaginable technically many of which are frivolous. Could not an Order in Council be passed more fully explaining section 12 subsection 8 and the Order in Council to the effect that the clause "appears to have been opened" refers to some illegal opening which is apparent on the face of the bag and not because of any condition of contents, and that where a decision is made by me in regard to a bag the endorsement of disapproval of such decision by any Special Returning Officer or Clerk must be made on the bag alone, and the only endorsement of disapproval which can be made on an envelope is where a decision has been given with regard to the endorsement, illegal opening of envelope, or the certificate, etc., on same and on the ballot where a decision has been given re the marking, defacing, rejecting, etc., of said ballot. In your cable of 31st ultimo you mentioned a plan which you had in mind regarding the limiting of proceedings. Do you think such a scheme quite legal and if so will you more fully outline it.—Purney.

To that the general returning officer in Canada replied by cable on January 24th, as follows:

Colonel Purney,
47 Victoria Street,
London.

Clerk Crown Chancery, Deputy Minister Justice and self all concur that provision re polling in locked bags merely directory. Your ruling correct. Further, several envelopes may be inserted in bag at one time. Also quite easy for several envelopes to interlock after depositing in bag. Neither Act nor Order in Council require supplementing to authorize you to forbid course proposed by Opposition counting officers. Bag being opened, contents must be counted if envelopes do not appear to have been opened and if certificate in order. Endorsement of objections must be of objections particularly referable to bag or envelope or ballot for reason based on some term of Act which explicitly deals with bag, envelope or ballot as case may be, and you must not permit such frivolous endorsements as threatened. Provisions as to apparent openings clearly refer only to opening in perpetration of fraud. Inform all concerned that business must be expeditiously wound up and cable me names of all who continue obstructive tactics, whereupon I will advise immediate removal and repeal under the War Measures Act of present provisions and substitution of sufficient number of persons recommended by you to finish operation. Having no trouble whatever here and not necessary to put up with any nonsense overseas. Name for me date when you consider reasonable men of sufficient number can finish operation. Cannot continue to pay officers indefinitely who will not reasonably perform their duties, as every officer here is doing. Are you successfully locating voters' proper ridings, and if not can I further help? Pay of counting officers overseas when appointed should start from time reporting unless special circumstances justify payment from time of setting out to perform duties. All new counting officers recommended your cables appointed. Leader Opposition nominated N. G. Charlton, vice Powell, so if position still vacant swear Charlton in.

O'Connor.

That telegram sets forth the facts very well. I would point out to my hon. friend and the House that the policy which was adopted by the chief scrutineer and many of his subordinate officers was to insist on very slight evidence that bags had been tampered with and envelopes inserted in an improper manner, and yet precisely the same operation which took place in England took place here and took place also in France, and we never had a word of complaint, practically speaking, in France or Canada. The same objections, it is true, were raised in Canada, but after examination and after consultation bags were set aside, though not to anything like the same number, and afterwards a general agreement was come to and the votes were counted. It is perfectly plain that the whole object over there was to set aside an indefinite number of bags, and an effort was made to delay in a most extraordinary and unjustifiable way the progress of the whole election. My hon. friend adduced as a reason that there was a conspiracy the fact that three or four envelopes of different dates were rolled together, and he argued that that was proof they had been put in improperly. I would say it proved just the contrary, because it would have been stupid for a man who wanted to do such a thing as that to put together envelopes of different dates. Such a man would have been clever enough to make them all of the same date, so as to avoid being detected. I do not think I need delay the House any longer on that point.

My hon. friend has said that a great number of the soldiers voted twice. It is quite possible that some of the soldiers voted twice. I think it has been quite possible in any election for a number of men to vote twice; you cannot always stop these things. But in regard to the military voters, if any of them did vote twice, wherever that was detected both votes were rejected, and I think my hon. friend ought to know that. In regard to personating, I am not here to argue whether there was personating or not. I think it would be very difficult to trace out innumerable points of alleged irregularities in an election of such extraordinary difficulties as the one held last December. I am not saying whether personating was or was not done, but I am here to say that there was no double voting or personating to the extent that would justify my hon. friend in assuming that there was a dark and deep-laid conspiracy on the part of somebody unknown to do all these things.

I would point out, in closing, that the one obvious thing that sticks out in this whole matter is, that all these objections, all these charges and all these insinuations of deep and dark conspiracies, come from one place, from England. They do not come from France, and they have not been alleged in regard to Canada; and yet, I repeat, the administration by the election officials was carried on in precisely the same way, under precisely the same rulings and decisions in all three places, England, Canada and France. I would also like to emphasize again this fact in regard to the futility, to my mind, of wasting the time of the House on a subject of this kind in the manner my hon. friend has wasted it; the soldiers were so overwhelmingly in favour of conscription that the matters my hon. friend refers to are a mere bagatelle, an infinitesimal grain of sand, so far as they affect the general results of the mandate of the people as expressed in the last election.

My hon. friend knows that from 90 to 95 per cent of the votes of soldiers that were counted, to say nothing of those that were rejected, were in favour of this Union Government and of conscription. As to what the feeling of the soldiers was, I particularly remember that during my election I went down to a certain station in British Columbia to meet 330 soldiers who had just come back from France. We were in the middle of the election and we were naturally anxious to know what the real feelings of the soldiers was in this grave national crisis. One man who got off the train was a stalwart Highlander of about 45 years of age, who had been at the front since 1914. I asked him if he knew what the general views were of the Union Government and of conscription. "Well," he said, "I do not know anything about Union Government, but as regard the other matter, while I am not able to speak with regard to the feeling in England, I can say that every man who has been in France is in favour of conscription and against prohibition." I have nothing to say about his views with respect to prohibition, but I got from him an impression of the strength of feeling that existed. What is it after all that has inspired the general attitude—what is it that has inspired my hon. friend in regard to England? It is impossible to avoid the conclusion that it is the personality of the chief election agent of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, Mr. Preston. He raised, all through the conduct of affairs the most strenuous objection to the administration of the Act, to the officials and to everybody engaged in carrying out the Act, and he has hinted at and charged irregularities all along the line. He has made allegations of wholesale fraud which have not been substantiated, and he has made very strong charges about the unjustifiable partisanship that existed. I do not know that the gentleman in question is a very bad judge of partisanship. I do not think that anybody who knows the history of that gentleman will deny that he is a fairly strong partisan. It is no wonder that this type of man should be looking around all over England for some mysterious machine for running the election because he no doubt believes that is the way elections are run. He probably knows something about it, and he has a good deal of suspicion of other people with regard to election frauds.

I have alluded to one or two things that the hon. gentleman said in connection with that matter, but I would like to point out that Mr. Preston does show suspicion and my hon. friend does show suspicion of the work that was done in England by those who were responsible for the administration of this Act. My hon. friend while reading innumerable affidavits read one of a gentleman named Mr. D'Arcy. It appears that Mr. D'Arcy was told that he would be sent right off to the front if he did not vote for Union Government, but he said he was going to vote for Laurier, that his father and his grandfather and his whole family had voted for my right hon. friend and that nothing could swerve him from his determination to vote for Laurier. He would vote for Laurier and was against conscription. In the face of that statement and having in mind the source from which it emanated I desire to tell the House that I hold in my hand a newspaper bearing date December 11, 1917. It is a newspaper called the Penrith Observer, a well known Welsh newspaper, and in a corner of that paper there appears, in large type, an advertisement addressed, "To the Canadian Overseas Forces". This is signed by "W. T. R. Preston, on behalf of the Liberal candidates." How does the House think this advertisement is worded, and what is the heading? In big black letters, "Vote for Sir Wilfrid and Conscription and a Leader You can Trust."

See his statement at Ottawa, (London Press, Nov. 29th) in which he declares he will not ask Parliament to repeal the Compulsory Service Act. Training will therefore go on which will furnish a full quota of reinforcements.

Here is a man who is supplying my hon. friend with his ammunition, most of it based on the flimsiest evidence and talking about partisanship and everything of that kind, publishing over his own signature in a British paper an appeal to the soldiers to "vote for Laurier and conscription" under the theory and belief that he will delude the soldiers into believing that if they supported my right hon. friend they would be voting in favour of conscription. This advertisement was published in face of the fact that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition told the people of the West that he was not in favour of conscription. Lots of my right hon. friend's friends in the West had a very loyal and affectionate regard for him and they gave him, as we Unionists gave him, a real welcome on account of his personality when he came to the West. There was no lack of courtesy there. There were a great many men who had suspended judgment upon my right hon. friend and who, although they approved of conscription, and rather approved of Unoin Government, hesitated to withhold their votes from my right hon. friend because they believed that he had been maligned in the party press, and that he had not said what he was reported to have said in regard to conscription. My right hon. friend came there and told them where he stood. They went away with bowed heads and said: "There is nothing for us to do but to leave him and to vote for Union Government, because he has put his position plainly before us." What was it that he put before us? He said that he was against conscription. It is true he said that he would not repeal the Act, but he would suspend the operation of the Act, return to the voluntary system, take a referendum of the people and go out to the people himself and appeal against the whole theory of conscription. In the face of that here is this man putting an advertisement in a British paper and asking the soldiers who are fighting our battle in Europe, who believe that conscription was the only way to get the necessary reinforcements to oppose the Hun, to "vote for Laurier and conscription." If that is the authority to which my hon. friend appeals, I must say that he is discredited by that authority's own announcements.

I have to apologize to the House for speaking so long, but I want to close with this testimony. I think my hon. friend was rather unfortunate in his somewhat vague denunciation of everybody connected with the administration of the Act, and in suggesting that the officials were more or less cognizant of those things which he charged, that they tolerated and connived at them. It may be a surprise to the House to know that the gentleman who advertised this appeal in that way is the person who supplied my hon. friend with his ammunition and supplied him, I presume, with those lengthy lists of names, which really need not have been put on Hansard, because they did not substantiate anything in connection with this matter. This same gentleman wrote a letter and I am going to read it. This is a letter to Colonel Purney in reply to the suggestion, and it is dated November 23, 1917:

National Liberal Club,
Victoria Street,
London, S.W.I.
November 23rd, 1917.

My dear Colonel Purney,—

In reply to the suggestion that the advertisement in to-day's issue of Canada might possibly be interpreted or taken as a reflection upon your position as assistant clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and your staff, permit me to say that the reference to officers is entirely in regard to those who had received instructions from the Government at Ottawa to canvass and organize the overseas forces on behalf of the Government, and to do their utmost to secure the election of the Government candidates in certain constituencies, a list of which instructions had been given should be placed in their hands.

Speaking on behalf of the Liberal candidates I desire to say that instead of there being a suspicion that you would not act impartially, there is, without exception, a unanimous opinion that your integrity is unimpeachable, and that you will discharge your duties with the most strict impartiality, and that no partiality on the part of any of your appointees will be tolerated by you.

With much respect, believe me,

Yours very truly,

(Sgd.) W. T. R. PRESTON.

That is Mr. Preston's opinion of Lieut.-Colonel Purney. I would like also to read a letter from General Currie addressed to Lieut.-Colonel Purney, as follows:

Canadian Corps Headquarters,
22nd January, 1918.

Dear Colonel:

I acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 4th instant, and beg to thank you for what you have said with reference to the manner in which the polling of the vote of the Canadian soldiers was carried on in the Corps. It was a matter of great pleasure to me that Major Gibson, your representative here, had such a thorough grasp of the situation, and that he was most heartily in sympathy with my desire to have every soldier given an opportunity to vote, to have the Act fairly explained to that soldier, and to have the election clean. These things we were able to accomplish, and when those votes are counted I know our pleasure will be greater still.

Ever yours faithfully,
(Sgd. A. W. CURRIE,
Lt. General Commanding
Canadian Corps.

Now I desire to read a letter from General Turner to Lieut.-Colonel Purney:

Canadian Headquarters,
London, 7th January, 1918.

Dear Colonel Purney,—

It has been a great pleasure working with you during the trying period of the election.

You have been considerate, and asked for only what was necessary to carry out efficiently your important duties for Canada.

I will have conveyed to the officers concerned your appreciation of their assistance.

Trusting the count will be taken without undue worry,

Believe me,

Faithfully yours,
(Sgd.) R. E. W. TURNER.

I have only to say in closing, that to those who are chiefly concerned in this matter, any difficulties, any irregularities, or any breach of the technicalities of the law, which have occurred,—and which must necessarily occur to some extent in any election, and which it would be impossible to avoid in an election so extraordinary as that which has just taken place,—have not been sufficient to justify the general and broad charge of conspiracy that my hon. friend has made, and on the whole I think this House will agree with me, that as far as the administration of the Act goes, and as far as regards the fulfilment of the purpose which the Government and this House had in mind,—namely, to give the military electors of Canada, and all those who are fighting our battles, a fair right to express their opinion in regard to the destinies of this country,—I think that purpose was fulfilled with few blemishes and with an honest and sincere desire on the part of the officials to carry out their duties, and I think with a reasonable and fair measure of success.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères): Mr. Speaker, I was not at all surprised to-night when I saw the Secretary of State (Mr. Burrell) rise, to answer in the name of the Government the charges made by my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Copp) on the military vote. No one else in the Cabinet could have replied, as the hon. minister is probably the only Simon-pure on this subject, and probably the only member of the Government who did not commit himself last year when the Military Voters Bill was discussed in the House. Looking through Hansard, I find that the Secretary of State did not speak on this question on that occasion. The other members of the Government, if I am right, did commit themselves, but, Sir, how differently. Some of those hon. gentlemen, like the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) indignantly repudiated the idea that frauds could be committed in relation to the Act, or that it could be used in the interest of the Union Government. But others, like the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) and the present Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Maclean) denounced the Act in question most vigorously. I have not time to read the whole of their utterances, but it may be of some interest to the House to quote just one extract from the speech of the Acting Minister of Finance, which I find at page 4716 of the Revised Hansard of last year:

Subsection 2 of section 3 requires that a voter, on presenting himself, must state the electoral district wherein he last resided, during a restricted period at least. Then there is another provision to the effect that if he cannot state or specify a residence he shall be deemed an elector from such electoral district as he may indicate. Supposing he had never been in Canada prior to his enlistment. Imagine the case of his proceeding overseas the day after he enlisted. Theoretically at least he would not know the name of a single electoral district in Canada. Take a case put to me after six o'clock this evening by a member of this House whose next opponent is an officer commanding a Canadian regiment in France. Say that, of 1,000 men, 999 came from the colony of Newfoundland and the British West Indies, and that they did not know any of the electoral districts of Canada; it would be quite evident that they could not state the electoral district in which they resided continuously for a certain period in Canada, because they had never resided here. They could not indicate any electoral district to which they desired their vote allocated. What would be the consequence? They would be entirely under the domination of their commanding officer. I do not say that would happen, I have no fear whatever of any improper influence being exerted in the taking of these votes overseas. But I submit that, when you point out the possibilities for the exercise of improper influences, you thereby point out fundamental weaknesses in the Bill, and we, as representatives of the people, seriously considering an important piece of legislation, are bound to take that into consideration.

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, it is necessary to reply to the speech of my hon. friend the Secretary of State, because at the beginning of his remarks he stated that even if all the charges made by the hon. member for Westmorland were true, it did not matter, because the Union Government was elected without the military vote. To such a conception of political morality, Mr. Speaker, it is useless to answer. I may say, though, that my hon. friend was right when he stated candidly that in his opinion there was a universal impression that the military voter could apply his vote in any constituency he desired. It is an admission, indeed, that when the Government secured the passage of this Act last year, and when the present Minister of Public Works and the Acting Minister of Finance denounced it, expressing their fear that the Government could use that vote for improper purposes, my hon. friends who are now on the treasury benches, but who were then on this side of the House, were right in the fear to which they gave expression.

The Secretary of State has seen fit to make a charge against a son-in-law of Mr. Preston. I am not aware of the facts which he has related, but it seems to me that the making of such an accusation is a pretty good reason why we should have an inquiry. The Secretary of State will then have ample opportunity to air his charges properly and legally, and we, on this side, will not prevent him from punishing the guilty whether the man is a Liberal or a Unionist. My hon. friend also said that there were no accusations from Canada or France, but only from England. Let me tell him that it is not my intention--

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: The Secretary of State has left the chamber.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: His friends will tell him what I say. Let me state that it is not my intention to review the votes cast generally by the soldiers overseas or in North America, because I have not made a study of that vote. But the present discussion gives me the opportunity of bringing before the House a special case of conspiracy carried out, not overseas, not in France, or in England, but in the military barracks at St. Johns, Quebec, during the last general election, which only emphasizes the necessity of having an inquiry in relation to the whole military vote. I have tried, Mr. Speaker, unsuccessfully since the beginning of the session, to bring this matter up, and in this connection let me assure the Secretary of State that my ammunition does not come from the source which he dislikes so much. On the 16th of last month I placed on the Order Paper a motion calling for:

A copy of envelopes Nos. 8, 10, 11, 12, 13, 15, 17, 19, 20, 21, 22, 39, 53, 56, 59 and 99, polling booth No. 9, Barracks of St. Johns, Quebec, used in the Federal Election of 17th December last and placed in Military bag No. 446 of the North American Continent Military Votes. Also, a copy of the envelopes Numbers 65 and 70, polling booth No. 4, Barracks of St. Johns, Quebec, used in the Federal Election of 17th December last, and placed in Military bag Number 451 of the North American Continent Military Votes.

To this motion, when I proposed to move it, the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) said, "Stand." On the 22nd of April my motion was still on the Order Paper, and when I was about to proceed with it the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) expressed some doubt as to the possibility of producing the documents asked for, and begged to be allowed to examine more closely into the effect of the motion before it was passed. On 1st May the motion was called again and the Minister of Justice stated that the reasons he had given on April 22nd appeared sufficient to refuse the production of such papers. However the motion was again allowed to stand. My next move was to drop the motion, believing that, perhaps, the phraseology was not regular. I had asked for the production of documents, which had been placed in ballot bags. I was informed later on that the documents had been taken from those ballot bags and placed in ballot boxes. Therefore, I put in another motion asking for the same envelopes, papers and documents that had been originally put into ballot bags, but later on had been transferred to ballot boxes. To the latter motion the Prime Minister again said "Stand." Finding that the Government was unwilling to grant my request, I said: Since the Government does not seem disposed to grant this motion, as I believe they should, I shall withdraw it, but I give notice that I will bring the matter before the House at the first opportunity. This is the subject which I wish to bring up to-night. It is with a great deal of reluctance, Mr. Speaker, that I bring it forward, and I must say that before taking this step I gave the question very careful consideration. My election not having been disturbed by the unnamed and unheard conspiracy that I will relate, I have nothing to gain personally by disclosing it. Had it not been for the pressure that was exercised upon me to stifle the matter, I, perhaps, would not have realized as clearly as I do now that it is an imperative obligation on my part towards my country, and a necessity in the interest of the honour of our gallant army, to disclose, fearless of the threats made to me, the regrettable incidents which took place at the barracks of St. Johns, Quebec.

Before presenting the facts, Mr. Speaker, I want to state emphatically that I do not want to cast any discredit on the army, and especially on the privates. Nay, It is my unswerving desire to protect the soldiers from the immoral and perverse influence of damnable officers which prompts me to bring this matter up. I wish to demonstrate that, in a particular instance, at any rate, the hon. Prime Minister was labouring under a grave delusion when he stated on the opening day of the session that never since Confederation was an election in Canada conducted more fairly and decently than the recent one. The Prime Minister on the same occasion reproached the hon. leader of the Opposition for having suggested the existence of a plot or conspiracy in connection with the soldiers' votes in Canada. I am afraid that another of the delusions of the right hon. gentleman will be shattered, because I will lay before this House the proof of that conspiracy.

My opponent in the last election was the former Deputy Speaker of this House, and he knew from the outset that he could not be elected by the civil or military voters of the county of Chambly-Verchères. He stated so publicly; he did not hide it. He boasted of it. He told his constituents, and his partners and friends told his constituents, that even if he required two thousand soldiers' votes he would get them. Surely he had sacrificed enough for the Government, his solemn word, his province, his honour. They were to see that he was to be returned by any means, even if it was against the desire of the majority of the electors of the county. The Military Voters Act of 1917, with its intentional loopholes and ambiguities, was there to carry out his intentions. In the little town of St. Johns, Quebec, in the county of St. John-Iberville, some twelve hundred men were stationed in the barracks, training for overseas service as the "Engineers' Training Depot." Their commanding officer was Lieut.-Colonel W. W. Melville, who was born in Peel, near Woodstock, had lived for a while in Florenceville, near Woodstock, was residing at Woodstock at the time of his enlistment. The major of the corps was Major T. C. Keefer, of Ottawa, and to them and to other officers of the Engineers went my opponent for his well-prepared and well-mapped out scheme to secure election to this House, even against the will of the electors. The idea was to get the 1,200 men to vote for the Unionist candidate in the electoral district of Chambly and Vercheres. I do not know what happened between the officers of the Engineers' Training Depot and the Unionist candidate and the Unionist organization, or what conversation took place between them; inquiry into the matter would probably reveal many unsavory incidents. I know that the officers of the Engineers' Training Depot were convinced and decided that my opponent should get the 1,200 votes; so they went to work. A banquet was given to the men in the barracks, and I can assure you that the flag of war-time retrenchment was not flying on that occasion. Political speeches besides many good things other than those cherished by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell)—such as grape juice, ginger ale, and coca cola—were indulged in. Placards containing a picture of my opponent and an urgent appeal in his favour were liberally posted around the barracks. The power of persuasion to say the least, of the officers towards their subordinates was played to the limit, in absolute violation of the King's regulations and Orders. But besides the banquet and the speeches by the candidates and the verbal power of persuasion employed on that occasion, there was published in the barracks, under the authority of the commanding officer, Lieut.-Colonel Melville, a certain newspaper, copies of which I now hold in my hand, called "Knots and Lashings" for the men of the Engineer's Training Depot, in which partisan, political, slanderous articles appeared for the purpose of having the men vote for the Unionist candidate in Chambly and Vercheres. I have in my possession two issues of this paper, one published on December 15, two days before the election, and another on December 17, the day of the election. Allow me first to read a few interesting extracts to prove my assertion. I quote from the issue of December 15, the subtitle of the newspaper:

A Weekly Newspaper, sanctioned by the Officer Commanding, and published by and for the Men of the E.T.D., St. Johns Quebec, Canada. Volume 1. No. 7.

This paper, therefore, was published purposely for the elections, the first issue appearing five or six weeks before December 17th. After the extra edition published on December 17th, the paper appeared no more in St. Johns.

Mr. MURPHY: The war was won.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I repeat that this paper was published and distributed throughout the barracks against the King's regulations and orders, which provide that no political meeting shall be held or political publication distributed in barracks where soldiers are quartered. This issue of December 15th, page 12, has also the following:

One vital issue. For the first time in the history of Canada public opinion is sharply divided on a single, vital issue. Shall we or shall we not send reinforcements to those heroic Canadians, who, during the past three long years, have played such a gallant part in making it possible for you and for me to live in safety and in comfort?

On the one hand are those indomitable Canadian battalions which, at Ypres and St. Julien, at Messines, Vimy and on numberless bloody fields have brought immortal fame to the name of Canada.

On The Left Hand—

And on the other side what do we find? Cowardly mobs who, at Sherbrooke, at Montreal, at Quebec and at a score of other places, have attempted and still attempt to impose German brutality and mob violence on the people of Canada; Germans and avowedly pro-Germans who at Kitchener and elsewhere, have attempted to disgrace the name of Canada in the eyes of the world; slackers who would stand idly by and see their women folk suffer the unspeakable fate of the women of France and Belgium rather than play a man's part beside the heroes who are to-day fighting their battles.

In the past, in civil life, you have been accustomed to choose your friends and associates; your selection has reflected your true character. Now you are confronted by a choice of supremest importance.

And what will be your choice?

Will you by your vote identify yourself with pro-Germans, Germans and slackers, or will you honour yourself by taking a man's place behind the heroes in the trenches?

It must be one thing or the other. THERE IS NO MIDDLE COURSE.

I may add that on page 16 there appears a picture of Sir Robert Borden. I quote from page 1 of the extra edition published on December 17, the day of the election:

A weekly newspaper sanctioned by the Officer Commanding and published by and for the men of the E.T.D., St. Johns, Quebec, Volume I., No. 7. Extra.

On the first page appears a picture representing a Canadian soldier casting his vote. There is one ballot box called "Union" where soldiers are lined up, and there is another ballot box called "Opposition," where there is a soldier maiming women and children. Is it not a disgrace that such publications should be distributed, especially in barracks where soldiers are training for overseas service? From the second page of this issue, referring to the soldier, this article says:

Does he realize that in voting for the Opposition he is voting for a "party" which has nothing but rash promises to offer?

Does he realize that in voting for the Opposition he is voting for procrastination, while our Canadian boys at the front are in need of reinforcements?

Does he realize in voting for the Opposition he is protecting the sleek slacker, the miserable "skunk" who will shelter behind all manner of excuses rather than go out and do a man's work?

Does he realize that he is offering sanctuary to this class of individual who, if Canada was immediately threatened, would no doubt act in the same manner?

That is their cry: "Canada is not in need of defence"—"Canada is not threatened by the Hun."

You poor shortsighted, misguided fools—small wonder you cry in that manner. Your scope of vision is so narrow that it is piteous to believe man could be so puny. Remember Edith Cavell, the Lusitania, the Belgian massacres. Remember Louvain and a thousand more acts of frightfulness. You, as a soldier, as a part of this great Empire, can only have one right point of view. Sink your petty grievance, take a broader look at the situation, use your vote as a bullet against the Hun and your duty will have been well done at the poll.

Mark these words:

If you vote for the Opposition, you are not fit to wear the uniform; you are not fit to live with your comrades; you are a traitor.

Another page is adorned with the picture of the ex-Deputy Speaker of this House. I do not know if the ex-Deputy Speaker has a press representative with as much literary experience as the private secretary of the President of the Privy Council. I do not know if there was a man by the name of Donald Hunt who was writing those articles, but they are just as laudatory as the articles we have read in the Toronto Globe. On this page I read the following and every one can see the photograph:

Here is a Good Man to Vote for Monday.

J. H. Rainville, Esq., LL.B., M.P., is an attorney of some distinction. He is at present Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, and is slated as a Cabinet member in the prospective "Union" Government.

My hon. friends who sit on the treasury benches must be glad that I defeated J. H. Rainville:

Here is one of three French Canadian public men who have had the courage of their better opinions in refusing to associate with the pro-German element.

Blondin, Sevigny and Rainville are names that will go down with fame and honour in the annals of Canada, when those who are to-day flocking to the Opposition banner, to protect the slacker and help the German, will not be able to lift their heads in decent society.

Might I digress a moment in reminding you, Sir, that three days after the election the Toronto Saturday Night, speaking of Mr. Blondin and Mr. Sévigny, said that now that the Union Government was safe, they were glad that Blondin and Sévigny were not returned, because the furniture would be safer in Ottawa. The article continues:

These men are for a real Canada—a Canada for all; and, what is more to the point just now, they stand for Union against pro-German; for Union against slackers; for Union and the soldiers' weal, at this critical stage of Canada's history. J. H. Rainville was born in Ste. Angele, Quebec, March 8, 1875 educated at the Seminary St. Marie de Monnoir, taking his degree of B.A. He contested the Vercheres seat in 1908 and was defeated, but was elected for Chambly-Vercheres in 1911.

I wish hon. members to note the following sentence:

He is a lieutenant in the 85th Regiment, which appointment he has held for ten years.

I wonder where is the slacker. I wonder how this appeal could be made to soldiers, telling them that Rainville would go against the slackers when he was an officer for ten years and yet saw fit to stay at home instead of going overseas.

Your vote can put this excellent French Canadian in. The Union Government will be strengthened by the addition of this candidate. Do not make any mistake.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is in the extra.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Yes, that is in the extra. There is more of this:

Now is your opportunity to avenge Kitchener and Sherbrooke. In voting for the Union Government at this election you will not only be providing for the soldier, but you will register your disapproval of the mob methods practised by the German and pro-German in Kitchener, and the slacker and pro-German at Sherbrooke. Such mob methods are a disgrace to a country boasting of its democracy and which also allows the privilege of free speech. Imagine, if you can, a country governed by such as these. With the reins of power in their hands we would be ruled by laws of brutality; we would have "Kultur" and mob violence, instead of sane, progressive government. Remember this when casting your vote. Remember your comrade when casting your vote—and remember that over eighty per cent of your comrades in France and Flanders have voted solid for Union Government. Go to the polls and register for Union Government.

Section 430 of the King's Regulations and Orders for the Canadian Militia, 1917, reads:

An officer or soldier is forbidden to institute or take part in, any meetings, demonstrations or processions for party or political purposes in barracks, quarters or camps.

It is useless for me to add anything to convince you, Sir, of the flagrant breach of discipline on the part of the officers and men of the E. T. D. of which I have spoken. But you will certainly be astounded when I tell you, Sir, that not one of the 1,200 men stationed in the St. Johns barracks had ever resided in the electoral district of Chambly-Verchères; that all the officers and nine-tenths of the men had resided in Canada before enlistment, and that quite a number of the men were not even British subjects. Indeed, the first question that will come to your mind will be: What was the purpose of all this work, this undue influence, these banquets, these speeches, this expense, if those men could not, under the Military Voters' Act, cast their votes in the electoral district of Chambly-Verchères? Surely a candidate is not foolish or stupid enough to conduct such propaganda amongst voters who will not be able to cast their votes for him. That is what struck me when, a month before the election, I heard of the banquet, the placards, the speeches and the accompanying paraphernalia that was going on at St. Johns, Que. I beg to direct your attention to the Military Voters' Act, 1917. Section 3 reads:

(1) Every military elector shall be qualified and entitled to vote at a general election.

(2 If he can state the electoral district wherein he last continuously resided during at least four months of the twelve months immediately preceding his appointment, enlistment, or so particularly specify a place or places within an electoral district whereat during such period of time he so resided that such electoral district can therefrom be ascertained, he shall be deemed an elector of the electoral district so stated or to be ascertained, and his vote shall be applied thereto.

(3) If he cannot state or so specify an electoral district or place wherein he has so resided for the time and within the period mentioned in subsection two but can state an electoral district or so specify a place within Canada wherein he has at any other time resided, he shall be deemed an elector of the electoral district so stated or made ascertainable and his vote shall be applied thereto.

(4) If he cannot, because of non-residence or otherwise, so state or specify, he shall be deemed an elector of, and his vote shall be applied to, such electoral district as he may indicate.

Paragraph (c) of section 9 says:

The voter shall answer under oath, before the Deputy Presiding Officer, the questions set forth in the certificate which is form B in the Schedule. Such certificate shall be endorsed on the envelopes referred to in section five of this Part.

Form B of the schedule has already been read. I wrote to the general returning officer explaining the facts. Mr. W. F.

O'Connor in reply to my letter said there was no possibility of a soldier non-resident in my constituency but who had resided in Canada previous to his enlistment applying his vote in Chambly and Vercheres. But the rumour gained ground that 1,200 soldiers at the St. Johns barracks would apply their votes in Chambly and Vercheres. I took no chances. I had nine scrutineers appointed, one for each poll in the barracks, and instructions were given to the effect that soldiers should be properly sworn, according to law, as to residence. Then not a vote in the barracks could be applied to the electoral district of Chambly and Vercheres and the scheme would fall through. But you will be amazed, Mr. Speaker, to hear as I did on the 18th of December that seventeen officers and about seven hundred men, as shown in my scrutineers' books, applied their votes in Chambly and Vercheres, voting at St. Johns barracks. How could they do it? The law was plain that not one of these soldiers who had not resided in my constituency could cast their vote in Chambly and Vercheres. The only way in which they could apply their votes to that constituency was by not only violating the King's regulations, but by trampling on sections 170 and 172 and 175 of the Criminal Code of Canada dealing with perjury, and I quote these sections not for the lawyers of the House, but for the benefit of the laymen. Section 170 says:

Perjury is an assertion as to a matter of fact, opinion, belief or knowledge, made by a witness in a judicial proceeding as part of his evidence, upon oath or affirmation, whether such evidence is given in open court, or by affidavit or otherwise, and whether such evidence is material or not, such assertion being known to such witness to be false, and being intended by him to mislead the court, jury or person holding the proceeding.

Subornation of perjury is counselling or procuring a person to commit any perjury which is actually committed.

Section 172 says:

Every one is guilty of perjury who,—

(a) having taken or made any oath, affirmation, solemn declaration or affidavit whereby any Act, or law in force in Canada, or in any province of Canada, it is required or permitted that facts, matters or things be verified, or otherwise assured or ascertained by or upon the oath, affirmation, declaration or affidavit of any person, wilfully and corruptly, upon such oath, affirmation, declaration or affidavit, deposes, swears to or makes any false statement as to any such fact, matter or thing.

Section 175 says:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who, being required or authorized by law to make any statement on oath, affirmation or solemn declaration, thereupon makes a statement which would amount to perjury if made in a judicial proceeding.

I have read a few paragraphs from the paper published in the barracks of St. Johns. Now, to prove that the military regulations were transgressed, I shall make a few quotations which are nothing less than subornation of perjury, and let me remind the House that this paper is published under the authority of the commanding officer. My hon. friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Burrell) complained that there was no proof or evidence of a commanding officer inducing his men to vote a certain way, but I believe, after reading this article, he will change his mind. It says:

THE ELECTION.

We go to print on the eve of the election with out watchword—

VOTE FOR UNION.

In another column you will find instructions as to voting.

Every soldier of the C.E.F. has a vote in this election, and that vote is a powerful instrument which, used in a proper manner, can be made to operate effectually. You can size up the situation for yourself.

Ask yourself these questions:—Will your vote be needed in the constituency from which you come? Will your vote, marked for the Government, be the means of putting in a candidate in a constituency where your vote is needed?

Weigh these questions in your mind!

DON'T WASTE YOUR VOTE!

Have your mind made up before you enter the Polling booth. Don't hesitate to place your vote for the Government, in a constituency where it will count.

Mr. MURPHY: Where is the Secretary of State now?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: In the next column is: "A specimen ballot showing the only mark you need to make to convert it into a Win-the-War ballot."

I vote for
I vote for the Government..X
I vote for the Opposition..
I vote for the independent Candidate..
I vote for the Labour Candidate..

Following is this:

Specimen envelope showing how questions may be answered

1. What is your name..... Thomas Atkins.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Is that printed?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: That is printed.

2. What is your rank?.... Sapper. What is your number.. 21144.

3. In what force or service are you?.. Engineers C.E.F.

4. Are you a British subject?.. Yes.

Otherwise he could not have voted.

Have you previously voted at this election?.. No.

5. Where you in Canada when you were appointed, enlisted enrolled or called out on active service?.. Yes or no.

6. Specify the name of the place or places in Canada whereat you last continuously resided during at least four months of the twelve months immediately preceding your appointment, enlistment enrollment, or calling out on active service.. Cannot say.

7. State if you can the electoral district wherein such place or places in which you so resided are situated.. Cannot say.

8. If you cannot specify as required by Question No. 6 or state as required by question No. 7, then state in what electoral district or place within Canada (giving street and number where possible) you have resided at any other time than is referred to in Question No. 6.. Cannot say.

9. If none of your answers to Nos. 6, 7 and 8 specify or state as required thereby, to what electoral district do you desire your vote to be applied Electoral district..... Chambly-Verchères.

Province..... Quebec.

I certify that the above named military elector did this day make to me under oath the preceding set forth answers to the preceding set forth questions.

Dated this.. 7th day of December 1917.

Sgd. P. W. Coles, Capt. C.E.
Deputy Presiding Officer.

What was the result of these appeals and incitements to crime? Was I not right, Mr. Speaker, in telling you in my opening remarks, that never before in this country was there such debauchery of conscience, such unfair and immoral appeals as the ones I have just read? The soldier represents in the mind of the people all that is noble, right and chivalrous; he sacrifices his life and everything he has in the world for the protection of his fellow countrymen, the protection of his women and the honour of his country. But before he embarks to cross the ocean, men without morals, for the sole purpose of fostering political ends, invite him to step on his honour and become a criminal. I have a detailed report of every vote recorded in the nine polls of that parish, of what the commanding officer did, and the result of the conspiracy. The Government has in its hands all the affidavits and votes. My motion was for the production of these envelopes. You will find on these envelopes all the affidavits I have mentioned. I am not surprised, Mr. Speaker, that every time the question which I put upon the Order Paper was called the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice, or some other member of the Government had no other answer than "stands." Seven hundred men perjured themselves; they swore falsely.

Mr. BUTTS: Order.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: They swore falsely.

Mr. BUTTS: Order.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The hon. member for Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Butts) always butts in. I have here the names of the men, the numbers of their regiments, the numbers of the ballots, the name of the returning officer, and the name of the scrutineer. I am not going to give the names of the privates. If an inquiry is granted I will name them, but otherwise I shall not do so, because I believe they have been misled, and although they committed a very reprehensible act, I have some doubt as to their full responsibility. But, Mr. Speaker, the officers who have led them into such actions do not deserve my mercy, nor the mercy of their fellow-citizens, and I shall name them so that the Government will be in a position—

Mr. LEMIEUX: To promote them.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I do not say to promote them, but the Government will be in a position, and that is the wish I express, to withdraw the soldiers from the pernicious influence of these persons. At the beginning of the session I put a question on the Order Paper asking for the names of the officers of the Engineers' Training Depot at St. John during October, November and December, 1917; who were the officers stationed at St. John on the 17th, where did these officers enlist? As my hon. friend the Secretary of State said a moment ago, the place where they enlisted did not mean that they had resided there. I put a further question, which was this:

Where did these officers reside before their enlistment?
Where did these officers reside at the time of their enlistment?

At the head of the list is the name of Lt.-Col. W. Melville, enlisted at Valcartier, P.Q.:

Where did you reside before you enlisted?.. Woodstock, N.B.

I charge here—and I will make good my charge, and if the Government are willing to produce and lay on the table of the House the envelopes I will present the proof now—that Lt.-Col. Melville voted No. 8 in poll No. 9 in the barracks, St. Johns, ballot bag No. 446. Here is what Lt.-Col. Melville said under oath——

Mr. LEMIEUX: He will be made a baron.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: These are the questions and answers:

What is your name?—Col. Melville.

What is your rank?—Colonel.

In what force or service are you?—E.T.D.

Are you a British subject?—Yes.

Were you in Canada when you were appointed, enlisted, enrolled, or called out on active service?—Yes.

Specify the name of the place or places in Canada (giving streets and numbers where possible) whereat you last continuously resided during at least four months of the twelve months immediately preceding your appointment, enlistment, enrollment or calling out on active service?—Can't say.

State if you can the electoral district wherein such place or places in which you so resided are situate?—Can't say.

If you cannot specify as required by question No. 6, or state as required by question No. 7, then state in what electoral district or place within Canada (giving street and number where possible) you have resided at any other time than is referred to in question No. 6?—Can't say.

If none of your answers to questions Nos. 6, 7 and 8 specify or state as required thereby, to what electoral district do you desire your vote to be applied?—Chambly-Verchères.

Mr. MURPHY: Nothing wrong in Canada!

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I understand, Mr. Speaker, that Colonel Melville is well known in the province of New Brunswick. I understand that he was the organizer of the Conservative party in the last provincial election, and some of my hon. friends on the other side of the House can probably give us some light on Colonel Melville.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I should say so.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Now I will not take the time of the House—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MURPHY: Don't omit a thing.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The second name on the list is Major T. C. Keefer. To question No. 3, which I put on the Order Paper: Where did this officer enlist? the answer is Ottawa. 4. Where did this officer reside before enlistment?—Ottawa. And Major T. C. Keefer voted No. 19, in poll No. 9, bag 446. And he answered, "I cannot say" to questions Nos. 6, 7 and 8, and applied his vote to Chambly-Verchères.

Captain R. W. Powell: The answer to the third question: Where did he enlist? is "Ottawa, Ont." Where did this officer reside before enlistment? "Ottawa, Ont." And he voted No. 20, in poll No. 9, bag 446. And he answered to questions 6, 7 and 8, "I cannot say," and he applied his vote to Chambly-Verchères.

Captain J. P. Campbell, of Kingston, in answer to the third question: Where did he enlist? is "Kingston." Where did he reside before enlistment? "Napanee, Ont." He voted No. 56, poll 9, bag 446; and he answered the same way, perjured himself the same way, and applied his vote to Chambly-Verchères, to "win the war."

Captain A. C. Wright: to the third question: Where did he enlist? the answer is "Ottawa, Ont." Where did he reside before enlistment? "Ottawa, Ont." He voted No. 80, poll No. 2, bag 453, and he voted the same way as his friends, perjured himself, answered "I cannot say," to questions 6, 7 and 8, and "Chambly-Verchères" to question 9.

Captain L. Pettigrew: He enlisted at Lindsay, Ont., and before his enlistment resided in Toronto. He voted No. 53, poll 9, bag 446, and with his other friends he committed perjury, and applied his vote in Chambly-Verchères.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And he is from Toronto?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: That is a shame. Lieut R. R. Knight, enlisted at St. Johns, Que.; before his enlistment he resided at Fort William, Ont. He voted No. 65, poll 4, bag 451; and he did the same as the others.

Lieut. D. B. Armstrong enlisted in Ottawa. To my sorrow he resided in Montreal before his enlistment, but bad companionship probably made him perjure himself; and he voted No. 22, poll 9, bag No. 446.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Are any of those votes counted?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I do not know. It makes no difference from the standpoint of morality on this side of the House. It may be that our mentality is not the same on this side of the House as that of my hon. friend.

Lieut. A. T. Adney enlisted at St. Johns, P.Q. He resided before he enlisted at Woodstock, N.B. He voted No. 17, poll 3, bag 446. He swore he had never resided in Canada before he enlisted, and he applied his vote to Chambly-Verchères. The same gentleman is the officer who was demonstrating the other day in the hall of the House of Commons a very well made model of trenches, much according to nature. And after an inquiry from me, he told me that he had never been over at the front.

Lieut. R. M. Trow, of Toronto, enlisted in St. Johns, P.Q.; he had resided in Toronto before his enlistment, and he voted No. 12, poll 9, bag No. 446. He answered, "I cannot say" to questions Nos. 6, 7 and 8, and "Chambly-Verchères" to question 9, like all his friends.

Lieut. H. G. Young has resided before his enlistment at Farran's Point, Ont., voted No. 59 in poll 9, bag 446, and he did like the others, perjured himself and applied his vote to try to help the ex-deputy Speaker of this House—

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Real Union.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: —the future minister. Lieut. H. S. Phillips enlisted in St. Johns, P.Q.; he had resided in Toronto before his enlistment, he voted No. 99, poll 9, bag 446, and he did the same as the others.

Lieut. J. V. Culbert, of Timmins, Ont., voted the same way, and he voted No. 39, poll 9, bag 446.

Mr. MURPHY: How did he swear?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: He swore he had never resided in Canada before his enlistment, and that he wanted badly to put in his vote for Chambly-Verchères, and he did it.

Lieut. H. Blackadder, North Vancouver, B.C. We have some from every province, no province will be jealous. Lieut. Blackadder voted No. 13, poll 9, bag 446.

Lieut. T. Bourget, of Ottawa, Ont., voted No. 10, poll 9, bag 446, and he answered the same way and applied his vote the same way.

Lieut. J. C. Armer, of Toronto, Ont., swore that he had never lived in Canada before enlistment, but he had resided in Toronto, as this paper shows. He voted No. 11, poll 9, bag 446.

Lieut. H. P. Duthie, of Toronto, voted No. 15, poll 9, bag 446, and he had resided in Toronto before his enlistment, and he swore that he had never resided in Canada, and applied his vote in Chambly and Verchères.

Captain H. H. Pinch, of Ottawa, voted No. 21, in poll 9, bag 446; he had resided in Ottawa before his enlistment according to this official document, and at the same time he swore that he had never resided in Canada, and that he wanted to apply his vote to Chambly and Verchères.

These officers, Mr. Speaker, were not satisfied with the preparatory work they had done. They did not think it was sufficient to publish a paper and put up placards and posters in the barracks. But some of them, especially Lieut.-Colonel Melville and the returning officers on the day of the election, saw fit to supervise the voting, and saw that the work was done according to their views and the views of their masters, my opponent, and the Union organization. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will read just three affidavits. I could produce a large number of affidavits, but I have been speaking for quite a long time, and I will read but three.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I will read first the affidavit of Mr. Stanislas Poulin:

I, the undersigned, Stanislas Poulin, advocate and King's Counsel, of the city of St. Johns, in the district of Iberville, in the province of Quebec, do solemnly declare:

1. That on the 17th day of December, 1917, this being the date set for polling at the federal election, I was duly authorized to act and did act as deputy scrutineer in accordance with the Military Voters' Act, at poll No. 8, in St. Johns' Barracks, this being one of the places set to receive the votes of the military voters in Barrack at St. Johns, and especially those belonging to the Engineers Corps.

2. The deputy returning officer at the said poll was Lieutenant H. G. Young.

3. Among 97 military voters who polled their votes at said poll, 63 declared that said vote should apply to the county of Chambly-Verchères.

4. When questions 6, 7 and 8 of Form B of the said Military Voters' Act were put to those 63 military voters their answer was: "I cannot say."

5. Nevertheless most of those 63 voters declared having lived in Canada previous to their enlistment but it was impossible to get the deputy returning officer to enter their full declaration and he satisfied himself with setting down: "Cannot say."

6. The watchword had been generally given to all military voters to give the above answer to the said questions 6,7 and 8, and to mention the county of Chambly-Verchères in answer to question No. 9. The officer commanding the Engineers Depot visited the polls frequently himself and inquired if many of the voters did specify the county of Chambly-Verchères. After his first visit, at about 10 o'clock in the forenoon, when he found out that, in the poll where I was stationed, only a small proportion of the votes had been cast for the county of Chambly-Verchères he said to the deputy returning officer in my presence: "this should work better" (Il faut que ça aille mieux). I immediately discovered and found out during the rest of the day a considerable increase in the number of votes applying to the county of Chambly-Verchères.

7. I saw myself at various places in the barracks posters showing the military voters how to vote and stating the answer "I cannot say" to questions Nos. 6, 7 and 8; and the county of Chambly-Verchères as being the one to which the votes should apply.

8. Among the voters who have thus cast their ballot for Chambly-Verchères and answered to the said questions there are a few who had previously given me their addresses as having always lived in Canada.

9. I begged the deputy returning officer several times to put the questions 6 and 8 in such a way as to be understood so as to get the voters to indicate the place of their previous residence, but to no avail.

10. Several times I also insisted and told the deputy returning officer and the officer commanding the Engineers that I considered that a large number of the said military voters did not seem to understand that their answers constituted a falsehood declared under oath and that it would seem better to advise them as to the importance of such a declaration. That, in my opinion such a declaration constituted a serious offence; that it seemed the duty of the officer commanding to prevent its repetition and the only answer I could obtain to these remarks was the following: "We are in elections."

And I make this declaration solemnly believing it to be true in my soul and conscience and knowing it has the same force and effect as if it were made under oath and under the Evidence Act of Canada (1903). And I have signed Stanislas Poulin.

Declared before me at St. Johns, this 1st day of April, 1918.

