Allow me, first of all, Mr. Speaker, to protest most energetically against certain attacks, born of fanaticism and ignorance and launched by some hon. member on the other side, against the Opposition representatives from the province of Quebec. Time and again, we have been slandered; and our opponents have done all in their power to throw upon our province the suspicion of disloyalty. We were pictured as being against the soldiers who are dying for the defence of our freedom. Some of our accusers, with more of blindness and less of information, called us anti-British. One amongst them—I believe it was the hon. member for Comox Alberni (Mr. Clements)—showed how limited are his judgment and his knowledge of history by declaring that the French Canadians are strangers in this country. We know the remarkable reply that the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) made to this offensive language of the hon. member for Comox Alberni. It is certainly astounding that we should be called strangers here, we whom roots deeply imbedded in the traditions of centuries tie to this land which we so cherish and love.

Such insults as these are hurled in our faces, we are accused of disloyalty, because we differed, or differ still, with the opinions of a group of false patriots who—like the donkey burdened with relics, in the fable of La Fontaine—believe that all honour is due them because forsooth they style themselves the Saviours of the Empire.

Let there be no mistake about that. The attitude which we took at the last elections in favour off volunteer recruiting was a loyal and patriotic attitude, of which I was proud then and of which I am prouder still today, since recent happenings have proved us right. The recruits who have been flocking to the colours in Quebec these last few months show clearly enough which side had judged aright. If I am told that Quebec was slow I will reply that our showing in volunteers would have been much greater if one-half, if one-quarter the fabulous sums expended on conscription had been applied to promoting voluntary enlistment.

Indeed, if we consider that the machinery for putting concription into force has cost this country $1,803,581—or $45 for every soldier drafted—we cannot fail to acknowledge that the volunteer system would have given much better results if one-quarter of this sum had been put at the disposal of a patriotic campaign. Many moons ago, if the policy suggested on this side of the House had been followed, long ago, I say, we would have had at the front, fully complete, and without compulsion, the divisions promised the British General Staff by the leader of the present Government.

I repeat that I am proud of the attitude I took and I shout here to all who have ears to hear me—although it is unfortunate that all the members have not the advantage of knowing both tongues—that it is time to come to an understanding and to realize that, in order to be loyal and patriotic it is not necessary to hail from such and such a province, to sit on this or that side of the House, no to hurl impudent insults at a whole race.

What is that I say Mr. Speaker? Our common aim, the foremost wish of the members of this House, the foremost wish of the whole Dominion is the victory of the Allied armies. Who will dare to cast slurs upon us because, with the same end in view, we have counselled other means—means which appeared to us more in harmony with our ideals and with our innate respect for the great principles of the freedom which is the right of each and every one of us?

In my calling, Mr. Speaker, which I am alone in representing here, it has often happened me to lose myself in the vast expanses of territory which I was traversing with my companions. And when I established the direction of a meridian line, by the light of the polar star—whether I were in Alberta, in Saskatchewan or in the province of Quebec—I was always working towards the same goal. Mr. Speaker, the polar star which guides us French Canadian members is patriotism well-understood, patriotism without narrowness and without rancour, the patriotism of the noblest pages of our national history. And it is also on this good star of patriotism that is fixed the gaze of all those who lay claim to the great principles of Liberalism.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I fear that those who sit opposite us have taken the wrong road; that they are guided by a magnetic needle which has been unsettled by the constant attraction of power. However, let us hope that before long they will become better Magi, and will find once more the star of patriotism—leaving behind forever the dark clouds of fanaticism and prejudice.

In this way we shall have a united country, and we shall all contribute with our utmost energy, to the great cause which is ours in common, and to the immortal achievement of victory.

Mr. WILLIAM A. CLARKE (North Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I feel I should be remiss in my duty to the constituents I have the honour to represent if I did not make a few remarks in this very important debate. I do not rise to criticise any of the taxation proposals of the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) but rather to congratulate him and the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) on having carried this Dominion so successfully through the most trying period we have ever experienced in our history. I am placed in a somewhat peculiar position. Of course, as a representative of the people in this House, I am no more responsible for the actions of the Union Government than they are responsible for my actions. Ever since I entered the House of Commons I have been a humble follower of the present Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) both in this and the last Parliament. I consider him the greatest statesman in the Dominion, and I have been proud to vote for every measure he has introduced. We had a most trying time last session and many troublesome questions arose; in fact, I think it was the most strenuous session we have had since Confederation, and I think the Prime Minister is to be congratulated on the splendid way in which he carried us through. On many occasions he met with severe criticism, which I think was carried to greater lengths than one might have expected under the present war conditions.

We have heard a great many splendid speeches from both sides of the House in this debate, but with many of the speeches from the Opposition side of the House I do not agree. I feel it my duty to make a few suggestions, rather than criticisms, in connection with the views of my constituents at the present time. When I go home after supporting every measure that the Prime Minister has ever presented to Parliament—and it is my intention to support every measure he brings down in future, unless I change my mind or he acts in a very different way from what he has done in the past—I am confronted with the question, what is the Government doing to enforce the Military Service Act? Our county is practically denuded of all the young men who can go to the front. I have supported every measure for keeping up our reinforcements, and I have done it gladly, but yet when I go home my constituents want to know why the province of Quebec is not made to contribute men for the army in greater numbers. Every one who reads the newspapers knows that Quebec has not done her share. A few months ago it was stated that only seven thousand had been got from that province altogether. I do not know whether that statement is true or not, but it has been made on many occasions, and has never been contradicted, so I am inclined to believe it is true. When my constituents ask me why Quebec is not made to do its duty I have to give them some kind of an answer. I have to tell them that we have passed the Military Service Act. Then they want to know why it has not been put in operation, and that is the question I wish to put to hon. gentlemen sitting in the front benches of the Union Government tonight. The only suggestion I have heard is that the weak cog in the wheel in the operation of the Military Service Act is in the Department of Justice. Whether that be true or not I do not know, but I am not in a position to contradict it. If it be true I would suggest to the Prime Minister and the other members of the Cabinet that some rearrangement be made. I have every respect for the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), but if he is the barrier in putting the Military Service Act into operation some rearrangement certainly should be made. We all know he was tired after the recent campaign. He is getting to be an old gentleman, and he had to take a couple of months' rest to recuperate. I am glad he came back looking so well. But when he came back after a couple of months' rest, if the work was too much for him, or if he was incompetent to transact it in the way the people of this country wanted it to be transacted, he should have been given assistance. But instead of that being done, I understand he has had the additional burden placed on his shoulders of administering the Post Office Department. The people of this country are wondering why the Government do not take action in connection with the Military Service Act. It would be an easy matter to rearrange the Cabinet. There are lots of good men supporting the Government, all good, loyal and true citizens, who would make good heads of any department, and I think it is high time something was done to fill the offices with the best men available on this side of the House. I would not go to the other side of the House, because we cannot expect anything from those who have always been in opposition to the Military Service Act and to Canada's taking her proper share in this war. I am not alone in this experience I have with my constituents; I have spoken to other hon. members and the same question is asked in practically every constituency from Prince Edward Island clean through to British Columbia. The people want to know why there is such laxity in enforcing the Act in the province of Quebec. It is all right for hon. members to stand up in the House and say they are doing this and are going to do that, but it is no use training a horse for a race after the race has been run, and possibly lost. Our boys overseas are calling out for reinforcements. In almost every letter from the front we hear that cry for reinforcements, and reinforcements at once, and the people of the rest of this Dominion want the major part of those reinforcements to come from the province of Quebec, and I say they are justified in asking that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CLARKE: My hon. friends may laugh, but this is too serious a matter to laugh at. We do not blame you very much. You do not get any too much support from your leaders; you do not get any too much support from the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), who, this afternoon, took occasion to lecture the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken). You do not get any too much support from the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). His loyalty is somewhat questionable at times in the opinion of a great many people in Canada, although not by many in Quebec, because he always stands by them, and I give him credit for it. I must give him credit for an expression which he used in this House not long ago on the occasion of the visit of Mr. Balfour. He stated, and I was glad to hear him, that he was much more loyal to the British Empire now than he had been three years ago. We all heard him state that and I must congratulate him upon having made that statement. The question that this Government is confronted with was dealt with by the hon. member for Maisonneuve this afternoon. That hon. gentleman said that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) should go back and consult the farmers, and that the Prime Minister should do the same, and find out what their opinion is with regard to war service. I wish to express the hope, and I do it in the kindest possible way, honestly and conscientiously, that this Government will see fit to man every department with the strongest and best men they can glean from the ranks on this side of the House, because in this crisis in the war we feel that we cannot have too strong a Government. I am surprised that the Prime Minister is able to bear the burden that falls upon him and I realize that he will need all the assistance that this Dominion can provide for him.

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the Budget to-night, it is not my intention to join issue with certain hon. members on the opposite side of the House on the very burning question that occupied the attention of the country during the last election and which continues to occupy it at the present time. But, I cannot let the references of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Clarke) pass without making a protest against the words that he has just uttered with regard to the part that the province of Quebec has taken during the war. The hon. gentleman is mistaken when he says that the province of Quebec has not done its share and that the leaders of the party in Quebec have been misleading the people of that province. If the people of the other provinces would pay more frequent visits to the province of Quebec and come into contact with the people there they would find that we desire to be, and, as a matter of fact are, just as loyal to the British Crown and British institutions as are the people of any other province or as is any member of this House.

Mr. BUREAU: Our loyalty is not bought with dollars.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Certainly not. That is something that hon. members on the other side of the House cannot understand. The hon. member who has just taken his seat is the best living proof that the horse of the Orange Sentinel and the Orange Order, of which my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) spoke the other day, is not yet dead, but is still alive and kicking, and that we must be very careful if we do not want to be run down by that animal. We thought for a time that in view of the present situation these people would bury the hatchet and that we would all stand on common ground for the purpose of winning the war. But instead of encouraging us they pursue the opposite course. When we see men like the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, we must have a double measure of courage in order to enable us to continue to do our share as we have done it in the past.

If the people of Quebec have adopted an attitude that some hon. members of this House do not like, they have done it because they thought that according to the constitution and the laws of the country as they at present exist they were allowed to stand by the programme of their party and say that conscription at the present juncture was not the best means of providing reinforcements for our Allies at the front. I think that the future events will prove that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was not wrong when he took that position. The facts that transpired since this law was introduced and put into force have proven that it was wrong and inopportune. That is emphasized by the fact that at this present session an amendment had to be introduced in order to try and get the reinforcements that the law as originally enacted could not get. We thought we were right in taking the stand that we had taken on that issue, and the leaders of the party on this side of the House were sincere in their motive. I, and the other members who sit around me, were sincere in our motives, and I do not think that our integrity or loyalty should be called in question by those who choose to say that we are not loyal.

Now, I am coming to the question of the Budget, which is the issue before the House. It is not my intention to deal with the subject exhaustively because the ground has been very fully covered by my hon. friend from Brome, who has criticised the Budget on behalf of the Opposition. I only want to offer to the House a few observations by way of suggestion, and as a junior member I would ask that they be received with that reserve and consideration due to a member speaking for the first time on such an important subject. I must confess that I do not approve of the new tax imposed on tea and coffee. This Government in December last prohibited the use of liquors, beers and wines. The only beverages or stimulants left, which we all know are necessary not only to hard-working people, but also to people of mature age, as well as those belonging to the younger generation, and which are within the reach of all classes, especially the poor, are going to be taxed. If there are any commodities which should not have been made subject to tariff taxation they are tea and coffee. The people of this country have been induced to use them more and more since the use of liquors of all kinds has been prohibited by Order in Council. Canadian cigars, cigarettes and tobacco should not have been so heavily taxed. As regards imported cigars, cigarettes and tobacco, I would say that these should have been taxed to the limit.

I would go a little further. For a Government that is preaching so much economy and retrenchment, I would say that they should not themselves indulge in luxuries. Is there anything more painful, Mr. Speaker, than to see some of these ministers coming forward at the Chateau Laurier, after a good dinner, and enjoying those big long cigars, as long as themselves ?

As the Government has taxed tea, coffee, cigarettes, cigars and tobacco, why has it not proposed heavier taxes on expensive foreign furs from Russia, the sale of which we see advertised every year in the foreign markets of Europe, in Chicago and New York. Let those pay who want to buy and wear these expensive luxuries, but permit the Canadian to go free of taxation who is satisfied with Canadian beaver, bear or racoon fur.

Heavier taxes should also be imposed on diamonds, billiard tables, and accessories and necessities of sporting and social life; also on all kinds of ladies' wearing apparel such as expensive hats and toilettes which are being continually imported from New York and elsewhere. These, Mr. Speaker, are the kind of taxes which could better be imposed upon the people than some other taxes which more nearly touch the poor man.

While considering the subject of taxes that the Government could have imposed, there are a few to which I will allude that might be levied in the shape of war taxation. For instance, why not impose a tax of one per cent on all deposits in the banks? Those deposits, according to the last statement contained in the last issue of the Official Gazette of the 27th of April, totalled on the 30th of March, 1918, $1,482,123,039. A tax of one per cent would give about $14,000,000 revenue, without taking into account the deposits in the hands of trust companies, savings banks, private banks and loan companies, etc., which I would estimate at over $250,000,000, and which would yield another $2,500,000 of revenue. It could not be said that this tax would be unjust, as it is a well known fact that throughout the Dominion as the country grows old and larger, the banks are getting less in number, due to the fact that so many mergers have been permitted.

From something like thirty-three to thirty-five banks which were in existence years ago, this number is now down to twenty-one, and these banks have an understanding which is certainly an interference against the law of trade and commerce, an understanding of not paying more than three per cent on deposits, and this agreement has now been in force for a great number of years to the detriment of all savings depositors. While the Government is paying 6 per cent and more for loans and the banks are charging from 6 per cent to 10 per cent for discounts, the depositors are kept down to 3 per cent, while by taxing the banks 1 per cent on the deposits their money would only cost them 4 per cent, and surely in times like these, when everything has gone up (except interest on deposits) there could be no complaint. The understanding is there, and if a bank does pay more than 3 per cent it is fined by the Clearing House Association. Such understanding is not only detrimental to the depositors but also to the smaller banks, as rates being equal the depositor is always prone to go to the larger banks, and the smaller banks who are supposed to take care of the small industries are handicapped, and such small industries cannot compete with the larger ones who are the bosom friends and very often the partners of those who are at the head of the large banks. By taxing the deposits 1 per cent it might prevent these bankers, who are preaching economy to their clientele, but who are not practising it themselves, from becoming more and more autocratic, as you will notice if you look at the palaces they are erecting as bank buildings. Such things do not exist in Europe, or any other country. Some of these banks in the city of Montreal have so many of these palaces that the small traders feel like taking off their boots before going inside. One has only to look at the bank premises in this country, which represent about 50 per cent of the paid-up capital of the banks. In March, 1916, the paid-up capital was $111,727,692 and buildings $52,388,793, at not more than cost less amounts, if any, written off. Could not all this money which is not producing have been better employed in developing this country? These bank premises are simply erected to the glorification of luxury. On a draft of say $2 we have to pay 25 cents exchange to a bank, which represents a rate of 12½ per cent, and they are only paying 3 per cent on many deposits and probably on one-third of that they are not paying interest. They are preaching economy, but they do not set an example. A number of these banks even build mansions for their managers. I therefore do not see why such a tax should not be imposed. The Banking Association is the biggest monopoly that Canada has. Look at the boards of directors of our banks. Many of the directors are interested in large companies and the latter can get all the money they need, but the small trader or manufacturer is the loser as he can hardly get anything from the big banks.

I stated a moment ago, that the banks were growing too big, that there was danger of a monopoly being created, and this is a fact. Well, if the monopoly exists as it does at present, why not tax these banks in proportion to the benefits and the profit they derive? In the province of Quebec and the other provinces when a public utility wants to obtain a franchise, it has to pay for it and contribute to the treasury of the city, town or province, a certain amount of money. Why not have the same requirements in the case of the banks? If the banks want to enjoy all these benefits and privileges, let them pay for them and be taxed accordingly.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) is a director of the City and District Savings Bank, in which he takes a great deal of interest. I know that he is a great philanthropist. Perhaps he could tell me why, with all his philanthropy and good intentions, that bank has not seen fit up to the present to raise the rate of interest on deposits. I am sure that his answer will be the argument which I have just advanced, that the bank is prohibited from doing so by the Canadian Bankers Association. All the money deposited in such institutions as the City and District Savings Bank comes from the poor, the working woman as well as the working man, and it is not the small trader or the small manufacturer who benefits thereby, but the financiers, directors and managers, who are in the ring of big banks and corporations.

Now, about investments. I believe it is a fact that in England and France it has been forbidden to invest in outside securities, while here in Canada there are many people deriving hundreds of thousands of dollars as interest on stocks and bonds from corporations in the United States. If we refer to the lists of shareholders of different companies in the United States, we find that a large number of Canadians, probably patriotic Canadians, have invested huge amounts of money in that country. We know also that the large Canadian insurance companies own a great deal of securities, in some cases seventy-five or eighty per cent of the stock of certain railways in the United States. I am not far from the truth in asserting that at present nearly $250,000,000 is invested by individual Canadians, companies and trusts in United States securities. Would it not be better if a law were passed, or, as it is so easy under this Government, an Order in Council, prohibiting investments in any other but Canadian securities?

Another source from which the Government could obtain a large amount of revenue would be by taxing the foreign insurance companies, life, fire and accident, who are draining this country yearly of millions of dollars in premiums, which money is taken to the United States and invested in their own undertakings and for their own benefit. There is no reason why a tax should not be imposed on such premiums.

So far as the exchange rate on the Canadian dollar is concerned, it is not by getting a credit of about $40,000,000 in the United States, as our ministers obtained recently, which will make our credit better. That amount will be only a drop in the bucket after all, and our trade balance surely cannot be re-established with that small amount of money. It may improve the situation for a short period, for the spring or the summer, but if no further arrangements are made I predict, Mr. Speaker, that our dollar will be nearer the 90-cent mark than the dollar mark. We must not close our eyes also to the fact that the financiers in the United States are very well aware of our situation, and as some members in this House said recently, they know that we are only banking on paper, as the gold and the silver which we have to meet the Canadian notes which are being printed by the Dominion Government represent only 45 cents on the dollar, and if this policy keeps up a year longer our currency will be worth 75 cents on the dollar at the most. We are told by the Acting Minister of Finance that we should not worry, that business is splendid, that we are doing business with the Mother Country, and that we are even lending her money. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is that not misleading the public, as, after all, these loans are being repaid by contra account for the upkeep of our army overseas? I would ask the minister to tell us if it is not true that these loans made to England since the war began have been repaid by contra account? Probably there is not more than $25,000,000 to $40,000,000 outstanding at present, but when the war ends we will be in debt to England instead of England owing us; we will still have a huge bill to pay her.

The Acting Minister of Finance has told us that he needs at present about $280,000,000 for the purpose of carrying on the war. Why not, as has been done in England and other European countries, requisition or commandeer all foreign securities? There are millions of dollars' worth of these held by different people and institutions in this country. We know that holders of capital and the big trust companies and banks have a great number of these securities on hand invested in railway stocks and bonds in the United States. Why not, as a war measure, requisition the stocks of the Canadian Pacific railway, as was done in England at the beginning of the war? And why not ask all the insurance companies who are bound according to law to deposit with the Treasury a certain amount of securities to guarantee their policies, to substitute for their securities Canadian war bonds?

Another point I desire to touch is that, some fifteen years ago or thereabouts, the Government granted to the steel industry, then being started, bounties to run for ten years, and which were afterwards renewed for a further period of five years. This action was taken to help to build up these industries. To-day the situation has changed. These industries are most prosperous; their directors are rich; they are paying large dividends to their shareholders and are even in a position to lend money. They are boasting that they have paid all their floating liabilities, and have vast sums to the good. It is differentiating between industries started with the help of the Government and others which got no bounties not to tax the former more than they are taxed at present.

Then why not get back from these companies these bounties in the shape of taxes special taxes, or super taxes, or other means which I have no doubt the Minister Finance can find out, because after all, as I said before, this money was well invested as it started all these industries, but did all the other industries of this country get such bounties and yet they are being taxed to the same extent. You have taxed the C.P.R., why not tax these companies and you would get back probably 50 million dollars?

I shall not say very much with regard to the matter of war expenditure. We all deplore the fact that at the beginning of the war certain mistakes were made, especially at Valcartier camp. Ice was brought from Ontario and transported to Valcartier; goods that could have been obtained in Quebec were purchased in various parts of the country at high prices and shipped to Valcartier, enormous freight and express charges being thereby incurred in order to help and promote the interests of that good friend of the Government, the Canadian Northern railway. The Government has paid huge amounts of money for motor cars and motor vehicles which have been placed at the disposal of the military authorities—so much so that in the big cities the ordinary pedestrian is in danger of being run over by these cars, because the majors, captains and lieutenant-colonels are in such a hurry to go about their supposed business that they do not care for the public. In England some abuses have arisen in that respect. Many colonels and generals have stayed there longer than they should and have drawn their salaries for doing nothing and not going to the front. It is true that many expenditures have to be made in time of war, and that they are very small when compared to the end that is had in view by the people who wish to see the Allies triumph. But I impress on the Government the necessity of greater economy in the administration of military affairs and of the avoiding of such waste as has taken place on certain occasions.

The member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier) made reference recently to the use of public moneys by the Department of Justice in submitting bail for a man who was employed by the Government to detect supposed criminals but who has been organizing riots and sedition in the province of Quebec. I refer to the case of the man Desjardins. In answer to a question which I put to him, the Minister of Justice said that Desjardins had been in the employ of his department. We heard during the recent troubles in Quebec that a hidden hand might be visited upon certain people who had provoked or started these troubles, and that the Government might be at the back of it. We have proof of the astounding fact that in Montreal last year, when the Conscription Bill was in course of preparation, persons paid by the Government were trying to organize in Montreal a clique, a certain gang, a certain number of men, a certain club or association, for the direct purpose of trying to violate the law, of trying to stand against the Government to defeat the law. A number of men were arrested in this connection, among them Wisintainer, Goyer, Cyr, Bolduc, Chagnon and Paquette. The judge of the preliminary enquete found that there was enough evidence to commit these men to trial. In the case of Lalumière, who was the chief of the gang, Judge St. Cyr, who presided at the trial, went so far as to say not only that Lalumière and the others should be committed for trial, but that Desjardins, the chief witness of the Crown, should himself be arrested. The judge was surprised that this man had not already been taken into custody. An answer was given to a question put in the Senate some time ago which may be taken as indicative of the policy of the Government in this respect, that Desjardins was arrested "upon the instance of the other criminals who were connected with him in this plot, who, when they came to be indicted for their offences, accused Desjardins as a fellow-conspirator and he was indicted accordingly." I want to make a correction here. It is not true that these people had Desjardins arrested in order that they might try to save their own skins; on the contrary, they did not want him to be brought into the case at all, because they thought they might be adversely affected. The person who swore the warrant against Desjardins was present when Lalumière was committed for trial; he is a gentleman who sat as representative of the constituency of Nicolet, if I am not mistaken, in the last Parliament. He writes to me saying that after reading the evidence he was absolutely convinced that Desjardins was just as guilty as the others, if not more so, because he had urged them to commit criminal acts which should not be tolerated by any Government, and for which he should be punished. He violated articles 523, 510, 347, 457 and 69 of the Criminal Code. What took place after that? Desjardins was indicted and was let out on bail for a time. by an official of the Government, Mr. Giroux, who supplied bail for him. Afterwards, when the trial started in November last, all the accused were to be tried together, but the trial could not be concluded because one of the jurors took sick and subsequently died. All the accused, with the exception of Desjardins, were let free on personal bail or certain securities being deposited on their behalf according to the judgment of Mr. Justice Pelletier, who said that they could go free. But Desjardins was kept in jail, Mr. Justice Pelletier did not want to allow any bail for him, because he considered his case worse than any of the other cases. I may say that Mr. Desjardins had many lawyers, Mr. Peers Davidson, Mr. Pelissier, Mr. St. Pierre Pruneau, Mr. Normandeau and other criminal lawyers in Montreal; because after a lawyer had defended him for a couple of days, he found the suit was too hot and he could not, as a gentleman of the Bar, defend Desjardins any longer. Finally, after certain investigations and pourparlers between the attorneys of the Government and the judge, bail was fixed at a certain amount, I think, about thirty thousand dollars, twenty thousand dollars being secured upon real estate and the balance in cash. As Desjardins could not obtain bail, the party who put up the bail, as we were told the other day, was the Department of Justice, the cheque being signed by Mr. Newcombe and countersigned by Mr. Narraway, accountant of the department. What happened then? The trial started some time ago in Montreal. It was presided over by the same judge, Mr. Justice Pelletier. If I am not mistaken, Mr. Justice Pelletier is a former friend, and, I think, he is still a friend of this Government. He was appointed by the Government to his present position. Not long ago he held a seat on the Treasury benches along with my hon. friends opposite. In this second trial, strange to say, the attorneys of the Government were new attorneys. They were Mr. Dagenais and Mr. Maurice Alexander. As I said before, Mr. Desjardins could not keep his attorneys very well. He had to change them every month, or every week, or sometimes oftener. After the evidence was all in, the judge reviewed the facts, and we find certain comments which are very important. The judge for instance says, in a certain part of his charge, speaking about Desjardins:

> In other words, a spotter or a spy. He tells us, in answer to one of my questions, that he induced those boys into error, and that was his object. He told them he was one of them against conscription. It was a lie, according to what he says now, it was a lie. He deceived them, and led them into a trap.

Further on the judge says:

> If a man acts in that way and is a spotter or an informer, or a spy, he has the right to do all that, and to go and inform the people who have hired him about all that took place, and that is the law too, but a man like that has no right in law, and the law is based on common sense here, he has no right to induce these people to do something wrong. Not even a policeman has the right to advise any one to do a thing which is forbidden, because he is the very man who ought to prevent it, and who ought to advise that it should not be done. Now if a man, clothed with the authority of the law, assumes the right to advise people to do things which are wrong, that man becomes guilty from the moment he has adopted that course, and I give you that under my responsibility as good law, whatever may be thought of it in any quarter.

Further on he says:

> Let us consider the stand that Desjardins is the only one of them all who tells the truth—even saying that Ranger, this young, honest boy, has taken a false oath—that all the others have taken a false oath. Desjardins tells us here of seven different heinous crimes which have been organized and premeditated at the meeting of the 27th of July. Killing public men; killing the Prime Minister of this country; killing General Wilson. He tells us there was a question of setting fire to a city and robbing and blowing up the bank. He tells us there was a secret committee of fifteen to be formed—and mind you, gentlemen of the jury, that all that is taken from his evidence as extended by the stenographer—and which I have taken great care to read as it is—the idea or suggestion of blowing up the properties where newspapers were published, or blowing up the owners of newspapers; the kidnapping of one of the ministers, the Hon. Mr. Sevigny. . . . . Desjardins also states that there were revolvers there. There were black-jacks there. There were instruments of torture, and assassination. Now, he comes and reports, and I am giving him all the credit to which he is entitled in saying that he reports one part of what has taken place, but he leaves out things in his reports—leaves out some very important information about things which he himself says took place there. That is a fact which cannot be denied, and which no impassioned speech will brush to one side. He gives us the reason for leaving that out by saying that he made a verbal report to Colonel Sherwood. After, or, may be, even before the Cartierville outrages, these people did not trust Desjardins any more, and it would also be to his credit if these people did not trust him. They continued their organization and their bad actions without him. There is an outstanding salient fact to which I now want to call your attention, which may be an act of virtue, but which I consider a very disgraceful thing. On the 27th of July, in the year of our Lord, 1917, all these bad things, theft, murder, destruction of property—are prepared and talked about and are, to a certain extent, organized. On the 28th of July, the following day—twenty-four hours afterwards—Charles Desjardins, who knows all that, goes to this crowd and gives them the sum of twenty-five dollars. Now it has been said or it has been insinuated here that the Government of Canada approves of that.

And this, I may say, was referred to as being approved by the Government, by the attorney who defended Desjardins, and who said at the trial that he was defending Desjardins at the request of the Government of Canada. Judge Pelletier goes on to say:

I do not believe it. It would be shameful all the same, if a hundred Governments had approved it. It is so shameful that I do not believe any Government, Liberal or Conservative, would approve of it. This was so disgraceful that Inspector Giroux himself has felt it his duty to enter into this box and tell you what he thought of that. I shall not repeat his words, you still have them ringing in your ears. Now, Desjardins did that. Was that putting money into the hands of these people whom he knew, and he must have known, were not rich men; but where young men just beginning life. They have received this contribution of twenty-five dollars, and they had plotted all these things. Would you have done that? There is the true test. Would you have gone to those people knowing they were going to do these dastardly things, and opened your purses to them? I have too much faith in your honesty and your common sense to think that you would even have thought of doing this. He said he did this "in order to be friendly with them, in order to have their confidence."

This is what this creature of the Government says. Judge Pelletier continues:

Did you ever hear of anyone gaining the confidence of a gang of blackguards and criminals by opening your purse to them? You would perhaps have to give it up if he were holding a revolver to your head and saying: "Your purse or your life," you might have had to give it up, but you men do not volunteer your money to him. I do not think so.

Further on, at page 40, the same judge in the same charge, says:

There again I find fault, and serious fault, against Desjardins, because this is the third time he has given money for unlawful purposes . . . . I want to make a distinction here which is perhaps necessary for the interests of the impartial administration of justice. I want to tell you that it is not wrong in law to pay to become a member of a society, bad though it may be, in order to know what is going on there. It is not wrong in law, but it is wrong in law to give money to dangerous people when you have not to give it, when you are not obliged to give it, and when you know that that money helps or will likely help for the commission of a crime—of a crime which you know is going to be committed.

Further on he says:

I shall not discuss that at length, because Desjardins admits that they were not complete. They were far from being complete. For instance the blowing-up or intended blowing-up of the Gazette, the Star, La Patrie and La Presse is not mentioned in the report. This is a most serious thing. If Desjardins heard of these things, and he admits that he did, and did not report it, he was not only wrong in that, but he was absolutely derelict in his duty. He understands that, because he takes great care to tell us that "What I did not put in my report I told verbally to Sir Percy Sherwood." If he did not do that, it was a very serious matter for him, because when you know of anything of that kind and hide it knowingly, you become an accomplice."

The same judge, in the same trial, says, page 43:

Why was not Sir Percy Sherwood brought down here? We have the unsupported evidence of this boy that he told Sir Percy Sherwood, and he is trying to-day (and he is supported by a lawyer who claims he represents the Government) to blacken Sir Percy Sherwood's fair name. That is one of the things which I do not understand in this case. It is either one of two things; either Desjardins told Sir Percy Sherwood about this Three Rivers outrage, and then Sir Percy Sherwood should not have waited until the fourth of August, but would on the twenty-eighth of July, the same evening, have informed Chief of Police Berthiaume or Sir Percy Sherwood closed his eyes and allowed this gang to go to Three Rivers if they wished. Now, I am not here to defend Sir Percy Sherwood, but I am here to tell you that in order to save this fellow Desjardins, Mr. Alexander has no right to put Sir Percy Sherwood in the awful position in which he has tried to put him in this case.

Further on he says:

What do we see next? It is on the twenty-eighth of July that he goes to Ottawa. He has sent in his report on the twenty-seventh: he writes on the twenty-seventh another letter which must have ben received on the twenty-eighth, and who does he write to? Does he write to Sir Percy Sherwood? He knows that Giroux is not in Ottawa. No; he writes to a man whom he knows is not there, about a crime which is going to be committed.

On the twenty-ninth of July, another letter in which pretty serious matters are mentioned is written—to Giroux again.

The judge says further on, at page 46:

Desjardins has told us that he gave a revolver to this man Paquin, a worthless thing, not much more perhaps than junk; an old thing; valueless. The revolver is found, and it works. A very bad position—a very bad situation, indeed . . . . What is important is the fact that Desjardins went away from Lalumiere's place and got a revolver and gave it to Paquin, and he told these young men that he was prepared to supply them with fire-arms. That is proved against him, and is corroborated by his admitting that he left Lalumiere's place with Paquin in order to get a revolver for him. Now, what inducement was that to these people? That is the real point of this revolver matter. What inducement were these people given, when they saw this man giving them money and giving them fire-arms, and helping to give them tools and the means to accomplish their evil purposes? We are told by Mr. Alexander we must approve of that.

Further on he says:

And yet Desjardins gave Paquin (whom he calls a conspirator) a box of cartridges in good working order—a nice thing for a police officer to do.

On page 48, speaking of Ranger's evidence, the judge says:

He has given evidence like a man who wants to be fair to every one; he stated that this revolver was offered to him for a seditious purpose, and Desjardins does not deny that either. Now, we have one revolver given, and one revolver offered. We have cartridges given, and that by a man who comes before you and says "I am a Police Officer, and I only did what was necessary." . . . . I do not say it was the necessary result, but I am afraid the other accused have got the right to say that they were to a certain extent encouraged to do what they did do by what Desjardins said and did. After all is said and done, when these boys saw that man amongst them, handing over money, and fire-arms, and ammunition, don't you think that this was of such a nature as to encourage these people to go further than they might have done without that? If that is not fairness, then I do not know or understand what fairness is, or means.

The judge says further:

We are told that we should accept the theory that all this was all right. My stomach refuses to swallow that. If yours are robust enough, alright. Mine is not. I am an older man than you, and that may account for it, but my stomach cannot stand it.

If the stomach of the judge could not stand that—a man who obtained his position through his allegiance to the former Government—how can the people of this country stand it? The Government of this country must have a pretty strong constitution to be able to stand it, and a very good physician in attendance in case their stomach refuses to swallow it. The judge says further, on page 50:

But bad as they are, nobody, and particularly nobody representing the powers that be—the authorities—had the right to go and give them encouragement, give them money, give them fire-arms. You have been told that the Government of Canada is going to be sorry if Desjardins is not approved by your verdict.

The judge was there referring to a charge previously made by Mr. Alexander. This is most important. The judge goes on:

I do not believe that, but if it were so, let justice be done, and let them be sorry, and Mr. Alexander is fully authorized to tell them that I, at least, do not approve of it, but the Government when they read the evidence will not approve of it, I am sure.

That is the reason why I have encroached on the time of the House in putting this evidence on Hansard. The judge goes on:

I do not think that if the Minister of Justice (whose political opinions all the people do not approve, but who is considered even by his political opponents as an honourable man and an upright man) had heard the evidence in this case, he would, like Inspector Giroux, have told you that he disapproved of Desjardins' actions, or I don't know him. You were told, and you were told in a frantic way, that all this was said to you on behalf of the Government of Canada! I was sorry to hear that.

It is a friend of the Government who is speaking. The judge goes on:

I think it was a great mistake for any gentleman, even though he be a member of the Bar, to come and practically place the Government of Canada here in the box, in a case prosecuted by the Provincial Government. I think it was a big mistake. The view I take is that nobody had the right to come here and tell you that. I do not know whether you are Conservatives, or Unionists or Liberals.

I presume you are all on one side or the other, unless perhaps a few of you are Nationalists—but I do not approve of anybody coming here and telling you these things in order to influence your verdict. This case has to be decided on the evidence and on nothing else.

These are the main remarks of the judge in his charge to the jury. The case was left to the jury. What happened? The jury disagreed. They stood eleven to one in favour of convicting Desjardins, and in the case of Lalumière, who was tried at the same time they stood 9 to 3 in favour of convicting him. A new trial was ordered and Desjardins asked for bail as in the first instance. He was allowed ont on bail and he was allowed out the second time but a larger sum was required than that on which he had been allowed out in the first instance. A cheque for $10,000 signed by the same persons, the Deputy Minister of Justice and Mr. Narraway, the accountant, and bearing the heading of the Department of Justice was deposited in court. I saw that cheque myself; it was made payable to the clerk of the court. Mr. Desjardins is still free awaiting another trial that is going to take place on the 15th of this month. There is more. There is a case which seems to be in a different category but which is still amongst these cases. I refer to the case of Blackwell. That man had been doing certain work in connection with the manufacture of shells; he was a shell turner in one of the big factories in Montreal. He was working in conjunction with these others, he was arrested and when he came before the court on the last occasion certain evidence was adduced. I was told that some people who would have been able to have proved the facts against him were removed or taken away and the result was that the judge advised the jury to discharge him because there was not sufficient evidence. I know something about the facts of this case. This man was employed by the company owning this factory. I do not know if they knew anything about it, but the fact is he joined that band of blackguards that tried to raise sedition and riots in Montreal. But I do know that this company paid a lawyer, using their own money, to have this man defended, to see that the trial should not continue to the end and that he should not be convicted. I do not know if this man was hired by authority of the Government or not, but these seem to be the facts and they certainly have a very peculiar appearance. The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) has stated the position in a somewhat similar way to that in which I have stated it now. He asked a statement from the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) in reference to this matter, and I think that before this session is over we should have a statement from him as to how and why the Government of Canada authorized the employment and payment of a man of this kind to stir up sedition and riots in Montreal at a time so inopportune, when the conscription law was being discussed in this country, and when a spark would have set fire to the province, nay, to the whole country. These expenditures for hiring lawyers and depositing money to defend criminals I take exception to, and I think that I am right in criticising them in the present situation when the war is on.

There are numerous other things which I have been very much surprised at since I have been a member of this House. For instance, there is the use, if not the abuse, by the Government of Orders in Council since this war has been on. We know that by the War Measures Act this Government was authorized and empowered to do everything by Order in Council, but although the Government has the right to do those things, I do not believe it is a wise policy or that the Government should exercise this power at any time or any moment, especially when this House is in session. On three occasions recently resort has been had to Orders in Council. An Order in Council was issued at the time of the recent disturbances in Quebec, another was issued to amend the Conscription Act, and again another under the War Appropriation measure that we have passed. We have passed this measure authorizing the Government to spend, by Order in Council, any amount of money, and to take whatever precautions they think fit without consulting this House. In doing so we violate the principle of control by Parliament over all public expenditure. The British system is for Parliament to vote and appropriate sums of certain amount for the different services of the Government, and then Parliament supervises, through its own committee and by an audit controlled by Parliament, the actual use and application of such appropriation. The measure sweeps this system away and introduces a species of administrative absolutism, a veritable czarism, with no possible control either at the beginning, in the vote and appropriation, or at the end, the use and spending of the money of the people.

There is the same tendency to use this power to pass Orders in Council to control the press of the country. Only recently we saw an Order in Council passed preventing the newspapers from making comments upon, or certain statements in relation to, the war, or criticising the way in which certain things were done in connection therewith. There is a natural tendency, while we are striving after efficiency and promptitude of governmental operation, for us to turn this country more and more into a bureaucracy wholly controlled by a group of ministers and department heads whose responsibility to Parliament becomes more and more indistinct and unenforceable. Their acts come before the representatives of the people only when presented for ratification after the facts; and the representatives of the people are then told that they might ratify or lose the services of the only Government that can really win the war. In this way irrevocable decisions are constantly being reached by the Cabinet, and, by individual ministers, are being imposed on the country without any real consideration by the public or its representatives. Many of these decisions are only remotely connected with the conduct of the war, and the consequences of most of them will be felt for a generation after peace is declared.

While we should strive to do our utmost to win the war, we should not lose sight of the conditions which will need to be dealt with when the war is over. The Government should be prepared to avail themselves of any advantages that will then present themselves for the development of commercial intercourse with other countries, as well as in our internal trade, and now is the time to prepare ourselves with that object in view. We were given to understand that many public works had been stopped, the reason assigned being that we were not able to obtain the necessary money to carry them on and that the works in question were not urgent. For example, work on the St. Charles River improvements was brought to a standstill. But, Mr. Speaker, if that work was deemed necessary a few years ago for the improvement of existing conditions in that part of the country the necessity surely is as great to-day. The few million dollars of outlay involved will not render our financial condition very much worse, and if the undertaking was a necessary one before the war broke out, it is just as necessary to-day and should not be discontinued.

There has also been a stoppage of work in the harbours of Montreal and Quebec. Although it is necessary for us to practice economy, we must also be keenly alert so that we may take advantage of the opportunities which will present themselves when the war is over. It is very necessary to provide proper harbour facilities for our overseas trade and to maintain adequate transportation facilities between the different parts of Canada. With the completion of the improvements contemplated at these harbours we should be in a far better position to handle a greatly enhanced volume of trade, at those places.

Some years ago, the project for the construction of the Georgian Bay canal was inaugurated and was strongly supported by several members of Parliament. At that time the Government deeming the enterprise too big, did not feel themselves able to recommend the appropriations necessary to bring it to a successful completion. Had the Georgian Bay canal been commenced at that time it would by now have been well under way, and although perhaps not completed it might be available later for trade purposes. That canal would have afforded very important transportation facilities for our trade and commerce, and would have been regarded for all time as a great achievement for Canada. We have been told that public works have been stopped because the cost of material and labour is growing dearer all the time. In answer to that I would say that the Government has been able to find the material, the money and the men necessary to reconstruct the Parliament buildings. I do not criticise their action in that regard, but I would ask if these works were absolutely necessary in connection with the carrying on of the industries of this country. The Government has emphasized the necessity of making sacrifices now that we are at war. Would it not have been better to have made the sacrifice of remaining in the present building until after the conclusion of the war, and have devoted the money which is now being expended on the Parliament buildings to other public undertakings, which would be of greater assistance in developing our commercial position when the present great world conflict is at an end?

My reason for bringing forward these suggestions now is that the Government and Parliament might take up and deal with the situation before it is too late and provide for the conditions which will arise when the war comes to an end. The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) stated to-day that there exists in Canada a certain association whose object is to promote the reconstruction of this country after the war. That organization is called the Canadian Industrial Reconstruction Association, and the hon. gentleman gave the names of certain prominent members of the provisional executive committee. These gentlemen, who are Tories, or Unionists, and are friendly to the Government, and cannot be taxed with being opposed to the war, and at their meeting in Toronto, as well as at their meeting in Montreal recently, they advocated the present as being a most opportune time to provide measures for the improvement of trade and commerce, and to meet industrial conditions of Canada after the war is over, and they suggested that we should get into touch with the people of other countries in order to take such steps as may be necessary to that end. It is held that the war will certainly bring new forms of taxation, although the customs duties will continue to be the chief source of revenue. But it is doubtful if all the forms of taxation that can be devised will meet the interest upon the war debt, to say nothing of providing for the pensions and other war obligations that will have been incurred during the present war. In undertaking their reorganization programme, the members of this association have not been accused of being unpatriotic and not being good supporters of the cause of the Allies, so the accusation cannot in justice be levelled against them with others who came forward with similar suggestions.

Then, a few months ago, the Imperial Government appointed an Empire Resources Committee to consider a resolution adopted by the Imperial War Conference of 1917, which declared that the time had arrived when all possible encouragement should be given to the development of Imperial resources, and especially to making the Empire independent of other countries in respect of food supplies, raw materials and essential industries. It is important, they say, to any such inquiry that the interest of the Dominion should not be prejudiced by neglect or want of knowledge. There is no necessary conflict between Canadian and Imperial interests if the situation is clearly understood. Each portion of the Empire must maintain the industrial policy which its conditions demand, and the more clearly that is recognized, the stronger will be the bonds of sympathy which hold the parts together. Beyond legitimate protection of local interests there may be Imperial preferences in control over raw materials, in direction of immigration, and in charge of transportation, which will tend greatly to unify the Empire, enhance its strength and security and increase the general average of prosperity alike in the Mother Country and the Dominions.

This Government has announced its purpose in aiding in bringing the war to a successful issue and looking after the interest of our soldiers who are returning—which two objects we on this side of the House would like to see carried out. But as I have already said, the Government should do its utmost so that the resources and the trade and commerce of Canada may be developed to the fullest extent when the war is over.

To these, Mr. Speaker, to other immediate problems, and to new problems that will arise during the war and the period of reconstruction, the Government should give its immediate attention with the single desire to assist in their wise solution, to assure equitable dealing with all classes and interests, and particularly to develop the natural resources of Canada for the national advantage, and maintain in strength and efficiency the industries of the country upon which labour and agriculture, town and township, so greatly depend.

Mr. DESLAURIERS (St. Mary's, Montreal) (translation): Mr. Speaker, seeing the hour is so late and that we must sit again to-morrow, I have the honour to move the adjournment of the debate.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think the hon. gentlemen had better go on for a while.

Mr. DESLAURIERS: Mr. Speaker, after listening to the many and elaborate speeches delivered on the budget by those who spoke before me, this House cannot expect me to bring any new light to bear on the subject; however, I intend in the course of the few brief remarks I am going to make, to protest against the extravagance and the nefarious enactments foisted upon my country by our hon. friends on the other side of this House, whose sincerity can be nothing other than questionable.

If my memory serves me right, a man took the floor of this House, one day, and addressed the following language to those who are now his friends: "When the Conservatives were in Opposition they never let pass the opportunity of criticizing the Government for its expenses, even taxing as extravagant the lowest budget, the most appropriate to the business needs of the country. Since coming into power, the spirit of economy has disappeared and been replaced by such extravagant methods of spending the public money as have no precedent in Canada. Never was there seen such a dance of millions spent strictly among friends. The present Government have broken all their election promises, have set aside all the principles they so proudly proclaimed when they occupied the Opposition benches, and have brought down to Parliament a budget demand for 200 million dollars, while the former Government, with great national undertakings to its credit, never went beyond 149 millions." The man who spoke these admirable words was my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Maclean). On this occasion how well may we exclaim: "O tempora! O mores"! Two hundred million dollars got on his nerves in those days, and now he brings down a budget for 980 millions, assuring us, meanwhile, that we have not yet reached the last penny alluded to by the Hon. Minister of the Interior. So he must not feel surprised if we, in turn, are inclined to be irritated by this fabulous or rather this ridiculous sum. His opponents of yesterday, his friends of to-day, have broken their election pledges; they promised volunteer recruiting, they promised the selective draft, they promised exemption to all those whose work was in the national interest. What hon. member of this House does not recall the patriotic (save the mark); orators shouting to Ontario that conscription was for Quebec; and in Quebec, on the other hand, didn't we hear these topsy-turvy patriots howling that conscription was not as bad as it was painted, that the population consisted mostly of farmers and would hardly be touched? What man does not know the name of the hon. gentlemen on the Government side who assured His Lordship, the Rt. Rev. Archbishop of Montreal, that conscription was being put in force by the Government as a means to clearing out the places of amusement and the pool-rooms; of getting hold of the shirkers, of making a general clean-up in society? Are those the Government's claims to-day?

No, Mr. Speaker, we meet the very contrary; through these Orders in Council and like measures—a form of administration which I despise and which every citizen respectful of the constitution of his country must also despise—hasn't every exemption been annulled, is not the Government laying hold, indiscriminiately, of the best we have in the country, leaving behind the sickly, the unwholesome, the effeminate, in a word all those who are incapable of shouldering arms for the defence of the Canadian race, and then we are told that this is a national Government! Didn't they promise the farmers that their sons would be exempted and, is it necessary for me to add, was there one member on the other side of this Chamber who was not elected on this condition? Have they or have they not been false to their word? Lately when the Molloy amendment was moved, demanding the exemption of farmers, and the Lapointe amendment, demanding the exemption of both farmers and those other classes of society who would be of more service to the country here at home than they could be overseas, did the Government have the courage to insist that what they had promised to their respective constituents be respected?

As to those who were not present at that solemn moment, how are they going to face their electors? And those who voted for the Molloy amendment and, a few minutes later, upheld the Government's Bill, thus contradicting their first vote, what will their explanation be? I will say to the Hon. Minister of Finance that what was true of his friends in former times, what was reprehensible in them, is none the less true and reprehensible to-day; he cannot help acknowledging that, and what I regret is this mental shuffle of the hon. minister whereby he looks upon the business of the country to-day in the same manner as his present friends were wont to do in olden days. Why this strange conduct? Is it because Canada has fallen below her true status? I do not hesitate to deny that, when I see Ireland which has over 100 members of Parliament at Westminster, and has given nothing in the present war, while Canada, with no representation whatever in the Imperial Parliament, has already contributed 6 per cent of her total population; when I see India who, with a total population of 300 million people, has not given as many men as has little Canada, a country of 7,000,000; when I compare the efforts of Japan, a rich, powerful nation, directly interested in the present war, whose military efforts has been practically nil; when I compare the efforts of Italy which hasn't accomplished half as much as Canada having regard to population; when I compare Canada with the United States, that nation whose resources are inexhaustible, and which has not done one-tenth as much as we; and even England herself, can England compare her showing to Canada's? When I see that all these nations directly interested in the war, have not seen fit to make the supreme sacrifice, I say that Canada, engaging in this war through sympathy, because a noble and sacred cause was at stake, should not follow the road of national suicide.

Why does the hon. member for Halifax come before us with such a monstrous and irrational Budget? What are the motives behind this manner of carrying on the business of the country? I will not repeat them now; they are known to every one, especially to our hon. friends on the other side of the House. I shall be told that the Government is acting in defence of Canada; that, in this war, Canada's border line is in Flanders.

Mr. Speaker, not very long ago I was reading in a daily paper that Judge Benton, I think it was, of Ontario, at any rate a man likely in favour of conscription, had a case up before him. The matter concerned a life insurance company, one of whose members had fallen on the field of honour in Europe. The company were being sued because they had refused to pay the insurance policy on the ground that a clause in the policy exonerated them from paying for a demise in a foreign land. Now, plaintiff's counsel argued that Canada's Parliament had declared that our frontiers were in Flanders, consequently that the family should be paid.