N. Lord,
Justice of the Peace.

I have also the affidavit of Charles Romeau, which is as follows:

I, the undersigned, Charles Romeau, accountant, residing on Longeuil street, No. 37, in the city of St. Johns, in the province of Quebec, do solemnly declare:

1. That I have acted as the Liberal agent for Poll No. 2, bag 453, at the St. Johns, Quebec, Barracks, on December 17th, 1917, that is to say when the last Federal Elections took place, and I have no hesitation to say that the military vote was there influenced by improper motives;

2. That my above assertion is based on the fact that out of 83 militaries who have presented themselves to vote, 50 have answered to the 6th, 7th and 8th question "Can't say" and have had their vote applied to Chambly-Verchères;

3. That several events have occurred during the polling to confirm and strengthen to a very large extent the above assertion, and I mention the following ones:

(a) A certain Harris Geo. Henry (No. 5005880), when came the time to say where he intended to have his vote applied to, did not remember the place he was to give it, and Captain Wright suggested at once Chambly-Verchères and the said Harris Geo. Henry answered "Yes";

(b) When A. H. Chapman (No. 527117) came to vote he also did not remember who he was to vote for, and Colonel Melville, who had replaced Captain Wright, forwarded this leading question: "Well, vote for the Government, I suppose?"

(c) Captain Wright also voted for Chambly-Verchères after having said to myself, shortly before, that he was from Ottawa and that his family was living there yet;

[Mr. Archambault]

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath, and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

And I have signed

Chs. Romeau.

Declared before me at St. Johns this 1st day of April, 1918.

N. Lord J.P.

I ask the indulgence of the House while I read another affidavit as follows:

CANADA.
Province of Quebec,
District of Iberville.

I, Charles Bélanger, residing and domiciled at No. 23, St. Charles Street, in the city of St. Johns, in the District of Iberville, Province of Quebec, advocate, do solemnly declare:

1. That, on the last Federal election day, being the 17th of December, 1917, I did act as Deputy Scrutineer representing the Opposition party at Poll No. 7, bag No. 448, located at the Barracks, in St. Johns City aforesaid, Lieutenant H. R. McBeath, acting as Presiding Officer;

2. That out of 77 votes given at this poll, 57 soldiers answered questions numbered 6, 7, and 8 on the voting envelopes by the words "cannot say," and the 9th question by the words "Chambly-Verchères" according to instructions given to them by an "extra" of the newspaper called "Knots and Lashings," published at the barracks under the control of the proper authority;

3. That this "extra" was not for sale to the public as the ordinary numbers of the said newspaper "Knots and Lashings"; but on our journey to the barracks that same morning, my colleague, Mr. Stanislas Poulin, advocate, C.R., of the said City of St. Johns, found a copy of it, showed it to me, and this gentleman must be still in possession of this "extra";

I may say that I obtained this copy of the extra from Mr. Poulin (reading):

4. That I kept track of how questions No. 6, 7, 8 and 9 were answered, as it appears by my notebook marked "A" and signed by me.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath, and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

Declared before me at St. Johns, aforesaid, this twenty-seventh day of April, A.D. 1918.

(Sgd.) Charles Belanger.

(Sgd.) Armand Brosseau, N.P.

I am also in a position to prove, if an inquiry or an investigation is granted, that the vote was open in nearly all the cases. That does not surprise me now, because those hon. gentlemen who were present at the moving picture shown at the Imperial Theatre in this city on Monday last saw plainly on the screen the representation of a soldier voting at the front. The vote was absolutely open. The soldier was handed his ballot and voted openly in front of the returning officer. It is no wonder that the military vote overseas was so largely in favour of the Government.

Other interesting incidents took place in the barracks at St. Johns. Permit me to cite one which is very piquant. In poll No. 9, Private J. Patton, No. 506605, voted No. 100. When he was asked to reply to question No. 6, whether he had resided in Canada four months previous to his enlistment, he hesitated, saying, "Well——." "Answer, please," said the returning officer. "I cannot say," replied the soldier. When question No. 7 was put to him, he hesitated again, and finally said, "I cannot say." In answer to question No. 8 the poor fellow wanted to say where he had resided, but was prevented from doing so by the returning officer, who simply put down for him, "Cannot say." When he was asked question No. 9, as to where he wanted to apply the vote, being an English-speaking gentleman, he found it exceedingly hard to pronounce accurately the French words "Chambly" and "Verchères." Finally, in reply to this question, he said, "Chanly." The returning officer said, "There is no such constituency." Then the poor fellow said "Verchley." The returning officer said, "There is no such place. Why do you not answer? You have to name a constituency." Finally, the soldier said: "May I go to the door and ask the man?" The returning officer answered, "Certainly." The soldier went out the door, and evidently got his information. But as he appeared not to have a very good memory, and thought that he might forget the name in making the little trip from the door to the polling booth, instead of walking right in and answering at the polling booth, he opened the door and said, from where he was, "Chamble-Verch."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MURPHY: An honest election.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: The fairest election ever held.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I assure hon. gentlemen that if an inquiry is granted I shall be able to relate many incidents that will probably bring the same laughter, but which, indeed, in a case of this kind I consider very tragic.

I stated that this conspiracy not only was carried on between my adversary and the officers in question, but was participated in also by the Unionist organization. The reason for my assertion is very simple. The same answer—evasive, snake-like; as we say in French, ni chair ni poisson—was found probably on 10,000 envelopes in all parts of Canada, France, England, Asia, United States. As the member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp) has shown, 200 electors in Quebec voted the same way, applied their vote in Chambly and Vercheres. And they gave a scare to the member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). The member for Quebec South met a couple of Quebec officers stationed at Quebec. Of course, he knew that they were voting, and he asked them how they were voting over there. One of the officers said: "Never mind, Chubby, we will not vote against you. We are plumping our votes against the Liberal candidate in Chambly and Vercheres." Surely all the telepathy in the world could not account for such a coincidence. This answer was well prepared, well devised and studied, and is the morbid result of the unscrupulous, but clever, mind which directed the vote of the Unionist campaign in the last election.

My first intention when I had in my hands the evidence of what took place at St. Johns was to institute criminal proceedings against Col. W. W. Melville and his assistants.

Mr. MURPHY: Do it yet.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I am not making a threat, but I must say it will be my only alternative; that I will lay a complaint if nothing is done by the Government in that regard.

But I wish to point out that I believe it is the duty of the Government to have a thorough inquiry into this matter, not only into what happened in my constituency, but into the whole military vote, and I gladly second the motion made by my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Copp). The Government should be just as anxious—

Mr. McKENZIE: More so.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: —as I am, for the honour and good name of our army, to make a full search into all these facts and to get rid of officers who, instead of giving to their subordinates an example of righteousness, honour and God's fear, fell so low as to perjure themselves, and what is worse, used their influence to induce their men to do so. Sir, officers with that standard of morality are liable to betray their country before the enemy if they ever go to the front, and they should be cashiered at once. Crime is the antithesis of patriotism.

Mr. R. H. BUTTS: Mr. Speaker, at this late hour I do not wish to take up much of the time of the House—

Some hon. MEMBERS: The answer of the Government.

Mr. BUTTS: Ten minutes, I think, will do me to answer all that has been said here to-night. I started in to do a little figuring while the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp) was speaking, and I think I have now got my figures right. I figured that the speech of the hon. member for Westmorland had cost the country, as closely as I could get to the correct amount, valuing the time of hon. members at one dollar an hour and the time of the spectators in the gallery at fifty cents an hour, somewhere in the neighbourhood of $2,350.35. I do not think I would be striking my hon. friend too hard if I said that this House could go up to Sparks street and go into the Woolworth building and get for fifteen cents more knowledge than it has received from my hon. friend from Westmorland. The hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault) gave us quite a little entertainment. He exhibited considerable eloquence, but I think at the same time I would be very slow to tell such a tale about my constituency as he has told about his. He says that in one day there were 700 perjurers in his constituency.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Not in my constituency.

Mr. BUTTS: The hon. member said St. Johns, Quebec; Chambly and Verchères is what he told us about.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: My constituency is Chambly and Verchères, but St. Johns is outside of that constituency. The barracks are situated at St. Johns, Quebec, in the county of St. Johns and Iberville, and not one of the soldiers came from Quebec.

Mr. BUTTS: I accept my hon. friend's explanation, but I recall very distinctly, and I took down the words of the hon. member when he spoke of 700 perjurers in one election. I am proud to say that there are not many to be found in the four constituencies in the island from which I come. I would say, though, that I would be very much better pleased with my hon. friend to-night if, five months after these 700 crimes of perjury were committed in his province, where men went into the polling booths and called Almighty God from His Throne on High to bear testimony to the fact that they were telling the truth, and then made Almighty God a witness of their perjury, he was able to come before the House and say, as a representative of the people, that he had done his best or made some slight effort to bring those criminals to justice. Perjury is the greatest crime against humanity; it strikes at the very basis of justice, and makes null and void the actions of our courts. Yet one of the representatives of our people, from the province of Quebec, five months after those 700 crimes of perjury have been committed, tells us that he may yet be compelled, if this Government does not take action, to take action himself against some of those criminals. I may be mistaken, but I understand my hon. friend to be a lawyer. If I am mistaken, I wish to be corrected. If he understands the very first principles of law, he must know, that, instead of asking this Government, he should apply to his friends in the province of Quebec, to the Attorney General. Our Minister of Justice is not expected, neither is the Canadian Government expected, to look into all the crimes that may be committed down in Chambly and Verchères. Instead of coming here and blackening his own fair province, and particularly his own county, why did he not go himself and bring some of his criminals to justice?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: None of them were from my province.

Mr. BUTTS: If he did not bring his criminals to justice, why did he not appeal to his Attorney General to see that the fair name of his province was not blackened in such a manner, instead of coming here and telling us to-night about the perjuries and the crimes that seem rampant in his constituency?

In that four-hours-and-five-minutes speech that cost this country, apart from the expenses of Hansard and printing, something over $2,300, the hon. member for Westmorland spoke of votes from Sydney Mines and Glace Bay being counted in constituencies in Quebec, and perhaps in Ontario. I do not think that any of my hon. friends have very much right or reason in their cause when they began to complain about the election. They got 62 out of 65 seats in Quebec. How much more do they want? Do they want the world with a fence around it? My hon. friend spoke of Sydney Mines and Glace Bay, and those are two towns above all in Canada that I can speak of with some knowledge. A short time ago I resigned my position of town solicitor and stipendary magistrate of the town of Sydney Mines, a position I had held for nineteen years. In that town of nearly ten thousand people I have three brothers who have been elected as town councillors, and whenever they have run they have never been beaten. There is hardly a man in the whole town that I cannot shake hands with and call by name. My hon. friend has spoken of men from Sydney Mines polling their votes in counties in the province of Quebec. Now, I do not wish to violate the Criminal Code, I do not want to get into trouble for gambling, but if my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Copp) will hand me a list of these men from Sydney Mines I will put a five dollar bill over every name, if he will put another one, and every time I win I take the ten dollars and he can have the ten dollars every other time. I do not think my hon. friend is game enough to take that up. He has either to put up or shut up.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid the language of the hon. member is hardly in conformity with the custom of Parliament.

Mr. BUTTS: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but it did work me up a little bit when my hon. friend spoke of these voters from two towns in my own county. I know there cannot possibly be any justification for it, because I know that every one of those men in Sydney Mines whom he alleges to have voted in the province of Quebec would have been only too glad to use their votes against my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) and every man in Glace Bay would have been only too glad to vote for myself or my colleague, Mr. John Douglas.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): The motion which the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp) has made, he puts before this House under the guise simply of a motion asking for an inquiry into certain matters which he laid before this House at very considerable length this afternoon. He does that, however, by means of a motion in amendment to the motion to go into Supply, which in practical effect means that upon charges, none of them directed against this Government and by none of which he makes any imputation upon any member of this Government or upon any action of this Government, he asks this House to vote want of confidence in this Government. There was open to the hon. gentleman, and it has been open to him throughout this entire session, a perfectly direct method of bringing the charges he has seen proper to bring and asking for the investigation that he desires. He did not choose to avail himself of that method, but at this last moment of the session he makes this motion in the form of a motion of want of confidence, and asks this House in effect to vote want of confidence in the present Government. He interposes between the making and the granting of his request for an investigation the necessity of adopting that vote of want of confidence in the Government. It is needless to say that in adopting that course the conclusion is inevitable that the hon. gentleman could not have expected the acceptance of this motion on the part of this Government, and therefore he could not have hoped by means of this particular motion to arrive at the investigation for which he has asked.

The subject matter in itself is undoubtedly one of great gravity. It is a subject of all subjects, I think, that must be approached, eliminating from its consideration party interest or party advantage, and above all not involving in its decision the fate of a Government which I have no hesitation in saying enjoys the confidence, it is perfectly manifest, of a great majority of the members of this House, and certainly anything that was said this afternoon, whatever may be the truth or the falsehood of the accusations brought against any particular individuals, was not of a nature to shake that confidence. I know of no motion that could be more aptly described as a non sequitur than this particular motion, but, as I have said, the subject matter of this motion is certainly of great gravity. The hon. member who made this motion took up a long period of the time of this House—in what? In bringing most grave and serious charges against men who are our fellow-citizens, men who to-day are not here in this country to make any answer on their behalf to his charges because they are engaged in the great and paramount work of the defence of this country. Now I think that when, as he said—and I assume he was speaking sincerely when he said it—in the performance of what he conceived to be his duty he thought it proper to lay these charges, it was at least incumbent upon him to do it in such a manner as would assure the attainment of the purpose which he states he has in view, and without involving the result which this motion must first attain in order to arrive at the object of an inquiry where these men would be afforded opportunity of reply. The hon. gentleman has made use of an ex parte statement. He tells this House that it rests upon evidence that satisfies him. He does not tell us how long he has been in possession of that evidence. Presumably, it is not yesterday, and he has allowed this session to run through and has not taken the steps that might have been open to him at an earlier period to bring about, perhaps, an immediate investigation.

I do not intend to go into the discussion of the well or ill-foundedness of the charges and accusation made by the hon. member for Westmorland. It would be impossible for any man immediately upon hearing these charges, coming as they came to us this afternoon, to arrive at any satisfactory conclusion not only as to their truth or falseness, but even upon the question as to whether or not there was a prima facie case made out against any of the individuals whom he so seriously impeached. The hon. gentleman asks us to order a judicial investigation not merely of the particular charges that he made, but of the entire taking of the soldiers' votes. The charges he made, as has been pointed out, are entirely charges of misconduct on the part of officers and men, who, at the time they are alleged to have committed these offences, were stationed in England. Many of these men, if not all of them, today, have gone forward. He recognized that himself in his motion because he feels the necessity of withdrawing from the judge whom he asks to have appointed to investigate the power of summoning witnesses whose presence would interfere with the performance of their duties as soldiers.

What is this so-called remedy that he asks for the condition of affairs that he has described? Let me deal with it as he dealt with it, in so far as it would be applicable, in so far as it calls for judicial investigation at the present moment and held in England, into the conduct of the election so far as military voters were concerned, and so far as that election was held in England. I think the House is satisfied, after the exposition of my hon. friend and colleague, the Secretary of State (Mr. Burrell) that in the taking of that election, on the whole, and by and large, it was fairly and honourably conducted. If the particular charges that are made here to-night were true it would not alter the fact that upon the whole, on the evidence we have before us, we are in no position to say that there is ground to suspect that there were any general irregularities throughout that election. Such an investigation in England, at the present time, for the purpose of clearing up these charges which the hon. member for Westmorland would make, must, in the first place, involve the most serious possible inconvenience and interference with the military operations on the other side, an interference and obstruction that could only be justified by its being established that some adequate, effective result would be obtained by that investigation. I did not understand that, by either of the hon. gentlemen who spoke, it was contended that any of the irregularities that they alleged affected in any way either the general result of the election, or even the result of the election in any particular constituency. Had it been so contended, one would naturally have expected that a remedy other than that which is sought by the present motion would have been asked or. I think the form of the present motion goes to confirm the impression gathered from what was said in support of it that there is no contention that either the election as a whole or the election in any particular constituency was affected by the irregularities charged, either upon the other side of the Atlantic or upon this side. Were there any such contention it is obvious that the proposed remedy would afford no correction of any unjustified result in any particular election. What, then, is the purpose that could be obtained? It would be the maintenance of these charges if the hon. gentleman is right in his contention. Is it of sufficient importance that at the present time, with all the difficulties that would be in the way of a satisfactory investigation, with the necessary interference that such an investigation must bring about in the military operations on the other side, we should ascertain whether these charges without affecting in any way the result of any election, are, or are not ill founded?

When the suggestion was made from this side that these alleged offences did not affect the result of the election, we were treated with some expressions as to our standard of morality on this side of the House. I do not think there is implied any suggestion—and certainly on my part there is intended no such suggestion—that because these alleged irregularities and this misconduct, if they took place, did not affect the result of the election, they are not to be seriously condemned. But is it of sufficient importance at the present moment, if this motion be carried, to justify our setting on foot an investigation, which, as I have said, must necessarily be carried on in the face of insuperable difficulties and obstacles which most assuredly must constitute a serious interference with the regular carrying on of military operations? For the reason, therefore, that I have pointed out, I think it is impossible for any one not ready to declare his lack of confidence in this Government, because certain military officers acting as election officers may have misbehaved themselves, to vote for this motion requiring us to order an investigation because the investigation, if it were ordered and held at the present moment, would afford no effective remedy in any way for any wrong or any evil committed by any person in this country or in any constituency of this country by reason of its being represented by one who was not lawfully elected. The only purpose that might be obtained immediately and now, whether certain officers are or are not deserving of condemnation is not a purpose which would justify our resorting to the method which has been suggested, and therefore it seems to me we would clearly not be justified in adopting the present motion, even if it stood as a substantive motion, and in asking for an investigation of the kind that is sought into the operations in connection with the election as held in England and in France.

Now the hon. member for Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Archambault) has laid before us to-night what he claims to know to be facts with regard to the election as it was carried on among the soldiers in the constituency which he represents. It may be —I think it is—perfectly fair to point out when he expresses such grave indignation concerning what he alleges to be the conduct of certain officers in the barracks at St. Johns, and such severe condemnation of those officers in themselves, that he, in possession of all this information—and let me say in that regard that I agree with him, if his statement be true, if his statement be well founded, and I do not mean to suggest that he himself does not believe in their truth—and notwithstanding his indignation against those who, in his belief, are guilty of this very grave misconduct, has retained that information through all these months, and notwithstanding the knowledge that he has had up to this time but has only imparted to us to-night, has never felt that there was any duty upon him to take the proceedings that it was open to him to take to vindicate the law and to impose upon those gentlemen to whom he imputes such very grave misconduct, the condign punishment that their conduct, if they are guilty, would deserve. He referred to the fact that he had moved for the production of certain envelopes used in the election in the county of Chambly-Vercheres, and he was scandalized because it was pointed out to him that under the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act those documents, whether in the original bags or in the final ballot box in which they were deposited, were contained in a sealed receptacle, in regard to which the law enjoined that the seals should be broken only in the presence of the tribunals mentioned in the Act and produced before those tribunals only upon the order of the judge presiding over them, and that only when there was either an election contestation or a charge of some kind in which the documents were necessary as evidence, could such order be given —(because this was pointed out to him, and because, furthermore, his attention was specially called to the fact that it was necessary to go into the question of the right or power of this House to order the breaking of those seals and the production of those documents, because he had laid no charge before this House; no charge was made before the House into the investigation whereof those documents would be necessary)—because those things were pointed out to him, representations in which he acquiesces by dropping his motion, he seems to think that those incidents and the action of the Government in regard to them are in some way connected with these charges he has brought for the first time to-night, although he might have had them before the House at an earlier date, when a satisfactory method of dealing with them might have been proposed. I am not going into this question now: it is certainly not possible we should deal with them in that way now, and this motion does not ask that we should do so. Eliminating for a moment the form of the motion—which makes it, as I have pointed out, absolutely unacceptable, and necessarily so—that motion asks for a general investigation into the entire elections so far as regards the extent to which the military vote was polled. The hon. member for Chambly and Vercheres, as ground for his support of that motion, limits himself to making these very grave charges against the officers in command, I think, of a regiment of engineers, who were at the St. Johns barracks during the election. I am not here to plead any extenuation of the offences which he has alleged those gentlemen were guilty of. Neither am I here to say, on the ex parte statement that we have heard this evening, that these men were guilty of those offences; but in so far as that particular charge is concerned, or series of charges, against that particular group of men—which charges are brought to our knowledge to-night for the first time —I am quite prepared to say that if the evidence of which the hon. gentleman is in possession and of which we are not in possession, makes a prima facie case in support of those charges, they should form the subject of a most thorough investigation. In fact, if the evidence which the hon. gentleman has and which we have not, makes a prima facie case against the men whose names he has mentioned, it would seem to me that that evidence constitutes a better foundation for a prosecution for those grave offences than for a judicial investigation, which can, after all, be nothing else but a preliminary inquiry. But I am quite prepared to say—I do not want to make any distinctions—that at the least they are a proper subject matter for judicial inquiry.

And as regards this case which has been brought to our attention, when this House has disposed of this motion in the only way which is open to this House, which by its large majority has confidence in this Government, and which has heard this evening nothing impugning or attacking this Government or affording ground for any lack of confidence in this Government —when I say, this House shall have disposed of the motion which is now before us in the only way which it is open to a House composed as is this House to dispose of it, that is by rejecting it,—the Government will, nevertheless, realize, as we all realize now, the propriety of there being investigation into the case that had been laid before us—judicial investigation.

Mr. MURPHY: When?

Mr. DOHERTY: As promptly as that can be done. Let me say this: I do not want to introduce into this discussion anything that might give it any tinge of bitterness. But I am glad to believe that it was thoughtlessness, but it was most painful, I am sure —it certainly was most painful to me, and I am sure, when my hon. friends on the other side come to think it over, it will be painful for them,—to remember that they sat here this evening and cheered to the echo the evidence which, if it was true, would show that certain of our soldiers have shown themselves unworthy of the confidence that this Parliament reposed in them. When the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault) brought out what he considered this conclusive evidence, it was met by the resounding cheers of gentlemen upon the other side.

Surely, when they come to think it over, they with us all, if these men are guilty, will be sorry that these men should have been guilty. I am sure, after all, they, with all of us, would be glad if, notwithstanding the evidence which the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères informed us he had in his possession, it should be found that there was some explanation of this conduct that would make it consistent with innocence on the part of these men.

And let me say this: I do not want to prejudge the case—it is easy to run away with the most condemnatory conclusions. Sometimes you find that, even in what appear to be strong prima facie cases, your first impression was very much mistaken.

I am not going to discuss the propriety of the publication of this newspaper which we had to read here, nor am I going to go into the question whether the opinions expressed in it were well or ill founded; nor whether they were expressed in just the language that would be considered most desirable. I do not want to prejudge now a case that is to be the subject matter of investigation by others. But, after all, if we all of us look back to the past election, and to elections which preceded it, shall we not perhaps realize that under the influence of strong conviction the language of some of us has perhaps been as strong as the language that was read from that newspaper? There was the difference in the last election that exists between men of strong convictions when they differ on a question of first importance. And I think we should all of us be willing to forgive, even to the soldier, what may appear to us sitting here this evening to be perhaps the exaggerated expression of a strongly-entertained conviction, that appealed after all, whether he was right or wrong, to his profound sense of devotion to our common country.

As to the charges that are made as to the conduct of the election itself, we heard very positive affirmations of perjury and subornation of perjury. These are grave charges. The hon. gentleman, no doubt, believes that he is in possession of the evidence to substantiate them, which moved him to throw all this matter before this House to-night, I do not say with the purpose but with the necessary result, that the men that he has accused here to-night must remain under suspicion until someone initiates proper proceedings that will lead to their condemnation or to their exoneration; and, as I have pointed out already, he might have, carried these serious charges to a tribunal where both sides could be heard and where the public would have had an opportunity of knowing in a reasonable way whether those charges were well or ill founded. Now we have heard this absolute assertion of perjury and subornation of perjury. I am not here pleading for these men; I do not know what the circumstances were; I know nothing of them beyond what the hon. gentleman has told us. But I do know this of my own personal knowledge, that many and many an honest man, absolutely an honest man in the province of Quebec, believed that under the Military Voters Act it was the privilege of the soldier to choose his constituency. And how was that belief brought about? By the persistent assertion, by the persistent mis-statement, coming from almost every platform of the party in opposition to this Government, that that was the state of the law. I spent much of my time in the course of that election making it clear to people that that was not the state of the law—perfectly honest people who had been misled into that belief by those who, being interested as they all were to bring about my defeat in particular, and the defeat of this Government as a whole, were industriously engaged in charging me with being the author of a law that told the soldier: "You can vote anywhere you please." And gentlemen who sowed that seed are astounded and indignant when there comes back to them what I do not say in this particular case was, but what very well in this case may have been, the result of the doctrine that they themselves had been preaching. It may be that all of these men committed perjury. It may be that many of them acted in the honest belief that they were entitled to vote at the place that they selected.

Before we come to absolute condemnations, it would be well for us to know that these men were sworn at all. If things were as irregular as they are said to have been, it is not impossible that these soldiers were not sworn. If so, these wholesale charges of perjury are certainly unfounded. I have not said these things because I want to defend these men if they be guilty, or because I want to prejudge the question whether they be innocent or guilty. When hon. gentlemen adopt a method of bringing these charges to the public which gives no opportunity of reply to the men accused, some one should point out in the meantime that it would be well for the public to withhold their judgment. To-night we are asked for an investigation; but the whole tone of the ground upon which the investigation is asked for is the condemnation as guilty without further proceeding of the men against whom the charges are brought. I have no desire to introduce any feeling into this discussion; matters of this kind are bigger than parties and bigger than governments and ought to be regarded from both sides and in as judicial a frame of mind as we are capable of bringing ourselves into. But in view of the fact that so many methods were open of bringing about a clear and satisfactory investigation followed by proper punishment or deserved exoneration, all fair-minded men will regret, with me, that the method adopted, which must be unfair to the accused, should have been considered the proper one. I think it is generally conceded that it is the duty of a good citizen, when he has information justifying the belief that crime has been committed, to lay that information before those who are charged with the enforcement of criminal law, and thus set the law in motion. But as the hon. member for Chambly and Vercheres has not seen fit to adopt that course, and has—for what reason I am at a loss to imagine, because I should not like to impute to him any motive that I should not wish to have imputed to myself in like circumstances — adopted this particular method, the Government will take the steps that may be necessary to bring about judicial investigation of the case that has been put before us in this way to-night.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: In what way?

Mr. DOHERTY: That has been put before us by the member for Chambly and Vercheres; this case that is alleged to have happened in Canada and that it is, therefore, possible for us to deal with directly.

Mr. MURPHY: Will the inquiry be limited to that?

Mr. DOHERTY: As far as I can say, the inquiry will be limited to the case that is brought before us. If other hon. gentlemen have other cases in which they can show us that there is cause for inquiry, we shall be glad to inquire.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Then you will grant an investigation right away?

Mr. DOHERTY: As regards the case that has been put before us.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: With regard to the motion now before the House?

Mr. DOHERTY: With regard to this case of Chambly and Vercheres which has been put before the House this evening. Let us have no misunderstanding; we will see that it is properly and judiciously investigated. As to the incidents referred to as having happened in England, I have given sufficient reasons why it would be highly improper, even if we could hope to arrive at any practical result, to embark upon an investigation in England and France, the bulk of the necesary witnesses in which would be men who have other work to do than that of giving testimony before the courts, whether to inculpate their comrades or to exonerate themselves. In respect of the matter put before us by the member for Westmorland this evening, individual cases may justify some action in the way of further inquiry, and, perhaps, the taking of some measure looking to the disciplining of officers who may have been guilty of some offences. Should that be so, some action from this Government may be called for, even in England. But of one thing the House can rest assured: that the Government has no desire to cloak any guilty man or to encourage any of its officers in violation of the law. In saying that, I do not say that there was made to us this afternoon a case that would justify our ordering an inquiry in such a large and general way as has been suggested.

The Government feels that this is a motion with regard to which only one course is open to it and to those who have confidence in it. The Government realizes also the duty that has come to it with regard to this matter of Chambly and Vercheres and is alive to such duty as may come to it, in proper cases and under proper circumstances, to look into charges involving the due performance of duty on the part of its officers, with an eye to such disciplining as circumstances may call for. But we should be doing anything but the work we are here to do if we cast over our forces overseas at this moment a general dragnet to see whether or not we might gather into it some soldier who had been guilty of some misdemeanour, some irregularity, or even some serious offence. If there be soldiers of that kind there will be time and place for dealing with them.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, when a man walking along the street finds that some one has unsuccessfully attempted to purloin his pocket-book, he is apt to be almost as angry with the intended thief as he would have been had the attempt been successful. I am one of the candidates who was marked out by the Union Government to be defeated. I do not know how many ministers in the present Government formed part of the Unionist organization.

Mr. MURPHY: Two.

Mr. McMASTER: Had the plans laid by the Unionist organization been successful, I would not have had the pleasure of meeting hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House in friendly converse in the corridor or have had the honour of representing the constituency I represent in this House. I shall endeavour, as I trust there is no bitterness in my make-up, to follow the suggestion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) to discuss this case in the calmest and most judicial manner possible.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Burrell) addressed the House at some length. His main objection to the speech made by the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp) was that it was too long. His second objection was that those irregularities which had happened across the seas were irregularities which must have happened by inadvertence or carelessness, and the fact that many military voters had forgotten to answer questions Nos. 6, 7 and 8, was to be put down only to the feebleness of human memory and not to any ulterior or improper motive. The Secretary of State, after attacking the plantiff's attorney, also attacked one of the plaintiff's witnesses. I do not think the character of that witness is in issue here to-night. What is before the House is a statement made by an hon. member of this House, seconded by another hon. member, that they believe that certain irregularities and frauds were committed in connection with the taking of the soldiers' vote, and they ask for an investigation. They have brought before the House certain facts which, in my opinion, make out in many respects a prima facie case for an investigation. Apart from that, we have had a very able exposition of the electoral crimes committed in the barracks at St. Johns, Quebec. Those have so impressed the Government that the Government has promised an investigation into them. Would I be unfair in laying down this principle?—that, if I show that similar actions are likely to have occurred elsewhere, in connection, for instance, with my own election, that a similar investigation should be granted into that, and if I showed that the facts make out a prima facie case that those irregularities and frauds were general, I make out a case that the investigation should be general and not confined to one particular case? I think I do.

The Minister of Justice says that the hon. member for Westmorland could not have expected his motion to carry. Why not? If there are serious grounds for believing that irregularities and electoral crimes were committed in connection with the taking of the soldiers' vote, either across the seas or in Canada, why should not this Government grant an investigation? We have been told, with a modesty so peculiar to this present Government, that it represents, as the President of the Council has told us, the best elements in both parties. Surely the best elements in both parties will not allow any doubt to be cast upon the purity of their escutcheon. Surely, if any reasonable grounds for granting an investigation are brought before the House, they will hasten to show that they are true and honest men, above reproach. Why should we, on this side of the House, expect that the motion made by the hon. member for Westmorland should be defeated? The Minister of Justice referred to the fact that those men who are charged with having committed those irregularities—to follow the example of the Minister of Justice, we shall call things by their pleasantest names—are soldiers. We know that. We are not suggesting to the Government what punishment they should mete out to those men if they are found guilty. It may be and it certainly is true that, as far as the private soldiers were concerned, they were not free agents to begin with, and many of them will now, by their efforts, by their spilt blood upon the field, have expiated any commission of an offence. But I shall ask the Minister of Justice—does he lay down the principle that because a man is a soldier he is relieved of his moral responsibility towards his fellow Canadian citizens? I do not accept that. That has never been the manner in which the British people have looked upon the responsibility of their soldiers. I would go back to history and say that one of the greatest soldiers that ever commanded a British Army in the field, John Churchill, was once accused of serious crimes, and was very heavily punished. But now a more serious argument is brought forward by the Minister of Justice. He says: You cannot have such an investigation as you propose, without seriously interfering with military operations in the field. On the face of it, that is a serious objection if it is well founded in fact. But is that the case? The soldiers, when they voted, all placed on their envelopes, if their ballots were counted, the place where they lived in Canada, or they stated that they did not live in Canada at all. Those envelopes are in the possession of the Government. The ballots are in the possession of the Government. The names and addresses of the soldiers are in the possession of the Government. The whole investigation may, in very large measure, be made by an examination of the envelopes and the ballot papers which are in the possession of the Government. That course was followed in connection with the British Columbia soldiers' vote, and it is a matter of interest to this House to recollect that a precisely similar investigation was held under a commission appointed by the British Columbia Government, and that by examination of the voting papers and the envelopes, they were able to determine that out of a total of 8,488 military votes, 3,796 were legitimate. What the British Columbia Government did was to cast aside the soldiers votes and refuse to accept them, because there had been such wholesale misconduct in connection with the taking of that vote.

I should like to deal with these points calmly and seriatim as they come to my mind. The Minister of Justice blamed the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères because, having this information as to those electoral crimes in his possession for some months, he had not moved the criminal courts of Quebec to arrest and punish those men.

I do not know whether the Minister of Justice meant by his suggestion that my hon. friend should have arrested some 750 men. If he did suggest that I beg to tell him that a lawyer practising in Montreal cannot contemplate the expenditure of some $3,000 for warrants alone as a mere bagatelle. But there is a much more serious reason for my hon. friend having stayed his hand in that connection. The members across the floor of this House, as well as the members on this side, will remember that for some time after the election in this country there was a considerable amount of public excitement, public friction, a feeling between one portion of the country and another, a feeling which I am glad to say has largely disappeared and is disappearing day by day, and we can thank Heaven for it; but if at that time my hon. friend from Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Archambault), a French-speaking gentleman from the province of Quebec, had done what the Minister of Justice proposes, and had arrested these English-speaking officers of the provinces of Ontario and New Brunswick it would have been a very unwise thing to do, and would have caused a lot of hard feeling in this country. Surely the Minister of Justice cannot blame us when we come to him who is supposed to be the fountain of justice in this country, for redress.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Besides, he did not know until he got the return.

Mr. McMASTER: My hon. friend says that he did not know until he got the return, but he had a very shrewd suspicion of these matters. He had not, however, his complete evidence until he obtained it during the session of this Parliament, and as the Orders of the Day have been pretty well encumbered day by day, I do not think it becomes very highly the Minister of Justice of this department, when a serious matter is brought before him, to meet it by dilatory exceptions or exceptions to the form. Let us go to the very heart and essence of this matter, casting aside the juridical niceties about jurisdiction and procedure.

The Minister of Justice says that these articles which appear in Knots and Lashes must be more or less forgiven—that was the inference—because people say harsh things of each other in times of elections. They do, and they have done so in this country, but I am glad to say that never before in Canada have we had such an election as regards bitter attacks as we had last December. I do not think there were very many bitter attacks directed from this side of the House to the other; there may have been some, but I say that for months and months before the last election there was no epithet too grossly insulting to be hurled by the Conservatives or Unionists at the Liberals of this country. The Minister of Justice blames us because he says we circulated the impression throughout this country that the soldiers could cast their votes where they liked. Nothing is more mistaken than that. The soldiers were not free agents at all. But I think there is a good deal of proof in the record, or will be before I have finished the case, that soldiers had to give their votes in many instances, not in all, where their officers who were acting as election officials told them they must vote.

Now I will proceed to discuss why I think this general investigation should be given. First of all, let us look at the soldiers' vote in general. In North America the soldiers' vote amounted to 54,500, and the total votes rejected amounted to 17,114, or 31½ per cent; that is almost one man out of three improperly marked his ballot. How does that fact square with the pretension of the Secretary of State that it was all done by inadvertence, that the people forgot to answer Nos. 6, 7 and 8, or made some other mistake. Does the Secretary of State suggest that we at least on this side of the House have such a low idea of the intellectuality, the mentality, and ability of those men in Canada whose brothers form the finest fighting unit on the Western front as to think that one man out of three marked his ballot improperly by inadvertence? I cannot believe that; I do not believe that. In England—in Great Britain I should say because those of us of Scottish race do not like the old country to be called England; Great Britain is the name which suits us better—in Great Britain 104,377 soldiers votes were cast, and of these 19,251 were rejected, or 18½ per cent, and the same argument that I have made in respect to the votes in North America applies, though in not quite so strong a degree, to those votes cast in Great Britain. In France 128,073 votes were cast, and 15,025 were rejected, just about 12½ per cent. Is it likely that twelve men out of every hundred more or less improperly marked their ballots in France by inadvertence? I do not think so; I do not think any member on this side of the House thinks so; I think few members on the other side of the House think so.

And now, if I may be pardoned a personal reference, let me take up the county of Brome, in which I ran, to show how the soldier vote worked out there. Brome is a small agricultural county in the eastern townships. It has no urban centres dignified by the name of "town." The largest village contains about one thousand people. Brome had sent some 225 boys to the war, and at the time the vote was taken, from deaths, wounds and discharge, sickness and discharge, there were not more than 175, or at the most 200, Brome men in the Canadian military forces. Now how many men do you think voted in Brome? I cannot tell you how many ballots were cast in France to apply in the county of Brome, but 84 were counted, and I presume a large number were rejected. If we take 84 from 200, that leaves 116 Brome men yet to vote. In Great Britain how many Brome men voted? There were 216 votes rejected and 57 votes counted. In Canada there were 112 men voted in Brome. Perhaps I should not have said that men voted in the Old Country, because while my hon. friend from Westmorland was addressing the House, we learned that some lady was induced by a chaplain to vote, in Brome, on the ground that she had "been kind to the Canadian soldiers."

One hundred and twelve men or women voted in Canada under the provisions of the Military Voters Act in the county of Brome. If we take the same proportion for the votes cast in France as for the votes cast in England—and of course these figures are in the possession of the Government and they can verify everything I say—you will find that about three times the number of men who were in the army at the time of the election voted in the little county of Brome. Had all these votes been counted, the splendid majority the people gave me, the largest majority which was ever given in the county of Brome at a really fought out election, a majority of 609, would have been wiped out and I would not have had the pleasure of meeting hon. members on the other side of the House.

Let me deal, in connection with the vote in Great Britain with the argument advanced by the hon. the Secretary of State (Mr. Burrell) that if a few mistakes were made, they were merely mistakes and inadvertences. I nave a copy of the list which has been certified to by Mr. Fraser and Mr. Soles. Mr. Fraser was the special returning officer and Mr. Soles was his clerk. I do not know Mr. Fraser but Mr. Soles is a gentleman occupying a responsible position in the Civil Service. He is a well known civil servant and he was sent to France for the purpose of counting the vote. I think he is one of the inspectors engaged in laying out rural mail routes, he has his headquarters in Sherbrooke, and he is a perfectly responsible gentleman. I wish to state that the purse was not made away with, that I still retain my seat which I won, and that the 216 men whose votes were rejected failed to answer questions, 6, 7 and 8. Where did these gentlemen come from? Were they all gentlemen who came from the old country and who had a right under the Military Voters Act to apply their votes in whatever county they wished? No. I do not propose to read a long list of these men. I have not the address of every one of them but from the investigations which have been made, and the examination of the rolls of the regiments, it was ascertained that 62 of them came from counties, stretching, to use the expression frequently employed by orators in this county, from the stormy waves of the Atlantic to the calm waters of the Pacific.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Spare us.

Mr. McMASTER: Perhaps I should. As it is getting late I will endeavour to be as brief as possible. Out of the 62 names on this list investigated only one belonged to the county of Brome, a man called Plouff, who came originally from Sutton and who had become a United States citizen.

Now let us come to the question of the vote in Canada. 112 votes were cast outside of the county of Brome, for the county of Brome. Of those 56 were counted and 56 were rejected. We have a record of how the questions were answered by those 56. Some 40 answered to the effect that they had resided in Canada at the time of their enlistment, but like those poor, unfortunate forgetful fellows in the barracks at St. Johns, Quebec, they did not know where they had ever lived in Canada, or they could not say where they had lived in Canada. Some 40 or so answered the questions. Others who had tenderer consciences or had not been so well coached answered questions that they lived in Canada at the time of their enlistment and then did not answer 6, 7 and 8 and applied their vote to Brome. Does any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House desire me or any member to believe that these votes were cast by inadvertence or by a strange coincidence in the county of Brome? No, I will tell you why I was picked out for slaughter from the first. I do not think that I am a particularly bad man; at least my badness has not made me notorious. I was picked out for slaughter by this Union Government because I was running in one of the two essentially English-speaking constituencies in Quebec, where the population is English yet by a very considerable majority. In the county of Brome about two-thirds of the voters are English-speaking and about one-third French-speaking. The population is divided about 60 per cent English and about 40 per cent French. The difference between the voting strength and the population is due to the fact that there are a great number of people whose children have left them to go to out West or to go into the city of Montreal, and a great number of French Canadians with large families of children have come into the county in comparatively recent years. I was picked out for slaughter because this Union Government did not want it to be shown that there was an English-speaking county in Quebec that could be carried for Laurier and the straight, grand old Liberal party. They failed, and if I speak with some warmth about this matter it is because I think I have a right to. I ran as clean a campaign in the county as any man ever ran in the Dominion. I had as my opponent a gallant and distinguished soldier across the seas. What did this party, that includes the best elements in both political parties, do? They stuck placards on every barn door and on every rock in Brome saying, "Draper is fighting the Hun, McMaster is fighting Draper; for whom would the Kaiser vote?" The old, old Tory trick, to endeavour to pretend that they have a monopoly of the patriotism of the country and any one who does not agree with them is not patriotic. I ask why the soldiers voted as they did? I ask why there were so many irregularties committed in connection with the soldiers' vote both in Canada and across the sea. I will tell you; it was on account of the campaign of misrepresentation and abuse that this Union Government put up in the last general election. Let me just rehearse very briefly why the people of Canada lost their heads in the last general election. On the first day of December the Prime Minister made a speech in a certain western Ontario town and was not very well received. And the next day there was held in Toronto, at the house of a very godly gentleman there, a meeting of some twenty people, who were very prominent in Y.M.C.A. work, and who were also endowed with a goodly portion of this world's goods. Diligence in business was united with fervour of spirit, and these gentlemen who protested that they were followers of the God of love made up their minds that the Ontario farmer was in a very difficult and uncomfortable frame of mind for the Unionist party and that something must be done. And out of that meeting there came a committee—out of that meeting, or similar meetings, out of that class of men there came a Citizens' Union Committee. These men, who said they were followers of the God of love, went out for the purpose of winning an election, to sow hate between different sections of our Canadian people. Was there ever more horrid, hideous and odious hypocrisy? I do not think there has been. These men—I wish they were within the sound of my voice—are familiar with the history of the Founder of our religion. They know that although He dismissed with a kindly word the poor woman taken in flagrant sin, that although He forgave the penitent thief on the cross, He preserved the vials of His righteous indignation for those whom He called scribes, and Pharisees, and hypocrites, those who liked to broaden their phylacteries and stand at the corners of the streets making long prayers to be seen of all—these men went out, and this is the sort of stuff they spread through the papers of Ontario:

> Is a united Quebec to rule all Canada?

The glaring advertisement in which this appeared had the Union Jack and the British lion prominently displayed at each of its four corners.

> To-day in our national crisis Quebec along among all the provinces stands more united than ever before. She knows what she wants:
> (1) Withdrawal from the war.

A downright lie as black as any that ever came from the abode of the father of lies himself.

> (2) Bilingual schools everywhere.
> (3) Weakening of the ties of British connection.
> (4) Political control of Canada.

Political control of Canada! As if one province of a population of a little over two millions could control other provinces whose aggregate population amounted to six millions. And listen, Mr. Speaker, to this gem:

> Within the last few weeks, Quebec has mobilized all her forces to dominate Canada under the unified leadership of Bourassa and Laurier.

The united leadership of Bourassa and Laurier. Why, if there has been one man in the province of Quebec, who, for the last forty years, has been standing four-square against the prejudices of his province it is my revered, and honoured, and beloved leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The Montreal Weekly Witness well said that such a statement was effrontery worthy of the Prussian general staff. But they had another untruth to tell about those people who did not agree with him politically:

> All Canada knows that Germany has been working through agents, spies and bribes in every country in the world. The latest evidences are the revelations recently made to the world by President Wilson. Do we Canadians think the Kaiser has overlooked Canada? If we do, what a fool's paradise!

Now, I have in my hand the Ottawa Evening Journal of Monday, December 10, 1917, and this paragraph appears in all its wicked untruthfulness in full in that paper. But in the Ottawa Citizen of about the same date I find that the last most odious statement and inference that German gold was being used at the last election is left out. I do not know who is responsible for it. Perhaps this was a little too strong for the Citizen's stomach, although the Journal was able to swallow it. There is something I want to say—I think it should be said, although it may not be agreeable to say it: I have no quarrel with people who believe that their political duty obliged them to join the Union Cabinet, because they considered that conscription was a large enough and broad enough issue upon which to base a government. It always struck me, Mr. Speaker, that conscription was a very narrow platform on which men of different political traditions and different political outlooks should get together, because, after all, it is a matter of procedure, and the somewhat interesting thing is that the conscription law on which these gentlemen joined together has been, by their own declaration, practically admitted a failure, and they have had to change the very essence of their law and get rid of the selective feature which characterized it. But I have no quarrel with any one who joined that Government because he sincerely thought it was his duty to do so—I respect the convictions of all. I have expressed what I think of this sort of thing:

The Citizen's Union Committee. A Non-Partisan War-Time Organization to Support Union Government. J. W. Lyon, Guelph, Chairman; Norman Sommerville, Toronto, Vice-Chairman; G. A. Warburton, Chairman Executive Committee; Albert H. Abbott, Secretary.

G. A. Warburton is a name, if I mistake not, I have seen connected with the prohibition movement in the province of Ontario, and also with Y. M. C. A. campaigns in the same province. That sort of thing is just the very worst and most wicked thing that we could have in Canada, and that was spread abroad throughout Ontario in both Liberal and Conservative papers. I asked myself this question: Did the leader of the Unionist party in Ontario try to stop that sort of thing, or did he profit by it? Because if he profited by it, if he allowed that to go unchallenged, and if he did not do everything he could to stop that sort of thing he did wrong. I am willing to pause to find out from him now whether he tried to stop that sort of thing, because I do not want to accuse him unjustly and I await his reply.

Mr. BUREAU: He will not reply.

Mr. McMASTER: No answer. I do not want to say anything that would not be fair and right to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell). What did the President of the Privy Council do in this campaign that was going on? He went up to North Bay and made a bitter attack upon the French Catholic orders that had come to this country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if his words were true, I would not have very much to say. I would permit myself, perhaps, to criticise the wisdom, in an election of this sort, of raising a personal attack upon those Orders of a religion to which I did not belong. I think that would be fair criticism. But the President of the Council, eight weeks ago, was told in the most firm and unmistakable manner, and with proofs, that his assertion was incorrect. And although we have had a statement handed out to the press, which is, possibly, a new way in which men belonging to this Government answer their adversaries—or some of them; I don't want to be unfair to those who use the old fashioned way and come into the House to make their own defence—eight weeks have passed without reply; and except for this statement handed out to the press, we have had no statement from the President of the Council either adducing the proof that he was right when he made those charges or that he withdraws them like a man.