The outcome was that the company won their case, since the judge brought the boundaries of Canada back to their normal position. So I am not alone in thinking that in the present war, we are combatants solely through sympathy. Some one might make reply that Germany is liable to attack us in the future. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not hold that opinion; I have before me an article in Overseas, a monthly magazine published by the Overseas Club, an English Imperialist association; they publish a map of the world under the heading: "What Germany Wants," founded on the demands formulated by Berlin through their principal authors and publicists. Here is what we find on this map: Tannenberg, in Gross Dutchland, claims for his country, Holland and her colonies; Angola; the Congo; Turkey's possessions in Asia; the river basins of the Yellow river and of the Yang Tse Kiang, in China; Cuba; Central Africa; Asia Minor; Syria; Mesopotamia, Warner Sambart wants Germany to have Dover, Malta, the Suez region; the Deutcheschaften of Paul de Lagarde suggests that Berlin take over a part of Russia; Bernardi looks upon German possession of Denmark as essential; Ernest Haase speaks of Scandinavia; Fritz Bley claims that Germany by right should rule over all the basin of the Rhine; Wolf-Politik Haase suggests that Germany should have supremacy over Luxemburg, Switzerland and the Balkans; General von Shellendorf demands the annexation of the whole of northern France as far as the Loire; Frederick Lange's patriotic ambition asks for nothing less than the suzerainty of his country over all the republics of the South; Maximilian Harden wants Morocco, Egypt, India, Belgium, Calais; Paul Rorchbach wants all Austria Hungary, while the Industrial Association of Germany are asking for all the Meuse basin, Briey, Longwy and Lorraine. After several examples of this kind, we find that, outside of Cuba, the territory of North America remains intact, Canada and the United States are not affected. Therefore those who claim that Germany is after Canada are in error.

Has Canada done reasonably well in the present war, in comparison with those nations which most resemble her, through their situation, their interests, their sympathies and the principal elements of their population: England, France, the United States?

Let us take for granted—and this falls short of the truth—that we have enlisted 420,000 men in the different army services; now, setting Canada's population at 7,000,000, which is very near the true figure, for since 1914 a great many foreigners have returned to their own country—this figure represents the total population, including children, women and old men—so that we have put 6 per cent of our population under arms. This is equivalent to an army of 2,400,000 for France; an army of 2,700,000 for England. Nevertheless, despite the number of her troops on paper, England, so far, has not sent that many men to France.

It will be admitted that we are aware today of Germany's intention to get hold of the French forts along the English channel; that England has at least just as much direct interest as we have to prevent the Germans from accomplishing their design.

If we estimate the military effort of each nation, taking into consideration, at the same time, the population, the number of soldiers and the cost of maintaining the army, the comparison is still more striking. Once more, let us take for granted that Canada spends on her army three times more than England, and four times more than France, for each soldier; if we make allowance for the difference in pay, in pensions, in transportation, etc., these figures are moderate indeed. In this way we must multiply by four the comparative figure for France, and by three that of England; so we find that Canada's present army costs her as much as would England an army of 8,100,000 men; or an army of 9,000,000 men in France. That is more than our two mother countries will put on a war footing during the entire conflict, even if it were to last two years longer. Now, France and England are, subsequently to the United States, two of the wealthiest nations on the globe while Canada is one of the poorest.

The comparison with the United States is, in certain respects, still more impressive. The situation of both countries is identical and the danger of an attack by Germany is at least as great for them as for Canada. The American nation is fourteen times as big as ours and its wealth seventy-four times as great. In order to equal Canada's showing, therefore, the United States would have to put on a war basis, and transport to France, an army of six million men. Moreover, they would have to spend at least one hundred billion dollars. Now, we have never heard that they intended creating an army of more than three million, and the more conservative place it at one million. So that, if they sent three million men they would contribute only one-half as much as Canada, while if they send but one million, Canada's showing will have been six times as great.

Estimated in dollars and cents the disparity is still greater. The United States pay $1.00 per day to each soldier; Canada pays $1.10. Basing our assumption on Canada's figure of 420,000 soldiers and a possible army of 2,000,000 men in the United States—an average generally accepted—every Canadian ratepayer, every man, woman and child, pays $24 a year for our army, while the American pays only $7. Should the war keep on into 1919, the Canadians will be spending $120 and the Americans, $14. These figures have merely to do with the soldiers' pay. If we take into account officers' salaries, indemnities, pensions, transportation and equipment, the difference is much greater. So we must conclude that we are contributing ten times more than they in every respect and their newspapers are decidedly out of place when they heap insult upon us as they frequently do.

Now, have we the necessary means of transportation to carry on a policy like this? In a magazine published in the United States. The New Republic, I read a short time ago, that millions of tons of foodstuffs and munitions—which are absolutely necessary to carry on the war, especially to-day—are piled up on the wharves along the Atlantic seaboard, with no immediate hope of being able to transport them, and that, in any case they will be transported under hazard of the hardest kinds of difficulties, such as submarines and floating mines,—because there is a shortage of bottoms. On the 18th of last October the Tribune of New York stated that what tortured it most was the thought that the Allies might be struck down dead before the United States had been able to send them help, because there were not enough ships. And M. Tardieu, High Commissioner for France, sent on a mission to America, stated in the American papers that his greatest fear was that the United States did not have the ships necessary to forward, at the proper time, the food and munitions bought there, the need for which was becoming more urgent as the days went by.

To me it is permissible to think that since the Canadian government have an official representative of the cabinet in Washington, they should be well aware of this shortage of ships and that, in consequence, they should energetically promote shipbuilding in this country so as to help the Allies and allow them to strike with their full strength. We all acknowledge that it is useless to transport splendid soldiers to France if we have not also the wherewithal to feed them and to fulfil their requirements in the matter of munitions, since we are suffering from a scarcity of the means of transportation. Besides, when we have before our very eyes the statements of eminent men, like Lord Reading Mr. Asquith, Mr. Lloyd George, Lord Rhondda, Mr. Hoover, Lord Northcliffe and Mr. Kemp himself, urging upon us the imperative necessity of shipping them food, while it is common knowledge throughout the world that France is put on rations and that the bakers of England and Italy have not sufficient flour for baking bread; when, finally, we read the reports of eminent men like Dr. Robertson, Hon. Mr. Fisher, the Hon. Mr. Caron, of Quebec, and the leaders of all our agricultural societies, demonstrating, figures in hand, that the present Administration is rapidly heading the country towards famine; when we know that Canada, to-day is face to face with a shortage of 60,000 hands for getting in the next crop; when we know that, thanks to our excessive contributions of men, hundreds of acres suitable for cultivation and ready to be planted, will fail to be, on account of the scarcity of farm labour; is it practical, is it reasonable for the hon. Minister of the Interior to bring down legislation concerning our Indian reserves which have never been cultivated, while we have so much more land already for seeding? Is it really opportune, from a national standpoint, to amend the Military Service Act so as to recruit from our farmers and our farm workers?

It is not with theories of that sort that a country is governed wisely.

For my part I find irrefutable evidence that our friends on the Government benches entertain an entirely false conception of their duty to the State; they cannot expect to convince this House that we must ruin Canada, bring starvation upon our European allies and thus win final victory!

In the name of liberty, honour and patriotism, interpreted according to their own light, they seem free to do anything at all, except what is right. In certain provinces they have succeeded in deceiving the people, but to-day the people have grasped just what this patriotism of the hon. gentlemen amounts to, and to-morrow the people will brand upon the foreheads of these hon. gentlemen a stigma which through all eternity will torture their souls.

We of the Opposition are in this war to the very end, taking heed of our strength and our resources. No one detests Prussianism more than do we who have met with a few transitory samples of it in this country. Our ranks hold none of those emboldened talkers who on every occasion mouth the august name of liberty and then erase it wherever they find it emblazoned on the walls of our country. We have known what true freedom is and we would like to see the people of Canada continue to enjoy this true freedom.

A few words of recapitulation, Mr. Speaker, and I will have done. I maintain that the Government should, first of all, build ships so as not to be a burden to any one else; next, develop agriculture in every possible way so as to sustain the vital forces of Europe and of Canada. Finally I say that, so far, Canada has done herself proud, in men, in money and in food; and that Germany has never designed an attack upon Canada.

Mr. A. B. HUNT (Compton) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Speaker, I had intended to take steps under the rules of the House to ensure that the debate would be ended to-morrow, as it has lasted a very long time, but I have an arrangement with the chief whip on the other side which will obviate that necessity, and therefore I shall consent to the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

On the motion of Sir Robert Borden the House adjourned at 1.25 a.m., Wednesday.

Wednesday, May 8, 1918.

The House met at Eleven o'clock.

REPORT.

Report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs for the year ended March 31, 1917.—Sir Robert Borden.

RELIGIOUS SERVICES FOR FLYING CORPS CADETS.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: An hon. gentleman on the other side of the House inquired a few days ago regarding the opportunities afforded to men training for the flying service to attend religious services. A telegram was sent to the officer in command at Toronto, to which the following reply has been received:

Toronto, Ont.

General Gwatkin,
Ottawa, Ont.

Reference your letter May 2nd. Applied to Military District No. 2 on 30th April for six chaplains of suitable religious denominations for service in various units. No religious services held at School of Aeronautics, Queens Park, Toronto. This not considered necessary in view of excellent church accommodation in Toronto. Cadets and men of this school are given every facility to attend any religious Sunday service they wish and are free from 10.45 a.m. each Sunday.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

MILITARY SERVICE ACT—EXEMPTIONS.

Mr. MACNUTT:

1. What is the number of volunteers for Military Service exempted on account of physical unfitness?
2. What is the total number exempted for the same cause, including the men who were called up under the Military Service Act, to 15th of April last?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. There were no records kept for those rejected for physical unfitness under voluntary enlistment.

2. There have been 118,772 men who registered and claimed exemption examined by military medical boards and placed in a lower medical category than "A." These men have been automatically granted a temporary certificate of exemption on account of their medical unfitness. An exemption certificate granted on medical grounds automatically expires immediately the men in the medical category under which the certificate has been granted are called upon for military service.

BARGE BENMORE.

Mr. DUFF:

1. Did the Government own an iron barge called the Benmore?
2. What are her dimensions and tonnage?
3. Has this barge been sold? If so, when?
4. What is the name of the person who purchased said barge?
5. What was the amount received by the Government for said barge?
6. Does the Government know for what purpose she is to be used?

Hon. J. D. REID:

1. Yes.

2. Length 242 ft., breadth 39.2 ft., moulded depth 24.9 ft., registered tonnage 1,355, gross tonnage, 1,477.

3. Yes; the 22nd September, 1917.

4. J. A. Farquhar, Halifax.
5. $22,500.
6. The Department of Railways and Canals has no information.

ST. CLAIR WEST.

Mr. TRAHAN:

1. What rank did St. Clair West, No. 68,113, hold in the 25th Nova Scotia Battalion?
2. Did he proceed overseas in said Battalion?
3. Did he see active service in France?
4. If not, what duties did he perform?
5. Was he wounded in France?
6. If not, by what authority does he wear stripes on his uniform usually worn by and designating wounded men?
7. Is he still engaged in military duties?
8. If so, what are said duties?

Major-General MEWBURN: The information asked relative to this man is not available in Canada. It is being requested, by letter, from the Overseas Military Forces of Canada.

HON. ALBERT SEVIGNY.

Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. Has the Government entrusted the Hon. Albert Sévigny, former Minister of Inland Revenue, with any mission?
2. If so, what is the nature of such mission?
3. What remuneration does the Hon. Albert Sévigny derive from this source?
4. How long ago was he appointed, and what sums have been paid him to date?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Sevigny has not been entrusted with any mission by the Government, and he is not in receipt of any remuneration from the Government at the present time.

CHAMBLY-VERCHERES ELECTION DOCUMENTS.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Vercheres): moved:

(a) For a copy of envelopes No. 8, 10, 11, 13, 15, 17, 19, 20, 21, 22, 39, 53, 56, 59, and 99 polling booth No. 9 Barracks of St. Johns, Quebec, used in the Federal Elections of 17th December last, and placed in Military bag No. 446 of the North American Continent Military Votes and now in the boxes for the Electoral District of Chambly and Vercheres. (c) A copy of envelope number 80 of polling both No. 2 Barracks of St. Johns, Quebec, used in the Federal Election of 17th December last, and placed in Military bag No. 453 of the North American Continent Military Votes and now in the boxes for the Electoral District of Chambly-Vercheres. (d) A copy of all statements, polling books, papers, documents relating to said polling booths 2, 4, 9; bags No. 451, 453, 446, sent to the Returning Officer in the said bags or separately.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Stand.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Since the Government does not seem disposed to grant this motion, as I believe they should, I shall withdraw it. But I give notice that I will bring this matter up before the House at the first opportunity.

Motion dropped.

ADJOURNMENT FOR ASCENSION DAY HOLIDAY.

On the Government notice of motion that the House do adjourn over Ascension Day, being called:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Stand.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is this motion not to be passed?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not intend to move it at present. I will speak to my right hon. friend about it. It is probable that the Senate will sit to-morrow, and it is very desirable that this House should sit unless there is very great objection. I might point out that we are faced with one or two alternatives. This House will have to prorogue not later than Saturday, May 18th, or else adjourn until about the first of August. I am not saying this with a desire to in the slightest degree restrict discussion. I am only stating the fact. If it is desired that further discussion with regard to any matters of public business shall take place, I am perfectly willing that the House should be adjourned until the 1st of August. All I desire to point out, and I do so with all respect, is, that unless this House can prorogue by the 18th of May it will be necessary for us to come back about the first of August.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That view of the case has nothing at all to do with the question of the House sitting to-morrow.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It has in this way, that we could make some progress to-morrow, and it might assist in enabling us to prorogue on the date I have mentioned. I desire to say, however, that I do not wish the House to sit to-morrow if there is any grave or serious objection. I thought I would let the motion stand for the present, and we can return to it later. In the meantime I will confer with my right hon. friend about it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It will be called again to-day?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Oh, yes, if necessary.

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE.

VISIT OF THE PRIME MINISTER TO ENGLAND FOR IMPERIAL CONFERENCE AND IMPERIAL WAR CABINET.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Before the Orders of the Day are called, and in view of some remarks made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) yesterday about the Prime Minister not going overseas this summer, but that other ministers of the Crown would; and in view of the remarkable statement just made by the Prime Minister that we must either prorogue, or adjourn by a certain date to come back later, is it the intention of the Prime Minister to give to this House and to the country a statement as to what the ministers are going to do when they go overseas; whether they are going to do any more than they did last year, and whether they are going to get the overseas forces in order? We want to know what is going to be accomplished by this trip to England, and why the members of this House should be called back here on the 1st of August, if matters stand as we understand they do.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I thought the hon. gentleman was aware that members of governments from all the Dominions of the Empire had been summoned to attend an Imperial War Conference, and also to attend sessions of an Imperial War Cabinet. The date has not yet been fixed. I believe the ministers from other Dominions have already started. The correspondence with regard to the matter, in so far as it is not of a confidential nature, can be brought down and laid upon the table of the House. It is the intention of the Prime Minister of Canada to be present at that conference.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I heard it was not.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend must not believe everything he hears.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I believe I read it in the minister's own organ.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Does the hon. gentleman refer to me?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I read it in the Evening Journal.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If the hon. gentleman refers to that or any other paper as my organ, he is transgressing the bounds of truth.

Sir SAM HUGHES: He is not transgressing the bounds of truth at all. He is not in the habit of transgressing the bounds of truth.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I desire to ask another question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member must resume his seat when the Speaker rises.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The Speaker must not rise.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member must be amenable to the rules of the House, as must any other member of the House, and it is my duty, charged as I am with the responsibilities of my position, to see that the rules of the House are carried out. The hon. member is not in order in entering into any discussion.

Sir SAM HUGHES: When I am charged with stating an untruth, I am within my rights.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member was not charged with stating an untruth.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, take your seat, please. The point I want to get at is this, if Canada is going to be committed—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is out of order.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am not out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is not in order in entering into a discussion, and I must rule that he is out of order.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am asking a question. I am within my right in asking a question, with all due regard to the chloroform that has been administered here.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must ask the hon. member to resume his seat at once. If by using the word "chloroform," he has reference to the ruling of the Chair, I must ask him to retract that statement.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I desire to ask the Prime Minister a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If the hon. member, in using the word "chloroform" has reference to the ruling of the Chair, I ask him to withdraw that statement.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am not in the habit of answering hypothetical questions.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member may not proceed unless he withdraws that statement.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I will not withdraw the statement. I am perfectly in order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If the hon. member persists in refusing to withdraw that statement, I shall name him.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It is the privilege of the Speaker to name me if he wants to.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I would suggest to the hon. member (Sir Sam Hughes) that he is too old a member of this House to defy the authority of the Speaker. The reason I made the reference to him that I did was that he had stated, without any warrant, that a journal which he described as "my organ"—

Sir SAM HUGHES: A Government organ.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. member said it was my "organ." I think the hon. member said it was my personal organ. I resent that statement, because I assure him and the House that I have no personal organ in this country, nor have I control over the editorial utterances of any newspaper in Canada, nor have I sought to have any such control.

Mr. FIELDING: Except the Canada Gazette.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That has no editorials.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And Orders in Council.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I accept the explanation of the Prime Minister. I desire to ask him this question. Is it the intention to discuss with this House and with the country the questions that are to arise at the Imperial Conference as to the future of this country in connection with the Empire? If we are to judge by the statements that have been made concerning what transpired at past conferences, I do not agree with those, and I would ask the Prime Minister respectfully—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I would ask the Prime Minister respectfully if he purposes to lay before this House and the country—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Sir SAM HUGHES: —the facts in connection with the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If the hon. member does not make himself amenable to the constituted authority of this House, I shall have to take the proper measures to see that he does.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I have asked the Prime Minister a question, and I purpose asking: Is it the intention to bring before the House the subject matters that are to be discussed at the conference in Great Britain, or is it not?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If the hon. member will put his question on the Order Paper, it will be answered.

THE BUDGET.

The House resumed the debate on the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean (Acting Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means (resumed from May 7).

Mr. A. B. HUNT (Compton): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make the remarks which I believe it is my duty to make on the present occasion, I wish to say that, at this stage of the debate I intend to be as brief as possible. I do not wish to take up the time of this House in wandering far from the question which we are now called upon to discuss. I shall, therefore, not attempt to discuss many of the questions that have been brought up by members on both sides of this House.

I claim, Mr. Speaker, that the only important questions before us at the present time are men, munitions, ships, food and the financing of this great war, and, in my opinion, the most important of all is food. I believe this Government should move very carefully and study well the great question of the shortage of food. I feel, after they have weighed the question from all sides, they will come to the conclusion that the young men should not at this critical time be removed from the farms. It must, however, be clearly understood that the farmers in our part of the country are ready to do their share, either at the front or on the farm, in winning this war, and I dislike hearing the slurring insinuations that are thrown across the floor of this House at Quebec, because nothing but harm can come out of such statements. You cannot produce more food and, at the same time, take the men from the farms. You must choose what you consider the most essential at this time, and then carry out one plan or the other. You must not endeavour to do both with the same class of men. I consider a great deal of time has been lost and a great deal of harm has been done by discouraging the farmers and young men of this country by pulling them from one exemption tribunal to another and not giving them any satisfactory answer as to where their best work may be carried on in order to win the great struggle which is now being waged. If those young men are wrongly directed by this Government, the ministers of the Crown and hon. members supporting the Government will be held by the people of this country to be responsible for the action they have taken and the method they have used in carrying out what I consider an unnecessary law. They say that we can replace those farmers by sending out men from the cities. It is absurd to think that anything of the kind can be done. How many men can you get out in the morning and milk ten cows and do the same thing at night? If they were willing, not more than one out of ten can milk, and not more than one out of twenty is willing. And when you stop the dairy industry of this country, you stop the production of cheese, which is a most essential and necessary food for the soldiers at the front.

What advice do we get from our food controllers, both in Canada and in Great Britain? Are we carrying out their views by taking men from the farms? Let us see what they say. Although this has already been placed on Hansard, I feel it is of such great importance that it cannot be too carefully considered. We even have the statement of the Prime Minister of Canada that food may be the winning card in this war. We also have the opinion of Lord Rhondda, the British food controller, who, from London on the 10th of April, cabled the Canada Food Board as follows:

> In these stern days it is inspiring to learn that Canada is tackling the food problem with redoubled energy. The terrific pressure on our military front makes it all the more imperative that those behind the lines should strain every nerve to defeat the enemy's avowed object of destroying the British Empire. Germany hoped first to starve the Old Country by the submarine campaign and then to smash her land forces. She has failed to starve us and she will fail to smash us but we cannot achieve victory without food. There never was a time when it was more needed. The Canadian farmer and the Canadian farm hand now have the opportunity to make an effective reply to the enemy's present onslaughts by bending their undivided energies to the increased production of those food supplies for which we depend to such vital extent on your great Dominion.

We also have our own Doctor Robertson, who has assured us that the world faces a food situation that is nothing short of appalling.

The increased dependence of our Allies, France, Italy and Belgium, upon us for food production is shown by the following facts: In France the average yearly production of wheat for the five years preceding the war was 317,000,000 bushels. In 1916, the production had fallen to no less than 214,000,000 bushels, and in 1917 the crop was estimated at 161,000,000 bushels. Likewise in Italy, the average pre-war production for five years amounted to 183,000,000 bushels. In 1916 this had dropped to 176,000,000 bushels, and in 1917 the estimate was 147,000,000 bushels. In Belgium the average pre-war production was almost 15,000,000 bushels. It fell in 1916 to almost 12,000,000 bushels. The estimate for 1917 only amounted to 9,000,000 bushels. The total reduction in those three countries amounted to over 198,000,000 bushels, representing a reduction from pre-war production of nearly thirty-eight per cent. In view of these facts Canada finds itself one of the most important factors, if not the most important factor, in the food situation. Supplies from Eastern Europe no longer exist. Supplies from Australia and Africa are too far away to be moved. As Lord Rhondda has said: What we ask from the United States and Canada we cannot procure elsewhere. As between ourselves and the United States we have a far larger exportable surplus of wheat than she has. In the past year our exportable wheat surplus amounted to 154,000,000 bushels, while the United States had only one-third of that amount. Canada is called upon to be a factor in saving the world which is face to face with starvation. Now, Mr. Speaker, you can see by this shortage that Canada and the United States are looked upon to save the situation. We have, in our great West, vast prairies and wheat land which can produce an immense quantity of all kinds of grain, if we can only get the help to cultivate those vast fields. We also have, in our own country, a large quantity of land not cultivated on account of shortage of labour, and if the Government takes away many of our boys, the situation will be still more serious.

The Government must be congratulated on the stand they have taken in removing the duty on tractors to assist in greater production. Should that increase production, as I am ready to admit it will, would it not have been wise, under the same Order in Council, to go further and absolutely eliminate all the duty from farm implements? No doubt there would have been some objections from manufacturers, but the Government could have called the measure a war-time measure and waved the old flag, and it might have passed without any serious objections being raised. Some years ago there were brought up in this House cases where manufacturers sold farm implements to dealers in the United States, paying the duty, and those dealers sold them back again to our western farmers, another duty being paid, and even then those implements were sold for less money than the price at which our dealers could sell them. Does any hon. member think that those manufacturers still require protection on the part of the Government? This is an opportune time, when the war is on, to remove the duty on farm implements altogether.

A pledge was made by members of this Government to the farmers of my county that the latter would not be taken from their farms, that the object of the compulsory service legislation was to get at the slackers in large cities, such as Montreal. The same statement was made by some clergymen on public platforms, and no doubt they had authority to make such statements. If not, they should have had authority before making such statements on public platforms. I believe the Government should be in a position to tell the farmers what they really intend to do. They should settle down to some kind of a policy whereby the people of this country will know what they have to do, and in that way the Government will prevent all this trouble that is now going on. They should call off many of the officers who are, without any reason, arresting young men. Judgment should be used, and when a young man is ready and willing to go he should not be taken as a criminal and locked up. All he asks is to be notified when he is wanted and where he has to report.

In my constituency, on the 16th of April, two young men were arrested; they were marched four miles down the track that evening and placed in jail. Two other young men, one only nineteen years of age, were asked to come to a village, and when they drove up with a team they were taken away from the team, not being allowed to drive the team home again, and put into jail. The next morning a man was taken from a field where he was working and also put into jail. He was not allowed even to go home and change his clothes. The men who were put into jail in the evening were taken out in the morning and given breakfast, and then they did not receive anything more to eat until night. They went without dinner. They had no chairs to sit down on, and there were no sanitary arrangements. They were locked up in one room, being treated worse than criminals. At night they were given supper and were again locked up. The Government should see that the proper men are authorized to bring these men wherever they want them. Everybody is willing to help to win the war, but what the young men want is to know when they are wanted and where they have to report. A letter with a three cent stamp on it would have brought any one of those young men wherever they were required to report. They were later on taken out of jail, and four or five officers took them to Sherbrooke or Quebec. It is no wonder riots occur in Quebec when young men are treated that way. It must have cost twenty or twenty-five dollars to round up each of these men. I did not intend to bring this matter up; but I have received letters from many of my electors requesting that this should be discussed in the House of Commons, and I hope nothing of the kind will happen again.

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, this debate has already continued to such a considerable length that it is not my desire to prolong it unduly; but a consideration of the Budget touches upon the national interests at so many points that I believe it provides a suitable opportunity for the discussion of national affairs as would be provided under possibly no other circumstances. While, Sir, it gives occasion for constructive criticism, and also perhaps criticism of the opposite kind, I may say that I do not propose to approach the questions which I shall briefly discuss from the point of view of party politics at all. I believe that to-day the people of this country are not particularly concerned with party politics. They are interested in the war. They are interested in the heavy financial responsibilities that they have to bear, and in all those things which result from the conduct of the war.

The national interests are to-day already so delicately balanced that it would be nothing short of criminal on the part of the members of this House to attempt to make this the occasion for the making of party capital or for the securing of any purely party advantage. We have arrived at the most critical stage of the war. Our financial responsibilities are extremely heavy, and the harmony which ought to exist, but which, unfortunately, does not exist amongst the members of the various races which go to make up this Dominion, deserves, to my mind, a different treatment from that which was accorded to it yesterday on the occasion of the speech delivered by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken).

It is true that nearly all of us on this side of the House differed and still differ from hon. gentlemen opposite on the question of conscription. It is not my intention or desire to re-thrash old straw. We were and are honestly opposed to conscription, and I believe we are right. I believe further that the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) showed the only statesmanlike course we should have pursued in that matter. Now the Act has been tried out, and since we have heard hon. members of the Government admitting it has been a failure and have amended the Act within the last two weeks, I think I am absolutely correct in saying the leader of the Opposition will not be required to await the verdict of history, but that he is vindicated already in the opinion of the majority of the people of this Dominion. While we cannot support the Government in all its measures—I think every member on this side should realize and does realize he has nevertheless a responsibility to his constituents, and that it is his duty to support whatever legislation may be brought down by the Union Government which is deserving of support. It is no less the duty of hon. members on this side of the House to offer suggestions and criticism, constructive wherever possible, and to do all they can to advance the interests of the people of this Dominion.

Those of us who are new members have observed the proceedings of this House with a great deal of interest, and particularly with a view to observing how the Union Government will reconcile in a practical way its protestations of democracy with the actions of the executive branch of Parliament, so far as it relates to the members of the House at large. I admit, as a new member, that we have a great deal to learn but after all the new members come here with certain very well defined convictions. Among these, first of all, is the duty we owe to our constituents; we must not forget that we should represent their views. Secondly, we have the conviction, just as strong, that the Cabinet owes a direct responsibility to and derives its powers from the members of this House, and through them, from the people of this country. Believing that, I have observed, if not with surprise, at least with considerable disquiet, the undoubted tendency of the Government to arrogate to themselves powers that I believe should never be surrendered by the members of the House of Commons. We have to-day, as has been stated by the right hon. leader of the Opposition, Government by Order in Council. I do not profess to have any great knowledge of constitutional history or practice, but I have always had the impression that the Cabinet of a democratic country was supposed to employ itself more in the way of administration, and that the legislative function belonged to the House of Commons, directly representing the people. I believe I am right when I say that to-day, to a grave degree, the Cabinet has usurped the legislative functions which ought to rest entirely with the House of Commons. While I should like to enlarge on that point, time does not permit, and I will pass on to the Budget itself.

It had been my intention if the Acting Minister of Finance were here, to congratulate him on the very clear and comprehensive address he made in presenting the Budget. But after hearing the speech of the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) I hesitate to do so, because he stated that the speech of the Acting Minister of Finance was really the speech of the Minister (Sir Thomas White). If that be true, I fear it will be a matter of considerable grief to the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) who told the House that it was the best Budget speech he had ever heard. If the speech was really the brain-child of the Minister of Finance, it would be " the most unkindest cut of all " for the hon. member for Victoria thus to compliment that best beloved friend of his, Sir Thomas White. However that may be, I am inclined to give credit to whom it is apparently due. The Acting Minister of Finance has the honour of pre enting what I think is the largest Budget ever presented in the Dominion of Canada. It is a billion dollar Budget. Four years ago, a Budget of this size would have been thought not only absolutely impossible, but entirely ruinous to the Dominion. To-day we are spending millions where formerly we were spending perhaps thousands, and conditions are such that we must go on. But I trust that in raising the money that is required we, the representatives of the people of Canada, will not ignore entirely the principle of financial conservation. To-day Canada is prosperous, and she is prosperous because we are living on borrowed money, and because of the abnormal conditions resulting from the war. But the reckoning will come, and with that in mind I am sure it will not be considered unpatriotic to be practical, or disloyal to count, in some measure at least, the cost. If ever a Government and if ever a Parliament had a tremendous responsibility, it is this Government and this Parliament. Economy must be the order of the day, and the members of this Parliament are justified in asking the Government itself to set an example. The hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Kennedy) the other day showed that even in the Finance Department there is room for improvement, and in his own humorous yet practical way he told how the Minister of Finance had squandered public money on "movies" in connection with the last Victory Loan. But after all, if we could tempt some other members of the Government to go into the "movies" and could be guaranteed the same results that accrued in the case of the Minister of Finance, who is now missing from the Government benches, it might not be altogether an unmixed evil. If, for example, we could have the hon. Minister of Labour pictured in the act of seizing those bloated capitalists, the three cobblers of Chatham, and with all the strength that animates the protector of the people shaking their ill-gotten wealth from the pockets of these three plutocrats, would it not be a tremendous object lesson for our Flavelles and others of that ilk, and show that this Government means business and is not to be trifled with?

The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), in his excellent speech the other evening, made an estimate of what he thought should be a sufficient annual expenditure in the years to come after the war. He summed it up as follows:

Expenditure on revenue account	$100,000,000
Pensions	15,000,000
Interest on debt	60,000,000
Sinking fund	15,000,000
Deficit on railways	10,000,000
Total	$200,000,000

While I have great respect for the opinion of the hon. member for Brome, I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I am not quite as much of an optimist as he appears to be. The expenditure on revenue account for the transaction of the ordinary affairs of this country was in the past year $120,000,000. I do not believe there has been a time in the history of Canada when the expenditures were ever reduced. They have been consistently increasing, and if I placed that account at $125,000,000 instead of $100,000,000, I believe it would be more nearly correct. A pension fund of $15,000,000, I believe, is entirely inadequate in the light of experience of other nations and I am of the opinion that it will be more nearly $50,000,000 a few years after the war ends. If we send over half a million of men to France, that amount averages only $100 per man. Interest on indebtedness he places at $60,000,000. Our indebtedness at the present time is about $1,300,000,000. It is not probable that the war will close before the lapse of at least one year. The expenditures in connection with the bringing home of the men will continue for a considerable time after that, and I think that I would not be overestimating if I stated that at the conclusion of the war it is altogether likely that our indebtedness will be at least two billion dollars. As we are borrowing money now at the rate of five and one-half to six per cent per annum, and as the last loan of $100,000,000 placed in the United States costs this country at the rate of nearly eight per cent, it seems to me that we must count on an interest charge of something like at least $100,000,000 after the war closes. The two other items, a sinking fund of $15,000,000, which would wipe out the capital expenditure in something over one hundred years, and the deficit on railways, I allow to stand. If then we take the figures as I have given them, and I believe there are good reasons for so doing, we must look forward to expenditures at the rate of $300,000,000 per annum.

There is one item here in regard to which I would like to make a suggestion, and that is the item of pensions. We have before us the example of the United States following the Civil War, sixty years ago. We know that the amount of the pensions in that country continued to increase for some fifty years after the conclusion of the war, and it is only a few years since they began to diminish. They constituted a heavy drain upon the resources of the United States, a much richer country than Canada. They have in that country at this time a new scheme which combines the advantage of a pension with that of the insurance of their men. It is worked out, I understand, in something of this fashion: If a young man aged twenty or twenty-one desires to insure for the sum of, say, $10,000, he can do it at very small cost—something like $6 or $7 per month. The Government itself conducts the insurance scheme and itself carries the additional risk which is imposed as the result of a man engaging in hazardous military service. After the war, the young man, if he desires to do so, can keep up the insurance by continuing the payment of the premiums. That scheme is intended to replace the old pension scheme formerly in force in the United States. It seems to me that it might very well be looked into, if it has not already been done, on the part of the Government.

To-day in Canada the matter of insurance of the men is left almost entirely in the hands of municipalities with results that are unfair and inequitable. In some towns and cities the men are insured for $500 or $1,000 as the case may be. In some other towns they are not insured. The point is that it is being left practically entirely to private or municipal initiative to insure the lives of the soldiers. Since conscription has been adopted, we find that in many instances municipalities can no longer carry the burden. I contend that, when the state takes men by compulsion to fight its battles overseas, it becomes the duty of that state not to place the responsibility of the insurance of the men on municipalities, but to assume that as a national obligation. The same holds good of the Patriotic Fund.

Where shall the Government obtain money to take care of these heavy expenditures? We have two great principles of taxation. One, which is generally applied in the municipal scheme of taxation, is based on the service rendered by the taxing power. It works fairly well in municipal government, but is not adapted to national administration. The other idea is based on the ability to pay, and in the final analysis the Government of Canada, I believe, will find it necessary to fall back on the principle of collecting its taxes from, and imposing its levies upon those who have the ability to pay. They must go and find the money where it is to be found. That brings me for a moment to the income tax. I am quite in accord with what the Acting Minister of Finance has done, in so far as the principle of the income tax is concerned, but I agree with almost every member who has already spoken, that he has not gone far enough. If a man enjoys an income of $10,000, there is no real sacrifice involved in making that man give to the State practically all that he receives above that figure. That is not unfair, because, after all, I contend that a man whose income is in excess of that, makes it because he is living in a country which gives him the opportunity of making that income, and in that case he may well give back to the country that which he has received from it.

I would not tax industry, or I would not tax it very heavily, because industry at the present time has a great deal to contend with. Our manufacturing industries, with the shortage of labour that exists, together with the high costs they have to meet, already find the burden a very heavy one to carry, and I, for one, would regret if the Government were to place too heavy a strain upon those industries. Let us leave them in such a condition that at the end of the war they will have sufficient resources to continue in the way to which they have been accustomed, because, after all, the future prosperity of Canada and her power to recuperate from the effects of the war will depend on the manufacturing industries and the farming industry as well.

There is one other point, Mr. Speaker, in that connection I would wish to make, and it is a criticism of at least one form of taxation which has been placed in the Budget; that is the tax that falls upon the poor man. I know it is the fashion to advocate the cause of the poor man, but I am not making the criticism with that object in view. One hon. gentleman stated yesterday that he approved of the taxes on tea, tobacco and matches, because the poor man would be made to feel that taxation. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the poor man already feels abundantly the burden imposed by this war—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. EULER:—and it is quite unnecessary to place any further burdens upon him to make him realize that to the full. We may speak as we like of the high wages that are earned by the workingmen in these days, but I want to say that the working people with their big families, and it is usually the workingman who has the big family, already have all that they humanly can do to make ends meet. I believe it was hardly worthy of the Government to place the taxes which they have placed upon tea, and the little luxuries that the workingmen have in the form of tobacco and matches. I would like to see those taxes cut off altogether when the Bill is considered in Committee, and provide for the raising of money from other sources which can very well afford to pay.

I am quite in accord with that provision of the Government's proposals which grants an exemption of $200 for every child under the age of sixteen. I thought that when the Acting Minister of Finance made that announcement he would receive most hearty commendation from my friends on this side of the House from the province of Quebec, where, we are told, the families are very large. In that connection I can remember a certain occasion, about a year and a half ago, in the city of Hamilton, when I had the honour and the pleasure of attending a meeting in connection with the Bonne Entente movement, which, by the way, has ended so suddenly and so unfortunately.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Godfrey's Tory speeches killed the Bonne Entente.

Mr. EULER: At that meeting I can remember the mayor of one of the cities of Quebec rather proudly acknowledged that he was the father of a family of twenty-five.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

Mr. EULER: I wish to ask the Acting Minister of Finance whether, in cases such as this, where the family is so large that the exemption of $200 per member of that family will wipe out the excess of income upon which that man might otherwise have to pay, the minister would not consent a bonus to those people.

I realize that I am, perhaps, trespassing on the arrangement made to confine the length of speeches to some twenty or thirty minutes, and therefore I shall endeavour to bring my remarks to a close very soon. There are just one or two further observations I would like to make.

With regard to the question of production, the ground has been very well covered, I think, and yet I believe the Government do not realize the gravity of the situation which they have created. Those of us who have been among our constituents during the last two weeks, have a very much more accurate conception of the feeling of discouragement and consternation, and the lack of confidence that to-day exists among the farmers of the province of Ontario. And when I read a few lines from a cablegram sent on April 13 to the Canada Food Board it seems almost the sheerest irony in view of the nature of legislation that has been placed upon the statute book in the form of amendments to the Military Service Act:

"In these stern days it is inspiring to learn that Canada is tackling the food problem with redoubled energy.

"We cannot achieve victory without food. There never was a time when it was more needed. The Canadian farmer and the Canadian farmhand now have the opportunity to make an effective reply to the enemy's present onslaughts by bending their undivided energies to the increased production of those food supplies for which we depend to such vital extent upon your great Dominion."

That cablegram was sent by Lord Rhondda, Food Controller of Great Britain. The member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) the other day made reference to what he called a "vicious circle." I believe that the legislation that the Government have passed in conscripting the farmer will result in another vicious circle: No men on the farms, no food, and ultimately, if there be no food, there will be no men.

I was going to comment, Mr. Speaker, on another phase of the subject, which has already been touched upon, and with which I will deal very briefly. I was somewhat surprised yesterday when the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) gloried in the fact that the pledge given to the farmers had been violated. I hope, Sir, I am no Pharisee, but it is difficult for me—as I am sure it is for many other members of the House, some of whom sit on the other side, if they speak their convictions—to understand the mental attitude that permits any man, or any responsible body of men, to violate a solemn promise given to the farmers of this country. As the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Ross) stated the other day in the House, a pledge is a pledge. In my opinion a pledge can be obviated only by the consent of those to whom it was given. The Government urge military necessities as the ground for their action. Those military necessities may be very great, but that was the doctrine that was invoked in another case, to which I need not refer, at the beginning of the war, and which doctrine meets with the condemnation of the whole civilized world.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. EULER: I trust, Sir, that we have not adopted the vicious doctrine that "the end justifies the means."

I have not noticed in the speech of the Acting Minister of Finance any reference to the claims of the letter carriers of Canada. I do not know what the intentions of the Government are with respect to this deserving class of Government employees, but I read in the press a few days ago that it was proposed to give them some recognition in the form of increased remuneration.

I believe the Government would be justified in giving to these men a very substantial increase in pay. Their work is difficult and responsible, and they have not been paid in accordance with their needs. While I say that, I would also make a plea on behalf of the country postmasters, and the men who are in the service of the Government driving vehicles on the rural routes, whose case, I believe, is just as good as that of the letter-carriers. While we should exercise economy, the people should not forget that the labourer is worthy of his hire.

One thing more, Mr. Speaker, and I am through. We are told that it is desirable that this House should adjourn to give opportunity for the Prime Minister, the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell), and, I believe, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen), to proceed overseas to confer with the representatives of the Imperial Government and of the other Dominions. While I do not begrudge the trip, to the President of the Council,—and I would like to remind the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) that this time the President of the Council will go at the expense of the Government—and while I believe that the Minister of the Interior is well worthy of any consideration, because we have been told, and I believe it is true, that during the last session at least he was the hardest worked member of the Government, it seems to me that if the consultation pertains to the carrying on of the war the Minister of Militia (Mr. Mewburn) and the Minister of the Naval Service (Mr. Ballantyne) should rather be members of that delegation.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. EULER: Some one near me mentions also the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) and I might say that that is a good suggestion. We have an Overseas Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp) and it would be quite in the interests of the country if the two Ministers of Militia were able to get together once in a while to compare notes. The Minister of the Naval Service in presenting his estimates, I can say without flattery, earned the approbation of members on this side of the House. He handled his work and his figures not only courteously but in the most businesslike way, and with great ability. His department has in charge a work of great consequence to the people of Canada, the construction of ships, which, in itself, is a large factor in connection with the war. It seems to me that these two ministers, in any conference pertaining to the war, might very well accompany the Prime Minister across the sea.

Now, Sir, a last word. We know there are members on the other side of the House who are not altogether in accord with some of the actions of the Government. We know that is the case in connection with the exemption of the farmers, we know that they desire free implements, and they are setting that desire aside for the time being in the interest, as they say, of the winning of the war. We know that they do not altogether agree with the recent increase in freight rates. But we have the disappointing experience, and the disappointing spectacle of having the protests on the part of these gentlemen made, not in the House where such protests count, but in the corridors of this House and in the Committee on Agriculture. Let me say that so far as I am concerned, and with all due deference to my right hon. leader I propose to exercise a very considerable degree of independence. We have been told that the Union Government created the opportunity for the exercise of a measure of independence by members on that side such as never existed before. For my part, so far I have failed to see it in a practical way, or in any way that counts. I would say to these gentlemen—and I do not know that it is quite fitting that any advice of this kind should come from a humble back-bencher, a man new to this House—that it is their duty to represent their constituents, that we should all realize that, after all, the Cabinet, the Government, the executive power, should be the servant, not the master, of this Parliament; and that these members will find if they do follow their convictions that they will maintain not only their own self respect but they will not in any way prejudice the winning of the war.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères): Mr. Speaker, I listened very attentively on Tuesday of last week to the most interesting address of the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) also to the speeches made by the various members in the course of this debate. It is not my intention to pick holes in the Budget or to make a long speech at this stage but simply to draw attention to certain sides of the question which might be of some interest.

Last year, when the healthy, but now convalescent, Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) introduced the income tax measure an article appeared in a newspaper in Montreal on July 31, 1917, of which the following is a translation:

> Nobody will pretend that the father of eight or ten young children can easily take away from a salary or income of three or four thousand dollars, the same amount that the head of the traditional American or Ontarian family, composed of Monsieur, Madame and Toutou the favourite dog, will be able to do with the same salary.

From the moment we admit the principle of exemption in ratio of family responsibility it should be applied with method and economy.

It would be much better to reduce by half the initial margin of exemption, and fix the first degree of taxation at $2,000 and exempt each individual in the ratio of the number of persons he has in charge. A married man would pay a tax if his income is $2,000, he would pay on $2,250 if he has a child, on $2,500 if he has two, and so on. If the objection is that it is too complicated I answer that it is of the nature of the income tax There will be fewer false reports from the honest fathers of large families than from the wealthy business men and their wives who have already conspired to defraud the divine and human laws in holding down the number of their children.

That article appeared in Le Devoir, and its author is Henri Bourassa. When the Acting Minister of Finance introduced this year an amendment to the income tax, not only as suggested by that article, but copied from it, I was at sea to understand why a certain organization well known to everybody in this House, and sitting on your right, Mr. Speaker, did not rise as a body to protest vigorously against adopting even suggestions from the enemy. I thought perhaps the old alliance of the Conservatives and the Nationalists was not dead yet. Anyway, the adoption by the Government of such a suggestion shows that there is a little bit of good even in a bad man. I congratulate the Acting Minister of Finance on the amendment; it is tardy justice, but it is justice. But I do not believe that the amendment goes far enough. If we admit the principle that taxation should be imposed in proportion to the number of a man's dependents, why not extend the principle to bachelors and widowers with dependents? The married couple without children are not asked to pay any tax if their income does not reach $2,000 a year, while the bachelor with parents and relatives to support must pay a tax if his income is only $1,000. I express my earnest hope that when the House goes into committee on the proposals of the Acting Finance Minister, the Government will find a way to make the same provision respecting income tax on bachelors with dependents as they have made with respect to married men.

With regard to the exemption from income tax of amounts subscribed to patriotic funds, I may point out that there are other charities besides the Red Cross Fund and the Patriotic Fund which, if not as spectacular as these, are as deserving and are giving assistance to the poor and destitute, modestly but effectively, without any display or advertisement. I do not see why contributions to such charities should not be exempted from taxation as are contributions to the Red Cross and Patriotic Funds.

The Acting Minister of Finance referred to the last Victory Loan. Although I have not had much parliamentary experience, I may venture to give a little advice to the minister with regard to the next loan campaign and to warn him that the unfair and outrageous use of the Victory Loan campaign for the success of the Union Government has probably put in jeopardy the success of other loans in the province of Quebec. While the leader of the Opposition and the Premier of Quebec joined in stirring appeals to their compatriots to subscribe to the loan, and while their appeals were used to advertise the campaign in Quebec, in every English-speaking province—even in English papers in Montreal—the success of the loan was heralded and played to the limit, unscrupulously, and unfairly, to foster the interests of the Unionist campaign. Let me first read to you the stirring appeal of the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and Sir Lomer Gouin, published in the French papers; I shall give my own translation. In La Presse of November 20 there were displayed pictures of the leader of the Opposition and of Sir Lomer Gouin. I quote the following:

Let us follow the advice of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Lomer Gouin for the good of the province and the whole of Canada.

Then followed this letter from Sir Wilfrid Laurier to Sir Thomas White:

Dear Sir Thomas White:

I am happy to join my voice to yours to recommend to the people of Canada the loan you are placing on the market. You are appealing not only to the business sense, but to the patriotism of the country, and I hope the answer will be spontaneous, universal and enthusiastic, because from all points of view it is preferable that we should borrow at home instead of in a foreign market. I particularly approve of your intention to appeal to this class of the public who does not generally place money in the public treasury. Everyone can bring their contributions, everyone, even the humblest. Their contribution will find their place on the altar of a grateful country.

In his speech on November 12, Sir Lomer Gouin said that the Government had the right to expect more than $150,000,000. He continued:

England has spent more than $1,000,000,000 in Canada since the beginning of the war.

Every farmer, every manufacturer, every clerk, should subscribe their savings, and if they have none, tell them to economize and save in order to invest in this loan.

After using this appeal it seems to me that it would be only common decency and good manners not to use the Victory Loan as a political step-ladder. What happened? The Montreal Star did not wait until the last day before the election, but on December 4, shortly after the conclusion of the Victory Loan campaign, under the caption "Well Done Canada," published a cartoon showing a soldier with fixed bayonet addressing the Kaiser in the following words:

Put that in your pipe and smoke it—and on the 17th we will blast another of your hopes and give a Union victory to smoke with it.

On the same day an editorial appeared in the Star, from which I quote the following:

The Canadian people themselves have shown the measure of their concern in the war. Asked for a war loan of $150,000,000, they have given $401,530,100. Canada has begun to march to the relief of the heroic lads in France. The Victory Loan result is a prelude to the certain election of Union Government and the forwarding of new troops to help win the war.

These articles appeared not only in the papers of Montreal, where they could be contradicted; where we could go before the people and proclaim their truth or falsehood, but in Ontario as well. I quote from the Toronto Daily News of December 6:

If Laurier and Bourassa were returned to power French Canada would have the spending of $400,000,000 contributed by English-speaking Canada. Is French Canada, which contributed 5 per cent of the Victory Loan to spend the 95 per cent subscribed by English-speaking Canadiens? Do the English-speaking Canadians who contributed 95 per cent of the Victory Loan wish the $415,000,000 to be spent by Laurier, Bourassa and their corrupt associates? Do English-speaking Canadians who have just raised $400,000,000 for war purposes wish that vast sum to be spent by the corruptionists of Quebec for the enrichment of a province which has done little in the war? Are 2,200,000 French Canadians to spend the $400,000,000 subscribed by 5,000,000 English-speaking Canadians?

And this is not all. On December 15, 1917, another Ontario paper said this:

Six hundred thousand Canadians have subscribed $401,000,000 for the further prosecution of the war to victory.

The spending of this vast sum of money will pass into the hands of a man almost 80 years of age, if Union Government is defeated.

This aged man is under the thumb of Quebec. He has turned against Canada's solemn pledges to the influences of the French Canadian province.

The control and direction of this four hundred million dollars will really, therefore, pass into the hands of the anti-British Lemieux-Bourassa-Lavergne group.

Quebec has not contributed to this fund. She has given neither men nor money in any proportion. On the contrary she has even violently attacked soldiers and members of the war Government.

A vote against a Union Government candidate is hence a vote to take Canada out of the war and to give nearly half a billion dollars to the French-Canadian separatists with which to thoroughly establish a French Canadian regime at Ottawa.

I could take up all the morning citing articles of that kind—slanderous and insidious falsehoods and ramblings. I submit most seriously to the Acting Minister of Finance that if he does not desire to make a complete failure of the next Victory Loan campaign in the province of Quebec he will have to devise some means of muzzling his dogs. How could you expect the province to subscribe largely to such a loan when its success was used for political purposes?