Now, you may ask, why should I say this, what object have I? I have no desire to hurt the feelings of the President of the Council. I admire his ability and his devotion to the public service; he is a hard-working man. I say it for this purpose: that very shortly the President of the Council is going over to the old land, and I do not want him to represent himself as a Liberal there, as a sort of modern George Brown, who has joined a Union Government for the sake of saving Canada. I think I know what you are looking at, Mr. Speaker. You are wondering whether I am keeping to the motion. And therefore I have said all I need to say on that question. With his usual acumen and nimbleness of mind, the President of the Council knows exactly what I mean. I will see his career in the Tory party with pleasure, but I do not want him to represent himself as a Liberal.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. member will confine his remarks more closely to the subject.

Mr. McMASTER: I will, Mr. Speaker, and I thank you for your indulgence. Now, have I made out a case, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, not yet.

Mr. McMASTER: I was addressing my remarks to the Speaker. Have I made out a case, Mr. Speaker, for a general investigation? I believe I have. It will be for the Government now to grant an investigation now, or not to grant an investigation. And if they are successful in getting their followers to vote against their desire and against their will for the maintenance of the power of creating life titles in Canada, I do not know how the vote will go, but I leave it before the House.

Hon. A. L. SIFTON (Minister of Customs): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to detain the House very long at this time of the morning in regard to the discussion of the election that took place on the 17th December last, and which, for the first time, we are discussing this evening in this House. I have been a little disappointed, in connection with this matter. Having for a great many years taken an academic interest in the conduct of the affairs of the Dominion of Canada, I have noticed that, after every general election, in the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, or the very first available opportunity in the House, the members of the Opposition, whichever that Opposition might happen to be at that particular time, devoted the greater part of the first session to showing the country that they had obtained a moral victory. That has been the custom ever since Confederation; and here we have waited now for two or three months, and to-night is practically the first time that it has been brought to your attention, Mr. Speaker, that the members of the Opposition obtained a moral victory in December, 1917.

The reason that has been brought to your attention to-night is peculiar. A gentleman has just arrived from England with the evidence, according to the first speaker in this debate, which has proved that the Opposition obtained a victory, or should have obtained a victory, if they had had their rights. They ignore absolutely—and it is absurd to discuss the question—that the people of Canada, utterly regardless of all the soldiers' votes, returned the supporters of this Government by a very considerable majority. They ignore the fact that if they consulted the figures they would probably find that if all the soldiers had not voted at all, or if in the bulk of the constituencies they had all voted against this Government, the result would have been very much the same in a great number of cases. These things are absolutely immaterial to the members of the Opposition in connection with this matter. They are not so much material to them as they are to the particular member who last addressed you in regard to this, because he has taken a low stand, as if a gentleman of his eminence and ability, representing an English-speaking constituency in the Province of Quebec, should not receive any opposition from the members of this side.

Mr. McMASTER: No.

Mr. SIFTON: I have had some part in elections for a great many years, and I have always proceeded upon the basis that every member of the Opposition and every supporter of the Government should be opposed honestly to the best strength that all the members of these respective parties have, and no member has a right to get up and say that he received special attention and that was made an object to defeat him. They did not succeed to do it in all; nor in the County of Brome they did not succeed. And they did not succeed, because, as the hon. gentleman has shown, the officers of this Government, whom he now blamed for not taking part properly in the conduct of this election, threw out the soldiers' votes that he says would have defeated him if they had been counted. And because the officials in the conduct of the election carried out their duty as it was carried out, because a number of soldiers' votes that were improperly cast either in England or in Canada were thrown out by the officials of this Government, and the member for Brome was elected by the resident voters of that district, therfore he says that he was the subject of special attack and singled out to be defeated. Apparently the gentlemen who were in charge of the campaign either in Toronto or otherwise were not competent for their job.

Mr. McMASTER: Something slipped.

Mr. SIFTON: They apparently succeeded in a great many places in accomplishing what they were for, but they fell down in the constituency of Brome. And, as a consequence, Mr. Speaker, we have the privilege of listening to the address we have had to-night. And the hon. member for Brome forgets all about the soldiers, he forgets about the importance that it is to the Dominion of Canada to see that there is an investigation into the conduct of soldiers abroad; he forgets the important things that were mentioned by the first gentleman who moved this resolution in regard to the effect on the country. He devoted the greater part of his speech to a political address in opposition to the people of Toronto and to the President of the Council. What has this to do with the motion with which the member for Westmorland has occupied the time of the House in connection with the vote of the soldiers overseas? As a supporter of this Government and as a private member of this House, I am opposed to any judicial investigation of what took place in England and in France in connection with the soldiers' vote. Every one knew when the War-time Elections Act was passed—any one who did not know should have known—that it was impossible in a time of war to take the vote of the soldiers overseas in the same manner that the civilian vote at home is taken. Every one recognized the fact that you could not pass a law making perjury in England perjury in Canada; that you could not pass an Elections Act that could be enforced in England and France as it could in the constituency of Brome, for instance, or any other constituency of Canada. When Parliament passed that law they left it to the honour of the soldiers to vote in accordance with the dictates of their consciences and in what they believed to be the best interests of their country. If Parliament could not trust the soldiers, they had no right to provide for the taking of the vote overseas, because under no circumstances can the soldiers in France and England be made subject to the same rules that are applicable to an election in this country. Either the matter had to be left to the honour of the soldiers, or the soldiers had to be left without votes. At the last session Parliament chose the other course; they gave the votes to the soldiers overseas, and so far as I have been able to discover, the election was carried out as well as it could possibly be carried out under the circumstances.

We are told that the soldiers were influenced by their officers. Hon. gentlemen who make that suggestion know perfectly well that the soldiers did not need to be influenced by their officers. Only to-night a man who has just come from there and who was present in one of the units on the occasion of the election told me that three soldiers in that unit who desired to vote for the Opposition, and did so, immediately asked to be locked up in the guard-room in order to escape from their comrades who unitedly supported Union Government. It was not necessary for the officers to issue any instructions; the privates would have risen in rebellion against them if the officers had not allowed them to vote as they did vote, almost unanimously, for the Government pledged to carry on the war to the very utmost of its ability. That is the view I take with regard to this matter; that is the view which I believe will be taken throughout the length and breadth of Canada and by the vast majority of the members of this House.

Rt. Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I do not want to trespass at length upon the time of the House, and I shall confine myself to a very few minutes. Most of the ground has been traversed well by my three colleagues who have spoken on this side of the House, but there are two or three points that I think we might touch upon before the vote is taken.

There is a saying—it is hardly a saying, for it consists of only two Latin words,—which has come to me out of the degree of my former Latinity, whatever I may have possessed. I refer to the expression "cui bono"—to what good purpose? These words have been on my mind all the time during which this debate has been going on, and they were running through my head more rapidly during the speech of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). Viewing the matter in the light of the present situation, in the light of this gathering of 200 busy men from every part of the Dominion of Canada, in the dying day of the session, with the weight and the burdens of the war in their hearts, upon their minds and on their shoulders, and in the light of the duties awaiting them at home,—to what earthly good the speech that was made by the member for Brome? Let each one try to answer that question. As the Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Sifton) said, my hon. friend drifted entirely from the impersonal question of the soldier and the war, and made the mistake that a young preacher often makes: That of putting himself in the front and not getting behind the pith and essence of the gospel which he is preaching. My hon. friend did not add to the weight of moral tone or the firmness of moral fibre in this country when he—held up to the ridicule of this House? no; he could not do that; this House is a little bit too serious to look upon it as a matter of ridicule—but when he attempted to hold up to the ridicule of this House men such as he mentioned as forming a committee in Toronto or in Ontario. Cui bono, to single out worthy christian workers in any line—the Y.M.C.A., or workers on behalf of prohibition, temperance or any other good cause. Why single them out and hold them up to the scorn of a hundred or two hundred men and to the scorn and the laughter, if he is able to provoke it, of the people of the country? We have none too much of this moral fibre in our country, and I never like to hear a man chiding or jeering at men whose chief object in life is doing Christ's work in the way they consider to be the most honourable and the most effective way of doing it. Cui bono? Is it an aimless curiosity that prompts such talk as we have had here to-day? It is curiosity to look into the workings of a watch and to tear it to pieces, to see how the wheels go around, well knowing that it is an old watch which will never be used to keep time again. I can see that there would be some purpose in having an investigation into the methods of the election in England and France if that mode of election were ever supposed to be used again in choosing the members of the Parliament of Canada. But that method of selection has been forced upon us by a great war. It would never have been possible under other circumstances, and we hope that it will never be used again because it is made necessary by another great war. It would be infinitely interesting and amusing to my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) if he knew exactly everything that took place in the trenches when soldiers were voting, how they were led to vote and everything like that. But cui bono? Where is he going to apply it as a lesson to aid and help, for the good of this country or of his own constituency? May I say to my hon, friend that when, as he well observed in the early portion of his remarks, there was a change in the relations of peoples and sections of peoples in Canada at the present time, as compared with what was the condition six months ago, twelve months ago, more or less—what earthly good would it be to bring again into the arena and fight at the old causes of separation and dissention, and renew, so far as he could pour oil upon the fire, the smoke and the flame of a contest and conflagration which we were all hoping had died down never to be relighted again? To what good again, I say? No argument has been given here this evening at all to show that, if all those investigations were carried on and all the information was gathered, there would be one iota of change in the parties, and the policies, and the principles, which govern this country as a result of the election of the 17th of December, 1917. There is no national political interest in the matter at all, because no amount of investigation could ever cause any change in the policies and principles being carried on in this country at the present time. I think this is a fair method of criticism. There were several things which could have been done. But just now the thought comes to my mind—to what good again? There are in this country, people who do not like the war, people who do not care much for our soldiers, some people—I hope there are not very many—who roll under their tongue as a sweet morsel anything which will derogate from the war party, from the soldier, from that portion, that effort of the Dominion of Canada which is behind this war and is pushing it to the conclusion to which it must be pushed if we are to keep our lives and liberties and status intact. Does it help to throw the blur and fog and mist and darkness of mistakes that have been committed by soldiers, if mistakes have been committed; of irregularities that have been committed by soldiers or officers, if irregularities have been committed? Does it help in the united purpose of this Dominion of Canada that such should be dug up and thrown out? I do not think it does. I have, flashing before my mind just now, two illustrations of that in the history of the present war. Galipoli and Mesopotamia were dark features in the campaigns of the last two or three years. There were allegations; there were thoughts; there were ideas; there were even facts which in normal times would have carried like a whirlwind investigation of the very keenest and deepest kind. Great Britain did not investigate. The war was on, and nothing was done which would dim the public ardour, nothing which would tend to make confusion or disorder or lack of unity and purpose in the carrying on of the war, either as affecting Great Britain herself or her standing and that of the army and that of the war in the view of the warring enemy. So, many things that otherwise would have been looked into have been left over until the war is at an end. Will it do any good at all for us to fling out a drag-net investigation into soldiers, lieutenants and captains, and with that drag-net proceed through Great Britain, and, if we are logical, through France as well and elsewhere? Will it help in any way? To what good again? It is a matter which appeals to my mind as being one of infinitesimal importance in comparison with the great purpose for which we are banded together and which this country is doing its very best to carry out.

There is close at hand an element which has been imported into this discussion. My hon. friend from Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault) had three courses before him. He has chosen one. He has ignored the other two. There was one course,—I do not know whether this course is politically possible or not. He has had the knowledge of what he calls irregularities and if his statements are proved, if the prima facie evidence turns out to be true evidence, he has made statements which reflect upon the honour of soldiers and which involve strongly a moral question. One course open to him would have been to come with his information the very first moment he got it and lay it before the Government and ask them to deal with it and make such investigations and mete out such discipline as they thought possible. My hon. friend smiles—that is not the party way of doing such things; that would not have had the effect for him nor for his party that he hopes has been had by the method of procedure which he did ultimately adopt. But I take it that, in many a case, in grave situations like this, the quiet way of scotching an evil and preventing it from spreading is the best way, and that was one way open to my hon. friend. But he did not take it. There was not enough light and shadow about that. There was another way. The moment that the hon. gentleman got into this House, the moment that the House came together, why should he not, burdened with all that information which showed to his mind dire and dreadful iniquity, the influence of which could not be good for soldier or for national life, bring that information and put it upon the table of the House and press for an investigation early in the session when the House would have had an opportunity of dealing with the matter? Instead of doing that, he waits until the day before the House is to prorogue and then on an independent motion he and his confreres bring those matters and chuck them into the House. Such a motion, under those circumstances, no Government could allow to pass. In spite of all the camouflage and smoke screens that may be thrown up, there is no possibility, on a motion such as this of a discussion which would be fair or an investigation which would be thorough by a Committee of the House or by the House itself in any capacity. One of those two courses he could have taken, but he has taken a third. I am only criticising the method.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Is my hon. friend not aware that on the 16th of April I put a question on the Order Paper asking for the production of documents, which, if received, would have enabled me to move for this inquiry earlier?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend put on the Order Paper questions which if they had been answered or could have been answered would have enabled him to bring in two sets of information; first, the information that he has read out as to where these men were born, where they enlisted, their residence and the like of that. He had the sworn affidavits of his own men as to that in his pocket all the time. Men of his own choosing, in whom he had confidence had furnished him with the prima facie case he has put before the House to-day. That was made a little stronger by the documents which he did get. I take leave to say that the stand taken by the Minister of Justice, which the Government has stuck to, was the fair thing, namely, that it is not the right of any person to go in and take hold, for any purpose whatsoever, of the documents which are the records of the elections of the country, and which are guarded as great secrets. They can be brought out for use in a judicial commission or in an investigation by a Committee of the House, if they are ordered, but it is irregular, and it would lead to dire consequences if these documents could be fished into for information at any time and every person. So I say that my hon. friend having sufficient evidence, evidence of his own choosing, furnished by his own scrutineers in whom he had confidence and who had charge of his election, if he had laid it before the House at an earlier period of the session, it would have brought the House to a discussion of the matter under such conditions as would make it a real discussion and would enable a conclusion to be come to by the House on the merits of the case. But to throw into the House to-day, as has been done, a vast mass of stuff that took four hours and a little better to read—how can a Government or how can the House itself make any valuation of these things? A thousand and one incidents may have to be probed in order to test whether those things are worthy of an investigation or not. However that may be, the matter has come before the House; the Government has met it, and the Minister of Justice and my other colleagues have spoken in detail to the House.

I have but one thing more to say. The moral quality in the question which has been raised by my hon. friend from Chambly and Vercheres is a different phase of the matter. To what good may well be asked with reference to the other phases I have discussed, because they are ephemeral; they cannot have any very great advantage as a guide for future action. But moral delinquency stands on a different plane. The moral question was what was raised by my hon. friend from Chambly and Vercheres, and that cannot be ignored by any House of Parliament or by any Government. With reference to that, while I am not going to say on prima facie evidence that officers of the militia or military formations of this country have done anything that is dishonourable or wrong—we cannot say that until the matter is investigated—I am bound to say that when things of that kind come before the House the Government and the House itself must take cognizance of them, because the moral quality is one which pervades the community to-day and pervades it always, and it must be kept as pure and as strong and as elevated as we can possibly keep it. And so when evidence of that kind is put before it the Government is prepared to say—it could not do less—that it will be probed to the very bottom, and that in so far as the evidence goes to show wrongdoing, the wrongdoing will be punished, even though we may be sorry in our very heart of hearts that such things do occur and have to be made examples of. The Government purposes to do that.

My hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) started out with the idea that he could put up as direct a case as was put up by my hon. friend from Chambly and Vercheres, but he forgot his case in attending to himself, and so he put up no case for an investigation.

As to a general dragnet thrown over this country in one of the crises of our country's efforts impugning the whole military organization of Canada, putting it under suspicion and having it menaced by the coming investigation, whether anything has been proved or not in the first case, no man of good common sense would think that a good thing to help on the war at the present time. But we will take this particular case, and it will be looked into thoroughly and speedily, and as the evidence is brought forth so will the punishment rest on individuals who have been guilty of wrong-doing. The Government must go on; we must have our Supply, and we must stand by the motion to go into Committee of Supply. That, I believe, is a sensible thing to do, and that is what I think will be done when the vote is taken.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, we have heard from four ministers, and now the motion comes at last to what we might have expected; the Government take it as a motion of want of confidence. Now an amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply is a motion of want of confidence if the Government wants to make it a motion of want of confidence, and it is not a motion of want of confidence if the Government does not choose to make it so. Again and again in this House amendments have been made to the motion to go into Committee of Supply by members of the Opposition, and again and again Conservative governments and Liberal Governments have accepted those motions, and not treated them as motions of want of confidence.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Those occasions are exceedingly rare.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Such cases have occurred in the Government of which my hon. friend was a member. I remember a case in the eighties, when my hon. friend was a member of the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald, on a motion for Supply Mr. Mills, the member for Bothwell, moved an amendment that public buildings should not be built except in places where the revenue justified it. Sir John Macdonald accepted the motion at once, as it was a proper motion. He did not treat it as a motion of want of confidence, and my hon. friend assented to it also. I can remember a case in which the Government of which I was the head accepted an amendment to the motion for Supply moved by Sir Charles Tupper and seconded by my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster).

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I suppose my right hon. friend's memory will carry him back to the occasions where he refused it over and over again.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Only yesterday a motion was made in this House, as to the merits of which every one was agreed, but the Government chose to take it as a motion of want of confidence.

But the Government made this a party question, and therefore everybody has to bow. Yesterday the Government was concerned. They had just passed an Order in Council which to a certain extent negatived the motion, and then wanted their supporters to stand by them. But in this case the Government are not involved. Neither my hon. friend who moved the motion, nor my hon. friend who seconded it, accused the Government. They made charges of wrong-doing. In those charges the Government are not concerned. Up to the present time not one word has been said against the Government. Will the Government step in and have an investigation? No, they say, we will not grant this inquiry, we will make it a party question, and therefore every follower apparently will have to do what he did yesterday, swallow his convictions and support the Government.

My right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) stated a lot of objections to this motion. It comes too late; why did it not come earlier? My right hon. friend asked my hon. friend from Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault) why he did not bring this matter to the Government. Whoever heard of a matter of this kind being brought to the Government. This is the great inquest of the nation, this is the place where all accusations are brought, and I will ask my right hon. friend, if he will permit me, if he ever heard of an accusation of this kind going to the Government? Did he ever hear of it? Such a thing never took place. It is a phantom of the imagination of the right hon. gentleman to try and bolster up a bad case.

Then my hon. friend from Chambly-Verchères was asked by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) why he did not take this to the courts of law. He might have accused somebody of wrongdoing. He certainly might have done so, but does any one pretend that when such grave charges are brought to the attention of the House as those which my hon. friend from Chambly-Verchères has placed before us to-night, that justice would have been done to the public if there had been an appeal to the courts of law? Some parties might have been punished. But what we want is not to punish parties, but to uphold and vindicate the honour and dignity of the law. That is why this motion is made. My right hon. friend told us that even if the charges were true no national interests would be served by an investigation. Let me answer at once that we know we cannot change the complexion of this Parliament, and such is not our intention. But, is the matter confined to that? Does my right hon. friend pretend that when an election has taken place, as it took place under the circumstances of the last election, the honour of the country is not a consideration, that the law of the land is not a consideration, and that we are not interested to know whether or not the law has been observed? It is not to change the complexion of this House, it is not to change the Government, but it is to maintain the principle of the electoral law of the land, without which there is no liberty whatever. We are fighting to-day for liberty. That is our pride, but will my right hon. friend tell me that, when we are fighting for liberty to-day, if such charges as these are brought they should not be investigated? These charges are either true or they are not true —I think they are—but we do not condemn anybody. We simply ask that the Government should have an opportunity to have an investigation, in order to find out whether these charges are true or not. It is not necessary to tell us that there are no national interests involved. It is the honour of the land that is involved. It is more than that. It is the foundation of the institutions under which we live. If there is anything that is sacred in this country, or wherever British institutions exist, it is the freedom of elections and the sanctity of the vote. That is what is at stake to-day. We are told that we should not vote for this motion. It is a principle of British justice, a principle of British institutions, that whenever and wherever a crime has been committed, no matter what it is, that crime must be investigated. If I find on the wayside a dead body, it is my duty to notify immediately an officer of the law; the coroner comes, empanels the jury, summons witnesses, and leaves no stone unturned, until the murderer is discovered, and justice is done. It is the same thing here. The principle of electoral freedom lies prostrate, killed in the House of its own friends, and this is simply a coroner's inquest called to inquire into the matter so that the culprits may be brought to justice.

The House divided on the proposed amendment of Mr. Copp, which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I was paired with the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Motion agreed to and the House went again into Committee of Supply.

Progress reported.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: I move that order No. 19 (Bill No. 62 to amend the Insurance Act, 1917) be discharged.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is that the Bill that came up to-day?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: This is a Bill that was recently referred to the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, and their recommendation is that it be not proceeded with this session.

Motion agreed to.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT.

Hon. F. B. CARVELL moved that the amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 41 to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act be read the second time and concurred in.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What are the amendments in question?

Mr. CARVELL: As the Bill was drafted it provided that the Minister of Public Works alone should have the right to say what works might be forcibly removed from the navigable streams, and also that he alone should have the right to state what works might be placed in the stream. When we came to examine the situation we found that the harbours of Montreal and Vancouver, and wherever there are harbour commissions, are really under the control of the Marine and Fisheries Department. Therefore when the Bill went to the Senate we had its provisions changed, otherwise it would have taken away from that department their jurisdiction over those national harbours.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN moved that the amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 53, respecting the Civil Service of Canada be read a second time and concurred in.

He said: The amendment to section 34 is the insertion of the word "transfer" in the first line after the word "appointment" so that the section will now read: "So much of this Act as relates to appointment, transfer and promotion," and so on. Section 41 is amended so as to provide that no person shall be admitted to any examination unless he has been a resident of Canada for at least three years. As the section stands now it reads "one year." The last section of the Bill, which is the repeal clause, was changed in three particulars. In the first place, certain provisions respecting the selection of reporters and assistant reporters and clerks and servants under the provisions of the Supreme Court Act, are repealed. The provisions regarding employees of the Post Office appointed in the statutes of 1912, known as case examiners, are repealed also. They hold the examination of the railway mail clerks. Just why they are called case examiners I cannot recollect at the moment. My hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) might tell me that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend mentions the reporters of the Supreme Court.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The provisions of the Act—

Mr. LEMIEUX: Do not apply?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, they have been repealed.

Mr. BUREAU: Under what clause would that come?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is in the repeal section.

Motion agreed to, and amendments agreed to.

BILL TO AMEND CHAPTER 39 OF THE STATUTES OF 1917.

On the order for the second reading of Bill No. 72, to amend chapter 39 of the statutes of 1917—Sir Robert Borden:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This is a contentious Bill, Mr. Speaker.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Is it contentious?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Then we will not take it to-night.

LEAD BOUNTIES.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN moved that Order No. 25—resolution in favour of continuing in force the provisions of the Lead Bounties Act, 1913—be discharged.

Motion agreed to.

THE ZINC BOUNTIES ACT, 1918.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN moved the second reading of Bill No. 109, to provide for the payment of bounties on zinc produced from zinc ores mined in Canada.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understand that there may be some discussion upon this Bill. I would suggest that it stand until the next sitting.

Motion stands.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACT AMENDMENT.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We might take Bill No. 117, to amend the Bills of Exchange Act. It is not on the Order Paper, but it is printed.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: It is not distributed yet.

Mr. DOHERTY: Some copies were distributed this morning. The purpose of the Bill is merely to amend the Banking Act to provide that a bill of exchange may be protested at half past two in the afternoon instead of three o'clock. It is a great convenience to the bankers, and does no harm to any one.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has it the fiat of the Bankers' Association?

Mr. DOHERTY: It has been asked for by the Bankers' Association. I move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

The House went into committee on the Bill, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1:

Mr. LEMIEUX: What will the public think of this change?

Mr. DOHERTY: It merely makes a man's note subject to protest half an hour sooner than it otherwise would be. A very large number of young men have voluntarily enlisted from the staffs of the banks and others are taken under the Military Service Act. If the banks are obliged to defer action until three o'clock in the afternoon, they have to keep their staffs, now greatly reduced, working very late.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is this intended to be permanent?

Mr. DOHERTY: Only during the war, and a year after.

Mr. CAHILL: Suppose a man's note was protested at half past two and the bank is open for deposit until three? He might expect by three o'clock to have money in the bank to cover the note?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is proposed that the banks shall close during the period of the war at half past two o'clock. The banks might do that without any amendment to the Banking Act, but the Act provides that obligations not paid cannot be protested until three; and that is the purpose of the change.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

On the motion of Sir George Foster, the House adjourned at 2.39 a.m., Thursday.

Thursday, May 23, 1918.

The House met at eleven o'clock.

REPORT OF PRINTING COMMITTEE.

Mr. HUGH CLARK (Bruce N.) presented the Report of the Joint Committee on Printing, as follows:

The Committee desire to commend to the consideration of the Government the matters referred to in the following resolution adopted by the Committee:

Resolved, that in the opinion of this Committee, the building now occupied by the Printing Bureau contains ample space for the work to be done:

That the policy of the King's Printer should not be to extend the premises, but to make a better selection in the character of the plant, by discarding obsolete machinery and replacing it by more up-to-date machines better suited for the character of work;

That the system of carrying a large amount of standing matter should be done away with as far as possible to save space and expense;

That a system of pension if necessary, to old employees whose services may warrant such action should be adopted and the staff thereby reduced in number, which in the opinion of this Committee, would not interfere with but would add to the efficiency of the plant.

In recommending the renewal of the plant it is the opinion of the Committee that fewer and more up-to-date machines would increase the product and reduce the number of men required for the operation of the plant, making a saving in the amount of wages paid.

[Mr. Doherty.]

QUESTIONS.

PAYMENTS TO SIR CHARLES FITZPATRICK.

Mr. NICKLE:

1. Is it the intention of the Government, in the event of voluntary repayment not being made by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick of the $5,000 paid him to cover expenses in connection with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council for the fiscal years 1915-1916 and 1916-1917, and not incurred nor disbursed, to take steps to recover this amount?

2. If not, why not?

3. Does the explanation given by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick in the memorandum read to the House by the Prime Minister on May 15, for the acceptance of the said sum, express the practice and policy of the Government?

4. Are payments of the nature of those referred to in the statement of Sir Charles made without the concurrence or consent of the Auditor General?

5. If so, why?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. No. In view of criticism made in the House of Commons, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick has offered to return the amount mentioned although he strongly urges that he is legally entitled thereto under the Act of Parliament which authorized the payment. In this opinion the Department of Finance and the Auditor General concur.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. The explanation referred to as given by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick does not purport to express any practice or policy on the part of the Government but merely the views of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick as to the effect of the legislation governing the payment of the allowance and his rights thereunder. In this connection the following additional letter has been received by the Prime Minister from Sir Charles Fitzpatrick:

My dear Prime Minister,—

May I trouble you again with reference to the payments made to me as a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General to which objection has been taken by two or three members of the House of Commons as having been accepted by me contrary to the terms of the Parliamentary appropriation which authorized them.

Dealing first with the "special allowance to the Chief Justice to cover travelling and other expenses in connection with his services while acting as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General"; as you are aware, during the early years of Confederation, the rule assigned to the Administrator one-half of the Governor General's salary. Subsequently this provision was considered neither just nor advantageous when applied to a Governor General when absent from his Government for a brief period either on leave or on the Public Service. As a result the emolument was reduced, about 1875, from one-half to one-fourth. In 1906 the question was again reconsidered and it was then decided that it did not comport with the dignity of the high office of Representative of the Sovereign in this country to make abatements of his salary and the regulations which authorized them were revised so as to provide that in case the Governor General of Canada was absent for a period of thirty days consecutively there should be no reduction of his salary for reason of such absence. In 1907, another change was made which provides that in any case of absence although exceeding thirty days no deduction should be made for the period of twenty-nine days.

Subsequently it was thought proper that the Administrator should receive a fixed sum of $2,500 in lieu of those allowances. At a later date the Government thought proper to increase this allowance from $2,500 to $5,000. That this latter amount was voted with the sanction and approval of Parliament cannot be doubted. For two years, the amount was put in the estimates and voted in the regular way and paid without protest. In the estimates for 1917-18 as originally brought down, that special allowance was reduced to $2,500, but on the 19th September, 1917, as will be seen on reference to Hansard, p. 6049, an item was introduced in the supplementary estimates "to complete the special allowance for the Chief Justice so as to make it equal to that allowed the previous years, $5,000." This did not pass unnoticed; Mr. Edwards, M.P., drew attention to this increase and asked for an explanation, which explanation was given by Mr. Reid, the minister in charge of the estimates, who said it had always been the custom to pay this amount to the Chief Justice "and the Government feel that as he has been receiving $5,000 for the positon it is hardly fair to reduce it at the present time." It was also intimated that the payment was made partly for the purpose of implementing the salary of the Chief Justice. Although the allowance is made to me personally I have always paid over the proportion due to the senior puisne judge of this court who has acted as Administrator during my absence.

Dealing now with the two payments of $2,500 each, made to me as a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, one during the fiscal year 1915-16 and the other during the fiscal year 1917-18.

The amounts in question were voted by Parliament as "special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses in connection with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council"—the provision in regard to "travelling expenses" attending sittings of the Judicial Committee which was a condition of payment in previous years, having been intentionally omitted—and were paid in monthly instalments on application from the Privy Council office to the Auditor General who evidently certified in the usual course that the cheques asked for might be properly issued by the Finance Department.

I perhaps never gave the matter as much consideration as I ought to have done but my view was that an allowance to cover expenses differed from the payment of actual expenses and was at any rate not dependent on their being incurred in any particular period. The expenses of attending the sittings of the Judicial Committee must always vary with the length of the sittings and of course attendance is not necessarily confined to one sitting in the year. If there were more than one attendance in any one year the expenses would certainly exceed the allowance.

The war has brought about an exceptional state of things. Though I have offered each year to go over to assist at the sittings of the Committee I have been advised that it was not considered necessary to ask me to do so under the conditions actually obtaining.

The fact that this exceptional position had continued for two years no doubt properly called for an alteration in the vote and this was made for the fiscal year 1917-1918.

I do not think that any representations of mine can be responsible for the view which I suppose both the Auditor General and the Finance Department must have held that the payments could be properly made.

If, however, it is now considered that the intentions of Parliament have been misunderstood I can only say that I shall be prepared to return the amount of the allowance received during the two years in question. My first object is to avoid all personal embarrassment to you.

Yours very truly,

C. Fitzpatrick.

4. No. The allowances in question were drawn with the concurrence of the Auditor General and of the Department of Finance.

5. Answered by No. 4.

CONCURRENCE IN ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I move, seconded by Mr. Carvell:

That the Orders in Council, copies of which were laid on the table of the House on the 2nd of April, be concurred in.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: As a rule these Orders in Council are considered in Committee of the Whole because it is more convenient to discuss them in Committee than with Mr. Speaker in the Chair. I have looked at the Orders in Council referred to in the motion and I see nothing of any importance in them, so that possibly we can approve of them, without going into Committee, if my hon. friend will call attention to any particular one of them which may be of importance. As I am advised at present, and from a cursory glance at them, I see nothing objectionable. They appear to be in most respects merely technical Orders in Council.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I most respectfully protest, as one member of the House, against this procedure. Yesterday morning there was a Bill brought in here and not ten members of the House knew what the Bill was about, nor could we hear one word of what transpired in the discussion of it. I speak in all kindness, and I say it is most painful to have to sit here and not know what business is being discussed before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question before the House is a motion for concurrence in certain Orders in Council, notice of which has been on the Votes and Proceedings for some time.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It would appear that most of these Orders in Council are purely technical, and so far as my information goes at the present time, they are unobjectionable. The objection of my hon. friend (Sir Sam Hughes) is well founded. We have to take these rather on trust than anything else. For my part I am satisfied, because I have looked at them, and possibly I am the only man in the House who has done so.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is the fault of hon. members themselves if they have not looked at these Orders in Council, because they have been on the table of the House for a considerable time. The statute provides that such Orders in Council shall be laid on the table of the House within a certain number of days after the session opens, and that was complied with, and they have been here for the use of hon. members.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is the fault of the Government who brought them down so late.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, no.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes, yes.

Mr. BUREAU: The Order in Council that was brought down yesterday did not lie on the table of the House all session.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I was not speaking of that one; I was speaking of those Orders in Council which have been on the table of the House ever since thirty days after the opening of the session.

Motion agreed to.

PENSIONS.

MOTION THAT THE REPORT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE UPON PENSIONS BE COMMENDED TO THE CONSIDERATION OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Hon. N. W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Power:

That the recommendations contained in the third report of the Special Committee, appointed on the 10th day of April, 1918, to consider and report upon the Pension Board, the Pension Regulations and the sufficiency or otherwise of the relief afforded thereunder, the Pension lists in force in Canada for disabled and other soldiers and the dependents of those killed while on active service, and any other matters relating thereto or connected therewith, be commended to the consideration of the Government.

[Sir Sam Hughes.]

Mr. ROBB: I draw attention to the fact that Mr. Power is not in the House.

Mr. ROWELL: I have no objection to let the motion stand until Mr. Power comes in. Mr. Power was a member of the Pensions Committee and it was arranged that he should second the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion can be seconded by Mr. McCurdy.

Mr. ROWELL: It was understood it would be seconded by a member of the committee representing the other side of the House.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Why don't you whisper what you are saying?

Mr. ROWELL: I said it was understood that the motion would be seconded by a member of the committee on the other side of the House.

Mr. D. C. ROSS: I will second the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion is seconded by Mr. Ross.

Mr. ROWELL: As the report contains two or three recommendations of great importance in reference to the regulations governing the granting of pensions it is perhaps due to the House that I should say a few words in explanation of some of the most important recommendations.

The members of the House will recollect that the existing pension regulations are based upon a report of a committee of this House made in the year 1916, who at that time carefully considered the whole question. That committee presented certain recommendations which were approved by the House and passed on to the Government, and the Order in Council creating the Pensions Board and establishing the principles upon which pensions should be granted were based upon the report of that committee.

In order that we may better understand the recommendations of the committee now before us, I wish to draw the attention of members of the House to two or three clauses in the existing regulations.

The first clause of the existing pension regulations provides for the appointment of a Board of Pension Commissioners each of whom shall hold office during good behaviour for a period of ten years from the date of his appointment. A permanent commission was created, it being the view of the House at that time that the pensions should be administered by a board independent of any department of the Government. Then by regulation No. 2 it is provided:

2. Subject to the regulations hereinafter set out, the Commission shall have exclusive jurisdiction and authority to consider and make all grants and payments of military and naval pensions, and of gratuities, allowances and assistance to persons wounded, injured or incapacitated in the military or naval service of Canada (hereinafter called members of the forces), or to their dependent relatives, and shall have exclusive jurisdiction and authority to deal with all matters pertaining to such pensions, gratuities, allowances and assistances. (P.C. 1334, June 3rd, 1916.)

Sir SAM HUGHES: What has the board power to do? We cannot hear two consecutive words; we can only hear a word occasionally.

Mr. ROWELL: The board has exclusive jurisdiction and authority to consider and make all grants and payments of military and naval pensions and all gratuities, allowances and assistance to persons wounded, injured or incapacitated in the military or naval service of Canada, or to their dependent relatives; the board has exclusive jurisdiction and authority to deal with all matters referring to such pensions, gratuities, allowance and assistance. The Board of Pension Commissioners has exclusive jurisdiction within the scope of the regulations to deal with the matters enumerated.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is that subject to any appeal?

Mr. ROWELL: There is no appeal. That was the recommendation of the House at the time. Regulation No. 5 provides:

There shall be no appeals from the decisions of the Commission, but every applicant for a pension, gratuity, allowance or assistance may present his or her case either personally or by counsel before the full Commission sitting for the purpose of hearing the complaints of those who may have been dissatisfied with the decisions given in the ordinary course of administration.

This provides for a review by the whole board, at which the applicant can be present in person or by counsel.

Mr. MORPHY: Is it intended that the commission shall sit only in one central place, or will it be a commission which can go to sit in different parts of the country so as to reach the people?

Mr. ROWELL: There is no limitation with respect to that. The members of the commission may travel through the country, and I understand they made a trip west last year or the year before. In this respect they can sit in the same manner as the Board of Railway Commissioners in different places. But the permanent headquarters are in Ottawa, where the administrative work is carried on.

Sir SAM HUGHES: A great many of these applicants for pensions are persons who are not accustomed to conduct business transactions. Is there any provision that there shall be any barrister or other officer who will look after the interests of those whose petitions for pensions have been presented? In the earlier period there were a great many cases where petitions fell down because of the failure of such persons to properly present their claims.

Mr. ROWELL: There is no provision in the existing regulations for the appointment of any person to represent the applicant.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I think there should be.

Mr. ROWELL: It was stated before the committee that the proceedings were very informal and that any person by writing a letter or forwarding a communication could have his or her claim taken up and considered. That was the statement made to us by members of the Board of Pension Commissioners.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It might be worth while considering whether it would not be well to have a regularly appointed officer for that duty. Some man or some woman should be appointed to an official position, who would properly present these claims. For example, I have had a claim forwarded to me this morning but I have not had time to go into the details. I do not think this duty should be imposed on the Militia Department because after all it is not within the scope of the business of that department. There should be an officer who would prepare the case for the board and see that justice is done to those persons who do not know the technicalities surrounding these applications. That is a suggestion which I throw out to the Government.

Mr. ROWELL: When the Government comes to consider the other suggestions the suggestion of my hon. friend will be considered. I refer to clause 7 of the existing pension regulations which says:

All pensions awarded to members of the forces shall be determined by the disability of the applicant without reference to his occupation prior to enlistment.

And clause 9 says:

No deduction shall be made from the amount awarded to any pensioner owing to his having undertaken work or perfected himself in some form of industry.

The principle underlying the existing regulations in respect to the award of pensions approved of by the House in 1916, is that the amount of the pension should be determined by the percentage by which the applicant's ability to earn a livelihood in the general labour market has been impaired by service, and that his prior occupation should not be taken into consideration in determining the amount of the pension, nor should his earning subsequent to the disability be taken into account in considering the award.

Mr. EDWARDS: Do they take into consideration the physical condition of the man previous to enlistment? I shall put it this way—I have heard of some cases where disability has been claimed by the returned soldier and the report has been to the effect that he was partially physically incapacitated at the time he enlisted, and a deduction is made from the pension on that account. I take the ground that if a man passed the examination and was put in Class A and sent overseas, we should assume that he was in perfect physical condition at the time he enlisted, and that no board has the right to assume that his physical condition was not perfect when his services were accepted for overseas.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend will find that the point he mentions is dealt with in the recommendations, and I shall refer to it later. The existing law requires the Board of Pension Commissioners to take into consideration the disability of the man, if disability existed at the date of enlistment, and the pension is based on the aggravation of that disability. In other words, the State pays for the additional disability from which the man suffers due to service. However, that particular matter is dealt with in the recommendations of the committee and, as I say, I shall refer to it later on.

There is a scale of pensions established under the existing regulations. I need not take the time of the House to go into details this morning, further than to state that I think the House would be interested in knowing how our scale of pensions compares with that of other countries at war. That matter came before the committee in view of the suggestion that there should be certain changes in the existing scale of pensions in Canada. The scale of pensions as recommended to the House by the Pensions Committee of 1916 and adopted by the House at that time, together with the present scale of pensions and the pensions in force in Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, France, the United States and Italy, will be found in the comparative statement on page 121 of the proceedings of the Committee on Pensions now before the House. That comparative scale is as follows:

(1) COMPARATIVE TABLES—PENSIONS PAID BY ALLIED COUNTRIES.

	Canada. (new scale).	Canada. (old scale).	Great Britain.	Australia.	New Zealand	France.	United States.	Italy.

Compensation for partial disability is a percentage of total disability equal to the reduction in earning capacity. A schedule of disability ratings will be adopted.	3 classes.

It will be seen from this scale that the pension for total disability in Canada is higher than that in any country at war.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is there any distinction drawn between "honourable wounds" and "dishonourable wounds," or is it just the physical condition of the man that is considered when his pension claim comes up.

Mr. ROWELL: There is a provision in the pension regulations which bears upon that. Section 20 of the existing pension regulation is as follows:

> 20. No pension or allowance shall be paid to a member of the forces or any person dependent upon him when the disability or death in respect of which the claim is made was occasioned by the intemperance or improper conduct of such member, unless the Commission otherwise consent.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is in the old pension regulations?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I heard it was omitted from the new regulations.

Mr. ROWELL: Nothing was taken out of the old regulations, but certain recommendations have been made for modifications of these regulations. It will be seen by a reference to the above table that in the provision of pensions for widows the Canadian scale is higher than that of any other country at war.

The net result is that Canadian pensions are substantially higher than the pensions of any of the other countries at war. It is only fair, however, to point out that in the case of the United States, in addition to the pension, they have a provision for insurance whereby any soldier enlisting in the American forces may take out insurance ranging from $1,000 to $10,000. But the cost of the insurance is deducted from the soldier's pay; he pays for it himself. Of course, he gets the insurance at a very reasonable rate as the extra premium because of war hazard is not added to the ordinary premium.

Mr. SHEARD: How is the insurance for the American soldier taken out?

Mr. ROWELL: It is under an arrangement with the United States Government.

Mr. FIELDING: And not through insurance companies?

Mr. ROWELL: My recollection is that it is under an arrangement made by the Government of the United States. The result is this: That in a case where a United States soldier takes out insurance ranging from $1,000 to $4,500, the Canadian soldier would receive more under our pension scale than would the American soldier, under both pension and insurance, although the Canadian soldier is not called upon to pay the premiums that the American soldier would have to pay on a policy ranging from $1,000 to $4,500.

Mr. MORPHY: Is the American soldier's insurance against disability as well as death, or what is the nature of it?

Mr. ROWELL: I am informed by my hon. friend (Mr. McCurdy) that it is only life insurance and does not cover disability. But, if the insurance taken out by the American soldier is $5,000 or exceeding $5,000, then under certain conditions the dependents of the American soldier may receive more under the American system of pensions plus the insurance than would the dependents of a Canadian soldier. But, in the meantime the American soldier has had to pay for carrying the insurance.

It was suggested to the committee that we should adopt the system of state insurance for our Canadian soldiers and add it to the existing pension system. The view of the committee was that if some such system had been adopted at the beginning of the war and if our pension system had then formed part of it, the two might have been worked out in a practicable way. But at the present time in view of the fact that we have adopted a scale of pensions which is higher than that of any other country, and in view of the fact that so many casualties have already occurred, the committee did not favourably consider the proposition to introduce at the present time a system of state insurance for our soldiers in addition to the present pension scale.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That matter was considered at the very beginning but uncertainty as to the length of the war and lack of general information on which to base a judgment were factors in the determination that it was not worth introducing an insurance system at that time.

Mr. ROWELL: In any case, under the existing regulations our soldiers will come out as well, if not better on the whole, than the soldiers of any other country.

Another question was pressed upon the attention of the committee—and I mention it because it is dealt with in the evidence but is not touched upon in the report—that is of the inequality of pensions between officers and men. There again, if the principle of equal pensions had been adopted at the outbreak of the war, many members of the committee would have approved of the principle, and they do approve of it in theory. But in view of the fact that the war has been going on for four years and officers and men alike have gone overseas on the basis of the existing regulations which give higher pensions to officers and men, the committee thought it would not be fair now to suggest a change in the principle and provide for an equality of pensions for officers and men.

Mr. EDWARDS: Is that on the ground that there was a contractual agreement?

Mr. ROWELL: Some put it on the ground that there was a contractual agreement and, while others did not put it on that ground, the conclusion was that it was not desirable to recommend a change in the system at this time.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Do not all nations recognize inequality in this respect as between officers and men?

Mr. ROWELL: I believe so, with the exception of the United States. The committee was informed that the United States did not recognize that distinction.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The United States pensions for the officers are far greater than the pensions for the men.

Mr. ROWELL: We were advised in the committee by the solicitor for the Pension Board, and he stated it very clearly, that in the present pension regulations of the United States officers and men stood upon the same footing.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Nothing of the kind, unless there has been some change recently.

Mr. ROWELL: Another matter urged upon the attention of the committee and with reference to which no recommendation appears in the report was that we should supplement the pensions now being received by the reservists of allied countries who lived in Canada at the outbreak of the war, so as to bring them up to the standard of the pensions now being paid in Canada.

In connection with that suggestion, the committee secured information as to the number of reservists of the different allied countries who had left Canada to fight in the armies of their own countries.

There were 3,232 British reservists in Canada at the outbreak of the war. Of this number 2,779 left at once and joined the colours; 153 were serving in the permanent forces, 194 were found physically unfit for active service, and 106 were unaccounted for.

The Belgian Consul General estimated the number of Belgian reservists at about 1,100. The French Consul General estimated the number of French reservists as 5,000. The Italian Consul General put the number repatriated through the consulate at 5,000, and those repatriated voluntarily between 2,000 and 3,000.

After giving the matter the most careful consideration, the committee reached the conclusion that at the present time they could not recommend that the pensions of these reservists should be supplemented. The committee thought that, in view of the obligations Canada has undertaken we were discharging our duty by providing pensions on the scale at which they are established for our own soldiers.

Sir SAM HUGHES: There were a great number of these reservists, belonging to various countries, who at the beginning of the war came from the United States and were forwarded from Canada overseas. They certainly should not be charged to Canada.

Mr. ROWELL: The existing pension regulations only cover those who enlisted in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and the committee did not see its way clear to recommend any extension of that at the present time.

There was presented to us the question as to whether we should not supplement the pensions of the Canadians who have enlisted in the Imperial Service: the Royal Flying Corps, and other branches of the Imperial Service. That appealed very strongly to many members of the committee, but on the whole the committee considered that in view of the situation at the present time we should not enlarge the scope of the regulations, but confine it as the regulations now confine it, to members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force and Canadian naval force.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is a Canadian fighting in a British regiment not recognized under our Pension Act?

Mr. ROWELL: No. He is recognized under the British Pension Act.

Sir SAM HUGHES: And we do not recognize him?

Mr. ROWELL: He gets his pension from Great Britain.

Sir SAM HUGHES: We deliberately induced a great many Canadians to leave the Canadian service and enter the British service. Surely these men who enlisted in our service and who, by an arrangement with the British Government were taken over to the Imperial service, should receive a Canadian pension. It is not fair to these boys not to recognize them. I think they should be given Canadian pensions.

Mr. ROWELL: The committee considered the matter, and it appealed very strongly to many members of the committee, but I want to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the report of the committee recommends that a committee be appointed at the opening of next session with the view of considering the whole matter and of drafting a pension law which will be submitted to Parliament. Many of these questions will be considered then when we come to pass a permanent law.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWELL: In the brief time at the disposal of the committee they did not feel they could do justice to a matter of that kind.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Do the regulations provide that the pension shall begin immediately when the military pay ceases? In other words, will the pay of the soldier continue until the pension begins? That is a point about which we have had a great deal of trouble.

Mr. ROWELL: That is an understanding between the Department of Militia and the Pensions Board. I think they are working at the present time on the basis that the separation allowance and assigned pay should continue for three months and then the pension commences. I think there is a conference now being held with a view to shortening that period and having the pension commence at an earlier date. At all events, that is the desire of the department.