This Budget calls for a larger amount of money than has been required in any previous year of our history—more than we ever dreamed of. The people will cheerfully impose upon themselves new sacrifices for the triumph of civilization, but under certain conditions: First, that the Government wage a merciless war on food profiteers; second, that the means of producing more food be not taken from the people. Our motto should be: Get rid of the food profiteers and encourage the food producers. It is not my intention to discuss the dismissal of Mr. W. F. O'Connor; I hope that the Government will set apart a day this session when we may bring out exactly what took place on the occasion of that dismissal. The big interests and the profiteers have been after this faithful and fearless servant of the public for a long time; they were bound to get him. For over two years Commissioner O'Connor had done most effective work—a war work—in exposing the outrageous practices of food spoilers. In this connection an Ontario newspaper said :

When Mr. O'Connor took charge of the office the profiteers were up to the arm-pits and over. They were wallowing in their work as a hog wallows in his wash. But to compare these men with the pig is to inflict an injustice on the pig, who would really serve in the capacity of a benefactor of mankind if the people who control its destiny did not want to make so much out of the mere handling of its carcass.

Mr. O'Connor had done good work. He had exposed the great losses sustained by the unsuspecting people who were led to believe that the prices of these commodities were rising because of their great scarcity. He was the Nemesis of the profiteer. But everybody knows that he was practically forced to resign. Charge after charge followed in his reports, but despite all this he had to resign; the situation made it impossible for him to carry on his work successfully. Who possesses the power to minimize the effective work of the food investigator? This is a proper question to ask and I hope the Government will answer it. But Mr. Speaker, the resignation of Mr. O'Connor did not come to me as an extraordinary shock, because at the beginning of the session, when the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) brought down his estimates he gave the House a foretaste of his policy. The hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) was questioning the Minister of Labour about the prehistoric chickens of Winnipeg, and the minister replied—(page 212 of Unrevised Hansard):

> As soon as I heard of the chickens that had spoiled in cold storage in Winnipeg, I wired the manager of that concern, and he referred my wire to the head office in Toronto, who wrote me at once concerning the matter. A few days later I got an explanation from the manager of the concern in Winnipeg, which satisfied me there was no intention of wrongdoing.

I was told before I came to this House that I should expect some surprises from the Minister of Labour—and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I got a surprise at the start.

Why, the people of this country are buckling their belts tighter and tighter every day. While the Government is asking the people to economize and conserve food for the Allies, profiteers and food hoarders like the William Davies Company when caught in the act—and not their first offence—are allowed to go scot-free by simply writing a letter that tickles the ear of the Minister of Labour. I had always thought that we, the representatives of the people, had something to say in these matters, and may I add these people would not have got off so easily if their explanation had reached this House instead of the well-seasoned and trained ear of the Minister of Labour. We might have been more suspicious of this wonderful hypnotic letter which so easily convinced the minister.

I said that the second condition required by the people of this country to accept cheerfully the pecuniary sacrifices involved in the Budget, and a condition essential to winning the war and avoiding famine, is the maximum production of food. Everyone admits that, so I will not take the time of the House in demonstrating it. I might, however, remark that when we on this side of the House were urging this fact during the last election we were accused of disloyalty and called traitors. The great economists of the world—David F. Houston, secretary of the Department of Agriculture of the United States, Prof. Arthur Richmond Marsh, Director of the Economic World, Mr. Boret, president of the French Commission of Agriculture, Sir George Paish, Mr. Prothero, Daniel Bellet, Georges Blondel, Victor Cambon, Edward Lyall Fox, Austin Harrison—all agree that famine is at our door. We are now facing a crisis, and it is imperative that production be increased. Remember, Mr. Speaker, the plough will be the gun that will fire the last shot in this war. Appeals for greater production have frequently been made by the Canada Food Board in their bulletins. That appeal is made on practically every page of the Bulletin of February 23, 1918. I am glad to say that the province from which I come is doing wonderful work in that respect. All authorities in the province are bending their energies to that end. The Chief Justice of the Court of Appeal of the province of Quebec, Sir Horace Archambault, appealed to the people of the province through the newspapers. Archbishop Bruchesi has also made an appeal to the people of Quebec, and if I were not afraid of scandalizing some of my friends opposite I would read what he said. However, I do not see present the hon. gentleman who would be scandalized, so I will read his letter, which was read in every church of the province of Quebec on Ash Wednesday:

> At the present time, other voices than her's (the Church's) imperious in their demand for the practice of abstinence and economy, have been heard. These are the voices of governments dismayed by the disastrous consequences of the war, and who foresee perhaps the awful spectre of a universal famine.
> Appeals are becoming more urgent day by day. We must, it is said, come to the aid of our soldiers by sending to them the food which they ask for. The most urgent question of the day is the question of assistance. We must look forward to the eventualities of the future; let us therefore economize; let superfluity be banished from our tables; deprive ourselves every day of some bread and some meat. In certain quarters leagues are formed. Citizens are asked with insistence to sign cards pledging themselves to conform to these measures called economical, but which are, after all, real measures for the practice of penance.
> Restaurants and hotels must abide by laws of privation, the infraction of which entails severe fines. These rigorous rules, these pressing recommendations, are inspired by sympathy towards our brothers, by public interest and the fear of evils ever menacing us.

What is solicited or prescribed by the stress of circumstances and for merely human motives, although praiseworthy and legitimate in themselves, let us continue to do for the supernatural motives recorded in the Gospel, and recalled to our mind by the Church.

This doctrine is for all times; it should especially be understood and accepted during days of suffering and mourning such as those we are now traversing. How can we give ourselves up to pleasure, how can we speak of banquets and worldly feasts, when we think of the thousands of men, women and children who lament and weep, without food or shelter, submitted to all the sadness of a cruel exile; and above all, when we think of those poor soldiers agonizing in the hospitals or dying on the field of battle.

I think every one in this House will say that that is the kind of appeal that should be made to our people. I think it was a splendid effort on the part of the head of the church in Montreal. But it is not only the ecclesiastical authorities in the province of Quebec that have made these appeals. Mr. J. A. Grenier, Deputy Minister of Agriculture of the province of Quebec, made the following special appeal:

Our first step was to organize an educational campaign. For lecture purposes the Province was divided into twenty-five districts. In each of these districts we placed two lecturers, one an experienced agricultural attached to the Provincial Department of Agriculture and the other a practical farmer. These men were made responsible for visiting every parish in their respective districts, and at the present time nine-tenths of the parishes, both French and English, have been covered in this way. The staff of Macdonald College have helped in our campaign in certain constituencies and have given much information to the agronomists of these districts.

We are supplementing this series of lectures by publicity in the Journal d'Agriculture and other newspapers, and also by circulars addressed to the parish priests, mayors, postmasters, bank managers, railway station agents, and others. The first circular letter addressed to the parish priests was read in the churches. The letter to the mayors is being sent out and the others will be issued from month to month in order to maintain the interest of the public.

Up to the present time we have purchased 540 choice sows, which will be distributed in the spring. We are making arrangements with the abattoirs for the purchase of an additional number. The Department has bought several car-loads of shorts which will be sold to the farmers. We are also planning to buy corn as soon as supplies are available.

We are awaiting the decision of the banks upon the question of exhibition of hogs. At these exhibitions entries will be received from young people, the object being to organize our own hog contests. We are counting upon an increase of 20 per cent in the number of hogs this year over normal production if the province can obtain a sufficient quantity of feed.

The Federal Department of Agriculture has assured us that the province of Quebec will receive the necessary seed wheat to cultivate 700,000 acres and to produce 12,000,000 bushels of wheat, which would be enough to provide for the consumption in this province. As this wheat is sold only in car-load lots, we have made arrangements with the more important co-operative societies to provide seed wheat in small quantities in localities where the farmers are not able to buy a whole car load. The Agronomists and Agricultural Societies, and agricultural circles are taking orders at the present time. We have good hopes of being able to treble our normal production of wheat this year.

We have taken the necesary steps to ensure to the farmers seed peas and beans to meet all their requirements. We are confident that the production of these two products will be double the normal crops.

Here is a short article in the Canada Food Bulletin reporting the pledge card campaign in Quebec:

Quebec Pledge Campaign.

Splendid meetings have been held and card canvass is going well.

The pledge card campaign in Quebec is going well. Splendid meetings have been held under the auspices of Chief Justice Lemieux, Hon. Mr. Caron, Minister of Agriculture, and Hon. Mr. Chapais, a member of the Legislative Council. The first housewife in Quebec to sign the card was the Mayoress, Mrs. Lavigueur, and the second was the President of the Housewives' League, Mrs. Tanguay.

We are not confining ourselves to appeals or preaching, but we are also getting results. Let me compare the agricultural production in Quebec in 1916 with that of 1917. The figures are:

Sheep	497,711	849,148
Pigs	531,303	712,087
Cows	639,805	911,023
Other cattle	535,693	958,010
	Bushels.	Bushels.
Wheat	960,000	3,883,600
Oats	24,411,000	32,466,200
Barley	1,456,000	3,063,600
Peas	302,000	797,500
Beans	78,000	827,400
Buckwheat	1,919,000	2,699,000
Potatoes	14,672,000	18,158,000
Turnips	2,650,000	15,759,000

I take these figures from the Journal of Agriculture of the province of Quebec dated February 15, 1918. But when we are asked to produce food and when we are bending our efforts towards that end, we are stunned by the announcement of an Order in Council passed by this Government calling off the exemptions from military service of men between the ages of twenty and twenty-two inclusive who are engaged in agricultural production. This was followed by voting down an amendment proposed in this House exempting farmers. This amendment was voted down on the 19th of this month, and the Canadian Food Bulletin of the month of March, issued by authority of the Government, stated that we were short 118,500 farmers. The publication in question, at page 5 of its issue of 7th of March, 1918, states that the shortage of farm hands in Alberta was 13,000, in Saskatchewan 25,000, in Manitoba 17,000, in Ontario 35,000, in Quebec many thousands, in New Brunswick 2,000, in Prince Edward Island 500, and in Nova Scotia 2,500. Assuming a comparative proportion for the province of Quebec I might put the shortage there at 20,000, which makes a total shortage, as stated, of 118,500. What will be the result of this policy? It will mean that we will miss our best opportunity to help the Allies. It will mean that if the Allies lose the war on account of the food shortage, the Government, whose short-sighted policy has always been to render not the most effective but the most spectacular aid, will be partly responsible.

At one o'clock the House rose.

The House resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: (Resuming). Mr. Speaker, when the House rose I was trying to impress upon hon. gentlemen the absurd and illogical reasoning of the Government in refusing to exempt farmers from military service, while at the same time declaring in an official publication, the Canadian Food Bulletin, that there was a shortage of 118,500 farm hands this spring. By this short-sighted policy we are missing the opportunity to render effective aid to the Allies and are running along the road to suicide at a tremendous pace. You may open the newspapers every day, Mr. Speaker, and find advertisements by farmers offering to sell their land because they cannot get help. Delegations from every province, except perhaps Quebec, are pouring into this House protesting against the folly of such an enactment. Meetings of protestation are being held everywhere from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Why is the province of Quebec not protesting so strongly, why are there practically no delegations from that province? The reason is very simple. The people of ny province were prepared long ago for the reversal of the promises of this Government. When the candidates of the Union Government in my province told the farmers that they would be exempted the electors did not believe them, and they are not surprised at what has happened now. But the electors of the other provinces, whose votes the Government obtained under false pretenses, are beginning to realize the hollow ness of its promises; they know how the Government got their vote. On December 3 last, fifteen days before the election, an Order in Council was passed exempting farmers, and on the following day a message from the Government appeared in the press announcing that even those farmers who had already been drafted could apply to the Minister of Militia and be returned to their farms. On December 7 a case was submitted to the Central Appeal judge, that of Mr. Rowntree, and the judgment was that a person who is habitually and effectively engaged in labour essential to the production of food should not be conscripted. Why, there was a paper published in Montreal, which lived only during the campaign, called Le Vrai Patriot—the True Patriot—in which appears an article which I have translated as follows:

The Central Appeal Judge has rendered a decision in favour of the exemption of farmers' sons, which the Liberal press does not acknowledge. In order to maintain the Military effort of the allies, it is essential that Canada should not lessen its agricultural production.

Farm hands are not superabundant in the country, they are rather insufficient.

Here are two important principles enunciated by Judge Duff, who constitutes the central appeal tribunal under the military law, on an appeal from the judgment of an exemption tribunal, which had refused an exemption asked by a farmer. The exemption of the farmer was immediately granted.

The decision in this test case will bring happiness to all the farmers of Canada.

A short-lived happiness, Mr. Speaker, after the last announcement.

It will reassure them not only for the present, but for the future.

A future which ended last week or two weeks ago.

Their status has been fixed on a definite unequivocal question. By this decision the farm hands will not be taken away from their work, no matter how hard pressed, we may be by our participation in the war.

The national interests and the Allies interests are served by the farmers continuing to work on the land. Although the law theoretically does not exempt them from military service, it does exempt them practically.

Here is assuredly something that will disappoint the poor Liberals, who were so happy in trying to convince the farmers that they would not escape military service. This judgment of Judge Duff will fall on them with much more vigour than a sunstroke. Any way, these good Liberals never thought for one moment that the farmers would come under the law. They knew that the intention of the government was to exempt all farmers and all farm hands.

This article is from a paper published by the Unionist organization in Montreal. I find on the third page portraits of the hon. Mr. Sevigny, the hon. Mr. Blondin, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), the ex-vice-president of this House, Mr. Rainville, all good supporters of the Unionist party, as well as portraits of all the candidates endorsed by the Union Government in the province of Quebec. And talking about the ex-vice-president of this House, here is a letter which was sent to every farmer in my constituency by Mr. J. H. Rainville, my opponent in the last election, I will translate.

Dear Sir,

I am pleased to inform you that the regulations of the military law exempt the bona fide farmers—

It will be observed that he went further than the election paper to which I have referred, and further than the Order in Council.

—exempt the bona fide farmers, their families and industrials. I have at last succeeded in winning this point, and it is only justice. You can, then, send without any fear your sons to the tribunals. Special instructions have been given to that effect.

I hope that the farmers will do all they can to ensure greater production of all that is necessary to feed the population.

With the assurance of my best wishes, believe me,

Yours very truly,

(Sgd.) J. H. Rainville.

But that is not all. In order to get the vote of the farmers, which was slipping away at that time, the whole of the Unionist Press, in elaborate articles, insisted that the Military Service Act did not threaten them; that they would remain on their farms—and similar arguments were addressed to those engaged in national industries. In its issue of August 30, the Montreal Star, referring to the Military Service Act, said:

It is merely a scheme for raising a definite number of new recruits—one hundred thousand. This is less than one-fourth as many as we have raised already. It proposes to raise these recruits among the young men in the community who have no domestic responsiblities and who are not usefully employed in war-winning work. It will take only young men who should have gone long ago or who have not before reached military age.

It is, in short, a scheme of selective recruiting.

If the recruiting officers had continued to get volunteers in sufficient numbers, this Act probably would not have been proposed. But the country would have suffered. Voluntary recruiting—as we now know in Canada and as they learned even more bitterly in Britain—is a wasteful and mischievous way to get men. The working men volunteer very often. That is, a man who is needed for some essential war-work at home offers to go; and he is taken. In Britain, they were compelled to weed tens of thousands of these skilled workers out of the army in France and bring them back to the factory, the foundry and the farm. If these skilled workers had properly known their own value, they would have known that they had no business to volunteer. For them to volunteer was to desert. But they could not know. That is a matter for the expert organizers of war services. So these expert organizers got a law in Britain which enabled them to simply tap the right young man on the shoulder and say—"You go"—and shake a prohibitive finger at the wrong young man and say—"You stay."

Not only did the Star make these assertions on its editorial page, but papers generally from other provinces were full of similar messages. On December 4 the following article appeared in the Star:

The Military Service Act will be no hardship to Alberta farmers. A short time ago H. W. Wood, President of the United Farmers of Alberta, representing 150,000 farmers, issued an interview to the press stating that it was most unwise of the Government to rob the farms of the producers, for military service, and stop the production of food for the Allies. On hearing of Premier Borden's anouncement and on receipt of a letter from the military registrar, Mr. Wood has decided that the Military Service Act will not impose any hardships on the farmers of Alberta, pointing out that appeal can be made by all farmers against decisions of tribunals and arguing them to take action in accordance with the modified Government regulations to get exemptions.

On the same page, the Star says:

Ontario has 82 seats and Unionists are confident of carrying 70 of them. That there has been some unrest in the rural parts owing to the anomalies in the ruling of exemption tribunals is not questioned, but the steps taken by the Government a few days ago to ensure that a bona fide agriculturist will not be interfered with neutralize effectively any adverse tendency.

What were the papers of the other provinces saying? I read in the Toronto World of December 10 the following:

General Mewburn announces that all farmers coming within Class A called out for military service under the provisions of the Military Service Act who are actually employed on a farm in the production of foodstuffs for Canada and her Allies, and whose services are necessary in the work of such farm, will be exempted from military service. If such a farmer is drafted in the army General Mewburn feels that it will be his duty to relieve him from military service on the condition that he returns to the farm and continues to be so employed.

The Canadian Thresherman and Farmer, of Winnipeg, dealt with this subject under such heads as the following: "Vote for Union Government," "Agriculture, Canada's prime industry, must carry on, unchecked by the draft." "Farmers' sons needed on land." "Sir Robert Borden's guarantees." "General Mewburn's explicit statement in regard to the sons of farmers needed on the home farm." "Necessity of selective draft." This paper says:

Class A men will suffice, and will be placed where they can give most value to Canada and the cause, whether in the ranks, on the land, or in the factory.

No reasons have been brought forward for the changing of the law; the Government is simply going back on its word. Before the election I was against the Military Service Act; I conscientiously believed that we could give better aid to the Allies and to our own country by continuing the system of voluntary recruiting, by encouraging shipbuilding and by increasing food production. I am still against this law; I conscientiously believe that it is a failure, and, if it were possible to do so, by constitutional means, I would repeal it for the sake of harmony and unity. But I have always been a law-abiding citizen, and when this Act became law I held meetings in my constituency explaining the Act and urging my fellow-citizens to obey it and register. Other hon. members on this side of the House did the same thing. The result was that the province of Quebec had the highest percentage of registrations. Nevertheless, I must confess that the last Order in Council, abolishing exemptions for a certain class of men, is mere national suicide and will not help to win the war. It will reduce production and create, throughout this country, a feeling of unrest.

I must apologize for having taken up so much of the time of the House, but I felt it was my duty to-day to explain my opinions frankly, without prejudice, in accordance with the dictates of my conscience and to the best of my ability. I believe I am expressing the sentiments of hon. members on this side of the House when I state that, since the beginning of this session, we have felt there has been a distinct effort on both sides to bring harmony between the two great races comprising this Dominion. It is true, a few hon. members on your right, Sir, have to have their unavoidable attacks of nettle rash after a bad digestion. Some of them will never take a polish. Even for the sake of unity, they will not stop their ramblings; but, thank God, they are the minority, and the true Canadians on your right are just as sick as we are of their exaggerated expressions. Let me, in conclusion, read a short article, published in the Toronto Saturday Night of the 27th of April, 1918, regarding one of those hon. members who do not stop attacking the province of Quebec:

> The present session of the House of Commons cannot wind up any too soon to suit the average intelligent Canadian, and last week we noted with pleasure that thereafter Government business was to have the preference. This, it is to be hoped, will give the Administration more control over the debates of the House, and the public will be spared some of the imbecile and mischievous oratory which has marked the discussion of almost every question that has come before the Commons this session.
> Of all the speeches, perhaps the most mischievous was that of Mr. Clements, of Comax-Alberni, B.C., who went so far as to propose that 50,000 or 75,000 French Canadians be carried away from Quebec and forced to work in the forests of British Columbia. It is nothing short of damnable that such a proposal should be made on the floor of Parliament in times like these. Everywhere, the Prussian policy of forcibly conveying Belgians into the heart of Germany to do war work has been denounced; yet Mr. Clements has the coolness to propose that we adopt the same course toward a group of fellow Canadians. He added insult to injury by stating that this policy would make better citizens of its victims, which is a good deal like the German boast that it will make better citizens of the Belgians to place them under the yoke of German "kultur."

To this school of thinkers we shall say that on this side we are well able to tell them what we think of them, and I can assure you, Sir, that our opinion of them is a hundred times worse than their opinion of us. But we keep ourselves under control for the sake of harmony and unity. We understand in a practical and patriotic way that we are at war. To the others—and they are the majority—we are glad to say that, through their behaviour and their evident disgust of these intolerant and ill-natured attacks, we foresee the near return of the bonne entente, the harmony, union and prosperity which will make of this Canada of ours a better place to live in, a better place to thrive in and a better country to fight for.

Mr. J. E. O. GLADU (Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, the debate which has taken place in this House has so far, I think, produced the very desirable results called for by that article which my hon. friend (Mr. Archambault) has just quoted from the Toronto Saturday Night. It is true that, in the first part of this debate, very harsh expressions were hurled from one side of the House to the other. It seems now, Sir, that such attacks have practically ceased, and that the members of this House, representing the people of this country, have come to the conclusion that, after all, there is something more important than insulting French Canadians or English Canadians.

There is now, I think, a feeling that we must treat every question as Canadians, independently of creed and nationality. I was especially impressed in that way when I heard yesterday afternoon and evening the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken). I frankly admit that I was under the impression that the hon. gentleman could not be characterized other than as being a kind of fire-eater. Yesterday, he was exceptionally moderate, and I wish to congratulate him. No one would think that the hon. member for West Toronto is the same gentleman who, a few years ago, was anxious to fight over again the battle of the Boyne, on the boundary line between the two provinces of Quebec and Ontario. I think, and I hope, he has dropped that feeling for all time. If the hon gentleman continues to treat this question of the province of Quebec in the Orange Sentinel as he has done in the past, and if he spoke yesterday his sincere convictions, then we must believe that there are in the hon. gentleman two personalities, one spreading oil on the fire in Toronto, to make it burn more viciously, and the other spreading oil on the troubled waters in the House of Commons, to quieten and calm the storm. Let us hope that the new light he shed here yesterday, may dispel the gloom of his harsh attitude towards Quebec which for so long has overshadowed him.

I shall not refer to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. W. A. Clarke) who last night thought it was his duty to distribute the insults which we in the province of Quebec are accustomed to receive as our daily bread from certain of our evil disposed fellow countrymen.

The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) in his remarks yesterday said, "The people of Ontario are especially sensitive about loyalty to the Mother Country." Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the people not only of Ontario but of the whole Dominion are sensitive about that, and I hope we have heard for the last time in this House that any one province is especially sensitive about loyalty. My conversion to loyalty is perhaps not so recent as the conversion of the hon. member for West Toronto to moderation in his sentiments. If I may be permitted, I should like to quote two extracts from speeches which were delivered in the province of Quebec, not a week ago, not a month ago, but two years ago, at a time when we in the province of Quebec were being accused by practically the whole English press of the country of disloyalty to the British Empire. I must first apologize for quoting from myself, but it will show our friends on the other side of the House, especially those to whom French Canadians have been represented as anti-patriotic and anti-English, what kind of gospel we Liberals have been preaching, not only on the floor of this House, but in the city of Montreal when the time came to tell our fellow-citizens what was their duty. The extract is rather long, but I quote it to give an exact impression of what we think and have been preaching in the province of Quebec. Addressing the Young Liberals of the city of Montreal two years ago I said:

Gentlemen,—There is not at this moment one single colony, whether it be an English or a French colony, which has the right to remain neutral in this world conflict. Let France or England fall in defeat and the fate of their colonies is immediately decided, and for you specially my compatriots, were you to remain disinterested spectators, deaf to the call of duty in the face of such a deadly conflict, and if, as the result of such a dangerous course, your country became a German colony, your prerogatives and your liberties, conquered through the supreme sacrifice of your martyrs, would be forever lost to you; lost in the dishonour and the infamy which would have resulted from your lack of patriotism and most unexplainable prejudices.

It has been said, I know it, that we owe nothing to Great Britain; that what she has done for us has at all times been prompted by her own interest. To this, Sir, I could answer by recalling to you the elequent words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier—"I love France which has given me life; I love England which has given me my liberty."

We owe nothing to Great Britain. Very well, gentlemen, name me a country in the world which enjoys more liberty than we do ourselves; name me a country in the world where religious freedom is respected to such an extent as our own, where collectively as a people or individually as citizens, we can adore our God in the creed in which we believe in, as freely as we can ourselves. Name me a country in the world, outside of Canada, where freedom's spech is more highly respected; that freedom which allows us, you and I, to speak the language of our forefathers without encroachment.

Let us not forget that it is within the shelter of the British Flag that we as a people have grown; that our marvelous development has steadily advanced without hindrance. Let us bear always in mind that it has been at all times through British capital that we have been able to exploit our inexhaustible natural resources. Let us engrave in our minds that if this country has been spared the ravages of invasion or the bitter pill of conquest, it has always been due to the incomparable British Navy.

Sir, however strong may be these reasons which I thought my duty to enumerate to you, I hesitate not in saying that did they not exist, our plain duty would still be to participate in this war.

We are met, Sir, by those who do not share our views—nobody ignores it—with the persecution of the French language in the province of Ontario. There is, Sir, but one answer to this. The jingoism of a few Canadians, equally narrow of mind as they are bitter in their prejudices, do not represent the English people and less again do they represent Great Britain. It is the wound which imposes upon us the sacred duty of healing as quickly and as energetically as we can, but, Sir, it is childish to maintain that such a situation, however grave and pitiful it may be, materially changes our general situation, our obligations as a people at all times, conscious of its honour, its dignity and its liberty.

I love sufficiently my country, Sir, to be moved by the keen desire to see it fulfil its duty to the end, confident as I am that by these means, and this means alone, it will assure for itself the material prosperity which it deserves coupled with the future and the honour of its children.

Gentlemen, whatever you may say or think, rest assured that alone in the triumph of the Allied Cause will we find the remedy to the evils from which we are now suffering and the guarantee of our future peace and happiness. To attain, Sir, that lofty purpose it is above all others essential, that we should bind together the individual energies of each of us, direct them as a whole towards that supreme object which constitutes the programme of the Prime Minister of France, Mr. Briand, a programme unique in the world's history, and which can be summarized in one word "Victory".

Gentlemen, I do not wish a change in the political status of my country; let it grow and prosper in the future as it has done in the past; let the link that binds us to Britain remain as it is, imaginary in fact but strong in reality. This is all the liberty that I ask for Canada.

Sir, that is the kind of disloyalty I have been preaching in the province of Quebec. I am proud to say that at a later day in Quebec I preached the same gospel. I am proud to say that in speaking in the way which I have indicated I was but following the advice, of my right hon. leader. A year later I addressed some young Liberals in Montreal but it is not necessary for me to quote what I said then because my observations on that occasion were along the same lines. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken), in concluding his speech yesterday said: "I want the province of Quebec to respect the constitution and to recognize it." I would ask the hon. gentleman if the fact of spreading hatred of one race against another, as he has been doing in the past in his newspaper, is respecting the constitution. We have heard much of late about respecting the constitution but would it not be fair to ask those who are so anxious to have the constitution respected to show some respect for it themselves? I would not like to say anything disagreeable to anybody on the other side of the House, but if the hon. gentleman to whom I have referred desired to be disagreeable to his own leader he would never have spoken otherwise than he did yesterday, because I contend that since 1911 no one has shown more contempt for the constitution than the right hon. the Prime Minister himself.

Let us have a glimpse at his political career since 1911. There is no use trying to make people believe that we are not respecting the constitution when those who are supposed to have the constitution in their special charge do not themselves respect it. When the Prime Minister was called to office in 1911 his first act was to commit a breach of the constitution. We all know that according to our constitution the members of the Cabinet must be in accord, that they must all feel and think the same way. Is it necessary to remind the House that the right hon. gentleman, unable to count on a majority elected by the people, was forced to appeal to gentlemen who had been elected to combat his Administration and his policy? In 1916 every body remembers perfectly well that the right hon. gentleman sent a message to the people of Canada in which he stated: "I have promised 500,000 men to England and have promised them without consulting any of my ministers." Would the Kaiser himself dare to do the same even in the autocratic country over which he rules? In 1917, the Prime Minister, after having asked for an extension of the term of Parliament, obtained that extension under the distinct agreement and understanding that no contentious measures would be brought before the House. During the session that followed we had the Canadian Northern measure which was brought in against the will of the members of this side of the House, and which was more than a contentious measure. It was not exactly a violation of the written law of the country, but it was a violation of the law of honour.

In that same year, 1917, we had another measure brought forward. As I was not in the House at that time, I would like to discuss that question at a certain length, because I think that at an early date it will have to be discussed in this House, and, if not this session, certainly at the next session. I refer to the War-time Elections Act. If there is in our statutes a law which deserves the condemnation of the people of this country and of the members of this House, it is the War-time Elections Act. This Act was passed for what reason? Because we were at war? To win the war? No, Sir. The reason that measure was passed in 1917 was that the Government did not dare face public opinion on its own merits, and it had to disfranchise hundreds of thousands of British citizens who were entitled to vote and who were not favourable to the Government at that time. The worst feature of this legislation, to my mind, especially for those who are always boasting of their loyalty and devotion to the British Empire, is that the Government has adopted measures which are a dishonour to this country and to the British Empire. When men of German and Austrian origin came to this country several years ago, they came, as the Prime Minister stated himself in 1914 and 1915, because they were invited to come here knowing that this was a free country, that their rights would be respected, and that they would be treated as British citizens. They took the oath as British citizens. They knew when they took that oath that they were binding themselves to respect the King and Constitution of this country. When these men were disfranchised, those who did it simply repudiated the King's signature and dishonoured the Crown of England. They gave that legislation retroactive effect going back as far as 1902. This is an abuse of a serious character. I intended to quote what the Prime Minister said at that time, but I shall just read two or three lines of it. Speaking of the Germans, in 1914, the hon. gentleman said:

> Nearly half a million of the very best citizens of Canada are of German origin, and I am sure that no one would for one moment desire to utter any word or use any expression in debate which would wound the self-respect, or hurt the feelings of any of our fellow citizens of German descent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GLADU: The hon. gentleman added:

> We have no reason to doubt, and we do not doubt, that these people will be absolutely true to the country of their adoption.

Sir, if the Germans in Canada were true to the country of their adoption in 1914 and in 1915, when the Prime Minister spoke of them, they were equally true to their adopted country in 1917. But the very reason why the Prime Minister and his colleagues changed their attitude towards those Germans who were then British citizens was, as I said a moment ago, that they had no faith whatever in the Government of that time, any more than one-half the ministers who are now sitting on the other side had faith in the late Government.

In a copy of the Current History Magazine, published by the New York Times a year ago, I found this article:

> Germany's Form of Government

Strange to say I found in this work the very principle of the legislation which was submitted to the House last session, and which is called the War-time Elections Act. So that not only was this legislation not British legislation, and legislation in which, of course, there is no British fair play, but it has been borrowed if not stolen from Germany. That is a reason, Sir, why that very legislation, especially from the point of view of the ultra loyalists, should be considered a stain on our statutes and should be expunged from them. Sir, when you think of the way in which the hon. the Prime Minister is trying sometimes to impose his views upon this side of the House, and upon the country, it is very interesting to notice that there is another man in the world who uses practically the same language, and here is what he says:

> It is a tradition in our House to consider ourselves as designed by God to govern the peoples over which it is given us to reign.

Just as those gentlemen opposite sometimes tell us, we do this because we want to win the war, and we are the only ones who want to win the war.

> My grandfather placed, by his own right—

In our case the hon. gentleman cannot say that he has been placed by the people's right or voice, when he has been placed only by this outrageous and scandalous legislation, the War-time Elections Act.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I regret that I have to call the hon. member to order. It is not competent for him to speak in disrespectful terms of an Act of Parliament, namely, the War-time Elections Act.

Mr. GLADU: Mr. Speaker, I very willingly abide by your ruling. I do not contend that this legislation is absolutely bad, because it has produced some good results so far. I cannot say that it has produced only bad results, lest I forget, Sir, that we owe to it the great privilege, and the greater honour, of retaining your services as presiding officer of this House. I quote further:

> My grandfather placed, by his own right, the crown of the kings of Prussia on his head, once more laying stress upon the fact that it was conferred upon him by the Grace of God alone, not by Parliament, by meetings of the people, or by popular decision; and that he considered himself as the chosen instrument of Heaven, and as such performed his duties as regent and ruler. Considering myself as the instrument of the Lord, without heeding the views or opinions of the day, I go my way which is devoted solely and alone to the prosperity and peaceful development of our Fatherland.

Sir, it was the Kaiser who uttered those words, and he says further on:

More than ever, unbelief and discontent raised their head. It may happen, though God forbid, that you may have to fire on your own parents and brothers. Prove your fidelity, then, by your sacrifice.

Would you not think that had been written for the present situation in the Dominion of Canada? Sir, knowing, as you have reminded me, that I should say nothing against the legislation which has been passed by this Parliament, let me say at least that I regret its enactment. To my mind it is not only a violation of the rights of the people, but it is unpatriotic, anti-Canadian, and anti-British.

We have been told, Sir, on several occasions, that we do not show enough loyalty. We have been told that we were not fulfilling our duty as we should in the present conflict. We have been told also, that there were many in this country who have given the best examples of loyalty. I remember a few years ago sitting in the press gallery, a post of honour from which, according to circumstances, I was forced to step down to where I am to-day, that a discussion took place in this House, and we heard of several men specially mentioned for their loyalty. I will only mention by name a few of those men, because I want to be brief. I remember that the then Minister of Militia gave us as an example of loyalty and of devotion to the British Empire the name of a man who had refused any salary to work for the Empire's interests. That man was doing the Empire's work, it is said, from mere patriotism, and his name was Mr. Allison. I remember, also, that at that time they were boosting the name of a man, Sir Joseph Flavelle, who was also refusing any salary, or refusing to accept any money from the British Empire. No, Sir, that man would not accept any money from the British Empire; he was giving his services on the ground of loyalty and nothing else. Think of Joseph Flavelle giving his services without any indemnity! The man whom we know now would apply the methods of Shylock to his mother's breast if by doing so he could pile up a little more money. There were other men—and I hope, Sir, that I am not speaking disrespectfully when I am not speaking of an Act of Parliament passed by members of this House—who boasted of their loyalty and devotion to the British Empire, and they were the two greatest scoundrels this country has ever produced—Mackenzie and Mann. It is rather surprising to learn that these very men are still before Parliament asking for more of the people's money. There are others I could name, but these are sufficient for to-day. These men have been held up to us as examples of loyalty and devotion to the British Empire. Well, if to be loyal to the British Empire it is necessary to follow in the steps of these men, I will never be loyal to the British Empire. And I will say further, that if all those who have made the British Empire great and glorious, as it is, if all those who have immortalized England,—Nelson, Wellington, Wolfe, Roberts, Kitchener, and those who are making history to-day—were told that such men as those I have mentioned have been branded as examples of loyalty and as descendants of their blood, they would simply tell you, Mr. Speaker, that they were not descendants of their blood, they were not even the foam or the slime of it.

I listened the other day to the Budget speech of the Acting Minister of Finance, and, as was stated yesterday by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), I think the acting minister was more of a mouthpiece than anything else on that occasion, I think that that speech was framed up in the land with which we were to have no truck or trade, and does not represent the personal opinions of the hon. gentleman. I cannot understand—I may be wrong—how the amount of our national debt could be specified with exactness by the acting minister. I remember that, two years ago, the Hon. Mr. Pugsley forced an answer from the Minister of Finance. We were told what our liabilities to England were in the present war, that we would have to contribute in proportion to the number of men we sent to the front, compared with the number of men sent by England. We were also told that not a shell would explode on the front without Canada paying her contribution. I do not know whether I am misinterpreting what I heard at that time, but if I am right, it seems to me impossible for the Acting Minister of Finance to state exactly what our debt situation is to-day. We are told that we will have to pay proportionately to the number of soldiers we have at the front compared with the number that England has. If England has five millions, and we have five hundred thousand, would it be wrong to think that we would be liable for one-tenth of the war expenditure? We are bound certainly to pay a certain part of it. How can we know exactly to what proportion we are bound? Is there any understanding which has been communicated to the House as to exactly where we stand on that question? I do not think so. I think that we are living in a desert absolutely on that question, and that neither the Acting Minister of Finance nor any one else can state where we stand. I say that not to find fault in any way with the Acting Minister of Finance, but because it is the right of the people of this country to know exactly where we stand. The Government is asking the people every year for hundreds of millions of dollars. They tell us the money will be loaned to England, that it will yield a good rate of interest; and that some day it will come back to us. The Prime Minister stated the other day that he thought there was a little balance in our favour; but there is nothing certain about that. Do you not think, Mr. Speaker, it only fair that the public should be informed of the exact situation?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: For the past year or more the arrangement with the Imperial Government is that we pay the British Government the equivalent of, I think, $1.25 per day per man for the upkeep of our troops, and that arrangement has not been interfered with, so it is an exact amount. That includes also the equipment required for our men and our proportion of the munitions.

Mr. GLADU: That amount covers the whole thing?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. GLADU: I did not understand it that way when the Prime Minister referred to it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am not speaking definitely of the exact amount per day. It is either $1.20 or $1.25, but which I do not pretend to say exactly.

Mr. GLADU: The only point in my mind was whether the amount covered all expenditures for munitions and so on. I understand by the answer of the acting minister that we will not be called upon to pay any more than $1.25 or something like that.

Coming to another point, the Government claim that our credit stands good. May I tell hon. gentlemen opposite that I do not agree absolutely with that statement. Not a month ago, the Prime Minister and the acting Minister of Finance went to Washington. For what purpose? We do not know exactly; we can only suppose. How is it that immediately after their return the cost of exchange between the two countries, which was at seven-eighths of one per cent when they left for Washington, jumped to two per cent? Does this not indicate that they had to show their cards before the officials of the American Exchequer? The member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) suggests that it would be better for the country if those hon. gentlemen had stayed here.

It is represented that the cost of floating the Victory Loan, which amounted to over $400,000,000, was about one and one-quarter per cent, or $5,000,000. Papers supporting the Government expressed the view that that was a fair and honest cost, and that the people ought to be satisfied. With that I do not agree. It must not be forgotten that this cost of $5,000,000 was incurred in floating a loan not for $400,000,000, but for $150,000,000, and that if the people had subscribed only $150,000,000, as they were asked to do, the cost would have been the same. The cost, therefore, of floating a loan of $150,000,000 amounted to $5,000,000, or three and one-third per cent, and when the Government float their next loan for $500,000,000 in a few months, the cost, if they proceed as they did with the last loan, will be $16,666,000, at three and one-third per cent, rather than $6,250,000 at one and one-quarter per cent.

Just a word with regard to the coal question, in which the people of the province of Quebec are specially interested. In past years the freight rates on coal coming into Quebec from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick was $1.80 per ton. In 1916 the rate was increased by the then Minister of Railways to $3.20 per ton, making it prohibitive for the people of the province of Quebec, to import coal from New Brunswick or Nova Scotia. This condition is unjust to the province of Quebec, and should be remedied at once. The Acting Minister of Finance knows as well as I do that an extraordinary situation exists with regard to soft coal. The Intercolonial is using and will probably require large quantities of soft coal. This coal has been brought in from the United States where it was formerly purchased at the rate of $10.25 per ton f.o.b. Montreal. This year a quantity of that coal was bought at $7.85 f.o.b. Montreal, and hauled from Montreal to Campbellton, a distance of 464 miles. The cost of that haulage should not be more than $3.40 per ton, making the cost of the coal $11, whereas if the coal had been bought in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the cost at the mine would not exceed $4 per ton, and the cost of hauling, as fixed by the former Minister of Railways, $3.40, representing a total of $7.40 per ton, and a saving to the country of at least $3 per ton. Why has this matter not been taken into consideration? The province of Quebec is entitled to protection in this respect as well as any other province. If proper steps were taken to safeguard our interests with regard to this coal, hundreds of thousands of dollars, which the Acting Minister of Finance so badly needs, would be saved. We have hired the services of a fuel controller and of an American expert whom we have been paying $24,000 a year—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We are not hiring the services of the fuel controller; these are absolutely free.

Mr. GLADU: Well, it is fair to say that we have been hiring the services of an expert on coal.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I did not deny that.

Mr. GLADU: We have been paying this expert $24,000 a year to bring coal here which we could produce in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, where there is a coal belt three hundred miles long. We could produce coal which would cost the country at least $3 a ton less than coal coming from the United States. That is a point that ought to be considered. Besides that, instead of decreasing our output, as we are doing by importing coal from the United States, we would increase our output, and further than that, help the proprietors of the mines and our citizens generally.

As regards our financial situation, nothing too stringent can be done by the Government to arrive, if possible, at a financial level which would be satisfactory to the country. I shall not say that at present we are in a desperate situation, but I think, Sir, as has been said by hon. members who have spoken before me, the Government should endeavour to reach all those who are unduly benefited by the war, as I think is the case in regard to the question of coal which I have just mentioned. If we are paying for coal imported from the United States and delivered in Montreal $3 a ton more than we would pay for coal coming from Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, I say that those three dollars are lost to the country and are going somewhere —we do not know where. I am not making any insinuations, but the question deserves consideration, if the Government is as anxious as it says it is to put the finances of this country on a better footing than they are at present.

I regret having spoken so long, and I must apologize to the House if I have been daring enough to use a language which is unfortunately unfamiliar to me. If, however, I have made use of any wrong expressions, I hope I shall be forgiven, as I think we shall have to forgive many things to those who may be disposed to criticise us.

Mr. R. H. BUTTS (South Cape Breton and Richmond): Mr. Speaker, referring to the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Gladu) when he was called to order for his statement in connection with the War-time Elections Act, although I think his assertion was intended as a retort, I really regard it as a very high compliment to yourself. I have no doubt it was intended to refer to the soldiers' vote, and if the soldiers' vote was instrumental in electing you, I think the hon. member's assertion was a very high compliment, for I assure you, Sir, I would sooner take my seat with a very small majority contributed by the soldiers' vote than come here by acclamation from a constituency of slackers. I do not intend to make any reference whatever to many of the somewhat excited remarks that have passed from one side of the House to the other in regard to both racial and religious matters. I have long ago come to the conclusion that such a course is anything but wise. Such remarks may be carried on as long as may be, but in the end, racial and religious matters are about the only victims. It is, therefore, somewhat out of keeping in this House that such remarks should be hurled across the floor and it would be well if they were discontinued for all time.

The hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie), in his speech the other evening, referred to some secret—I think, mythical—agreement between hon. members, both Liberal and Conservative, on this side of the House, as to the tariff. I have only to say that, if such an arrangement was ever made, I never heard of it previously to the opening of this House or to debate upon the Budget, and it is hard for me to understand why such an agreement should be made. As far as I can see, we are all tariff men, we are all protectionists when in office. Even on the other side of the House, hon. members are protectionists when they are in power. It is only when they are in Opposition that they talk free trade. I remember some years ago when, previously to 1896, the last Conservative Government was in power, I was then in the early days of my political inclinations, and I was an ardent free trader, I read the speeches of the then right hon. leader of the Opposition, the late Sir Richard Cartwright, and of many others, and from their speeches on free trade and their denunciation of high tariffs, I was led to believe that, on their accession to power, we would have a free trade Government, and that, under such a regime, great manufactures would grow up in this country; that the Northwest would be opened up with a rapidity unknown before; that small villages would become towns; that towns would become cities, and that cities would extend their borders. In fact, we were led to believe that, under the benign influences of this almost heaven-born policy, old men would be rejuvenated and old maids made marriageable. My hon. friends did not come into power altogether on their trade policy, but they did come in on a side issue; and if we are to take the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) they, during their regime, reduced the tariff by 71-100ths of one per cent. That was the degree of free trade to which they were prepared to go. When they were defeated in 1911, they immediately again became free traders. This reminds me very much of the old couplet:

When the devil was sick, the devil a monk would be;
When the devil got well, the devil a monk was he.

From my constituency over 4,000 young men volunteered for the front, and before conscription was spoken of they were in Flanders. Many of them are now home maimed. Many of them have made the supreme sacrifice in Flanders. I have heard from those who have returned many an interesting story about the condition of affairs at the front, about all the hardships they have had to endure. The other night, while some free trade speeches were being made, I was thinking of certain stories that I had heard, and I was picturing to myself some of the scenes that had been depicted to me by those returned soldiers. I could see before me the condition of affairs as it had been described, and I was picturing those young men there in the trenches with the great cannons booming all around them, with shrapnel bursting in the air over them, and with machine gun and rifle bullets whistling on all sides. Perhaps at the gray of the morning the order was given for them to scale the parapet and take the front trenches of the enemy, and in No Man's Land he that fell and was instantly killed was perhaps not the unluckiest. Others lie bleeding the whole day long, suffering agonies compared with which the Cross itself, if I may say so without irreverence, was mercy. In the midst of my reverie, when I was thinking of the sacrifices made by parents such as those in the county of Cape Breton, where five mothers have sent twenty sons to the trenches, where two mothers who had sent four sons each, had each lost three, I was aroused by my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) deploring the five cent tax on the poor man's pipe and the ten cent tax on the old lady's cup of tea, and I thought then what different conceptions some people have of the sacrifices we are called upon to make in this war. Ten cents a pound on tea is surely an awful sacrifice for one old lady to make, when compared with the sacrifice of four sons by a mother. Did the terrible disparity, the awful misproportion, never occur to my hon. friend as he talked about the poor man's pipe and the old lady's cup of tea, and about these old ladies having been a factor in electing this Government?

He preached free trade, but it was not the kind of free trade hon. gentlemen opposite practised when they were in power. He said the Liberals had reduced the duties on steel during their regime. That is quite true, but if protection can be corrupt, they resorted to the most corrupt form of protection when they removed, or partially removed, the duty on steel, for they granted a bonus on a sliding scale to last for ten years. Let me give another example of how sincere hon. gentlemen opposite are in their professions about free trade and protection. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) said in 1897:

If we know the hearts and minds of our people at present, I think I am not making too wide a statement when I say that the general feeling in Canada is not in favour of reciprocity. There was a time when Canadians would have given many things to obtain the American market. There was a time when the market of the great cities of the Union was the only market we had, but those days are passed and over now. We are not dependent on the American market now.

In 1907, in a speech at the Imperial Conference, he said:

There was a time when we were wanting reciprocity with the United States, but our efforts and our offers were put aside and negatived. We have said good-bye to that trade and we now put all our hopes on the British trade.

And justly so. I do not think the right hon. gentleman ever made a truer pronouncement on the question of trade. Under protection as we have had it in Canada since 1878 we have built 29,000 miles of railway; we have spent a little over $200,000,000 in the construction of one of the finest canal systems in the world, connecting up the St. Lawrence river with the upper regions of the Great Lakes, and giving us a great waterway right into the heart of Canada for a distance of twenty-five hundred miles. All this has been done under protectionist governments, and it was done simply because the treaties we had previously entered into with the United States had been denounced by that country at the earliest possible moment, and because Canada realized that instead of looking for trade channels running north and south, the proper thing to do was to build up an interprovincial trade in this Dominion. Hon. gentlemen opposite cannot possibly be sincere when they talk about disturbing this trade, which has been built up so successfully and has done so much for the development of Canada at such an enormous expense to the country. But I will not go any further into that. These trade questions have been debated so often that there is little left to be said. Suffice it to say, I would be more likely to believe that hon. gentlemen opposite were sincere if, during the fifteen years they were in power in this country, they had shown the slighest desire to reduce the tariff or grant free trade. But as their record is very strongly against that, their professions at this late date must fall, I think, upon deaf ears.

With respect to the Military Service Act, or conscription as it is generally called, there is this to be said: The leader of this Government and the party behind him did not mince matters when they went to the country last year. Conscription was the issue, and Canada never did itself more credit than on the seventeenth day of December last, when young men went to the polls and, like heroes, voted in favour of conscription, which meant voting themselves into the trenches; and when fathers and mothers went to the polls and voted their sons into the trenches. I think one of the noblest deeds Canada has to her credit is that the greater part of her population, knowing what the election of the Union Government meant, voted in favour of conscription and the Union Government.

I know a gentleman on the other side of the House whose son was a brilliant dashing young soldier before the war. When the war broke out he joined the home guard. When conscription was mooted his friends of the Liberal Government at Halifax made him stipendiary magistrate of New Glasgow, and he doffed the khaki. He is to-day in New Glasgow acting as stipendiary magistrate. His worthy sire has a seat on the other side of the House and was a great advocate of voluntary conscription, saying that there were lots of young men who were willing to volunteer for the front.

An hon. MEMBER: Give us his name.

Mr. BUTTS: I do not know that I should give the name. I will give his constituency. I refer to the hon. member for Antigonish and Guysborough. We had another candidate who ran in Eastern Nova Scotia. He is not in the House. He has two sons. One of them was eligible, while the other little fellow was about five years old and about the length of an axe handle. The son who was eligible for the front did not volunteer, but the little fellow strutted around home in khaki. When, during the election, his father was twitted about the matter, the little fellow was stripped of his khaki, I suppose, through mere shame, and God knows whether or not the world lost a Napoleon or a Hannibal. If it were necessary I could enumerate quite a number of such cases. It nearly always happens that when some of these gentlemen are in khaki they manage to get some position on the staff in Halifax, or to associate themselves with the home guard, to assure themselves that there are about 3,200 miles of salt water between them and danger. When I look around to see some of the conditions down in our province, and in some of the other provinces, I think I am very nearly justified in doubting the sincerity of those gentlemen when they protest against the Military Service Act and claim that the voluntary system of enlistment would have supplied all the demands.