Paragraph 9 of the recommendations of the committee deals with the question raised by my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), and I shall read that paragraph:

9. That no deduction should be made from the pension of any member who has served in a theatre of actual war, other than the United Kingdom, on account of any disability or disabling condition existing prior to enlistment, provided that the pre-enlistment disability or disabling condition had not been wilfully concealed by the said member, or was not obviously apparent in said member at the time of enlistment.

In other words, the Committee recommends that the existing regulations be changed so as to provide that if a man actually gets to the front and serves in France, that fact shall be deemed adequate evidence that he was physically fit at the time of enlistment, and the question of any prior disability shall no longer be taken into account in the case of a man who has actually served at the front, unless it was concealed at enlistment or was obvious.

Mr. MORPHY: Suppose he did not serve in France but served in England?

Mr. ROWELL: The Committee did not see fit to suggest a change in the existing regulations in that respect. They considered that if he was in fact partially disabled at the time of enlistment and did not actually get to the theatre of the war and take part in it, the existing regulations would continue to apply, and the pension would be based on the aggravation of the disability rather than on the total disability.

Mr. MORPHY: May I cite a case that I have had communicated to me. A young man had what they call a football knee, the infirmity attaching to which only appears at certain intervals. He went over to England, and is now back drawing a pension of $20 a month, and the only disability he has is his football knee which he took over with him.

Mr. ROWELL: That would be a case in which the Pension Commission had not discovered the prior disability when awarding the pension. In a case of that kind an opportunity for revision is open to the Pension Board, and I assume it would be their duty to review it when further information comes to their knowledge.

Mr. MORPHY: I remember being in the House when wholesale charges were made by members of the Opposition concerning defective medical inspection, particularly at the time of the first rush of volunteers. There may be very many cases similar to that which I have mentioned, and I think the Pension Board should have machinery at its disposal to eliminate all fraudulent claims for pensions.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Is there any time limit within which a pension must be applied for? If a man should defer his claim for a number of months or for a year, is he debarred from making his claim for a pension? In fact, his injury may not have developed at the time of his discharge and he can only learn it from experience.

Mr. ROWELL: He has two years from the date of his discharge within which to make his application. In fact, it is not necessary under the regulations to make application for a pension. When a man is discharged, or prior to his discharge, the report of his medical board is passed on to the Pension Board, and if it is a case for a pension it is the duty of the board to investigate and to award a pension.

Then, recommendation No. 10 makes a change in the existing regulations:

10. That pensions should be awarded for disability in accordance with the rank or acting rank of the member at the time the disability was incurred; that no variation in rank after such disability is incurred should affect any pension. The word "disability" as used in this paragraph means such a disability as unfits a member for service in a theatre of actual war, other than the United Kingdom; and that any award heretofore made should be reviewed and determined for the purpose of future payments in accordance with the provisions herein mentioned.

Under the existing regulations a pension is awarded on the basis of the rank of the pensioner at the date of discharge, and the man who has suffered a disability, and thereafter serving either in Great Britain or in Canada, away from the actual theatre of war, might be promoted in the ordinary course of military service and thereby receive a larger pension. The committee reached the conclusion that a pension should be awarded on the basis of the rank held by the man at the time he incurred the disability, and the committee has so reported.

Section 25 of the recommendation introduces another important principle to which I desire to direct the attention of the House. Section 25 is as follows:

25. That the regulations now in force with regard to the awarding of pensions to dependents should be amended so as to provide that a parent, or a person in the place of a parent, who was not wholly or materially maintained by a member at the time of his death, and who at a subsequent time becomes dependent, may be awarded a pension provided he or she is incapacitated, either mentally or physically, from earning a livelihood, and if in the opinion of the Commission the member would wholly or to a material extent have maintained such parent or person had the member not died.

The House will see that this introduces to a limited extent the principle of prospective dependency. Where a man has not up to the date of his enlistment materially contributed to the support of his parents, and the parents subsequently become dependent, pension may be awarded under the conditions mentioned in this regulation. It was designed to apply to cases of this character: parents in humble circumstances have provided out of their limited resources for the education of their boy, and he has gone to the front and has fallen in action. He had not contributed anything to their support up to the time of his enlistment, but his parents had reasonable expectation that he would contribute to their support in their old age. Under these conditions the committee thought that provision should be made for a case of that kind.

These matters to which I have referred outline the more important changes in connection with the recommendations of the committee, and I have much pleasure in moving that the report of the committee be received. I recommend it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Mr. SHEARD: Are these changes merely suggested for the consideration and approval of the Government? Shall we have a chance to consider them at a future date thoroughly in detail before they are finally adopted and passed into law?

Mr. ROWELL: That would depend, of course, on the view the Government would take of these recommendations. The Pension Board have urged upon the Government that some of these recommendations should be put in force without delay, to meet serious cases of hardship which have arisen and which are now pending. It would be quite within the power of the Government to give effect to these recommendations by Order in Council amending the existing regulations. But a general Pension Act will have to be passed sooner or later, and that must necessarily stand over until another session.

Mr. H. F. McLEOD (York-Sunbury): I understand the regulation is contemplated to cover a case such as this which I have in mind—a woman has a son who is just reaching the age at which he would become her support, and he enlists and goes overseas, and is killed. The Pension Board takes the ground that because this boy was not the sole support of his mother at the time he went overseas, she is not entitled to a pension on account of his death. Does this recommendation in the report of the committee change the existing regulation so that that woman may receive a pension on account of the prospective support she would have received from this son had he lived?

Mr. ROWELL: Paragraph 25 of the recommendation of the committee makes provision for such cases of extreme hardship. That is what is contemplated, and that is the change proposed.

Mr. MANION: Will these recommendations be printed and sent to members of the House?

Mr. ROWELL: A resolution already adopted calls for the printing of these recommendations of the committee, together with the evidence given before the committee.

Mr. D. C. ROSS (Middlesex W.): In order to expedite the business of the House I have, in the absence of Mr. Power, seconded the motion of the President of the Privy Council for the reception of this report. I would ask every hon. member of this House, if he can possibly spare the time, to peruse with care the evidence taken before the Special Pensions Committee, and I think he will find it not only very instructive but very interesting. I would refer particularly to the evidence of Colonel Russell in regard to the dealing of the Board of Pension Commissioners with cases of shell shock. The success they are having in the hospitals of this country in treating these cases is so remarkable as to be almost romantic. The committee had before them not only the members of the Pensions Board and their physicians, but also those who might be interested as soldiers, or returned soldiers, and the officers or organizations who have the interest of the returned soldiers at heart. These gentlemen stated their complaints and offered suggestions. If you look at the report of the committee, you will find that the first recommendations are along the line of administration, and suggestions are made that the commissioners were not themselves in as close personal touch with the affairs of the Pensions Board as the interest of the returned soldiers required. As a matter of fact, your committee found that pensions were granted without even the signature of a commissioner.

We thought that, in the interest of the administration of this most important matter, we would recommend that one commissioner at least should append his personal signature to every pension awarded, and that a regulation be passed that these commissioners who were receiving good salaries should devote all their time to this important task. We recommended, also, in order to meet a complaint made by the soldiers, that returned soldiers who have been granted a pension should be notified at once, or as soon as practically possible, of the decision of the board. These matters were all recommended by officers of the Returned Soldiers' Association. Another change was recommended by your committee on account of the evidence given by returned soldiers and by examiners on local medical boards. The question arose—and it was a very important question—as to which was the better board to decide the amount of disability a soldier suffered. It was contended by the returned soldiers—very moderately, but very firmly—that the original examining board, before whom the man appeared and told his story, and where a personal examination was made, was in a better position to determine the amount of his disability than the board at headquarters. On the other hand, it was contended that that examining board was very apt to be influenced by personal sympathy and friendship for the returned soldier, and was likely to make a recommendation in regard to his disability altogether out of proportion to that disability. Therefore, a middle course was adopted and the committee recommended that, in case of a wide variation between the recommendation made by the original board and the recommendation of the board at headquarters as to a soldier's disability, they shall confer together and then, by conferring together, arrive at a conclusion that seems satisfactory and fair to both. In this way the returned soldier will likely get a more careful consideration of his claim than he otherwise would. All these recommendations have been made in the interests of the returned soldier.

The further recommendation is made that these boards be conducted as civil boards and not so much as military boards. The contention was made by the returned soldier—and I can see how it can be justly made—that he comes before two or three doctors, sitting as a medical board, with all the fuss and feathers that go with that sort of thing, the stiffness, the discipline and the fear of his superior officer, so that he can hardly ask a question that he is not contradicted by an officer, and that he is not getting that sympathetic consideration which he thinks he is entitled to. He is not on equal terms with the officer. The contention is also made that an officer receives more favourable consideration than a private. I think that, if we make the recommendation that these medical boards should deal with all soldiers as if they were dealing with civilians, man to man, and not as soldiers dealing with inferiors, or as an officer dealing with a private, it will be in the interest of the soldier and will, I am sure, meet with the approval of the House.

I may say, as has already been said, that we went into the evidence in regard to the pensions given in this country and the pensions given in other countries, and came to the conclusion that the pensions given by the people of Canada to their returned soldiers were more liberal than the pensions given by any other country. We also came to the conclusion that, on account of the promises made to officers who have gone overseas, it would, at the present time, be hardly fair, and hardly in keeping with our pledges to these officers to recommend equality of pension between officers and men. As a matter of sympathy, or of consideration of the station of life in which these officers and men live, there is a great deal to be said in regard to the equality of pensions granted to officers and men. In many cases living in just as elevated a social position as the officers who have gone to the trenches as privates, have done their work just as well, have taken the same risks, and have left the same dependents at home, for whom they care just as much as the officers. If this country were going to war again and establishing a pension list, for my own part, I would favour equality of pensions to our officers and men in the service.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROSS: These recommendations have come from the returned soldiers. One matter which has caused a great deal of anxiety and a great many complaints on the part of the returned soldiers is the fact that when a man goes up to be re-examined he has no assurance that his expenses will be paid. We have made provision for that in section 13, which reads:

13. That whenever a pensioner is required to be medically re-examined he shall be entitled to be paid a reasonable amount for travelling expenses and subsistence or loss of wages.

I think that is only fair.

There are two important changes recommended in this report. Under the old practice pensions were granted to men as at the date of their discharge. I think the pension commissioners were following the rules and regulations in granting pensions on that basis, as those rules and regulations stood, but I do not think it is the right way to do it. It leaves the door open to all kinds of fraud and log-rolling. A man may suffer a disability to-day as a lieutenant, and be entitled to a lieutenant's pension. He may be afterwards promoted to a captaincy, a majority, a colonelcy, probably without good cause, at the instigation of his political friends, and not for merit, and before he is discharged he may be serving in the rank of major. Under the old regulations he would be entitled to a major's pension. I think the recommendation of the committee in this regard will meet with the approval of every member of the House.

Mr. ARTHURS: Where a man of a good family goes over as a private, is injured several times, is afterwards made an officer, and becomes partially disabled, does he receive a private's pension?

Mr. ROSS: It depends on the last disability of the man. If a man went over, was wounded, was promoted to a lieutenantcy and was wounded again, or promoted to captaincy and wounded again, he would be pensioned on the basis of his rank at the time the last disability occurred. But the committee has gone further than that. They have passed another resolution to provide for past cases. They say that if log-rolling has occurred in the past, and men have been given a pension when discharged, we think they should have been given a pension according to rank at the time of their disability, so that they will not be asked to pay back to the country the money they have received in addition to what they should have received, and that in the future their pensions will be based upon the amount they would be entitled to receive as pensions at the date of their disability.

The next important recommendation made by the committee is one already spoken of by the President of the Privy Council, in regard to prospective dependents, and I do not intend to add anything to what the hon. minister said. Many cases have arisen which the Pension Board could not consider under the regulations. They were cases of very great hardship. A woman had been educating a son, for instance, and she had probably taken all the insurance money which she received on account of the death of her husband to educate that son. Many other instances of great hardship could be cited. That woman has sent that son to university, and spent all her money on his education. She was not dependent upon him at the time of enlistment. He was not earning anything, but, under the present regulations, if the boy were killed she would not be entitled to a pension. The committee thought she should be entitled to a pension. The time would have come in that young man's life when he would have supported his mother, and when she would have been dependent upon him. We thought that that was one case in which a pension should be given to a widow. We thought that similar cases should be provided for in like manner.

This committee does not pretend that they have covered the whole field of pension awards. With the evidence we had, we made the best report we could. Our report is along the line of alleviation of the complaints of the returned soldiers, and is an endeavour to give them more liberal consideration than they received under the old pensions. We thought that they deserved this consideration, and I trust the House will approve of the recommendation contained in the report.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver): I would not trespass on the time of the House at this late stage in the session, were it not for the fact that I think I should say a few words in regard to a matter with which my name was connected, which came before the committee—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not interrupt with any idea of suppressing discussion, but we are endeavouring to prorogue to-night, and I would suggest that members make their remarks as concisely as possible and say as little as possible.

Mr. STEVENS: I had no desire to prolong the discussion at all. I have not trespassed on the time of the House at any great length this session. Unfortunately, on account of this question of pensions, I have already incurred the displeasure of some of the ministers, and I desire the opportunity of saying a few words in explanation of my stand on this question. On April 23 I sent a letter to the President of the Privy Council and Chairman of the Pensions Committee. That letter was published in the press, and some hon. gentlemen have stated that I did not extend the proper courtesy to the President of the Privy Council, or to the committee, in that I published the letter before giving them an opportunity of discussing it in committee. That is absolutely not the fact. I did not know the letter had been published, or even that it was before the committee, until I received a communication from the President of the Privy Council. I had nothing whatsoever to do with the publication. I do not regret that the letter was published, or that the matter to which it referred was aired before the committee. My object in bringing it to the attention of the President of the Privy Council was this; that the granting of the pension to Col. Labatt, referred to in that letter, gave clear evidence, in my estimation at least, of a method of administration of the pension laws of this country which was entirely unfair to the rank and file, and showed undue partiality to those in higher ranks. In order to warn the Government of that course of action, and to have it rectified—because I could not conceive that such a course had been pursued with the Government's approval—I sent the letter to the minister. I had no idea whatever that it would be published, or even given to the committee. I still contend, in spite of the report of the Committee, that this matter must receive the attention of this House, of the Government, and of the Pension Board, and must be rectified, or otherwise the country at large will not consider that the pension regulations are being properly and fairly administered. I will give the House a very short comparison of pensions. A man walked 160 miles from the Northland, enlisted at Edmonton, was overseas for two years, was wounded, suffered shell shock, and had one lung permanently affected. He returns to Canada totally useless as far as soldiers work overseas is concerned, and he receives the handsome sum of $20 a month. Col. Labatt comes back to Canada. Whatever may be the justification for the granting of a pension to him, I am not concerned with if the regulations were properly carried out. The regulations need radical amendment. Col. Labatt comes back and receives $2,300 a year. That includes the amount for the children.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And Senator Bradbury.

Mr. STEVENS: I will take the case of a brakeman. A brakeman naturally must be in possession of his physical faculties to carry on his work. I know a brakeman who returned to Canada permanently disabled and unable to carry on his work. He received another job, it is true, but he is incapacitated for the work of a brakeman. He receives $7 a month. I could give many other cases, but I will simply cite the case of a fisherman in my own town. This man worked for years to my personal knowledge as a fisherman.

These three men to whom I refer were physically examined and accepted as perfect specimens. This fisherman went overseas, fought for the country in the trenches, was wounded and came back to Canada. He was given $50 as a sort of gift and told to go. He cannot carry on his former occupation; he cannot fish. When he tries to fish he is crippled with rheumatism, as a result of the winter in the trenches in France. I desire to ask the Pension Commissioners, if Col. Labatt's pension was properly granted, what amount should these men I have referred to be awarded. If, as stated by the Minister of Militia and others, this pension was properly granted to Col. Labatt under the regulations, my contention is that the regulations are woefully amiss. This report tells us that, according to the regulations, labour power is the basis upon which the pensions should be granted. If a man is incapacitated, and unable to go into the open labour market and earn a living alongside of a man digging a ditch, that is the basis upon which his disability is to be awarded. Any man with common sense knows that the major portion of the senior officers who have gone overseas could not, at the time they entered the service, go into the labour market and earn anything. They may be doctors, engineers, lawyers, business men, bankers, or insurance men. It may be that for ten, fifteen or twenty years they were not physically able to go into the labour market, and why in these cases should we make a man's capability of going out into the labour market and earning a day's pay digging a ditch the basis upon which a pension should be granted? The absolute fallacy of this argument is clear, for this reason. Col. Labatt came back to Canada and served for some months in Niagara Camp as manager, or director or commanding officer, or whatever you like to call him. If he was suffering from total disability he was certainly not fit to command the Niagara Camp efficiently. But he comes back and he is capable of commanding this camp. They tell us he is an excellent soldier. He is not only capable of doing that work, but he is placed on the Pension Board. One of the commissioners was unable to give his attention to the matter, but Col. Labatt, on account of his superior ability, gave supervaluable services to the Pension Board, and yet he was suffering 100 per cent disability. If you are going to make the basis of the disability allowance a man's physical strength to go into the open labour market, I say it is absolutely ridiculous and absurd to use that basis, if, on the other hand, you are going to allow men to go into professional life and earn a full living, $5,000 a year. Therefore, I say, if you adopt that as a principle upon which you are going to consider a man's disability, then you have to accept the principle of the levelling of the pensions. You cannot have as the basis of pensions the ability to earn a livelihood in the market on the one hand, and, on the other hand, have a grade of pensions from $7 a month up to $2,300 per year. If you are going to accept as the basis for considering the disability of a man, his capability of earning a living in the labour market, then you have to adopt the policy or principle of the levelling up pension.

Mr. McKENZIE: Must we not, at the same time, recognize the rank of the individual? One thing is a disability, but when you come to the stage of granting the pension, must we not recognize, under the regulations, the position which the individual soldier occupies?

Mr. STEVENS: The principle upon which it is based is this: here is a man who is an officer and therefore is supposed to be of a little superior stamp to a private, and more cultured. His methods of life are more costly, and, therefore, we should give him a higher pension. I call your attention to this. In the volunteer army there are thousands of men who leave good positions, lawyers who have quit their practice, doctors who forsake their practice, business men who give up their business; men by the hundreds and thousands who have ruined themselves financially. These men have gone over, and many of them are in the ranks to-day. These men are just as much entitled to consideration from the social standpoint, or from the standpoint of the standard of living, as the officer, and if you are going to introduce into our pensions system the graduation of pensions, you must recognize the standing of a private or corporal in his social life, but it is not so under the regulations. My point is that the regulations are certainly a long way from being even practicable or reasonable.

Another point I wish to make is that we could prevent the payment of pensions, as far as public servants are concerned, to men who are, we will say, earning a good salary. I am not going to say what that salary shall be, but if a man can come back to Canada and earn $5,000 a year, to be paid out of the public treasury, I contend that he has absolutely no right to claim a pension also from the country in addition to his salary. I do not wish to single out the case of Col. Labatt, but his case has been under consideration. He was receiving from the public treasury, $7,300 per year. I say that is unreasonable. Many of the soldiers of our forces overseas will have been there four or five years before they will return, and we will give them small pensions, as we are bound to do, when they return, because the country will not sanction a handsome pension to 400,000 men. We will offer them a small pension, and I do not think the Government would have the face to go to these men and offer them that small pension, and allow another man to draw $7,300 a year from the public treasury.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: What would you do with a private who came back and took the position of postman? Would you not give him a pension?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. I would make the distinction only when the salary was a reasonable amount, say $1,800 or $2,000—an ordinary livelihood, keeping well above what you might call the poorer classes. It is not the poorer class that go into the public treasury for the amounts I have mentioned. I wish to impress upon this Government, not with any desire to harass the Government, but in all kindness, that they cannot play fast and loose with the soldiers in this country, nor can they play fast and loose with the treasury of the country in regard to pensions or any other expenditure of public money. We have to deal fairly with these matters, and if we want the soldiers to accept the small pensions which we are bound to give them—because we cannot give a high pension to them all— we must not single out any individual class or person for special consideration in regard to the payment of pensions.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If there is a disposition to have a further debate on this question, I desire to intervene at the present time in order to facilitate business, and I move that we proceed to Government Orders, so that we may dispose of some of the Bills we have recently received from the Senate, and discuss this matter later.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY moved that the amendments made by the Senate to Bill 69, to amend the Criminal Code, be read the second time.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Explain.

Mr. DOHERTY: They consist in the elimination of what I believe to be the most important provisions of the Bill. As I have had occasion to say in regard to another similar question, I would very much prefer to word my motion in this way, that I submit for the moment to these amendments rather than that I concur in them. The provisions of the Bill dealing with the important subject of the raising of the age of consent, concerning which there was, I think, practical unanimity in this House—which, under present circumstances, I think may fairly claim to represent the public opinion of the country—have been stricken out by the Senate. I cannot truthfully say that I am prepared to concur in any action of that kind. On the other hand, there remain in the Bill provisions which have been earnestly asked for, particularly by persons interested in the guardianship and protection of the child, which I would be sorry to see fail of enactment. There are also provisions which have been urged upon me as of great importance to cure a grave evil, more particularly in British Columbia. I refer to the clause amending the provisions with regard to gambling. That, too, is an improvement in the law urgently needed which I would be sorry to see delayed. In order to avoid the postponement of the enactment of these provisions which are left to us—and I cannot but feel that the Bill in its main purposes fails of achieving its effect by reason of the action taken in the other House—I am prepared to accept these amendments.

I understand the reason moving the honourable gentlemen of the Senate in their action striking out these important clauses was mainly that they thought the change effected in the law was so serious that the Government should give it further consideration. And I shall see to it, if I should be here in the coming session, that at the earliest possible moment these hon. gentlemen shall have an opportunity to reconsider the action which they have taken in this instance.

INCOME WAR-TAX ACT, 1917 AMENDMENT.

AMENDMENTS MADE BY THE SENATE CONCURRED IN.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 85, to amend the Income War-Tax Act, 1917.

[Mr. Doherty.]

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Acting Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, by the Income Tax Act of this session, clause 4 of the Act of 1917 was amended so as to make taxable the income received by any person from any source within Canada; that has no relation whatever to incomes derived from business or from investments within Canada by persons ordinarily resident in Canada. For instance, in the Income Tax Act as it now stands, the interest of moneys invested in Canada by persons in Great Britain or the United States was not taxed. The Bill of this year proposed to make such incomes taxable, but it was represented to the Senate and very strong representations yesterday were made to me by certain members of the House, and by persons outside of the House also that this would probably retard the investment of foreign capital in Canada at the present time, or in the near future after the war period. There is a good deal to be said in support of that view, and under the circumstances, the Senate having seen fit to make this amendment to the Bill, and after consultation with my colleagues I am of the opinion the amendment should be accepted.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Is the effect of the amendment to reduce the income liable to taxation, and will it affect materially the revenue from that source?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Only in one respect, that of the income derived from capital investments, that is all.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It does not relieve the investor in Canada?

Hon. Mr. CARVELL: It relieves the resident of the United States who has money invested in Canada.

Mr. ROBB: A resident of Great Britain who has money invested in Canada would be relieved under this?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: In the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday I thought there were several minor amendments made by the Senate to this Bill, but in the Bill which I now have there is only one amendment.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is only one amendment.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is all we are accepting?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is all.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Do we understand that the minister accepts under protest this amendment of a money Bill by the Senate?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, under protest.

THE RAILWAY ACT.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER moved that the Order of the second reading of this Bill be discharged. He said: We have reached a very late hour of the session and there is a general desire to prorogue as soon as possible. Representations have very largely been made by new members of the House to whom the argument was put that, because the Bill had received the assent, after thorough discussion, of the last Parliament, therefore it might be assumed to be representative of the views of the present Parliament. Taking all this into consideration it is thought better not to proceed with this Bill this year, but to take it up at the session next year, and press it to a conclusion.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I have sat on committees of this House in connection with the consideration of this very important railway measure, and we have given consideration, and very serious and long consideration to that Bill, in the last Parliament. This is a measure which the requirements of the country call for, and it is still in committee, and now it is proposed that it shall go over for another year. I am quite willing that it should go over, but on the understanding that it is to be introduced early next session, and that we shall have an opportunity of discussing it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understood the hon. gentleman wanted to put a question. Debate is not in order on this motion.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I should like to know what is the policy of the Government as regards the amendments that have been made by the Senate.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think we might well defer any statement as to the policy of the Government until the time of the introduction of the Bill next year when the policy of the Government will be stated. If that policy were stated now it might only disturb the summer leisure of my hon. friend.

Resolution agreed to.

WAR-TIME ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. Carvell moved the second reading of Bill No. 72, to amend chapter 39 of the statutes of 1917.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This Bill has only two clauses; the first clause is in these words:

(1) Paragraph (g) of Section two of the War-time Elections Act, Chapter 39 of the Statutes of 1917, shall apply only to a General Election.

And the second clause is:

(2) This Act shall be deemed to have come into operation on the eighteenth of March in the year one thousand, nine hundred and eighteen.

This Bill is to come to the relief of my hon. friend the member for Lanark (Mr. Stewart), who was elected a few days ago. Section (g) of the War-time Elections Act, which is repealed by this Act, provides that the delay between the nomination day and the election day shall be one month, amending the general Act, which says that the delay, or the space of time between the nomination and the election day shall be one week. The object of this amendment is to restore the former delay and to provide that the space of time between nomination day and election day shall not be one month, as it was during the last election under the War-time Elections Act, but shall be one week. There was an election in the county of Lanark, owing to the death of our friend and member for this House, the late Dr. Hanna. The Order in Council ordering the issue of the writ was made on the 11th April, and the nomination day was fixed to be on May 2, and the polling day on May 9. The election took place, the nomination being on the 2nd May and the poll on the 9th of May, and our colleague the present member was elected. But the whole election was against the law. The delay between nomination day and the polling day should have been, not one week, but one month, and the second paragraph of this Bill is to validate the election. So far as the election of my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Stewart) is concerned, I have no objection that his election should be validated, but I have very strong objections to its being made valid in the way in which it is being made valid by this Bill, that is, by amending the War-time Elections Act. For my part, I would say that that Act should not be amended, it should be abolished altogether; it should be repealed, and if the Government were ready, or saw fit, to repeal that Act I should have nothing to say about it. But unless they will do so—I will not discuss the question at length, but I wish to record my vote absolutely, at all stages, against this Act, which I regard as an abomination, and, therefore, I move in amendment:

That all the words in the motion after the word "that" be left out, and the following substituted therefor. "In the opinion of this House the War-time Elections Act should be re-repealed."

The House divided on the amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, which was negatived on the following division:

Motion, Hon. Mr. Carvell, agreed to, and Bill read a second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. BUREAU: When this Bill was introduced there was something said about the date of its going into force. Might I ask why this Act was made to go into force as on the 18th of March instead of, as in the ordinary course of procedure, after it had received the sanction of His Excellency?

Mr. CARVELL: There is no question whatever about the reason for it. It has been stated by the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) before the War-time Elections Act came into force seven days elapsed between the day of nomination and the day of election. The War-time Elections Act changed that delay to a month and the proposal now is to bring the law back to where it stood prior to the War-time Elections Act of 1917, and to provide for a lapse of seven days between nomination day and the day of polling. In the election held in the county of Lanark a few weeks ago, the returning officer issued his proclamation giving seven days between nomination and the day of polling. There is a question, and a very serious question, as to whether or not it should have been twenty-eight days, and, in order that there may be no question whatever about it or about the validity of the election, this second clause has been placed in the Bill. I hope there will be no misunderstanding whatever as to the reasons for the introduction of the second clause.

Mr. BUREAU: It is another case of confirming an election by legislation instead of having the proper tribunal decide upon the election according to the law.

Mr. CARVELL: There was no election in this case.

Mr. BUREAU: Then there is no reason for making this Act retroactive to the 18th of March. This gentleman was elected by acclamation, but there was a mistake made in the issue of the writ. As far as the Yukon election is concerned, the House was told that in that case it was at fault, but I hope that this time the country will know that it is not the fault of the House, so that if there is any presumption that the House was guilty with regard to the first error, as to this second error the blame will be laid at the proper door.

Mr. CARVELL: I would like my hon. friend to bear in mind that the writ issued by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery does not fix the date of polling, it orders that the election be held and fixes the day of nomination. The mistake, if such there be, was made by the returning officer who fixed the poll at seven days after the nomination instead of twenty-eight days. My hon. friend (Mr. Bureau) says this is an attempt to confirm an election by legislation I hope he will remember that this election was by acclamation, because only one candidate was nominated, and therefore it could make no possible difference.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Is my hon. friend right? Were not two candidates nominated?

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend is right, two candidates were nominated, but one withdrew a few days after the nomination, so that the difference between seven days and twenty-eight days elapsing between the date of nomination and the polling day makes no difference, because two days after nomination one candidate withdrew so that there is no invalidity so far as the election is concerned, except the mistake of the returning officer, and the object of this second clause is to remedy that mistake, and to validate the election, and I think that there is no harm being done by this Bill.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No harm done, but this is confirming previous harm that has been done.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not going to argue that point.

Mr. BUREAU: There is a doubt, and there is the difficulty. There has been a mistake or there has not been a mistake. And it is not a mistake of this House or of this Parliament, but a mistake of those who have charge of carrying out the provisions of this War-time Elections Act. What I wanted is to have the blame placed where it belongs, whether it be with the returning officer or with anybody else. The returning officer is the officer of somebody, he was not appointed by the House.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: I am very glad indeed that anything should be done to validate this election, because it certainly was not the fault of the member that there was any irregularity. Yet I cannot help thinking that when the nomination was fixed for a certain day, and the polling day was fixed illegally for another day, the whole thing is void, and even an acclamation would not be good. There must be jurisdiction for fixing the day of election as well as for fixing the day of nomination, and if the whole thing is wrong the mere fact that there is acclamation does not validate what was all wrong.

Mr. CARVELL: Does not my hon. friend consider that when the naming of the day of nomination was all right and valid, and where it turned out that there was acclamation, is there anything else necessary further than the fixing of the day of nomination?

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. minister does not quite catch my point; I am sure I am right. The whole thing is the bringing about of an election, that is what we started out to do, so that you must do the whole of it right. It is not admissible that a part of it may be right and a part of it wrong. The officer must have jurisdiction to name two days, a nomination day and an election day, and if he is wrong in the day that he names for the election, the whole thing is wrong, and requires ratification by this Bill,—and I am quite willing that it shall be done. I want to bring out the point that if this election is partly wrong it is all wrong.

There is another thing I want to call attention to, and that is that the old Act was repealed when we established the War-time Elections Act.

Mr. CARVELL: No.

Mr. McKENZIE: Yes, and must there not be something to bring the old law into force again?

Mr. CARVELL: Subsection g of section 2 of the War-time Elections Act amended section 131 of the election law, which reads as follows :

> Except as hereinafter provided the day for holding the polls shall be the seventh day next after the expiration of the day fixed for the nomination of candidates.

This Bill simply proposes to amend it by saying that the amendment as provided by the War-time Elections Act shall only apply to a general election, the result being that when it comes to a by-election, the original section 131 stands, and that that will be the case in future in by-elections.

Mr. McKENZIE: Yes, but you have repealed the section, and put "twenty-eight" in place of "seven" days, and the seven days will not automatically come into force again without legislation.

Mr. CARVELL: This is the legislation.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I want to record my objection to the principle of retroactivity. I am not sorry to see the hon. member for Lanark sitting in this House, but this is a question of principle. It is confirming the new principle that was created a few days ago by the several votes which took place in this House in the Yukon election case. In that case we passed a resolution which was creating virtually a change in the law and giving it a retroactive effect. In this Bill, not only do we declare that paragraph (g) of section 2 of chapter 39 shall apply only to a general election—to that I have no objection, but it makes it applicable to an election which has already taken place, and to that I do object. I do not care for this particular instance, but it is a dangerous precedent to create; it was a dangerous precedent to create in the Yukon case, and that dangerous precedent is now being confirmed by another Bill. Of course, we have a Union Government, and I hope that people in Canada will in future remember that Government as having created a dangerous precedent in this country.

Mr. BUREAU: Why not come out boldly and say: This Act is to confirm the election of Mr. Stewart as member for Lanark? There is no question as to the purpose of the Bill, we all know it; it has been said openly in the House. I move in amendment that subsection 2 of clause 1 shall read:

> This Act shall be deemed to be passed to confirm and validate the election of Mr. Stewart, held on the 18th of March, 1918.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am very serious in my representation to the hon. the minister that this clause does not restore the seven days at all. Every lawyer in this House knows that once an Act is repealed, if the repealing Act is taken away, that does not restore the old law unless it is specifically restored. The result is that if this section passes there is no time at all fixed for holding the elections.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I think it would be well to assure ourselves upon the point made by my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) that the Act of 1917 would be repealed, and that by the section as it now stands the former Act would not be restored.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose we were considering Bill No. 73, to amend Chapter 39 of the Statutes of 197. Section 1 had been read and is being discussed. Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the clause?

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Has the Minister of Public Works given any consideration to the objection raised by the member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie)?

Mr. CARVELL: I will give my view of the matter. I must confess I have not had much time to study it, because I have been very busy since the House rose at one o'clock. But I would like my hon. friend to go back to the War-time Elections Act, section 2, which I will read to my hon. friend.

Mr. BUREAU: Amending section 131?

Mr. CARVELL: Not even that. That is not in the pamphlet at all. Section 2 of the War-time Elections Act reads:

During the present war and until demobilization after the conclusion of peace, Part III of the Dominion Elections Act shall operate and apply as if amended, and shall be deemed to be amended in the following respects:

That is the theory of the War-time Elections Act, that the operation of certain portions of the Dominion Elections Act was suspended. First, I think, Part I was suspended entirely during the period of the war and demobilization. Then Part II was suspended in part. Part III was suspended in part. And by paragraph (g) of section 2 of the Act, section 131 was amended by striking out of the second line of section 131 the word "seventh" and inserting instead the word "twenty-eighth." Now, the original idea was that the operation of section 131 would be suspended during the pendency of this Act.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is specifically amended.

Mr. CARVELL: "Amended, and shall be deemed to be amended."

Mr. McKENZIE: It is amended.

Mr. CARVELL: It is amended, not repealed—that is the point exactly. It "shall be deemed to be amended." It is not actually repealed; it is not actually amended, but during a specific time it shall be considered as if it were amended. When that time arrives, it goes back to normal conditions just as though this Bill had never been passed. Then the present proposal says that " Paragraph (g) of section two of the War-time Elections Act.... shall only apply to a general election," that is, the suspension is removed so far as by-elections are concerned. I put that forward to my hon. friends; and my sole object—I will tell him frankly—that as I view this thing I think this section is properly drafted. I admit it is somewhat involved; I admit that you have to go back to the whole theory of the operation of Part III of the Dominion Elections Act under the War-time Elections Act. But if my hon. friend would prefer it, I am prepared to propose an amendment.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think it would be better to use such language as would restore " seventh " for " twenty-eighth." I have no purpose in the matter except to be as scientific as we can.

Mr. CARVELL: But there is the other side to it. I have had some discussion in the last two hours with the gentleman who prepared this Act. I will give his views. His idea is, and I think there is a great deal in it, that the War-time Elections Act was a lot of changes that were deemed to exist for a given time, and that if the war ceased and the time of demobilization arrived, then the War-time Elections Act would cease to exist and the Dominion Elections Act would stand out exactly as it was without an amendment to it. Now, if we amend section 131, we are making a positive amendment, and when the time comes to change over then you would have a positive amendment or positive enactment, that would necessitate special legislation to repeal. I do not know that it makes very much difference, because I imagine that before another general election takes place this whole election law must be redrafted and codified. Surely we can all hope that the war will be over with before there is another general election. When the war is over, certainly the Dominion Elections Act must come back into force. But in view of the fact that there is a change in the franchise, and that female voters will have the right to vote, at least in all the provinces except two—and I think we can pretty safely say that in all the provinces except one—a change will be required in the Dominion Elections Act. And so I do not think the theory I am now putting forward amounts to very much in practice, because, before there can be another general election, new legislation will probably be required in order to modify the Dominion Elections Act as may be found necessary.

Mr. BUREAU: Will the minister read the amendment he has prepared to show which of the two would be preferable?

Mr. CARVELL: The amendment suggested is:

Notwithstanding anything contained in Chapter 39 of the Statutes of 1917, Section 131 of the Dominion Elections Act, Chapter 6 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, shall be deemed to be amended only in the case of a general election and shall apply without amendment to any other election of a member of the House of Commons.

Mr. BUREAU: That covers it. If I remember rightly, by the War-time Elections Act, in section 131, the words "seven" is struck out and the word " twenty-eight " substituted. Why not add at the end of the section: " This shall only apply to a general election." It is the same thing.

Mr. CARVELL: It is so involved that I would want to consider that amendment.

Mr. McKENZIE: You cannot have the word "seven" in and out at the same time.

Mr. CARVELL: This amendment states the proposal in positive language.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think it is all right.

Mr. CARVELL: And it has also the advantage that it does not interfere with what is supposed to be the general scheme.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister understands what I mean? It is a principle that a certain section repeals another; the repealing one may repeal itself.

Mr. CARVELL: I quite agree.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported and read the third time and passed.

THE ZINC BOUNTIES ACT, 1916.

On motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean (Acting Minister of Finance) Bill No. 109, to provide for the payment of bounties on zinc produced from zinc ores mined in Canada, was read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 2—Bounty on zinc produced in Canada when price is less than £41, 8s 6d.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I wish to amend this section, not to change it in essence, but to make it more understandable. I move:

That section 2 be amended by inserting in the fourth line thereof, after the word "England," the words "or St. Louis, United States, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce may determine"; by striking out the fifth line thereof and the words "hundred and forty pounds" in the sixth line, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "nine cents per pound"; and by substituting the word "pound" for the word "ton" in the sixteenth line and the words "nine cents" for the words "£41"; and by striking out the words "8s and 6d per ton" in the seventeenth line and substituting therefor the words per pound"; and by striking out the word "and" in the nineteenth line and substituting therefor the word "or."

That is, if the standard price is nine cents the producer receives nothing as a bounty. If the price is eight cents, he receives one cent per pound; if the price is eight and one-half cents, the bounty is one-half cent per pound. It is improbable in any event that two cents per pound will be earned as bounty. The section as amended will read as follows:

Whenever it appears to the satisfaction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is charged with the administration of this Act, that the standard price of zinc or spelter in cakes, blocks or pigs, in London, England, or St. Louis, United States, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce may determine, is less than nine cents per pound, the Governor in Council may authorize the payment out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of a bounty on zinc or spelter, containing not more than two per centum of impurities, produced in Canada, at the time the price is as hereinbefore stated, from zinc ores mined in Canada. Such bounty shall be equal to the difference between such standard price per pound and nine cents per pound, as aforesaid, but shall in no case exceed two cents per pound, and in no event shall any bounty be paid when the price received for such zinc or spelter by the producer is nine cents or more per pound.

There may be no London market for zinc within the next two years, and St. Louis is always a very large market. It is in the interest of the industry and of the Government that an alternative market be provided in the event of the London market being destroyed.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. TURRIFF: When this bounty was granted two years ago it was pointed out to the Government of the day that these producers would soon be back for increased bounties or for renewals. We renewed the bounty on lead—

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. TURRIFF: I know that the price of lead has doubled since the bounty was given two years ago. While I am not as well posted on the price of zinc, I have no doubt that it has increased very materially since the bounty was granted. I am aware that the cost of refining zinc is very much greater than it was, but the circumstances show that the moment you grant increased protection or give bounties on these products you start to feed these babies and they come back to the Government from time to time. A great many interests throughout the country are trying to make the war an excuse for seeking consideration to which they are not entitled and which they would not otherwise be given. It is well to point out to these industries that while we in the West are satisfied not to bother about the reduction of duties until after the war, if they try, because of the war, to obtain consideration to which they are not entitled, they may look for trouble in the near future.

Mr. GREEN: There appears to be some misconception in the mind of the hon. gentleman as to what is intended to be accomplished by the placing of this bounty upon zinc produced in Canada.

I hold no brief for the smelter company which, so far as I know, is the only one producing refined zinc in Canada and which is located at Trail, B.C., but I hold a brief for the operators and owners of the mines that are producing the ore from which the zinc is manufactured. Until the time of the war no zinc was smelted or refined in Canada. The industry was built up practically at the request of the Munitions Board which found it very difficult to secure a sufficient quantity of zinc for the purpose of making munitions. They, therefore, entered into an arrangement with this particular concern to build, equip and operate an electrolytic zinc plant. At the time that this plant came into operation the Munitions Board were paying, the Acting Minister of Finance informs me, forty cents a pound for zinc. But at that particular time, the Munitions Board, having made this particular arrangement with the smelter to go into the zinc producing business, also made a contract that what zinc they bought from the smelter they would receive at the price of fifteen cents per pound. That means that while the markets of the world were offering forty cents per pound for this particular kind of zinc, this smelter, under its contract, supplied to the Munitions Board all that it produced at fifteen cents per pound. The ordinary zinc of commerce, or prime spelter, is produced not electrolytically but by what is known as the Belgian or distillation process. That is a very much more economical and cheaper process. At the same time it is a process that takes very much more time for the metal to pass through the various stages before it gets into the finished state. If we in Canada are going to produce from our natural resources the finished product, then we must keep alive this electrolytic process in Canada until one of two conditions is attained, either that the smelter is able to produce zinc electrolytically as cheaply as it is now produced by the Belgian method or that we supersede this method with the Belgian method. We have in Canada vast quantities of zinc ore. We require the zinc in the finished state. In the past any zinc ore that we had in Canada was shipped to the United States and smelted there. This particular industry has been built up, not by the bounty, because as yet it has received no bounty, but by the fact that this company was able to enter into this contract with the Munitions Board.

I wish to say a word or two in connection with the smelting from the point of view of the operator in my part of the country. The operator there has been demanding, and in my opinion rightly so, that a duty be placed upon raw ores coming into Canada, because this company has within the last two years imported something in the neighborhood of twenty thousand tons of ores from the American side. The company gives as its reason that those particular ores were wanted for fluxing purposes, and I am not going to say that their statement is not right, but as we have those ores in Canada, our people should be protected sufficiently to compete with those ores which are imported from the other side of the line. There is amongst the operators a strong feeling that, in the past, they have not received fair treatment from the smelter; that the smelting rates have been too high; that the smelter has not taken the ore from them when they had it to sell; that the smelter in the main favours its own mines as against those of the country generally. I do not know how much of this is true, but I have, in season and out of season, pressed upon the Government my view that they should hold an investigation under a commission so that this matter may be thoroughly gone into, and if the smelter, which is in a sense a public utility, is not treating the public rightly. If this is so, then some action should be taken to make it do so. On the other hand, the managers of the smelter say to-day that if they do not get the protection afforded them by this bounty, they will have to close down their smelter.

Mr. TURRIFF: If the smelter company, which is a very wealthy concern, owned chiefly by the Canadian Pacific, could sell its product at forty cents a pound and it is getting a bounty of only two cents and is selling its zinc at fifteen cents per pound, why should it close down its smelter?

Mr. GREEN: To-day there is absolutely no market in Canada for electrolytic zinc, unless the smelter can produce electrolytic zinc below seven cents per pound, because the price of prime spelter is seven cents per pound to-day, and prime spelter is the particular grade of zinc that is being used commercially, not only in Canada, but in other places. The Munitions Board have absolutely refused to buy any more zinc from this smelter, giving as their reason that large quantities of this particular grade of zinc were purchased for the Russian Government and paid for by the British Government. This particular zinc was not delivered to the Russian Government and is, therefore, on the hands of the British authorities and is being used by them, and they are not in the market for any Canadian electrolytic zinc. The whole proposition is to put this electrolytic zinc on a parity with the prime spelter, so that it can be sold in the same market at the same price.

I was going to say that the Government have agreed to appoint a commission to investigate the whole situation as between the smelter and the producer. That being the case, I think it will be a calamity for the mine owners throughout British Columbia, and possibly in other parts of Canada, if this particular portion of the process that is carried on at Trail should be closed down owing to inability on the part of the smelting company to compete with smelters in other parts of the world.

Mr. CAHILL: I want to voice my objection to bonuses or bounties or protective tariffs in any shape or form. I am not in favour of, and I do not believe in, taking the people's money for any special interest, and this seems to be the same old protective tariff proposition. My hon. friends are bringing out the poor mine owner, but really the party which gets the benefit in this case is the smelter, the rich corporation. If this is a case for special consideration and is an industry which the War Purchasing Board are anxious should be maintained, it seems to me that the smelter company could make a contract with that board for their products and that we could do away with bounty business. It is not right at this time to be loading up the country with additional bounties.

Mr. ELKIN: I notice the minister proposes to change the point at which the price of the smelter will be considered by adding the words "St. Louis." Since this Act went into effect—and I understand practically no bounty has been paid under this Act—the seven and one-half per cent war tax has been imposed, which at the present price of prime spelter gives an increase on the bounty of three-quarters of a cent or seven and one-half per cent on practically ten cents. It is an utter impossibility for this spelter that is made in British Columbia to compete in a commercial way with the ordinary spelter, and I think we should have a little more information as to how the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who will administer this measure, proposes to figure the price at which prime spelter shall be sold in Canada.

If we were to take the prime spelter at St. Louis and permit the British Columbia smelter to compete with it, that will perhaps be very good business from the manufacturer's standpoint, but this spelter that is made in British Columbia is not a good spelter for ordinary commercial purposes, and it seems to me that before we add three-quarters of a cent to this bounty, making it two and three-quarters cents per pound, we should know how the Minister of Trade and Commerce proposes administering this measure. If he is going to figure the price at St. Louis plus the freight and plus the duty of seven and one-half per cent, figuring the price of prime spelter in Canada at eight or nine cents per pound. that is not a serious matter; but if he is going to figure the price at St. Louis, without adding the war tax of seven and one-half per cent which came into effect since this Act was passed, we shall really be giving these people a bounty of two and three-quarter cents per pound instead of two cents.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In this respect the Act is just as it was when it was introduced two years ago. In this Bill, as in the Act now in force, the bounty is payable if the standard price at London or, as in the amended Bill, at London or St. Louis, is nine cents per pound, I suppose, of course, the duty and freight will have to be taken into consideration, but that would not operate in favour of the Canadian producer.