I merely wish to refer in closing to some remarks made by the last speaker (Mr. Gladu) about the War-time Elections Act about the disfranchisement of Germans, Austrians and other foreigners in the West and different parts of Canada, and about women's votes. I do not mean to say that the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House are altogether angels. I suppose they resorted to a great many of the ordinary election devices. We appealed, no doubt, to the sentiments of the mothers who had sons over there to vote that reinforcements should be sent to them. Perhaps less worthy appeals were made. But surely hon. gentlemen opposite will not say that we had a monopoly of that? Is it not true that they appealed to the mothers who had sons overseas telling them that if they got in power there would be long furloughs for their sons? Is it not true that they held up to the mothers of sons over there who still had brothers at home all the dangers of their other sons being put in the trenches by force? Is it not true that they appealed to them on the ground that if the Laurier party should be returned to power there would be no conscription and that every one who had been put into khaki under the conscription Act would be stripped of his khaki and given a chance, if he wished, to enlist voluntarily? Is it not true that they appealed to every delicate and tender sentiment of motherhood and parentage generally? Is it not true that those appeals were most successful particularly in those constituencies from which the greater number of hon. gentlemen opposite come? It must be absolutely true, I think that these appeals were made. Look at the number of acclamations; look at the small number of votes that the Government candidates received in these constituencies. That must be admitted inevitably by the whole of us in view of the fact that the province of which I am speaking went solidly against conscription and solidly against the Government. In quite a number of constituencies in that province there was not found one woman to whom those appeals were made who raised her voice in favour of the Government candidate, neither mother, nor sister of a soldier or a probable soldier.

If the Military Service Act had not been passed the mothers and sisters of soldiers would not have had votes. If the Military Service Act had not been passed the people of foreign blood and foreign leanings would have had votes. I suppose it is to be assumed that human nature is very much the same wherever you find it and that we must at least credit these people with having some love of the countries that they have left notwithstanding the fact that they have become naturalized British subjects. Had they not been disfranchised, had the women not been given the vote, had the soldiers across the seas not been given the vote—and that was looked upon with disfavour by hon. gentlemen opposite—had these things not been brought about by the Military Service Act, there were foreigners enough in this country to have elected any Government they wished and the native born Canadians and those of British birth could not under any circumstances have had a sufficiently strong voting power to overcome them. Of course, some fellows had to have their corns pinched, but I do not think there was anything wrong in granting a vote to a mother who had sacrificed a son for Canada and for the Empire. I do not think there was anything wrong in protecting Canada and British interests against what must be a very strong sentiment in favour of the enemies of the allied powers. I have come to the conclusion that it was not justice that these gentleman wanted but I am inclined to the belief that it was justice they got.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (North Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to prolong this debate, because I think all the questions involved have been already discussed at considerable length, but there are some matters in connection with this Budget which I have not yet heard any person mention, and which are of vital importance in connection with the affairs of the country. For that reason I trust that the House will bear with me while I refer briefly to those questions, and pass them on to the Government in the hope that they will receive consideration.

The Budget which we are discussing, as we all know, is the annual financial statement. I have heard quite a number of Budgets discussed in Parliament, and the procedure is that when the Minister of Finance comes down to the House on that occasion he presents a statement of his stewardship during the past year. He states what the expenditures and revenues have been, and how much the revenue exceeded the expenditure, or, if there has been undue expenditure, what the balance is on the other side. The Finance Minister also takes occasion to estimate the amount of money that will be required for the various public services during the coming year, and then summarizes the various sources from which he hopes, by the imposition of taxation, to meet those expenditures. If additional expenditures are required, he indicates the direction from which he hopes to receive the necessary revenue to meet those expenditures.

Now, the Acting Finance Minister made a speech which, to my mind, was a model of clearness. Personally, I regret very much indeed that the Finance Minister himself was unable to be present. Knowing the tremendous amount of work and labour which has devolved upon that hon. gentleman since the beginning of the war, it was not to be expected that a man of his physique could stand such a strain continuously. There is no doubt that so far in the financial history of the war, the Minister of Finance has met the situation. When confronted with almost unsurmountable obstacles he has overcome them, obtained the necessary funds, and in that respect has displayed great capacity. In the hon. gentleman who recently delivered the Budget speech, we have a worthy successor of Sir Thomas White. The Budget was excellent in its clearness of detail and lucidity of exposition, dealing with the expenditures of the past and the possible expenditures during the coming year. The Acting Finance Minister also very clearly outlined the new methods of taxation. But there was one omission from his speech, which he must have overlooked, although it has always appeared in previous Budgets, and that was the estimated amount of revenue expected to be derived from the new taxes. Now, the present Administration is a Union Government, we are not supposed to be attached particularly to one side of politics or the other, and, naturally, we would expect to be enlightened as to whether the Budget was a Union Government Budget or not. I regret to say that in my judgment the Budget which was submitted to the House a few days ago is not a Union Budget.

In the first place, if the Budget were a Union Government Budget the taxation would be collected, to some extent, equally from our two principal sources of revenue. At the present time some of our revenue is derived from direct taxes, such as the income tax and the super tax and that constitutes what is known as a free trade or international method of taxation. We also receive a large amount of revenue from customs and excise duties, which form what is currently known as the protection, the national or indirect system of taxation. Now, if the present Administration were in reality a Union Government the new taxation would, as I have already said, be collected to some extent equally from the two sources of revenue to which I have referred; but that course has not been followed. I have looked very carefully over the statement of the Acting Minister of Finance, and I find that the new taxation applies almost entirely to incomes. It is true that a tax has been imposed on tea, coffee and tobacco, which will bring in some additional revenue. None of these articles, however, are produced to any extent in Canada, and the placing of any taxes whatever upon goods produced in this country has been carefully avoided. To my mind that is not a proper system of raising additional revenue from the country. I may have my own views as to that, but I say that when you are applying added taxes to income only, you are adopting the Free Trade method of taxation. Why should we have such a Free Trade Budget, and why, in the application of taxes, should we have recourse to only one onerous form of taxation? We are standing on the threshold of the fourth year of the war, which may be prolonged for another two years, we may have to raise additional money yet, and we have consistently, in the Budget, avoided a source of enormous revenue to this country, we have avoided the imposition of taxation that would bear upon the people with scarcely any pressure at all, namely, an addition to the customs tax.

In the first place, I would say this to the Acting Minister of Finance: In looking over the blue books I find that the percentage of taxation upon imports this year is something like seventeen per cent, whilst in 1916 the percentage was over twenty per cent. In other words, the taxation on imports had been reduced three per cent during the war, whereas if it had been increased by that amount this year it would have yielded something like $25,000,000 to the country. Furthermore, had we adopted an increase of ten per cent it would have yielded the enormous sum of $80,000,000 of additional revenue. For that reason I say that we are eliminating and neglecting a most important source of revenue. I may be told that a taxation of twenty-seven per cent on imports is too much. I do not agree with that for the simple reason that the average in the United States is nearer fifty per cent. They are not neglecting any source of revenue over there, they are exploiting every source of revenue. Therefore, after examining the Budget, with all due regard to the Acting Finance Minister, and the manner in which his taxation proposals were framed, I must come to the conclusion that this is a Free Trade Budget, and deliberately framed as such, and that as far as the manufacturing and other industries of this country are concerned, we might as well roll up the industrial map on the wall. Why do I say that? I will give the House my reasons as briefly as I can, bearing in mind the fact that hon. gentlemen on both sides are anxious to get on with business. Why should we eliminate the source of revenue to which I have referred? Why should we, instead, take away the profits of manufacturers and tax the people directly more and more every year? There is no particular merit in an income tax. The only claim to merit which an income tax finds among the people of England is that when they are taxed on their income they will know how much they are paying and devote more attention to the administration of public affairs. During the war, when we have to raise such enormous sums, would it not be logical that we should place taxation where the people would feel the burden the least? To my mind the idea of playing free trade, as against protection, during the war, is exploded as far as this country is concerned.

The idea of free trade and protection is busted so far as this war is concerned. We have had to eliminate a great many of these old ideas. I am appealing to men of common sense in this House, and those who have studied economics know very well that it is only a matter of a few years since the gold standard as a basis for currency was accepted as an axiom, and no country was supposed to issue paper money unless it had a gold dollar in its treasury to meet a paper dollar. When the war broke out all those theories of the schoolmen, whose ideas of finance which had been propounded for years by the professors of Oxford, Cambridge and other universities, were swept away within the first two weeks, and Great Britain found herself compelled to go on a fiat money basis. England had to take tea paper, print her currency on this tea paper, and hand it out as money. Fortunately, they struck the secret of success so far as financing the country was concerned. I remember when the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) used to come into this House and declare that we ought to issue paper money. We all looked upon him as a heretic, a greenbacker, a man who wanted fiat money. To-day, every country in the war, with the exception of the United States, is on a paper basis, and it is only a matter of a few months until the United States will be on a paper basis also. That is to say, the country promises to pay on paper, which paper takes the place of gold, and is not redeemable in gold during the war. We have had to revise our views, and a great change has come over the thinking community in England and every country. It is as if some new discovery had been made, such, for instance, as the discovery that the earth was round instead of flat. We all know that for centuries professors preached the doctrine that the earth was flat, until suddenly one man advanced the view that it was round, and the discovery of the telescope proved that it was round. Nobody holds the opinion any longer that the earth is flat except a very few cranks. In the same way our preconceived notions of finance on the eve of the war are all going to be changed.

I think I have clearly established that we are on the threshhold of these great changes and we have to face that situation. We have in our imports, a source of taxation from which, if we took one-quarter as much in duties as do the United States, would give use at least eighty or ninety million dollars additional revenue every year.

There is nothing new in taxes; the world has used all methods of taxation. The first taxation ever adopted, I understand, was a hut tax which is still used in Africa amongst the primitive savages. They pay a hut tax to the colonial governments. The lottery system is another method. That system has been dropped out of consideration by the English-speaking people, although I understand it is used in some foreign countries. Another method of taxation is that on business transactions. It was put forward by some of the press, we were to have this here, that there should be a stamp on every business transaction. That is the alcavala of Spain, and its effect was to ruin business and to destroy industry and trade in Spain, and to make that country poverty stricken. We must not adopt that system. My idea is that we must adopt every reasonable expedient, because we need large sums of money, and the first thing we should consider is to find a system that will bear as lightly as possible on the shoulders of the people during the war. There are people going around the country endeavouring in every possible way to contrive something to make the people here feel there is a war on. Some people want to take away our tea, others our bacon, others want to take 90 per cent of our incomes; and in every possible way they are devising means to make the people feel that they are at war. If I were the German Emperor and wanted the people of this country to be directed in a certain channel which would make them tired of this war and cease to support it, I would adopt a policy, not only in taxation but in other things, that would stir up resentment. I think it is a great mistake that the minister omitted to add a substantial percentage to the customs duties of the country.

There are two methods of taxation known to the world, direct and indirect. One of the old fashioned direct taxes is a head tax or a poll tax. That would get a very large sum of money, but would be unpopular. There is also the taxation on real property. And the very reason that England has a tax on incomes is because the landowners would never stand for a tax on their property. We know that a few years ago Lloyd George proposed to impose a tax on landed property, and they were all up in arms. It is not necessary for us to follow those methods; the methods for us to follow are those adopted by the United States. With reference to the income tax itself, it works out very unfairly. The man who pays an income tax on rentals, for instance, can pass that tax on to the tenants, but the man whose revenue is derived from his labours cannot pass the tax on, and therefore it bears heavily on him and his family. There is no particular merit in an income tax any more than in a hut tax; they are only methods of deriving revenue. For our country the income tax is the most dangerous system we can adopt. England has raised large sums of money in this way, but England is beginning to realize that there is a limit. The United States after the war of the Revolution and the War of 1812, adopted the system of taxation on imports, because that was a method which assisted the country in selling as much in a foreign market and buying little, keeping down the trade balance. By 1837 the cost of the Revolutionary War and of the War of 1812-14 were fully paid up. About the same time England was engaged in the Napoleonic Wars, and as near as I can find out, the cost of those wars is still being borne by the British people and they are paying interest on it still. Is that a policy for us to follow? When a tremendous amount of money is going to be charged to us, should we not adopt the policy of the United States, and struggle as best we can to get rid of this burden inside of ten or fifteen years? It is a great mistake not to have adopted the policy of adding an additional amount of taxes on imports. Take the case of trade: In addition to the expenditure on the war, which is one of the dark clouds on the horizon, there is also the war itself. I have no idea in my mind at all as to when the war is going to end, and whilst many members of this House and many of my friends are pessimistic over war conditions at the present time, knowing every foot of that country as I do and knowing that all that territory which the Germans took back a few days ago, I know that a great deal more of territory was held by them in 1914, I am still confident of the success of our arms.

They have not gained one foot of new territory. They are stopped and I am satisfied that it is only a question of time when they will be driven back. But we must face the necessity of constantly raising more men. I am glad the Government has adopted a policy for men which has some ginger in it. We must, however, get a little more ginger in our finances and not be afraid to put a tax on imports simply because one or two members on this side of the House happen to be theoretical free traders. I have listened to the avowed free traders on this side of the House with care and find they are reasonable men, men of great ability. I am sure that if any question is put fairly to them they will be satisfied to do what they consider to be Canada's duty. Why should we impose heavy direct taxation upon the people when we can get three times the money without their knowing anything about it or feeling the burden? The United States has constantly followed the protective financial policy laid down by Alexander Hamilton. By 1890 they had paid for the expenses of the Civil war, whereas Great Britain under free trade has not yet paid off the expenses of even the South African war, which are a burden every year to their people. The people of the United States are wise and practical; they do not run to fads; they take a common sense view of things; they do business without much regard to sentiment. Why do I say that we should add a tax on imports now? That may seem like heresy to a free trader, but there is no such thing as freedom of international trade at this time. A great change has come over all states. There is no free interchange of products. Nations are placing an embargo on many things that formerly came into their country. What is the use of having free trade with the United States if that country will not trade with us at all? Almost everything is embargoed that might go from Canada to the United States; we cannot sell an axe handle there, let alone a bushel of wheat, unless the Government of the United States grant us a special license. The result of that policy during the past year is that we have bought unlimited quantities of goods from the United States—something like $600,000,000 or $700,000,000 worth—and we cannot sell one dollar's worth of goods to them to pay our debts—nor can we borrow and fund our debt. In view of this fact, how can any sane man say that we should stick to old ideas and old doctrines? There is a proposal on the Order Paper to give to Minister of Trade and Commerce the right to place an embargo on the importation of non-essential products into Canada from the United States. That is one way of avoiding the difficulty that confronts us, but another way would be to impose a heavy customs tax on all things that come from the United States. But we are in debt to the United States some five hundred million. They have refused to lend us the money to pay off our trade balance, but suppose they lent us the money, what right has any loyal Canadian woman to buy an American pair of shoes at $10 and make it necessary for the Minister of Finance to go to Washington and borrow $10 for thirty years at interest in order to pay for them? If a farmer's wife in the West buys from the United States a Chicago cook stove at $50 the Minister of Finance, if he can borrow in Washington —which he cannot just now—will have to borrow $50 in the United States to pay for that stove, and every man, woman and child in this country will have to pay 6 per cent interest on that $50 for thirty years. To do these things is absurd when we can buy these articles in this country with Canadian paper money instead of paying gold for them in the United States. If this condition continues and our trade balance keeps going up, we will owe the United States $1,000,000,000 on our trade balance before the war is over. When the Allies meet in final conference to adjust their balances the United States is going to exact that $1,000,000 in some form or other. We haven't the gold; how can we pay? They will not lend us the money; will we have to give territory for it? United States is a great country, and we all welcome her into the war. But, speaking on my responsibility as a member of this House, I submit that United States has failed to recognize Canada as being on the same plane as the other Allies, so far as war finances are concerned. Everybody knows that. We are not treated even as neutrals.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is that the fault of the United States? Did not the United States offer to deal with us on the same basis that they were dealing with England? Did they not offer us orders for munitions if we wanted to accept them?

Mr. CURRIE: I know the United States gave Great Britain an order for munitions a few months ago through Secretary Baker to the extent of $1,300,000,000, in order to enable Great Britain to make munitions and get out of the debt she owed the United States.

Sir SAM HUGHES: And we could have had the same.

Mr. CURRIE: If that same policy could be adopted here we should very soon be free of our debt to the United States. However, the matter is beyond me. Some of these boards and commissions, over which we seem to have no control but which seem to be spending plenty of money for us all the time, are simply stop-logs in the current of our trade. No man who is a profiteer or who has been in the shell game should be put on a board or commission that has to do with our foreign trade. I do not like to name anybody. We all know who are on some of these boards. We know that they have factories in Canada manufacturing things for which they are liable to get orders from the United States, and that they have moved machinery from Canada to the United States in order to make munitions. They want to be in strategic positions.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Did they not go to the United States because they were not allowed to bring goods from the United States into Canada?

Mr. CURRIE: Well, I do not know as to their going to the United States because they could not get orders for munitions here. I was told by a Montreal man who has an order for shells from the United States that to get that order he had to pay 7½ per cent commission to the Imperial Munitions Board. I do not think that any foreign institution in this country has the right to impose taxation upon the people of Canada. That should be done by Parliament alone. As far as the munitions business is concerned, the money raised by the Victory Loan in Canada during the last year was divided between munitions and wheat. Great Britain was unable to finance us. They said: If you want to make munitions, you must do your own financing. We must have wheat; we cannot give you the money to pay for it; you will have to raise the money yourself for the wheat—and we did so.

I think it is most hateful for members of Parliament to be provincial. I am a son of the great province of Ontario. We grow big men there; we try to let the people enjoy their full rights; we wish that justice be done to every one.

We are struggling hard to get out of the clutch of the so-called interests. We are an example to the whole world in public ownership institutions and in public-owned industries that are great and successful. Seventy-five per cent of the Victory Loan was raised in the province of Ontario. Seventy-five per cent of the munition orders went east of the Ottawa river. Seventy-five per cent of the grain and foodstuffs orders went west of Fort William. Yet Ontario has been constantly attacked by hon. members. You would think we were a lot of selfish people. You have never heard us complain about these orders in the press of Ontario, and every man in business in Ontario knows very well that we got the small end. We have tried to do our duty. We know that it is impossible for this country ever to achieve the greatness and the status that it should achieve if we are going to preach constantly sectionalism, class hatred, and stir up trouble between the provinces. We cannot have that. We must forget all those things, and now, of all times, is the period when we should forget them.

We are constantly charged, because, unfortunately, two or three so-called trusts have their headquarters in Ontario, that we are robbing the western farmers. I shall refer to some of these trusts, and it is just as well for us to have the matter spoken of openly in the House. Let us take the question of agricultural implements. There are in Ontario, and also in the Western Provinces, many concerns manufacturing agricultural implements. But there are agricultural implements and agricultural implements. The one item that stands out most of all is that which is controlled by a large trust. I refer to the binder used by the farmer. The question of reaping machines and binders is constantly being raised by the farmers. They say: Everybody is taking advantage of us, because we are taxed by protectionists on our binders. This is a matter of regret to every manufacturer, great and small, in Ontario, aye, and in Quebec, where they must have in the future greater manufactories, if they are going to retain their population, because they have not the agricultural land to support their population without the help of industries; they must depend on industries. Every legitimate manufacturer in Ontario regrets that there is such a thing as a binder industry in Ontario. It is of no use whatever to any other industry in Ontario than itself.

All the goods that go into the manufacture of a binder, for instance, the wood that goes into the tongue of it, or into the platform of it, the canvas, the tacks, the pig iron, are brought into this country free of duty, and those small manufacturing concerns in Canada who are manufacturing and who could manufacture those parts legitimately, do not get a cent out of the business. It is doubly protected. No other industry in Canada is protected in that way. Take the question of ploughs. Last year over $2,500,000 worth of ploughs were brought into this country. There is in the world no better plough made than the plough that is made in Canada. A plough is a very low priced article. There are in my province dozens of concerns manufacturing ploughs, but the race hatred cry has so grown in the West and the farmers are so stirred up against our ploughs and other small articles that we are legitimately trying to manufacture in order to support the population in our towns and villages, that they are boycotting our Ontario manufacturers, and they will not purchase our ploughs. What merit is it for a farmer in the West to buy an American plough at $25 or $30, and then send the Minister of Finance down to Washington to borrow money on that amount at 6 per cent for thirty years, simply because the farmer wants to buy an American plough? I have here a long list of articles. Last year we imported over $1,000,000 worth of cotton socks which could have been made in Montreal, where large quantities of socks are manufactured. Last year fully $400,000,000 worth of manufactured goods were brought into Canada which could have been manufactured by Canadian concerns.

The manufacturers of Canada have, during the last four years, been constantly subjected to unfair competition by the Americans. Let me point out an article that is free of duty, and that is made in this country, so that we need not become involved in any question of tariff in regard to it. I refer to barbed wire. The western farmers buy an average of 125 tons of barbed wire a day. The manufacture of that in Canada would give employment to about 5,000 people. Those people would be eating western wheat, whereas the people in the United States cannot eat western wheat, because the United States will not allow any western wheat to enter that country. There is an embargo on it. But, as I say, we import that barbed wire. Barbed wire has two prices in the United States. There is an "ordered" price of $3.80; there also is a "spot delivery" price, which is an export price to the Allies and all other countries in the world of $4.75. If you live in the United States and you want a car of barbed wire, you go to the United States Steel Corporation and you ask them the price. They will say: "Well, we shall give it to you at $3.70 on order, or if you want 'spot' stuff, we cannot give it to you at that price." You say: "If I order it, when can I have it?" They will tell you: "You can have it after the war." But your wire was broken down and the cattle are running around your ranges, and you want the barbed wire right away, so you ask them: "Have you any "spot" wire? They say: "No, but John Jones across the street has some of our wire, and you can get some of it if you want an immediate order." If you go there, you will find that you will have to pay $4.70 to $4.80 for it. I know these are facts that I speak of. The documents are in Canada to prove them. If, however, a western Canadian jobber went down to Pittsburg and asked the United States Steel Corporation what barbed wire was worth, they would say: "The 'order' price is $3.40." He would ask them: "Can I get some?" They would say: "Where do you live?" He would reply: "I live in Saskatchewan." Then they would say: "All right, you can have it right away at $3.40." They thus flood this country not only with barbed wire, but they dump every other manufactured article which can be shoved into Canada on what is called an "order" price. That has been the unfair policy of the manufacturers of the United States. Some of the large trusts in the United States have tried this two price system on various other commodities. They have applied it on coke, of which they virtually have a monopoly. If you wanted to buy "order" coke, you could get it at $3 a ton, and have it delivered after the war. But if you wanted coke for immediate delivery you had to pay $12 a ton for it. The Government here was negligent in not taking cognizance of the two prices system in the United States, and stopping its application here, but they were more negligent than that, because if a good stiff customs duty were put on those articles it would have brought in to our treasury from seventy to eighty million dollars a year which would have enabled us to pay a hundred million dollars of the four hundred million dollars that we spent annually on the war. In 1916-17, we paid $100,000,000; in 1917-18, we shall pay not more than $50,000,000. If we were able to carry on our taxation in such a way as to pay on this war a hundred million dollars every year, inside of ten years after the termination of the war Canada would be free from all war debt. I am sure that every man who gives a thought to the finances of this country would say that is the proper method of carrying on taxation.

I wish to refer now to other things that are giving us a great deal of trouble. I refer to the proposal to grant the Minister of Trade and Commerce the right to embargo imports. We must do either one of two things. We must make up our minds to go behind the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) as one man and say: We give you full authority, for every year from now until the war is over, to put an embargo upon goods coming into this country from countries that will not trade with us, or else we must insist that the Government take the other method of imposing a stiff tax on goods coming from countries of that description. Otherwise Canada will be on the auction block after the war is over; we shall owe the United States so much money that we shall have to hand over to them British Columbia or Quebec or some other part of the country in payment. The manufacturers of Ontario, when they can meet the American manufacturers in a free market, are not afraid of their competition. In the manufacture of chains, for instance, Canadian manufacturers have discovered a method of making the chains automatically by electrically welding them.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What kind of chains?

Mr. CURRIE: Logging chains, cow chains, and other chains of that description, of which a very large quantity is used in the United States and Canada. These Canadian manufacturers went to the United States, and inside of five years, by this new method, put the American chain factories out of the running. That shows what the Canadian manufacturers can do when given a fair chance. Our manufacturers are not behind our soldiers in enterprise, energy or courage, and you know how good our soldiers are. All we want is a fair and square deal. We do not want to be constantly subjected to one-sided unfair competition.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Is the hon. gentleman of the opinion that a protective tariff operating to the advantage of eastern manufacturers operates equally to the advantage of western farmers?

Mr. CURRIE: Certainly it does, because every extra mile the western farmer has to send his wheat—I am speaking now of after-the-war conditions,—represents a toll on him. If the farmer sold his wheat to the industrial workers nearby, we would save this extra freight, and be that much more in pocket. But there is such a thing as "selling the hide for six pence and buying the tail back for a pound." The whole policy of the United States has been to build up home industries. Patriotic people in Canada are trying to do likewise. I am connected with a firm that has been manufacturing a line of goods that is shipped to the four corners of the earth. They had a large shipment to make to Ceylon and India, and needed jute sacks in which to ship the goods. Hon. gentlemen will hardly believe me when I say that the city of Winnipeg, in competition with every other city in Canada that was asked to bid, took the prize and got the order for the jute sacks; and the jute sacks were made in Winnipeg, shipped to Ontario, and then sent out to Ceylon and India. That is the condition that is going to obtain all over this country. Factories in the West are going to succeed as they are in the East. The province of Ontario has established a great trade with the province of Nova Scotia. There is more business done between those two provinces, I believe, than between any other two provinces in the country, and it is because the province of Nova Scotia with governmental assistance has built up great iron and steel works, and were it not for these works the manufacturers of Ontario would not have been able during the last two years to carry on business for one-half of their time. We had to have pig iron and steel, and we received greater advantages from these works in Nova Scotia. So he would be a very unnatural son of Ontario or of Nova Scotia who would try to set up any barriers or clan hatred between these two provinces.

We must look things in the face. The munitions business at the present time is dying away, and our factories will have to go at other work very soon. I am sorry to say that in many respects the Imperial Munitions Board did not observe Pitt's great maxim that they must make war pay. The ex-Minister of Militia and Defence knew that maxim, and did his best to carry it out. Men in this country who had made decent sums in the manufacture of munitions were thinking of enlarging their factories, but during the last two years the prices imposed by the Munitions Board have been so ridiculously low that these men have taken the orders at a great loss, and many of them have gone out of business and are now ruined. Many of our manufacturers, through lack of munitions orders, are taking their plants out of the country and working them in the United States. If the United States can give an order for one billion three hundred millions dollars worth of munitions to Great Britain, there is no reason why we should not get an order of reasonable size. What is the use of piffling with a forty or fifty million dollar order? That does not cut any figure. Last year we purchased close on to seven hundred million dollars' worth from the United States, and how can we pay for those goods unless we get orders for a similar amount for munitions or goods of one kind or another from the United States? Otherwise we shall have to close up our factories and our working men will go to the States. I am not a munitions manufacturer, so I am not personally interested in the game, but I am intensely interested in the success of my country. We have gone into this war, being a good loyal people, and we are now asking everybody to send their sons to the front under conscription. What do we get out of the war? What does Australia get out of it? She is going to get an Empire in the Pacific; the German empire in the Pacific will go to Australia.

What does South Africa get? She also gets an empire, two empires, in fact in Africa. What does Egypt get? She is doing very little, she gave five million pounds to the war. What is five million pounds in comparison with the amount we are spending on the war? Egypt will get Palestine and Arabia. Italy will get Asia Minor. Every country of the Allies is going to be indemnified except Canada. The indemnity which the United States is looking for is world trade, for they cannot receive any territorial indemnity; neither can we. The only indemnity we can get is a business indemnity. Then, as solid business men, why should we not forget our petty squabbles about what some school man wrote in a book years ago? I heard the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) speaking on free trade last night, and he reminded me of the doctors a thousand years ago disputing on the merits of Aristotelian medicine as against experimental science.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I thought we were fighting for ideals and not for business.

Mr. CURRIE: We are fighting for an ideal, and that ideal is freedom, parliamentary freedom. When Strafford stood at the Bar of the English House of Commons, charged with trying to suppress parliamentary liberties in England, he urged in his defence, "I have given a Parliament to Ireland." What answer did Pym give him? He said, "Parliaments without parliamentary liberties are but a fair and pleasant way to greater servitude." Stick that under your hats, gentlemen. That is a good motto for us in this House. We are fighting for freedom, but we must not forget to have a little eye on what we are going to do at home after the war. We all know that after the American war there was heard all over the country the tramp of the boys in the blue overcoats on all the roads of the United States; they were soldiers out of a job. The outhouses, the fence corners were filled with soldiers begging their bread. The United States immediately grasped the situation and did everything they possibly could by a high tariff to get factories established to give employment to these men. That is why I am calling attention to these matters now.

There will be three or four hundred thousand men coming home after the war, seventy-five per cent of whom are not farmers. Why, at one time at the front, there was a whole battalion of students, most of them in their third or fourth year—the Princess Pats, the brainiest men that ever stood in France.

The Princess Pat men were the highest type of men that ever set foot in France. Our battalions are composed of men of high educational attainments, men who can take their places in the factories, the mines or industrial institutions of the world. Why should we not help these men to secure profitable employment in industrial callings at home, as well as to put them on farms? The majority of these men from Ontario, Quebec and Nova Scotia are skilled in industrial trades and employments, and if you insist on putting them on farms you are going to impose a very great hardship upon them. Is it not better that we should keep this country on an even keel? We should not build up one industry at the expense of others. In order that these men and their families may have their bread and butter assured to them in the time to come after they leave the army and are disbanded, we should try and make the war pay for itself now, build up factories all over the country so that these men when they come back will have employment and take the places of the women factory workers, because the women in many cases, while filling the men's places for the present, will not continue to work in factories.

It is no use to talk about free trade, because there is no such thing as free trade. No man will stand up before me in this House and say that free trade is a possibility now in Canada for a moment. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) knows very well the facts that stare him in the face. We are face to face with new conditions. With all our patriotism, with all our love of country, with all our love for those men who are now serving at the front, we are surely not going to divest ourselves of all our interest the moment these men come back. Both our interest and our affection should teach us that it is our duty at the present moment to forget all this piffling about protection and free trade. We want to build up a country that will sell its products to the world and buy as little as possible for the time being. We can thus only get out of debt. Let political economy wait until we are past this great crisis. If we do that we will be in a better national position. If a 10 per cent customs tax were imposed on imports we would get at the very least $80,000,000. Nobody would be any the worse for that except those foolish women who buy American boots and those young fellows we see on the streets who are working in munition factories and who like to wear some American collar or tie. Why should we support them in trading abroad?

With reference to our industries, I am almost ashamed to confess that I am a manufacturer, because there is nothing good said of the manufacturers. As long as I have been in this Parliament I have heard nothing but sneers and expressions of scorn directed at the manufacturers. When the history of this war is written, as far as Canada is concerned, it will show that the greatest patriots in any of the allied countries have been the Canadian manufacturers. You may say that their patriotism earned money for them. It did not. When they started to manufacture munitions in England what happened? Lloyd George would go to a manufacturer and say: "You have a fine factory; how many hands do you employ?" "Three hundred hands." "Can you make shells?" "Yes." "Alright; go ahead and make them." "I have not the machinery, and I have not the capital to go on paying wages." "The Government of England will advance money to buy you the latest machinery; it will advance you money as the work progresses to buy your raw material and to pay wages. Then we will give you a price for your munitions which will enable you, at the end of the year, to scrap every tool you have in the factory and give you a substantial profit." They amortised the plants in the price of the shells. The hon. the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) knows that that is true. Lloyd George, after another year, said: "Gentlemen, have you your plants free?" "Yes." "I will continue the price of munitions on condition that you give me a quarter or a third"—I forget which—"of your profits." Why should they not give him a third of their profits? He had given them a free plant and they were quite willing to give him a fair share of the profits. That is what took place in England. Now, what happened in Canada? When the Imperial Munitions Board was established they said to the manufacturer: "We want you to make shells." The manufacturer said: "I have not any plant." "You will have to get a plant."

Sir SAM HUGHES: We preceded England in that.

Mr. CURRIE: That is right, but it was dropped here when England took over the manufacture through the Imperial Munitions Board. The arrangement which was made by the late Minister of Militia and Defence to start the manufacturers of Canada making munitions, in justice to him, was borrowed by Mr. Lloyd George. There is no doubt about that, and we want to give the hon. gentleman full credit for that. The manufacturers of Canada and England do. But the Imperial Munitions Board said to the manufacturer: "Do you want to make shells?" The manufacturer said: "Yes." "You must get your own plant and put it in." "Alright." The directors of companies went to the banks and the bank directors stretched their imaginations a great deal and lent them the necessary money. But the directors of the companies had to go on the notes personally in almost every case in order that these plants might be put in. The prices for shells were very low, but still there was a margin of profit in it. No sooner had these manufacturers succeeded in showing a slight margin of profit for the first year than everybody in this country started yelling: "You are making too much profit out of this thing; the Government must take your profit." The Government have done so in the form of the supertax which has been imposed. I do not believe there is one out of a hundred corporation directors in this country who sleeps soundly at night. Why? They are a badly abused lot.

[Mr. Currie.]

If they go to the bank to borrow $100,000, they have to get down on their knees before they can get it, although in some cases the banks are very good. Some of the older banks are exceedingly good, but the company directors have to go on the notes of the company. What do they get out of that? If they get a ten dollar fee from their company for a meeting of directors, it is known all over the country. They have to go on the notes of these corporations, and if one fails to make any profit the directors have to make good the loss out of their own pockets. Do the shareholders have to pay that? No, they have paid up stock in their pockets, and like everybody else they have a kick at the directors. This country owes a great debt of gratitude to every director of a public company. If there are any people in Canada who have helped Canada to carry on the war, they are those men who are the directors of public companies and those carrying on manufacturing industries. Yet these men are constantly abused and are looked upon as outcasts, and as being unfit for ordinary society. I am ashamed to see this country forming small factions about this, that and the other thing.

I was the other day reading May, the well known authority on constitutional law, and he says the only safety for a country is partyism, that if you have not partyism you are going to have faction, and government will not be staple but will fall to pieces. Are you going to have in this country factions, differences and class hatreds, the farmer against the manufacturer, the manufacturer against the man who is working for him, and the labourer and the labour union against the manufacturer? Why should we begrudge a fair profit to the man who is at the head of a factory? There is no reason why we should. There is no reason why the directors of corporations and the captains of industry in this country should not be allowed to carry on their business as free, honest men, or why they should be constantly classed as rascals and renegades. It was faction and class hatred that ruined Russia. Where do you get your Victory Loan from?

You do not get it from those people who are going about the country crying down the manufacturers. The working class are sound and I must say for them, they have subscribed to the Victory Loan to the limit of their ability, just the same as any other class. The manufacturer also has subscribed, but in order to enlarge his factory, as is necessary in order to make provision for the future, he cannot willingly take all the loans you offer him. What is the policy which has been adopted in England? There Lloyd Genrge has done what he could to help the manufacturers, his idea being that war should pay and that their co-operation was necessary towards the winning of the war. It is from these manufacturers he is getting money for his loans. The same policy is pursued in Germany where the government have aided the manufacturers to develop their industries, believing that in so doing they were helping to win the war. The Germans do not buy abroad, and buying at home use paper money. As long as they do this they can go on indefinitely. In this country, however, no man can make a dollar but what everybody joins in an attack upon him. I think it is time that sort of conduct was stopped.

There is another phase of the Budget I wish to discuss, and that is the railway situation. Let me say that it is one of the most dangerous issues this country has to meet at the present moment. The war of the railroads in Canada is far greater than the war of Great Britain on Germany at the present moment. It is well known to members who sat with me on this side of the House in the last Parliament, that we urged the policy on the Government of following the example of the Government of Great Britain and relieving the railroads from the possibility of giving us any trouble during the war. What happened in Great Britain when the war broke out? There one-third of the railways were excursion lines and could not earn a dollar. Many of the large roads could carry on, but very few of the small ones could. The British Government very wisely called the heads of all these railways together and said to them: "Form a board. Every railway in Great Britain is going into this board, and the directors will manage all the systems as one concern. All the money that comes in will be pooled in one pool, and the Government will see that every shareholder gets a return equivalent to what he has been receiving on his investment for the past three years." That was a very successful idea. For three years the Government of Great Britain successfully carried on the railways in that way, Although I cannot say what the results of last year's operations were, they have increased the earnings of the employees from time to time by what they call war bonuses. That is, instead of an increase in wages the Government would give them a war bonus of ten per cent. In that way, as the cost of food went up the railwaymen's earnings kept pace with it, and the Government have done that after attending to all the wants of the debenture holders and the shareholders. Not only so, but the Government have carried free on those railways all their munitions and all the men that they needed at the front. We know that in 1914 all the British and all the Canadian soldiers got a free ticket on the railways to go and visit the localties where they came from, and it didn't cost the Government a farthing. We suggested the same thing should be done here, but the interests had too much control. For some reason, although many of us, including some able men, tried to do our best to get that policy carried out, we failed. The Government, however, succeeded in running us into a debt of thirty or forty millions a year that we have to pay, for these railways. No wonder the United States does not want to finance this country at the present moment, bearing in mind the improvident and wasteful policy we have pursued with railways. What has the United States Government done? The very moment they were involved in war they followed exactly the same course as Great Britain; they established a War Board to control their railways exactly as Great Britain has done, and they are putting men of business ability at the head of their great departments. I have no hesitation in saying that if we had placed ourselves at the beginning of the war in the same condition as Great Britain did and given the management of our railways to that great Canadian, Lord Shaughnessy, he would have established operating traditions on all our roads. The first tradition that would have been emphasised on the employees would have been honesty, from the water-boy right up to the president. The second tradition that Lord Shaughnessy would have developed in the course of three weeks after he had taken charge, would have been loyalty to the road. Travel on the Canadian Pacific railway and say anything to a brakesman or a water-boy derogatory to that road and the first thing you get is a sharp rebuff. That is loyalty. Every man feels that he is a part of that great machine, that he is doing a great public duty, and a great public service. He is not looking round to see if he can slink off and steal an hour from his employers, or get away into a corner and hide himself, but is doing his utmost to earn his pay. If we could have such a fine spirit established on every Canadian railroad there would be inaugurated a reign of operating traditions that would be worth millions of dollars to the future trade of this country.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (Resuming). Mr. Speaker, when six o'clock was called I was entering into a discussion of the second great difficulty facing the people of this country. The first is the war; that is our greatest danger. The second dark cloud on the horizon is the railway question. It does seem to me that it is impossible for us to get rid of the railway question which is eating into our resources and our vitals every year. Every year they come to this House we have to vote from $25,000,000 to $50,000,000 of the people's money to railways; it has gone out in an endless stream; for eight or ten years we have been throwing out these golden life-lines to rescue the railway capitalists from oblivion.

Now, we have railways and railways in this country. I took occasion to refer to the President of the Canadian Pacific railway as one to whom along with other able men from the other roads we could safely have entrusted the control and operation of our railway system during the war. We could have given them instructions to the following effect: For goodness sake do not let these railways come to the people or this House clamouring for more of the people's money until after the war is over. That is not what happened, and every year we are asked for more money, and we are shortly going to be asked again. Mr. Speaker, it took a little energy on the part of some of us here to get a move on as far as the Government was concerned to see that aid was sent to our men in the trenches; it seemed to me and to others that there was rather a hanging back, and we had to bring the matter before the House in a very urgent manner. But now the House is to be closed up in two or three days, possibly adjourned by Order in Council, in order that there may be an expedition over to England to rescue another railway over there. That does seem absurd to me in the face of the tragedy which is taking place in Europe. However, the facts stare us in the face, and the railway situation has to be solved.

Let me briefly go over the railway question. The Government of the day is not to blame originally for the situation; neither is the previous Government to blame. I must say, so far as what was done under the Liberal Government is concerned, that I believe the people to a large extent were to blame. First, there was a great expansion in the West, and a large number of men who were not legitimate farmers—I have every confidence in the legitimate farmer in the West, who is a hard-headed man—real estate boomers, and men wanting to live by their wits, started a great propaganda that the West must have more railways. They were never contented. When one was built they wanted another. Their latest proposition was the Hudson Bay railway. When this started the country was being rapidly provided with branch line railways, both by the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian Northern. But that would not do; these propagandists must mave another transcontinental. I have seen maps showing no less than four or five transcontinental railways hanging in the Railway Committee of this House, and a dozen lines to Hudson bay and Greenland. A transcontinental railway was started as an adjunct of the Grand Trunk. This road as first proposed was to keep fifty or sixty miles away from the other railways, so that it would be a colonization road as well as a road for through traffic. The proposal passed the House, and arrangements were made to finance it. But when it came to construction, that road was so located that from its eastern terminal up as far as Edmonton a good cannon shot could not be fired from one line without danger of injuring the other, so closely were the existing railways duplicated. I took occasion in 1909, when the question was discussed in this House, to point out to the Minister of Railways and Canals, Hon. George P. Graham, that great duplication was proposed by that road, and that if the West was to be served properly the railway should be projected in another direction before it was too late. He laughed at me, and said: "We are not building railways for colonization and pioneering any more; that day has passed; we are building competitive railways." Well, we built that line as a competitive line, and the people of this country are paying for it through the nose. What has happened? As I said, the Grand Trunk has paralleled every other road in the West. Instead of keeping forty or fifty miles from other main lines, establishing new centres and building up a traffic of their own as the other roads had done, they wanted to dig in and divide the traffic at every important point. And the farmers of the West to-day are just as far away from railway communication, so far as that road is concerned, as they were before it started.

Then the road was built through the Rockies. I have been over that road. The country was given the impression that it was a tremendous physical undertaking to put the road through the Yellowhead Pass. The road through the Rockies, with the exception of ten or fifteen miles near Hazleton, is as smooth as this floor right clean to Prince Rupert; it goes through a valley all the way. I remember the propaganda. All the press said that it was a terrible undertaking to run the line along the valley of the Skeena river. That valley is not half as impassable as the valley of the Ottawa river is in some places. I am told that the first fourteen miles of that road cost nearly a million dollars a mile. The contractors who built it from Edmonton to Winnipeg charged this country fifty-seven thousand dollars a mile over level prairie. Somebody got seven or eight million dollars out of that. Those who built the Canadian Pacific railway worked out their profits with fear and trembling years afterwards, in their effort to build up a utility that would be of some benefit to the community. But the men intimately connected with the promotion of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway wanted their money quickly, and they got it. So we have that road, paralleling the Canadian Northern, the Canadian Pacific, and our own railway, the Intercolonial, built in such a way that in many places it is just impossible to use it as a two-way road. We cannot run trains one way by one route and back by another railway, because the lines are not sufficiently close together, and yet they are never sufficiently far apart to help the country; it is a case of neither fish, flesh, nor red herring. In the Railway Committee yesterday a man was charged with being a bad actor because he borrowed $11,000 from a bank to build four miles of railway. I felt constrained to say that I was sorry he had not been a promoter of some of our roads; we would have got the work done so much cheaper.

And then the Canadian Northern Railway people decided that they must have a through route. They had built up a railway in the mid-West which, to my mind, compared very favourably with some of the best roads in the United States. Their traffic system and their methods of operation very much resembled those of the Illinois Central, one of the most prosperous roads in the United States, the Delaware and Hudson, and other roads of that character. Wherever there was good traffic and a good line in those three Prairie Provinces, there you found the Canadian Northern railway. They came to the head of the lakes, delivered the traffic to boats, were doing an enormous business, and were getting wealthy. Then the cry arose throughout the West that the Canadian Northern should be extended to the Atlantic coast on the one hand and to the Pacific coast on the other. Almost everybody in the country had the transcontinental bug in his head. While this was going on, numerous applications were made in the Railway Committee for charters for the construction of other transcontinental railway lines. Any number of maps must be stowed away on the musty shelves of the Railway Committee room showing that not less than eight or ten different roads of that kind were projected. Hundreds of dollars were paid in to the Railway Committee by these promoters for charters and we took their money without batting an eye. Of all the charters that were granted in the West, outside of those of Mackenzie and Mann, the Canadian Pacific, and the Grand Trunk only about twelve miles of road were built by private enterprise—and the man who promoted the construction of these twelve miles is in the asylum. So the Canadian Northern commenced the construction of a transcontinental road, starting from Fort William east—and you could jump from the Canadian Pacific tracks to those of the Canadian Northern all the way to Nipigon. They thought that they had a wonderful find in the Nipigon falls, so they diverted the railway up to these falls, so they diverted the railway up to these falls through the gorge and then started east to catch up with the Canadian Pacific as quickly as they could and to keep on paralleling. This they did around Sudbury, and they continued on to Toronto, at no point more than a mile or a mile and one-half from the other line, but just so far away that you could not use the two tracks as a double track line. Then they came east from Toronto to this part of the country, and hon. gentlemen who have travelled over that road to Toronto know very well that for miles you could almost cover with a blanket the lines of the Grand Trunk, the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian Northern, in most places you could throw a stone from any one of the tracks to any other. Then they went east and built lines in Nova Scotia and Cape Breton and Quebec; wherever they could find a subsidy they were prepared to build a road and bond it—and now we have to pay the piper.

They went to British Columbia also on the principle that they must get an outlet on that coast. It was argued that elevators were to be built and that all the grain of the western provinces was to be sent from the Pacific coast around the Horn and the Cape of Good Hope to feed the Englishmen. Of course they never dreamed that when the grain crossed the equator the midge fly and the maggot would get into it; that every bushel of wheat which goes over the equator must be specially treated and disinfected in order that it may be transported without injury. That was all forgotten; there was millions on the Pacific coast, they thought, for any enterprising promoter who went there. So the road went from Edmonton through the Yellowhead Pass, never more than one hundred or two hundred yards from the National Transcontinental that we are sweating blood to pay for. The line went as far west as the other side of Prince George. They thought they could get a lot of fine scenery that way; they turned down and took some of the scenery from the Canadian Pacific. As a matter of fact, I suppose the Canadian Pacific would have been glad to give them the heavy grades along the Thompson and Fraser rivers. They paralleled the Canadian Pacific down the Fraser valley, the Canadian Pacific on one side of the creek and the Canadian Northern on the other, and they landed at Vancouver. If it were possible to operate any of these roads as a double-track line, a great deal of trouble would be saved, operating expenses would be reduced, a smaller working staff would be sufficient, and less equipment would be required. The grades could be readjusted on the up-and-down tracks. One staff of superintendents and operators and one private car to trot round the country in, instead of three or four, would be sufficient. We find ourselves in a difficulty so far as these roads are concerned; we have to provide money; and there will be great difficulty in synchronizing operation. I always like to find historical parallels for peculiar incidents in history, but I cannot find in any country in the world a case that at all parallels that of Mackenzie and Mann. A man by the name of Law blew certain bubbles in France, but he did not constantly bleed the people because they benefited by his operations in the establishment of banks. He left the Bank of England and the Bank of France. He blew the South Sea bubble in England; but these Mackenzie and Mann bubbles beat anything I ever saw or heard of in history. We are stuck for something like $25,000,000 a year for these gentlemen. When anything ever happens around the corridors of any legislative body in this country they have a lot of lawyers versed in the art of talking to members, and if you are a newly-elected member a very smooth gentleman offers you a cigar, gets into conversation with you and after a while wants to know your views on granting Mackenzie and Mann $50,000,000 of a bonus, or something of that kind. They operate amongst public men, the legislatures of the provinces and the Parliament of Canada. There is hardly a mile from the Behring sea to the trenches in France would fail to disclose wrecks strewn by these two men. Everything that they touch has blown up. At first their stocks went flying up like a kite, and when the public set in and woke up they had nothing but the stick left. Take the street railway in Winnipeg, the stock of which at one time was about 200, and is now down to about 50. When they owned the Toronto street railway the stock went up to 150 or 180; to-day it is down to 50. They are out. Wrecks all the way—saw mills, coal mines, trawlers, saw mill companies, whaling companies. I am informed that the coal lands on Vancouver island for all time will be obliged to earn an extra tax of something like $2.50 a ton because of the operations of Mackenzie & Mann. Now they are broken, they say, and they want more money. Nobody seems to know where they lost their money, what latitude or longitude, but they want more.

This country has entered into an agreement with them now to pay $10,000,000 for the rights of a road which is really in real financial difficulties. We have to take care of it by issuing short-term notes, and when we do get it, we shall hardly know what to do with this white elephant. No doubt, Mackenzie & Mann will come down to Ottawa after we pay them and want it back. I am credibly informed that those gentlemen are still in control of the Canadian Northern railway. I would have thought, when this country has used Mackenzie & Mann so well and has agreed to arbitrate their equity in the stock, a question which we really did not need to arbitrate at all, because we could have taken over the road under a mortgage; when we are so willing to hand them over $10,000,000, if they can only show us a reasonable excuse for doing so—and some of their excuses are rather flimsy—that they would have the good grace to step out of the directorate and management of the company pending the conclusion of that investigation. I am told that Mackenzie & Mann are still in control of the Canadian Northern and direct its resources and enterprises. Furthermore, I understand that a very strong effort is being made to see that the control of the Consolidated Railway Companies of Canada is put into the hands of Sir William Mackenzie as general manager. This will need an Order in Council but the people of this country will rise in rebellion if anything of that kind occurs. We are tired of those gentlemen and their exploits. I have nothing personally against either of them. As a clannish Highland Scotchman, I would like to see them succeed. They have not, however, shown the slightest evidence of ability to manage public affairs, except to plunder the people. If a man had a good steam sawmill at any place along their line, they were not satisfied until they put another one in and beat him out of what he had. If a man had a coal yard out of which he was making money, they would put in another coal yard and destroy his business. It was nothing but a record of wrecks, as I said, from the Behring sea to the trenches. It is very hard for me to make these statements, but I have to speak the truth. It is difficult for a public man to tell the truth as he should do in a public place like this, but I am stating facts. We have to handle their derelicts. We have to pump the water out of those floating hulks of theirs. We have to get them into some shape again, and if we are going to do that, let us put in charge of them somebody who has business ability, and let us see that the road is properly managed and is not to continue a streak of rust as it is at present.