Mr. ELKIN: It gives the producer a further protection of three-quarters of a cent per pound on to-day's prices, and of one cent per pound on the prices of a few months ago. In other words you are protecting this industry by way of bounty to the extent of practically three cents per pound. That is going pretty far in the case of a smelter.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This company at the instance of the British Government and the Munitions Board of Canada, was induced to enter into the manufacture of electrolytic zinc in order that the British Government might have a supply for the manufacture of munitions here and in Great Britain, and for some of the Allied countries. The company made an investment of $2,500,000, and it was agreed between the Government and this company, as an inducement to the latter to enter into the manufacture of this high grade zinc, that the company should receive a bounty under certain conditions as to price, of two cents per pound for two years, payable only after the war. When the company commenced to make the investment, it naturally anticipated that, during the war period at least, it would have in the Allied countries a market that would consume its entire production.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Was not the price limited to fifteen cents per pound?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes. This company eventually produced a great quantity of zinc which was purchased by Great Britain and Russia. When Russia withdrew from the war, that market was, of course, closed to the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company which, at the beginning, always anticipated it would have this market. Great Britain was also expected to be a continuing purchaser of the product of this company. For some reasons, largely financial, Great Britain is obliged to purchase zinc in the United States. Now the smelter company is in the position that it made an investment of $2,500,000 to manufacture this high-grade zinc expecting that it would always have a customer, but now it finds itself without a market and it will have no market unless it can reduce the cost of production of electrolytic zinc to the cost of production of ordinary zinc, that is about seven cents per pound. In 1916, an Act was passed by which it was agreed to pay this company a bounty of two cents per pound whenever the price fell below the standard London price, but that bounty was not to be paid until after the war. The purport of this Bill is to allow the payment of this bounty at once if earned under the conditions stated in the Bill. The amount is limited to $400,000. My hon. friend from Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) was, I think, a member of the original Shell Committee that induced the company to go into the business.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The original Shell Committee had the honour of establishing the zinc industry. At that time the British authorities were paying from forty-two to forty-five cents per pound for zinc in the United States, and under the contract entered into the zinc was to be supplied at fifteen cents per pound. Unless I am misinformed, the price in the United States is not fifteen cents per pound to-day.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The price in the United States as fixed by the Government is twelve cents per pound, but the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company cannot sell at twelve cents, they must sell at nine cents to compete with the other companies producing the lower grade of zinc.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The British authorities were paying forty-two cents per pound at the time we made the arrangement by which the industry of smelting zinc and copper in Canada was established. I did not know that the price of zinc in the United States had fallen to twelve cents. How about the ores imported from the United States? The only objection I have to this measure is that it does not protect our own ore producers sufficiently, but treats the Yankee producers of ore the same as it does the Canadian producer.

Mr. BURRELL: I do not think there are any zinc ores imported from the United States.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Yes.

Mr. BURRELL: Lead ores, but not zinc ores.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The lead is in the zinc.

Mr. BURRELL: No, in the class of ore they have been importing, the zinc would be an extraneous element, so that they do not want it. They do not import ores that have zinc in them. There is one thing that seems to appeal to one pretty strongly, and the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) touched on it. It was the paramount necessity for this zinc for munitions of war that really induced these people to go into the zinc business at all. Certainly, after an expenditure of $2,500,000, they have accomplished wonders, and they would not have required one cent of help if the British Government had been able to live up to their promise that they would take every pound of zinc that could be manufactured, but they have not taken it simply because of the Russian situation, and as they had a credit established in the United States they took an immense quantity of zinc from there, and consequently had to turn around and say: We cannot take any more.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is the reason that our zinc is not being taken by the British Government to-day because the Chairman of the Munitions Board did not advance Victory Loan money for it? That money seems to be for beef and bacon and things of that kind.

Mr. BURRELL: I have never heard that statement.

Mr. ARGUE: How long are we to continue paying this bounty?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is limited to two years and a total of $400,000. Nothing has yet been paid.

Mr. EULER: If it is impossible for this company at the present time to produce the zinc so as to be able to sell it at a price which would give them a return, why should they not follow the practice followed by other concerns under similar circumstances and discontinue business? If the British Government are not in the market for their product, why not discontinue the production of this particular commodity until such time as there is a market for it the same as others have to do?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There will never be a market for it unless they can reduce their production-cost down to the cost of producing ordinary zinc. They embarked in the enterprise practically at the request of the British Government and the Canadian Government, in order that the allied countries might have a supply of zinc. Circumstances have so developed that these countries will not buy, and there is no market for the product. They must sell a high-grade article at the price of a lower-grade article.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What information has the minister as to the reason why the British Government will not buy this zinc? I never heard of it before. I know that they were paying 42 cents a pound and that we saved the British Government millions and millions of dollars by producing it at 15 cents a pound. It is very strange that the British Government, which has been paying 42 cents a pound for zinc, will not buy zinc from us unless they get it for 15 cents a pound. There is something about this that requires looking into. I have heard it said that the reason the Imperial Munitions Board will not buy this zinc is very much the same as the reason why the British Government would not buy fish. The fish had to come from Newfoundland, and $7,000,000 or $8,000,000 was lost to Canada while Newfoundland got the sale of the fish. Probably the zinc will go through the hands of some Yankee concern and they will get the profit. We might as well look into these things.

On section 5—regulations:

Mr. JOSEPH READ: It is apparent to all that when the Government gave notice of this Bill they also gave notice of a Bill to authorize the payment of a bounty on lead. I noticed that in the original lead bounty Bill, clause 5 read in this way:

[Mr. Argue.]

> The Governor in Council may make such rules and regulations, including regulations as to rates and charges for refining, as are deemed expedient in the public interest for carrying out the purpose of this Act and all payments of bounty shall be subject to the due observance of such rules and regulations.

It looks to me as if they had switched from the lead to the zinc in order to avoid that clause. I made a reference to this subject in the Budget debate, and by leave of the House I will recall the fact that on that occasion I read a letter which had been written by a resident of British Columbia. When I read that letter one hon. gentleman said that the man who wrote it was a miner. He is not a miner; he is a medical doctor, and he has taken care of the families of soldiers free of charge ever since the war broke out. He is an altruist and not an egoist. He says—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I cannot allow the hon. gentleman to read from a previous debate on another subject in the same session.

Mr. J. READ: It is not on another subject.

The CHAIRMAN: It is absolutely against the rules of the House.

Mr. J. READ: It is the same subject exactly.

The CHAIRMAN: But it is an altogether different debate.

Mr. J. READ: It is a letter that I read on a previous occasion, but on the same subject.

An hon. MEMBER: It is on Hansard; it is all right.

Mr. J. READ: It is on Hansard. I am only going to read a few words:

> There has been talk about a committee being named to investigate smelter charges. Well, whatever one is named, the Consolidated will put it all over them, because there are very few mining operators in British Columbia who are not in their employ, or who dare find any fault with them. The only plan that would be any good would be a Royal Commission where any one could go before them and volunteer evidence, like what happened to Sir Joseph Flavelle. Any other solution of the difficulty would be a delusion and a snare and worse than nothing.

I would ask the promoter of the Bill to make a substitute for clause 5. That clause reads:

> The Governor in Council may make regulations for carrying out the provisions of this Act.

I suggest the following for a substitute:

The Governor in Council shall appoint a Royal Commission to investigate the rates and charges for refining, transportation, importation of foreign ores and such other matters as is deemed expedient in the public interest for carrying out the purposes of this Act and shall make such rules and regulations and fix such rates for refining as will promote the mining industry of Canada.

If the minister would kindly incorporate that in the Bill it would avoid a great deal of unnecessary discussion.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Quite recently a committee was appointed by the Government to investigate complaints made by independent mine owners in British Columbia against the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company. It was charged that they discriminated against the independent mine owners in favour of their own mines. This committee was appointed upon the suggestion of the mine owners of that district in British Columbia, and I think the personnel of the committee was that suggested by the mine owners who came to Ottawa to confer with the Government. Now, I am told that they desire wider powers in their investigation and require a further sum of money to spend upon that account. But these requests only reached the Government during the last twenty-four hours and we have not had an opportunity of giving them consideration. If it is necessary to create a commission instead of a committee to investigate the grievances of the mine owners the Government would probably agree to that. The Supplementary Estimates contain a vote of $3,000 for this very purpose. I think we are very substantially meeting the suggestion of my hon. friend and I think he should be content with that. I submit that this is very good evidence of a desire on the part of the Government to give every consideration to the complaints of the mine owners of British Columbia against the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company. It is hardly fair to suggest putting this into the Bill in any event.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. J. READ: You are very anxious to create a monopoly, are you not? If what the minister has just said was correct, or if he had not been deceived, I would not say anything about this. But he has evidently been deceived, if he has been told that the miners' association has appointed that committee.

As a matter of fact, the Miners' Association sent down a gentleman named Mr. Caldwell, and he made the statement that they did not want this committee—that the committee was simply a farce and was going to put it over on the miners. They want a royal commission, that will deal fairly and justly as between the Smelting Company and the people of British Columbia. You already have an appropriation in the Estimates and for that sum, or perhaps a little more, provision can be made for an inquiry by a royal commission. The Smelter Company and the Consolidated Company are one and the same thing. That is the worst feature of the matter. And these people have already formed a great monopoly in the province of British Columbia by reason of having this smelter, which is going to be supported by the Government. They are already producing, in fact, the returns for the past year show that the output of the Consolidated Mining Company of British Columbia, which is really the same as the smelter, is 30,659 tons of ore, whereas the production of the rest of the mines of East Kootenay would not total one-sixth of that amount. In other words, the Consolidated Mining Company have put all the small miners out of business, and are now in possession, practically speaking, of the whole mining system of the Kootenay district. If hon. gentlemen are very anxious to perpetuate that sort of thing, I, for one, certainly am not. I put myself on record against such a giant monopoly as that is. I am only asking the Government to protect the ordinary mine owners of the Kootenay district by giving them a royal commission to discover whether the allegations they are making are correct, and to fix the smelting charges so that they shall be on a reasonable basis.

Mr. BURRELL: This matter is one of very great importance to the whole of the district referred to. There may be something in my hon. friend's contention that there is a difference of opinion between certain mine owners and the mine owners as a whole, and that the committee which is suggested would not have powers wide enough to investigate the charges which the smelter is making. A convention of the Associated Boards of the Kootenay district was held on February 26th at Kootenay, at which this whole thing was threshed out. It is possible, as my hon. friend intimates, that the mine owners were not thoroughly represented there. At all events, all interests were represented to some extent, and as a result of that convention they asked for a commission to investigate whether charges made by the smelter were fair, because they thought the existence of the whole industry was imperilled. Two gentlemen were sent from that convention to Ottawa who placed the whole matter before me, 4 p.m. when we had a two hours' talk and discussed the subject thoroughly. Subsequently I had a discussion with the Prime Minister on the subject. The smelter had raised no objections whatever to an investigation, in fact they were prepared to throw open their books, accounts, and processes to inspection, because they believed that their charges were fair and they were willing to meet the contention of the mine owners in a fair spirit. As a result of that discussion we concluded that, as there was some objection to the perpetual appointing of royal commissions —because there is undoubtedly a good deal of restlessness in the country in regard to the multiplicity of commissions,—the purpose in view might be achieved by a friendly investigation carried on by the committee suggested, in which we would assist them financially. An Order in Council was thereupon drawn up setting forth all the facts, and the sum of $3,000 was placed in the Estimates for the purpose of meeting the expenses and giving power to enlist the services of a metallurgical expert and accountant in connection with the conduct of an investigation. Since that time, it is true, representations have been made to the Government—and there have been very strong representations in a telegram received as late as this morning—to the effect that the powers that were given to the committee in question are not sufficient, that the committee is not sufficiently in the nature of a royal commission. It is asked that the powers granted should be enlarged, and permission given to take the sworn testimony of witnesses, and so on, and thus get what the complainants believe to be the essential facts of the case. I have not had much opportunity to discuss this matter with the other members of the Government, but I think I might go so far as to say that consideration will be given to the representations made, and I believe I can fairly say that we will try and meet those requests as far as possible by enlarging the powers that have been given. We do not necessarily pledge ourselves, even if we go that far, to appoint the same committee, but we will take up the question of giving further powers, if such powers are necessary, and of perhaps granting a little more financial assistance, and put the matter in such shape that these disputed questions can be adjusted to the satisfaction of both the mine owners and the smelter. The main thing to be achieved is to stimulate production from all these mines of the Kootenay district which are so immensely important, not only to that district but to the whole of Canada. Under those circumstances, I would ask my hon. friend not to press his amendment.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

YUKON TERRITORY BILL.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Solicitor General) moved the second reading of Bill No. 112, respecting the election held in the electoral district of Yukon.

Mr. J. BUREAU (Three Rivers): Before the Bill is read a second time I wish to again protest against the principle contained in it. In doing so I need not go into a recital of what has transpired at each successive stage of this Bill's progress. As I have stated before, the question of the qualification of the member, or of the candidate, for this electoral district, is not at stake. We on this side deem the question involved to be one of law, and we consider that a grave injustice has been done to the candidates in this election by the passage of the Order in Council concerning it, which we believe to be ultra vires and illegal inasmuch as it deprives one, or both, of the candidates of the rights granted by the Dominion Elections Act to appeal to the courts to correct any error which has been committed in connection with the election, or to decide the case itself definitely upon its merits. The present Bill is simply a camouflage which has been introduced by my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie). He and his friends say to the candidates in this election, "We have illegally deprived you of your rights, as a result of which you could not go before the courts. Now we are going to restore those rights, but we will do so on one condition," and that is that any rights which you may have shall be annulled, any means of submitting to the court the grievances or wrongs of which you complain shall be taken away." This is another case, Mr. Chairman, where the Government have decided that they should have their man in the House, and they have now got him. It is another case where the House has ratified the substitution of the Governor in Council for the legislation of Parliament and the will of the people. We have protested. I do not want to weary the House with the arguments which we have brought forward —and which have not been answered, may I be allowed to say, by the Government—as to the legality of the steps taken by them or of the Order in Council suspending the statute without any authority or justification whatever. The only thing that we on this side of the House can do this year is to protest, because we know if we go any further and move an amendment the Prime Minister cracks the whip and everybody on that side votes as he is told to vote. I won't give him the trouble of doing that, or put his followers to that humiliation. But I register my protest as an independent member of this House.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think the protest as it stands should go unanswered. The Bill is only brought before the House on account of the objection made by Mr. Congdon at the last sitting of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. During the discussion he urged, and I took his words down: "The Order in Council," he said, "prevents me from going to the courts under the Controverted Elections Act, upon questions of bribery and corruption, and I claim that right." It is on account of that objection that the Bill has been introduced at all. The Committee on Privileges and Elections itself dealt with the question of the soldiers' vote. I assume their finding on that was conclusive, and it has been concurred in by this House.

Now, in order to meet Mr. Congdon's objection, and for no other purpose—because he is the only man in Canada who can take advantage of this Bill—this Bill is introduced to give him a chance of invalidating the election through election irregularities, if he has the evidence necessary. If my hon. friend who has just spoken speaks on Mr. Congdon's behalf, and desires the Bill withdrawn—

Mr. BUREAU: On my own behalf; I speak for nobody else.

Mr. GUTHRIE: —I do not know that the Government has anything to gain by passing the Act.

Mr. VIEN: I think that the remarks of the Solicitor General are not an answer to the point at issue. It is not the fact that we speak on behalf of Mr. Congdon that is at stake, but that the Bill is now introduced to remedy something which cannot be remedied. I think that the country at large should know that the Bill introduced at this stage provides a remedy to a certain extent, but it does not give the full remedy to which Mr. Congdon is entitled. I think the private members of this House are justified in recording their protest on the ground that a full remedy is not granted.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I desire to protest also. I am absolutely surprised at the Solicitor General saying that this Bill gives back the rights of Mr. Congdon, when, as a matter of fact, it only gives back part of his rights. And then he makes the proposition that if we do not like it they will withdraw the Bill. Half a loaf is better than no bread. I would not favour withdrawing the Bill, because I assume the possibility—I do not know anything about it—of Mr. Congdon establishing his right to sit, or, at any rate, unseating his opponent, with the Bill as it is. But I do know this, that the Bill has omitted that which should not have been omitted, that is that part referring to the soldiers' vote. That is the part of the Bill, as is quite apparent to every man in this House, including the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), on which, if it went before the court, there could be only one decision, and that decision would be in favour of Mr. Congdon. I am not speaking in behalf of Mr. Congdon; I am speaking in behalf of fair play. There is no question in my mind or in the mind of any unprejudiced member on either side of the House, that if the two candidates had been nominated before the election the result of the overseas vote would have been different. That is very plain, and it is a question of law whether it is or not. There has never been such a thing known in the history of parliamentary government where a man was elected before he was nominated.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Extension of date for filing an election petition.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is some ambiguity there, at least there is the possibility of ambiguity. There were two returns made, one to the House of Commons, and one returning the member. I think it would be better to specify the date of the return in the Bill, so that there will be no doubt about which is meant.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The one meant, of course, is the one made within a day or two, electing the member.

Mr. McKENZIE: No doubt the one intended is the one electing the member.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We might add to the section the words "on the twenty-second day of May, 1918."

Mr. BUREAU: Why not say "by the return of the returning officer proclaiming the election?"

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will move that the words "on the twenty-second day of May, 1918" be added to section 1.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 2—Votes of military electors, how to be counted.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 2 carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Lost.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried on division.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I understand that this clause is only for the purpose of providing that the votes shall be counted "notwithstanding the date or dates upon which the said votes were polled." But I think it is not very clear that it will only be for that purpose. As the clause now reads, the votes will be deemed to be legal, however objectionable they might be for other reasons, within the date or dates upon which they were polled. I would therefore move that the following words be added to section 2:

Provided said votes were polled according to and in conformity with all the other provisions of the said Acts.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think that is a little too general. This Bill seeks merely to ratify any votes cast between November 19 and December 17, both dates inclusive.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Why not make it clear that that is the only purpose of the Bill?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The section is quite clear. It says:

Notwithstanding anything contained in the Dominion Elections Act . . . the provisions of the said Act in respect to fixing the time for polling the votes of military electors shall apply and extend to the electoral district of Yukon . . . . notwithstanding the date or dates upon which the said votes were polled.

Mr. BUREAU: But it says that the votes shall be counted.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The committee has found that they shall be counted for the parties for whom they were marked.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: What is the objection to the amendment which I propose?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There may be something else in the Act which is not before my mind at present. This section was carefully drawn by the parliamentary counsel to cover only the point respecting the time at which the votes were cast, and leaving everything else open to Mr. Congdon. I should not like to interfere with the language of the section on that point.

Mr. BUREAU: The Solicitor General might give us an idea of what the intent of the section is. If it is to make valid the votes cast between November 19 and December 17, as if the Yukon election had taken place concurrently with the election in the rest of Canada, is it understood that that will not prevent Mr. Congdon or anybody else from protesting the election, from going into the legality of these votes, the manner in which they were polled, and all other errors or irregularities which may have been committed at the time of polling?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the understanding. The provisions of the Act are made to apply in respect of the fixing of the time for polling the votes; that is all. My hon. friend's amendment is also in contravention of the Military Voters' Act, section 18 of which provides that the validity of an election shall not be questioned on the ground of irregularity which has not affected the result. I do not want to override that section.

Mr. BUREAU: The wider the provision against irregularities affecting the result, the less you have to fear from the amendment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not take that view.

Mr. PEDLOW: Would the insertion of the word "valid" in the eighteenth line, before the word "votes," not cover the point?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the section reads properly now. It says:

And the votes of the military electors polled at the last general election . . . . shall be counted and applied.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The provision says: "shall be duly counted and applied." The fact is that the votes have already been counted and applied, and one of the candidates declared duly elected.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That was all considered when the clause was drafted.

Amendment negatived, and section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY.

On the Order for Committee of Supply:

Mr. LEMIEUX: I had made arrangements with the Prime Minister to bring up a matter on going into Supply.

Mr. SPEAKER: I had no knowledge of such an arrangement. According to the rules, I must leave the Chair on Thursday without question being put.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Bring it up when we are in committee.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Administration of Justice—salaries, including H. Demarais at $1,000, $166,387.50; contingencies, $21,000.

Mr. EDWARDS: Is there any truth in the rumour that the Chief Justice has paid or will pay back the $5,000 to which allusion was made early in the session?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The answer will be given later in the evening.

Mr. LEMIEUX: During the Budget debate I called the attention of the Acting Minister of Finance to a very serious incident which took place before the Supreme Court a few days ago, and which I think might well occupy the attention of the House for a few moments. As we are all aware, the Government some years ago decided to construct certain works at the estuary of the river St. Charles in the province of Quebec. The other evening when his Estimates were before the House, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) stated he would not continue the construction of these works. When speaking on the Budget, I drew attention to the enormous and indeed shameful waste of money that had been perpetrated in expropriating land on the shores of the river St. Charles, at or near the point where the works contracted for are being erected by the Public Works Department. As a result of the determination of the Government to dam the river St. Charles, expropriations became necessary and the property of one of the riparian owners by the name of Bélanger was expropriated. The Crown initiated proceedings, and one of the judges of the Exchequer Court was dispatched to Quebec in order to hear the evidence and arrive at a proper valuation of the land to be expropriated. At the expropriation proceedings the Crown was represented by Mr. Bernier, K.C., of Levis, and Mr. Bélanger was represented by his counsel. Many witnesses, so-called experts, were heard and the record of the proceedings, which I have here, is more voluminous than the Hansard of this session. Mr. Bélanger filed before the Exchequer Court his petition, in which he claimed the land to be expropriated was worth the sum of $800,000. Several claimants nearby have had their lands expropriated at fantastic prices, but as these cases were settled out of court the public does not know what the awards were. But the case of Bélanger, fortunately for the public and for the taxpayers of Canada, has gained some noteriety by reason of the fact that an appeal has been lodged in the Supreme Court of Canada. After a number of expert witnesses had been heard. Mr. Justice Audette gave the reasons for his judgment, in which he says:

> The lands in question were acquired by the suppliant for the sum of $18,165.32, and were practically yielding no revenue, save the renting of one house on lot 513, and pasture on lot 560. These lots lie in the estuary of the River St. Charles, and are nothing but a stretch of muddy soil upon which in the case of lot 560 some marine grass grows, upon which cattle may feed; but the land is entirely covered by water at high tide, and the lot has been practically idle and no use has been made of it for years and years. Wharves may be built upon the same, as wharves may be built in fields, but it has no access to deep water, except to the height of the water brought in by the tide. Lot No. 513 is impracticable for building purposes. It is a beach lot. Retaining walls and fillings would have to be resorted to. Some of the witnesses contend that lot 560 might be used for a railway yard. Is it, indeed, conceivable that a railway could afford to spend thousands and thousands of dollars in building wharves for a railway yard, when other property is available inland? Some of the witnesses were candid enough to say they thought the property had very little value, but it might have value for public purposes and assessed it on that basis. In other words, that the property was of very little value to the owner, but might be of some good value to a party expropriating for public purposes or for a scheme like the present works. However, it is now settled law that in assessing compensation for property taken under compulsory powers, it is not proper to consider as part of the market value to the owner, such value as the land taken may have to the party expropriating when viewed as an integral part of the proposed work or undertaking. But the proper basis for compensation is the amount for which such land could have been sold, had the present scheme carried on by the Crown not been in evidence, but with the possibility that the Crown or some company or person might obtain those powers and carry on their scheme. And, in the present instance, who, outside of the Crown, should undertake such colossal works?

Further on he says:

The policy of the Expropriation Act is to enable the court to compensate the owners; but not to penalize or oppress the expropriating party. The court must guard against fostering speculations in expropriation matters, and must not encourage the making of extravagant claims, and more especially must guard against being carried away by the subtle arguments of real estate speculators or expert witnesses and thus render the execution of public works impossible or prohibitive. While the owner must be amply compensated in that he is no poorer after the expropriation, it is no reason to charge the public exchequer with exorbitant compensation built upon imaginary or speculative basis.

These remarks, I must confess, are provoked by the extravagant amount of the claim of the suppliant, namely the sum of $800,085.65 for a property which has cost him, a few years before, the sum of $17,165.37, as above set forth—and more especially when the property has been idle for years and years, and the public work in question herein is but the only thing which will give it any value.

Further on he says:

Under all the circumstances of the case I will bracket the two lots together and will allow an average price of ten (10) cents a square foot for the same, making the total sum of $215,925.40; and in fixing such compensation, although remaining within the evidence adduced, I feel I am perhaps allowing too high an amount for a property composed of waste flats and beach entirely covered with water at high tides, which a few years ago cost in round figures $18,000, and which had been for years practically unproductive and has been a charge upon the owner, the taxes being larger than the revenues, and but for the public work in question would have very likely remained idle for years to come.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend has stated that the evidence was very voluminous, and the judges stated that according to the evidence adduced they allowed ten cents a foot. Was there any reputable evidence upon which a lower estimate could have been made?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I will come to that in a moment. Mr. Justice Audette concludes:

To this sum of $215,925.10 will be added the usual 10 per cent for compulsory taking, the land having obviously been taken against the will of the owner, making in all the sum of $237,517.61.

Mr. CARVELL: I wonder if it was really taken against the will of the owner.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is clear from the reasons for the judgment that the whole of the evidence to protect the Crown was not adduced in this case, and I should like to have from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) some information as to the instructions given for the conduct of this case. I am informed that this property was acquired some years ago by Mr. Bélanger and another gentleman by the name of Delisle. Delisle was living with his wife under the régime of communauté de biens, and on her death had to file at the registry office in Quebec in connection with the payment of taxes on the estate of his wife the valuation he placed on his own property, and I am informed that the Crown could have secured that very important and very valuable document when the case was heard before Mr. Justice Audette, but this document was not filed. It would then have been proved beyond the shadow of a doubt that the owners themselves placed a very, very low value on the property. At all events, Mr. Justice Audette, with much reluctance, to use his own words, awarded the sum of $215,000, in round figures, and added to that 10 per cent for compulsory expropriation, which made the total $237,517.61. The Crown appealed from that judgment. The Crown was represented there again by Mr. Bernier, K.C. Much to the surprise and astonishment of the Bench, when Mr. Bernier appeared before the Supreme Court a few weeks ago, he accepted on behalf of the Crown the award of $215,925.10, and only contested the remaining ten per cent for compulsory expropriation.

Mr. CARVELL: According to the factum, did the Crown protest against the award or only against the ten per cent?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Only against the ten per cent.

Mr. CARVELL: That is what counsel did. But what was in the factum?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have the factum filed by the Crown, and here are the conclusions:

We therefore pray that the said sum of $21,592.51, representing ten per cent on the amount of $215,925.10 fixed as the value of the lands expropriated, be struck out from the sum of $237,517.61, awarded by the Exchequer Court.

So the Crown only contested the ten per cent. Otherwise it accepted the judgment.

Mr. CARVELL: As this has something to do with the department over which I preside, I am naturally interested in getting the facts. My hon. friend has produced the factum filed by counsel representing the Crown. I have some knowledge of the procedure in these cases, and I know there would be a notice of appeal given by the Crown preceding the factum.

Is there any protest in that by the Crown against the award of $215,000?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have here the statement of the Crown through the attorneys, Bernier, Bernier & deBilly, and I have just read the conclusion of their petition. My hon. friend knows from his long practice at the Bar that a factum is filed weeks and months before the hearing of a case. The judges of the Supreme Court read this factum, and the factum of the respondent, and when Mr. Bernier appeared before the court and stated that his only appeal was against the ten per cent for compulsory expropriation, the judges expressed their surprise because they had read very closely the reasons for judgment of Mr. Justice Audette, and the proceedings were stopped by the court, and if my information is correct—the Minister of Justice is better informed on this point than I am—the Supreme Court sought new instructions from the Department of Justice.

This is clearly a case where the Government should investigate and where the Department of Justice should be exceedingly careful. There seems to have been gross neglect in connection with this important litigation. A sum of $237,000 deserves some attention and consideration in view of the reasons for the judgment given by the Exchequer Court. What has taken place I do not know, but it seems to me that the Department of Justice should, in view of the incident of the Supreme Court, and in view of the reasons for judgment given by Mr. Justice Audette, revise these proceedings and give new instructions in order to prevent a scandalous claim from being paid. Here, you have the whole case in a nutshell. These beach lots cost the owner $18,000. They did not yield enough to pay the tax bills, the claim made was for $800,000 and because of the laches of the Crown, because of the absence of witnesses and experts on behalf of the Crown, the judge was compelled to award with reluctance, as he says in his judgment, a sum of $215,000 plus 10 per cent. The Crown, represented by its agent before the courts, and knowing more than anybody else the reasons given by the judge, yet accepts the judgment as to the amount of $215,000 and only contests for the smaller bit, a sum of $15,000. There is something strange, something mysterious, and I hope the minister will explain to the satisfaction of the House what happened in this case and what action he has taken since to prevent that scandalous amount from being taken away from the exchequer of the Dominion at the present time.

Mr. CARVELL: Would the hon. gentleman tell me whether or not either or both of these lots, or any portion of them, is now occupied by works constructed by the Department of Public Works on the St. Charles river?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am informed that the barrage, the damming, of the river is above those lots. I could quite understand the Crown expropriating lots above the dam but I am informed—and I speak subject to correction—that these lots are below the barrage and are therefore not seriously affected by the proposed works. I say the "proposed" works. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) declared the other day that he would stop these works. I do not know what his intentions are but this is an exorbitant amount that is being claimed under the present circumstances.

Mr. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): The hon. member (Mr. Lemieux) in his statement of the case, seems to have attached particular importance to emphasizing the part which the Crown took in the matter. There is not any doubt that the Crown was represented by counsel. The facts in regard to the direct action of the Crown are that the instructions were of the clearest possible kind that an appeal should be made from the entire award, and the appeal which was lodged under the immediate direction of the Deputy Minister of Justice, as the departmental records will certainly show, was an appeal from the entire award. But the hon. gentleman says that it was greatly to the surprise of the court when counsel charged with the case made the declaration. I may say it was as great a surprise to the Department of Justice, as great a surprise to the deputy minister who had given the instructions, as it seems to have been to the court. These instructions, I am informed by the deputy minister, were clear and distinct that the entire award was to be appealed from. What misapprehension the counsel seems to have laboured under it is quite impossible for me to explain. Certainly his action as I have said, was not in accordance with the instructions that he had received. The gentleman who had been retained and who was representing the Crown is, I do not think it will be disputed, a gentleman of repute and standing in his profession. I cannot undertake to explain how he came to misapprehend his instructions and to take the line of action that he did. I suppose it is to be assumed that for some reason he was of the opinion, differing from the opinion expressed by the hon. member that the evidence for whose production he was responsible supported the judgment. If he entertained that view it was not shared by the department, and his instructions were such as I have stated. When the incident occurred, and when it was brought to the attention of the department, steps were at once taken to see that this erroneous representation was corrected and that the matter was put in such shape as to ensure that the case of the Crown attacking the award itself should be put in the most perfect manner possible before the court. Further, instructions, as I am informed, were given that, if upon a careful examination of the entire evidence, it should be deemed necessary, steps should be taken looking to a reference back to the court if there should be any deficiency in the evidence which it would be possible to supply. While the fact is undoubted that the learned counsel who was retained to carry on the case did take the view which the hon. member has stated, it is equally true that in taking that view he was not acting in accordance with the instructions which were given to him, and that that view was not shared by the Department of Justice. That the gentleman in question should have been retained I have not heard suggested as ground for complaint. I understand that Mr. Bernier has been the batonnier of the bar of his district, and enjoys a good reputation as a member of the profession. It is an incident most regrettable that he should have so misunderstood his instructions, but that is something, I suppose, that might happen with respect to the legal representative of any client. It might happen that the instructions of any client might be misunderstood or not fully grasped, and that is the regrettable thing that appears to have happened to the Government in this particular case. But the hon. gentleman and the House may rest assured that the appeal itself, as I have pointed out—which is a direct action on the part of the Crown taken under the direction of the department itself—was an appeal against the entire award, and, as I have said before, I am informed by the deputy minister that the instructions were precise that the entire award was to be appealed against. When it was brought to our knowledge that those instructions were not being acted upon, steps were taken at once such as I have already indicated, steps to see that the contentions of the Crown, as against the amount of the award itself, should be fully put before the court, and looking also—if that were deemed necessary or advantageous—to securing a sending of the reference back to the court below for the purpose of taking further evidence in the event of it being found both desirable and possible.

I do not know that I can add anything further. Those are the facts. Upon that set of facts I do not think that the department or the deputy minister, who is directly responsible insofar as the direction of these cases come under his hands, can be open to legitimate reproach. The most that can be said—and it is a most regrettable thing to have happened—is that the counsel that the Crown had retained to conduct the case—because it is quite clear it is not possible for the officers of the department to conduct all of the litigation which goes on on behalf of the Crown—apparently misconceived, or misunderstood the directions which he had received, or formed a judgment of the merits of the case, which was not in accord with the appreciation of the department.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There is no doubt whatever, from the explanation given by the Minister of Justice, that no blame can attach to the Crown, which was simply unfortunate in its selection of the counsel who conducted the case. I am glad to hear from my hon. friend that the instructions given to the new counsel are to have the case referred back to the Court of Appeal for the production of other evidence.

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Lotbinière): Were any explanations asked for, or received, from the counsel as to his conduct in the case?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not in a position to say. I certainly have not taken the matter up, nor am I in a position to state at the present moment what communications have passed between the deputy minister and the counsel. There is room in this case for demanding an explanation, and that explanation will certainly be asked for.

Mr. VIEN: To whom has the case been entrusted for future action?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand that Mr. Chrysler has been retained, and that the deputy minister is personally interesting himself in the matter.

Mr. CARVELL: As this matter relates to the Department of Public Works, I do not think I ought to allow the opportunity to pass without making a statement which possibly may have something to do with the ultimate settlement of the case. Personally I never heard of it until last Friday morning, when I met a gentleman who told me what had taken 5 p.m. place at the Supreme Court, substantially as narrated by my hon. friend this afternoon. I immediately went to the Justice Department and there I saw the deputy minister, who explained to me the instructions which had been given to the counsel, just as the Minister of Justice has explained this afternoon, and who also assured me that the department would take immediate steps to apply to the court to have the case re-opened, and ask not only for a reduction of the award, but a new trial. As to that phase of the case, I have nothing further to say, because it does not rest with my department, but with the Department of Justice. Knowing, however, Mr. Justice Audette as well as I do, and realizing how carefully he weighs the evidence —and I speak now from personal experience and knowledge—I cannot read the judgment which he has given in this case without coming to the conclusion that he had a very strong opinion that something had been withheld from the court, and he was awarding more for the land than he was justly entitled to. I purposely asked my hon. friend this afternoon if these lands had been built over, or formed any part of the works on the St. Charles river. He says, in his judgment, he thinks not. From my standpoint, as Minister of Public Works, that is a very serious part of the case. I know generally where these works are, although I have never examined them carefully. I expect to go to Quebec within the next three weeks, when I shall to some extent act as my own engineer, and I want to assure this House that if these lands have not been built upon I know enough about the law of Canada to determine how to get round this thing a good deal simpler than going to the Supreme Court—I will simply abandon the whole proceedings. Because if we have not got the lands, from the description I have received of them I do not think we need them, and I know well enough how to get rid of them.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not wish to occupy the time of the House any longer than merely to say a few words further. I am satisfied with the explanation given by the Minister of Justice that he will see to it that decisive and direct instructions shall be given to Mr. Chrysler to look after this case. But in justice to Mr. Bernier, I wish to say, that I have learned since the incident which took place in the Supreme Court, and new instructions were sought from the Department of Justice, that the Crown Counsel was specifically asked by one of the judges on the bench whether his instructions were as stated in the factum. Mr. Bernier answered in the affirmative; that his instructions were to accept the award and to contest only over the ten per cent.

Mr. DOHERTY: Did Mr. Bernier state from whom these instructions were received?

Mr. LEMIEUX: He could receive those instructions only from the Department of Justice for whom he was the agent.

Mr. DOHERTY: Apparently then the question is which of these two gentlemen is correct in his statement, because so far as the deputy minister is concerned, I have his most direct assurance that the instructions were clear, that the entire award was to be appealed from.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is more probable.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Just one word of personal explanation. It is not, Mr. Chairman, an agreeable task for me to bring such a matter before the House, and some newspapers in my own province are blaming me for preventing the Government from giving this bounty to the city of Quebec. I have done nothing of the sort. If the works are needed, I have no objection to their being completed. But I do certainly object to bleeding the treasury even though these works should be a benefit to the city of Quebec. There is no reason why people should extort from the public treasury moneys which are not due them. I remember some years ago I lodged a protest against other expropriations on the frontage of the city of Quebec. Of course, the amount involved was not so large, but yet it was very much exaggerated in my judgment. And I am told—I beg to give this information to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice—that some of the riparian owners on the river St. Charles have filed claims which, to use a well-known phrase, would make reality stranger than fiction. I ask him to keep his eyes open as to these claims, and to protect the treasury, as he swore to protect it when he was made Minister of Justice.

Mr. DOHERTY: So far as it depends on me, and in so far as I can vouch for the officers of the department, we quite realize what our duty is in the premises, and we certainly shall endeavour to continue to perform that duty to the best of our ability, as we have endeavoured to do in the past to the full extent.

Department of the Secretary of State—Salaries, $80,025; Contingencies, $16,500.

Mr. VIEN: Have you called the item of salaries and contingencies for the Department of Militia, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. gentleman wish to revert to No. 5? It was passed long ago.

Mr. CARVELL: There will be another item for Militia and Defence in the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I would like to mention to the Minister of Justice in connection with his department that the returning officers have not been paid in connection with the election, and members are receiving a great many letters from people who complain that their fees have not been settled. One of the troubles is this: The proclamation for the election was sent out, I believe, late in October, and the returning officers were instructed to post it. They posted it at many places, and about a week afterwards another notice was sent by Mr. Foley, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, accompanied by a letter in which the returning officers were told that if they had already posted the proclamation they must also post these notices, which might have gone out with the proclamation if they had been sent at the same time. The consequence was that in many cases, I am told, all over Canada, the returning officer had to go to the expense of sending men around the constituency to post these notices which left Ottawa on 6th November. The Auditor General takes the ground that he has no authority to pay, because he says that the notice should have been posted at the same time as the proclamation. For this condition of affairs it will require an Order in Council to authorize payment. There is no doubt at all about the justice of paying the bills because the letter from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery positively instructs the returning officer that if the proclamation was already sent out, the notice must also be posted beside the proclamation. If that had to be done, and expense incurred, it should be paid for. The sheriff in the constituency I represent writes me that he had posted the proclamation and that after having done so, he got this letter, dated 6th November, instructing him to post this other notice. He did what he was told, and the posting of the second notice cost him $104.74. The parties who did the work are claiming their money, and correspondence has come to the Auditor General and to the members regarding this matter, which is now several months old. I hope the minister will take the matter up and instruct the Auditor General by Order in Council to have it settled.

Mr. BURRELL: Apparently the Auditor General is not able under the Act to pass these special amounts. There are some of the accounts which have been sent in which can be paid, and some which will require to be looked into. These are being dealt with by competent men, one in the Finance Department and the other the General Returning Officer. After they are sifted out then they can be dealt with by the Governor in Council under a special clause.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Do not be too long.

Mr. LEMIEUX: May I ask the Minister of Justice when he expects that the amounts due to members of the military tribunals will be paid? I have already sent to my hon. friend some accounts from tribunals in the county of Gaspé, and they have been bombarding me with letters and telegrams. I hope that my hon. friend will be able to settle them soon.

Mr. DOHERTY: The last information I had on the subject, which was within the last two or three days, was to the effect that all the claims that had been received had been passed for payment. They have to go from the Military Service Branch, to the accountant, and so on, but they have been passed for payment. I do not know that that means that all of them have been passed just as they were sent in, because there have been differences between the department and the tribunals.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is not as to the amount, but as to the fact of being paid if they are legal.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is the last information I have. I think it is contained in an answer that was given the other day.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: I would like to ask the Minister of Justice a question regarding the Military Police.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We have long since passed the Estimates of the Department of Justice, and we are considering item No. 6, Department of the Secretary of State. The discussion has been somewhat out of order since the beginning, with the exception of the first item discussed by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) which I think was quite in order. But the other questions asked have been entirely out of order; and if it is the intention to finish up business to-night, the committee must certainly assist the chairman in keeping the discussion relevant.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: Then I shall bring the matter up later.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Estimates of other ministers will be under consideration.

Post Office Department—salaries, $943,870; contingencies, $125,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is rather strange, living as we do under British institutions, that for the last three years we should have been deprived of a responsible head of the Post Office Department. But what is most extraordinary, indeed, is that the Postmaster General, having been defeated at the last election, should still be the incumbent, although he is not attending to the duties of his department. I know of only one similar instance in Canadian history At the very inception of responsible government, when the Governor was attempting to bar the way to its attainment, two gentlemen were sworn in as ministers in the Draper-Viger administration, under Sir Charles Metcalfe, if I mistake not. They went before the people and were defeated, yet they were retained in the Government. After some time, however, there was a reaction in public opinion, the Draper-Viger administration had to resign, the Lafontaine-Baldwin ministry succeeded, and Canada has since had an uninterrupted succession of cabinets possessing the confidence of the people. Since this case of Mr. Viger and Mr. Morrison, no gentleman sworn in as cabinet minister and afterwards overwhelmingly defeated by the electors has been maintained in office against the popular will. Aside from the constitutional revolution which such a precedent creates, what are its consequences? During last session and since the beginning of this session we have not once been able to discuss seriously the administration of the Post Office Department—and heaven knows that it needs investigation. The expenditure of the Post Office Department has more than doubled since 1911. If a responsible head of that department was in the House we could discuss these matters and certainly impugn its administration. What reason can the leader of the House give for such a nefarious precedent? Are there not gentlemen behind the Government who are able to occupy the position of Postmaster General? Is it fair for the Government to place the administration of the Post Office Department in the hands of a gentleman who does not belong to this House and is not appointed to the other? Hon. Mr. Blondin has not been elected by the people, and for him to draw his salary as minister of the Crown is rather surprising. I repeat that this is a dangerous precedent; it is on a par with the kind of government we have had since the beginning of the war. I need not say that my heart is in this war, but I regret that I ever gave my assent to the War Measures Act as it has been framed and applied. The country is being shorn of its liberties; Parliament of its constitutional rights. It is being shorn of its privileges and of its ancient usages. The constitution has become a by-word in Canada. The country is governed by Order in Council passed before, during and after sessions of Parliament, under the shallow pretense of winning the war. Mr. Chairman, we are fighting in Europe for the very liberties which are being denied to the Canadian people. I hope that the leader of the Government will give this Committee and the country the reasons why the Post Office Department has no responsible head, and whether this scandal is to continue during this fiscal year.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not know that in the Committee of the House is the proper place to make statements with reference to the matter brought up by my hon. friend. I do not think things are quite as blue as he has tried to make them appear. These are extraordinary times. The late Minister of the Post Office—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is it the late minister?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: —and the present Minister of the Post Office, not now representing a constituency, is doing more than speaking in favour of the war. He has actually put himself to the test of the war, and is to-day at the front doing his quota in sustaining the war effort. I think that it to be taken into account. I grant you that constitutionally the assent of the people to the possession of a constituency is the normal ground for the continuance of a departmental head in office, but there has not been a lack of instances, in our own or other countries constitutionally governed, where that general principle has been passed by under temporary or extraordinary circumstances. This certainly is no ordinary circumstance; it is an extraordinary one, and I do not think that for a short period the people of this country will find any great fault with the action of the Government in reference to Mr. Blondin under the circumstances to which his absence from this country is due. He is doing where he is a service to the country equally as great as he could do here in Canada in administering a department of Government. The Post Office Department has not lacked for direction and Government during his absence. It has been under the care of a judicious and careful administrator. My hon. friend makes no point when he cites the fact that the expenses of the Post Office Department have increased during the last two or three years, and attempts to draw from that the conclusion that it is because of the absence of the departmental head. There are other reasons which account for the increase in the expenses of the Post Office Department and which will be amply explained by the administrator of that office when, in a few minutes, we come to his Estimates.

In reference to the more general subject as to Government of the country by Orders in Council under the War Measures Act, we are under experiences which are not different from those of all warring countries, and although we may talk academically with reference to loss of rights and privileges, there is not a single man of us who enjoys one iota less of his freedom, of his liberty, of his well-being, on account of the peculiar methods which do obtain in governments of countries in any period of great war and the stress which arises therefrom. If my hon. friend had been a member of a government during this war, he would have resorted to the very same measures. It is impossible not to do so. Let us take the case of the United States. The people of that country are, to a large extent, suffering a curtailment of the privileges of its legislative bodies such as in normal times they never would submit to for a single moment. They submit to it because the exigencies of war call for it, and it is impossible to have direct and strong action such as is necessary in war times, if you have to observe all the methods which obtain in normal times when everything has to pass through legislative channels. I do not think we are really very much hurt in the matter. As to the imputation of my hon. friend that he and the country have suffered from the Government which has been in power during the last three or four or five years, I am quite sure that the country had just as good an idea as my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) of what the Government had done and what they expected the new Government to do, when in 1917, they reposed an unbounded confidence in the present Government, although they may not have had as much practical acquaintance with governmental and administrative methods. When the war is all over, my hon. friend will not be the last to give his meed of commendation and praise for the way in which, and the methods by which, the present Government, and, I may say too, the past Government, have conducted the affairs of Canada in their objective of pursuing the war to a victorious conclusion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My right hon. friend has, as usual, very cleverly evaded the question, but he has done so through an expedient which is becoming stale. Whenever any reproach is brought against the Government, the answer which we have is "Win the war." Mr. Blondin is at the present time Postmaster General. That is against the law, but the answer which we have is: Mr. Blondin has enlisted. But if Mr. Blondin is to be Postmaster General he must, whether he has enlisted or not, be a member of this House. He tried his fortune in two constituencies, and he was defeated in both, and yet he is kept in office by the Government, with all the privileges attached to the office and none of the duties. We are at war, it is true, but the law must be observed. These privileges of responsible government have been won by long fights in the Motherland between the Crown and the people. Now it is a settled principle, which nobody denies, that a minister of the Crown must be in Parliament to administer the duties which are entrusted to him. Mr. Blondin tried to be a member of Parliament; he ran as a candidate; he was defeated; he is no longer in this Parliament, and therefore it is an abuse of the law of Parliament to keep him in office. We must have somebody in Parliament to discharge the duties of Postmaster General. If Mr. Blondin was a member of Parliament, it would be an excuse to say: He is not in attendance here because he is doing duty elsewhere. The only charge which we bring is this, that Mr. Blondin, not being a member of Parliament, cannot any longer be Postmaster General.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Without questioning what the leader of the House (Sir George Foster) has said, or what the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has said, may I point this out? This country is about to take over a great railway. We are to have a national railway, and with that railway goes a national telegraph system. Therefore, at a period like this, a Postmaster General ought to be in office so as to administer that national telegraph system, if the telegraphs are, as I imagine they are, to go under the administration of the Post Office Department. I should like to see not only a strong Minister of Railways, but a strong and active Postmaster General to administer the national telegraph system.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska) (translation): Mr. Chairman, I concur in the statements made a moment ago in reference to this matter by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). Under the circumstances, Mr. Blondin's absence is not only detrimental to the proper management of the Post Office Department, but it gives rise to a state of things which is contrary to public interest. As a matter of fact, the maintenance of Mr. Blondin at the head of that department, under the circumstances, is in defiance of public opinion, more especially of that of the people of the province which defeated the ex-minister at the last election, in two of the most important electoral districts of Quebec. French Canadians—and they constitute a most important section of the people of this country—are not represented in this Cabinet. We are not anxious to be represented in this Administration as now made up, and the remarks I have just made should not be construed as implying such a desire on our part. But let me say this: As long as the French Canadians have no representative in this Cabinet, at least let us dispense with that camouflage which is resorted to at present and in justification of which arguments quite as worthless are put forward.

Under the British system, it is contrary to every principle of constitutional government that a member of that Cabinet should be maintained in office and should continue to advise the Crown after ceasing to be a member either of the Senate or of the House of Commons. It makes no difference whether we are at war or not; I say to the Government that they violate every principle of responsible Government when they maintain in office a man who was defeated at the polls. As stated by my hon. friend the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), it seems as though, under the present régime, Parliament no longer exercises any rights in this country. Public affairs are settled by Orders in Council. We are left in ignorance of what is going on, the most important matters are disposed of without Parliament having any opportunity to interfere in any way. As an illustration, Mr. Chairman, take the question of prohibition; it is a most important matter. I, for one, would likely favour some measure of prohibition, especially during the war; but I am earnestly opposed to the settlement of the question through the Government, without Parliament being consulted, notwithstanding the fact that the hon. the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) is a member of the Administration. A few days ago, a member of this House was elected by Order in Council. If the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Thompson) sits in Parliament to-day, he owes it to the fact that, on February 26, the Governor General in Council abusing the powers conferred on them by the War Measures Act, suspended the working of the electoral law in this country, so that a partisan might secure a seat in this House.

We had been told that this Union Government, as the offspring of the Parliament which was to be elected on December 17, would exert some influence over the future of this country, because political partisanship would disappear and we were, at last, to see independence prevail in Parliament. We have had instances of such independence here within the last two or three days, members who, though they had been elected under the Union flag, under the flag of independence, cast their votes in direct opposition to the views they had expressed, because the Prime Minister had said: "If you vote in favour of abolishing titles in Canada, or else if you wish to prevent me, as Prime Minister of this country, from giving titles to my friends, although I am in favour of winning the war and have been elected to win it, I shall give up the job, and shall tender my resignation to His Excellency." Mr. Chairman, that such conditions cannot be tolerated much longer is quite apparent, because they are objected to by all right thinking people, and I would ask the Government, as also the Acting Postmaster General to give us some assurance to the effect that the Post Office Department will be put under the management of one who is the choice of the majority of the electors in some constituency of the Dominion.

Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment—Salaries, including solicitor at $4,000; Assistant Deputy Minister and Secretary at $4,000; Director of Employment at $4,000; Accountant at $3,500, and Assistant Accountant at $2,500, $66,000; Contingencies, $25,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What are the names of the solicitor, the assistant deputy minister and secretary, the director of employment, the accountant and assistant accountant?

Mr. McCURDY: Mr. S. A. Armstrong, who was formerly in charge of the Ontario Government institutions, was appointed deputy minister shortly after the establishment of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. The other offices have not been permanently filled.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are they all appointed under the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They will be appointed by the Commission.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Does this department deal with the employment of returned soldiers?

Mr. McCURDY: The functions formerly performed by the Military Hospitals Commission have now been taken over by the Invalided Soldiers' Commission, or rather the name of the Commission has been changed to the Invalided Soldiers' Commission. Invalided soldiers who have been returned to Canada for active treatment remain under the Department of Militia and Defence until their discharge from military service; when they are no longer soldiers in uniform they come to the Invalided Soldiers' Commission which is under the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. The principal classes of invalids that will be taken care of by the Invalided Soldiers' Commission are the incurables, insane, and the tubercular cases; to that Commission will also return ex-soldiers who have a recurrence if illness due to service.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Will this department find employment for a soldier who is well enough to work?

Mr. McCURDY: The Military Hospitals' Commission some three years ago called a conference of the provincial premiers. In each province is a Soldiers' Aid Commission, or similar body, though perhaps under different names. The premiers of the different provinces undertook the responsibility of finding work for returned soldiers through the medium of these provincial Soldiers' Aid Commissions. The Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment will aid in a supplementary way in securing employment for returned soldiers, but the primary responsibility rests with the provincial Soldiers' Aid Commissions. In the province of Nova Scotia, for instance, Mr. McCoy is the secretary of the commission, and is the person to whom applications for employment should be addressed.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka): What is the policy of the department with regard to tubercular and insane cases and epileptics?

Mr. McCURDY: The policy that has been followed heretofore with regard to tubercular cases is to utilize the existing tubercular institutions. In many cases these institutions have been enlarged, and arrangements have been made with some of the institutions for the payment at so much per bed, the institutions taking complete charge of the cases. The large number of tubercular cases coming up for treatment have made it necessary for many of the tubercular institutions of the country to be enlarged; in many cases the accommodation has been doubled, but in each case a separate arrangement was made between the Military Hospitals Commission and the owners of the institution, or the provincial government operating the institution, as the case may be, on whatever might be mutually considered fair terms. With regard to insane cases, a uniform method of treatment is followed in all the provinces. At the conference of provincial premiers held in Ottawa, I think in November last, an arrangement was arrived at whereby all the incurably insane were to be cared for in provincial institutions, and the provincial governments were paid by the Military Hospitals' Commission a fixed sum per head per year.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka): Might I suggest that there may be great difficulty on account of these institutions being at the present time very much overcrowded? We cannot get half the accommodation we require in the province of Ontario for the treatment of civilian tubercular and insane cases. It strikes me the soldier end of this matter should be handled by the commission direct.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY (translation): To an inquiry which I caused to be inserted in the Orders of the Day, as to whether there was any foundation to the rumour that the Military Police had been substituted for the Dominion Police in the apprehension of conscripts, the hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) answered in part by stating that as yet no Order in Council had been passed to that effect. However, despite the answer given by the hon. gentleman, I am informed that such is the practice for the time being; that is to say, that the Military Police have charge of apprenhendible that every considération should be Montreal.

It is useless for me to add that, toward ensuring the proper enforcement of the law, and especially the proper enforcement of the Military Service Act, it is indispensable that every considération should be given to the feelings of the people of the province of Quebec, as well as to those of the people of all other parts of the Dominion. Further, I may say that Mr. Bélanger, who is head of that department, has rendered valuable service, and it would be preferable, all things considered, to continue employing the Dominion Police, being careful at the same time to give them strict instructions to do their utmost not to provoke, or even hurt the feelings of the people, as was done in certain cases.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY (translation): Today, as in the past, in the district of Montreal such work of apprehending, or rather locating—since apprehensions are not always in order—those who have been called or are bound to report under the Military Service Act, has been entrusted in part to the Dominion Police and in part to the Military Police. It is now proposed to establish a regulation whereby that whole locating service would be performed by a single body. I believe, and it is a view which I think will commend itself to all, that under such circumstances, as well as under any other, it is preferable that authority and responsibility be centralized. The question is just now being considered, and a rule will be laid down within a few days.

I thank the hon. gentleman for the kind advice he has thought fit to extend to the Government, but I do not think there was much occasion for it. Heretofore, we have endeavoured to impress on those who are entrusted with the carrying out and enforcement of the Military Service Act, that all are bound to faithfully fulfil the duties incumbent on them, but should invariably act in such a manner as to avoid antagonizing the people at large. In other words they should act toward people with whom they come in contact as officers of the law are expected to do that is to say, they should see to its enforcement, without, however, fully exerting the powers with which they are vested, except in cases of absolute necessity.

Mr. VIEN (translation): Before we leave this subject, the hon. Minister of Justice might inform us whether the two officers of the Dominion Police who had charge of the enforcement of the Military Service Act in the city of Quebec, and who, by their demeanour, brought about those riots, have been dismissed?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY (translation): The evidence in the matter of the Quebec riots, is far from showing conclusively that the said rioting was the outcome of the demeanour of these two men of the Dominion Police. At any rate, I am not in a position to state whether these two men have been dismissed or not. I shall make inquiries.

Mr. McKENZIE: I saw a petition going around the House yesterday respecting the salary of a certain judge. I do not know whether it has reached the Minister of Justice yet or not. It has reference to our judge in the city of Sydney. The judge had his home in the town of Arichat, in Richmond county. He is a native of Arichat, and his district takes in Richmond, Victoria, and Cape Breton. He has come to reside in the city of Sydney. We have been battling with the Minister of Justice to try and get him a little more salary. He only gets $3,000 a year. He cannot live in the city of Sydney on $3,000 a year. He can live more cheaply in his own home in the town of Arichat. He has his home there, and a very comfortable one, too. He has told the Cape Breton Bar that he must, notwithstanding the great inconvenience that it would be to the Bar, go back to his own home. The Bar of Cape Breton are up in arms. I saw a petition yesterday that is to be presented to the Minister of Justice. If anything can be done to make it possible for the judge to live in the city of Sydney, it would be very much appreciated by the Cape Breton Bar. The minister might allow him a little more salary. The petition will reach the minister shortly.

Mr. DOHERTY: The determination of the place at which a judge should reside is a matter within the authority of the provincial legislature. As to legislation looking to an increase of a judge's salary, I am afraid I cannot say to the hon. member (Mr. McKenzie) that it is possible in the present session to deal with that. He says that he has been battling on behalf of this judge. It may perhaps not be an in-discretion for me to say that I have been doing considerable battling myself on this question of the inadequacy of remuneration of certain judges, but so far my battling has not been crowned with success.

Dominion Police—amount required, $146,765.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is the Minister of Justice aware of the resignation of a Dominion Police officer by the name of Belanger?

Mr. DOHERTY: Mr. Belanger, a week or ten days ago, tendered his resignation. The resignation has not been accepted in view of a question concerning the enforcement of the law with respect to those who are being called out. The question is at the present moment engaging attention as to whether it is desirable that one force, one authority, should deal with this subject, and as to which of the two forces which in the past have been engaged in connection with the matter should be exclusively charged with it. Action in regard to Mr. Belanger will depend upon the decision reached in that regard, and that decision will be reached almost immediately.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am informed on the best authority that Mr. Belanger is an excellent and efficient officer, moderate in the exercise of his authority, and I hope that he will be retained in office and that the condition that he has brought to the attention of the hon. gentleman will be given consideration. We will have no trouble in so far as the city of Montreal, or the whole district of Montreal, is concerned with a gentleman of the judgment and of the poise of Mr. Belanger. I do not know Mr. Belanger personally, but I have had both from lay and clerical sources the highest praise with regard to him.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a very short statement. Tentative arrangements have been made for the Governor General to come to this House at ten o'clock to-night for prorogation. What we have to do in the meantime, if that arrangement is to be carried out, is to pass the remaining items of the Main Estimates, not so very many, and the Supplementary Estimates and the whole of Concurrence. That, as hon. gentlemen know, takes some time in the reading. Therefore I hope we shall be able to despatch that business in order to help towards that end. After consultation with my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) it is suggested that you take the Chair again to-night at seven o'clock instead of eight o'clock, and that members should practise so much self-denial as will enable them to be present at that time.

The CHAIRMAN: According to arrangement I now leave the Chair to take the same again at seven o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at seven o'clock, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Do any honourable gentlemen object to our proceeding without a quorum?

Militia and Defence, Gratuities, $5,541.42.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Are these for the year mentioned?

Major-General MEWBURN: One of these gratuities is to the family of Professor J. M. Lanos. He is a Frenchman, who was for years a professor at the Royal Military College. He was ordered to France, and came back here and died, leaving a large family.

Legislation—Senate—Salaries and contingent expenses, $113,416.50.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I saw the other day that the Senate was very severely criticised in the press for the purchase of some ladies' purses. I think the frills should be cut out, and the purses too.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I quite agree with my hon. friend. It should not have happened. I noticed a reference to this matter in the Journal of Commerce. I shall call the attention of the Minister of Finance to this matter. I quite agree that there should not be a single cent spent for such purposes.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is it true that the Senate claims that they have a right to make expenditures of this kind without authority from the Government?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There may be something in that contention. However, if we decline to give them the money, that would prevent the expenditure.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: But they put up that claim, do they not?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think they do.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Does the Government agree to that doctrine?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: To this contention of the Senate?

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: To accept the principle that the Senate can originate expenditures?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, we do not concur in that. I was informed that that contention was made quite recently. I do not know whether it is true or not.

Legislation—House of Commons, $457,537.50.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is that vote?

The CHAIRMAN: It is the salaries of the whole staff of the House of Commons, expenses of committees, and so on. This item has been slightly changed. The salary of the Deputy Serjeant-at-Arms, $2,575, has been struck out, there being no Deputy Serjeant-at-Arms. Shall the item as amended carry?

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I understand that His Honour the Speaker has entrusted somebody with the task of preparing a report on means to decrease the expenditure of the House of Commons. Has any report been prepared in that connection?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not know whether the report has actually been prepared, but I know that Mr. Speaker has been engaged in the preparation of a report. I shall inquire before we close this evening, and if he has a report he might be requested to make an announcement.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I was appointed a member of a committee to review the expenditures on the Journals and Votes and Proceedings to see if these could be combined, with a view to reduce expenditure. I was not convinced of the practicability of the scheme, and as the committee could not meet very conveniently during the session, although we had two or three meetings, a report was prepared recommending that the matter come up next session, when another committee will be appointed. Meanwhile, nothing has been done.

Library of Parliament, salaries, etc., $66,700.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It has been reported in the press that Mr. DeCelles, the General Librarian, is to be replaced by Mr. Sévigny. In reply to a question which I put to the leader of the Government, I was informed that he had no information on the subject. Mr. DeCelles is in perfect health, hale and hearty. He is an excellent officer and has been in the library for several years with Mr. Griffin, who is also an excellent officer. Surely the Government would not appoint as librarian a man who has not the necessary qualifications for the position. To be a librarian nowadays requires a great deal of experience. Besides being an expert librarian, Mr. DeCelles is a man of letters, and as such has a high reputation. I should like to have the assurance of the Government that they do not intend to superannuate him if he is willing to work for many years to come.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The rumour is entirely unofficial. I have not heard of it officially.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Then I have the assurance that no change will be made?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have absolutely no knowledge of the matter. I have not heard it stated officially by any of my colleagues that Mr. DeCelles is to retire. That is all I can say. If he is still capable of performing his work, I cannot see why he should be retired.

General—contingencies of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, including the employment of temporary help, $5,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: At the beginning of the session I received letters and telegrams from enumerators in the counties of Maisonneuve and Gaspé respecting the payments of their accounts. Have all these accounts been settled?

Mr. BURRELL: A great many claims have been submitted which, under the Act, the Auditor General could not pay. These have been placed in the hands of Mr. O'Connor, general returning officer, and of Mr. Stockton, of the Finance Department, for investigation with a view to their advising me what amounts should be allowed under the circumstances. They will then be dealt with by the Governor in Council.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: There is no doubt about the authority of the Government, I suppose, to make payment legal by Order in Council?

Mr. BURRELL: The Act provides for that. Unquestionably many claims were sent in of an extravagant nature which, as presented, could not be allowed.

Pensions on account of the Fenian raid, 1866-70, $1,600.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I had inquiry a few days ago from a gentleman in California who said that he was entitled to pension on this account but that it was now too late for him to apply for it. Is it still open to him to apply for this pension?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My recollection of the Act is that it was passed for the purpose of excluding any further applications after a certain date. This amount is probably voted to meet some cases that have been under review.

Salaries and contingent expenses of the Board of Pension Commissioners for Canada, $750,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understand that Colonel Labatt has resigned from the Board of Pension Commissioners?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And that his resignation has been accepted. Is the pension paid to Senator Bradbury to continue?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have no information on the matter. I shall inquire into it and let my hon. friend know. Whether I can give the information to the House to-night or not, I do not know.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does my right hon. friend approve that pension?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is not necessary for me to answer that.

Mr. CARVELL: The doctors say that Senator Bradbury is entitled to the pension.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The pension was not granted by the Government, but through the Pensions Board in the usual way and after the usual examinations and reports.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wish to enter my earnest protest against the payment of this pension to Senator Bradbury. I should think that his having been appointed a member of the Senate constitutes a life pension sufficiently remunerative to exempt him from receiving a pension from the Pension Board. If Senator Bradbury had been amongst the combatant forces—

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Would not his appointment to the Senate only prove that he was permanently incapacitated?

Mr. CARVELL: I am also reminded that all exemptions are now abolished.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not wish to be unjust towards Senator Bradbury, but if he had been on the firing line and in the combatant forces, I would not object to his receiving a pension, although it seems that, after having received that life pension by his senatorship, he should not receive another pension. I protest against his pension. I think it is nothing less than a scandal.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: I understand that some few days ago the French Canadian section of the Great War Veterans' Association, at a meeting held in Montreal, passed a resolution requesting that Dr. Laviolette, who has been serving at the front for several years as surgeon and who holds the rank of major, be appointed to represent the French Canadians on the Pension Board. Is it the intention of the Government to take any steps regarding this request?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Government will pay every attention to any request that is made to it with reference to the filling of that important office, and it will be the main effort of the Government to see that a perfectly qualified man is appointed. Whether that man is a French Canadian, or an English Canadian, or any other Canadian, will depend a good deal upon the merits as compared with the work which is to be undertaken, but all those requests as they come in will be given careful attention.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: This is a very large item—for salaries and contingent expenses of the Board of Pension Commissioners for Canada, $750,000. Some explanation, however brief, ought to be given as to why it is necessary for us to vote such a large sum of money. How many members are on the board?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am not able to say how many, but my hon. friend will only have to think of the work which is before that Pension Board to understand how widely distributed it is and what an immensity of detail there is in connection with its work. There is a very large staff and that staff will increase in proportion as the number of the pensioners increases.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Does this pay for the whole staff?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, it is not the salaries of the officers alone; it is for the whole staff. If my hon. friend had the leisure time and would look into the Pension office to understand its organization and the immensity of the work, he would be fully persuaded that the staff was not too large, and that it will probably, before the war is over, be larger instead of smaller.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: We had submitted to the House this morning a report from the Committee on Pensions, and it does not look as though we would be able to deal with that report to-night.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is the intention to go back to that report and have it discussed and passed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: If there is to be an opportunity afforded for having a full discussion on that matter, I shall not take up the time of the House now, but this is a matter which I consider of as great, if not greater, importance than anything that has come before this House during this session.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We shall get back to it.

Distribution of Parliamentary documents and other Government publications, $45,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What was the saving made as regards this distribution of parliamentary documents?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: About $175,000 up to the present time.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That does not appear here.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That saving is distributed over parliamentary and governmental documents as well. It represents a saving which took place under circumstances which were not favourable to the greatest saving, because the savings commenced later than they will another year.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The system adopted by the Distribution office is an excellent one. I refer to the system of sending out to institutions cards containing a list of public documents that are available and leaving to the parties the selection of documents which they want. By this work I think a great saving can be accomplished.

Expenses under the Canada Temperance Act, $1,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Should this be expended, now that we have prohibition in Canada?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The expenditure has been cut down to $1,000.

Special Allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, to cover expenses when attending the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, $2,500.

Mr. EDWARDS: The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) said this afternoon that a statement would be made in regard to this item. I am not prepared to let it pass without further information being given.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I did promise that a statement should be laid on the table of the House later in the day. That statement is at present in the hands of the Prime Minister, and I expect it before the House prorogues.

Mr. EDWARDS: I would ask that this item stand in the meantime.

Item stands.

Special allowance to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, to cover travelling and other expenses in connection with his services while acting as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, $5,000.

Mr. EDWARDS: I hope I shall not be misunderstood in raising objection to this item. I do not want to be understood as being parsimonious in regard to the salaries that should be paid to the judges in this country. I should not object if the salary of the Chief Justice of the Dominion of Canada was doubled; I would not put my judgment of the worth of his services against the judgment of hon. gentlemen in this House who are of the legal fraternity and therefore better able to judge the value of those services than I am. But I do not like this roundabout way of adding to a man's salary, whether it be the Chief Justice of Canada or anybody else, and it does seem to me this is a roundabout way of adding to his salary. If the judgment of this House was that his salary should be $15,000 or $20,000, I should not object, but I say it is ridiculous, illogical, and unreasonable on the face of it, to say that $5,000 is necessary to cover travelling and other expenses in connection with the services of the Chief Justice while acting as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General. The Chief Justice of Canada, I understand, comes down here once in a while to sign certain documents and act as the Deputy of the Governor General when His Excellency is away. If he is to be paid for that service, well and good, but to say that $5,000 is a fair remuneration for the work done is not in my opinion reasonable. Why does the item appear in that way? It must look to the general public as unreasonable, and that being so, it does not reflect credit on this House or upon hon. gentlemen. I agree that the position of our judges calls for such remuneration as will enable them to maintain the dignity of their position; I am quite in accord with that idea. But let us look at this thing reasonably and face the facts fair and square. Let us vote the Chief Justice of Canada a salary that is fair and reasonable according to his position, instead of voting him a salary which in the judgment of the members of this House is only half what he should get, and then making up the deficiency in some roundabout way.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that it is not exact to say that this is an addition to the salary of the Chief Justice of Canada. The history of this vote is this. At all times since we have had a Governor of Canada, there has always been an Administrator of Canada, or a substitute for the Governor, so that if the Governor was called away or was incapacitated for one reason or another from discharging the functions of his office, the executive head should not be wanting in Canada; there would always be some one to represent Royal authority. In the olden days the officer who discharged these functions when the Governor General was away was called the Administrator, since known as the Deputy to the Governor General. In the olden days the Administrator was the General Commander of the Forces who at that time was residing in Halifax. We had in those days garrisons at Halifax, Montreal, Kingston and Toronto, but the garrisons were moved from one place to another until at last we had only one garrison, and that was stationed at Halifax. The Commander of the Forces lived in Halifax and as it was inconvenient for him to come to Ottawa in some short absence of the Governor, it was thought advisable, and this dates back I think to the days of Sir John Macdonald's Government, to have the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada made the Administrator or Deputy Governor, and the salary was attached to the office at that time, if I remember correctly; I think I am right in that, but I speak subject to correction. It was thought advisable afterwards to give the salary as Administrator to the officer who happened to be the Chief Justice of Canada. That is the reason for this vote. Whether it is too high or not is another matter. I simply wanted to call the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that this is not an addition to the salary of the Chief Justice. We must have an officer for this purpose, and if it is not the Chief Justice it must be somebody else. I simply rose to correct the observation of my hon. friend, and to say that this sum is not an addition to the salary of the Chief Justice, because sometimes the duties of the Deputy Governor have been performed by a puisne judge of the court who has received the remuneration. This remuneration is attached to an office which I think ought to be remunerated.

Mr. EDWARDS: Permit me, Mr. Chairman, to express my thanks to the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) for the explanation which he has so fully and kindly given. I am very glad, indeed, to get it, because this is the first time I have heard a full explanation of the matter. Perhaps that is my fault. At all events I am glad to get the explanation now, and get it from one who has been connected with the affairs of this country for so long, and who can speak of his personal knowledge. I repeat, I have no desire whatever to be unjust or unfair to any man in this country, the Chief Justice or any one else, and I am very glad, indeed, to get this explanation, which I think was due to the members of this House, and which possibly it is not against the interests of the Chief Justice himself for the public generally to know.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is true that the Deputy Governor General resides in Ottawa for six or seven months of the year, but I know that he resides at Murray Bay for a part of the year.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I have never raised the question, but I would like to learn, if possible, what the function of the Chief Justice is in attending as an associate member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think that question is in order now that the item has been held over and will stand until some further information has been disclosed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: May we return to the item providing for the special allowance?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER moved

That the committee revert to item 268.

Motion agreed to.

Special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, to cover expenses when attending the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, $2,500.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This special allowance to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court to pay his travelling and other expenses while attending the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council goes back to the days when Sir Oliver Mowat was Minister of Justice. At that time the then Chief Justice, Sir Henry Strong, went to England to sit as a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council under an Act which had been passed by the Imperial Parliament inviting judges of colonial courts to sit with the members of the Judicial Committee. Their services were required especially for colonial cases. The Government of that day, at the instance of Sir Oliver Mowat, placed an item in the Estimates of $2,500 to cover the travelling expenses of the Chief Justice. I do not remember the exact wording of the item, but it was to pay the travelling expenses of the Chief Justice while attending the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, or some such wording as that. This item goes back to 1897. It was for travelling expenses. It appeared in the Estimates in that form until 1915 or 1916, when the item was changed from "travelling expenses" to "special allowance." Under this the Chief Justice received his travelling expenses to attend the court, when, in fact, he had not attended the court. Why this change was made from "travelling expenses" to "special allowance" I do not know. That was not in my time. It was in the time of the present Government. What the explanation of it is I do not know.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The late Government.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The present Government.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The late Government.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No, not the late Government; the present Government. It may have a new complexion now but that is only a veneer; it is always the same old Government. They changed the words "travelling expenses" to "special allowance" and the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) made the statement lately that it was paid monthly. It so happened that in one or two years the Chief Justice was not called upon to attend the sitting of the Judicial Committee and on those years he had received the money. If the item had been left as it was before with the wording "travelling expenses" the money could only have been paid when there were travelling expenses, but it was changed to "special allowance" and there the matter stands to-day.

Mr. EDWARDS: As I have intimated once before in this House I often feel myself at a loss in discussing some of these questions when I have to pit my poor abilities against those of a lawyer who has had training along legal lines, knows the intricacies of the law and knowing also how to make a bad case out of a poor one.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EDWARDS: Well, I will leave it at that, because the case, although poor before, is worse now. The wording of the item was changed from "travelling expenses" under which, as the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) says the money could only be paid when he travelled, to "special allowance." What is the significance of the word "special"? If it was a special allowance I would imagine it would be granted for a special purpose and if it was for a special purpose, what was that purpose? Unquestionably it was to pay his expenses if he went overseas to attend the Privy Council. He did not go to attend the sittings for two years but he drew the $2,500 nevertheless. One might criticise paying a man $2,500 to cover travelling expenses even if he did go over, because, if you allow for a first-class passage on one of the best boats that cross the Atlantic and grant him a liberal remuneration during the six or seven weeks that he stays in Great Britain attending the Privy Council, his expenses will come far short of half of $2,500, let alone $2,500. I would not call in question the payment of the $2,500 if he had actually gone across to attend the sittings of the Privy Council. But it does seem to me that no amount of twisting—I do not use the word in a discourteous sense—no amount of camouflage can get around the fact that $2,500 was paid for a specific purpose which purpose was not carried out and he therefore was not entitled to that $2,500. There is only one thing that a member of Parliament can do and that is to insist that that money shall be handed back to the treasury of this country. If we have not some assurance along that line, there is only one thing I can do and that is to ask that this item be struck out. If you pay the Chief Justice $2,500 a year for a specific purpose which he does not carry out, then I shall certainly not give my consent to an item remaining in the Estimates to vote $2,500 to the same gentleman for a purpose which he will not carry out.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I want to call the attention of my hon. friend and of the members of the Committee to the wording of the vote. These Estimates are not got up by parliamentary lawyers, and it is quite open to ask why the word "special" should be there at all. The thing would explain itself if we made it read an allowance for a certain purpose. The word "special" does not qualify it in any sense good or bad.

Sir SAM HUGHES: How does it read?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The item reads as follows:

Special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, to cover expenses when attending the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, $2,500.

Taking the wording itself, it means that this amount is to be paid if he is attending the meetings of the Privy Council. If it is considered well to have a special representative of Canada on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in view of all the different circumstances which may arise in reference to Canadian cases and Canadian law, if the country feels that that is a good thing to do—and I have no doubt about it whatever—then the country will have no objection to paying the expenses of the said representative when he does attend the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Sir SAM HUGHES: In case the judge named may not be able to go, under the wording of this item, no other judge could go. If it is proper that Canada should be represented there, why not word the provision so that it can be Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, or any other justice selected by the Government? While I am on my feet I would like to ask what duties this gentleman performs when in attendance as a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council? Does he make arrangements in advance as to how a case shall be tried, or give the judges data in advance, or arrange for the cases to be presented before the Judicial Committee?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He sits on the committee, of which he is a member.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Does he make dispositions in advance, or anything of that kind?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Minister of Justice could better answer that.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I would ask the Minister of Justice if he can throw any light upon the question as to what duties this gentleman performs in connection with cases coming before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council? It is rumoured that these gentlemen do sometimes assist in the preparation of the cases to be submitted, as well as of the judgments.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I hold no brief for the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, but I may say that I attended the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council when I was Solicitor General. I remember perfectly well on that occasion seeing Chief Justice Taschereau, who was then sitting on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council for the first time. The committee's sittings begin early in the summer months and last for three months at least. It is not only for the trip to England and meeting the other members of the Judicial Committee that this allowance is paid. The Chief Justice of Canada, sitting with the other members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, hears not only Canadian cases but cases from all the other Dominions. He takes the cases en delibere with the other judges, and the reports to His Majesty the King are made by that committee of whom he forms one. I can assure my hon. friend that the Chief Justice of Canada spends, when he is in London attending to his judicial duties, very much more than the amount he receives from Canada. Now let me say this: My hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) will see in the Estimates of this House the salaries of the Supreme Court judges of the province of Ontario who are paid the same as are the Superior Court judges in the province of Quebec, namely, $7,000 a year. But the province of Ontario pays every year to each of its Supreme Court judges an additional $1,000, under an Act which was passed under Sir Oliver Mowat's premiership of that province, by reason of the fact that those judges perform additional work in connection with the hearing of election petitions. That was a pretext—but a good pretext I must say—to increase the salaries of the Ontario Superior Court judges. Do you think, Mr. Chairman, that the Chief Justice of Canada, sitting as a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, should not get this small allowance of $2,500, when he is on a par with the other members of the committee in respect to hearing all the appeals that are inscribed, especially when it is borne in mind that lawyers like Mr. Lafleur, K.C., and Mr. Geoffrion, K.C., of Montreal, and Sir Allen Aylesworth, and Mr. Hellmuth, of Toronto, or any other prominent lawyers in Ontario, receive for one case at least twice that amount.

8 p.m.

Mr. EDWARDS: My hon. friend has the Estimates before him. Will he refer to item 268 and read it like this: "Special allowance to the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux to cover expenses for attending the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council." Or suppose it read that it was to cover the expenses of the hon. gentleman attending the Imperial Conference. Would the hon. gentleman take that money if he had not gone to that Judicial Committee or to that Conference?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Oh, well——

Mr. EDWARDS: That is a question that can be easily answered. If I were a lawyer and my hon. friend were a witness I would rap the desk firmly and say to him, "Answer the question, sir—yes, or no."

Mr. LEMIEUX: If it was understood between the Chief Justice and the Government that this allowance was voted to the former for the object of representing Canada at the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, I would certainly accept the amount under such circumstances.

Mr. EDWARDS: Whether you went or not?

Mr. LEMIEUX: But the other vote did not read in that way. My hon. friend knows that as the vote reads to-day, the Chief Justice would not draw the amount if he should not go to England? Does he not think so?

Mr. EDWARDS: Will my hon. friend say that the wording makes any difference whatever as to what that $2,500 was voted for? That is camouflage, and nothing else.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: That is a good French word.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Let me call my hon. friend's attention to a statement coming from Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, which was made by the Prime Minister the other day. It is to be found at page 2044 of Hansard. He will find that in the year 1913-14 the vote was:

> Travelling expenses of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick attending sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, $2,500.
> Fiscal year 1914-15—travelling expenses of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick attending sittings of Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, $2,500.
> Fiscal year 1915-16—special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses in connection with Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, $2,500.

Why was the change made that year from "travelling expenses" to "special allowance"? That I do not know—my knowledge stops there. It is for the Government to explain why this vote was changed. Was the special allowance given to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick no matter whether he went once, twice, or three times to the Judicial Committee, or not at all? That is a question as to which I have no knowledge, but at any rate there is the law to-day.

Mr. EDWARDS: My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will not argue that the Chief Justice of Canada took this $2,500 without any reference to the purpose for which it was voted. He cannot surely argue that. I am perfectly satisfied in my own mind that he believes as I do, that, notwithstanding the change in the wording of this vote, the purpose for which it was granted was precisely the same in the one year as it was in the other. My right hon. friend and the gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) who sits upon his right are trained barristers and can always find a loophole where apparently the argument against them is irrefutable. If I had a legal training I could perhaps make my contention more convincing still.

But I would like to get a straight answer from the right hon. gentleman, or anybody else, why there should be a different consideration made for the vote in one year than in another, because in the one year it says for "travelling expenses" and in the other "special allowance." What was the purpose of that vote in each of these years, whether it was for travelling expenses or for special allowance it was to meet his expenses when he went across the seas to attend the sittings of the Privy Council. If it was not for that purpose, what was it for? And the Chief Justice of Canada is no more entitled to get $2,500 out of this country for services he has not performed than anybody else is. What was that special allowance for? For his activities in connection with the Imperial Privy Council. It could not be for any other services that he rendered for the Privy Council on this side of the Atlantic. It must be for his services when he goes overseas. That is unquestionably what it was for. In two years, the vote was so worded that some persons thought—apparently the Chief Justice himself thought—he could take this money notwithstanding that he had not performed the services for which the money was specially voted. To put it mildly, I think the Chief Justice of Canada has made a very grievous mistake in taking the money in those two years; and if the majority of the members of this House think that he made a mistake, then the proper thing to do is to rectify the mistake, and that can only be done by paying back the five thousand dollars.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend has asked me a question as to the interpretation of that vote. It is not to me that he should direct that question. The law was changed from "travelling expenses" to "special allowance." It was done for a purpose. I ask my hon. friend to put that question to those who made the law.

Mr. EDWARDS: Is it not true that we all made the law? My right hon. friend, because he sits as leader of the Opposition, cannot absolve himself from all responsibility in the matter. Neither can the members of this House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Pardon me. I make the laws here, but I absolve myself from many of the laws I have made. I accept only my own responsibility.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Was not the reason this: travelling expenses would not run up probably to the amount voted, and it was in order to cover travelling expenses and, in a sense, services at the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I have asked several times what were the services for which this $2,500 was voted.

Mr. VIEN: Might I venture—

Sir SAM HUGHES: May I have an answer?

Mr. DOHERTY: As to their nature, they are precisely the services of a member of any court. When the Chief Justice of Canada goes over to sit in the Privy Council, as has been pointed out, he sits as a member, hardly of a court, but as a member of the Judicial Committee, which is the proper designation, which advises His Majesty as to the disposition which should be made of the cases.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Does he prepare the cases?

Mr. DOHERTY: He sits as a judge sits, hears the cases, as one of the committee composed of a number of members. When they have heard the cases and studied the cases, they form their judgment, and he takes part in that judgment with the other members of the Judicial Committee. As I understand it, provision is made qualifying the Chief Justices, or the judges of certain courts in the Dominions, upon invitation of the Judicial Committee, to join with them in the hearing of cases. It is found, I think, particularly desirable in connection with colonial cases. Upon that invitation, when the Chief Justice acts upon and sits as a member of the Judicial tribunal, his duties as such are purely judicial, that is to say, to hear with the other members of the committee the cases and to make up his mind with the others as to what the proper judgment is to be rendered.

Sir SAM HUGHES: He does not have to do with hearing the evidence in advance or anything of that kind?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, he sits like any other member of the tribunal.

Mr. EDWARDS: I want to call attention to one other thing. In the year 1914-15 the vote was "travelling expenses of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick attending sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, $2,500." This amount was paid, as Sir Charles Fitzpatrick attended sittings of the Privy Council in August, 1914. In 1915-16 the vote was "special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses in connection with Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, $2,500." He drew it that year. Now, I have a right to ask, inasmuch as this is a vote to cover expenses in connection with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, what expenses were incurred to warrant the payment of that amount? The wording is being changed this year to read as follows: "Special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses when attending the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council." That makes it, of course, that he cannot get it unless he attends. The only difference then in the wording in the two years is that the one year says "when attending." Now, if you say he is entitled to $2,500, whether he attends or not, to cover expenses in connection with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, then it is up to this Government, or to those who think that the money should be voted, to show what those expenses were, or to show what trouble he was put to which would justify the paying of that amount to cover expenses. In the one case we have travelling expenses. When he travels, it is actual travelling expenses. We can understand that. In the other case, he does not travel, and gets the amount still to cover expenses. No travelling in that case: then what are the expenses? The idea unquestionably was to pay him $2,500 to cover his expenses in attending sittings over there. It is unreasonable to suppose otherwise. That being the case, when he did not attend, when he was not put to any expense for travelling, it seems to me self-evident that he has no business to draw the amount for services he did not perform.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is no doubt about the wording of this vote. Is there any doubt in the mind of the Committee that if we have a representative on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and we send him there, that we ought to pay him his travelling expenses, the expenses that he has incurred in doing that duty? The vote is so worded that it shows its intention explicitly. And I am quite willing to say that not a cent of that money will be paid unless the service is rendered. Under that, has my hon. friend from Frontenac any objection to the vote passing? I will also say that I will get the information and give it to him, I hope, before this session is over, with reference to the two preceding years.

Mr. EDWARDS: My right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) has asked me a question, and I will answer it. I am not prepared to let the vote go through. I am in the judgment of the House; I am only one. But the fact that, in my judgment, five thousand dollars of the money of Canada has been taken out of the Treasury by a man who happens to be Chief Justice of the Dominion of Canada, warrants me in saying that I will not consent to the passing of another item of $2,500 to that gentleman until I know that that money will be refunded.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think we must let this item stand until a later time, and come back to it again. When I have the information I will give it to the House, and then the House can make its own decision.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I suggest that instead of providing a specified sum for Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, we vote an amount for the duties performed and expenses incurred. Two thousand five hundred dollars would not be too much to grant for the duties performed.

Mr. RICHARDSON: That would be a great mistake. I do not see why the Chief Justice of this Dominion should not be in the same position as that occupied by the humblest civil servant in the country so far as this matter is concerned. Why should he not make a return to the Auditor General of the expenses which he incurs on this visit to England? Why vote him $2,500? It does not cost Sir Charles Fitzpatrick $2,500 to go to London. Let Sir Charles Fitzpatrick do as any other civil servant is required to do, that is, submit an account of his expenses, and we shall be glad to pay them.

Item stands.

Post Office—Outside Service, salaries, etc., $19,116,260.75.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I notice that the country has lost the valuable services of the Postmaster at Toronto. The postmasterships of Toronto and Montreal are the most important in Canada; these are the largest offices, yield the largest revenue and incur the largest expenditure of any in Canada. The press of Toronto are unanimous in their desire that the late Mr. Rogers, the former postmaster in that city, be soon replaced. We have just passed a Bill which is supposed to bring about Civil Service reform. Will the leader of the House inform me, without giving names—I understand that he must be very discreet about such appointments—whether it is the intention of the Government to select by promotion from within the ranks and according to merit only, a successor to the late postmaster at Toronto?

Mr. DOHERTY: Under the Civil Service Act all appointments are made by the Civil Service Commission, who will doubtless proceed in accordance with the provisions of that Act. I understand that the question is presently engaging their attention.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Perhaps I am too exacting, but I am not satisfied with my hon. friend's answer. Various rumours are afloat and prominent names have been published in the press in connection with the vacancy in the Toronto post office. Will the Government fill this vacancy by appointing an officer from within the ranks on the principle of promotion and according to merit?

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman does not seem to grasp what I pointed out: that the appointment is not in the hands of the Government; therefore, the Government cannot say who will be appointed. The Government will appoint nobody. The Civil Service Commission will make the appointment, and I have no doubt that they will give consideration to the point raised by my hon. friend. I do not speak positively, but I think that the principle of promotion such as my hon. friend suggests is laid down for the guidance of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. FIELDING: I must express my regret at the manner in which the public business of Canada has been handled during the last two or three days. I think I am right in saying that this is the first time that we have had before us any item which permitted the discussion of post office affairs.

Mr. DOHERTY: The post office estimates have not been up before to-day.

Mr. FIELDING: It is now half past eight o'clock, and I am informed that at ten o'clock His Excellency is to come down with the expectation of proroguing this Parliament. It is very desirable that we should do business expeditiously. But I want to say this: I shall not use the word "protest" because that is too strong a word, but I believe I voice the general opinion of the House when I say that this is not a fair way to do the business of the Dominion of Canada. I realize the necessity of the Prime Minister and some of his colleagues going away, but certainly that is no reason why the whole work of Parliament should be rushed through in the way in has been done during the last two or three days. We have had meetings of the committees at ten o'clock in the mornings; the House has met at eleven o'clock in the morning; it has met in the afternoon; it has met in the evening, continuing till all hours of the night; and now at this stage of the session we are, for the first time, within an hour and one-half of prorogation, taking up the Estimates of one of the greatest departments of the Government and we are in a few minutes going to vote $19,000,000 for that department. I want to say, in no spirit of fault-finding, that this is not a proper way of doing business, and I do not think the Government are justified in rushing business through in this way. While it may be quite necessary to provide for the absence of the Prime Minister, he has able and competent colleagues who could take charge of matters in his absence, and we should have been able to sit here for a few days longer and conduct the business of the House as it should have been conducted.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wish to emphasize the remarks made by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens. I shall not delay the proceedings of the House, but I shall simply give a few facts which will show how this whole business is badly managed.

Sir Sam HUGHES: Has it not always been the same?

Mr. FIELDING: No, it has not.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend says that we are going to vote $19,000,000 without having had a single minute during a session of nearly three months to discuss the affairs of the Post Office Department. I said before dinner that the expenditure in that department had doubled since 1911.

[Mr. Fielding.]

I have the figures under my hand. In the public accounts I find that in 1910-11 the expenditure in that department amounted to $7,954,222. In 1911-12 it jumped to $9,172,035. In 1912-13, it was $10,882,804; in 1913-14, $12,822,058; in 1914-15, $15,961,191; in 1915-16, $16,009,138, and in 1916-17, $16,300,578.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: How much has the revenue increased in that time?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I know that the special war tax has increased the revenues of that department, but putting that tax aside, as it should be, the revenues have practically remained the same while the expenditure has been more than doubled. That is a very unhealthy state of affairs. I do not wish to delay the proceedings of this House, but I shall simply enter my protest. We have had no opportunity to discuss the postal administration, and yet we are face to face with this bald fact that, in 1910-11, the expenditure of that department was about $8,000,000, whilst for the last fiscal year it had reached the enormous figure of $16,300,000, with no more revenue than in 1911, with the exception of the war tax.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. member has pointed out that, in the last seven years, there has been, as he states, no increase in the revenue, if you eliminate the special tax. I am assured by those who know the facts that in that he is quite mistaken, and he shuts his eye to the fact that there has been an immense expansion in the business to be carried on by the Post Office Department. We have had a great extension of the rural mail route deliveries. We have had an immense increase in the parcel post business which has necessarily entailed an additional cost of the service rendered to the public. Anything so unfair as taking the bald statement that more money is being spent in the year 1918 than was spent in the year 1911, and concluding that that necessarily implies improper expenditure, I think it would be difficult to suggest. As to our having such a very short time to deal with this matter, we have been in readiness, on different occasions, to lay these Estimates before the House, and the delays that have prevented us are not attributable to the Government. Yesterday we spent one whole day that might have been usefully employed in discussing in detail these very Estimates, in discussing a motion that prevented us from going into this matter. On other occasions attention has been given to matters that are certainly less important than these Estimates, but whose is the responsibility? I do not think this is an exceptional instance which has never occurred before. I shall not dwell upon the reasons on account of which, in the judgment of those best qualified to speak for both sides of the House, it was not thought desirable that this session should be prolonged. Those reasons commended themselves to the general judgment of the House. Those reasons have brought about this situation, which I should be glad to have avoided, but the responsibility for which does not rest, at all events exclusively, upon the shoulders of this Government and this particular department.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I would like to have from the minister a statement as to the cancellation of mail contracts. There is a great deal of unrest amongst mail contractors throughout the country, many of them claiming they are losing money by carrying out their contracts. I understand that of late some contracts have been cancelled. Will the minister state briefly on what terms a mail contractor can obtain cancellation of his contract?

Mr. DOHERTY: A mail contractor has no right to cancellation of his contract. He tendered for that contract in competition with others, and got it because his tender was lower than the tenders of others. But as I mentioned some time ago, upon a resolution on this subject, taking into consideration the circumstances and conditions which justified the belief that, in many instances, it is, at all events, probable that unexpected increases in costs have so altered the situation of the contractor as to place him in a position where he is suffering substantial loss, we did adopt, as I explained at that time, the rule that, where a man had, under totally different conditions, entered into a contract which, for the reasons I gave a minute ago, might be entailing serious loss to him, we would in such cases consent to cancellation of the contract and call for tenders at the present time, putting that man in a position where he would be enabled to do the work at prices similar to those for which others would be willing to do it, giving him his fair chance with everybody else. As I explained, I could not convince myself that it was fair to those who had failed in obtaining contracts that the man who had got it because his tender was lower in the first place than the others should retain the contract at a higher price because he was losing money. Of course, it is not really a sound business principle to consent to cancel a contract at all, and if we were standing on our rights we would not cancel them. But I have felt, and I think the House will justify that view, that where it was perfectly clear that a man by reason of unforeseen and unusual circumstances was in a position where he was actually doing this work for the country at a substantial loss to himself, the country should not insist on holding him to his contract.

Sir SAM HUGHES: In the old wagon days a certain mileage rate was allowed up to a certain sum. Possibly that has all been done away with, now that tenders are called for.

Mr. DOHERTY: The work is let by calling for tenders.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Under the system carried out by the minister one man may find that he has submitted too low a price, but he has to struggle on. Why not return to the old system and say the rate should not exceed so much per mile or per trip? Give the department a little option in the business. I do not want to take up the time of the House, but I could give half a dozen instances where men who have the mail contract are losing money. They find themselves cut out and then the man who takes their place in turn has the same experience. I think it is hardly fair to the men who are doing the contracting.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: There is a great deal of distress among the men carrying the rural mail in our part of the country, and they would like some advance. If the minister would allow the men who have the contracts a better rate I certainly think something of that kind ought to be done, because I get letters nearly every day from men who are actually losing money on their contracts. If the minister can possibly find a way of relieving the distress of these rural mail carriers it certainly ought to be done.

Mr. ARTHURS: I was desirous of bringing this matter to the attention of the House. I read with some interest the statement made by the minister some time ago respecting the possibility of cancelling these contracts. As a matter of fact, in only one of the cases that have come to my attention has the contract been cancelled, and that was the best paid one of the lot. An absolute refusal to cancel the contract was given in every other case.

The minister has stated that as a matter of right these contracts need not and should not be cancelled because these men entered into them in a perfectly open and legal way, and knew what they were doing. It is true tenders were called for, but in almost every case it has been the practice of the Government for many years past when the tender price was a little higher than they wanted to pay, to send an inspector or some one acting on his behalf around and peddle the contract between Tom, Dick and Harry, beating them down like a Jew would until they got a certain price and in most cases the price was ridiculously low. I know a case in one part of my riding where a man for many years has been carrying the mail for a dollar for a return trip of sixteen miles, and yet he has to go on in spite of the fact that the price of everything has gone up. This man has not had a new contract for years, I venture to say, but his old contract has been renewed, the department simply saying to him that he should not ask for anything more in these hard times. Rural mail delivery contracts have been let in the past on the basis of $30 per mile per year; in other words, a man who had a trip of twenty miles would receive about $2.12 or $2.15 per day and out of this magnificent sum he had to pay the expenses of keeping a horse or a team, and pay for his meals when away from home, and when you take into account the present price of hay and oats, that leaves him 62 cents a day. I was told by one official of this Government that the matter might be remedied by letting women do the driving, and letting the men go into other employment where they might earn perhaps $3 per day. I told my informant it might be quite true of the part of the country from which he came, but that it would be absolutely unfair to ask any woman in my part of the country to drive a team twenty miles a day through snow in winter and mud in summer for the magnificent sum of 62 cents a day. I would be ashamed to offer it to any woman in the province of Ontario. These men are suffering an actual hardship, and I think the members of this House have a right to demand that where these men ask for a cancellation of their contract it should be granted at once. If a man is making any money out of the contract he will not ask that it be cancelled, but will go on with it; it is only men who are losing money who will ask to be relieved from their contract.