What is the condition of the National Transcontinental, which is another problem we have to face? For a number of years I handled the financial Bills of the Grand Trunk Railway in the House of Commons, and I shall say this, that under the management then of Mr. Hays, and those men who came here, especially Mr. Wainwright, an effort was made to put the old Grand Trunk on a first-class financial footing. Those men made that effort. They saw their troubles; they started in to pay up all their debts with debenture stock, which did not carry a mortgage against the road at all. Those debentures were sold in England, and as bonds matured the mortgages were taken off that road until, at one period, before they started financing for the new railway in the West, I think there was only something like $8,000,000 worth of bonds against the whole road. That was a very small amount, the road being at that time valued at between fifty and sixty million dollars. That was a splendid example of financing, unequalled by any other road on the American continent at that time; but they got into the flotation business, the transcontinental fever, and they agreed to finance the greater portion of those roads in the West which connect with the Grand Trunk Railway. The result is that the shareholders of the Grand Trunk are now so much involved that it is almost hopeless for those who hold the debentures ever to expect to receive a dividend. Did this country put the shareholders in that position? No. Their own directors, whom they appointed with their own votes, put them into that difficulty. That road, or a portion of it, must be taken over, and, as far as I am concerned, I think the only solution of the matter is to deal fairly with those shareholders and take over the whole road. The East will then, if it is properly managed, take care of the West; it will help the West. The tremendous arteries the Grand Trunk has running into every town and village of the East, coupled with the western connections and the similar web of the Canadian Northern in the West—those two gigantic webs joined together will, to my mind, pay and can be made to pay.

Last year, however, we found ourselves in the face of a peculiar difficulty. Those roads were constantly running into debt, and the Canadian Pacific was constantly making money. Instead of adopting the plan in existence in the United States of pooling the roads, we must adopt some expedient, and the expedient adopted was to raise the rates on those roads by 15 per cent. As a shipper, I do not see anything wrong in an additional freight rate of ten or fifteen per cent, because we must realize that the cost of operating those roads has tremendously increased. The price of coal has risen to almost three times its former cost; steel has advanced to an equal extent; rails which formerly could be secured for $28, now cost $70; locomotives that formerly cost $20,000, now cost $55,000. You see, therefore, the tremendous operating difficulties those railways had to bear. But above all that, there was the human element. The men who had gone into the employment of those roads years ago, especially the men who were in the machine shops, were affected. Formerly, if they received twenty-five to thirty cents an hour for working in the roundhouses, repairing locomotives, running lathes, they considered they were well paid, and they were then a well paid class of mechanics. But, the manufacture of munitions was commenced in this country, and any man who could handle a lathe could earn from sixty to seventy cents an hour. Many of the railwaymen, as a matter of patriotism and principle, stuck to the roads, although they saw some of their comrades getting employment in the munition factories at three times their wages. No attempt was made to give these faithful employes a war-time bonus, because the roads were really losing money on their own operations, as they were unable to keep up their betterments; they could not afford to pay war bonuses to their workmen because they were going in the hole all the time on account of cars and locomotives being smashed. I do not think fifteen per cent of an increase in the freight rates was too much. A year ago I made a calculation that, if an advance of fifteen per cent was made, it would take care of all the difficulties with which we had to contend in connection with our roads; it would pay the additional wages that the men who were faithful to the roads should receive during the war, and it would enable us to carry on and avoid debt. The difficulty then was to deal with the Canadian Pacific. Had the Canadian Pacific been taken hold of; had they been offered the same earnings as they had been receiving in previous years, and their earnings put under their own management in a pool, we would not have had this difficulty of having to hand over, through the operation of this fifteen per cent increase, a large sum of money to the Canadian Pacific, and then levy, in my opinion, a very illegal tax in order to take it back. I cannot find, in my study of modern economics, a single case where a company or an individual has been taxed a large sum of money by Order in Council such as the arrangement made with the Canadian Pacific. The Canadian Pacific has been, during the war, a great national asset, and every dollar of profit that that road has made during the war, has been invested by it in war securities. In addition to that, thousands and millions of dollars that this road had on deposit in New York and elsewhere has been invested in war securities. I cannot see how we are going to go along. Something, I suppose, must be done with the Grand Trunk, but we must bear in mind that, as a Parliament and as a people of Canada, we are under no obligation to the directorate or shareholders of the Grand Trunk. Let us also bear in mind, what those of us who have dealt with England even during the war realize, and that is that, so far as the English are concerned, there is very little sentiment in business. I do not think, if we had any enterprise in England that blew up, that we could for one minute go to the English Government and ask them to recoup us for the money we had lost. They would laugh at us. So I do not see why we should indulge in any heroics over the British shareholders of the Grand Trunk if we take that road over. Furthermore, if we take over the Canadian Northern railway, I cannot see how we would be justified in paying Mackenzie and Mann millions of dollars in cash, and I think that as long as the war lasts, and for at least five years thereafter, Mackenzie and Mann or the Grand Trunk will be doing well if they get a fair rate of interest on what they are to be paid, without sending us into the market to borrow ten or twenty million dollars more for railways. It is hard for us to see our way clear in the matter of the railways of this country, but the United States and Great Britain have blazed the trail, and I think we should carefully consider what they have done before taking any action here.

The next thing I desire to say a word about is our foreign trade. If we are going to take our place with other nations we must not live to ourselves alone. We must establish a great foreign trade, and I think we shall have a great foreign trade outside of our natural products. It is only a few years since this country was sending millions of cords of pulpwood into the United States. Canadians were then simply hewers of wood and drawers of water. All they got was an axeman's wages of twenty-five dollars a month to produce the raw material for the mills on the other side. But the province of Ontario saw the light and put an embargo on the shipment of logs from the lands of the province, compelling the manufacture of that raw material in Canada. The neighbouring province of Quebec followed suit, with the result that to-day we have in that way established one of the greatest industries of this country, and one that is bound to bring millions of dollars annually into this country. I would be the last man to say: "Let us bleed these great concerns out of their last dollar." They must continue to build and to increase their plants if they are to keep up with business. Nobody who has studied the industrial history of the United States and considered the reports that have been made on that industry by British commissions, and especially the book on the life of Carnegie, by his own secretary, can escape the conclusion, which is proved by statistics, that during the period of expansion in the United States, the average profits of industry were thirty-five or thirty-six per cent. The proprietors received as a return six or seven per cent, and the balance went into the building of great factories. How otherwise could such enormous plants as the Carnegie Steel Company have been built in the States? There are in this country a great many concerns which have had a small beginning, and out of their earnings have reared enormous concerns employing from ten to fifteen thousand people. We must remember that if Canada is going to be a great country in the future we must allow for a large margin of profit or for something of that kind. We cannot go and borrow any money from England, or a five cent piece from the United States, with which to build factories. So I think the State, in adjusting its taxation, should be liberal in dealing with these industries who re-invest their profits in plant. If they put their added profits into new construction and new machinery and employ more people, they are doing as much benefit to the country, and possibly more, than if they handed that money over for the purposes of the war. They are building for the future.

What is going to occur after the war, when our outside trade will be threatened by the freedom of the seas? There is no freedom of the seas just now. The ships we have built for our inland waters and to carry our products across the ocean to foreign countries, are now carrying munitions and war supplies for our Allies. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) is endeavouring to get as many ships built as possible in Canada. There is but one thing in connection with that which I think we should reconsider. We are advancing $30,000,000 or $40,000,000—I do not know the exact amount—to the Imperial Munitions Board to built package freighters for the ocean, and those package freighters are being handed over to the British Government. I would insist that if we advance that money, and the ships are handed over to the Allies for the purposes of the war, they should be returned to this country after the war to look after our trade. I think that is only reasonable. We know very well what England is going to do with the ships she has built for war purposes. After the war they will be turned over to the large British shipping corporations to compensate them for ships which have been lost during the war. And I repeat, we should insist on the ships we loan to our Allies for the purposes of the war being returned to this country and coming under the Canadian flag when the war is over. Unless we do that, we shall have no guarantee that we will be able to carry on business with any foreign country except Great Britain. Is it necessary for us to do business with any other country but Great Britain? As one who has some idea of the amount of foreign trade that is being done at the present moment by Canada, I say unhesitatingly that if we had twenty-four ships at our disposal now, it would go a long way towards recouping ourselves for the war. It would enable us to take at least one-third of the pre-war German trade in India, Ceylon, Java, and other points on the Pacific ocean, Peru, Chili, the West Indies, and especially in South Africa where we have a preference. We have no ships now worth speaking of, trading with these ports. They have been taken away and I think we should make some arrangement whereby a certain number of our ships should be released as soon as possible to carry on our business with these countries. Our business in many cases is already established. Half a dozen ships do not amount to much to Great Britain, but they would assist us materially in carrying our manufactured products to these countries now; and that is something which is very much needed. We used to have a line of steamers running to the Bermudas and the Bahamas and they did a large trade. The people in those islands are now without our ships and are suffering very much. However, I leave it to my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, because I know his business instincts will see that so far as our business with those countries is concerned, justice will be done. I am speaking in this manner not by way of criticism, but to assist the minister by pointing to those Imperial merchants who are just as anxious to hog as much of Canada's trade as of anybody else's, and so that he can say to them when they start hogging our trade and our ships, "There are men to-day in the Parliament of Canada who do not appreciate your walking off with our business and taking ships that are not necessary." I have been informed that some of our ships which have been taken over by the British authorities for the purpose of transporting munitions and food lay for weeks in the harbours of the United States without cargoes. One ship, I understand, lay in New York harbour for six weeks and then had to be taken back again by this Government to its owners, and from the noise that went up there you would have thought there was only one ship left in the Anglo-Saxon fleet, and that we were taking that one over. We must do things in a business-like way. Canada is not a crown colony. We are prepared to pay our way and more than pay our way. We are prepared to finance this war and grow the grain the Allies need in this war and wait for our pay. Where can you get anybody else to do that? That being so, I insist that justice must be done in the allotment of ships, to enable us to carry on our former business, unless it is absolutely impossible.

The ministers of this Government must have a very difficult time. There is always suspicion on account of their political leanings in the past. They are constantly confronted with new problems, and every interest will be trying to pull them in various directions. Members of Parliament on both sides of the House are critical, perhaps a little too much so, but so far as I am concerned, I want it understood that my criticism is made in no carping spirit. In a free Parliament, and a great Parliament such as we have here, it is the duty of every member to speak out and give his views instead of sitting behind and grumbling. The proper thing is to come to the front and say what you want to say. I have endeavoured to keep out of politics and follow the straight path as a Conservative Unionist. But, I am sorry to say that some of the press are trying to make it exceedingly difficult for any member of the great party to which I belong, the Liberal Conservative party, to be a minister of the Union Government in this country. I am referring to the Unionist press. The Conservative party supplies at least sixty-five per cent of the support of this Government. I was ashamed the other day to see in the Globe newspaper, which professes great friendship for the Unionist party, a mean and contemptible attack on my hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) who happens unfortunately, like myself, to be a Tory. I do not think it is fair. I am ready to take all the blows I get, but when a man is endeavouring to do his duty in a very difficult situation I think that some credit should be given to him and the paper which would be the last to criticise him would be a paper of the opposite party in the Union Government. We want fair play in these things.

The food situation in Canada is critical and the food department of the Government is receiving a tremendous lot of criticism. It is very difficult to decide what to do under the circumstances. But, if the Government is willing to lend an ear to anything I say, and in this I am only voicing the sentiments of the country, I would favour fixing maximum prices for the principal food commodities so that the poor man will know how to adjust his breakfast table to the market. Prices have gone far too high. We fixed the price for wheat never expecting that oats and barley would, through some remarkable process, appreciate in value to such an extent as to reach a higher figure than wheat. Give the farmer whatever is the right price for his wheat and adjust the prices also of the other commodities according to that scale. In Great Britain they have had to come to fixed prices. In this country we are paying 37 cents a pound for oleomargarine while in the Old Country the advertised price is 27 cents a pound. The same applies to foods of other kinds such as meal, flour, etc. Why is it that you have to go to the United States to import corn in the face of an adverse trade balance in order to meet some requirement of the food controller that we shall not eat white bread? I do not see anything sensible in that. The food controller is collecting taxes under an Order in Council. He is selling a monopoly to a woman who serves a cup of tea in the morning to her boarders; he makes her take out a license. The regulations are so intricate that you cannot tell whether you are breaking the law if you sit down to a meal. Let the regulations be simplified as in the United States. There they have their meatless day and on that day they know they cannot eat meat. Monday is a meatless day and they refrain from eating meat on that day. Tuesday will be a wheatless day and they will not eat any bread that contains wheat on that day. I am unable to say whether we have a wheatless day or not. But, I do know that these regulations are very confusing, that I have been receiving bunches of correspondence from farmers in my constituency asking such questions as this: "Is it true that I am contravening the law by eating pork or bread on Wednesday?" To my mind, all these confusing regulations are not in keeping with the spirit of the times. I do not offer any criticism of the Food Controller, excepting that. If Parliament is to give him the right to collect taxes, let it be brought into this House in the form of a Bill and let us put a law on the statute-book. I am quite willing to vote for it and I do not think a single member will raise an objection, but let us carry on our business in the proper way. Let us be straight with the people. I do not know but what I am going to find an order issued under an Order in Council some morning sending me down to Halifax or some place else. I do not say this in criticism. I am only repeating exactly what every man in the country, from one end of it to the other, is saying. Orders in Council? Why not give us an Order in Council to put 10 per cent on the customs imports and perhaps that would be a reasonable measure. We would get $70,000,000 in that way. That would be an order worth while. In order not to further detain the House on this particular question, I want to give notice that I intend to discuss the question of Orders in Council the first time we go into Committee of Supply. If nobody else does it I will.

Now, I have offered some criticism to the Government and I trust they will take it in good part. I trust they will take counsel together in these matters. It is well that the Government has somebody sitting behind it to say some of these things because many people think my way and if nobody offered criticism against free trade proposals the first thing we would know every factory in this country would be closed. If nobody offered any criticism in regard to railway rates and other matters concerning the railways the first thing we would know this Parliament House would be occupied by the railways and we would be all out of business. Somebody has to speak against these things and I think it is the duty of members on this side of the House to express their views just as much as it is that of members of the Opposition and perhaps their word will carry more weight.

I trust that members of this House will take into their consideration that we should do everything we can at this time to stop all this snarling, contemptible agitation and class hatred of various kinds. Do you not think it is time that we all got together? Quebec is doing its duty now in so far as the war is concerned. There was snarling between Quebec and Ontario, but we know, and everybody knows, that Quebec and Ontario are inevitably husband and wife and they cannot be permanently separated. There is always, however, a nasty hard man who is sticking his nose into our affairs, like Bourassa or Lavergne, and trying to cause trouble at the fireside. Let us get rid of all these trouble-makers, and let us unite behind this Government to win the war.

Mr. LEMIEUX: They have lost the wedding ring.

Mr. CURRIE: They have not lost the wedding ring. The man who says so says what is untrue, because the ring is not lost. These two peoples must live alongside of each other, and if they are going to live alongside of each other they must have mutual respect for each other. I can never lose my respect for the French Canadians. I deplored the situation in Quebec with regard to the war, because I knew what a false position some politicians were putting the men from Quebec in, virtually branding them as cowards. When you have a man of French Canadian blood voluntarily interposing his body between you and the enemy, you can never have a hatred of the people of his race. I very much regret the feelings that have been engendered, but I hope that is all over. I hope we will all look forward to the time after this war is over when every man who has served his country in the war will be happily employed in his customary avocation and that we shall see him during his leisure in the evening of his life, sitting in peace beneath his own vine at home enjoying that rest which he has so well earned, because he has fought for the liberties of the world, and he, more than any one who has not taken part in the struggle, recognizes what the liberty of the world means. We want Canada to be a great country—to be not only a great country from the military standpoint, but great, also, agriculturally and industrially, because we have the motive power necessary to bring that about. We can put power on the belt of our industrial machines at a rate equivalent to coal at $1 a ton, and there is no country in the world where coal will ever again be as low in price as $1 a ton. We are going to be a great farming country, why cannot we be equally as great industrially? We are a military nation, why cannot we be also great in a truly national sense? Why can we not stop this constant stirring up of class hatred, this continuous snarling of one race against the other, and of one business against another, and become a truly united people worthy, in every sense of the term, of those brave men whose blood is to-day being shed so plentifully for our sake, and for the sake of all that we hold most dear in life?

M. D. A. LAFORTUNE (Jacques-Cartier) (translation): Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to preface the few remarks I am about to make by the last words fallen from the lips of my learned friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Currie) the hon. gentleman said: "Quebec and Ontario are inevitably husband and wife and they cannot be permanently separated," I am quite willing Sir, to contract marriage with the province of Ontario, but under one condition, namely, that Ontario shall deal justly with me. Husband and wife, forsooth! After marrying an Englishman, I would not be allowed to speak French; that is to say, being his wife, I would be denied the right of speaking my mother-tongue. Or else, I might not be able to speak English, and he might not understand French. How well we would understand one another, at the fireside! How nicely we would live together! He would say: "How dearly I love you, my wife, but take good care you do not speak French.

How sad such a match would be.

It is all very well for the hon. gentleman to make such remarks and say: "Let us live in peace, let us love one another, let us protect one another"; and then, when the question of the French language comes up, to say: "Cut it out, amputate the French tongue, do not speak French in the Ontario Schools, it is a crime." And the hon. gentleman talks about harmony, peace, toleration, "bonne entente". Let him first of all, begin by telling his fellow-countrymen. Let us mete out justice to the province of Quebec; let us grant the French Canadians full freedom to speak their mother tongue and practice their religion in the province of Ontario." And then we will talk about making love, an dthe courtship may perhaps result in wedlock.

Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to represent the mighty county of Jacques Cartier, the most beautiful, the most important, the most wealthy and the most populous in the Dominion.

Since the last election I have moved to Jacques-Cartier as a member of Parliament. I was sorry to leave Montcalm, for the old Administration had given full justice to the voters I had the honour of representing. I had got from them a great number of public works, a post office, several bridges, good roads, a railway, all sorts of things had been given me by the old Administration which was well-off financially, and as I said I was sorry to leave Montcalm; when that constituency was joined to l'Assomption county, there were two Liberal members, one representing Montcalm—myself—the other representing l'Assomption, my honourable colleague, Mr. Séguin. So I was asked to run in Jacques Cartier the old fortress of the Conservative Party, the old constituency of the ex-Minister of Public Works, the late Honourable F. D Monk. That gentleman represented Jacques Cartier from 1896 to his death, with honour to himself and a little benefit to his constituents. He was a good man, an honost man, a distinguished man, a lawyer of sterling worth.

Since 1878, the year of the famous contests between the late ex-Minister of Justice, Hon. Rodolphe Laflamme and the former M.P., the former Judge of the Supreme Court the late Hon. Désiré Girouard, from 1877 up to the death of Mr. Monk the election speeches in Jacques Cartier were always along this line: "You need a bridge from St. Anne to Ile Perrot and from Ile Perrot to Vaudreuil"—they spoke of two bridges. At every election this same appeal was trotted out and the voters were promised that if the candidate was elected he ;would move heaven and earth to have both these bridges erected.

Mr Speaker, when I see the millions and millions that are being asked of this House for things which are not indispensable and not a cent in the Estimates for the construction of these bridges, what must I think?

Mr. Monk went through many contests, from 1896 to his death, always victorious, always elected with a big majority, and always promising his electors to have these two bridges built.

When he became Minister of Public Works, the people began to feel easier, they began to expect that the bridges would be built, since their representative occupied the most important portfolio in the Government. All in vain; nothing was done. Millions upon millions were voted for all sorts of undertakings, but nary a cent for the St. Anne bridge nor for the Ile Perrot bridge.

In a way, I followed the example of my predecessors. I almost promised that these bridges would be built; but if I had known that the Administration we have at present would not include an item in the Estimates for the erection of these bridges, I am not sure that I would have been willing to run in that county.

If I must face again the voters of Jacques Cartier without these bridges having been constructed, what shall their opinion be of your humble servant? They will certainly point out: "Sir, you are no improvement on our former representatives, who made us the same promises as you did, but who in the like manner failed to make good. You promised us to make every effort and sacrifice, as in the case of the electors of Montcalm, and we blindly believed in your word."

As soon as this House prorogues, Mr. Speaker, I will begin an electoral tour, and when I will tell my constituents, as I will be forced to, that I failed in having a sufficient amount placed in the Estimates for the erection of these two bridges, what shall they think of me? Being a lawyer, I will endeavour to make the best plea possible, but I can assure you, Sir, that they expect a full account from me, because, as I have already stated, these two bridges must be constructed. How can we conceive that, since the Confederation to this date, when millions and hundreds of millions of dollars have been expended for public works of all kinds, Montreal, the Queen of this Dominion, still remains isolated? How can we imagine that even to-day it is impossible to leave the Island of Montreal by any other means of communication than by row-boat? People are fully served if they can afford to walk, but transportation of this kind is not of a ready use with a heavy load. A light parcel, a suit-case, or other small articles can easily be carried in a row-boat, but transportation becomes impracticable in the case of an automobile; it is better not to take any chance, for it would mean a straight diving to the bottom. The county of Jacques Cartier, as well as Ste. Anne de Bellevue, for years a town, with a great population, having within its limits most important buildings, such as the Macdonald College, located in the neighbourhood, and for which were freely expended millions over millions of dollars, and which is every year visited by thousands of people from all parts of the country, are nevertheless bereft of means of communication. In order to reach that town, one must cross from Ste. Anne de Bellevue to Vaudreuil, by way of Perrot Island in a row-boat. You may point out that railways are available. Granted. However, the big bug, the powerful, the rich would certainly not be satisfied with it, on account of smoke. Further, we do not enjoy so great a freedom in railway cars, being unable to go back at will. We cannot travel along in private with beautiful women of our choice. and whose company we crave. In a word, we are somewhat interfered with, whereas in motor-car we leave and return at as early or late an hour as it suits our own convenience, nobody being on the spot to peep or gaze. Well, Mr. Speaker, I state and hold that these two bridges must necessarily be built from a triple, commercial, intellectual and moral point of view.

It is with great pleasure and pride that a large hospital is now being erected by the Government at Sainte-Anne de Bellevue, and I must especially congratulate the Government who was so well inspired as to construct such an important hospital near the limits of the County which I have the honour to represent in this House, and this would seem to me an additional reason why honourable ministers here present should make all their endeavours to decide and hasten the erection of these bridges. The building of Charlemagne bridge, which was less necessary, whatever may be said in that connection, was carried out. but it was under the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The Brandon bridge was also erected to replace the old one, built years before, and which was moved twice a year, in the fall, lest it should be crushed by ice, and in the spring at the time of the freshet. Now, if Sir Wilfrid so well succeeded in constructing all these bridges in my former constituency of Montcalm, why should not the present Government be in a position to build the bridges I ask to-day for the county of Jacques-Cartier? Truly, the bridges to which I referred a moment ago were not as costly, but they were needed. Therefore, at the last election, my opponents were at bay in my electoral district, and they pointed out: "David is unbeatable". Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I had the honour of being returned by the voters of Jacques Cartier, as their representative, by a majority of more than 3,200 votes, although a great number of women have cast their votes for my opponent, on account of my getting older. However, I will not quarrel with them for they meant well, and I will endeavour to conquer them at the next election.

The Government friends, who were canvassing in behalf of the Union Government, stated everywhere that the Military Service Act was calculated to protect the farmers' sons, who should never be drafted, and that it was beyond reason to believe that the Union Government, if elected, would enlist the farmers' sons and send them over to war. Otherwise, Sir Robert Borden had declared to all comers that the Military Service Act was to scare the province of Quebec, and that they would not be sent overseas. But, Sir, now that the women of Jacques Cartier are witnessing the departure of their sons to war, these clever voters who had supported the Union Government have changed their mind, as they have changed their course and policy. I pity these voters who were so deceived by the Prime Minister and the clergy, from the pulpit, in our churches. Countrymen are good people, but easy believers. Priests have urged them to sign the National Service cards under the belief that conscription would never be enforced. Do not fear, they were told, we are in connection with people quite to the fact, and we are assured that conscription shall never pass.

Masses are now being chanted, and the holy sacrament is carried in the churches; processions take place after Mass, after Vespers, as in the evening, and the holy sacrament is exposed in order that the children of this country be not sent over to war. What a change! I join them, I walk with them, and I am inclined to tell these people: "You should have been better informed before inducing any one to sign the National Service cards."

But I revert to my two points:

When I see ministers, who represent the beautiful, large and important City of Montreal, perfectly aware of the correctness of my statement, I say that it is a scandal, a wrong to treat in such a way the large population living in the vicinity of Montreal, in the finest part of the Dominion. Millionaires residing at Quenneville, Baie d'Urfé, and Dixie, and all along the road, expect me to leave no stone unturned and continue to be their representative in this House until I have succeeded in having these bridges built by the Government. The voters of Soulanges, so ably represented by my hon. friend, Mr. Gustave Boyer, the electors of Vaudreuil—the two constituencies have been amalgamated—the voters of Coteau Landing, as well as those of Montreal, are all favouring that construction. I would now ask the hon. member for Ste. Anne (Hon. Mr. Doherty), whose absence I regret, and the hon. Minister of Marine (Hon. Mr. Ballantyne) to make all their endeavours in view of justice being done.

As for me, I do not need these bridges, but the Dominion tax-payers who have always contributed towards the building of bridges, towards the construction of railways all over the country, and of wharves, elevators, as well as of our roads, churches, jails, penitentiaries, and of our post-offices, shall never give up asking for justice until they have received their equal part of public works, and nothing but the erection of these two buildings would satisfy them. Justice must be done, and people will finally say that in this small section of the Dominion our position has been considered by the Ministers and given some kind of satisfaction.

Mr. Speaker, I will never stop pestering the Government so long as these two bridges have not been put up.

There is another bridge in my district which is not as important as the first two but which is very badly needed; I mean the bridge desired by the good voters of Bizard Isle who want to cross a part of the Ottawa and reach Jésus Isle. This need is imperative.

You see a rural population, a population made up of the best farmers in the country, the tobacco planters of Bizard Island. They have been there for years. With sweat and anguish they succeeded in getting a bridge from Bizard Isle to Saint Geneviève. Now they are protected. They are bellowing at me to speak to the Government, now when they see Ottawa spending hundreds of millions saying: "Mr. Lafortune, couldn't you at least get something towards our bridge from Ile Bizard to Ile Jésus?" I say: Gentlemen of Bizard Isle, were I alone in the matter your bridge would have been completed long ago. You see we are up against opponents. True, amongst these opponents are some former friends who will be favourable towards us; these are former Liberals who have left us on good grounds, they affirm. Let us take it for granted, although I wouldn't swear to it: however, we will not talk of the motives the honourable gentlemen had for leaving their old leader and following a new one. As for myself I can assure you that my price would be high to do a thing like that.

But what of all this, I have not lost faith. So I say: The bridge from Bizard Isle to Jésus Isle is absolutely necessary. I went to the place. The bridge will cost about $65,000. Perhaps you will say: Why do not you have this done by the provincial government? The provincial governments are ready to help us, just as they are ready to help us build the Saint Anne-Vaudreuil bridge. We are wondering whether this bridge is provincial or federal, or both. At Vaudreuil and at St. Anne the engineer of the Quebec Government stated that it was a federal bridge, while at Vaudreuil it would be more of a provincial bridge.

The governments could take hold together and try to build both bridges because they are in the public interest, in the general interest; and in a case like this I believe we should be protected by both Governments.

The same is true of Bizard Island; navigation is practicable there also. Between Bizard island and Jésus island the river runs quite deep and I think that with a little dredging it could be made very navigable. I am happy that the Honourable Minister of Marine is in his seat; he is familiar with the place in question. For instance, opposite Saint Geneviève there is what from time immemorial has been known as the "White Horse" a sort of little water-fall near Bigras Island. If the Government took the trouble to make this "White Horse" disappear the river would be open all the way from Hawkesbury and barges could easily transport all the fuel necessary for the town of Saint Laurent. Now, Mr. Speaker, I figure that it would only cost $5,000 to take away this obstacle. In days gone by a cabinet minister once took the trouble to go to this place and see for himself how things stood; he came back astonished, telling his friends he could not understand why this obstacle had not been taken away sooner, all the more so since this improvement would be of very great service to this part of the population. I hope the honourable minister will consider the few remarks I have made on this subject; and in that case I feel sure that before long the "White Horse" will have disappeared.

In olden days wood and coal were carried along this route but to-day the water level has fallen and the route becoming dangerous, had to be abandoned. There is some thing else that needs to be done in Jacques Cartier and I ask the particular attention of the Honourable Minister of Justice, who is my neighbour, since he represents Saint Anne division.

I wish to draw the Hon. Minister's attention to the serious disturbance that the passing to and fro of boats in the Lachine canal causes to the people of Ville-Emard and St. Gabriel on one side of the canal and to those in St. Paul and Côte-Turcot on the other side. When boats go through this canal the bridges are raised and thoroughfare is interrupted until they are lowered again. Every morning you find a crowd of workers waiting to get across to their work and the same thing goes on every hour, day and night, for as you know, the Lachine canal is very busy; this is very inconvenient for the workers who are often forced to be late at their places of employment and the employer naturally pays them no wages for this lost time. For years and years the city of Montreal and the different governments have been asked to build a tunnel at this place; a number of petitions and delegations have solicited the construction of this tunnel; but without avail. I would ask the Hon. Minister of Marine to join with me in asking the Government to build this tunnel; it will be perhaps the only thing to carry his name through history since his name will be inscribed on the entrance to the tunnel—not in letters of gold—times are too hard, and they would cost too much—but in well-polished letters. Everybody is agreed on the necessity of this undertaking, everybody admits that it is essential, still, like sister Ann, we are watching; but all we see is the dust of the road and the sun reddening the hill. I feel sure that if the Hon. Minister of Justice will help us in this we shall soon see something besides the dust of the road, for he has a great deal of influence over his colleagues; he is a valuable man, like all Irishmen; besides he has shown his powers and there is no need of my praising him here; he is energetic and like all Irishmen, again, when he starts a thing, it must either go through or be broken in the process. So I beg of the Hon. Minister of Justice to give me a hand, to put himself at the head of the movement and, together with the Hon. Minister of Marine, to show the Prime Minister how necessary it is to give justice to that part of the population I am interceeding for at this moment.

What would you say, what would these hon. gentlemen say if they had to pass through the Lachine canal quite often and if they saw 30, 40, 50, 100 workers, men, women and children, waiting to get through.

I have visited the place several times since I am in the county and I intend to go there still oftener so as to become possessed of the fact that by all means, the Honourable ministers must go there and see with their own eyes just what is happening, for I am convinced that they will not turn a deaf ear to the prayer of these good working-folk and will help me to get this tunnel built. Tunnels have been built in Montreal, in Beaudry St., and in Visitation St. The Hon. Minister of Marine who, with honour to himself and advantage to us, was a member of the Harbour Commission, undertook a great many costly works, through the Harbour Commission, to better the lot of the citizens of Montreal.

Now, I tell you, hon. minister, that you have done nothing; there can be no comparison between the necessity for building this tunnel and the very important works you did for Montreal. I feel sure that you will grant my request and will see that we get this tunnel and the day it is decided that we will get it I can assure you that it will be a holiday in your honour.

In Lachine, in the beautiful city of Lachine, a plot of land was bought to build a wharf. This land was bought a long time ago; but the wharf has not been built. In the meantime the people are using the wharf belonging to the Grand Trunk Railway Company and this wharf is in a bad state. If the Government is not ready to build the proposed wharf I would ask the hon. minister to see to it that the Grand Trunk wharf is repaired while waiting for the Government's projected wharf to be built. The wharf used is in bad shape and it would not cost much to repair it so as to make things a little easier for those whose business forces them to use it.

You were busy, Hon. Minister of Justice, so I am going to repeat what I was saying a moment ago.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: I would not want to miss that.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: I am going to repeat in two words what I said a moment ago. It is this: in your division of St. Anne you were elected by a large majority; although you were opposed by a man of sterling worth, of wonderful talent, despite all his efforts you triumphed over him. You are all the more indebted to your constituents. Rather you had two opponents and you defeated them both royally.

The people of Ville-Emard, of Monk boulevard, quite numerous, and now that the railway and the street cars are coming, now that we are going to have a new line along Côte St. Paul, St. Gabriel, Turcot, Ville-Emard, it is absolutely necessary, hon. minister, now that the tramways are going to run there—the commission has decided to lay new lines in that region—it seems to me, hon. minister that you should put yourself at the head of the movement to give this tunnel to these poor working people so that they will not lose any more time through waiting for the boats to go through and the bridges to be let down. I have seen 40, 50, 60 and more women and children, poor people, waiting for the bridge to close so they could continue on their way to work. It is a sorry sight. I feel sure that your sense of justice will not allow this thing to go on any longer and that you will put yourself, together with your colleague, the Hon. Minister of Marine, at the head of our movement and see to it that this tunnel is laid and that these people get fair treatment. I feel confident that you are going to do what I suggest.

There is a wharf at Pointe Clair, where I stopped recently.

An hon. MEMBER: The county was badly represented then?

Mr. LAFORTUNE: The county was well represented, but there was not a great deal of work done there. The late hon. Mr. Monk represented the district from 1896 until his death. He was in Opposition. I do not know if these works were refused him, but I see that the work has not been done.

Now there is no party to your Government. We can neither say that it is a Conservative Government nor a Liberal Government; it is a Union Government. So it is with confidence that I have recourse to our new Administration, feeling more or less certain that you will give some consideration to the voters I represent and grant them justice.

When I used to speak on behalf of the voters of Montcalm and go to the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier to request certain public works I was the mouth-piece of 4,000 voters and he gave me my share; but when I speak in the name of the voters of Jacques Cartier—there are 23,000 of them—I assure you that those people have the right to speak right out loud. There are several Acadians among them, and several Irish too. I assure you that you must listen to them because Irishmen sometimes raise a holler. I have also in my county a young lady who wishes to enter the postal service. I told her: "Poor little girl, you are pretty, but to-day there is no more patronage; you must pass your examinations; try to get a certificate from the Civil Service Commission." I hope that when I introduce her to the hon. ministers, with a little influence, I shall succeed in getting her a place.

Mr. Speaker, the present Government is doing some dredging at Ste. Anne de Bellevue. The people in these parts are very grateful to the Government but they find that the work is not getting ahead fast enough and they are afraid that what has been dredged will be filled up again before the thing is completed.

That reminds me of the way things were done when we built the Soulanges canal which was started towards 1896; some excavation was done in the fall, but the following spring the place filled up again and we never got ahead. When the hon. leader of the Opposition came into power he went about matters with the care, the activity and the energy which universally characterize him; the canal was completed and is to-day the finest ornament in my county. When I pass through the Soulanges canal I would like to see the name of Sir Wilfrid Laurier written on all the stones which line the canal, it is so beautiful, it would be so worthy of the name of the hon. leader of the Opposition, and in all frankness I must say that it is the finest I have ever seen. Yes, Mr. Speaker, this dredging must be brought to a head, if my good friends are to be pleased.

Now I take up a question which is very dear to me, Mr. Speaker. I am really very sorry to find that the estimates brought down by the hon. Minister of Finance (hon. Mr. Maclean) do not contain sufficient sum to encourage the holding of a great fair in Montreal; still, I have been begging the Government to do this for a long time. The hon. Minister of Justice and the hon. Minister of Marine must admit that Montreal suffers from the fact that she does not have a fair every year. Twenty-five years ago I was present at the last annual exhibition held in Montreal at the Mile End grounds. In spite of my beseeching nothing has been done and it is truly pitiable to hear the hon. members on the other side of the House speak of agriculture, of progress, of farm-improvement. On behalf of all those things have not I the right to say to the Government: Place in your Estimates a sufficient sum to enable Montreal to take up once more the annual fairs which she held in the past and which the city was obliged to abandon for lack of funds. Still, Mr. Speaker, we find in the budget that sums are voted for Toronto, Guelph, Three Rivers, St. Hyacinthe; even in the parish of St. Scholastique I have witnessed from 25,000 to 30,000 people gathered there from the surrounding country to visit the annual fair held there and I was ashamed that the city of Montreal, the Queen of the Dominion, despite the claims of our friends from Ontario who say that Toronto is the Queen of our fair Dominion, since Montreal has one hundred thousand more population than Toronto, I was ashamed that the city of Montreal should have no annual fair. The city of Toronto, although of less importance receives every year from the Federal treasury a large sum which enables it to hold its exhibition every year. I am in favour of encouraging these fairs in all the large cities like Toronto, Winnipeg, in a word, in all the provinces, for I believe that these exhibitions are bound to play an important part in the future of the country; I would like to see more done in that regard than has been the custom in the past; but why not give the province of Quebec her share; why not let Montreal hold a fair to the enormous advantage of its agriculture, its trade and its numerous industries? For that purpose Mr. Speaker the Government should vote at least $50,000 every year, and Montreal should moreover be helped by the provincial parliament.

The farmers are told that they should increase their production. I submit that the holding of fairs would be a great stimulant to the farmer, enabling him to have more known about his products, which would result in his receiving better prices. For my own part I must say that I have 10,000 pounds of tobacco from last year's crop; the crop was good, although half the product is below standard on account of the imperfect drying of the tobacco. If we had held a fair at Montreal I could have exhibited my products and I would have likely got a better price for them, although both the crop and the prices were very satisfactory last year. An exhibition brings better appreciation of the work of man, of intellectual and manual effort, and everybody learns while they are enjoying themselves. Once more I hope that the Government will not turn a deaf ear to my request.

Another thing that I would ask from the Government also is a national holiday for the agricultural class. All the other classes of the population have a national day of rejoicing; the agricultural class alone has none. This class comprises more than 65 per cent of the population of the country and to my mind it is only just that the Government should proclaim a day, as both a civic and a legal holiday, set apart every year for the especial benefit of the agricultural class of our population.

I come to another point. If it be true that the province of Quebec should have its share in the public monies voted for the holding of annual fairs it is further true that it should receive its share in the matter of good roads. Many of our roads are in need of improvement and this improvement is imperative if agricultural industry is to flourish in our province. Here I make a special appeal to the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) who spent his youth on a farm and I would ask him to place in his Estimates a sufficient amount for the construction of good roadways in our province. I shall perhaps be told by those on the Government benches that session before last they wanted to vote $10,000,000 for this purpose and that the said sum was to be distributed among the different provinces. I was in favour of the principle of this bill but I voted against the measure as did every member of the Opposition because the Prime Minister and his colleagues reserved the right to spend that money when and how they pleased, and as they saw fit. All that we asked at the time was that this money be distributed proportionately to population and that the provinces themselves have the handling of the funds.

The Senate supported the amendment that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had prepared. The bill came back to this House but they did not want to accept the amendment; the bill granting $10,000,000 for the construction of good roads was put aside. I say that in safeguarding the autonomy of our provinces it was absolutely necessary not to consent to this money being spent by the Ministers to suit themselves. We were perfectly right in insisting that these millions be spent by the provinces and thus protect automony.

It is absolutely necessary for the Government to make sacrifices in this direction for the sake of good roads. It is absolutely essential in a country like ours to see to it that our roads are kept in good condition.

Moreover, why not include in the budget an important amount to help the farming class, to reclaim wild land, land which lies too low, land that is covered with water, land that yields nothing; that can not be cultivated on account of its natural position. This sort of land requires special treatment.

Let us protect the farmer, protect him in a practical, logical way. Go through the province of Quebec, go through the province of Ontario, go into any province in the country and you will find acres upon acres of land which give no yield because they are not drained. The Government never had a better chance to show some real administrative wisdom; vote an important sum every year and say to the farmer: you have so many acres that yield nothing because they need to be attended to. We are going to advance you the necessary money for putting this land in good shape; we will take a lien on your property; and when the work is done you must get a certificate from the Departmental inspector to the effect that the work on your land has been done in accordance with the rules of the Department. I hope this matter will receive your serious consideration; that is at the root of all success.

A distressing thing these days is to see the farmers unable to procure the necessary fodder for their stock. It seems to me that the Government should do something to help the farmers to get the bran and shorts they need. As things are a great many farmers are forced to dispose of their cattle. Labour is becoming so hard to get and animal fodder is so high in price that a large number of farmers are beginning to sell their stock. A practical way for the Government to come to the help of the farmer in this matter would be to oblige the milling establishments to keep a little of our wheat, bran, shorts and middlings in this country instead of sending them all to foreign parts. I can assure you that there is nothing funny about it when we have to pay $70, $54 and $42 a ton for different kinds of feed grains. This thing is phenomenal. It must be remedied.

When I had the honour of discussing the reciprocity treaty that the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier wanted to bring about with the United States I was happy to foresee the possibility of buying corn cheap. If we had a treaty with the Americans today so that we could get from Illinois all the seed grain and all the corn we wanted, especially the corn which we do not grow in this country; we could buy it cheap and feed it to our stock: we could feed the pigs, the horses, the cows, the poultry and the sheep; with corn you can feed any animal. Sometimes it is too heavy for them, then you must mix it with a little oats; you cannot always use corn alone, but with a little care and proper mixing you can get along without wheat or barley and still feed your farm stock profitably.

We have suffered a frightful shortage and to-day we begin to see that we should have concluded that treaty with the United States, not a general treaty because I would have voted against a general treaty. For instance if there had been talk of concluding a treaty which would have put tobacco on the free list, tobacco that we grow—I who represented a county, the county of Montcalm—where all the people know is how to grow tobacco, would certainly have voted against any such general treaty which admitted American tobacco free of duty; what we needed was a special treaty for the exchange of goods, which we do not produce or which we do not produce in sufficient quantity, with the United States who have a surplus of these same goods.

This afternoon I heard an hon. gentleman on the Government side speak of corruption. I know neither his name nor the district he represents, but this gentleman was imprudent in speaking of corruption. He was speaking of corruption under the old Liberal regime. That was a poor compliment to certain hon. gentleman who are sitting beside him today. He should know that you must never mention the noose in the house of a man who has been hung. I know something about it; I have sent several of these poor wretches into Eternity, as a matter of duty, and one must never speak of the noose in the house of a man who has been hanged.

I do not know if the hon. gentleman knows the history of his country. I could have told him about corruption, about the monstrous scandals which made their appearance under Conservative administrations. He is not in his chair, so I will leave him alone; but he musn't repeat that.

Mr. Speaker, over and over again I have read the new tariff on Canadian tobacco and American tobacco; if the tobacco industry has flourished in this country we owe it to the policy inaugurated by the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In former times when we had a duty of only 5 cents to help Canadian tobacco to compete against the American product the industry was practically worthless. However, those who inaugurated tobacco planting in Montcalm continued to grow a little as a matter of habit; later the Liberal Government put on a duty of 10 cents. We began to feel fine. Later the duty was raised to 28 cents. The golden period had come; tobacco growing, in the county of Montcalm, as in Essex and Rouville, became a success. A duty of 28 cents a pound had never been asked against American tobacco; but a powerful delegation came before the old Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier as they came before the new Government and they asked for 7 cents more; they proved, beyond all doubt, it seems to me, that the interest of the tobacco industry in Canada demanded an increase of seven cents in the duty on imported tobacco. We were well received on both occasions; this delegation was well received by the old Liberal Government. We had hopes and at one moment I felt that we would succeed. But the general elections came around; the matter had been laid aside; and the Government went down to defeat. We came back before the new regime; we pleaded our cause before the hon. Minister of the Interior and the hon. Minister of Finances (Mr. White). I think we succeeded in convincing them that it was necessary to raise the duty to 35 cents; however, matters went no further. Every time the farmer asks for a little help he is met by opposite interests; the manufacturers. Every time that the tobacco grower succeeds in having the duty on tobacco increased he is met by the cigar manufacturers who refuse to increase their prices, and very often we are their victims.

I notice, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. minister who represents the Minister of Finance has put a further tax of from 28 to 40 cents, and even from 40 to 60 cents on American tobacco while putting a tax of 5 cents on Canadian tobacco. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the voters I represent I thank the hon. minister for having put a tax of from 28 to 60 cents on American tobacco in favour of Canadian tobacco.

Thanks to this tax the Canadian planters will be able to compete successfully with the American planters; we are all glad to pay the 5 cents tax.

The honourable member who preceded me said that on the 17th of last December the Canadian people went to the polls with their heads held high, proud to vote for the Union Government. If they did this it was because the leader of the new Administration had promised them that they would not be conscripted. So it is that to-day we witness delegations on delegations coming to Ottawa to protest against their sons being sent to the battlefields; and I know that when you go before your constituents you will be in a fine muddle; and if the election were to be held over again to-day I can assure you that the people of Canada would not go to the polls so gaily. You told those brave mothers that their sons would not be conscripted; they believed you and sent their sons to vote for Union Government. To-day this opinion has changed. We are told with a flourish of trumpets that a great delegation will come to Ottawa on the 14th to protest against the recent Order in Council concerning farmers' sons; we also learn through the newspapers that the hon. Mr. Caron, Minister of Agriculture in Quebec, will head the delegation from that province. I hope that those honourable members whose counties will be represented in this delegation will make it their duty to assist at this interview. We shall have the pleasure of seeing some of those wonderful people from Ontario who declared that Sir Wilfrid did not know what he was doing. I am in a hurry to see the face they will make when the Prime Minister tells them he can do nothing for them; you will see, Mr. Speaker, if they are in a pleasant mood and if they will shout again: "Hurrah for conscription!"

Now I come back to the town of Ste. Anne that I was speaking of a while ago, to tell this House how badly the town is in need of a post office. It seems to me that this post office is certainly due St. Anne which has quite a population, constantly on the increase; then they have a number of important business establishments, besides Macdonald College, which employs a great many people, and the new naval hospital that the Government is now building there. I hope that the Postmaster General will think over my request, not forgetting St. Genevieve which is also sorely in need of a post office. My worthy constituents have asked me to submit their request to the hon. minister; it is my duty to do it; and I do it gladly. During the former Government's tenure of office post offices rose as if by enchantment; every city whose population was sufficiently numerous to warrant a post office being built there was sure to obtain one from us. I would like to see the present Administration follow the same policy. So, in a nutshell, I say that a post office at both St. Genevieve and Ste. Anne de Bellevue would be very useful.

A moment ago I heard one of the hon. members in the course of the very interesting remarks he made to the House say that he approved the taxes brought down by the hon. Minister in his budget speech; only he doesn't like the methods used to levy these taxes; he would like to see the people taxed in such a way that they would not notice it. Mr. Speaker, the members who sit in this House are the authorized representatives of the people and the people have the right to demand that their representatives here be sincere and straight forward. I want to say to the hon. member that when you start out to attain a certain good you should take the best means of getting there and not try to hide the truth. No, Mr. Speaker, let us be frank and above board with the people. Let us tell them just how things stand; you cannot, you should not do otherwise. The people who toil and who pay decidedly have the right to demand sincerity in those whom they pay. So I believe that we should speak out frankly to them and tell them the truth about matters. I have never done otherwise.

Mr. MACKIE (Edmonton): Will the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. LAFORTUNE: Certainly.

[Mr. Lafortune.]

Mr. MACKIE: If I understand the hon. member, I conclude from what he says that he is opposed to direct taxation.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: I never said that, Mr. Speaker. I am merely blaming the hon. member who told this House that we should tax the people in such a way that they would not notice it.

About the time of the last election a very important question was discussed in this House: the question of establishing farming stations in the different centres of the Dominion. We already had large experimental farms in Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and at Cap Rouge, Quebec and Ste. Anne de la Pocatière. I do not think we have enough of these establishments.

We have an experimental farm at Ottawa and its usefulness is recognized far and wide, but this is not enough for the farmers and I would like to see agricultural stations at different places in the provinces to give the farmers still more information. In the county of Montcalm the Government has established an experimental station for tobacco. At St. Jacques de l'Achigan they have succeeded in getting an agricultural station which is a tremendous help to the people of that locality. The Minister of Agriculture has just told me that the lease has expired. You wish to change the station; very well, so long as you set up some place else to better advantage and with greater efficiency. Last year we grew three million pounds of tobacco. As for myself every year I plant ten arpents with tobacco.

In the budget we meet no very great encouragement for dairies and creameries. I think that these latter should receive much more from the Government. Everything comes high and those who are engaged in the dairy industry should receive more protection. So I suggest to the hon. Minister of Agriculture that he put larger sums in the budget for the encouragement of agriculture.

Agricultural societies should receive special atention; co-operative societies and cattle-raising associations should get more encouragement. When we have millions and millions to spend it seems to me that we should be able to do something for agriculture.

It is necessary also for the Government to appoint inspectors the better to protect our cattle against contagious diseases. For instance, at St. Laurent, near Montreal, through an epidemic the college at this place lost 150 head of pork while the nuns lost 200 head. I myself have lost some thoroughbred animals; they died because the village veterinary did not know how to treat them.

We want these inspectors, Mr. Speaker; we have a right to them and the Government should not refuse to give them to us. These inspectors would also ascertain what animals are unfit for breeding and have them killed with the unhealthy cattle.

I once spoke to the former Postmaster General, the Hon. Mr. Pelletier, about a question of public interest and asked him why a law was not passed forbidding people to enclose money in letters which were not registered. For the last twelve years I have been a Crown prosecutor in Montreal and it always pains me to see young folks who come of good families enter the postal service and then be dragged into court for having stolen 50 cents, 75 cents or a dollar from letters which were not registered; in cases of this kind the law does not consider the amount stolen and the minimum sentence that a judge may pronounce is three years in the penitentiary. If such a law were passed temptation would disappear; registered letters are never rifled for the simple reason that they are traced from their point of departure to their destination. Since a law of this kind would bring a little money into the public Treasury it would cause a double advantage, for at the same time it would shield those young people from temptation. The former minister, Mr. Pelletier, promised to give the matter his serious consideration. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, a similar law exists in many countries. Very often these young folks are led astray by their youth; they take a small amount thinking that they will be able to refund it the next day; but if they are caught in the meantime, they are sentenced to three years in the penitentiary.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we hear a lot of talk about recruiting and I wonder why the hon. Minister of Justice does not send the inmates of our prisons to the front. It appears to me that when we are making every effort to send to the front our young men of education and character it is not asking too much of the Government to send, too, the inmates of our prisons and our penitentiaries. I do not claim that we should send all prisoners to war; such a policy would be dangerous in the case of murderers and cutthroats; but I see no objection to sending those guilty of minor offences. It would be a saving to the country, for each prisoner costs us from $175 to $215 a year and they give practically nothing to the State in return. If they were permitted to enlist they would be able to earn something for their families and they should certainly be of more service to the country over there than they can possibly be in our prison cells. Very recently I asked the hon. Minister of Justice to allow a young man of 27 to enlist; he is serving a prison term for a minor offence and I hope that when the hon. minister is in possession of all the facts he will grant my request. This young man, while making himself useful to the State, will greatly help his family, who are sorely in need of such help.