[Mr. Arthurs.]

The minister said a few moments ago that we are getting an increased revenue and doing increased work on account of the parcel post system, but what about the poor fellows who carry the parcels twenty or forty miles away from the railroad, and sometimes require two teams of horses to draw the mail in? These men are carrying the mail for the contract price in force before the war, and before the parcel post system had reached anything like the proportions it has to-day. These men are not getting one cent extra in spite of this heavy additional work.

I want to say a word on behalf of the country postmaster. In a great many cases it is a woman who is doing this work for $50 a year. She has the trouble of looking after the post office every hour of every day, and I think something should be done for these people. No man, let alone a woman, should be asked to put himself to the inconvenience of handling the mail in one of our country post offices for the sum of $4 a month. I think something should be done for their relief now. We are told that the estimates are doubling themselves every five years, and I think some part of the increase should be given to this very deserving class of our people.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In the early days of the session a resolution dealing with this question was before the House, and I believe the Prime Minister asked to have the debate adjourned with a view to resuming it later in the session after the Government had had an opportunity of considering the matter of an increase in salary to the rural mail carriers. A few days ago I asked a question in the House, and the leader of the Government informed me that an opportunity would be given when the post office estimates were up to discuss this question.

The rural mail carriers are undoubtedly rendering a splendid service to the country, a service which is invaluable under present conditions, and at this particular time, when we are taking care of practically every branch of the public service of this country except the rural mail carriers, I think some explanation is certainly due as to why some relief has not been afforded them. Two years ago when a number of these contracts were let conditions were altogether different from those of to-day. I have a case in mind which I took up with the department about six months ago, asking that the man be relieved from his contract or be given an increase. Yesterday I had another letter from him almost begging to be relieved from his contract, as his family was sick and he had no means, and he also urged me to see that the last part of his salary was forwarded to him immediately.

He is in a position to get daily wages as an ordinary labourer that would be much greater than he gets with his team and outfit while carrying His Majesty's mail. That is surely a condition of affairs which should not exist. It is deplorable. You must realize that many of the rural mail carriers are at a time of life when they are very much below their ordinary earning power. Old, and often crippled, men who are unable to engage in ordinary labour render good service as carriers of the mail. When you stop to think of the torture that these people had to endure during the past winter you must realize the very great injustice that is being done. I do not think that I am asking too much when I ask that adequate salaries be paid to these people. I would give some official in the department, an inspector, a superintendent, the deputy minister, or some one else, the right to exercise a little discretion in the matter during the abnormal times through which we are passing. The department ought to see that a uniform remuneration is paid for this service and that nobody is carrying His Majesty's mails at a loss. If a mail carrier is performing his duty at a loss the department ought to make up the difference. In a case such as I have referred to, where a man has gone down and out in absolute poverty as a result of carrying the mail, I think some recompense should be made. It is humiliating for the people of Canada to have public service rendered when the people who are rendering that service are unable to support themselves and their families as a result of the increase not only in the cost of living but in the cost of feed for their horses. The Government increased the salaries of letter carriers, who have only themselves and their families to support, but the rural mail carrier has a double increase to attend to. He has not only himself and family to provide for but he has his steed. The feed for his horses has now doubled in price, its cost is four times greater than it was when he entered into the contract. I was a little surprised that some explanation has not been given in view of the request that the Prime Minister made when the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) moved his resolution dealing with the matter. We have been looking day after day to see if something was going to be done in this regard. It is a matter of keen disappointment to me to find that apparently no provision is going to be made to take care of the people who are performing this service.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I just want to add a few words to what has been said in regard to the rural mail carriers and postmasters. Cases similar to those which have been spoken of by my hon. friend (Mr Sutherland) have come to my notice in the past three or four months. When I have brought these to the attention of the department, I have had the same answer, that these men were under contract, that they had taken the contract at a specific price and they must carry it out. In one district in my constituency two rural mail routes became vacant. No contractor has come forward and expressed a willingness to accept the price that the department is ready to offer. In one case the department have suggested to me that if I could get some one to take a contract they would be willing to consider a compromise and make the rate a little higher. Therefore, the whole contention about mail contracts being carried out falls to the ground. If they would simply give the contract to the lowest tenderer, whether or not such a tender was higher than the limit they had fixed instead of sending some one out to try and beat the man down to the mileage basis which was arrived at a few years ago, satisfactory contracts would probably be obtained. The only fair way is to give the mail carriers an increase in proportion to the increase which every one else in the country is receiving. I desire to say a word in regard to rural postmasters. I have had this matter also up with the department. A group of members waited on the minister and I think we made it clear that on the new basis which was established in 1915 fixing the salaries of rural postmasters there was a discrimination against the man who is in a post office with a revenue of less than $10,000 a year. Under the basis in force prior to 1915 a revenue of $10,000 gave the postmaster $3,200 a year as income. Under the new regulation a postmaster in order to get $3,200 a year has had to increase his postal revenue by 23 per cent. A postmaster in an office with a revenue of $1,000, received $500 a year, but under the new regulation he has to increase the postal revenue 52 per cent in order to get the same salary that he got before. I have spent considerable time at the Post Office Department trying to get to the bottom of this question, but I will admit that I could not convince the officers of the department that there was discrimination. I pointed out the case of a post office in my riding where the postmaster's salary had decreased in the past two years, that whereas he was getting $208 a month prior to the change in the basis rate—out of which he had to pay his rent, light, heat and assistant—the remuneration has been reduced to $159 per month or a reduction of $49 a month while the work has been very largely increased. I have in my pocket a statement from the Post Office Department in regard to another post office in the district I represent, where the total amount that the postmaster receives for carrying the mails and keeping the post office, with an allowance of $80 per year for night duty, is $416, including rent. When a group of members had this question up with the department we were given to understand that probably some relief might be given when the Supplementary Estimates came down. But in the Supplementary Estimates I find that there is an item put in to take care of increases to thirty postmasters where the revenue is more than $10,000, and where the salary will be $3,200, but there is not one single nickel for the rural postmaster. The condition has just got down to this, that it has become almost impossible to get a man who can be depended upon to take charge of the post office in an outlying part of the country. Certainly, I feel that the whole scheme of remuneration for the rural postmasters and rural mail carriers should be revised and that something like reasonable compensation should be given to them.

Mr. KEEFER: I would like to corroborate what the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) has said. In many cases the rural postmasters are not paid what they ought to be. In some cases there are well founded complaints about the management of the post office, but nothing can be done, because when you speak to the postmaster you know he is not properly paid and you cannot find fault. The remuneration of these postmasters and mail carriers is not what it ought to be. A case came up recently in Port Arthur where a man who had served faithfully for twenty-five years died and no allowance whatever was made to those who were dependent upon him. The postmaster wrote to the department about the old and faithful servant, but nothing could be done. I think the postal department should revise their salaries and allowances.

[Mr. G. B. Nicholson.]

Mr. BOYCE: I would like to endorse what has been said in regard to the rural mail carriers and postmasters, and to apply it especially to the postmasters in the county of Carleton. I know a postmaster within seven miles of the city who is carrying the mail seven miles backwards and forwards for the sum of $300. There is no better class in the community than the country postmasters. They have to keep their offices open from six o'clock in the morning until possibly ten o'clock at night, in return for which they receive the munificent sum of about fifteen cents a day. If the Government are not generous they should at least be just, and I think it is only right that these men should be paid fair wages. Take the rural mail carriers. They drive twenty-five miles a day generally and are paid $600 a year, which hardly suffices to feed their horses. If we expect the mails to be carried in a satisfactory manner, we ought at least to pay these men a fair wage. I hope the Government will take these representations into their earnest consideration. We do not urge an extravagant stipend, but it should at least be a just one. I do not think any man who is in charge of a post office, and keeps it clean and presentable, should be paid less $100 a year, while the mail drivers should receive at least $1,000 a year.

Mr. MORPHY: There is in my county a grave state of affairs with regard to the rural carriers. The people there feel that the postal department is probably the best run department in the Government service because it is administered so parsimoniously. The general public think it is a wonderful department, by reason of it being the most economical branch of the public service.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is a pity the hon. member from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) is not one of the listeners.

Mr. MORPHY: I will be glad to study the situation a little and find out who is the mean man at the head of the department. I cannot say that it is my hon. friend from St. Ann, because he is only the acting minister. However, I have observed this: A man having a route of twenty-five or twenty-six miles paid for on the old standard at the rate of $30 per mile per year, refused his contract lately when it expired. New tenders were called for and only one was received, which was $200 higher than the former contractor was paid. The Government would not give the contract to the tenderer. I suppose if his tender had been $200 lower he would have got it very quickly. The department, I presume, said to the inspector: "For God's sake, see if you cannot save that $200 and get somebody to take this work."

The inspector wrote to the former contractor and he refused to continue the work. The request virtually made was: "Please keep the contract and we will peddle around and see if we cannot get somebody to take it." That was the tenor of it, for I saw the letter. The man wrote back and said: "I will not be bothered with it." Is that a fair way to do business? If the Government are going to stand by the principle of calling for tenders they should take the offer that comes in, whether it is a little higher or a little lower. I do not think it is dignified for the Government to attempt to beat down men who have sent in a bona fide tender according to the regulations, and failing that, attempt to get the former contractor to help them out.

While on the subject of the parsimony of the department, I do not know whether the Post Office Department is blameable for this matter or not, but I know a post office janitor who has served for thirty years at the magnificent salary of $600 per year. Although he is married and has raised a family of three children, he has not had an advance of salary in all that time. That man is there yet, but is frightened of his life of being squeezed out if his health fails him and losing that miserable pittance.

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand that janitor is suffering from the parsimony of the Public Works Department.

Mr. MORPHY: He has charge of the public building which accommodates the Excise, Customs and Post Office Branches. But it shows the parsimony of the department that they would keep a man at a salary of $600 after thirty years of faithful service. Hon. gentlemen stand up in this House and talk on behalf of the under-dog and all we get is a nod of the head from the Acting Postmaster General. He does not rise and say he is going to see that grievances like this are remedied. I think that the situation in the country to-day calls, and calls loudly, for the Government to declare that the time has come when this loyal and efficient body of officials in the country districts should get some recognition and some consideration. Large increases can be easily got for the big men, but nothing is forthcoming for the little men. There is no doubt about that. Why is it? Hon. gentlemen sitting on the front benches do not go to the country. They do not know the country. They are ensconced in Ottawa mingling with the high fellows, the club fellows, and the top-notch fellows. They do not know the country fellows at all. It is about time they roused themselves and shook up the service. We have got a splendid body of officials, but the officials are frightened of the ministers.

9 p.m.

An hon. MEMBER: Are they?

Mr. MORPHY: Yes, absolutely frightened, and yet some of them are men of strong parts and large hearts, but they are so repressed by the ministers that they are in a state of perpetual fright. When it comes to Sir Thomas This, or Sir Thomas That, it is easy enough to get a thousand dollars, it goes through hidden in the Estimates so that you cannot find it. On behalf of the Outside Service, I want the Acting Postmaster General to give the pledge to-night that, so far as this department is concerned, he will shake things up in the interest of that deserving body of men, and the same with the rest of his colleagues, so that the country's needs will be properly taken care of and what we sometimes call the "under dogs" properly looked after. You cannot expect a man to keep a wife and family of three children on such a salary as $600:

Mr. LEMIEUX: That's a large family.

Mr. MORPHY: There are some men in the eastern provinces who probably have more than thirteen children. Well, for keeping the post office, furnishing fuel and light and shovelling the snow off the paths in the winter for the convenience of the public, country postmasters get the magnificent sum of $75 a year. Morning, noon, and night, these postmasters are at the behest of the public in an official capacity, subject at any time to dismissal and the loss of that munificent stipend, if somebody happens to complain that he did not receive a letter which he should have got. Services such as these are, to my mind, public services in the true sense of the term, and these men should not be treated in the meagre, miserable, measly way in which they are treated throughout the country. I ask the ministers to realize that the Government is not getting any credit from the people for the parsimony exercised and displayed towards what might be called the inferior service, but is nevertheless the superior service, rendered by these people in the country districts. I ask again for the most favourable consideration for the claims of these people, and that they be given a fair show.

The CHAIRMAN: Before recognizing Mr. Euler, who caught my eye several moments ago, I wish to say that never in my experience have hon. gentlemen kept so well to the question before the Chair as they have during the last two hours, but I must also remind them—without in any way desiring to call them to order—that there is only one hour left in which to dispose of about one hundred items in the Estimates. I understand that His Excellency the Governor General is leaving for Toronto on the eleven o'clock train, but if hon. gentlemen think that prorogation should be delayed until to-morrow, why of course it will have to be. I understood, however, that it was the desire of every one that Parliament should be prorogued to-night, but I would be very glad to have the opinion of the committee. If it is the unanimous consent that we adjourn until to-morrow the chairman is quite willing.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Only hon. gentlemen on the other side have spoken so far.

The CHAIRMAN: At the present rate, it will be impossible to meet the wishes of the Committee.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think, Mr. Chairman, that we will be able to get through in fair time. If we cannot do it by ten o'clock, we can by a little after ten, and if not by then, then by a little after eleven. We can get our views out, and I think we can get ready for prorogation to-night. I would not have gone so far as to have suggested it to-night, but there have been many times when we have made the same general conventions. And I have consulted also with my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier).

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) will certainly acknowledge that there has been no obstacle placed by us. We have been endeavouring to further the business. But the business of the country must be done, at all events.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Oh, yes.

Mr. EULER: I shall not keep the House more than a few moments. I thought it was absolutely in place that at least one member on this side of the House should support what has been said by seven or eight members on the other side. I absolutely agree with the argument advanced by those who have already spoken. I believe the people of this country will absolutely endorse anything in reason that the Government will do for the relief of these three classes in the postal service—the letter carriers, whose case, I believe, has been dealt with, I think, not altogether too liberally; the postmasters, whose remuneration, I think, is almost a disgrace to the people of Canada; and the rural mail carriers. I agree with what has been said, and I think that the Government should deal with this,not in the spirit of getting the services of these men for as little as possible but with some idea of remunerating them according to what they deserve. I think the people of this country should support them in that. I will also say that, before the House prorogues, hon. members would appreciate some sort of an expression of policy on the part of the Government with regard to this matter.

Mr. FIELDING: Might I have a single word, not by way of criticism, but rather with a desire to help the minister who is acting as Postmaster General? I sympathize very deeply with him and his associates in the position in which they are placed. It is easy for us to stand up here and advocate the claims of the rural mail carriers, the postmasters and so on, but the minister and his staff have to consider the general cost of the whole undertaking. And when my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) is telling the department they are spending too much money, the minister might be disposed to hesitate about adding additional charges to the service. I am afraid with regard to the public service of Canada generally, that it is underpaid. There are exceptions. There are a few of these big men that my hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Morphy) talks about; there may be a few getting more than they should, but the great mass are not being adequately paid having regard to the service they perform. And I believe the people of Canada are willing to do it. I would like to strengthen the hands of the minister in any effort he may make to do something for the rural postmasters, particularly the smaller ones. Might I add a suggestion, which I ventured to offer before? I know the difficulty about the rural mail contractor. He has made a bargain, and a bargain is a bargain. And the minister may say: "If you do not like your contract, give it up." That may be a just judgment, but it is rather a harsh judgment. I ventured to offer a suggestion. My suggestion was with respect to the smaller class of mail carriers in the country, not the big ones—I suppose seven-eighths of the mail contracts, leaving out the railway and steamship contracts, do not exceed $800 a year. My suggestion in regard to this smaller class of contractors—the big fellows can look after themselves—is, where they made their contracts before this great advance in the cost of everything, would it not be fair, confining it to that period and to that class of contracts, to give them a moderate increase all round? I am not urging it. I know the minister's difficulty. I only renew the suggestion. If he is able to bring forward some proposal in some shape or form, and not be too much alarmed by what the hon. member for Maisonneuve has said, he will be gratified to find the whole House disposed to agree with him in doing something for this worthy class of public officials.

Mr. MARSHALL: I quite agree with all what has been said about the mail carriers, who are not paid well and who are complaining bitterly. As the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens has said, conditions have changed very much in the last four years. Some of these contracts were taken four years ago, when horse feed did not cost half what it costs now. I think there is only one way for the Government to remedy this, and that is to allow every man to cancel his contract. Of course, he has the privilege of tendering again. The minister might add a percentage, but it is just a question whether that would be satisfactory. I know of one case in my riding, where the contractor carrying the mail was very poor, and we had to buy a horse for him to carry on his work. That should not be. They are not paid at all well.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: There was a certain amount of disappointment in this House at the answer the Acting Postmaster General (Mr. Doherty) gave to the question of my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Lemieux) as to the principle which should be adopted in filling the vacancy in the Toronto Post Office. The minister said, when asked if it would be filled by merit from some man already in the service, that the department had nothing whatever to do with it, that the office would be filled by the Civil Service Commission. We are all aware that the Civil Service Commission has a certain amount of control, but I find that the Act says that the Governor in Council may make such regulations as he deems necessary or convenient in carrying out the provisions of the Act. There is nothing to hinder the Governor in Council from making a regulation as to the making of appointments. I would like to know from the minister, in view of the fact that the Government have complete control over the commission whether the principle of promotion will be applied at Toronto or will the old patronage system be followed?

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman comprehends in a manner I cannot follow the provisions of the Act that the Governor in Council may make regulations to carry out the Act, while the Act says that the Civil Service Commission shall make the appointments. And the hon. member suggests that we should make a regulation to control the Civil Service Commission, which, under the Act is to control us.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The Act says that the Governor in Council may make regulations to control the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. DOHERTY: For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of that Act.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Certainly.

Mr. DOHERTY: But not, as I understand it, to empower the Governor in Council to make regulations to tell the Civil Service Commission whom they shall appoint.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The minister will not say, I am sure, that the Government have not the power to make a regulation that the principle of promotion by merit shall apply.

Mr. DOHERTY: As I understand it, the Civil Service Commission are to determine as to how they will select the best man to fill the office. And if it were up to this Government, would the hon. gentleman suggest that we should make a rule that even if in the judgment of the Civil Service Commission the man next in position was entirely unqualified, that he should be nevertheless promoted? To do that would bind the Government in all cases to appoint to vacant positions the man who happens to be next in rank, and would tie absolutely the hands of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. PEDLOW: I wish to bring three matters to the attention of the Acting Postmaster General: First, the postage on parcels to soldiers overseas. This is a subject that I have had in mind ever since I came to this House in April. During the campaign in December it was impressed on me very forcibly from many quarters that it would be desirable if the Government could see its way clear to forward free of charge parcels to the soldiers overseas. Poor women who have to work hard for their money and find it difficult to pay for the material contained in the parcels sent to their sons overseas, have to pay in addition excessive amounts by way of postage On a package of ordinary size the postage amounts to thirty-eight or forty cents, and this makes the cost of the whole parcel very high. I am sure that this suggestion will appeal to the sense of fair play of many members on the other side of the House. The next matter that I have in mind is that of postage on magazines to soldiers. In the magazines published in the United States there is a notice on the cover advising the reader that if after he finishes reading the magazine he places a one cent stamp over that notice and drops the magazine in the post office, it will be forwarded to some soldier in the army or the navy overseas. I think that this also is a matter for the serious consideration of the Post Office Department. Then, there is the suggestion that the revenue from the sale of postage stamps and inland revenue stamps be kept separate. It is impossible for the Post Office or Inland Revenue Departments to determine exactly the amount of revenue received by the respective departments in respect of these stamps if they are not kept separate. Moreover, the way they are dealt with now is not businesslike. I suggest that the ministers of these two departments take this subject into consideration. It should not be possible to use a postage stamp for inland revenue purposes, and vice versa.

Mr. ARGUE: If rural mail carriers resign their positions, will the Government release their bondsmen?

Mr. DOHERTY: These people are not employees. They do not receive salaries; they are contractors who undertook to do certain work at a certain price. I do not think it is possible for me to say that I will cancel the contract of any rural carrier who asks that his contract be cancelled, because the question whether he had made a bad bargain or a good one would then cease to receive consideration. I do not see why a rural mail contractor, who is receiving proper remuneration which he originally agreed to take, should be relieved of his contract merely, perhaps, because he can get a more paying position if he goes somewhere else. It can only be dealt with, so far as my judgment goes—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am asked by some to answer, and others interrupt by calling "carried."

Mr. PEDLOW: I would like the Postmaster General to give expression of opinion regarding the matters to which I have directed attention.

Special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, to cover expenses when attending the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, $2,500.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I stated this morning that I would give the House an answer to the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) and the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), with regard to their inquiries concerning the allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick in respect of his attendance at the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I will read the statement if my hon. friend wishes, but the substance of it is this: Sir Charles Fitzpatrick contends that he was entirely justified under the circumstances in accepting the allowance for the two years during which he visited London. That is entirely true. But with reference to the last two years, as it appears to be the wish of the House that these amounts should be returned, he says that he is quite willing to return them. I think that is the gist of the matter.

Dominion Police—further amount required, $11,000.

Mr. BUREAU: I see that there is a provisional allowance under this head in the Supplementary Estimates. Is this amount of $11,000 to give a supplementary allowance to the Dominion police, or it is just the ordinary increase to which they are entitled under the law?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand this further amount of $11,000, which is for the last fiscal year, is attributable to the fact that it has been found necessary to increase the number of the Dominion Police. Their work under existing conditions calls for additional help. That is the reason why we were $11,000 short.

Mr. BUREAU: It is for past services?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, for the last fiscal year.

Mr. BUREAU: Is it the intention of the minister to give the Dominion Police any supplementary allowance the same as is being done for the Outside Service on account of the increased cost of living?

Mr. DOHERTY: We expect to make to the different ranks a proportionate increase in their pay.

Mr. BUREAU: Plus an allowance?

Mr. DOHERTY: The increase in their pay will represent the allowance. Instead of proceeding by way of allowance, in view of the discrepancy between their pay and the pay of other police forces, what is going to be done is to give a reasonable increase of pay.

Mr. BUREAU: That will be an increase over and above the salaries they were getting last year, plus the allowance, to supplement the difference in the salaries?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Arts and Agriculture—For the purchase of seed grain and feed oats—Governor General's Warrant (Mar. 8, 1918), $700,000.

Mr. KAY: What was this used for?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The item explains itself. It is for the purchase of seed grain and feed oats. The purchases have been made and the amount is re-paid to the public treasury.

For the purchase of screenings, mill feed and corn, $300,000.

Mr. KAY: What was that purchased for?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That was purchased in the same way by the Department of Agriculture for the purpose of getting feed for the stock raisers, which was sold to them and for which they paid.

Adulteration of food, and the administration of the Act respecting fertilizers, fraudulent marking, and commercial feeding stuffs.—Further amount required, $5,000.

Mr. VIEN: It was understood with the leader of the House that there was a matter that would be introduced on the Supplementary Estimates of the Department of Militia and Defence. I understand that there are no Supplementary Estimates of that department.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There were Estimates of the Department of Militia and Defence in the Supplementary Estimates. They were passed just after the committee assembled at seven o'clock. My hon. friend was not in the House at the time.

Mr. VIEN: I was here when the Chairman took the Chair.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: Item 342 is not yet passed.

Mr. VIEN: If all the items connected with the Department of Militia and Defence were passed after recess, I suppose the leader of the House will permit me, as promised, to introduce this matter on this item which is connected with the Department of Agriculture.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend sees exactly where we are. If he were here at seven o'clock when those Estimates came up, he should have spoken to those items. As it is now, this is not an item to which his remarks would be pertinent. At the same time it is quite true, as I said this morning, there would be items and he would have an opportunity of saying something.

Mr. VIEN: There is at my disposal another way of bringing before the House the matter I have in mind. I have a motion to adjourn the House in order to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. VIEN: If the Chairman will allow me to put a question—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. VIEN: I think the right hon. gentleman will allow me to explain.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. It is well known that the rule in Committee of Supply is that the discussion must be strictly relevant to the clause that is before the committee at the time. The Chairman, of course, has no knowledge of any agreement which may have been made between the hon. member and any hon. member who may have at the time been leading the House. The Supplementary Estimates of the Militia Department were passed at about ten minutes after seven o'clock this evening. The Minister of Militia was in his seat and asked that those items be called owning to the fact that he was obliged to go somewhere else, and the items were passed. The Chairman would suggest—it is merely a suggestion—that the items be allowed to go through as quickly as possible, and, if we have time left, the hon. gentleman may, with the unanimous consent of the committee, address the House on the subject, but, without unanimous consent, I certainly cannot allow him to do so.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The facts are as have been stated by you, Mr. Chairman.

The Minister of Militia was in his seat, and the items were called and passed. My hon. friend (Mr. Vien) did not notice that and consequently lost his opportunity. At the same time, I would be very sorry to have him go away feeling that he had been disappointed in his purpose. Let us put through these estimates and put through concurrence. Then I am going back to motions, and, with the consent of the House, my hon. friend can then take his time.

Mr. BUREAU: We cannot rely on the unanimous consent of the House. Some hon. member might object.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: We will take it on concurrence.

Mr. VIEN: It will take longer on a motion to adjourn.

Railways and Canals—chargeable to collection of revenue—Canadian Government Railways, working expenses, further amount required, $8,500,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Before this item is carried I wish to have a parting word with the Minister of Railways on the question of patronage on the Intercolonial railway. I have brought this matter to his attention several times, but I have not yet had a clear and distinct statement from him as to the policy of the Government in this matter. We all know that the employees of the Government railways were excluded from the Civil Service Act which has just been passed. I want to tell the minister that in Eastern Canada the patronage system still exists on the Intercolonial railway notwithstanding the fact that the Prime Minister stated some months ago that it had been abolished. It has not been abolished. When I brought this matter up a few days ago the minister said that he had had a conversation with the superintendent of the road, and that he had told the superintendent he had a free hand with regard to the question of patronage. Now that is not sufficient to bring about the reform we desire. The general superintendent will be afraid to offend members of Parliament in that part of Canada by enforcing this reform unless he is backed up by the whole strength of the minister, and the minister so far has not taken the action that is to be desired. In Nova Scotia we have a committee which looks after securing employment for returned soldiers. The committee is very active and has done splendid work in the way of finding employment for the men who are coming back from the front. The secretary of the committee a few days ago wrote a letter to the master mechanic on the eastern division of the Intercolonial railway. It had occurred to this committee that some of these soldiers might be given positions as brakemen or cleaners on the railway, and this letter I have referred to was written for the purpose of eliciting from the master mechanic a statement that he would accept applications for employment of that kind from returned soldiers. Let me read the reply to that letter:

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS.
Eastern Lines.

R. H. Martin,
Superintendent Dist. No. 4.
Stellarton, N.S., April 22, 1918.

Secretary, Returned Soldiers' Employment Committee,
65 Metropole Building,
Halifax, N.S.

Dear Sir:

Your letter of the 16th instant to hand, in regard to the employment of returned soldiers.

If you have two machinists, I could place them at Sydney. In regard to wipers and cleaners employed at the roundhouses, I would refer them to Mr. A. McGregor, M.P., New Glasgow, for a recommendation, as this has always been the practice when taking on employees in the railway.

Yours truly,
W. N. Ingram,
Master Mechanic.

Mr. Ingram has the duty of employing men on the eastern division of the Intercolonial, and in this letter he tells the secretary of the committee that if he wants to get a position on the road for a returned soldier as a wiper or cleaner, which is the meanest position on the Intercolonial, the applicant must get a recommendation from Mr. A. McGregor, M. P., for New Glasgow. Imagine, Mr. Chairman, a young soldier just back from Vimy Ridge who wants a position of this kind on the Intercolonial going to the door of one of the shops on the Intercolonial and with hat in hand asking for a job, being told that he must first get letter of recommendation from someone distributing patronage for the district! If this is done in the case of returned soldiers, what will be the chances of a young fellow who belongs to the opposite political party? What I want from the minister is a plain and clear-cut statement that he will apply the rule of no patronage on the Intercolonial railway; that he will have a notice nailed on the doors of all the shops to the effect that no recommendation will be required from any patronage committee in the case of any applicant seeking a position; that men will be given positions on their merits, and will not be required to bring a certificate from Mr. McGregor or any body else. If the minister will make such a statement it will be quite satisfactory. I know he does not intend that the present conditions should prevail on the road, but the conditions I have described certainly do exist at the present time, and unless some positive action is taken by the minister they will continue to exist.

Mr. J. D. REID: I think I stated in the House a few days ago that I had informed the general manager of the Intercolonial railway, Mr. Hayes, that in operating the road he could employ any one he saw fit without regard to the political party to which the applicant belonged. I am sorry the party mentioned in that letter should take the stand he does as far as returned soldiers are concerned. The only recommendation any returned soldier wants to get a position on the Intercolonial railway or in any department of this Government is himself. The returned soldier will be given preference over everybody else. With reference to patronage outside of returned soldiers, I gave instructions to Mr. Hayes that he was to employ people on their merits, and those instructions, I suppose, he would circulate among all the officials serving under him who had authority to employ help. I gave him instructions by letter only to-day, for I have received a copy of the letter my hon. friend has read, and I will expect those instructions to be carried out. I do not think the hon. member for New Glasgow, the hon. member for Guysborough or any other member, wants to be bothered with patronage if he can get out of it; that is the way I feel about it, and I have not been bothered with patronage either on the railway or anywhere else since Civil Service reform was brought about. Neither Mr. McGregor nor any other member has recommended me to employ any person on the Intercolonial railway.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: He is certainly doing it, as this letter shows.

Mr. J. D. REID: He is assuming that responsibility himself. I do not think I could make my position any plainer than I have done. If the instructions I have given are not carried out we shall be having another session some months hence, and hon. gentlemen can come back and make any complaints they wish.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Would it not be well to put that letter of instruction on Hansard?

Supplementary estimates, 1918-19, Department of Justice, including Penitentiary Branch —To provide for a clerkship in First Division, Subdivision A, $2,800.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would the Minister of Justice inform me whether he has appointed the new inspectors for the penitentiaries?

Mr. DOHERTY: That has not as yet received its sanction, so that it would be a little difficult for me to have made any appointments under it. Moreover, these offices will, I understand, be like all others.

Department of Mines—Contingencies—for expenses of a representation of the Dominion of Canada on the advisory body of the Imperial Mineral Resources Bureau, London, England, $2,000.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I understand that this bureau is established in accordance with a resolution adopted at the Imperial Conference of last year. I am glad the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) is in his seat and that I may have an opportunity to say what I have to say previous to his departure for London to attend another conference with certain members of the Government. The main resolution which was adopted last year, and with which I thoroughly agree, concerning the political readjustment of the different parts of the Empire, reads as follows:

> The Imperial War Conference is of opinion that the readjustment of the constitutional relations of the component parts of the Empire is too important and intricate a subject to be dealt with during the war, and that it should form the subject of a special Imperial Conference to be summoned as soon as possibles after the cessation of hostilities.

But I submit that other resolutions adopted at the same conference are somewhat objectionable, though it may seem presumptuous on my part to criticise in any way the statesmen who took part in that conference. What I fear is that certain gentlemen, certain groups and certain organizations, are taking advantage of the war, and of the conditions created by the war, to try to create a situation or condition of accomplished facts in order to promote their ambitions, and that they propose a readjustment according to their own view. It is said that these commissions and bureaus are only created for the purposes of the war. That was said in answer to a question asked the other day of the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen). In this connection, I wish to read to the committee the following resolution which was adopted at the conference last year in regard to the control of resources:

> The control of natural resources available within the Empire, especially those that are of an essential character for necessary national purposes, whether in peace or in war.

In regard to this Imperial Mineral Bureau, for which we are now asked to vote a sum of money, it is said:

> That it is desirable to establish in London an Imperial Mineral Resources Bureau upon which should be represented Great Britain, the Dominions, India, and other parts of the Empire.

So this control of what certain gentlemen call "Imperial resources" is advocated for times of peace as well as for times of war. What about this particular Imperial Mineral Resources Bureau? This Imperial Mineral Resources Bureau has been recommended by the Imperial War Conference of last year upon a suggestion by the Dominions Royal Commission, of which the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce was a member. I commend to the members of the committee these words which I find in the report of the commission:

> It is not difficult, however, to imagine conditions even in times of peace, in which it might become desirable to use the possession of these assets as an instrument of commercial negotiation. The practical monopoly of potash which Germany possesses has enabled her to exert pressure on other countries in the past, and the controversy between Germany and the United States in 1911 may be mentioned as an example of the influence which the possession of a raw material monopoly gives in commercial negotiations between two Powers. The possession of assets such as the Canadian asbestos and nickle supplies could be used by the British Empire as a powerful means of economic defence.

The commission, of which the right hon. gentleman was a member, recommended that the assets of Canada should be considered as belonging to the Empire as a whole and might be used to advantage by the united governments of all parts of the Empire in the negotiation of commercial treaties with foreign countries. I do not desire that this particular vote should be considered as a ratification of the resolutions, especially of the wording of the resolutions, which were adopted at the Imperial Conference of last year. The resources of Canada are national resources and should be so considered. Nothing should be done of such a nature or character as to prejudice, or interfere in any way with, the great task which will confront the statesmen of the Empire after the conclusion of the war.

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

Mr. LEMIEUX: I had expected that the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) would before his departure for the old country give us a precis of the objects of his visit to London to attend the next Imperial Conference. He had promised to make a statement to the House but he has not made it. He had also promised to give us the names of those who were to accompany him on his visit. I wish to emphasize the remarks which have been made by my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe). I do not object to the presence of the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues at any Imperial Conference provided that at that conference nothing is decided upon without the free and unshackled consent of the people of Canada. Last year's conference was held in London and several important matters were discussed. First, the navy scheme was discussed and the Admiralty was requested to work out, immediately after the conclusion of the war, what it considered the most effective scheme for the naval defence of the Empire. I would not wish to enter upon a naval debate this evening, but while we do not object to our statesmen discussing with the Imperial authorities the actual needs of the war, the time is not ripe when they should proceed in advance and commit the credit of Canada and of the Dominions to any future naval schemes. Other questions were decided with regard to the military situation, standardization, military training, the question of Imperial resources which has been brought up by my hon. friend from Kamouraska, and preferential treatment, this last being a very dangerous subject to discuss at the present time, because when the war is over the policy of preferential treatment between the British Empire on the one hand and the rest of the world on the other will create a very complex situation.

The CHAIRMAN: I fear that the hon. member is out of order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am just about to conclude my remarks, Mr. Chairman, and it is just as well to have from the right hon. leader of the House a word or two on the contemplated visit, because in the last dying hours of Parliament we have had no explanations whatever with respect to this important matter. I do not wish to detain the House at any length, and I will conclude my remarks if the Chairman will afford me the opportunity of merely stating this: We are all proud to belong to the British Empire, but we are all Canadians, and at the forthcoming Imperial Conference we hope, as Canadians and as free British subjects, that the interests of Canada will not be jeopardized. I, in common with many other Canadians, view with alarm the constant agitation of these round table clubs and Imperial circles, and the reunion of those framers of Imperial constitutions. I remember that Mr. Chamberlain many years ago—

The CHAIRMAN: I am very sorry, but I will have to ask the hon. member to desist. He is absolutely out of order in discussing these questions on this item I have called a great many of the younger members to order, and I cannot do otherwise with the hon. member for Maisonneuve.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Do not be sorry, Mr. Chairman; I will bow gracefully to your decision, but before doing so I wish to conclude my remarks. Whilst at the Imperial Conference let the representatives of the Canadian Government work in conjunction and in harmony with the British authorities towards the winning of the war but let them not jeopardize the interests of Canada by wild Imperialistic schemes. The world is against imperialism just now.

Mr. MURPHY: Before the item is carried, we would like some information as to who is to be selected for this mission?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If my hon. friend will allow the business to go through so that we can get somewhere near the object that we have in view—

Mr. LEMIEUX: Do not obstruct.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: —There will be a few moments in which I will make some remarks with reference to the mission and the persons who are going.

Mr. MURPHY: I will just ask the one question.

Mr. BURRELL: I will answer my hon. friend. The gentleman who has been selected to represent Canada on the Imperial Resources Board is Dr. Miller, of Toronto, Provincial Geologist of Ontario, whose salary they are paying. Dr. Miller is a very well known geologist, and this amount is intended to meet his expenses.

Mr. MURPHY: I simply want to have the assurance of my hon. friend that this gentleman is not a nominee of Lord Beaverbrook.

Mr. BURRELL: Not at all.

Mr. MURPHY: Because I have reason to know that Lord Beaverbrook is very much interested in imperializing the resources of Canada.

Mr. BURRELL: Dr. Miller was selected after a conference of various representatives of the provincal governments and mining men throughout the country, including the Mining institute.

High Commissioner's Office, London—To provide an additional amount for three clerks, $300.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I desire in connection with this vote to offer a suggestion, or present a request to the Government—perhaps I should say that I am only claiming a right. I was in London last year and I happened to go to the High Commissioner's office in company with two lawyers from the city of Quebec—Mr. J. E. Chapleau, K.C., and Mr. Simon Lapointe, K.C. One of my companions was curious to learn whether he could be understood in French in the High Commissioner's office. The first official to whom he spoke only shook his head. He then went into the various rooms in the building and tried to get the information he wanted, but nowhere in the High Commissioner's office in London could the French language be understood. Now, Mr. Chairman, the French language is spoken everywhere in London. In the large stores, in all the hotels, in all the public offices, and in the railway stations, notices are posted in both languages. In all the large churches, even of the Church of England—and there are very few Frenchmen who belong to that denomination—French is recognized. In St. Paul's Cathedral and the other churches you will observe notices posted in both French and English. In the city of London the French language occupies the position which it enjoys in all civilized countries and among all educated people. Sir, it is a pity, and I thought it was regrettable, that the only place where French could not be either spoken or understood was the office of the High Commissioner for Canada, a country in which the French language is official. I avail myself of this opportunity to ask that this grievance be redressed, and that at least one of the three clerks who are to be appointed as a result of this vote shall be a person able to understand the questions of gentlemen of French extraction who may go to London and who want to be heard and understood in their own language.

10 p.m.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend is a little mistaken, but it is probably the wording of the item which has led to the error. The item does not mean that there are three additional clerks to be appointed to the High Commissioner's office, as my hon. friend will see when he notes that only $300 is being voted. What this means is that a statutory increase is asked for three clerks. However, that does not take away from the other portion of my hon. friend's remarks, and I shall have very great pleasure in giving the substance and the very words of his statement here to-night to the Prime Minister, under whom the High Commissioner's office is placed, and who will take the matter into consideration. I do not think that what my hon. friend has said is unreasonable.

RAILWAYS AND CANALS—CHARGEABLE TO CAPITAL.

Canadian Government Railways.

To provide for the purchase of the following Railways at amounts not exceeding those set out in each case:—

Elgin and Havelock Railway	$30,000 00
York and Carleton Railway	18,000 00
St. Martin's Railway	65,000 00
Salisbury and Albert Railway	75,000 00
Moncton and Buctouche Railway ..	70,000 00
Kent Northern Railway	60,000 00
Caraquet and Gulf Shore Railway ..	200,000 00
	$518,000 00

Mr. CAHILL: Judging by this item there seems to be quite a flock of lame ducks seeking shelter under the protecting wings of the Minister of Railways and Canals. And before he gets too far into the railway game in this country, into the business of acquiring all the railways in sight, he and the Government should take into their very serious consideration the question of the counties which are paying bonuses to railways. The county of Pontiac, which I have the honour to represent, voted a bonus of $200,000 a few years ago to get a railroad. Of that they still have to pay $100,000. They will also have to assume their proportion of the cost of the purchase of these and other railroads; they have to stand the burden of the increased freight rates and passenger fares as well. They understood they were to be benefited by this railway when they agreed to pay this bonus, but they have no railroad communication whatever, yet they are in a position of paying a bonus, and having to pay ferry charges every time they go across the lake at Pembroke, representing an increased expenditure there of five or six thousand dollars a year to get their produce to market. While the minister is spending money for railways in lavish amounts, I think something should be done to relieve these people of that bonus. I think other counties than Pontiac have probably paid bonuses to have railroads built. If it is the policy of the Dominion of Canada to take over these railroads, they will, I hope, not demand the payment of at least that proportion of the bonus not yet paid.

Mr. J. D. REID: The matter referred to by the hon. member is of course a very large question, and it is the first time I have had any suggestion of this kind. I should be glad if he would put in writing to me the suggestion he has just made in order that I may give it consideration during the recess. It is too large a question to discuss here at this late hour. With respect to the several small lines in the province of New Brunswick, covered by this item, they have been operating for years at a loss, and it is really now impossible for them to operate on account of the loss they are making. We are now taking them over, and not at a price that any one would feel is exorbitant For instance, in the case of the Elgin and Havelock railway, they have agreed to sell their lines for $30,000. The rails alone on that line, if we were to sell them for scrap, are worth about $80,000.

Mr. MURPHY: May I ask my hon. friend who are the directors of that railway, or, at least, who is the president?

Mr. J. D. REID: I could not say. There is a Mr. Pearson in Halifax, connected with it. All of these railways we are getting at about one-third the value of the rails. I have a word to say about the last two. For the Kent Northern, I have put in an amount of $60,000. They have not agreed to accept that amount. Neither have the Caraquet and Gulf Shore railway agreed to accept the amount of $200,000. To those two lines we have made these offers, which are on about the same basis as the others mentioned before. If they do not accept, we will not pay any higher price, and these amounts will not be paid. But I am placing them in the Estimates to give them the opportunity, and to allow us to take over the lines, and thus close out the branch lines which are so unsatisfactory in the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. MURPHY: Out of deference to the wishes of hon. gentlemen to wind up the business of the session and get home, I do not at this stage intend to enter the protest against these purchases, which it was my original intention to do. However, I desire my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals—who refers to a matter relating to the county represented by my hon. friend from Pontiac, involving, I think $100,000, as so large that he has not time to deal with it, but who is asking us to vote $518,000 as a comparatively small sum to these other railways—to submit to the House at the opening of the next session the full correspondence relating to the purchases of these roads, giving all details as to the ownership and directorates in each case.

Mr. J. D. REID: I shall certainly be glad to do that.

Mr. TURGEON: I could not allow this item to pass without making some remarks. I have explained my position with regard to the Caraquet and Gulf Shore Railway, and I do not intend to rehearse the argument I put before the minister at that time. However, my chief fear was that the company in possession of this railway would not accept the amount that was offered to them. In the early days of the session, I suggested to the Minister of Public Works that the best way to handle this matter would be to expropriate the road and arbitrate afterwards. We want to ensure a service equal, at least, to the necessities of the community in the county of Gloucester. I suggested at the time to the minister that, although I did not think the proposed amount of $200,000 would be accepted, he might put it in the Estimates. He refused at the time to put it in. On second thought, he has included the amount of $200,000, which is in the Estimates together with the corollary "not exceding those set out in each case." I am afraid these words will render an arrangement as impossible as it was last week when I spoke on this question. The Minister of Public Works especially knows the feeling existing to-day in the county of Gloucester with reference to transportation facilities, which are of vital moment for our important industries which cannot do without an efficient service. I had hoped before prorogation that I might possibly get either from the Minister of Public Works or the Minister of Railways and Canals a statement that would dispel the disquiet now prevailing.

Mr. CARVELL: If my hon. friend wants a statement I will give it to him now. We have offered them $200,000 for the railway. They cannot make two hundred thousand cents out of it for the next ten years. We will not arbitrate. We will not pay any more. We think they will take it.

Branch lines—to bring Lines up to Canadian Government Railways Branch lines standard, $200,000.

Mr. MURPHY: I desire to ask my hon. friend if this amount is to be expended on the branch lines which were set out in the previous item.

Mr. J. D. REID: Exactly, if we get them all. But if we do not get the Caraquet and Gulf Shore or the Kent Northern, we will only need probably a third of the amount.

Railways generally—Contribution towards cost of construction of a railway bridge on the Canada Central Railway, over the Peace River, at or near Peace River Crossing, Alberta, $175,000.

Mr. MURPHY: Who is bearing the rest of that cost?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Alberta Government.

To acquire free and clear of all charges, encumbrances or claims, at any public sale, the Quebec and Saguenay railway, extending from its junction with the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix railway to Nairn Falls, Que., about 62.3 miles, at a price not exceeding $3,489,313.53, $3,489,313.53.

Mr. J. D. REID: I desire to add to the end of this item the words "exclusive of any sums paid out of amounts voted by Parliament in 1916 and 1917." That is so that there may be no misunderstanding.

Mr. TURRIFF: What is the total amount that has been paid out?

Mr. J. D. REID: About $1,500,000, in addition to this.

Mr. CAHILL: Will the minister explain this item a little more fully?

Mr. J. D. REID: Two years ago an Act was passed authorizing the purchase of this railway, with two others, the Quebec and Saguenay, and the Lotbiniere and Megantic. We are now taking only the Quebec and Saguenay. I have before me the judgment of Judge Cassels, in which the amount of the award is stated as $2,892,249.87. Then there are two years' payments during construction on monthly balances, $228,519.63, and interest from July 1, 1916, up to the present time, $373,854.84.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The minister is not increasinig the judgment of the Exchequer Court?

Mr. J. D. REID: No.

Mr. CAHILL: Is this to be a final payment? Shall we have title to the property when this payment is made?

Mr. J. D. REID: We cannot pay one dollar of this until they hand us the deeds and the title, free from all encumbrances.

Harbours and rivers—Quebec harbour—river St. Charles—improvements to navigation—further amount required—revote, $386,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understood that the works on the river St. Charles had been dropped.

Mr. CARVELL: This is not for the continuation of that work. The work was stopped nearly a year and and the contractors are contending that because of the closing down of their works, a portion of their plant should be taken over and certain amounts paid them by way of damages. I do not admit for a moment that we are liable for those claims, but an adjustment is to take place. There is also the question of the amount that we thought might possibly be required in the adjustment of the case referred to by my hon. friend this afternoon.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is provision for that adjustment, then?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes. This amount is to take care of every possible contingency. No work will go on at the river St. Charles until the financial condition of the country is different, and no money will be paid out of this vote until the matter is thoroughly investigated.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I see that there is an item here for St. John harbour. I saw a report in the press the other day that a contract in this connection had been let for $7,000,000.

Mr. CARVELL: That is not true.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What is this expenditure in St. John harbour?

Mr. CARVELL: It is to carry on a contract that has been running for some years —the Norton, Griffiths contract.

Mr. MURPHY: Has it not expired?

Mr. CARVELL: No, the contract has been assigned to the St. John Dry Dock and Shipbuilding Company, a new company, which took over all the rights and works of the old contractors. They have filed their specifications for a dry dock of the first class, similar to the new dry dock at Lauzanne. They hope to be able to make arrangements to commence operations soon, and this is to carry out some necessary harbour works without which the dry dock could not be operated.

[Mr. Cahill.]

Mr. MURPHY: Who are the gentlemen connected with the new company?

Mr. CARVELL: I can only say this: it is really the Canadian Dredging Company of Collingwood, of which Mr. Playfair is president.

Mr. FIELDING: This dry dock comes under the Dry Dock Subsidies Act?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: And is not included in this vote?

Mr. CARVELL: No. They have made application for a subsidy under the Dry Dock Subsidies Act.

Mr. MURPHY: How does this next item, Toronto harbour improvements, find its way into the Estimates?

Mr. CARVELL: This amount is necessary to finish up work that is now partly constructed. So far as we can see, this is the total amount that will be necessary until new financial arrangements are made.

Mr. MURPHY: The vote does not relate to new work?

Mr. CARVELL: No. Crib work has been built up to within two or three feet of the top of the water, and this is to put the top on the crib work and keep it from being lost. About $200,000 is invested in the cribs, and the engineers report that unless something is done it will all be lost.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the public utility of this work when it is finished?

Mr. CARVELL: Very little, in my judgment.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The minister is very frank.

Harbours and rivers—Nova Scotia—generally —construction and repairs, $55,000.

Mr. J. C. DOUGLAS: Has provision been made for repairs to Glace Bay harbour? Has the minister decided upon the policy of taking over that harbour and making it a public harbour? At present this harbour is owned by the Dominion Coal company and representations have been made that it should be taken over by the Government. I understand the minister has had the matter up. Has he come to any decision?

Mr. CARVELL: This amount of $55,000 has been asked for the carrying out of repairs generally in the province of Nova Scotia. I have received an enormous number of applications from the different engineers stating that wharves and breakwaters have been injured by ice and severe storms. In fact, the reports were so much alike in each case that I thought it was best to have a general appropriation and to make an investigation, and I propose to have a pretty thorough investigation before the money is expended. I never knew until a few days ago that the harbour of Glace Bay was not owned by the public. I understand it is, and has been for some years, owned by the Nova Scotia Steel Company. There have been some negotiations towards handing it over to the department. I am not in a position to say what the result will be, but I can only state that, in my judgment, the harbour of as important a town or city as Glace Bay should be public property, and, therefore, if proper arrangements can be made, it would not only be proper, but in the public interest of the commercial life of that district, that it should be made a public harbour. I cannot say that any amount of this $55,000 is intended for that purpose. The $55,000 is left in a general way, and will be used as we think best for the repairing of wharves and breakwaters in Nova Scotia.

Mr. MURPHY: After investigation?

Mr. CARVELL: After investigation.

Mr. FIELDING: The appropriation being a general one, we are disposed to ask what is contemplated by it. I accept, however, the assurance of the minister that he is going to make an investigation. That is satisfactory. I had occasion to bring to the notice of the minister some urgent matters of repair in my constituency, and if he will investigate them with the help of his engineers, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. McKENZIE: Hon. members from Nova Scotia who are supporting the Government are making a very poor job. New Brunswick is getting $678,000, and the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) an able representative—

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Nova Scotia got the large plate mill.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is such a thing as I have read in the scriptures: "You must needs go through Samaria."

Mr. CARVELL: Twenty-five or thirty million dollars of public moneys are being spent in the province of Nova Scotia this year.

Mr. McKENZIE: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. McKENZIE: You are up against the wrong chicken if you think you are going to make me sit down. I shall be very brief if you will let me alone; if you are not, it will be daylight. I simply want to tell my hon. friends from Nova Scotia supporting the Government that they made a very poor job of this. They get a miserabe $55,000, and they are not going to get it in a particular place; it is put between Heaven and earth where it will not help anybody. The good little province of New Brunswick, however, with an active solid minister, gets $667,000. That is what I remind the supporters of the Government of, and I want to tell the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, if he is throwing the plate mill up to us, he had to go where the substance of the matter was and get it there.

Mr. BUTTS: Is it not true that this harbour of which the minister has spoken was given away from this country to the Dominion Coal Company without a cent of consideration?

Mr. BUREAU: By whom?

Mr. BUTTS: By the former Liberal Government.

Mr. McKENZIE: Glace Bay river was a small brook, and the late Hon. David MacKeen, who at one time had a seat in this House, owned the old Caledonia mines. That enterprising gentleman and his company dug out that little river and made a little bit of a harbour for themselves in connection with the mines. They claimed it was their own because they opened the mouth of the river. About twelve years ago an arrangement was made with this Government.

Mr. BUTTS: Not with this Government.

Mr. McKENZIE: With the Government at Ottawa. I was in the House at the time. I should have known that this Government would make no arrangement of any kind. There was made with the Government of the Dominion of Canada an arrangement by which some moneys were expended in the harbour of Glace Bay. The Minister of Public Works will find that contract in his office. The company gave away certain rights to the public for the consideration of some public moneys being spent there, and there is an agreement of that kind. We never owned that harbour; it is merely a little river which is opened up for the purpose of the mines. We know all about it down home. If my hon. friend (Mr. Butts) does not know about it, he is the only man in that part of the world who does not.

Harbours and rivers—Prince Edward Island—Mink river, repairs to wharf, $1,500.

Mr. McISAAC: I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works concerning two matters. One is the boat harbour at North Lake and the other the dredging of the boat harbour at Newfrage. As the minister understands, there is now at North Lake a boat harbour where the boats can come in and out at high water; but in consequence of the shifting of the sand, it is likely to become shallower and fill up. Further than that, the provincial Government finds it necessary to build a bridge across there, and it would be out of reason for them to do so unless something was done by the Federal Government to make the harbour substantial. This is a matter of extreme importance to a very large number of fishermen.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend has brought this matter before me a number of times during the last three months. I have made inquiries, and I find a report from the engineer that it would require some $15,000 or $30,000 to do this work. I have information from a gentleman in whom I have the very greatest confidence that about $2,000 will do it. I am going to investigate the matter. There is a general vote for the Maritime Provinces, and if the work can be done for a reasonable sum of money, I may be able to arrange to do it out of the general fund. I shall, however, have the matter thoroughly investigated and do whatever is proper.

Dredging—Ontario and Quebec, further amount required, $70,000.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Has the Minister of Railways made arrangements to dredge the approaches to Cape Tormentine and Cape Traverse.

Mr. J. D. REID: The chief engineer is looking after the matter now. I expect to be down in that locality within the next few weeks and I shall take the matter up.

Mines and Geological Survey—For experimental work relating to briquetting of lignite coal, $200,000.

Grant for investigation of conditions affecting smelting of lead-zinc ores, $3,000—$203,000.

Mr. MURPHY: Who is to carry on this experimental work in connection with lignite?

Mr. BURRELL: It is to be carried on by an advisory board of three, appointed under an arrangement between this Government and the governments of Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is this one of the results of the investigations made by the Advisory Council of Industrial and Scientific Research?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes.

Labour—Administration Employment Offices, Co-ordination Act, $15,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: May I ask the Minister of Labour what are the latest developments in connection with the Winnipeg strike. I see that Premier Norris of Manitoba is in Ottawa to-day. Has he had an interview with the minister in reference to the strike?

Mr. CROTHERS: I have not seen the Prime Minister of Manitoba in connection with this matter.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He is here.

Mr. CROTHERS: Very well, but I have not seen him. I received two telegrams from Winnipeg this afternoon, the latter indicating that the whole thing will be adjusted inside of twenty-four hours.

Mr. KEEFER: Has the minister an officer in British Columbia who could investigate the question of wages paid to the fishermen to see whether they are reasonable? The situation is this. We are encouraging people to eat fish, and halibut come largely from the Pacific coast. In 1915 the men were all found in nets, food and everything else and the price was $1.25 per hundred pounds; in 1916 the price rose, in 1917 it rose to $2.12, and now it is $3. This cannot be due to the high cost of living or anything of that kind because the men, as I have said, are found in food and everything else. It is a matter that ought to be looked into because it affects the price of fish very much. I am told that a good many of these fishermen are of alien race and not in sympathy with the Food Administration and they are making things difficult in this way. I think it would be of great assistance if the minister would appoint an officer to look into this matter.

Mr. CROTHERS: If my hon. friend would send me a memo, setting forth the particulars of the complaint—

Mr. KEEFER: The complaint is that there has been an increase of 140 per cent in the price the men are getting for their fish.

Mr. CROTHERS: We all know that wages have been increasing in the last few years, as well as everything else. I am not prepared to state that wages have advanced as rapidly as some other things. However, if my hon. friend will send me a memo. I will have our agent on the Pacific coast look into the matter, but I do not expect to find that the fishermen are being paid too high wages.

Mr. HARRISON: Representations have been made by officials of the Trade Unions that a wrong impression has been created by the statement made by the hon. member for South Vancouver on April 22, to the effect that one-third of the membership of the unions are alien enemies or aliens of neutral countries. I have been informed on good authority that this is wrong, that not over ten per cent of the membership are alien enemies or aliens of neutral countries The unions pride themselves on their loyalty during this struggle, and resent the implication that any material fraction of membership could influence action inimical to the best interests of the Empire. They also claim that by reason of their association with aliens, enemy and otherwise, in the unions and at work, they are in a peculiarly fortunate position to detect any unfriendly disposition on the part of any of said aliens and to take such action in consequence as will ensure the greatest measure of safety to the Empire. The unions are anxious that nothing should be said that would lead to misunderstanding and consequent friction, and express the hope that the hon. member from South Vancouver had only the best interest of all concerned in mind when he made the statement, and was in not particular antagonistic to the unions which have aided so materially in the present crisis. With regard to the present difficulties at Winnipeg I must say it is deplorable that conditions of this kind should arise at the present time. I do not know whether every possible means have been tried by the men to effect a settlement, but if not I can assure the House that they are not working in accord with the principles of organized labour as I know it.

Miscellaneous — Provisional allowance (except in the case of light-house keepers') for married men and for widowers and widows, with children, in the Outside Service, who are employed permanently and are giving their entire time to the public service, such allowance to be made on the following basis:

(a) To each such person in receipt of a salary at the rate of $1,200 per annum or less, an allowance of $150 less any permanent increase in salary given to such person since January 1st, 1917, provided however the total salary and allowance shall not in any case exceed $1,300;

(b) To each such person in receipt of a salary at the rate of more than $1,200 but not more than $1,550 per annum, an allowance of $100, less any permanent increase in salary given to such person since January 1st, 1917, provided, however, the total salary and allowance shall not in any case exceed $1,600, $3,000,000.00.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I should like to know whether this expenditure is going to end here. This increase of $3,000,000, which I presume is one of the first results of the new Civil Service Act, is a considerable item to pass without discussion, representing an increase unparalleled in this House. We were discussing a little while ago the question of providing an increase for postmasters and rural mail carriers, who, if the comparison is permissible, are giving their time for one-half the amount these civil servants receive. I want to point out that this is one of the effects, during war time too, of the Bill that was passed at this session of the House, and without any very great demand, I consider, from the people of Ontario, at all events.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My hon. friend is certainly mistaken in attributing this vote to the passing of the Civil Service Act, as there is no connection between the two. Very many representations have been made to the Government for a war bonus to the Outside Service, limited to those who were devoting their whole time to the public service and were in receipt of smaller salaries. I desire to amend the phraseology of the vote by inserting the following words in the first paragraph, after the word "Service," in the third line:

And also when deemed advisable by the Governor in Council for unmarried persons in the outside service with dependents and for married persons and unmarried persons with dependents of the inside service of the rank of messengers, packers and sorters, and also to strike out the words "January 1, 1917" and substitute the words "April 1, 1918" in sub clauses A and B.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. KEEFER: Are the Dominion police included in this item?

Mr. DOHERTY: No.

Mr. KEEFER: Should they not be taken into consideration?

Mr. DOHERTY: As I explained in answer to a question when the Dominion Police Estimates were up, we are proposing to give the Dominion police an increase in their pay.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Why are lighthouse keepers not included?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: An increase was provided for them under item 409 of the Estimates we are now considering.

Amount to pay claims for clothing and articles lost in destruction by fire in the Parliament Buildings, $3,500.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would the Government give the details of this item? I understand that last year we had a return tabled showing the extravagant claims made by some people. I would like to have full information from the Government on this subject.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This is merely a vote to cover what we anticipate we will have to pay.

Mr. LEMIEUX: We want the details showing what you are going to do, because there were fictitious claims filed last year. The Government has refused for two years, through the Auditor General first and then through, I am glad to say, the very able and faithful official who preceded the present Serjeant-at-Arms, the late Lieut.-Col. Smith, who put his veto on these claims, to accede to the demands which were made and which were nothing less than scandalous. I would like to have all the details about this expenditure.

Mr. BUREAU: Does this item include any articles except those which were lost by employees at the time of the fire?

Mr. DOHERTY: Generally speaking, although I cannot say absolutely that no person who was not an employee may not possibly receive something. We received a large number of claims which my hon. friend properly enough has described as extravagant. I do not know that it was necessary to have the intervention of any officials of the Government to prevent their being paid. The matter has been looked into by a committee which was appointed for that purpose, and having arrived at the specified amount which people ought to receive, we determined to ask for this vote which, upon its face, is not extravagant, to meet a number of small claims. The great bulk of them were from employees in and around the buildings, people who could ill afford to suffer the loss that was serious, though the amounts in each case are not large. I do not recall at the moment any considerable sum that would be paid to any individual.

Resolution agreed to on division.

[Mr. Doherty.]

Railways and canals—chargeable to collection of revenue—Canadian Government Railways—working expenses, $37,000,000.

Mr. MURPHY: What is that item for?

Mr. J. D. REID: That is for the operation of the Government railways. Last year we had an item of $25,000,000. We have just passed an item of $8,500,000 in the Supplementary Estimates, making between $33,000,000 and $34,000,000 that it cost last year to operate the Government railways. This year we estimate it will take about $37,000,000, but, of course, the earnings are deposited to the credit of the Receiver General and will offset that amount. This is merely a bookkeeping entry. Earlier in the session I introduced a Bill to take the place of this item, but I dropped the Bill later on.

Mr. MURPHY: Does this cover any actual or estimated loss on operation?

Mr. J. D. REID: I estimate there will probably be a loss of $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 next year and that is included.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: We have already voted $8,500,000 for this purpose.

Mr. J. D. REID: That was for last year.

POST OFFICE—OUTSIDE SERVICE.

To provide for the salaries of the Postmaster and staff of the following Post Offices, the salaries may be readjusted and appointments made notwithstanding anything in that portion of the Civil Service Act affecting the Outside Postal Service, or the Post Office Act—Sydney, Truro, Amherst, Moncton, St. Hyacinthe, Three Rivers, Cornwall, Brockville, Smith's Falls, Belleville, Lindsay, Niagara Falls, St. Catharines, Woodstock, St. Thomas, Chatham, Sarnia, Collingwood, Owen Sound, North Bay, Sault Ste. Marie, Port Arthur, Fort William, Portage la Prairie, Prince Albert, Strathcona, Lethbridge, Medicine Hat, Nanaimo and Prince Rupert, $310,000.00.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Will the minister explain on what principle these selections were made?

Mr. DOHERTY: This item, while it figures here, does not imply our obtaining any additional money. It is inserted to effect the abolition of what were called semi-staff offices and to place them on a parity with the offices where we directly pay the salaries. Though in the semi-staff offices fixed salaries were paid, those salaries were paid out of the revenue of the post office. The object of this is that while we take a vote for $310,000, the entire revenue of these post offices will now come into the general office. This is really not adding a cent to the expenditure of the Post Office Department, but it is abolishing a system which has given rise to a good deal of complaint and recrimination and has not proved of material advantage.

Mr. CARVELL: Is that Woodstock, Ont., or Woodstock, N.B.?

Mr. DOHERTY: It just depends on which one of them is a semi-staff office.

Hr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The officials in some towns are receiving an 11 p.m. increase and the officials in other towns are not receiving any. How did the minister select the towns mentioned in this list and leave out other towns?

Mr. DOHERTY: Nobody is being given an increase. But all these towns have semi-staff offices, that is to say, offices where the revenue of the office is taken and the salaries paid out of it.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: All the towns that have semi-staff offices are included in this list?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, it is to get rid of the distinction between the regular offices and what are called the semi-staff offices.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has my hon. friend calculated whether the revenue of these semi-staff offices will make up for the amount voted?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am assured that they do. They necessarily must because the salaries paid in the past are not being increased, and those salaries were paid out of the revenue.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

The House proceeded to consider resolutions reported from Committee of Supply.

Resolution concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE SUPPLY BILL.

On motion of Mr. A. K. Maclean, the House went into Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN moved:

1. Resolved,—That towards making good the Supply granted to His Majesty, on account of certain expenses of the Public Service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1919, the sum of $131,342,638.20 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

2. Resolved,—That towards making good the Supply granted to His Majesty, on account of certain expenses of the Public Service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1919, the sum of $46,957,312.68 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

3. Resolved,—That towards making good the Supply granted to His Majesty, on account of certain expenses of the Public Service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1918, the sum of $14,034,274.33 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions reported and concurred in.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 111, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial years ending respectively the 31st March, 1918, and the 31st March, 1919.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first and second time, considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time and passed.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the Governor General's secretary, announcing that His Excellency would proceed to the Senate Chamber this evening at half past eleven o'clock for the purpose of proroguing the present session of Parliament.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Mr. HUGH CLARK (Bruce North): moved:

That the recommendations contained in the third report of the Joint Committee on Printing, presented to the House this day, be concurred in.

He said: The House is asked to concur in two recommendations made by the committee. One is for the discontinuance of the monthly statement of Canadian exports and imports which have been published, I believe, for the last eighteen years. At this session we passed an Act to establish a bureau of statistics which will compile and publish the statement referred to, and we are endeavouring to avoid duplication and overlapping. The other recommendation is that the report of the editorial committee concerning a reduction in the grade and weight of paper used in Government publications be adopted. I may add that the editorial committee, of which Mr. Fred Cook is chairman, has done very valuable work and has saved the country thousands of dollars in the last year.

Motion agreed to.

PENSIONS.

MOTION THAT THE REPORT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS BE COMMENDED TO THE CONSIDERATION OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Rt. Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved:

That the recommendations contained in the third report of the Special Committee appointed on the 10th day of April, 1918 to consider and report upon the Pension Board, the pension regulations and the sufficiency or otherwise of the relief afforded thereunder, the pension lists in force in Canada for disabled and other soldiers and the dependents of those killed while on active service, and any other matters relating thereto or connected therewith, be commended to the consideration of the Government.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION.

Mr. R. C. HENDERS (Macdonald) moved:

That 500 copies in English, and 250 copies in French, of the first and second reports of the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization be printed in pamphlet form forwith, and that rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

THE FARMERS' DELEGATION.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH THE GOVERNOR GENERAL, THE HOUSE OF COMMONS AND THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have an understanding with the right hon. leader of the Government that I shall be given opportunity to direct the attention of the House for a few moments to a matter which I deem to be of considerable importance. I shall not take up much of the time of the House; I have not much time to take up, anyway. If an agreement had not been made for prorogation this evening, a much longer debate would have taken place on this matter. However, I do not wish to delay the business of the House, as our friends on this side do not desire to delay prorogation unduly beyond the time agreed upon.

On 14th May a delegation of farmers some 4,000 strong, came to Ottawa from all parts of Canada, representing, I might say, not only the districts from which they came, but the whole rural population of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. VIEN: At least, large sections of the rural population of Canada. Hon. gentlemen who say "No" may find that the population represented by these delegates is a larger one than they imagine. These delegates embodied in a report the conclusions of their deliberations, a copy of which they sent to the Prime Minister. They also addressed to you, Mr. Speaker, a communication which passed almost unnoticed. Subsequently a further communication was addressed to His Excellency the Governor General. I ask the leave of the House to lay this correspondence on the Table and to have it embodied in Hansard without my reading it.

Mr. SPEAKER: A great deal of this correspondence came to my hand. It attempts to put in the form of a letter what is, in effect, a petition which, in that form, would be precluded from presentation to the House.

Mr. VIEN: Then I shall read the documents. The following is the communication to the Governor General:

His Excellency,
The Duke of Devonshire,
Governor General of Canada,
Ottawa, Can.

Your Excellency:—

The undersigned, in exercising the immemorial privilege of British subjects, are confident that Your Excellency will honour the ancient practice of the highest authority in the realm of hearing sympathetically the representations of the citizens upon matters affecting the good government of Canada.

We are encouraged to transmit to you certain information by the knowledge that those who have preceded you as a representative of the Crown in the working of responsible Government in Canada, have been swift to regard any endeavours of departure from the constitutional usages by which the freedom of Parliament and of the individual citizen has been established.

Since Your Excellency's arrival among us, we have had every reason to be assured that Your Excellency is imbued with the conciliatory far-seeing and statesmanlike spirit which animated Lord Elgin, to whom Canada and the Empire will ever be indebted for a wise and courageous guidance within the powers confided to him.

We believe, therefore, that you will welcome this expression of our trust during the period of unprecedented difficulty through which the Dominion of Canada is passing.

It is in harmony with Lord Elgin's reply to an address from the County of Glengarry, dealing with the unrest at that time, regarding the administration of public affairs, that we submit for Your Excellency's consideration the attached correspondence with the Speaker of the House of Commons. Perhaps Your Excellency will allow us to repeat what Lord Elgin said to the men of Glengarry, in reply to their address; "I recognize in it evidence of that vigorous understanding which enables men of the stock to which you belong, to prize, as they ought to be prized, the blessings of well-ordered freedom, and of that keen sense of principle which prompts them to recoil from no sacrifice which duty enjoins."

The letter goes on to make further representations to His Excellency, and attached to it is the correspondence which was subsequently transferred by His Excellency to the Prime Minister. I put a question to the Prime Minister with regard to this matter and was informed by him that he would later make a declaration to the House on the subject.

This announcement by the Prime Minister has not come as yet. I might now read the correspondence which was attached to this letter sent to His Excellency the Governor General:

Windsor Hotel, Ottawa,
May 15th, 1918.

Hon. E. N. Rhodes,
Speaker of the House of Commons.

Sir,—

The delegation of farmers from Ontario, Quebec and other provinces which held several conferences here yesterday charged us to transmit certain information to you with the respectful request that you will convey it to the House of Commons.

The conference yesterday afternoon composed of several thousand farmers decided unanimously to present itself at the House in the evening, with the request that two of its members be heard at the bar, in pursuance of the resolution duly adopted in the morning and forwarded to you. The Prime Minister, who was informed of this intention, referred us to the acting leader of the House, the Hon. Mr. Sifton. The request proffered while the delegation was in and about the precincts of Parliament was refused by the Hon. Mr. Sifton on behalf of the Government. The delegation therefore, in a most orderly manner, returned to its meeting place, where it unanimously endorsed the address which its representatives hal intended reading to the House, and directed us to forward it to you.

It is as follows:—

To the Honourable the Speaker, and Members of the House of Commons, of Canada, in Parliament assembled.

Mr. Speaker and Gentlemen of the House of Commons:—

On behalf of thousands of Ontario farmers assembled in this city to-day, we warmly thank the House for the proof it has given that it desires to keep in sympathetic touch with the citizens from whom it derives its dignity and authority. We believe we express the sentiments of all thoughtful citizens when we say that this departure in Canadian Parliamentary practice, following so closely upon the speech to this House and the Senate, of the President of the American Federation of Labour, is an agreeable recognition of the new relationships which the war is producing, as between those who govern and those who are governed by consent.

That portion of Canadian labour which is so vital to the prosecution of the war, and which we represent, appreciates to the full the evidence of loyalty which the House of Commons gave in August, 1914, to the democracies of the Western Hemisphere in its instant support of the motherland in her hour of need. We trust that the spontaneous action then taken will be justified by a continuation of those habits of freedom which it has long been the peculiar privilege of Canadians to maintain. These privileges are all the more appreciated in view of the long struggle for responsible government which was undertaken against the opposition of those who exercised arbitrary authority, and who feared the free expression of opinion, in the press and by the spoken word.

We are sure the House will permit us to say also, that the citizens generally have observed with gratitude that the House has shown a larger independence of thought and speech than has been customary under the system of partisan Government. We should fail in the duty of being candid which is cast upon us by the readiness of the House to hear us, if we did not express our concern regarding another tendency that has been observed in the House where the public will is believed to be supreme.

The increasing frankness of discussion so noticeable here, has been accompanied by a tendency to silence on the part of members of the Cabinet, who in reality, are, as one of four distinguished members has said "only a committee of this House."

The unrest in the country which has brought about the unexampled spectacle of thousands of farmers leaving the important work of planting their crops, to come to the capital to remonstrate with the Government, is known to every member of the House of Commons. We beg leave to intimate that this unrest is not related merely to the special matter which was discussed with the Premier and members of his cabinet to-day. We cannot disguise from the House an apprehension that the liberties, of which the popularly elected branch of the Legislature is the bulwark, may be dangerously curtailed during the period that the House is not sitting. In proof that this dread is not illusory, we would venture to inform the House that, in common with our fellow citizens, here and throughout the country, we have observed certain innovations, the continuation of which we believe would be fraught with serious results to the confidence which the subjects of His Majesty have hitherto reposed in the working of that responsible government for whose unimpaired preservation forty thousand Canadian soldiers have laid down their lives.

Will the House permit us to speak more plainly what is in our minds? We have never believed that the conditions produced by the war demanded flagrant departures from the honoured processes of law enjoined by the constitution while Parliament is in session or is near assembling. We believe that reliance upon Parliament, instead of upon arbitrary authority, most effectively honours the guarantees of freedom which are embedded in the constitution. One considerable departure from sound practice may be accepted, but repetitions of it may be exceedingly dangerous, especially under such circumstances as now beset the State.

We, therefore, beg leave to remind the House of several instances in which, it seems to us, the liberties of the people and of their representatives have not been given sufficient consideration.

Twelve days before the meeting of Parliament in January, 1916, the authorized Canadian Army was doubled from 250,000 to 500,000 men. No British Army had ever been doubled without recourse to Parliament. That it was done in Canada caused students of British history to enquire whether anything had occured to warrant such a disregard of Parliament. Though this House of Commons has inherited some of the consequences of such an innovation, we desire to confine our respectful remonstrances to more recent events.

During the session there were riots in the city of Quebec. The House desired to discuss the serious situation thus created, and was entitled to declare what measures might be taken to prevent a renewal of such unhappy occurrences. It did not escape the notice of the country that immediately before the House proceeded to discharge its duty, there was put upon the table a completed law, in the form of an Order in Council, which arbitrarily took out of its control the very question which the House of Commons was about to discuss.

Later there were other departures from the traditional practice of British law by equally astonishing proceedings. An Order in Council was given to the House as a matter of information providing for the registration of the human power of the country, and setting up an entirely new criminal code in connection therewith, by creating several methods of punishment hitherto unknown to Canadian civilization. Surely such departure should not have been attempted in such a manner. Punishments created without the assent of Parliament naturally tend to provoke hostility. We feel we are performing a national duty in respectfully calling attention to such conditions.

The Order in council endorsed by Both Houses on April 18th virtually sweeps away the Military Service Act. The resentment it has created is known to this House, members of which are known to regret that the elements of the constitution were ignored in this proceeding; and that the method of presenting a practically executed decree, while withholding disclosure of the facts on which it may be based, cannot easily be justified to the constituents of a newly elected Parliament.

The curtailment of the liberty of written and spoken speech contained in the Order in Council given to the public on April 16 has especial concern to all who are aware of the history of free discussion in Canada and other parts of the British Empire. We are sure we need not beg the House to examine its provisions in order to appreciate how a doctrine of the essential infallibility of the Government may be forced upon a free people on pain of a fine of five thousand dollars and five years' imprisonment. The House, to our extreme regret, has been faced with a notification of the intended curtailment of the privilege of a member of Parliament to declare his mind, and the right of his constituents to know what he has uttered. That this unique warning to a freely elected British assembly was halted for several weeks on the Order Paper, we venture respectfully to attribute to you, Mr. Speaker, as the appointed guardian of the liberties of the House and also of the people. It has been noted that the Prime Minister, in withdrawing the measure, viewed with so much apprehension from outside the House, announced that it is likely to be reintroduced next session.

Perhaps the House may not be offended to learn that cognizance has also been taken of a notice issued to it within the last week to the effect that it must curtail its discussion of vital national affairs, and withdraw from its precincts within a few days, or be summoned hither during the hottest and most inconvenient month of the year. That such a direction should be issued without apparent recourse to the judgment of the House causes reflective citizens to wonder what has happened to the freedom Canadian institutions have hitherto enjoyed.

Mr Speaker, and gentlemen of the House of Commons, the disquiet of the country of which we are the humble and inadequate exponents and which demonstrates sadly the increasing dangers to our national unity, which, if we lose it, we shall have lost all indeed, cannot be allayed by a persistence in the courses we have so imperfectly sketched.

Will the House permit us, with much deference, but much earnestness to repeat the reminder of one of its members that the Government is a Committe of this House vested with the executive powers of Parliament. The responsibility of government, therefore, is ultimately upon this House. Nothing appears to have been done to make the position of members of Parliament, with regard to the carrying out of the war policy, correspond to the status which they enjoyed before the practice crept in of making them subservient to those whom they created and whom they might destroy.

In this prolonged crisis of the national fate the hour has arrived to re-establish the inherent freedom of the House of Commons. We are certain that in that restoration the people of Canada will sustain you, and that the sacrifices of war will ultimately be justified and honoured in the blessings and progress of peace.

May we inform you that we remain at the Windsor Hotel, where we shall be happy to receive whatever answer the House may return to this address.

We are, Mr. Speaker,

Yours very sincerely,

I beg to remind the Government, also, of the conclusions of the first report of the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture, which has just been adopted by the House. For three weeks the report of the committee lay on the table and no motion was made to have it concurred in by the House. The conclusions of that report are most important and read:

(a) That actual farmers who have been called up shall be given leave of absence and

(b) That no actual farmers be required to report until all others in the class affected by the Order in Council of 20th April, 1918 have been put in service; such leave of absence and delay in reporting to be conditional upon their actual employment in farming.

The other day, when the estimates of the Department of Agriculture were being discussed in committee, I inquired from the Minister of Agriculture what was the policy of the Government with regard to the exemption of farmers. The minister replied that I surely could not expect him to make a declaration of policy, but should put my question to the leader of the Government. I inquired from the Prime Minister as to the change of policy, if any, that was contemplated, and drew his attention to the fact that though the Minister of Militia and Defence had told the House that the boys on the farm would not be called before the city boys and that instructions to that effect had been sent to the registrars for their guidance in sending out notices, those instructions were not being followed. The Prime Minister told me he would bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of Militia and Defence. The boys on the farms are being called up as a matter of fact. Some time ago the Deputy Minister of Agriculture wired to Mr. J. J. Morrison, Secretary-Treasurer of the United Farmers of Ontario, Toronto, as follows:

> Your wire 18th to Minister re leave of absence for farmers. Communicated with Mr. Stonehouse, Agricultural representative Toronto, who replies officer commanding district states no leave being refused to farmers. Please see Stonehouse and furnish him with any specific cases you have. After seeing him, if still reason for complaint, kindly communicate with me.
> Deputy Minister of Agriculture, Ottawa.

I wish to bring the attention of this House to one fact of which I am myself a witness. There is a conflict of authority between the representative of the Minister of Agriculture on the Leave of Absence Boards and the officers who compose these boards. The boards are composed of three or four officers who sit in a committee, and the representative of the Minister of Agriculture is there simply in an advisory capacity. I have seen cases in Quebec where I have myself acted as counsel for the farmers who were claiming exemption under the Leave of Absence regulation, and on three or four different occasions Hon. Mr. Garneau, the representative of the Minister of Agriculture on the Leave of Absence Board has recommended that leave of absence be granted, but leave was not granted. I am told by Mr. Morrison, the secretary of the United Farmers of Ontario, that yesterday Mr. Stonehouse, the representative of the Minister of Agriculture in Toronto, advised him that he was powerless to obtain leave of absence for the farmers who were claiming it before the Leave of Absence Board. There is therefore a conflict of authority. Surely if the Government are in earnest when they state to this House and the country that the boys on the farm will not be called up until after the city boys have been called, means can be found of sending sufficiently plain instructions to the registrars to that effect. I have talked this matter over with some of the officials of the Department of Militia and Defence, and they inform me that the whole thing is in the hands of the Minister of Justice, who has charge of the administration of the law. Surely there should be some understanding between the Minister of Militia and Defence, the Minister of Agriculture, and the Minister of Justice, as to the instructions that shall be sent to the registrars and the steps which shall be taken to see that such instructions are carried out.

I have been given leave by the right hon. leader of the Government to ask him a question, and this is the question I am going to put: Has the Government adopted any policy to provide for cases of extreme hardship and for cases in which production would surely be diminished? For instance, the case of the farmer's son who is the only one left to work the farm, or where the son is the sole support of incapacitated parents. I see by to-night's Star that an announcement on this question was supposed to be made to the House. I would ask the acting leader of the Government to make a plain statement on this matter, which is causing a great deal of unrest in the country.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Government has given and is still giving the most careful and earnest consideration possible to cases of extreme hardship that may occur in the working out of the Military Service Act and the Order in Council which has been passed more recently. These cases of hardship will be considered not only as they affect farmers but others as well. There will be no distinction made as to classes in which similar cases, or equal cases, of extreme hardship occur. In reference to those cases, an Order in Council has been considered and has been passed, and will be issued to the public, accompanied by regulations which are now receiving the consideration of the Government. These will be framed and published simultaneously with the gist or essence or full text of the Order in Council.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I cannot say to my hon. friend the exact time, but no delay will occur beyond what is absolutely necessary to come to considered conclusions as to the regulations which are to be made public. Publicity will be given just as soon as these regulations are complete. I should think that within twenty-four hours or thereabouts these will be completed and issued. I do not know that my statement could go beyond the words which I have just now addressed to the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will it affect only farmers?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have already said that cases of extreme hardship will not be restricted to any one class. Cases of extreme hardship will be considered, no matter under what class the person who claims, or suffers, the hardship may be included.

SECRET SESSION OF PARLIAMENT—ALLEGED DISCLOSURE OF PROCEEDINGS.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The very applause which has greeted the declaration of my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) must show him that the Government has taken the proper action in doing what it has just done. The more liberal the execution of this new order is the better it will be. In connection with this matter I want to call the attention of the House to a question which is one that affects its privileges. I am glad to see the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) in his seat. Respecting the very subject that has just been dealt with, I find that the Evening Journal says:

> Mr. J. E. Armstrong, member for East Lambton, who was asked to resign, has issued a vigorous reply to the petitioners.
> Mr. Armstrong throws some new light on the secret session of Parliament and states that Mr. Lloyd George in an appeal to Canada asked for more men even if production suffered.

If it be true that the hon. member for East Lambton has given out a statement of what took place in the secret session, it is a breach of the privilege of Parliament. He had no right to do so. Nobody will dispute that. It was well understood that it was a secret session, and so far nothing has been said with regard to it. But if it be true that the hon. member for East Lambton has said what is here alleged, I repeat, it would be a breach of privilege. The paper further says:

> Mr. Armstrong says in part:
> In the secret session of Parliament held before deciding on the setting aside of exemptions, word was received direct from Lloyd George to send men and more men, even if production did suffer. This is only one of many urgent appeals received from the Government.

I think every man who heard the words spoken by the Prime Minister on that occasion—and he is the only man who spoke,—will agree with me when I say that I am sure the hon. member for East Lambton did not understand, or represent, what was said by the Prime Minister if he understood him to attribute to Lloyd George the words: "Even if production did suffer." There was not a word of that kind said, and I call upon the Government to take such action as they think should be taken in regard to such a matter. I do not press for any answer to-day, but I must protest and nobody will contradict my word, when I say that the hon. member for East Lambton had no right to repeat what was said in this House at a secret session.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: The statement made in that letter in answer to the petition that was sent to me by my constituents, is a perfectly straight-forward and honest statement, and a statement that has been used freely throughout the country. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) knows that it has been used freely throughout the country.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is not the point.

Mr. MURPHY: It is evident that the secret session is going to be used in the same way as the soldiers—camouflage.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There is no excuse at all. However, I am not going to carry the matter further.

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I wish to call the attention of my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) to two other matters on which we should receive information. We were promised some days ago by the Prime Minister that we should be informed as to who the ministers were who were to accompany him to England and as to what was, in so far as it could be disclosed without infringing upon the secret correspondence, the object of the meeting.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I remember that, in answer to a question of my hon. friend the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) I promised to make a very short statement in reference to this matter. First, as to the object of the assembling of the war council and of the Imperial Council; my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and all the members of this House have, I have no doubt, taken cognizance of similar meetings which were held in pursuance of a similar call about a year ago or a little less. The purpose of these meetings was explained to the Parliament of that day and Parliament signified its agreement with the purpose for which those conferences were called. The propriety of having them attended by the representatives who are invited was also apparent. Since then, published reports have been made of what took place at those conferences. Whilst everything that took place has not been made public the larger portion of the resolutions and the discussions upon them, is now public property. The summons for the meeting of these conferences this year has been made for the same purpose as before and my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) has been summoned to attend these as have the Prime Ministers of other overseas dominions and also a representative of India. In pursuance of that summons, and for similar purposes as were held in view a year ago, the Prime Minister proposes to proceed to London. The Prime Ministers of the other dominions are also over there or on their way thither. The Prime Minister has selected to accompany him, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen), the Minister of Colonization and Immigration (Mr. Calder) and the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell).

Mr. BUREAU: Some choice!

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: These gentlemen will in due time proceed to London, and will carry out the objects for which the meetings have been summoned. It is not known how long the conferences will take, but every effort has been made to make them as short as possible. It is not supposed that the Prime Minister will be absent from Canada for a very long period, and it is quite probable that the three ministers whom I have named will be a still shorter time in Great Britain. It may be, if circumstances require it, that when they return the Minister of Naval Affairs and the Minister of Militia as well may go to London to take up matters in connection with their several departments. That gives a general idea both of the purposes of the call and of the gentlemen who are to participate in the conferences. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) knows that whilst the Prime Minister of each dominion may have such of his colleagues as he chooses, and as are felt necessary, to attend him, there is but one vote in these conferences and that is the vote that is given by the Prime Minister of each of the dominions. I do not know that there is necessity for any fuller statement on my part.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is quite sufficient. It is five minutes to twelve, and we are on the eve of being summoned to the other House; but perhaps we might use the time available before the summons reaches us to take up a matter to which I have already drawn the attention of my right hon. friend. Perhaps he will give us some information now as to the registration of man-power and woman-power which is to take place at an early date—that is to say, what is the object of such registration and if any policy has been decided upon by the Government in connection with it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It might, perhaps, meet the wishes of my right hon. friend and the House if I should lay on the table a memorandum which I have had prepared in order to answer the question which my right hon. friend intimated a few days ago he would put before the prorogation of Parliament. The memorandum is fairly full, and I may just simply add, in connection therewith, that the purpose, of course, is to register the man and woman power of this country within certain ages. The registration is to be carried out by a distribution of cards and the signature of the persons falling within those ages to those cards. A board, or commission, has been appointed, at the head of which is Senator Robertson, who have the arrangements in charge, and they are working in close conjunction with the Bureau of Statistics in my department in the collation and tabulation particularly of the information when it is gathered. It is not thought to be possible that that registration will take place before the middle of the month of June, or a little later. A great deal of the work—I might say the majority of it—is being undertaken by voluntary effort, and the response in all portions of the country to the call for voluntary effort has been very marked, and shows the sympathy and goodwill of the people in the purpose which is intended. At what time the tabulation can be finished we are not certain. Something will depend upon the day upon which registration takes place. After that, by a well co-ordinated system, the information will be sent as rapidly as possible to Ottawa, and there tabulated. Outside of that, it is meant that before the full results of the total registration are available, arrangements are being made by which the information as it comes in shall be made accessible as far as possible in order to get at sources of labour supply, with a view to using it for work during the coming season when agricultural labour will be very much required in our country. It is believed by the commission that it will be possible to reap very great benefit in that respect with regard to agricultural work in the autumn of this year from the information received through the registration. The memorandum is a pretty full one and will give the modus operandi as well as the objects of the registration.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Have the Government formulated any policy, and if so will the right hon. gentleman state what that policy is with regard to the use of the information thus collected?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Government has considered very carefully as to what measures can be taken to utilize to the very largest possible extent the information which will be available, and that is a matter for further consideration.

Mr. MURPHY: Did I understand my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) to say that the results of the registration will be used for agricultural or labour purposes, and not for military purposes?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I was speaking with reference to one of the uses which would be made of this information which is to be gathered, and that it was hoped to use a portion of that for agricultural purposes during the coming autumn.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Just one word about the Imperial Conference. I said earlier in the evening that the people of this country viewed with alarm the agitation which is going on on both sides of the Atlantic—the agitation carried on by the Round Table Club. For the information of the gentlemen who will represent Canada in England at the coming Imperial Conference, I wish to quote advice given by the late Sir John A. Macdonald on the question of Imperial Federation:

> We are told that we want imperial federation. I will not trouble you with a disquisition on that subject now, but I will tell you imperial federation is utterly impracticable. We would never agree to send a number of men over to England to sit in Parliament there and vote away our rights and principles. I am, so far as that question goes, up to the handle a home-ruler, We will govern our own country. We will put on the taxes ourselves. If we choose to misgovern ourselves we will do so, and we do not desire England, Ireland or Scotland to tell us we are fools. We will say: If we are fools we will keep our folly to ourselves; you will not be the worse for it and we will not be the worse for any folly of yours.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I may be allowed just one word in answer to my hon. friend's proffer of information. Whilst it is accepted gratefully, I hope my hon. friend will not consider that he is the only guardian of the rights, privileges and liberties of this country. I hope he will consider, and that, after considering, he will not be backward in expressing that the gentleman whom I have named and the party or the section that they represent, are not one whit less loyal to the interests of Canada than my hon. friend. I beg of him to disabuse himself of the idea that he is the only guardian of the rights and liberties of Canada, and I would ask him not to spoil his holidays by having any undue anxiety as to what may be done on the other side.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: You will allow us the privilege of believing that our trust in our missionaries is not unlimited.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: But it is always open for us to become more and more trustful.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is very slow to come.

Mr. BUREAU: In view of the discussion that took place this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member for Maisonneuve is doing right in giving warning to my hon. friend the leader of the House to-night. There may be a disposition to give away resources of this country, and if we are left without resources, I do not know what will become of us. Our trust may be diminishing after what has taken place in this House, after hearing the statements of the member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) and the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), yet in spite of these, when the challenge is made to a member of the Privy Council to make good unfounded charges, we see him sit quiet in his seat. So we have reason to be suspicious when we see him a member of the delegation.

Mr. CAHILL: Did I understand the leader of the Government to refer to gentlemen who were representing the party and representing a section of the country? They are not going to the Imperial Conference to represent a party, I hope.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Don't worry.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Everybody will remember that a very important question was discussed in this House a few days ago, the question of titles. The House, or a majority of the members of the House, reached a conclusion—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Surely my hon. friend is not going to broach an utterly new question.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I am going to ask the leader of the Government a question. The conclusion reached by the House, as everybody remembers, is that we would ask for the abolition of hereditary titles.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Is my hon. friend disappointed?

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: And we did not say what course we would take in regard to knighthoods. The Prime Minister informed us that this matter would be fully discussed at the Imperial Conference. It would be interesting if the leader of the House is in a position, or is free to tell us, what attitude the Government takes in regard to that matter, and whether they will hold to the resolution passed by the House, or whether they will go any further and ask for the whole matter to be considered at the Imperial Conference with a view to abolishing titles altogether.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The pleasures of anticipation are often very much greater than those of actual possession. I would not desire to spoil my hon. friend's pleasures of anticipation for the holiday season for the world.

Mr. BUREAU: We may anticipate anything.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I am not going to speak, Mr. Speaker, I just want to thank the hon. gentleman on the other side of the House for calling on me.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: And I want to say on behalf of myself—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: —and the party to which I belong that I hope the hon. gentlemen who are going to represent us in the United Kingdom will not give away any of our rights and will not do anything to prejudice the interest of Canada until they come before this House, and receive instructions.

Mr. BUREAU: Let them keep away from booze over there—preach prohibition.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: And practice it.

To these Bills the Royal Assent was pronounced by the clerk of the Senate in the following words:

In His Majesty's name, his Excellency the Governor General doth assent to these Bills.

Then the hon. the Speaker of the House of Commons addressed His Excellency, the Governor General, as follows:

May it please your Excellency:

The Commons of Canada have voted the supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the Public Service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Excellency the following Bill:

An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending respectively the 31st March, 1918 and the 31st March, 1919.

To which Bill I humbly request Your Excellency's assent.

To this Bill the clerk of the Senate, by command of His Excellency the Governor General, did thereupon say:

In His Majesty's name, His Excellency the Governor General thanks His Loyal Subjects, accepts their benevolence, and assents to this Bill.

After which His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to close the First Session of the Thirteenth Parliament of the Dominion with the following speech:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate,

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In releasing you from further attendance at the present session, I am mindful of the diligence with which you have discharged the important duties devolving upon you in these critical days.

A new campaign in the war having opened since you entered upon your labours, the enemy, now freed from threatened attack in the East, has struck with the force of vastly augmented numbers on the Western front for the primary purpose of destroying the British armies and with the ultimate object of gaining a decision before reinforcements can arrive. In the face of tremendous odds the soldiers of our Empire gallantly supported by our Allies, have withstood this assault with a courage and tenacity which command our admiration and gratitude. It is anticipated that the attack will be renewed in still greater force and intensity during the coming summer and autumn.

Portions of the Canadian forces, already engaged in meeting this attack, have rendered distinguished service.

The readjustments which you have authorized in the military service law will provide the reinforcements and reserves so urgently needed to support and maintain all arms of the service at full strength, without unduly interfering with the demands of essential production.

Meanwhile arrangements for a national registration are being advanced, in order that the human power of the Dominion, especially such as is ineligible for military service, may be more effectively organized to maintain the productive capacity of the country which is exceeded in importance only by our military needs. For the like purpose, action has been taken as a war measure to enjoin and enforce upon all persons the duty of active employment in useful work. The assistance you have rendered towards the encouragement and co-ordination of the Provincial Labour Bureaus will assist materially in solving the important problems of employment and distribution of labour.

Measures you have adopted for increasing the revenues by further and wider taxation will doubtless result in a more equitable distribution of financial burdens among the people.

You have given your assent to enactments respecting the Public Service which will unquestionably promote its efficiency both at the seat of government and throughout the Dominion.

In creating the Department of Immigration and Colonization and the Department of Soldiers Civil Re-establishment, you have provided the means for coping effectively with vital problems which will inevitably arise during and after demobilization.

The extension of the franchise to women will notably broaden the basis and strengthen the stability of government; and we may justly anticipate that it will exercise an important and wholesome influence upon many vital social problems confronting the nation.

The Daylight Saving Act has already justified the expectations you entertained of its attendant benefits.

The trade of the country has maintained its already remarkable development, and my advisers anticipate that necessary financial arrangements to facilitate the continued exportation of surplus products will be consummated at an early date.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I thank you in His Majesty's name for the liberal provision you have made for the needs of the Public Service and for the prosecution of the war.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The sinister purpose of the enemy has been still more clearly revealed by recent events and especially by the military domination which he has founded upon his success in the Eastern Theatre. The unmistakable menace to our national liberties and safety, thus disclosed and emphasized, cannot fail to strengthen the resolution of our people, who abide the issue with unshaken faith in their high cause consecrated by the sacrifice of those who have died that freedom, faith and justice may endure. I pray that their strength may be sustained by Almighty God.

The Speaker of the Senate then said

It is His Excellency the Governor General's will and pleasure that this Parliament be prorogued until Thursday, the 4th day of July next, to be here holden, and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued until Thursday the 4th day of July next.