I regret to keep the attention of the House so long; but I speak so seldom that when I do take the floor I must speak for some length of time if I want my words to matter.

I want to make a brief reply to the hon. member who spoke of corruption this afternoon. Mr. Speaker, every promise we made, we kept. I remember very well in 1893, I was in front of the old House of Commons at that grand reunion when Sir Wilfrid Laurier was chosen as the leader of the Liberal party after the departure of Edward Blake. We had promised to do away with revisers, those gentlemen who went about in the country districts and put on the voting lists the names they chose. I do not say that they were not honest, but when we asked them if so and so, and this fellow and that fellow, were on the list we always found that they were not; and what was rather curious was the fact that those forgotten were always Liberals. Do you know how things were done? These gentlemen used to drive through the country districts in a fine carriage smoking Havana cigars; when they came into a parish they would ask the secretary of the municipality what names should be on the list; and as these secretaries were usually friendly towards the Conservatives, the Liberals suffered.

We did away with these revisers and we placed the voters' lists once more in the hands of the secretary-treasurers of the municipalities. All is now plain sailing and I hope there will never be any change.

A certain number of commercial treaties were repealed. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was a shrewd diplomat; he set aside those treaties which were to our disadvantage and passed a number of new treaties which were very much in Canada's favour.

We had promised to reduce the cost of postage stamps and we kept our promise. Three-cent stamps were sold for two and the two-cent stamps dropped to one cent.

When the hon. Postmaster General of those days, Mr. Lemieux, took over the department, the preceding year had witnessed, there, a deficit of $750,000 and the following year the new minister came out with a million dollar surplus. But it must be said that when the Liberals came into power they put new keys everywhere and new locks and bolts; in a word, everything was put under lock and key and both locks and keys were new and in good working-order; so the deficit was turned into a surplus. Every year the former Conservative Admintration showed a huge deficit; but the Liberal Government always had a huge surplus to show. Sir Wilfrid Laurier is difficult of persuasion; he looks twice at any problem before spending on it and he had with him a man of high worth, Mr. Fielding, his minister of the treasury. I can assure you that this gentleman never used sausages to leash a dog. I can assure you that before getting anything from the former Minister of Finance you had to have very good reasons and take plenty of time proving their worth. I can assure you that there was nothing prodigal about him; he was not liked because he was too strict; but all honour to him; he was honest, faithful, an administrator of the highest worth. It is very regrettable that he should have disappeared from our ranks; but he will come back to us; you may be sure of that.

We had promised the electorate that public contracts would not be given as in the past. The Government had decided to award contracts to the lowest bidder. Many times we Liberals were displeased to see contracts being given to opponents, but Sir Wilfrid Laurier was inexorable and Mr. Fielding would hear of nothing but the lowest bidder, no matter whether he were friend or opponent. That was the straight line and he never swerved from it: all contracts were awarded to the lowest bidder.

We had promised that our contracts would make sure of the workingmen being paid. Before that the workers' wages were lost, drawn on, not to say stolen. A contract was awarded to a bidder. He passed it to another party and this party to a third and so on; and while it went from one to the other the workers' wages were not protected. In the original contracts we inserted a clause to the effect that no matter whether the contract changed hands the worker was to be sure of his pay. That explains why the workingmen everywhere always greeted Sir Wilfrid Laurier with such warmth; he had insured the payment of their salaries large and small, alike. We had promised to do that; and we kept our word.

We had promised to pass a law against usury, this festering sore which was ruining everybody. We forbade usury under penalty of fine or imprisonment. This law put an end to a lot of dishonest dealing. These things took place under the administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

The country became so prosperous that the banks were overflowing with money. The legal rate of interest was reduced from 6 per cent 5 per cent and it is still at 5 per cent.

There there was the school question, which had passionately interested the country from one end to the other; we had promised to settle that question and thank God, Sir Wilfrid Laurier settled it in a manner satisfactory both to the State and to the Catholics. And when I hear opponents declare that this question can still be a subject for discussion pro and con I tell them that it is not; that, thanks to the intervention of the Prime Minister of that time, the question has been settled.

We had promised to put a stop to emigration. Hundreds upon hundreds and even thousands of our Canadians were crossing the border, before 1896, because they could not make a decent living in this country. Hardly had Sir Wilfrid Laurier come into power than emigration ceased as if by magic. We afforded our protection to all our citizens, so that instead of losing them, many of our Canadians who had gone to the United States came back to this country.

There is a subject that I have already discussed and that I will take the license of discussing again: the Parliamentary indemnity and the salaries paid our ministers; these amounts are too small. You see men of great worth come here and sit in this House, at the cost of heavy sacrifices, and all for a measly $2,500. When we see the city of Montreal, for instance, come here and take away our best members, and give them salaries of $10,000 or even $12,000 a year . . . . well, I say that the ministers of the Cabinet are not doing themselves justice when they do not vote themselves reasonable salaries.

I feel sure that the members of both sides of the House would vote in favour of an increased indemnity, whether it be popular or not. When you are dealing with a matter of justice it is not time to curry popular favour; it is time to render justice.

No, Mr. Speaker, I contend that the indemnity of $2,500 is far from sufficient, if you consider that the member of Parliament is obliged to contribute, from night to morning and from morning till night to all sorts of patriotic and religious undertakings.

Mr. MACKIE: Does not the hon. member believe that members should be paid according to the length of their speeches?

Mr. LAFORTUNE: No, Mr. Speaker; members of Parliament are far too precious for that; you cannot measure things like that by the armful. I would like to see a reasonable indemnity paid to us members and to the hon. ministers of the Cabinet, for the present indemnity is not reasonable if you consider that the city solicitor of Montreal receives $15,000 a year, and the members of the Street Railway Commission $10,000 each. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, are those men worth any more than we? No. This is so true that when one of those good little Sisters comes and knocks at my door asking for help I can only answer: I am happy my good Sister, that you have come to my house, and that you have not forgotten me; if you had forgotten me I would have been very sorry indeed; but my good Sister, all I can give you is 50 cents, or a dollar; you understand, we are obliged to give for all sorts of purposes and we are always in the lead in everything; a church is never built, church-bells are never blessed, the corner stone of a monastery or a convent is never laid without the member of Parliament being there right in front. I will give you another example, Mr. Speaker. When a man loses a horse in a parish of your county, he comes to the member and tells him that he killed his horse at the last election helping to get the member of Parliament elected and that he ought to be shown some consideration for his devotion to the good cause. Yes, Mr. Speaker, if our indemnity were increased our good constituents would be delighted; they would be glad when they came to see us and they would say: Now that you are better paid as a member of Parliament we hope you will show a little more generosity. As for the ministers, if they were better paid, they would give better service to the country. What I am saying now, every one of you admits to himself; but you do not dare to say it; I am not afraid of the voters, Mr. Speaker; I never was afraid of the voters.

Under the old regime the farmers made more profit out of their products thanks to the Hon. Minister of Finances of those days, the Hon. Mr. Fielding, who equipped our railways with refrigerator cars and our ships with cold storage chambers, and that was why our Canadian products enjoyed such vogue on the other side of the water.

We had promised further that there would be no scandals; and there were none. No, Mr. Speaker; I beg your pardon, I was mistaken; there was the paint scandal. Do you know anything about this notorious paint scandal? A man, a member of this House had been imprudent enough to buy a can of paint and forgot to pay for it. He had told them to send him the bill; the bill was sent him; but neglected to settle it. There you have in a few words all there was to the notorious paint scandal. I was a member of the committee and I can assure this honourable House that it was merely imprudence on the part of the member to have gone and bought his paint in the Government store rather than to have bought it at the corner merchant's. For this imprudence, Mr. Speaker, he lost his mandate, the character of an honest man was blackened, and some even wanted to strip him of all honour. Our friends on the other side say that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had promised to do something to the tariff whenever he came into power, but that once he was Prime Minister he never did anything about it. Then how do you explain the fact that what was an annual deficit in every branch of Government became an annual surplus under Sir Wilfrid Laurier if we always had the same tariff as before?

When Sir John A. Macdonald got hold of the reins of Government a great many of our friends were thrown out and there was a large number of dismissals merely because these employees were Liberals. We had promised to give them back their jobs; and we did it. We examined the main cases that were brought to our attention and we reinstated those who had been unjustly dismissed.

Mr. Speaker, in former days we granted subsidies to a good many railways. The Hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne) was appointed Harbour Commissioner of Montreal; he did wonderful things there; the mightiest of elevators were erected, wharves were built, and all that we needed was accomplished with success; all that required money; but he found the necessary money and he did honour to the position he occupied. The St. Lawrence river was dredged to accommodate inland navigation. The channel was widened and deepened and a system of buoys was set up; and all this was done under the guidance of the Hon. Minister of Marine. If he meets with the same success in the administration of his department as crowned his efforts there he will be entitled to our congratulations.

Now let us speak of the Soulanges canal, the Great Trunk Pacific and the Quebec bridge.

I remember what our opponents used to say to the old Administration about the Quebec bridge; they said that the bridge had fallen down because the Cabinet had employed incompetent workmen; but they, who claimed to employ for this same bridge the most competent workmen, the greatest experts on the face of the globe, were overtaken by the same disaster. You did not see the Liberals take advantage of the opportunity to pass unfair remarks.

All honour to those who had a part in this gigantic undertaking. The bridge is completed.

The Victoria bridge was subsidized. This bridge had no accommodation for vehicles or pedestrians. It took many millions to alter the bridge so as to accommodate vehicles and pedestrians and help trade on the southern shore. That was done by the Liberal Government.

The Intercolonial Railway had its terminus at Lévis; the former Government changed this terminus to the Bonaventure Station at Montreal. The result of this change was astonishing, and the country will be thankful to Mr. Fielding for it.

We began certain preliminary work on the Georgian Bay Canal. We went to considerable expense in this connection, chiefly for excavation and for hydrographic surveys, etc. I regret that this canal was not continued; the reason given by the old Government was that there were more urgent needs to be met, like the Hudson Bay railroad, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the completion of Montreal harbour. But I hope that before long the country will be in a position to undergo the necessary sacrifices to execute this projet of the Georgian Bay Canal. It would certainly be in the interest of Canadian trade, doing away with a distance of some 400 miles and bringing about a big reduction in the transportation cost of our western grain.

When the Liberals wanted to change their fiscal policy a little, I think I still hear the hon. gentlemen who were then in opposition saying: "Don't touch it; let well enough alone", after saying for years that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was leading the country into bankruptcy; that his Administration was worthless. Coming from the Prime Minister and his friends that was quite a compliment to pay the former Administration. If it was a good administration, why did you oppose it? Why did you go through the country crying out against waste, against robbery, and doing your worst to destroy his policy? That is how sincere these gentlemen are.

[Mr. Lafortune.]

When the Liberals spoke of building ships in this country they were told that it was a ridiculous idea; and, to hear the Prime Minister of to-day talk then, it was absurd, it was utter nonsense, it was nothing short of childish, to speak of building ships in our country. Are these gentlemen willing to say the same thing to-day? What hypocrites. They who are now asking us for millions to build Canadian ships called us ridiculous when Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Hon. Mr. Fielding wanted to do the same thing. That is how sincere they are.

This afternoon an hon. member said: Give the farmer his bushel of wheat. We are not asking you, sir, for our bushel of wheat; we are asking you to leave us the children who belong to us; do not take away the children off our soil; leave these young folk, the flower of our people, the future of our country, where they are. You come into our farming districts to take away the children of 19, 20, 21 and 22 years of age and you talk about increasing agricultural production. Don't you know what is going on in the countryside? We are told: Take men from the cities, take women, to work in the fields, Yes, we can take women for ploughing and for harrowing; we will take women for farm work— the notion is childish! Take men from the cities, we are told. Yes, they'll come and work on a farm for a day; but the next morning not one of them will be able to stand on his feet. These things require experience and concentration. It isn't any Tom, Dick and Harry who can make farming pay. You need practical men; men who have spent their lives on a farm. Those who ladle out this advice to the farmers are off their trolley.

Mr. Speaker, I am through. I know that you will not be sorry, and I am proud that you have given me your kind attention and have listened quietly, as usual, to my remarks. I believed I was keeping within bounds. You did me justice; so much the better; you were decidedly the man to preside over the deliberations of this Chamber and I tender my congratulations to the Prime Minister for having appointed you. He never did a better thing in his life. If only he did as well in other respects I would be very grateful to him. I thank the House for their kind attention and I resume my seat, happy if I have been of some use to those who elected me.

COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS.

Motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean agreed to, and the House went into Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

CUSTOMS.

Tariff item 27—Coffee, roasted or ground, when not imported direct from the country of growth and production, per pound—British Preferential Tariff 8 cents and 7½ per cent; Intermediate Tariff 10 cents and 10 per cent; General Tariff 10 cents and 10 per cent.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This item calls for both a specific and an ad valorem duty. What is the reason for such a high duty?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We are only increasing the specific duty, not the ad valorem.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the increase?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The old rate was 4 cents and 7½ per cent preferential; the general tariff was 5 cents and 10 per cent.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Will the new rate not be prohibitive?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This item covers indirect importations, on which the tariff is higher than on direct importations for domestic consumption.

Item agreed to.

Tariff item 29a.—Tea n.o.p., per pound—British Preferential Tariff 10 cents and 10 per cent; Intermediate Tariff, 10 cents and 10 per cent; General Tariff, 10 cents and 10 per cent.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the difference here?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There always was a tariff on tea under this item, and it had reference to indirect importations. The only difference is that we are adding the ten cents specific duty to the ad valorem duty which was in existence before. The purpose of the duty on indirect importations is to preserve that trade to Canadian business houses, otherwise it would go to the United States or to some other country.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Do you make any distinction in the tea grown in the British possessions?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is not proposed to give any preference to tea grown in British countries. This tariff is imposed particularly for the purpose of securing revenue, and we are applying here the same principle that we do to importations of liquors and tobaccos. However, there is a great deal to say in favour of granting a preference to British-grown tea——

Mr. LEMIEUX: In normal times.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: ——but at the present time I did not think it wise to make any distinction. Owing to the inability of shippers of teas from India and Ceylon to secure shipping, it would really make very little difference to them, or they would have very little advantage. At the next session of Parliament, however, I think the matter might very well be considered.

Item agreed to.

Tariff item 144.—Cut Tobacco per pound—British Preferential Tariff 95 cents; Intermediate Tariff 95 cents; General Tariff, 95 cents.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the increase on this item?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Thirty cents per pound.

Item agreed to.

Tariff item 145.—Manufactured Tobacco n.o.p. and Snuff per pound—British Preferential Tariff 90 cents; Intermediate Tariff, 90 cents; General Tariff, 90 cents.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The increase there is 30 cents.

Item agreed to.

Tariff item 657a—Cinematograph or moving picture films positives, one and one-eighth of an inch in width and over, per linear foot—British Preferential Tariff 3½ cents; Intermediate Tariff, 5 cents; General Tariff, 5 cents.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Since I gave notice of these resolutions it has been brought to my attention that the proposed tariffs upon the articles mentioned in this item are excessive. It would amount to an increase of more than one hundred per cent and would bear too heavily upon importers of films. The tariff rate before was 25 per cent plus 7½ per cent, equal to 2⅜ cents per lineal foot. I beg to propose an amendment which will provide that the British preferential tariff under item 657a shall be 2 cents, the intermediate tariff 3 cents and the general tariff 3 cents. I have given notice of an amendment to the special War Revenue Act to provide that a tax shall be paid upon moving picture films of one and one-eighth of an inch in width and over to the amount of 15 cents for each film—that is, in addition to the tariff as I propose that it shall be amended. At a later date I shall ask the committee to pass this resolution, notice of which has been given.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Films are shown successively in different cities at different times. A film may be shown in Ottawa, Montreal and other Canadian cities, returned to the United States, and then sent back to Canada. Does that film pay duty only once?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The films pay the duty each time they come into Canada.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am not sufficiently familiar with the intricacies of the tariff imposed by this item to realize the exact extent of the duty on moving picture films. There may be something in the argument of my hon. friend that we should not overtax this particular business. But these moving picture shows are always filled to the limit. The theatres on Bank, Sparks and Sussex streets are always crowded, and very frequently people may be seen waiting at the doors. If any reduction of the proposed additional taxation is intended, I suggest that it be made on tea.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: These films are usually one thousand feet in length and the tax of 3 cents per lineal foot amounts to $30 per reel. Since the introduction of the resolution it has been pointed out to me that at the beginning of the year contracts were made for the year with the manufacturers of films for the lease of films and there is now no way in which the persons entering into these contracts could protect themselves. The item as it now stands would be an injustice to such persons, but, as amended, with the additional tax on the exhibitors of films which I propose to submit to the committee, we shall receive as much revenue and the taxation will be more fairly distributed.

Mr. FIELDING: Some years ago, in one of the revisions of the tariff, an item was inserted prohibiting the importation of posters and handbills depicting scenes of crime and violence—I think my recollection of the phraseology is correct. We found that large numbers of printed handbills and posters were being brought in from the United States depicting scenes which could not fail to have an unpleasant effect. I think that item is still in the tariff, and we all agree that it is a wise provision, but I do not suppose that under the wording of the tariff as it stands, that provision would apply to moving picture films. Some of the films which are being brought in today certainly depict scenes of crime and violence and are not of a very elevating character, and I suggest that my hon. friend discuss the matters with the customs officials. Let us make sure that while we prohibit handbills depicting scenes of crime and violence, we do not allow moving pictures to be brought in which are just as bad or worse. It is true that we have censors in each province, but if we use the machinery of the customs to prevent the importation not only of handbills but of films depicting scenes of that character, it would be a step in the right direction.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I move:

That the following words be added after item 657a:

"Provided, however, that the goods hereinbefore enumerated shall be exempt from the rates of duties of customs specified in section 3 of the Customs Tariff War Revenue Act, 1915."

The purpose of that amendment is to provide that the Customs Tariff War Revenue Act, which imposes 5½ per cent under the British preference and 7½ per cent under the general tariff, shall not apply to these several items.

Mr. MOWAT: It is evident that the picture show people have been making to the acting minister representations which have induced him to make this reduction, but I am glad to hear him say that the revenue is not to suffer by that. The point I wish to make is this, that I think he should impress upon the picture show people the fact that the kind of plays that are being shown are not at all popular with a large part of our population. I am not now discussing those pictures depicting crimes and things of that sort that are demoralizing, but the picture show people are utterly without discretion as to what films they bring into Canada. Whilst some of the pictures are very good and some of the parts are taken by the best actors and actresses, yet there are others which show altogether the seamy side of life and not our life. The consequence is that our people are getting to think that the proper way to live is as depicted on the screen. We constantly see pictures which depict, not the best kind of American people and their life, but the less desirable class. I would respectfully suggest that the Acting Minister of Finance if he is again approached for lowering of the proposed tax should tell the picture show people that, unless they are more discriminating, unless they think more of and find out more about the character of the films they bring into Canada, they will not receive further favours so far as many members of this House are concerned.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I desire to ask a question concerning the importation by the Government of Canada of films for various purposes. Does the minister know whether any such films have, in the last two years, been ordered by the Government of Canada from American concerns?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have no knowledge of there being any importation of films by the Government.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Will the minister kindly make inquiry?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I shall make inquiry and inform my hon. friend when the Bill is under consideration.

Mr. KAY: How much does the minister expect to collect under this item as amended?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: About $300,000 altogether.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If the minister is in a mood to confess what he will receive through the various amendments, will he say what he expects to collect from each of the items? Has he an estimate?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Under the first item, that is chicory, raw or green, an additional revenue of $900 is estimated. The importations are very limited, and we would not anticipate any great increase of revenue there. Under item 25, that is chicory, kiln-dried, roasted or ground, the estimated increase in revenue is $4,900. Under item 25a, extract of coffee, n.o.p., and substitutes thereof of all kinds, the estimated increase in revenue is $7,500. Under item 26, coffee and imitations or substitutes, the estimated increase in revenue is $15,000. Under item 27, coffee not imported direct from country of growth the estimated increase in revenue is $21,000. Under item 28, green coffee imported direct from country of growth and green coffee purchased in bond in the United Kingdom, the estimated increase in revenue is $650,000. Under item 28a, tea imported direct from country of growth or purchased in bond in the United Kingdom, the estimated increase in revenue is $3,200,000. The annual consumption of tea per head in Canada is estimated at 4.27 pounds. Under item 29, coffee, green, not otherwise provided for, the estimated increase in revenue is $30,000. Under item 29a, tea not otherwise provided for the estimated increase is $25,000; under item 143, cigars and cigarettes, $42,000; under item 144, cut tobacco, $175,000; under item 145, manufactured tobacco and snuff, $30,000; under item 147a, beverages in the manufacture of which malt, rice or corn is used and containing not more than 2½ per cent of proof spirit, $30,000. I have already given the estimated increase in revenue under item 657a relating to cinematograph or moving picture films.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is a total of how much?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: About $4,000,000 from customs duties upon these items.

Amendment agreed to.

EXCISE.

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to impose, levy and collect on tobacco and cigars manufactured in Canada the following duties of excise:—

(a) On all chewing and smoking tobacco, fine-cut, cavendish, plug or twist, cut or granulated, of every description,—on tobacco twisted by hand or reduced into a condition to be consumed or in any manner other than the ordinary mode of drying and curing, prepared for sale or consumption, even if prepared without the use of any machine or instrument and without being pressed or sweetened,—and on all fine-cut shorts and refuse scraps, cuttings and sweepings of tobacco made from raw leaf tobacco or the product in any form, other than in this Act otherwise provided, of raw leaf tobacco, twenty cents per pound, actual weight;

(b) On common Canada twist, when made solely from tobacco grown in Canada, and on the farm or premises where grown, by the cultivator duly licensed therefor, or in a licensed tobacco manufactory, twenty cents per pound, actual weight;

(c) On all snuff made from raw leaf tobacco, or the product in any form of raw leaf tobacco or any substitute for tobacco, ground, dry, scented or otherwise, of all descriptions, when prepared for use, twenty cents per pound, actual weight;

(d) Snuff flour, when sold or removed for use or consumption, shall pay the same duty as snuff, and shall be put up in packages and stamped in the same manner as herein prescribed for snuff completely manufactured, except that snuff flour not prepared for use, but which needs to be subjected to further processes, by sifting, pickling, scenting or otherwise, before it is in a condition fit for use or consumption, may be sold by one tobacco manufacturer directly to another tobacco manufacturer, and without payment of the duty, under such regulations as are provided in that behalf by the department;

(e) On cigars of all descriptions, made from raw leaf tobacco, or any substitute therefor, six dollars per thousand;

(f) On all cigars, when put up in packages containing less than ten cigars each, seven dollars per thousand;

(g) On cigarettes made from raw leaf tobacco or any substitute therefor, weighing not more than three pounds per thousand, six dollars per thousand;

(h) On cigarettes made from raw leaf tobacco or any substitute therefor, weighing more than three pounds per thousand, eleven dollars per thousand;

(i) On all foreign raw leaf tobacco, unstemmed, taken out of warehouse for manufacture in any cigar or tobacco manufactory, forty cents per pound, computed according to the standard of leaf tobacco as hereinbefore established;

(j) On all foreign raw leaf tobacco, stemmed, taken out of warehouse for manufacture in any cigar or tobacco manufactory, sixty cents per pound, computed according to the standard of leaf tobacco as hereinbefore established;

2. In all tobacco manufactories where less than fifty per cent Canadian raw leaf tobacco is used, and where ten per cent, or more, of other materials is used, such materials shall be subject to a duty of twenty-three cents per pound, actual weight.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: With the exception of foreign raw leaf tobacco, stemmed, and foreign raw leaf tobacco, unstemmed, and with the exception also of the item referring to the materials used in the manufacture of tobacco where less than fifty per cent Canadian raw leaf tobacco is used, the increases amount to about one hundred per cent. The estimated increase in revenue is as follows: tobacco manufactured, increase $2,073,508; cigars, increase, $719,-256.75; cigarettes, increase, $3,921,830.75; foreign leaf tobacco, increase, $2,096,450.64; Canadian leaf tobacco, increase, $224,750. The total estimated increase in revenue upon these items is $9,035,796.14.

Mr. Du TREMBLAY: With regard to the tax on cigars, there is a uniform tax of six dollars per thousand regardless of quality. It has been suggested to me that this is unjust, because the five-cent cigar is sold to the retailer on such a close margin that with the additional tax he will be unable to sell at five cents, and will have to charge six or seven cents. The tax, however, will not affect the price of the ten or fifteen-cent cigar and cigars of better quality, because the margin at which they are sold to the retailer is not so close. In the case of the cheaper cigar it is the labourer, the farmer, and the poor people of this country who will pay the tax, but the ten-cent cigar and cigars of better quality will still sell at the same price, and the wealthy man will not be touched by this tax. Another injustice is done to the poor man by the increase on the tax of tobacco entering into these cigars from twenty-eight cents to forty cents. The Government taxes the tobacco that comes from Cuba and Havana for 10 and 15 cents cigars at the same rate as the tobacco that goes into the five-cent cigar, which is not nearly of so good a quality. In the United States, the tobacco tax is based on quality and not quantity, and I say that our tax should be on a similar basis. I am informed that the five-cent cigar which before the first of May was sold to the retailer at thirty-six dollars per thousand, will sell under this new tax at forty-two to forty-three dollars per thousand. The ten-cent cigar before the first of May was selling at sixty-seven dollars per thousand, or at six and seventh-tenths of a cent each. So the margin there will allow the retailer to sell the ten-cent cigar at the same price even with this tax, or three for a quarter. The consumer will pay the tax on the five-cent cigar, and the manufacturer and retailer will pay the tax on the ten-cent cigar. I understood it was the intention of the Acting Minister of Finance to tax wealth, and I would therefore submit that he tax the cigars according to quality rather than quantity. I am informed that on the present basis the tax will lead to a loss in revenue because the manufacturers will stop making five cent cigars, as the people will not pay six or seven cents for them, and the Government will of course lose that much revenue. I hope the minister will take my suggestion into consideration, and see that justice is rendered to the common people. I know that as the tax is based at present it will fall heavily on the poor people, and they will feel they have not been treated fairly.

Mr. HENRY A. MACKIE: I desire to support the remarks of my hon. friend. I think he has stated the case fairly. The cigars selling at ten cents and higher prices can still be sold at the present price because of the margin that exists between the manufacturer's price and the retail price, but the margin in the case of the five cent cigar is so small that the consumer must pay the additional price. The lower-priced cigar will then be so unpopular that its manufacture will have to be discontinued, and consequently the manufacturer loses, the retailer loses, and indirectly the Government loses. I would ask the Government to take my hon. friend's suggestion into consideration.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not deny that there is some force in the remarks made by my hon. friend in which he suggests that the excise tax upon cigars be based upon the selling price and not upon the quality. The excise cigar tax in Canada has always been based upon quantity, and I do not feel justified in changing that principle at the present time. In the United States for a number of years the excise tax upon cigars has been based upon the selling price. If that principle were adopted in the case of a five cent cigar, we would be obliged to apply it to all other excise taxes on cigars. The increase in the taxation upon cigars does not exceed two-thirds of a cent for each cigar. In the case of the five cent cigar, it is generally sold to the retail trade by the manufacturer at $36 per thousand, leaving a profit, selling at five cents, of about forty per cent. This increase in taxation should not at the very most increase the price to the retailer by the manufacturer more than $6 per thousand, or from $36 to $42. Even selling at that price, the retailer would still have a profit of 20 per cent. Again, he could protect himself by adding one cent to the price of a five cent cigar. It is quite true that in this country the payment of six cents for a cigar is somewhat awkward, but it is not impossible of accomplishment. If, during the present year the increased taxation upon the cheaper cigars, appears to do an injustice to the trade, at the next session of Parliament we shall give due consideration to the representations that have been made.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: Who will be called upon to pay the five cent tax, the farmer or the manufacturer?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That will be controlled by regulations. The price will be paid by the manufacturer and dealer in tobacco, and not by the grower—at least I think that is probable.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: Paragraph (a) says that 20 cents a pound will have to be paid. If this tobacco is used by a manufacturer he will be called upon to pay 5 cents more, or 25 cents. As most of this tobacco is bought by consumers, they will have to pay this excise of 25 cents. Instead of being 20 cents it will be 25 cents a pound.

Resolution agreed to.

2. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that no person shall grow tobacco in Canada in excess of the amount or for purposes other than those mentioned in section three hundred and twenty-five of the Inland Revenue Act without a license, that a fee of two dollars be paid for such license, and that a tax of five cents a pound be collected on all tobacco grown with the exception aforesaid.

Mr. KAY: What are the provisions of section 325 of the Inland Revenue Act, and how much tobacco can a man grow under those provisions?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN:: Thirty pounds for each male member of the family.

Resolution agreed to.

WAR REVENUE ACT.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Special War Revenue Act, 1915, and to provide that the tax to be paid by purchasers of a berth in a sleeping car be increased to ten per cent of the price for each berth, but in no case shall the tax be less than twenty-five cents for each berth and that the tax for a seat in a pullman or parlour car be increased to ten cents for each seat; that the definition of the word "Consumer" be amended so as to include a person who buys the articles mentioned for any purpose; that medicinal preparations and compositions excepted at the end of section fourteen be limited to those sold under the name used for them in the publications mentioned in the said section or any preparation manufactured and sold exclusively for the medical profession and on the labels of which no claim is made that the preparation has medicinal or curative powers or any description as to the amount that constitutes a proper dose; that manufacturers and importers of matches and playing cards be required after the thirtieth day of April, 1918, to affix to each package of matches and playing cards an adhesive stamp of the value of one cent for each one hundred matches or fractional part thereof in a package and of the value of eight cents on each package containing not more than fifty-four playing cards, and that such stamps be placed upon all packages of matches and playing cards held by dealers for sale on the first day of July, 1918, and that such stamps need not be affixed to packages of matches or playing cards manufactured for export; that there be levied a war excise tax equal to ten per cent. upon automobiles, gramophones, graphophones, phonographs, talking machines, cylinders and records therefor, mechanical piano and organ players and records therefor, articles commonly or commercially known as jewellery, whether real or imitation, for adornment of the person, when manufactured or imported after the thirtieth day of April, 1918, on the duty paid value when imported and on the price when manufactured and sold, provided that such war excise tax shall not be payable when the articles are manufactured for export or in the case of jewellery where the total amount of jewellery manufactured by any one person does not exceed the value of one thousand dollars in any calendar year; that a war excise tax be collected upon all automobiles and jewellery imported into Canada for sale or manufactured in Canada on or before the thirtieth day of April 1918, and which on that day have not been sold to bona fide users, of ten per centum of the amount of the duty paid value when imported and of ten per centum of the price when they have been manufactured and sold in Canada, but that no war excise tax be collected upon the same when manufactured for export in accordance with regulations; and that no war excise tax be collected on jewellery imported or manufactured and unsold on the thirtieth day of April, 1918, where the total duty paid value or price of the entire stock of the same held by any one person does not exceed one thousand dollars; and that there be levied a war excise tax of ten cents per pound on all tea entered at Customs on or before the thirtieth day of April, 1918, and held by importers or dealers and which on that day had not been sold, where the stock of such importers or dealers exceeds one thousand pounds.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This resolution contains a great many items and refers to a great many matters—

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have you got an estimate of the amounts you intend to collect?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: —and when the Bills are printed there will be an opportunity for hon. gentlemen to make any inquiries they may deem necessary. In connection with the tax on sleeping car berths and parlour car chairs, the estimated revenue is $130,000, from matches $3,000,000, and from jewellery over $200,000.

Mr. FIELDING: Does the term "automobiles," as it appears in the resolution, serve the required purpose? Is the word so distinctly understood in its meaning, or will it apply, for example, to motor trucks?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is intended to apply only to passenger automobiles.

Mr. FIELDING: The resolution does not say so. I think the intention is all right, but the minister might consider whether in the Bill which he is going to introduce the term should be made more definite.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I might say that motor trucks do not appear in the Custom returns as "automobiles."

Mr. FIELDING: This matter is going to be dealt with by the excise law and not by the customs law. It may not be necessary to have a clearer definition, but I am only drawing the hon. gentleman's attention to the point. I notice, with regard to matches and playing cards, that adhesive stamps are to be attached. I suppose any postage stamps may be used, as in the case of cheques. But there is no definition of what is meant by an "adhesive stamp." In that connection I will be glad if my hon. friend could give me an idea of how the distinction is kept in the accounts between stamps that are, strictly speaking, postage stamps, and those that are used for internal revenue purposes. For example, if I draw a cheque I can put a two-cent postage stamp on it. Does that money go into the revenue of the post office or into the inland revenue? I have no doubt the matter has been considered, but I am not quite clear how you can do it. I think there must be a large amount of postage stamps used for inland revenue purposes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: When the Bill is under consideration it is proposed to insert a provision that stamps other than adhesive stamps may be used. By the amendment it is proposed that a special stamp be used by the manufacturers of playing cards. It is impossible to estimate what is the proportion of postage stamps now used for excise purposes in Canada.

Mr. FIELDING: Do you say that it is impossible?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is impossible. I have endeavoured to secure an estimate but found it impossible to do so. When the special War Revenue Tax Act was enacted in 1915, it was upon the strong representations of the members of the House that the Minister of Finance was induced to make the provision that a postage stamp might be used in place of the ordinary excise stamp.

Mr. FIELDING: It is a convenience, undoubtedly.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is unfortunate for statistical purposes, but it is a great convenience to the public to be able to use the ordinary postage stamp.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The resolution provides for a tax on matches. Does the hon. gentleman also propose to provide for a tax on cigar-lighters?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: A tax on cigar lighters?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes. For example, if I want to present a friend with a little souvenir. I go, say, into Birks and purchase a little silver box with my friend's name engraved, which by a mechanical process will light a cigar.

Mr. BUREAU: What you mean is a gasolene cigar lighter?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, in which alcohol or gasolene is used.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Because by means of these lighters a man can obviate using matches for weeks and months without having to replenish the receptacle.

Mr. SIFTON: That should come under the ten per cent tax on jewellery for personal adornment.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In France, where match manufacture is a monopoly of the state, the Government has imposed a special tax on these cigar lighters.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I desire to move an amendment to the resolution. I move to insert after the word "dollars" on the fourth line from the bottom the words "or where the jewellery was imported or manufactured before the first day of October, 1917," and to insert after the words "importers or" in the second last line the word "retail." The purpose of this amendment is to provide that the payment of the excise tax on jewellery now in stock shall be applicable only to sales made since the first day of October last. As hon. gentlemen will know jewellers carry stocks over from year to year. That is, a great many articles ordinarily known as jewellery are not always saleable and have to remain in stock for a long time. The men in the business represent to me that it will be highly inconvenient for them to carry jewellery that is taxable and perhaps other jewellery that is not. The word "jewellery" is intended to cover only articles for the adornment of the person. A watch chain would come within the definition of "jewellery," whereas a watch would not, and jewellers, of course, carry many other lines of goods besides jewellery. For administrative purposes we thought it was better to settle now the amount payable by those liable to the tax, on stock now on hand. That amount when once assessed and paid will be in full settlement of all taxes upon sales made from stock in hand on the first day of May. There may be a possible loss of revenue, but the administrative cost will be much less. Of course, all sales made since the first day of May will be liable to the tax.

Mr. CRONYN: Will the Bill, or the regulations made under it, provide in what way the excise duty is to be paid?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It will be paid as the goods are sold.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I would like to ask the minister if he has given any consideration to the question of allowing the preferential rate in favour of tea imports from the British possessions? I have written to him on the subject and received no answer. I was instructed by some persons who were interested to place the matter before him, but I do not know what is proposed to be done, because I did not receive any reply to my communication. I notice that a difference is made in the case of coffee.

A difference is made in coffee which is 5 cents per pound preferential and 7 cents general tariff. I do not see why tea grown in India and Ceylon which are British possessions, and which have been loyal to us in the present war, should not have some little advantage in the tea duties, and I ask the minister if he has given that matter consideration.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am sorry that my hon. friend has not received an answer from me to the letter which he says he sent me. I may say to him that I have not yet received that letter.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I sent it four or five days ago.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In the case of coffee, we are bound to give a preference to coffee grown in the West Indies under the terms of the West Indies agreement so called. Coffee, cocoa and chocolate imported from certain of the West Indian Islands are entitled to a preference of 20 per cent on the general tariff. That is the reason why there is that distinction in tea and coffee so far as preferential rates are concerned. I explained some time ago that a preference is not always given on every commodity grown in the British Empire, and cited the instances of liquors and tobaccos. The imposition of a tax upon tea is purely for revenue, and it was deemed advisable to make the same imposition against British productions as against those of any other countries. However, there is a great deal to be said in favour of extending a preference to British importations. I explained earlier in the evening that such preference would not be of any particular advantage to the tea growers within the British Empire owing to their inability to get shipping to forward it. During the year and before the next session of Parliament, however, I promise my hon. friend that the Government will give consideration to the suggestion.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I wish to move a further amendment to this resolution, and it is in accordance with the notice which I gave yesterday and which now appears upon the Order Paper, and has reference to the tax upon moving picture films. The amendment is as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that a war excise tax be levied, collected and paid on all cinematograph or moving picture films, positives one and one-eighth of an inch in width and over of fifteen cents on each film for each day upon which such film is used.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I draw the attention of the minister to the fact that representations have been made by the smaller moving picture men that the proposed tax is going to put them out of business. It appears to me that, where films are used in very small buildings, where only two or three hundred can be housed at once, these should not be called upon to pay the same rate as houses accommodating two or three thousand. I am not a sponsor for picture shows and rarely attend them, but they are a benefit to many people who desire entertainment at very moderate rates, and the soldier, too, frequents these places very largely. I am not offering this by way of any factious criticism at all upon his very estimable way of raising the revenue, but from representations which have been made to me it appears that the smaller men will be practically put out of business if some difference is not made between the very small houses and the very large ones. This tax, I understand, increases the cost of the ordinary reel from $26 to $50, about 100 per cent of a tax.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My hon. friend was not in the House a few moments ago, when I moved an amendment to the tariff resolution respecting films, reducing the rate from 5 cents a lineal foot to 3 cents, representing a reduction from $50 to $30 upon film reels of one thousand feet. Having made that reduction, and not wishing to lose any revenue on account of the change, I desire to impose this further tax upon the theatre proprietor, that is, upon those displaying the film. The small theatres use five films per day, as a rule, and the tax would amount to 75 cents per day.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: Knowing something about the moving picture business, I think there should be a further change made in the system of placing the tax. In times gone by, the film producers furnished reels of pictures which permitted the small houses to give three different shows each night. The film producers have now changed the size of the reels and made them nearly twice as large, and have increased the price. Consequently the increased size of the reel and greater length of time required to run it takes away one of the shows from the small picture houses, enabling them to put on only two shows in place of three. The film producers might still further increase the size of the reel and if that is done the small houses will have only one show each night. The reduction from 5 cents to 3 cents per foot will help the small picture shows. I think a picture house should be charged according to the seating capacity. A 500 seating capacity should be charged a certain fee and a show which has 1,000 seating capacity charged a higher rate, and so on. I do not think it is fair to make the tax on a small show equal to that on a large one. The larger houses usually get 30, 35 and 50 cents admission while the small shows get 10 cents in the evening and in the afternoon only 5 cents. This increase in the tax practically puts the small shows out of business. If the Acting Finance Minister would allow this item to stand over I expect a deputation here to wait upon him. I did not know that this question was coming up to-night or I would have been better prepared.

[Mr. Cockshutt.]

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am afraid that the size of the theatres changes almost as rapidly as the length of the films. However, I may say to my hon. friend that before the Bill which will be founded upon this resolution passes, I shall be pleased to give every consideration to the representations which he has made to-night and which the delegation which is coming shall make.

Mr. KENNEDY: Does the minister think that the increased cost of films will add anything to the cost of the next Victory Loan?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I hope it did not add anything to the last one.

Mr. KENNEDY: About $7,000 for films.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am not aware that it did.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. JACOBS: I have been asked to draw the attention of the House to the fact that we are now sitting on Ascension Day.

Resolution agreed to.

BUSINESS WAR PROFITS.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, and to provide that paragraph (c) of section three be repealed; that any business having a capital of not less than twenty-five thousand dollars and under fifty thousand dollars shall pay a tax of twenty-five per centum of the amount of the profits exceeding ten per cent per annum upon the capital; that the amount paid or payable under the provisions of Part 1 of The Special War Revenue Act, 1915, and The Income War Tax Act, 1917, shall be deducted from the amount payable under the provisions of the above Act, and that in computing the profits of such no taxpayer shall include any tax paid under the said Acts in the expenses of his business; that the amount of capital in the excepted business mentioned in paragraph (a) of section five of the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, be reduced from fifty thousand dollars to twenty-five thousand dollars; that dividends paid during the accounting period shall be considered as a reduction of the unimpaired reserve, rest or accumulated profits; that the provisions of section three of the last mentioned Act be continued in force to the thirty-first day of December, 1918.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The only important amendments contemplated are to provide, first, that the Act shall apply to the accounting period of 1918 and, secondly, that companies employing a capital of $25,000 and up to $50,000 shall be liable to a business profits tax. The rate applicable to companies employing that amount of capital is that which first prevailed under the Business Profits Tax Act. An exemption of 10 per cent upon the capital employed is allowed, and 25 per cent of the profits in excess is payable to the Government.

Mr. McMASTER: It has been pointed out to me by a business man that in the case of small companies with a capitalization of, say $25,000, operating under a limited liability charter, the profits realized are not so much from the investment of large capital as the reward of the energy and work of the individuals forming the partnership. My correspondent suggested that it was hardly fair to tax a company with so small a capitalization as heavily as the corporations with larger capital are taxed.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The law as it now stands is applicable to partnerships as well as to corporations, though there is a difference in the rate.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Practically every resolution that we have dealt with to-night has been amended in some way to make less onerous the burden resting on those who pay taxes, and I urge on the Government to reconsider the scale now in force with respect to excess profits tax. Speaker after speaker has drawn the attention of the Government to this matter, and though the front benches have been vacant most of the time, the Acting Finance Minister has been here and I trust that he will give it careful consideration. We are placing our business houses at a very great disadvantage compared with those in the United States with whom they have to compete. In the case of two firms on the opposite sides of the Detroit river, one at Windsor and one at Detroit, with capitalization of $300,000 and making 25 per cent each in the course of a year, the firm in American territory is taxed only $12,150 while the firm in Canadian territory is taxed $24,750. Nothing is more mobile than capital; moreover, our Canadian business firms must prepare for what is in store for them when the war is over; there will be great deflation and great readjustment. Where shall our Canadian business men get money to enable them to weather that storm? They cannot borrow in England or in the United States. Our own people will have invested nearly all their available cash in Victory Loans. The banks will not lend them any money, you may be sure, to put into plant or anything immobile. The only thing our business firms can do in order to meet this period of readjustment is to save. When you take such a large percentage of savings from them that, after paying a dividend of 7, 8 or 9 per cent they are able to lay aside only very little towards the time of reconstruction, you are deliberately handicapping them for the competition of the future. If our business profits tax were made on a par with that of the United States, our revenue would only be $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 less, whereas the operation of the present scale is making ten times that amount of difference to the business institutions of our country. A gentleman from Toronto said the other day: American friends of ours were prepared to put $500,000 into the creating of a new industry in Canada, but when they found that the business profits tax was double that of the United States, they decided not to put their money into the enterprise. A Montreal gentleman said to me: We had intended to add three additional businesses to our plant in New Brunswick, but we find that we cannot save the money to do it; we cannot get the money in any other way, so that we are going on as before. In other words, Mr. Chairman, we are killing the goose that lays the golden eggs. We should impose heavy taxation where the liquid capital finally rests and the ownership lies. We should not tax earnings very heavily at their source; we should tax them at their destination. I will support any increase in income tax the Government care to make, even if they double it. When my revenue reaches me, I can do what I please with it. I can spend it on frivolities, if I like; put it into the bank, or invest it in some manufacturing enterprise. It is on revenue of this kind that taxation ought to rest. From the business firm which is preparing to weather the gale, which has not distributed its profits, which pays only a reasonable dividend and puts the balance into plant, in order that it may create more wealth, in order that it may, when the war is ended, employ more labour and strike out into the fields of the world, you are taking practically all that they have to fall back upon for their reconstruction. So again, in view of the fact that after the war we shall have to make great reconstruction of all our business enterprises throughout the country; in view of the fact that, after the war, we shall have to find employment for thousands and tens of thousands of additional men, I ask the Government not, at the present time, to stagnate Canadian industry; not, at the present time, to take away all incentive from Canadian industry; not, at the present time, to put Canadian industry under a tremendous disadvantage as compared with the United States. After the war is over, we want to compete in the markets of the world; we want to put our Canadian industry on a par with American industry so as to be able to compete. We cannot do that if all the industries are overtaxed as we go along. Take the two firms of which I spoke, one on each side of the Detroit river. In three years the American company will have raised its capital from $300,000 to $400,000, while the Canadian firm, supposing it is able to pay a small dividend during that period, will be able to raise its capital only from $300,000 to $350,000. Which is best fitted to compete in the markets of the world—the firm that has been allowed to prepare itself for the reconstruction period, or the firm which has been stripped of practically all its earnings as it goes along? The Government should give this matter serious consideration. What is a matter of three or four million dollars of revenue compared with having it known in Europe, Canada and the United States that the taxation in Canada on business profits is the heaviest in the world, and that new capital, if it comes in, must face that contingency?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Many representations have been made to the Government along the lines pointed out by my hon. friend. For the present it is the policy of the Government to renew the business profits tax at the same rate as provided for during the last three accounting periods. It is proposed, however, to impose this tax only year by year. It is not a tax that might fairly be imposed upon business after the conclusion of the war. The amendment which provides for the re-enacting of clause 3, which is the taxing clause of the Bill, provides that it shall continue in force and be effective only until the 31st day of December, 1918. During that period, the Government will, of course, be glad to hear any representations from the business men of the country, and if it should appear that the tax is too onerous, the Government shall be pleased to give every consideration to such representations. In the meantime, it is the policy of the Government to renew this taxation.

INCOME.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Income War Tax Act, 1917, and provided that "dependent child" shall mean a child under twenty-one years of age and dependent on its parent for support or over twenty-one and dependent on its parent for support on account of physical or mental incapacity; that paragraph (b) of section three be repealed and that an exemption of two hundred dollars be allowed for each dependent child under sixteen years of age; that paragraph (d) of section three be amended by striking out the words "or from the net earnings"; that subsections one and two of section four be repealed and that it be provided that there shall be assessed, levied and paid upon the income during the preceding year of every person residing or ordinarily resident in Canada or carrying on any business in Canada and upon the income received by any person from any source within Canada the following taxes:—

(a) two per centum upon all income exceeding one thousand dollars but not exceeding fifteen hundred dollars in the case of unmarried persons and widows or widowers without dependent children, and exceeding two thousand dollars but not exceeding three thousand dollars in the case of all other persons; four per centum upon all incomes exceeding fifteen hundred dollars in the case of unmarried persons and widows or widowers without dependent children, and exceeding three thousand dollars in the case of all other persons;

and in addition thereto,

(b) two per centum upon the amount by which the income exceeds six thousand dollars and does not exceed ten thousand dollars; and

(c) five per centum upon the amount which the income exceeds ten thousand dollars and does not exceed twenty thousand dollars; and

(d) eight per centum of the amount by which the income exceeds twenty thousand dollars and does not exceed thirty thousand dollars; and

(e) ten per centum of the amount by which the income exceeds thirty thousand dollars and does not exceed fifty thousand dollars; and

(f) fifteen per centum of the amount by which the income exceeds fifty thousand dollars and does not exceed seventy-five thousand dollars; and

(g) twenty per centum of the amount by which the income exceeds seventy-five thousand dollars and does not exceed one hundred thousand dollars; and

(h) twenty-five per centum of the amount by which the income exceeds one hundred thousand dollars and does not exceed two hundred thousand dollars; and

(i) thirty per centum of the amount by which the income exceeds two hundred thousand dollars and does not exceed four hundred thousand dollars; and

(j) thirty-five per centum of the amount by which the income exceeds four hundred thousand dollars and does not exceed six hundred thousand dollars; and

(k) forty per centum of the amount by which the income exceeds six hundred thousand dollars and does not exceed eight hundred thousand dollars; and

(l) forty-five per centum of the amount by which the income exceeds eight hundred thousand dollars and does not exceed one million dollars; and

(m) fifty per centum of the amount by which the income exceeds one million dollars; and in addition thereto the following surtax.

(n) five per centum of the tax payable upon income in excess of six thousand dollars but not exceeding ten thousand dollars;

(o) ten per centum of the tax payable upon income in excess of ten thousand dollars but not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars;

(p) fifteen per centum of the tax payable upon income exceeding one hundred thousand dollars but not exceeding two hundred thousand dollars;

(q) thirty-five per centum of the tax payable upon income exceeding two hundred thousand dollars;

that corporations and joint stock companies, no matter how created or organized, shall pay six per centum upon income exceeding three thousand dollars, but shall not be liable to pay the supertax; that the minister may permit any corporation or joint stock company the fiscal year of which is not the calendar year, to make a return and to have the tax payable by it computed upon its income for the twelve months ending with its last fiscal year preceding the date of assessment; that section five be amended by exempting the incomes or such portion of the incomes of judges and retired judges as comes within the provisions of subsection three of section twenty-seven of the Judges Act and the incomes of incorporated companies whose business and assets are carried on and situate entirely outside Canada

Mr. PROULX: In reference to the latter part of the resolution, what portion of the income of judges comes within the provisions of subsection 3 of section 27 of the Judges' Act?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The incomes of judges appointed by the Federal Government.

Mr. PROULX: Why the exception?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Judges' Act provides that their salaries shall not be subject to any Federal tax.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is an amendment.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, it is not an amendment; it is simply to carry out the provisions of the Judges' Act. I should like to place upon Hansard a table showing the comparison between our income tax and that of the United States in the case of a married person. It might be of interest to hon. gentlemen.

Mr. McMASTER: Has the minister a table showing the comparison between what we pay and what the people of Great Britain pay? That might be very illuminating.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It might be very illuminating, but it is a very difficult statement to prepare, and it would not be as illuminating as a comparison with the income tax in the United States.

Mr. McMASTER: You might have the three columns.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If my hon. friend desires it, I shall endeavour to have a statement prepared for him. This is the table of which I have just spoken:

INCOME TAX.

	Canada.		United States.
Income.	Married persons. Present Tax.	Married persons. Proposed Tax.	Married persons. Tax.
$	$	$	$
3,000	Nil.	20	20
6,000	120	140	130
10,000	360	392	355
20,000	1,260	1,382	1,180
30,000	2,460	2,702	2,380
50,000	5,260	5,782	5,180
75,000	10,010	11,007	9,930
100,000	14,760	17,607	16,180
200,000	43,760	50,957	49,180
400,000	101,760	142,757	142,680
500,000	130,760	195,407	192,680
600,000	159,760	248,057	246,680
800,000	217,760	366,857	357,180
1,000,000	275,760	499,157	475,180
2,000,000	565,760	1,228,157	1,130,180

I have also a statement showing the normal tax, the super-tax and the surtax, also the total. Hon. gentlemen will remember that under the Income Tax Act, as proposed to be amended, we shall have a surtax, whereas in the Act of last year there was only the normal tax and the super-tax. The table is as follows:

Income Tax.

Married persons.

Income.	Normal Tax.	Super Tax.	Surtax.	Total.
$ 3,000	$ 20
6,000	140
10,000	300	$ 80	$ 12	$ 392
20,000	700	580	102	1,382
30,000	1,100	1,380	222	2,702
50,000	1,900	3,380	502	5,782
75,000	2,900	7,130	977	11,007
100,000	3,900	12,130	1,577	17,607
200,000	7,900	37,130	5,927	50,957
400,000	15,900	97,130	29,727	142,757
500,000	19,900	132,130	43,377	195,407
600,000	23,900	167,130	57,027	248,057
800,000	31,900	247,130	87,827	366,857
1,000,000	39,900	337,130	122,127	499,157
2,000,000	79,900	837,130	311,127	1,228,157

Mr. LEMIEUX: I see that paragraph (d) of section 3 is proposed to be amended by striking out the words "or from the net earnings." What is the meaning of that?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Subsection (d) of section 3 as it now stands reads as follows:

For the purposes of the normal tax the income in a personal return shall be credited with the amount received as dividends upon the stock or from the net earnings of any company.

As the dividends upon the stock were credited, the words "or from the net earnings" had no significance whatever, and for administrative purposes only it is desired to strike these words out.

Mr. FIELDING: The hon. gentleman has referred to the exemption from taxation of judges. From what classes of taxation are judges exempt? At all events, I suppose that the laws respecting the judges are not like the laws of the Medes and Persians. The judges, above all other things, are just men and I am sure they will not desire to be exempt from any tax, especially in these times, which their poorer neighbours are obliged to pay.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: They do not get salary enough to be taxed.

Mr. FIELDING: Lots of us do not get enough salary, but we have to pay the tax. I am curious to know from what classes of taxation the judges are exempt.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: All salaries or annuities paid by the Government of Canada to any of the judges are exempt from any tax imposed by the Parliament of Canada. This is only to carry out that provision. Of course, it does not prevent judges from paying the tax if they so desire. Whether the judges should be exempt or not is a matter of policy. I am not suggesting any change.

Mr. FIELDING: How can there be a provision in the law to exempt judges from income tax when we did not have any income tax before last year? Are the judges exempt from customs and excise taxation? We have here a new system of taxation. We are creating an exemption which the judges apparently do not now enjoy. I think the point is worth looking into. The judges are most estimable men, but above everything else they are just, and I am sure they would not desire to be exempted from taxation which their less favoured brethren have to pay. I simply want to protect the judges.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The last clause says:

> Corporations and joint stock companies, no matter how created or organized, shall pay six per centum upon income exceeding three thousand dollars but shall not be liable to pay the supertax.

Under the Act of last year the income paid by incorporated companies was carried forward to the credit of the shareholders, who received it later in the form of dividends. Is it the intention to continue that provision? I am not able to ascertain from the wording of the clause whether the income which has been taxed six per cent is to be re-taxed, as though it had paid no tax, after it has been distributed to the shareholders.

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Act as amended will only give credit for the normal tax of four per cent. There will be no change.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It says six per cent here.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is the tax on any income in excess of three thousand dollars. Only the four per cent normal tax paid by corporations will be credited.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Although the corporations pay six?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Last year the Minister of Finance stated that the sessional indemnity was assessable. I have no objection to that, but the very word "indemnity" suggests, not a salary, but compensation for service which one is called upon to perform for the Crown. Some gentlemen have suggested that in the return to be made the indemnity should be reduced by the amount that has been expended by the member. A member who comes from afar spends a part of his indemnity in Ottawa and he should not be accountable for that in the return.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not desire to detain the House by asking for the information now, but if my hon. friend will make a note of it and bring it forward at another stage of the discussion I shall be quite content. I cannot see any reason why judges should be exempt. An hon. gentleman says that the judges salaries are not big enough. That is true of a great many people. It is a fact that the civil servants all over Canada are very poorly paid. If I may be allowed to say so, having regard to their duties and responsibilities, the most poorly paid officials in the Dominion of Canada are the Ministers of the Crown. They are the only people who have not received an increase in their salaries for the last thirty years. But still they have to pay income tax. I think they escape in the city of Ottawa——

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No.

Mr. FIELDING: At all events it is quite understood that Ministers of the Crown have to pay this income tax like any other people. If they are to be taxed I cannot see why the judges should be exempt.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not wish to be understood as opposing the suggestion of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens, but, as he suggests, the point may be raised later on when the Bill is before the committee.

Mr. BUREAU: If judges are exempt it must be for one of two reasons. The minister said that all judges received their salaries from the Dominion Government. If the fact of receiving a salary from the Dominion Government is going to be given as a reason for exemption, I think the point raised by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) is a good one, that it ought to apply to all those who receive a salary from the Dominion Government. If, it is on account of his judicial capacity, other judges who are not appointed by this Government and are not paid by this Government should be exempt. The judge of the general sessions of the peace in Montreal gets his salary from the provincial Government while a judge of the Superior Court gets his salary from the Dominion Government. If, on account of his judicial position, the judge of the Superior Court is exempt, why should not the judge of the general sessions at Montreal, or in any other judicial district, be exempt? On the other hand, if a judge is going to be exempt because the money is paid by the Dominion Government I agree with my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens that all other people who receive their money from the Dominion Government should be exempt from this tax.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have the provisions of the Judges Act before me. Section 27, subsection 3 provides:

> The salaries and retiring allowances or annuities shall be payable by monthly instalments and shall be free and clear of all taxes and deductions whatsoever imposed under any Act of the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. CRONYN: On the consideration of the Bill there will be an opportunity to discuss the point raised by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) as to the increase in the tax in the case of incorporated companies. I do not want to delay the Committee by discussing it, but I think that something might be said on the subject.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Has any further consideration been given to clause 3c of the Business Profits tax, as to a reciprocal arrangement with the United States without which the Business Profits tax that we should receive is paid to them? Has that been taken up?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is not proposed to submit to the Committee any amendment providing for a reciprocal arrangement with the United States. The Business Profits tax in the United States is based upon a somewhat different principle from ours. They have ruled that income received by Canadian corporations from products sold in the United States is subject to their Business Profits Tax Act. For instance, our manufacturers of newsprint export to the United States 88 or 89 per cent of their total production. The United States treasury has ruled that the proceeds of sales of newsprint in the United States are subject to taxation under their Act. Sir Thomas White, who is now in Washington, a day or two ago had an interview with the United States Treasury Department upon the matter, and yesterday I had a communication from him assuring me that his representations were sympathetically received by the department and he thought an understanding would be reached with respect to the matter.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In other words, there will be no change in the law regarding non-residents?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No. You are referring to the Income Tax Act?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I was speaking of the business profits tax. The matter of reciprocal arrangements between Canada and other countries, so as to avoid a double income tax, was discussed at the Imperial Conference last year, and I understand it was decided to allow it to stand over until after the conclusion of the war.

Mr. McMASTER: I believe that the rate of taxation on incomes over $10,000 is utterly inadequate and I am sure that the country will agree with that view. When this Government is asking the poorer folk to make the sacrifice both in men and money that they are being asked to make, the rate at which the larger incomes are being taxed is utterly inadequate. I know the reply will be given that the United States is taxing incomes on the same ratio. I hardly think that applies. What we want to do is to endeavour to equalize sacrifice as between the citizens of this country, and that is not done by the taxation that is imposed on the larger incomes.

Mr. LALOR: Is the Acting Minister of Finance aware that a Canadian company with branch factories in the United States doing business there is taxed in the United States upon the profits of these branches and again taxed in Canada upon the same profits it has made in the United States? I know something about this from personal experience. The company is taxed on the profits of its factories in the United States and when these profits are returned to the parent company in Canada the company is again taxed by the Canadian Government. I think it is hardly fair to have to pay such a tax.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Why cannot the minister devise a scheme to avoid this inequality? Because it is a clear injustice that a man should be compelled to pay a tax in the United States and in Canada.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Do you mean income tax?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, income tax.

Mr. LALOR: I am speaking of the Business Profits Tax.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am speaking of the income tax.

The CHAIRMAN: The Business Profits War Tax Resolution was adopted some time ago, and the discussion is now on the Income War Tax Act. It would be more regular, I think, for the hon. gentleman, when we have disposed of this matter, to move to reconsider the one to which he has reference.

Mr. LALOR: I merely draw the attention of the Acting Minister of Finance to this matter so that he may give it consideration.

Sir HERBERT AMES: I would ask the minister whether any action or decision has been arrived at with respect to farming and ranching companies? I want to know whether a farmer who has raised one hundred thousand bushels of grain and sold them for $2 a bushel comes under the Business Profits Tax, and whether a rancher who raises $250,000 on horses and sells them to the Remount Commission comes under the same tax? Has the Government considered whether these industries should be rightly brought under the Business Profits Tax, or left subject only to Income Tax?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I can only say it is not proposed to make these industries liable to the Business Profits Tax.

Sir HERBERT AMES: What justification is there for that?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: For the reason that in the cases mentioned, I am told, it is unlikely that the amount of capital employed would be such as to make them liable to the tax, and for other reasons.

[Mr. Lalor.]

Sir HERBERT AMES: Are they not businesses just the same as any others that are made subject to the tax?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It was the policy of the Government which introduced this Bill not to make the Acts applicable to them. It would affect only a small class in Canada—

Sir HERBERT AMES: Why should that be a favoured class?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: —and the administrative cost would be so high as to make it not a profitable source of revenue.

Mr. JACOBS. I would like to point out the disparity which exists between the income tax in Great Britain and that which is proposed to levy under this new Act. I had occasion to look the matter up yesterday, and I find that for the present year the tax is six shillings in the pound on income. That is to say a person with an income of $10,000 would be paying almost one-third of that into the treasury. Now there is a wide difference between paying $392 a year, and paying nearly $3,000 a year on the same income. We have only increased this tax from $380 last year to $392 this year, a difference of $12 per annum. Of course we have started at $2,000 instead of $3,000, but we are only paying $12 more than we paid last year on income. I am talking of an income of $10,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It was $360 last year.

Mr. JACOBS: We paid $360 last year?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. JACOBS: But now we are paying on from $2,000 up.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: And $392 will be payable under the Act when amended as proposed.

Mr. JACOBS: That may be, but we start from $2,000 instead of $3,000, so we really only have raised the tax $12.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, $32.

Mr. JACOBS: Very well then, $32, but we have started from $2,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It does not matter where we have started from.

Mr. JACOBS: We will not quarrel on a matter of $20 a year. We are paying $32 more than we did last year, and our expenditure for war purposes has gone up something like $500,000,000. It does seem to me that a man who has an income of $10,000 a year ought really to pay more than $392 a year when we have a war of this kind going on; it does not seem right to the community. In the general list we have taken chicory, green and ripe coffee, tea, snuff, and that kind of thing, and even matches; adhesive stamps have to be attached to packages, and all that kind of thing; and here right at our door we have large sums of money which can be obtained merely for the asking. All the Acting Finance Minister has to do is to declare by a stroke of the pen that So-and-so must pay a certain sum of money, and behold, he has it. My hon. friend has spoken of the fact that this tax is on a parity with the tax in the United States. We must not forget, however, that the United States is only in the first year of the war, whereas we are in our fourth year, and I venture to predict that when the United States is in its fourth year—I hope to God the war will not last so long, but if it should come about—the tax will be very much more than $392 on an income of $10,000 a year. In the matter of tea, large consumers will be paying a considerable sum of money. With that tea goes tobacco, and with tobacco goes all these little petty luxuries of the poor, and we will find that these people, although they have not an income of $2,000 a year, will be paying relatively a very much larger sum than other persons who have an income of $10,000 and upwards. It seems rather strange, rather extraordinary, that the Opposition should be begging the Government to increase the taxation, but we find that it is necessary to do so because the Government are not acting as we think they should in the interest of the country. While there is yet time, we on this side of the House urge the Government to see to it that the taxation is made commensurate with the needs of the country, because the people who have these incomes can very well afford to pay.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is quite easy to understand why an Opposition may be begging, to use my hon. friend's terms, the Government to increase taxation. I suppose that may be quite fair political game, but does not—

Mr. McMASTER: It is not a game. Mr. Chairman, there is no necessity for the Acting Finance Minister to say that and to impute motives.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am not imputing motives.

Mr. McMASTER: Yes, you are.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am not imputing motives at all. My hon. friend says that our income tax in Canada is not as large as it is in England. That is a well-known fact, but there are many reasons why that should be so. In the first place, there is no taxation upon consumption in England, as there is in this country. My hon. friend knows, further, that the customs tax upon practically everything coming into this country is very high indeed. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) very naturally bows assent to that statement, and we are not at variance upon that point. Well, that must be taken into consideration. To suggest that the income tax of Canada should be the same as that of England would be rather preposterous.

Mr. JACOBS: I am not suggesting that. There is a wide margin between $390 and $3,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is quite a wide difference, and it would be a very difficult matter for us to agree upon the exact point to which we should go in seeking to approximate the income tax of Great Britain. Now, the income tax in Canada under the present amendment will exceed that of the United States upon all incomes. Of course, that is not a complete answer to the statement that our income tax now is too low, but some consideration must be paid to the rate of income taxation in the United States. We cannot escape from it. Our territories lie side by side, and if the income tax is much higher in this country than it is in the United States there can be only one outcome: people will leave Canada and go to the United States. And the same might be said of our Business Profits War Tax, if the difference was very great. I hope my hon. friend does not mean to say that a consideration of that kind must not weigh with the Government. Further, in British Columbia, there is an income tax of 7 per cent upon incomes that are quite low, and in fixing the federal Income Tax we had to take that into consideration also. In the province of Ontario there is a municipal income tax, but I am really not in a position to state whether it is onerous or not. But I do know that the income tax in British Columbia is quite onerous and we could not escape giving due consideration to that fact. I would like to say also that while the tax upon an income of $10,000 will now be $392, it does not follow that it shall always remain at that sum. It is a good canon of taxation, well recognized by students and writers, that any new tax should grow gradually, and it should not be at its highest point when the machinery is being formed for its collection. My hon. friend may be quite right in saying that the tax upon an income of $10,000 is too small. It rather has that appearance to me, I admit. But the difficulty is, that if you apply a certain rate on the income of $10,000 you must carry that rate right through all the higher incomes, and if you did that the disparity with the United States Income Tax would be very much greater than it is at present. However, I am not arguing that our tax should remain fixed at the present rates forever. Circumstances and conditions in the future may make it absolutely necessary that we increase the present rates.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I want to draw the minister's attention to a fallacy he has been making use of with regard to the question of our people going over to the United States if we increase the income tax. If the income tax is increased and money is collected from our people it goes towards paying the debt. If we have a tremendous debt, much larger in proportion than that of the United States, won't our people go into the United States to the same extent by reason of the debt as by reason of the taxes?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think people in all communities fear taxes more than they fear debt.

Mr. BUREAU: I would like to remind the Acting Minister of Finance that by the new time, and by the sun, it is now Ascension Day.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend is quite mistaken so far as the House is concerned. It has been the practice for twenty-five years that if the House should meet on Monday and should sit continuously until Saturday it still remains Monday.

Mr. BUREAU: I appeal to the Prime Minister's sense of respect for all creeds, and he knows the position we are in. Of course, we can remain if necessary.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We will be through in a moment. I discussed this matter with the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and it is important to get these Bills introduced if possible. It will take us only a few minutes. All the information that is being asked for now could just as well be asked for when we are in committee on the Bill, so there is really no great advantage in delaying now.

Sir HERBERT AMES: I would like to ask the Acting Finance Minister whether any consideration has been given to certain representations made to him recently by the trust companies. I know that while we have the income tax under consideration other amendments that are desirable can be considered, and while this resolution is being considered seems the proper time to make suggestions. One of the suggestions made is that the date, February 28, is too early, and that March 31 would be preferable. Did that suggestion receive consideration?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is not proposed to change the date.

Sir HERBERT AMES: The second suggestion was with respect to exacting what is called for in Clause 6 from fiduciary companies. They find that clause extremely onerous. Has that suggestion been considered?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is proposed to repeal Clause 6.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The acting minister has not answered my question.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Will the hon. gentleman renew his question on the Bill.

Mr. LEMIEUX: All right.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolutions reported as amended and amendments agreed to.

REVENUE BILLS INTRODUCED.

The resolutions to amend the customs tariff, of 1907, were read the second time and agreed to.

Mr. A. K. Maclean thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 81, to amend the Customs Act, 1907.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

The resolutions respecting Duties of Excise were read the second time and agreed to.

Mr. A. K. Maclean thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 82, to amend the Inland Revenue Act.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

The resolution respecting the Special War Revenue was read the second time and agreed to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 83, to amend the Special War Revenue Act, 1915.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

The resolution respecting the Business Profits War Tax was read the second time and agreed to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 84, to amend the Business Profits War Tax, 1916.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

The resolution respecting the Income War Tax was read the second time and agreed to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 85, to amend the Income War Tax Act, 1917.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden (Prime Minister) the amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 3, to confer the electoral franchise upon women, was read the first and second times and agreed to.

ASCENSION DAY ADJOURNMENT.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That when this House adjourns on Wednesday, the 8th instant, it stand adjourned until Friday the 10th instant.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden the House adjourned at 1.22 a.m., Thursday.

Friday, May 10, 1918.

Friday, May 10, 1918.

The House met at Eleven o'clock.

BRAZEAU COLLIERIES—BILL WITHDRAWN.

Sir HERBERT AMES presented the second report of the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, recommending that the fees paid on Bill No. 33 respecting Brazeau Collieries, Limited, be refunded.

Sir HERBERT AMES moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has this Bill been withdrawn?

Sir HERBERT AMES: In the report just presented and read to the House it will be seen that the committee unanimously decided that the preamble was not proven; that the Bill was unnecessary, and that it should not be adopted. The committee reported accordingly. The applicants then asked that the fees be refunded.

Motion agreed to, and report concurred in.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE.

BILLS OF THE OTTAWA GAS COMPANY AND THE GOSPEL WORKERS CHURCH IN CANADA WITHDRAWN.

Mr. M. STEELE (South Perth) presented the fourth report of the Select Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills; recommending that Bill No. 35, respecting the Ottawa Gas Company, be withdrawn, and the fee and charges paid thereon be refunded, less the cost of printing and translation; and also recommending that the fee and charges, less the cost of printing and translation, paid on Bill No. 59, to incorporate the Gospel Workers Church in Canada, be refunded.

On motion of Mr. Steele, the report was concurred in.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE presented the report of the Special Committee on Bill No. 25, respecting bankruptcy; recommending that the Bill be forthwith printed as amended and herewith reported, with a further recommendation that over and above the usual parliamentary distribution, a certain number of copies of the Bill, as so reprinted, be supplied for distribution amongst the public libraries and the industrial, commercial, financial and legal bodies of the country.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie, the report was concurred in.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (North Simcoe) moved that the recommendations contained in the first report of the Joint Committee on Printing, presented to the House on Tuesday, April 23, be concurred in. He said: There is nothing in this report outside of the customary recommendation to print or not to print certain public documents.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I should like my hon. friend to summarize in a few words the recommendations contained in the report.

Mr. CURRIE: The report has been on the Table for a number of weeks. It recommends that a few documents be printed, and that a large number of documents be not printed. The report is on file for the hon. gentleman to see. It does not deal with any question of printing by the departments.

Motion agreed to, and report concurred in.

DAYLIGHT SAVING BILL AMENDMENT.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 86, to amend the Daylight Saving Act, 1918.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Explain.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The amendment appears to be made necessary, as will be shown when I read clause 2, as it is at present:

> 2. During the prescribed period in each year in which this Act is in force, the time, for general purposes in Canada, in each province, shall be one hour in advance of the time which under the law of the province is the time prescribed for such province.

We propose to amend that by adding after the words " law of the province," these words:

> At the time of the coming into force of this Act.

The clause will then read:

> During the prescribed pediod in each year in which this Act is in force, the time, for general purposes in Canada, in each province, shall be one hour in advance of the time which under the law of the province at the time of the coming into force of this Act is the time prescribed for such province.

What happens if that amendment is not made, is, for instance, in the province of Nova Scotia, the Daylight Saving Act went into force on the standard time in Nova Scotia. If Nova Scotia, for provincial purposes wishes to advance its time one hour so as to provide against any confusion of times in the province and does so advance it, then the Daylight Saving Act time would have to be advanced one hour beyond that, and that would throw it out of gear with the time in all the other provinces, and if the same operation was carried on time after time, the two times would be chasing each other around the whole circumference of the globe and would never get even.

[Mr. Currie.]

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

FIRST READING OF SENATE BILLS.

Bill No. 76, for the relief of William Leo Walpole.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 77, for the relief of Mary Claire Dawson Hislop.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 78, for the relief of Martin Hafner.—Mr. H. A. Mackie.

Bill No. 79, for the relief of Ida Sophia Wardell.—Mr. W. F. Maclean.

Bill No. 80, for the relief of Edward David Hill.—Mr. Richardson.

FISHERIES BRANCH, NAVAL SERVICE DEPARTMENT.

On the Orders of the day:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: With the leave of the House, I move that the Fiftieth Annual Report of the Fisheries Branch, Department of Naval Service, be referred to the Committee on Marine and Fisheries. I understand that without some such motion it is not competent for the Committee to take it up and consider it.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—THE MINISTER OF MILITIA.

STATEMENT WITH REFERENCE TO COLONEL LABATT OF THE PENSIONS BOARD.

On the Orders of the day:

Major-General MEWBURN (Minister of Militia and Defence): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise to a question of privilege. In the Ottawa Citizen of the 9th instant, an article was published—and copied in many of the newspaper journals throughout the country—in which my name was referred to in connection with the appointment of Colonel R. H. Labatt to the Board of Pension Commissioners. Included in this article was a letter from Mr. H. H. Stevens, member of this House for Vancouver Centre, in which letter the hon. member states:

> It is pointed out that Colonel Labatt is reported to be a brother-in-law to the Minister of Militia, (General Mewburn), and to the Minister of Railways and Canals, (Hon. Dr. Reid).

The said article and letter referred to, suggest to the public mind that Colonel Labatt's relationship to me had something to do with his appointment and pension. I, therefore, wish to take this opportunity of informing the members of this House that Colonel Labatt is not my brother-in-law and is not a relation of mine, but is connected with me by marriage.

Colonel Labatt's appointment to the Board of Pension Commissioners was made in 1916, long before I became a member of the present Government. or had any idea of being such a member. Further, I wish to state that I had no connection, directly or indirectly, with Colonel Labatt's appointment, although I remember that at the time he was offered the appointment he informed me of the fact and I advised him against taking it, because he had a good private business, and I believed the heavy responsibility and worry of such an office would be too much of a strain on his health.

While I have stated that Colonel Labatt is not a relation of mine, I do not wish to be misunderstood; I would feel honoured if this gentleman were a relation of mine. He enjoys the respect of all who know him and he is one of the most experienced and best known Canadian officers. His service in the Canadian militia dates back prior to 1885. He served through the Northwest Rebellion as a private. Ever since that time he has been a very active officer in the Canadian militia. He has given his best to the service of his country through this long period.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is exceeding his rights on a question of privilege.

Major-General MEWBURN: I was going to say that Colonel Labatt had been at the front. I desire to repudiate, in the strongest possible language, the inference that Colonel Labatt's appointment or his right to draw a pension, had anything to do with his association or connection with me.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I should like to add that the appointment of Colonel Labatt to the position which he now holds as a member of the Board of Pensions Commissioners was not due in any sense to the Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. J. D. Reid.) His name was not suggested to me by Dr. Reid, nor did Dr. Reid have anything to do with his appointment.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: These appointments on the Board of Pension Commissioners have caused a great deal of comment. I suggest that the House be given an opportunity to discuss the matter on a later occasion. It cannot be discussed at this moment on a question of privilege.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I believe that the subject is under consideration by the Committee on Pensions and when the report of that committee is made, ample opportunity for discussion will be given. The matter can be taken up earlier than that if the House considers that there is any urgency.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is it not a fact that Colonel Labatt has been asked to renounce this pension?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have not had any communication with him in the matter so far, for the reason that the subject is under consideration by the Pensions Committee.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Then we shall have an early opportunity of discussing the matter?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Certainly.

PRIVILEGE—MR. CURRIE.

On the Orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (North Simcoe): I rise to a question of privilege. In the Canadian Press report of my address in this House on the Budget, which has been sent to all the newspapers of Canada, there appears the following:

> There had been a careful avoidance of placing a tax on Canadian-made goods, he said, and this was not good policy on the part of the Government

I said exactly the opposite, and as this House is spending a large sum of money to have these reports sent out to the public, I think somebody should be put in the press gallery who will be more careful in the future.

PURCHASE OF TRACTORS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: May I ask the Minister of Agriculture if a report has been received from Hon. Mr. Dunning, of the Canada Food Board, as to the purchase of tractors for farm work in Canada?

Hon. Mr. CRERAR: No such report has come before me, but I will make inquiries of the Canada Food Board.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

MEDICAL EXAMINATIONS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. P. R. DuTREMBLAY: I understand that a number of young conscripts between the ages of twenty and twenty-two, and whose medical category is "C," have been put in the ranks at Lansdowne Park without further medical examination. Have all men in this class been ordered to report?

Major-General MEWBURN: A man's category may not be known when his notice to report is sent out. When he reports he undergoes a medical examination immediately, and if found to be in category "C" he would be relieved at once.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: I will give the minister the names of some of these young men.

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU: When a category "A" man is called, has he to undergo a further medical examination?

Major-General MEWBURN: In calling up the young men between twenty and twenty-two it has been found that a considerable number who were originally put in category "A" have fallen below that category when re-examined. Of course, it is not our desire to take the men of that class who fall below category "A," but there must be a re-examination to ascertain the condition the men are in at the time they report.

Mr. BUREAU: If a man had previously been placed in category "B" or "C," would not the production of his medical certificate be sufficient to relieve him from duty until his particular category is called?

Major-General MEWBURN: It is quite possible there may have to be a re-examination of all the men. Some who have been placed in category "B" or "C" in the first place, may be in category "A" when called to report.

LEGISLATION RESPECTING ALIENS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (North Simcoe): A few days ago this House unanimously adopted a series of resolutions requesting the Government to bring down legislation with respect to the aliens in Canada. The Government accepted these resolucions, and I would ask when they intend to bring down the legislation, for the session is likely to be short.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not recall any such resolutions.

Mr. CURRIE: The resolution of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Clements) was passed.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not aware that it called for any legislation but rather that certain Orders in Council should be revised.

[Mr. DuTremblay.]

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY.

RENEWAL OR POSTPONEMENT OF PAYMENT OF INDEBTEDNESS OF THE COMPANY.

On the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean (Acting Minister of Finance) for the second reading of the resolution adopted in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of assisting the Canadian Northern Railway Company, or any company included in the Canadian Northern Railway System, in renewing or postponing the payment of any indebtedness of any such company, etc.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I had understood the minister was to produce at this stage all the documents that were promised.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not know if the hon. member purposes making a speech, but I have grave doubts whether this motion is debatable. In the meantime, with the unanimous consent of the House, there can be no objection to his producing the information.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am inclined to think the motion is debatable but I do not want to debate it now. We simply want the information.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I shall be very glad to avoid any debate on the resolution. I shall lay on the Table all the information available. I had not understood, however, that the right hon. gentleman wanted me to lay the information on the Table. I understood he wished me to give it orally to the House, and I shall be very glad to do that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We are hungering for information, and want a taste of the food we are to get.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My colleague is proposing to feed my right hon. friend now.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I will give him all the information he can comfortably read in a couple of days.

Motion agreed to, and resolution read the second time.

Mr. MACLEAN thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 87, an Act supplementary to chapter 24 of the statutes of 1917, respecting the Canadian Northern Railway system.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall this Bill be read a second time?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is only reasonable that we should have time to digest the information that was promised, before taking up the second reading.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am ready to give the information now.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I should like to digest it before we take the second reading.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior) moved that the amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 5, to amend the Dominion Lands, be concurred in.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What are the amendments?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Subsection 1 of section 10 of the Dominion Lands Act, chapter 20 of the statutes of 1918, is amended by striking out the words "or purchased homestead" in the fifth line thereof. There was another place in the Act where the purchased homestead provision was still included notwithstanding the fact that purchased homesteads had been abolished. Consequently, it was merely by a clerical oversight that the words "or purchased homestead" were left in. The Senate struck them out and properly so. The Senate also struck out a clause which provided that when a patent was issued, and before it was delivered from the office of the Department of the Interior, it might be cancelled by the minister without recourse to the Exchequer Court. The Senate took the view that it was not good practice to cancel a patent after issue even though it was still within the office of the minister. The matter is not of sufficient importance to refer back to the Senate and I am prepared to accept that amendment. There was another amendment which was of a clerical character and it is also accepted.

Motion agreed to, and amendment concurred in.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved that the amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 65 to amend the Companies Act be concurred in.

He said: The amendment, I think, is an improvement to the Bill. The Bill simply provides that for the purpose of complying with the requirement of the Companies Act any agreement shall be deposited with the Secretary of State, but that in the case of an agreement from the province of Quebec, which is in notarial form, it shall be sufficient to file a copy of the original. The amendment that the Senate has made is to make that the provision shall operate as from the passing of the clause in the Companies Act in order that copies that have been deposited under the Act up to the present shall avail as well as those which may be produced in future.

Motion agreed to and amendment concurred in.

DOMINION BUREAU OF STATISTICS.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 32, respecting the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, be concurred in. He said:

The amendment that was made in the Senate is to subsection 3 of section 26. The word "railway" is struck out and the word "company" is put in its place. It refers to more than railways. It refers to express companies and carriers by water; so that, the proper word should have been "company," and not "railway," in order to make it include all.

Motion agreed to and amendment concurred in.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

On the motion of the Hon. Mr. Doherty, Bill No. 69, to amend the Criminal Code, was read a second time and the House went into committee on the Bill, Mr. Boivin in the chair.

On section 1—Seduction of girls between sixteen and eighteen; paragraph 2, male persons under twenty-one not to be prosecuted.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I would just like to point out that subclause 2, reading that no male person under the age of twenty-one years shall be prosecuted for any offence under the provisions of this section, is either designed to maintain a double standard of morality, or else it is a direct contradiction of paragraph 1. I submit that if the Parliament of Canada establishes the principle that a girl has come to the age of responsibility at eighteen years, it has no right to establish the principle that a man up to twenty-one has not come to the same age of responsibility.

I further submit that the clause is setting up a vicious principle, in that it is saying to young men between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one: We recognize that you have free license to do as you like during this period. Now the Act would be very much stronger if subclause 2 were omitted entirely, but I submit we are not keeping abreast of the times if we set up anything that would be in the nature of a double standard of morality. Subclause 1, providing for raising the age of consent from sixteen to eighteen years, is excellent so far as it goes, but subclause 2 certainly should be dropped, otherwise we are saying to our young men: We give you all the license that you wish, we invite you to do as you like between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one—the most vital years of a young man's life,—and we will undertake to correct the habits you have formed after you have passed the age of twenty-one.

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I will explain the reason for having in the Bill provisions to which he objects, and which he argues is creating a double standard of morality. Might I point out to him that the section which he commends—and which I am glad to see meets with his approval,—and the provision of the law up to the present which has been the same, save as regards the age fixed for the young girl, proceeds on the assumption that there is a double standard, but a double standard more severe as against the man than against the girl, because the man is made a criminal.

An hon. MEMBER: So he should be.

Mr. DOHERTY: This section makes the young man a criminal and extends the criminality as regards girls of higher age than the law previously provided, but it does seem that there is a severer provision as against the man than there is against the girl, and I think quite rightly and quite properly. The reason why the provision in question was inserted is this: You are making this offence, which it takes two people to perpetrate, a crime as regards one of them. By this section you are increasing the age at which the girl is held to be capable of consenting; you are raising the age of the girl in such a manner as to make it an offence henceforth on the part of the man to have relations with a girl with regard to whom, up till to-day, that was not an offence. The reason why that provision was introduced with regard to the boy up to the age of twenty-one, and the representation made in its favour, was that when you are dealing with a girl who may be just under the age of eighteen years, and a boy, say, of nineteen or twenty years of age, there was really no strong reason to assume that, as between young people of those ages respectively, the guilt or responsibility in the matter was entirely on the part of the young man. I do not want to go into the argument in detail. I think all our experience of human nature would lead us to concede, even if we do not think this provision ought to stand as it is, that there at all events is some force in the argument. The provision itself has been very strongly supported—I am speaking now of the main provision raising the age—by the Social Service Council of Canada while they very strongly recommend the enactment of the first section raising the age, they also expressed the view and recommended that there should be a clause which would give protection to boys up to the same age and in the same way as the section protects the girls. That involves a section fixing precisely the same age for both sexes, and I think, perhaps, there may be a general consensus of opinion in favour of accepting that. The reason for carrying the age up to twenty-one was that which I have given. It was represented to us by people who have had very considerable to do with the detection and punishment of offences of this kind, that when you raise the age of the girl to eighteen you diminish very materially the presumption, as I have said, that the entire responsibility for what happened was upon the young man. It was pointed out that in those very years is the time when young men are more open to the influence, or more apt to be carried away by the influence, of passion, and that experience would go to show that under those conditions the young girl—any girl of seventeen or eighteen years—may fairly be assumed to be as well qualified to control herself, and to prevent conditions arising where unfortunately these offences may be committed, as the young man up to the age of twenty-one. However, this is not a question upon which I am wedded at all to the fixing of a particular age; I am absolutely in the hands of the committee as to what age limit, if any, should be fixed with regard to the young man. This is a question, of course, as to which there can be no suggestion that there should be any consideration come into play but what, in the judgment of this House, would best conduce to the maintenance of morality.

It has been pointed out to me also in this connection, and as a ground for making a provision of this kind fixing this particular age, or possibly another age, with regard to the young man, that we are making this a crime. Undoubtedly the consequence will be that the young man who offends in this regard will be made a criminal; he is going to be subjected to the treatment of a criminal and started in his early youth with the brand of criminality upon him. Unless the proposed amendment passes, that has not been the case up to the present time. We all fully appreciate, and there is no occasion to dilate upon it, the very grave consequences that, without regard to legislative enactment, fall upon the girl who sins in this way, and I have no desire to make the position of the young man better in that regard than her own. On the other hand, I do not think it is quite correct to point to this section as giving a license to the young man to do what he likes with regard to girls of the age referred to. If that appreciation of it be correct, then the law up to the present has given a license to men of all ages to do what they please in that respect.

But now we are creating a new offence. This Bill makes it an offence for all men over twenty-one years of age, and assumes absolutely their exclusive responsibility for the commission of this sin, which, as I have said, takes two people to commit. Whether it is wise or unwise, in making that extension and raising the age of the girl, also to make that offence apply with regard to men of all ages, is a question that, at all events, is serious, and calls for consideration. As I have said, however, I am not wedded to this particular age. I am quite in the judgment of the committee and of the House as to whether the age with regard to the young man is the age that should properly be fixed, or whether we should fix the same age as for the girl, or any intervening age, or whether there should be any provision at all fixing the age. I would only like to call the attention of the committee to what has been said in support of this proposition, and perhaps particularly to the fact that by making legislation which will be applicable to young men of all ages you are perhaps not bettering the position of the girl who has the misfortune to be a participant in this sin, but you are very materially aggravating the consequences to the young man. So far as those consequences will operate as a deterrent, of course I think we would all hold up both hands for them. But I think it is well to look at the other side of the picture and to consider whether in the general interest of the community it is well to enact a law that will start out in his career in life branded as a criminal every young man who may have yielded to temptation in this particular regard. If we could do something to mitigate the social consequences to the young woman probably it would be better, but I do not imagine that we can, nor am I affirming absolutely that it would be. But the question really pressing is: Will society as a whole gain if we blast as a criminal at the very outset of his career the young man who, under the circumstances provided for by the section, has yielded to temptation and fallen into this sin and committed this offence, whose gravity I do not want to minimize, but which, at the same time, is an offence to which youth at that particular stage of its career is exceedingly liable, by the weakness of our human nature, to find itself guilty of. But as I have said, I am quite prepared to take the view of the committee upon that question.

Mr. DEVLIN: I am glad to hear the minister say that he is not wedded to this legislation.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not wedded to subsection 2.

Mr. DEVLIN: I feel moreover that the Minister of Justice had nothing to do with the drawing up or the dictating of this subsection. I know him too well for that. To my mind this is about the most damnable piece of legislation I have ever seen brought before this House. Subsection 2 simply gives to the young man up to the age of twenty-one license to go round the country committing a certain act which I will not mention, an act that is even too repugnant to mention here, and the Government will simply say to that young man: "Well done, go and do it again."

Mr. DOHERTY: Might I suggest then that if that be so all governments in the past have been saying to "all" men: "Well done, go and do it again."

Mr. DEVLIN: But governments have not been saying that, because answering my hon. friend's remark, I will give him what all governments have been saying. Section 211 of the Criminal Code reads as follows:

12 noon

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who seduces or has illicit connection with any girl of previously chaste character, of or above the age of fourteen years and under the age of sixteen years.

It does not tell the man that he goes scot-free; it punishes the man. But by subsection 2 of this Bill you say to the young man:

No male person under the age of twenty-one years shall be prosecuted for any offence under the provisions of this section.

If I have a suggestion to make respecting this legislation, it is to strike out the whole of the proposed new section 211 and amend section 211 of the Code as follows:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable—

Not to two years but——to six years' imprisonment who seduces or has illicit connection with any girl of previously chaste character.

That is the first amendment I would make. And the second amendment I would make would be to leave out all words after the word "character." The words in the present Criminal Code which I propose to leave out are as follows:

Of or above the age of fourteen years and under the age of sixteen years.

The clause as I propose it would then read:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to six years' imprisonment who seduces or has illicit connection with any girl of previously chaste character.

Mr. McMASTER: How would you define "girl"?

Mr. DEVLIN: I define a girl just as she is defined under the Criminal Code. I would not limit her age, provided she was of previously chaste character. I say that no man, especially the class of men the Minister of Justice referred to as most apt to show their passions and to commit this crime, would be entitled to have illicit connection with any girl of previously chaste character.

An Hon. MEMBER: Even if she were fifty years of age?

Mr. DEVLIN: I am not particular about the age. I have know of cases where girls over that age were before the courts. If there are hon. gentlemen in this House so very particular as to limiting the girl's age, then they can suggest a limit to the age. But I have known cases such as this: a woman who was not in full possession of her faculties has been seduced by a young man of twenty years of age. By this proposed new legislation that woman would have no redress before the courts. We are dealing with a section of the code which gives a free hand to every young man up to twenty-one years of age to commit a crime. Such legislation ought not to be tolerated.

Mr. F. B. STACEY (Westminster District): I congratulate the Minister of Justice upon the general character of the amendments proposed in this Bill. I am sure it will be a cause of deep satisfaction to the right-thinking citizens of this country, comprising, I believe, the great majority of the population, that the minister has brought down such important amendments to the Criminad Code. This Bill, perhaps more than ordinary Bills, lends itself to a discussion that is comparatively, if not entirely, free from all sectional considerations, and, therefore, in my remarks I shall try to speak as a man to men, irrespective of race, religion, or party. I have reason to believe that there are great numbers of our best Canadian citizens who would go even further than the minister has gone, and would favour raising both the age of consent and the age of seduction higher than is provided for in his amendments. With this view I do not hesitate to declare myself in full sympathy, but I do not intend to suggest any further change at present. I mention it merely to indicate to the minister that he has not gone beyond the judgment of hundreds of thousands of the best people of our country. I do, however, ask that the minister will accept an amendment to clause 2 of section 211, and which I have drafted as follows:

That the word "twenty-one" be striken out of line 16 and the word "eighteen" be substituted therefor.

It will then read:

No male person under the age of eighteen years shall be prosecuted for any offence under the provisions of this section.

It will readily be acknowledged that the subject matter of this clause has a direct and vital bearing upon the domestic life of the people of Canada and I submit that any matter so closely related to the welfare and happiness of our Canadian homes is worthy of our most serious consideration. It is considered by some people that it is scarcely within the scope of Federal legislation to have very much to say or to do with family life. This idea is probably based on the assumption underlying the well-known phrase that an Englishman's house is his castle; but we have learned that if it is necessary to do so to protect the interests of society, any man's castle may be invaded by the State. It is not necessary to argue to-day that what Canada needs is more homes; that the social and economic conditions of society be so adjusted that early marriages may be encouraged and that the State should give some attention to and some instruction regarding the vital subject of child welfare. When it is remembered that more children under five years of age die in Canada every year than the total number of Canadian fatalities during the first three years of the war; when we remember also that great numbers of these children might, under proper conditions, have lived, we will at once admit that every fact or consideration bearing upon the home life of our citizens is of supreme importance. I fear that this clause granting exemption from prosecution to all offenders under twenty-one, will, instead of affording protection to our Canadian homes, tend to lessen their number and destroy the happiness of many remaining. If a young man under twenty-one takes advantage of this clause and seduces a young girl, what follows? An unmarried motherhood, with one woman living under a cloud during the remainder of her life, and drawing other homes into the shadow; or, on the other hand, too often the beginning of a life of shame. So far as records are available I believe that a very small percentage of girls go wrong after twenty-one years of age, and consequently, so far as legislation touches this question at all, it should seek to protect in every way possible the young women of our country.

Another reason for this amendment is found in the fact that as the clause stands it appears at least to endorse a double standard of morals.

I am sure that this House only needs to be reminded that if there is any one thing in the whole realm of sociology which the best manhood and the best womanhood of this country deprecates and is most anxious to eliminate, it is this two-fold standard of morals. I fear that this clause as it stands will tend to encourage, if not indeed actually to sanction, that very distinction which our best citizenship is seeking to abolish. Must I speak plainly to be understood? This clause seeks to protect girls up to 18 years of age from seduction by men over 21 years of age, but it says to every young man under 21: Go to, yield to every passion, ruin every girl you desire of 16 years of age and upwards, and no prosecution will follow, we give you special permission until you are 21 years of age to live an unbridled sexual life, but after that you must settle down and behave yourself; it is true we have tacitly encouraged you to start on an evil road; nevertheless, if you keep on that road after you are 21, we will punish you severely. I am sure this committee will not endorse that policy. If any cynical critic either inside or outside the House should retort: Oh, you are only trying to make people virtuous by legislation; my answer is brief and direct: I am trying by legislation to make it difficult and as dangerous as possible for them to be vicious, especially when the life-long welfare of others is involved in such vicious self-indulgence.

One other reason only I shall briefly state. Our country is made up of a cosmopolitan population. From ocean to ocean, in every province of this Dominion, we have representatives of nearly every nation under Heaven. That simple statement is a warning in itself. We know that the morals of certain nationalities are exceedingly lax and that with many others of all races the animal passions are at a maximum between nineteen and twenty-one years of age. We must not consider this question merely from the viewpoint of our own households, but from the national viewpoint, and with the coming generations in sight. One thing I believe every man in this House wishes to escape and that is the accusation of an outraged public conscience, voiced too often by a broken hearted and spirit-crushed father or mother in the sad words: "My girl must suffer, but the man goes scot free." I submit that the amendment which I suggest would help in some measure to save us from that awful indictment.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the member for Westminster District formally move an amendment, or does he merely offer it as a suggestion?

Mr. STACEY: I have submitted my amendment in the hope that the minister will incorporate it in the Bill.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: If there is anything disgraceful in our modern civilization which has not been cured by the advance in sociality, it is the double system of morals. Any man who recognizes that system has not advanced far enough in the scale of sociality to vote to give women the franchise. I do not understand, and never could, why my sister should be tabooed for a breach of the social law while my brother for the same act should not. In bringing down a Bill, therefore, which introduces a double standard of morals for men—not as between men and women, but as between young men and older men— my hon. friend is making a great mistake. The member for Westminster District (Mr. Stacey) points out that certain people think we have no right to pass legislation with regard to young girls. But this is not altogether a moral question: it is a physiological question as well. A man who indulges once is likely to do it again, whereas if he is kept chaste, he has no desire to do it. I speak with some authority with regard to this matter, because I have been an observer of men whom I have had under my control, men who have been closely associated with me, locked up with me, so to speak, for weeks and months. I have observed the practice of a vicious system of ignorance: some of these men teaching younger men that they would have to do certain things in order to be men. This is the greatest rot that was ever taught to young men. I repeat that the question is one of physiology as well as of morals. Young men may be and ought to be so educated that there would be no necessity for such a law, in the meantime let us protect them from their present ignorance. I certainly hope the minister will strike out subsection 2, and I would suggest that he raise the age of consent to twenty-one. A man has no right to take advantage of a woman at any time, at any rate, not until she is twenty-one.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I am in full and complete accord with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin), and I believe the time is not very far distant, if it is not here now, when that principle will be incorporated into the Criminal Code of Canada. I believe, however, in being practical if I can, and I do not think there would be much use in pressing, at the present moment, an amendment quite so drastic as that, but I strongly urge on the minister that if he does not eliminate subsection 2 entirely, he will accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Westminster district (Mr. Stacey), and, at least, amend the subsection so as to make the ages similar. As regards what the minister said as to branding as a criminal a young man between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one, let us just reverse the order and see what takes place with regard to the girl. Assuming that we set the age limit in each case at eighteen, assuming that the young man and the young woman are alike up to eighteen years of age and that they commit that offence, what happens? The young woman goes through life branded, if not as a criminal, at least as an outcast, while the young man goes through life free. We proceed further along that line, and under subsection 2 we say to the young woman: You will be branded as an outcast, sinking possibly lower and lower in the social scale until you become a menace, not only to your own sex, but to the opposite sex, the younger boys, if you will, and we say to the young man between eighteen and twenty-one years of age, who brings the young woman into that position: You go scot-free, and we thus encourage that sort of thing to continue. I would like to see the clause struck out entirely, or if not, that the minister should accept the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Westminster district (Mr. Stacey).

Mr. PROULX: I approve the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Westminster district (Mr. Stacey). In some of the provinces a young man is considered old enough at eighteen to be married without the consent of his parents, so, as my hon. friend from Wright (Mr. Devlin) has said, a young man of eighteen years of age can commit as much damage as a young man over the age of twenty-one. It would be conducive to morality if the age, so far as the young man is concerned, was reduced to eighteen.

Mr. VIEN: The only argument that has been brought forward against striking out subsection 2 is that the young man between eighteen and twenty-one years of age should be protected and not be branded as a criminal. I think, on the contrary; it will be a preventive to the young man of that age if he knows that his action constitutes a criminal offence. Moreover, while the maximum punishment provided for is imprisonment for two years, the sentence may be for imprisonment for from one day up to two years, and I think that, if a young man between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one committed the criminal offence which is foreseen by this amendment to the Criminal Code, the court before which he would have to appear would take into consideration the particular circumstances of the case and, instead of branding him with a sentence of imprisonment for two years, the court might sentence him to imprisonment for an hour, a day, a week, two weeks, or two months. It would be a good thing to strike out subsection 2 and leave subsection 1 alone, thus leaving it to the courts to decide in each case what punishment should be inflicted.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Minister of Justice might also take this into consideration, that since we call a young man of the age of nineteen or twenty to the colours, he should not be put above the law, as under subsection 2 he will be put. I agree with the hon. member for Westminster district as to the merits of the Bill. It is a good Bill and it should be passed by the House, but subsection 2 should be struck out.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I am one of the few hon. members who agree with the Minister of Justice as to subsection 2. When I first read the Bill, I was going to ask for an explanation as to the age limit in subsection 2. The reasons given by the Minister of Justice have convinced me that subsection 2 should be retained in the Bill. There are certainly cases where the responsibility should not fall entirely on the young man under twenty-one years of age, and where the girl should be let go scot free. Surely my hon. friend from Wright and the hon. member for East Algoma are not serious when they say a young man under twenty-one years of age should be prosecuted for having seduced a maid of forty or forty-five years of age. The proposition is absolutely absurd. The reasons given by the Minister of Justice are sound, and I think the subsection should be kept as it is.

Mr. COWAN: I think the case cited by my hon. friend is so exceptional that it should not be considered at all. The vast majority of these cases occur between the young man of twenty and girls of the same age. Instances of the kind cited by my hon. friend are very rare, indeed, and should not form the basis of our legislation. I would sooner trust a man at any period of his life than between eighteen and twenty-one years, when his passions are matured but he has not the wisdom of maturity. Our ordinary legislation recognizes that. I see no reason why we should make any distinction between the two sexes. The law of Canada provides that where the two parties agree to marry all criminal proceedings shall be stopped. If we remove the penalty from young men up to the age of twenty-one years he will certainly not be any the more likely to marry the girl; whereas when he is liable to a penalty of two years he is more likely to do justice to her. I do not believe in forced marriages, but I believe that is better than to turn a young woman out blighted for the rest of her life. I therefore support the suggestion of my hon. friend.

Mr. DEVLIN: In order to settle the qualms of conscience of my hon. friend from Kamouraska, when I spoke of a woman of forty-five or fifty I was simply instancing how far young men might carry their crimes. I did not cite that as a basis for any argument at all, and I hope my hon. friend, knowing me as well as he does, will not think I meant that as the essence of any argument I was trying to make. I am thoroughly aware of the fact that the Criminal Code provides for cases of idiots and so on, but I had in mind cases occurring in the country. I am addressing myself particularly to hon. gentlemen representing rural constituencies, because apparently this legislation does not consider the cities at all. Hon. gentlemen representing the cities can draw up their own code of morals, but we are here trying to protect the people in the rural constituencies.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: These things do not occur in rural constituencies.

Mr. DEVLIN: The hon. member for Kamouraska has the advantage of representing one of the ideal constituencies of the Dominion. As a matter of fact, there is less crime in rural constituencies than in cities.

An hon. MEMBER: Less known crime.

Mr. DEVLIN: I have lived in cities and I have lived in the country, and I know whereof I speak. In the rural parts of Canada there is far less crime than there is in the cities, but it is in the rural constituencies where an odd case such as I have cited comes to the notice of the criminal authorities. You gentlemen who come from the cities are framing your code of morals every day for yourselves, and are perhaps not paying the same keen attention to this matter that we are who represent rural constituencies. I think, after all the arguments that have been advanced, there is nothing further for me to add. I am grieved, however, beyond measure to see that my hon. friend from Kamouraska, who is the very incarnation of virtue, respectable beyond his outward appearance, wants us to swallow subsection 2 of section 211. I am not going to attempt to answer my hon. friend. I shall leave him to settle the matter with his conscience.

Mr. McMASTER: It is a matter of gratification to see the unanimity with which the principle of this Bill is accepted by the House. I would urge that this clause be retained, not necessarily retaining the word "twenty-one," but some protection should be given to young boys. If you eliminate this clause altogether, a girl of eighteen, of a passionate nature, might have illicit connection with a young lad of sixteen, and she would not be liable under the Criminal Code, while the boy would; and that is something we have to provide against. We do not want a double standard of morality, and we do not want a double standard that will punish the boy of sixteen and allow the girl of eighteen to go almost scot-free. I am in favour of retaining the clause, and while not prepared to go quite so far perhaps as the hon. member for Westminster, I am prepared to go with him a considerable length. That a young man of almost twenty-one, with all the matured discretion of a grown man, should go scot-free is not right. At the same time there must be some protection to the mere lad, who perhaps through ignorance is led astray by a young girl a little older. I cherish this view that where two young people have misconducted themselves, as a rule the girl is just as much to blame as the boy, and I would suggest that as we are all agreed on the principle, it might meet the views of the House if we substituted the word "nineteen" for the word "twenty-one."

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I should like to emphasize the point I have already tried to make. In the case just cited by my hon. friend, what does a thirty-day term in jail mean to a boy of sixteen compared with the stigma the girl of eighteen will carry for the rest of her life? The girl you say, goes scot free but the girl who has wilfully got herself into that position, which is a most unusual thing to contemplate, or who has been brought into that condition by the wiles of a devilish young man, is branded for the rest of her life and no sentence you could impose on any young man could brand him to the same degree as the girl is branded before society by that very act. If the suggestion of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Vien) was accepted by which this clause would be stricken out and the determination of the punishment left to the courts you would eliminate the license you have given to the young man and place in the hands of men who are able to put a proper estimate upon the nature and extent of the offence, the opportunity to determine what the punishment should be. You will make the Bill clean and acceptable, and not hold out to any class of young men that liberty or license which has been spoken about during this discussion, if you simply strike out this paragraph as the hon. member for Lotbinière has suggested.

Mr. VIEN: Under the ordinary rules of criminal procedure a judge can even suspend sentence and no provisions are necessary in this Act to allow him to do so. The judge could suspend sentence, if paragraph two of this sentence were struck out, and exercise his discretion in each case.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am pleased to have had the advantage of listening to the different views which have been put forward. I was very gratified indeed to have had the endorsement of the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe), particularly as I endorse the description of him given by the hon, member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) as being the incarnation of virtue. That little consolation perhaps makes it easier for me, remembering some of the very strong language that has been used in regard to this section, to express my readiness to accept the modification which is suggested. I would not like to leave out entirely a provision, not holding out a license to do things, but merely, when we are making a new criminal law, making it applicable to men above a certain age. If the description of this legislation is correct as being a legislative holding out of a license to all young men up to twenty-one to commit this offence, we must inevitably conclude that as regards girls between fourteen and sixteen, or girls over fourteen, the law up to the present has held forth a license to all men to commit this offence. We would be making a step in advance if we cut that license down to a young man over twenty-one. However, I do not want to elaborate the argument that might be made. I do not want either to convey the idea that in the argument that might be made on the other side there is not very considerable force, but I cannot say that I am absolutely convinced by what has been said that the clause as it stands is objectionable. On the other hand, I am quite prepared, in a matter of this kind, to defer to the judgment of this committee as to the age which can be fixed and to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Westminster District (Mr. Steacey) that we should substitute eighteen for twenty-one. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) suggested nineteen. It was hardly worth while, for the sake of a difference of one year, to depart from the principle of putting both girl and boy, from the point of view of the criminal law at all events, on a footing of equality. There is nothing we can do by the criminal law which will minimize the social consequences to the girl. That, unfortunately, will always be the case. I say "unfortunately," and no doubt it is unfortunate for the individual girl, but perhaps not absolutely unfortunate for the good of society in general. However, I need not go into that question. We cannot modify the position of the girl by anything the criminal law does. I will be prepared to accept the suggestion that eighteen be substituted for twenty-one, in the hope that that will meet the view of the committee generally. I therefore beg to move:

That subsection two of the proposed section be amended by striking out "twenty-one" in the first line thereof and substituting "eighteen."

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 4—Unmarried man and woman registering as man and wife at hotel:

Mr. COOPER: I would like to ask whether, in the framing of this section, any notice has been taken of what is commonly known as a common law wife. All over the British Empire and in the United States they have acknowledged that principle by paying separation allowance to the dependents of a soldier whether he was married to a woman or not. It seems to me that this is a very drastic law, and makes a criminal of two people who have arrived at the age of discretion and ought to know their own intentions. I would think that before this is enacted it would be made the subject of discussion.

Mr. DOHERTY: All that is made an offence is the false statement. It is made an offence for people who are not man and wife to register themselves at any hotel or boarding house as being man and wife. There may be cases—I do not know to what extent if such is the fact—in parts of this country where what the hon. member describes as the common law wife is recognized as being validly married. But, after all, nobody has any right to live together as man and wife, unless they are legally and properly so, and the evil which is aimed at here has been represented to me as being largely prevalent. It has to do with people with regard to whom there is no pretence of common law relationship, or anything of the kind. On the contrary I am told that it is not at all an uncommon practice for people who have possibly met each other on a particular day or evening, and who make no pretence of conjugal relationship whatsoever, to go into hotels and boarding houses and use them simply as convenient places for prostitution, covering up their doings by registering themselves as man and wife. Large numbers of very respectable hotelkeepers have supported the suggested legislation because to-day they are not in a position to protect themselves by telling the parties concerned, "You are not married," and there is no consequence attaching to the registration falsely of these people as married persons. I think that the possible injury that might happen, if it be considered an injury, in the cases suggested by the hon. gentleman, sinks into insignificance in view of the real evil that is struck at.

Mr. MORPHY: Under the proposed section the Minister of Justice wants to reach the case of the man who goes to an hotel with a woman who is not his wife. But suppose the woman does the registering and the pretending, how are you going to reach her? I think the woman in such an event should be punished as well as the man, if we want to enact legislation that will prove effective. It may be said that the clause does cover the point that I have raised, but I do not think so. From a critical reading of it it seems to me that the clause would be quite inoperative and absolute nullity if it were left in the position in which it is at present.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think it would be desirable that we should make the section clear beyond the possibility of all doubt, and I have no objection to amending it with that object in view. I therefore move to amend section 220A by inserting in the second last line thereof after the word "woman," the words "or a man," and by inserting in the last line thereof before the word, "is" the words "or she" and adding to the last line after word "wife" the words "or her husband, as the case may be."

The CHAIRMAN: The section as proposed to be amended will now read:

Every one is guilty of an offence and liable, upon summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding five hundred dollars or six months' imprisonment, who, at any hotel, boarding or lodging house, whether by registering in any book kept in such hotel, boarding or lodging house, or otherwise, represents or pretends that a woman, or a man, to whom he or she is not married, is his wife, or her husband, as the case may be.

Mr. BUREAU: That makes both liable.

Mr. DOHERTY: Both liable.

Mr. BUREAU: In case the law is violated that will prove to be a very dear signature.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 220B—corrupting children.

Mr. VIEN: I think this section of the Act would afford the so-called social reformers the opportunity of entering any house, or of complaining of the internal economy of any house, making complaints in court, and compelling anybody to go and defend themselves against such complaint. The scope of the section is so wide that its operation will be mischievous and it should, therefore, be cut out entirely. As proposed the section reads:

> Any person who by indulgence in sexual immorality, in habitual drunkenness, or in any other form of vice, causes a child to be in danger of being or becoming immoral, dissolute, or criminal, or tends injuriously to affect the morals of a child, or renders the home of a child an unfit place for such child to be in, shall be liable—and so on. It would seem that whether you are in your own house or in the house of another person, any social reformer will be entitled to make complaint against you, and you will have to face the complaint in court whether it is well founded or not. It seems to me that the section opens a door to blackmail of the worst character, and should be struck out.

Mr. DOHERTY: The clause, while new in our Criminal Code, already appears in Canadian legislation. It is taken substantially from a provision in the Juvenile Delinquents Act of the province of Ontario, which has been in operation for quite some time now, and is considered invaluable by good and wise people who have interested themselves in the Child Welfare movement, and in the experience of the province of Ontario it has not given rise to the suggested abuses. The reason I am asking the House to introduce this clause into the Criminal Code of Canada is that though it had been applied for no inconsiderable time in the province of Ontario with what are represented to be the most beneficial results, it has recently been held, and I think properly, by one of the judges of the High Court of Ontario, before whom such a case came, that the provision properly and rightly constituted criminal law, and was not within the legislative jurisdiction of the legislature of a province.

As regards what the hon. gentleman points out, this clause gives no right of search or intrusion into anybody's house. What it does is to make it a criminal offence for people by their immoral acts to expose to corruption young children. Now, whatever view one may take of the desirability of making certain immoral acts criminal, I think there will be a general consensus of opinion that where people perpetrate these acts in the presence of young children in such a manner as to deprave and corrupt, surely that is an evil to suppress, and I do not think that there is any real danger to be apprehended with regard to the privacy of our own households. The charitable societies and the child-welfare societies have found this a most useful and effective provision, and I have not heard in the province in which it has been in force any suggestion that there has been any abuse such as has been mentioned. What I would like to emphasize is that the section confers on nobody any right of search or intrusion into a house which does not exist already. If there be a right on the part of moral reformers to intrude, they have it, and they will have it, whether this section is passed or not. As I have said, it has been found in practice—that information I have upon the authority of people competent to speak — a most useful section, and one particularly useful to restrain the practice of immorality on the part of men who intrude themselves into houses when the husband is absent or away from one cause or another, and so conduct themselves with the woman of the house in the presence of young children as to create a condition where it is almost hopeless that the children will be brought up with any proper ideas of morality.

Mr. VIEN: I do not desire to be misunderstood. I understand there is no right of search, but it is left to anybody to make a complaint. I am fully in accord with the principle embodied in this section, that children should be protected as much as possible, and I am glad to hear that this law has been in operation in Ontario and that it has not, thus far at least, given rise to any abuses. But I think the minister will agree with me that the right to make the complaint should not be open, but that the complaint should come through the instrumentality of the Attorney-General of the province, so that it would not be possible to use the right of complaint as an instrument of blackmail. This right should not be open to any body who would like to be a complainant. Even if the complaint were unfounded, it would be quite awkward for any respectable persons to have to face such a complaint in the criminal courts. Then the section is very wide in the definition of vice when it says "or in any other form of vice." I should not like the public at large to be confronted with the possibility of having to face a charge on any ground that the so-called social reformers could interpret as vice. There is no such thing as a definition of vice in the Criminal Code of Canada. I do not think the section in its present form should be adopted, but some proviso should be inserted restricting the right to make a complaint.

Mr. COWAN: I do not know what happens to blackmailers in the province of Quebec, but I do know that in my province if professional blackmailers or social reformers attempted to use blackmail under the circumstances mentioned in this section, they would be punished even more severely than would the persons against whom the complaint had been laid, if the charge were proven.

Mr. VIEN: The motive may not always come under the definition of blackmail, but suppose the motive was vengeance. By this Bill you give an instrument to avenge against a person by making the right to complain open.

At one o'clock the House rose.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. BUREAU: When the committee rose the member for Lotbinière (Mr. Vien) was taking objection to the clause under consideration, on the ground, first, that it was too vague, and, second, that it opened the door to blackmail. One of the members on the other side took exception to the word "blackmail," saying that if anything of that kind arose, there were means of dealing with it. But we must consider this clause as it is proposed to be enacted. We assume that those who asked for its enactment had a purpose in view. We are all human; we cannot create heavenly conditions on this earth by legislation; on the other hand, we do not want to ruin reputations by trying to be over-good. If I had a room in a house where there were small children and chanced to bring and use a couple of bottles of whisky or wine, some goody-goody gentleman who wished to get after me, contending that, in the words of the Act, my conduct would "tend injuriously to affect the morals of a child," could bring me before a magistrate and I should be disgraced for life, simply because, in a house where there were children, I happened to have more whisky than I should have had. I do not believe that is right.

Mr. DOHERTY: This Act deals only with habitual drunkenness, so that the instance my hon. friend cites does not constitute a case.

Mr. BUREAU: Habitual drunkenness would be a case outside the one I am citing. I am willing that strict measures be taken to protect the youth of the country; we cannot be too severe on those who teach younger children vice, or bad habits, or immorality. I do not go so far as the member for Lotbinière in reference to blackmail or the vengeance side of the matter, but I submit that persons acting in good faith, impelled by their zeal to do good and to see that everybody else in the community is good, may drag to dishonour a respectable person who may have had the misfortune to fall under circumstances rendering him liable to provisions of the law under which he may be fined $500 or sentenced to six months in jail. I suggest that the wording of the clause be so changed as to put a kind of limitation on the zeal of persons who, in their desire to do good, may make things worse than they otherwise would have been.

Mr. MORPHY: I agree with the member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) that the clause is not happily worded, that it is too broad to get at the evil for which we should provide a remedy. I suggest that if the minister is not going to define the meaning of the word "vice," he insert between the words "other" and "from," in the second line of 220B, the word "habitual," thus restricting the section by specifying that it is a vicious habit that is aimed at. It is a question whether a time of war is the best time for the enactment of legislation along the line of social reform. The public mind is excited, the nerves of the people are subjected to certain strain, and we are apt to go too far in this direction; legislation of this kind is apt to be put through too hastily. There is something in the argument of the member for Lotbinière (Mr. Vien) that this section as it stands may be taken advantage of by persons who are actuated by spite or malice. In connection with the work of the Children's Aid Society in Ontario, some cases have come under my attention where people actuated by malice have taken advantage of this kind of provision in the Criminal Code and of others as well. We should avoid that as far as possible. The minister should frame a clause defining vice, and should provide that in cases of wrong practices liable to depreciate the morals of children, no prosecution shall be made except through the medium of associations in the various provinces and districts which are engaged in child welfare work. These institutions are of high standing, and are accustomed to proceeding carefully along these lines and investigating very thoroughly before they make a complaint. It would be good policy also to make a further provision that in cases where no such society exists in any particular district, no prosecution shall be commenced without a fiat from the Minister of Justice, the Attorney General of the province, or such other well-constituted authority as may be designated. In this way such prosecutions would be thrown largely into the hands of societies which are peculiarly fitted to deal with the matter. I have had frequent opportunity of observing the splendid work done by the child welfare societies throughout large districts in Ontario.

The work of these societies has been the means of preserving the morals of thousands of children throughout Ontario, because those societies, being organized in a judicial manner, have made their investigations and have taken children bodily from their parents and away from the bad and immoral atmosphere which is aimed at in this Bill.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I do not agree with the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) at all. In the province of Alberta there is an Act governing the conduct of children by their parents, and, so far as I know, there has never been any attempt to use it for the purpose of blackmail against any individual by way of spite or otherwise. To say that such legislation should not be enacted because this is war time is, to my mind, no argument at all. The section is quite a reasonable one. There surely cannot be any vagueness in the phrase:

Any person who by indulgence in sexual immorality.

The phrase itself is sufficient to indicate that the indulgence cannot be a mistake, such as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau). It surely cannot be understood by the expression—

Any person who by indulgence in habitual drunkenness.

[Mr. Morphy.]

—that a man may make a mistake by having a few friends in a room where children may be

Mr. BUREAU: I accepted that too.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: The section aims at creating character in children. Habits are created by repeated acts, and habits create character in a child. This section is intended to lead parents to be careful in bringing up their children. If there is any possibility that the section might be used for the purpose alleged by the hon. member, then the suggestion that a fiat should be obtained from the Attorney General is a good one, and that would be the proper course to follow. The Attorney General would have the whole case submitted to him, and he would thus be able to see whether there was a violation of the law or not. Outside of that, I do not see why any amendment should be made, and when there are so many people coming from countries in which there is a different standard of morals from ours, they should learn that there is a standard of morals in Canada, and this section should be passed expressly for the purpose of bringing them up to the standard of morals which we Canadians have. I, therefore, heartily support the section.

Mr. BUREAU: The Minister of Justice this morning said that this section was copied from the Ontario Act, which was working very well. Is that the reason for enacting this legislation to-day, or is this legislation brought before Parliament because there has been a demand for it on the part of the people generally throughout Canada? If it is based only upon the fact that the Ontario Act is working well and that the minister thought that Canada should have uniform legislation in regard to the matter, all well and good. On the other hand, if this legislation has been introduced by reason of a demand from an association or of a particular class of people, we should, because they are extremists, be on our guard as to what they may do later on. They might go much further than this legislation intends. My hon. friend (Mr. H. A. Mackie) takes exception to my statement. He bases his answer on two things that I did not touch on, and he fails to answer the third. I do not take exception to the expression "habitual drunkenness or habitual indulgence in immorality," but I take exception to the vagueness of the third clause, which says:

Or in any other form of vice.

When the word "vice" is not defined in the Bill, those over-good people may, with the best intention in the world, go further than the presumed intent of this legislation, as it stands at present. That is the exception I make to this. I agree with my hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Morphy) that the word "habitual" ought to be inserted before the word "form" so that the clause would read:

In habitual drunkenness or in any other habitual form of vice.

It is common knowledge that there are persons who make it their business to run after young boys and young girls to endeavour to induce them to do wrong, and, for my part I do not think we can be too severe in dealing with such people. They are the ones whom we want to punish and of whom we want to purge society. But if we are going to pass this legislation as it is, there is an opportunity for such cases as I have suggested. Those who wish to have the legislation in its present form are extremists, and we must always be afraid of extremists. When the law is enforced, they may be extreme in carrying it out, and injury may result to good people, who may be dishonoured for life.

Mr. DOHERTY: We heard this morning about the Ontario Act, but this legislation is in existence not only in Ontario. An hon. member has spoken about Alberta, and, if I am not mistaken, there are similar provisions of the law in other provinces. The reason why this legislation was introduced here was not merely because it had been in force in Ontario and had proved a good law, but because it was found—and the court so decided—that this law, which had worked so admirably, was not within the legislative competency of a provincial legislature, and, therefore, if any portion of Canada was to have the benefit of it, it should and could be enacted only by this Parliament. Testimony as to this being good legislation has been given to me by most reliable people who certainly cannot be described as extremists, unless the fact that one is willing to give up his time and spend a good deal of his money and put himself to considerable trouble to protect children, constitutes a person an extremist. The gentlemen who have interested themselves in this matter can in no respect be described as extremists unless conduct such as I have mentioned is the conduct of an extremist. As to the criticism about the vagueness of the law, and the necessity of inserting the word " habitual," I put this proposition to the committee: A man will go into a household, and, in the presence of young children, commit one act of gross sexual immorality. Does that man deserve or does he not deserve punishment? Is this House going to hold its hand until he commits the offence half a dozen times?

Mr. BUREAU: No.

Mr. DOHERTY: With that suggestion I have really no sympathy at all. I do not see what exception could be taken to a man being punished for an action of that kind, even if he did it only once. In my judgment, it is a much graver offence than that of a man who steals even something of very great value. In the latter case we do not wait until the man has become a habitual thief before we punish him. I appreciate the suggestion that there should, perhaps, be some safeguard interposed in the way of requiring some responsible authority to be sponsor for the prosecution, although I think much that has been said about the danger of blackmailing would be equally applicable to a very large number of other offences that are provided for under the Criminal Code. It does not, at the first glance, seem to me to be quite clear why there is greater opportunity of blackmail presented because this particular conduct is made an offence than is presented by numerous other dispositions of the Criminal Code. Why, if somebody wants to exercise vengeance upon me he can charge me with having seduced my servant girl, for instance, and his vengeance will be just as effective, notwithstanding my innocence, as if he had prosecuted me under this section.

Mr. BUREAU: I hope he could not prove it.

Mr. DOHERTY: I trust the hon. gentleman looks upon that hope as an assured and certain hope.

Mr. BUREAU: Absolutely. What I was suggesting was that any other form of vice would give a man the opportunity to exercise vengeance if he wanted to use the Act for that purpose.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: The section aims at the forming of character in children, and if vice in any form is practised in a boarding house or anywhere else it would be detrimental to the formation of character. If the object in view is the protection of children, the section cannot be too wide.

Mr. VIEN: If the minister would accept my amendment, I think it would meet all the requirements. I would submit that no prosecution should be commenced without first obtaining leave of the Attorney-General. My amendment goes further and provides that the prosecution cannot be commenced after the expiration of sixty days from the time of the commission of the alleged offence. We do not want a prosecution for an offence that was committed years ago. My amendment follows the wording of the Lord's Day Act, which says:

> No action or prosecution for any violation of this Act shall be commenced without the leave of the Attorney-General for the province in which the offence is alleged to have been committed, nor after the expiration of sixty days from the time of the alleged offence.

Surely we can trust the Attorney-General of each province to apply the provisions of this Act justly.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am in accord with the principle of obtaining the leave of the Attorney-General of each province, with this one exception: I was draughting a provision that no prosecution under this section, unless initiated at the instance of a regularly organized Child Welfare Association, shall be instituted without the assent of the Attorney-General of the province. I would point this out: When you require the assent of the Attorney General, either you require a mere formality, or you make it necessary before any prosecution can be proceeded with for the Attorney General to sit down and got into the facts of each case and determine whether he thinks there ought to be a prosecution. Now, offences of this character are more numerous than I imagine all hon. gentlemen who are interested in this matter quite realize, and if they are to be handled with effective results they frequently require prompt action. If you have to wait until each case has been judged on its merits by the Attorney General you might hamper very much the operation of the Act. On the other hand, it may be wisdom not to leave it to any individual to institute a prosecution under this Act. I think we would have sufficient safeguards if we required the assent of the Attorney General save in cases where the prosecution is at the instance of a duly organized and established Child Welfare society, or an association having the like objects, and I would be willing to insert such a provision. With regard to the limitation of time, I would be quite prepared to set a limit, but I think sixty days is a very short period to fix. In order to constitute an offence proceeding from drunkenness, for instance, there has to be a conditions of habitual drunkenness, and it is very difficult to fix a particular date when a man's condition of drunkenness became habitual. I would be prepared to accept the amendment with the addition I have suggested, and to fix the limit at six months. That, I think, would surround the section with all necessary safeguards to prevent its being abused, and I understand that what all my hon. friends desire is that the law shall not lend itself easily to abuse.

Mr. MORPHY: Before the minister commits himself to the six months period, I would point out that many vicious practices which would be affected by this section will perforce be done in secret, and, if the word habitual is not inserted the practice may have continued for six months or have been committed at any time, have been kept secret, and then be discovered after the period for prosecution has elapsed. I think I am right in saying the Charlton Act contains a provision that no prosecution of a young man over twenty-one who has seduced a girl under twenty-one under promise of marriage can be commenced unless within six months from the time of the commission of the offence. I think this Act is more important in some respects that the Charlton Act, because it will be more general in its application, and I would ask the minister to consider carefully before he fixes the time at six months. I quite agree that sixty days would be entirely out of the question. I think a year would be more in the public interest.

Mr. VIEN: The character of the offence is so outrageous that, generally speaking, those who take cognizance of it will promptly bring a complaint in the police court. If twelve months are allowed to elapse it would hardly be possible to adduce such first-hand evidence that an indictment would be made out. I think we should not allow more than six months at the outside, and personally I think ninety days would be quite sufficient, considering the character of the offence.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I am placed at rather a disadvantage in not having heard what the minister proposes to do, but I have a good deal of sympathy with hon. gentlemen who have urged that this clause is too drastic in its present form. I know that a great many people are prepared to do a little wrong to accomplish a great right, but I have been always very cautious in advocating anything of that kind. I would rather see two bad men get off than punish one innocent man; I may be wrong, but that is my feeling. I approach this clause from the practical side, so far as I am able, and it does look to me that under this clause as it is some men and some families are going to be punished who should not be punished.

Let me draw the attention of the committee to what might occur in highly respectable families of comparatively slender means. In the northern part of Ontario, in the West and in the province of Quebec the new settler goes in and takes up a homestead. All that the man has in the world probably is a tent and some tools. There is probably a man, his wife and several children, and they must all live in a tent until he is able to erect, perhaps, a one-roomed shack. In that one-roomed shack or house he will have to live with his family during the first winter. It will be four or five years before that man can get a house sufficiently well built to accommodate his family as it should be accommodated. I was brought up on the scriptures just as much as the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Nicholson), and I want to see everything done decently and in order, but we must not be too hard upon the poor man, honest and with the best intentions, who is compelled for a time to live under such conditions as I have described, much against his will, much against the will of his wife, and much to the inconvenience of his family, but who, by reason of his slender means, is compelled to live in a house that does not accommodate his family as it should be accommodated. They will have to live in a tent or a house with one or two rooms together. Surely that man cannot be accused of vice when he has the best of intentions and lives as an honourable, upright and moral man. It does appear to me, unless you limit the term "vice" more than it is here, and unless the clause is modified in several important respects, there is danger of inflicting a wrong upon innocent people. I do not wish to be a party to that.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: The argument of the hon gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Cockshutt) is based upon the premise that because a poor man may be living in a tent or a shack with one room he would necessarily be guilty of sexual immorality, habitual drunkenness, or some other form of vice. I fail to be able to follow the logic of an argument that would convict a man of being guilty of immorality, habitual drunkenness or vice simply because he was compelled to live with his family in a house possibly of one room or even in a tent.

Mr. VIEN: The hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) probably did not follow the argument of the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt). If a family is living in a shack, or in a one-roomed building, some social reform association might interpret it as being a case in which a child would be in danger of becoming immoral, criminal or dissolute. You never know what construction a social reform association may put upon this clause. They might find it immoral for a child to live in a room where the whole family lived habitually. What the hon. member for Brantford had in view was the elimination from the clause of anything which might be interpreted by these social reform associations as being vice when it is not vice. There are some things which some people consider as vice which other people do not. Take, for instance, the enforcement of the provisions of the Lord's Day Act. There are some things which I consider to be allowable on Sunday and to which I do not object, whereas some other people might take exception to them. We do not all have the same ideas on different matters. Some social reform association might go much farther in its construction of the Act than that which would ordinarily be applied. If, we accept the suggestion that a prosecution shall be only undertaken on the fiat of the attorney general of the province, we then have a guarantee that proceedings will not be instituted on insufficient or foolish grounds. If we were to limit it, as suggested by the hon. Minister of Justice, to benevolent associations organized for the protection of children, these associations might construe some acts and conditions as being injurious to the welfare of children whereas other people would not so consider them. That is why I would favour the restriction that no prosecution should be commenced unless the attorney general, or, for the purpose of greater speed, one of his substitutes, issues his fiat authorizing the prosecution.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: The reasons for which any one might be prosecuted under this clause as specified—sexual immorality, habitual drunkenness or other forms of vice.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: What are the other forms?

Mr. BUREAU: What other forms of vice?

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: Pardon me for a moment. Is a man living with his family under conditions that have been described guilty of any one of these acts?

Mr. BUREAU: That is a question for the jury.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: It is a question for the law. I hold that the argument is specious that any one can be convicted of vice under the law simply because of the surroundings in which he is forced to live, provided he is a moral and clean man and lives in the best possible way he can.

Mr. BUREAU: Leaving that case aside, let us take the former case that I submitted. Being drunk is a form of vice which is not an uncommon one. A man, who might be the most respectable citizen in the place might get drunk once in his life, and be in that condition in the presence of children, and some fellow with a grudge to satisfy might see him and institute a prosecution under this clause.

Mr. DOHERTY: Drunkenness, to be considered as vice under this clause, must be habitual. It is other forms of vice that are spoken of, and it is only when drunkenness becomes habitual that it comes under the definition of vice.

Mr. BUREAU: Supposing a man played cards in the presence of children, smoked cigars and took a drink, that would be construed as vice.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think the hon. gentleman must have a peculiar conception of the capacity of the courts of this country to understand the ordinary terms of the English language. I think "vice" has a very intelligible meaning to intelligent people.

Mr. BUREAU: He might not be convicted but he might be arrested, and that is where the harm is done.

Mr. DOHERTY: We cannot undertake to make any amendment to the Criminal Law under which no innocent man will ever be prosecuted.

Mr. BUREAU: Certainly not.

Mr. DOHERTY: If we are going to have laws against crime we have to take the risk of some innocent man some day being prosecuted.

[Mr. G. B. Nicholson.]

Mr. BUREAU: Protect him as far as you can.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think we are protecting him as far as it is possible to do so, consistent with a reasonable enforcement of the law.

I beg to move that the section be amended by adding as subsection 4 the following provision:

No prosecution under this section shall be instituted unless it be at the instance of some organized Child Welfare Society, or Association with like object, without the authorization of the Attorney General of the province, nor shall any such prosecution be commenced after the expiration of six months from the time of the commission of the alleged offence.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 6—Theft of motor cars, punishment increased:

Mr. BUREAU: Will the minister explain the object of this provision? Is this a punishment for furious driving?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, it is for stealing automobiles—that is, the stealing of automobiles exclusively for the purpose of taking a joy ride—and all that the section proposes is to increase the possible penalty. At present the penalty for this offence is a fine of $50, or imprisonment for thirty days. By this section the fine is not to exceed $500, and the imprisonment is not to exceed twelve months. It has been pointed out that this offence has become exceedingly prevalent, that in very many instances the damage to the cars taken is far beyond the $50 fine, and that there is real necessity for adding to the deterrent effect of the law. I am in a position to give some testimony as to the prevalence of the offence, inasmuch as I have observed that recently we have had a large number of applications for ticket-of-leave, or other forms of leniency, in cases of people convicted under this section. There is no obligation upon the court to impose the higher penalty. This simply makes it possible for the court, in a case that calls for it, to do so.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Instruments proof of house being gaming house:

Mr. VIEN: I think that the words "any unlawful game" in the present law are quite sufficient to cover anything that would be objectionable. Has the minister any concrete case which suggested the amendment to him?

Mr. DOHERTY: The difficulty arose from the fact that a great many instruments are capable of being used in perfectly lawful, as well as in unlawful, games. The law imposes upon the prosecution in every instance, in order to get the benefit of its provision, the obligation of showing that the instrument is one peculiar to an unlawful game. It is to be noticed that the provision itself only makes the presence of these instruments prima facie evidence. It is perfectly open to any person who has them for lawful purposes to establish the fact; but the section with this requirement of establishing that the instruments are for an unlawful game practically nullifies itself. The purpose of the section is to facilitate the proof. As it stands now, in order that a thing should be prima facie evidence of the place being a gaming house it is required, in effect, to prove that the thing is of such a nature that it could not be used for anything else than an unlawful game, and, as I have stated, that practically nullifies the section. Nobody is exposed to any injury whatever, in the practical application of the section, by this being made purely and simply prima facie evidence. The enforcement of the law against the guilty will be facilitated, and the innocent will not be exposed to any serious consequences.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY.

RENEWAL FOR POSTPONEMENT OF INDEBTNESS OF THE COMPANY—EXPLANATIONS BY ACTING MINISTER OF FINANCE ON THE BILL.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Acting Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask leave of the House to revert to the Order for the second reading of the Bill founded upon the Resolution numbered one upon the Order Paper, in order that I may move the second reading of the Bill with the understanding that when I have finished my statement I shall move the adjournment of the debate. This will enable me to give to the House certain information requested regarding the Canadian Northern Railway system.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent Mr. Maclean moves that Bill No. 87, an Act supplementary to chapter twenty-four of the Statutes of 1917, respecting the Canadian Northern Railway system, be read the second time.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Upon the occasion of moving the resolution upon which this Bill is founded, certain information was requested of the Government by the right hon. leader of the Opposition. I now purpose giving that information and I hope that it will in every respect be complete.

As I have already stated, when I have given this information to the House I shall acquiesce in the adjournment of the debate.

The information which I am about to present will consist largely of figures and will I fear prove uninteresting, but at least it will be available in Hansard for those interested.

I was asked the other day to give the names of the directors of the Canadian Northern Railway. The Board of Directors and officers of the company are: Sir William Mackenzie, president; Sir Donald Mann, vice-president; D. B. Hanna, third vice-president; Z. A. Lash, R. J. Mackenzie, W. J. Christie, R. M. Horne-Payne, London, England; W. K. George, E. R. Wood, and Graham A. Bell. The last three mentioned are the representatives of the Government upon the Board of Directors. I have already given a list of the short term maturities for this year, but in order that it may be before the House in a complete and consecutive form, I shall read the list of securities of the railway maturing this year:

4 p.m.

15.	Jan. 10, 1919.	Wm. A. Read & Co., New York.....	1,250,000
			$55,437,274

I may say that all securities maturing to date this year have been renewed in full. In addition to the maturities above mentioned there are the following securities maturing in August and January next:

16.	Aug. 12, 1918, London, £2,000,000	$9,733,333
	$2,433,333.34 C.N.R. 4% Deb. Stock (Guart. Sask.)
	2,190,000.00 C.N.R. 4% Deb. Stock (Guart. Alta.)
	1,460,000.00 C.N.R. 4% Deb. Stock (Guart. Man.

	862,670.18 C.N.R. 4% Deb. Stock.

The total maturities for the year therefore amount to $67,360,607.

It may be of interest to the House to give an estimate of the requirements of the Canadian Northern Railway for this year. Hon. gentlemen will remember that the Estimates contain an item for $25,000,000, for the Canadian Northern Railway, and upon reference to the Estimates hon. gentlemen will see the purposes for which that vote is asked. That $25,000,000 vote is composed of the following amounts:

Canadian Northern Railway System, Estimate of Requirements for Year 1918.

(1.)	Balance required for Interest on Securities, Loans, etc., outstanding, including interest on Lines and works under construction	$5,389,922 89
(2.)	Payment of Principal of Equipment Bonds maturing during the year	2,995,000 00
(3.)	Estimated amount required to pay in reduction of existing Collateral Loans in connection with renewals	6,028,854 88
(4.)	Estimated amount required for Improvements, Additions and Betterments, as per detailed statement	3,400,922 02
(5.)	Construction, Completion of Western Branch Lines already graded, Terminals, etc., as per statement ..	7,185,300 21
		$25,000,000 00

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

Hon. gentlemen will, of course, understand that this is merely an estimate, and it will be seen that it is anticipated that there will be an estimated deficit of over five million dollars for the year 1918, after payment of operating expenses and fixed charges.

The amount of $3,400,922.02 for improvements, additions and betterments is allocated as follows: For the western lines, $2,148,589; for the eastern lines, $1,252.333.

The amount required for construction, namely, $7,185,300.21, will be expended in the completion of western branch lines well along in construction, it being very desirable that they be completed if possible.

Since the opening of the session I think no statement showing the financial result of the recent operations of the road has been presented to the House. The fiscal year of the Canadian Northern railway ends on June 30th, and the following is a statement of the income and operating expenses for the fiscal year ended June 30th, 1917:

Earnings	$41,244,689 58
Subsidiary Miscellaneous Earnings	2,250,386 98
		$43,495,076 56

I now present a statement showing the estimated cost of completing lines and terminals under construction. It would take a long time to read it, and if the House will allow me, I shall insert it in Hansard so that hon. members may be able to obtain the information in detail.

Mr. SPEAKER: Only in very exceptional circumstances may a document be placed on Hansard without having been read, but in view of the undoubted importance of these figures I assume that there will be no objection.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The statement is as follows:

Canadian Northern Railway System, Estimates of cost to complete Lines and Terminals under construction, September 30, 1917.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Can the hon. gentleman tell when these works will be completed?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: I cannot give the information at the moment, but when the second reading of the Bill is resumed later, I shall endeavour to have it for my hon. friend.

A statement was presented to Parliament last year showing the securities issued and outstanding by the Canadian Northern system, and it may be found in sessional paper No. 237. There has really been no change in the amount of securities issued since that date. I wish however to submit a fresh statement showing the total amount of securities outstanding, comprising securities guaranteed by the Dominion Government and by provincial governments, securities unguaranteed, and also the amount of issued securities held by the public, the amount pledged by the company, and also the amount of note issues. I, of course, cannot read the whole statement, but if the House so desires, I shall be very glad to have it placed on Hansard.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The statement is as follows:

(a). Canadian Northern Ry. 5% Income Charge Convertible Debenture Stock $25,000,000.00.
(b). Imperial Rolling Stock Equipment Trusts $14,846,500.00.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: A great many of the securities are pledged. With whom are they pledged, and for what?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They are pledged with the persons from whom loans were made by the company.

Mr. VIEN: With banks?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: With banks and brokerage houses.

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

Mr. LEMIEUX: It seems that my hon. friend has missed some provinces. Will he name the provinces that have guaranteed securities?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Nothing guaranteed by Nova Scotia?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No. The Halifax and Southwestern railway was financed in a different way. No securities of the Canadian Northern railway were guaranteed by the Government of Nova Scotia.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What about lines that were afterwards assumed by the Canadian Northern Railway system?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Halifax and Southwestern railway forms a part of the Canadian Northern Railway system, but no securities were guaranteed by the Government of Nova Scotia. The Government of Nova Scotia incurred a direct liability in connection with the construction of this road.

Mr. ROSS: Will the minister give the grand total of the liabilities and the notes?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The total issue is $359,931,494.40.

Mr. ROSS: And the notes are in addition?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. ROSS: What is the grand total?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: $393,604,827.73. The total amount held by the public is $253,922,087.28. That is the total issue less the amount pledged as collateral but unsold. I am informed that inclusive of the equipment and temporary loans, the total would amount to about $400,000,000.

Mr. CAHILL: Is the $98,000,000 which the minister mentions included in the $359,931,494.40 with the notes?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, it would be included in the total amount of $400,000,000.

Mr. CAHILL: According to the statement there is a total issue of securities in round figures $359,000,000 and $33,000,000 of notes, and there is another item of $98,000,000. Is the $98,000,000 included in any way in the total of $359,000,000? There are three items, one of guarantees by the Dominion Government of, in round figures, $104,000,000, one of guarantees by the provinces of $107,000,000, and a third of unguaranteed securities of $147,000,000, making in all a total of $359,000,000 up to June, 1916.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The floating liabilities are not included.

Mr. CAHILL: The $98,000,000 is in floating liabilities?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not know just what my hon. friend refers to.

Mr. CAHILL: Then there would be a total indebtedness of about $500,000,000 including the floating liabilities?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No. I shall give to the house the floating liabilities in a moment. I have in my hand a condensed general balance sheet as of June 30, 1917. The report which the leader of the Opposition now has in his hand contains a general balance sheet, but as of an earlier date. This condensed general balance sheet is as follows:

Certified correct,

(Sgd.) H. O. FOREMAN,

Chief Accountant.

I might give a few details of the floating liabilities. It will not be necessary for me to state them all, as they would not be very informing. There is of accounts payable and audited, $5,660,000; bills payable, $489,-367; due on account of terminal properties, $1,175,000. There are other miscellaneous liabilities of various amounts totalling $10,-130,000. The floating liabilities aggregate $17,278,583, as appears in the balance sheet.

Mr. MURPHY: Are all those figures as of September 30 last?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The balance sheet was brought down to September 30 last. The maturities are inclusive of everything down to the present date.

Upon my instructions, Mr. Hanna, Third Vice-President of the Canadian Northern Railway, was requested to prepare a statement giving information not contained in the statements I have already presented to the House, and showing particularly the gross earnings and operating expenses of the railway system since last June. I think I cannot do better than read his letter, which is addressed to Mr. Graham Bell, of the Railway Department:

May 9th, 1918.

Major G. A. Bell, C.M.G.,
Department of Railways and Canals,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—

Complying with request contained in your telegram and as referred to in my reply, I enclose herewith statement of gross earnings, expenses and net earnings for the nine months ended March 31st, 1918, compared with those of the corresponding period of the previous fiscal year, the figures being as follows:—

	Ended March 31st 1918.	Ended March 31st 1917.
Total Gross Earnings..	$30,699,391 20	$30,095,886 66
Operating Expenses .	28,209,439 57	22,591,432 08
Net Earnings .	2,489,951 63	7,504,454 58

It will be seen that gross earnings increased by $603,504.54 over the same period of 1917, so that if normal conditions had continued, the net earnings for the nine months ended 31st March, 1918, would have been approximately $7,675,000. Unfortunately, however, conditions did not remain normal, winter weather of unprecedented severity was experienced, and, due also to increased fuel cost, higher wages in every department, coupled with increased prices for all materials and supplies used in operation of the Railway, the operating expenses were increased by $5,618,007.49 resulting in a decrease in net earnings of $5,014,502.95—a decrease of 66.82%.

The increased cost of fuel for locomotives for the two nine month periods is shown by the following figures:—

	1918.	1917.
Fuel for Train Locomotives .	$5,241,560 23	$3,197,131 04
Fuel for Yard Locomotives. .	667,919 59	340,324 47
Total. . . .	$5,909,479 82	$3,537,455 51
Increase of 1918 over 1917.. ..		$2,372,024 31

This is the increased cost of fuel as shown merely by the difference in the totals charged to the above two accounts and does not show up the loss in efficiency due to poorer grade of coal available, and takes no account of increased cost of coal used for operating snow plough trains, heating buildings, etc.

Increased cost of labour accounts for increases in principal Maintenance of Way and Structures accounts to the extent of $470,715.70, and accounts which combine Material and Labour have increased by approximately the same amount.

Maintenance of Equipment accounts, including labour and material, show heavy increases. The principal accounts compared show the following increases for the nine months:—

	1918.	1917.	Increase.
Repairs to Locomotives..	$1,936,542 15	$1,508,608 00	$427,934 15
Repairs to Freight Cars..	1,790,521 53	1,302,183 10	488,338 43
Repairs to Passenger Cars..	641,695 56	545,151 30	96,544 26
Repairs to Work Equipment..	187,737 04	124,638 02	63,099 02
Mtce. of Shop Machinery..	152,511 53	105,768 50	46,743 03
Increase of 1918 over 1917..	.....	.....	$1,122,658 89

In addition to fuel cost, other items of transportation expenses have increased as follows:—

Item.	1918.	1917.	Increase.
Dispatching trains..	$ 172,079 83	$ 138,914 11	$ 33,165 72
Station employees..	1,695,413 36	1,410,959 62	284,453 74
Yard employees (a/cs 377-380)..	823,020 83	687,053 89	135,966 94
Enginemen..	1,653,626 89	1,421,638 33	231,988 56
Enginemen..	1,539,907 47	1,479,828 04	60,079 43
Total of these increases..	.....	.....	$745,654 39

* NOTE.—As regards the items shown above for trainmen, it must be explained that there will be increases to these men which will date back to January, dependent upon the increases granted by the Director General of United States Railways.

The above are items of labour alone, and there are besides increases in other transportation accounts which combine labour and material amounting to an additional $939,861.98 of which the principal are:—

	1918.	1917.	Increase.
Station suplpies	$178,183 92	$131,821 07	$ 46,362 85
Water Stations	292,257 63	242,085 59	50,172 04
Engine House Exp.	815,739 87	545,407 41	270,332 46
Train supplies and expenses	661,045 73	545,928 04	115,117 69
			$481,985 04

These increases in operating expenses summarised in round figures are as follows:—

Fuel	$2,370,000
Maintenance of Way Expenses	940,000
Maintenance of Equipment	1,222,000
Transportation expenses	1,228,000
Total	$5,760,000

The increase in the cost of coal during the last four years is shown by the following figures:—

Year.	Tons of Coal used by Locomotives.	Total charge to Fuel Accounts for train and yard locomotives.	Average cost per ton.
1915	795,054	$2,659,712 89	$3.34
1916	1,097,574	3,926,697 04	3.57
1917	1,282,341	4,828,425 70	3.76
Estimated for year 1918	1,448,000	8,256,010 00	5.70

Not only are we paying an excessively high price for our fuel, but due to restrictions in supply from the United States, this Company has had to take freight cars out of revenue service and use them in the haulage of locomotive coal for very long distances, and this condition absolutely beyond our control, reduces our revenue as well as increases our operating expenses.

The enclosed statement showing increases in cost of some of the principal items of railway materials and supplies covers the period during which these prices advanced most alarmingly as reflected by our operating statements.

While high percentage increases in wages have taken place in the last eighteen months, yet some substantial increases were also granted in 1915 and 1916.

The following comparison of increases shows the increases on a percentage basis obtained since 1914 by the main groups of employees. In this computation changes in the working rules, involving overtime, etc., are not considered, which make the actual increases considerably above those shown, which apply to rates alone:

Fiscal Years.	1914 Taken as standard	1915 % of Std.	1916 % of Std.	1917 and to Dec. 1917 % of Std.
Trainmen	100	100	119.25	120.57
Enginemen	100	117.41	118.93	130.81
Telegraphers	100	100.11	119.49	131.63
Mechanical	100	100.59	108.13	127.00
Maintenance of Way	100	100.00	105.12	123.81

The percentage for Trainmen in last column does not include increases to be given dependant on increases granted by Director General to Trainmen on U.S. Railways from January 1st, 1918, and adoption of eight hour day. Maintenance of Way employees on Western Lines obtained increases of from 45 cents to 35 cents per man per day effective 1st January last, which in respect to the Western men would increase the above ratio to 141.14. The Shopmen on all lines have asked for a very large increase, and at the present time a board is sitting to consider the demands of the federated trades, and even if a portion of the request is granted, the increase will be serious. The Telegraphers and Maintenance of Way employees on Eastern Lines are now asking for substantial increases which, if granted in whole or in part, will considerably augment the above percentage for the present year.

As the Freight and Passenger rate increases went into effect on March 15th—except the increase in grain rates which is not effective until 1st June next—practically no benefit is reflected in the gross earnings for the nine months.

Gross earnings, however, for April show an increase of $642,600 reflecting, to some extent, the benefits which may be expected from the rate increases. The comparative figures are as follows:

April 1918	$3,958,100
April 1917	3,315,500
Increase	642,600

It is impossible to say how far the increase in gross earnings will go towards meeting the increased cost of operating, as the conditions affecting the expenses are altogether unusual. The best that can be said is that the same close scrutiny which has obtained in the past by the Management in respect of costs will continue in the future.

If further information is desired, we shall be glad to supply it.

Yours truly,

D. B. HANNA,

Third Vice-President.

Attached to this letter is a comparative statement of the earnings and expenses for nine months, but that already appears in the letter as read and I need not again state it to the House. I thought it well to read that letter because it particularly brings up to March 31, last the figures in respect to the earnings and operating expenses of the road, besides affording other valuable information. That is all I have to submit to the House and I trust I have given all the information desired. I shall be glad to supply any further information required on the debate on the second reading of the Bill.

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Has the minister any evidence, or guarantee, that all the floating liabilities have been got possession of by the department? If any such are not yet in, and should turn up later, what course does the minister purpose to pursue in regard to them?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Government are satisfied that they have a complete statement of all the floating liabilities of the company.

Mr. CAHILL: Would the minister, tomorrow, be able to give us a statement of what the assets controlled by the subsidiary companies consist of?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would the hon. gentleman send me a note covering the information he desires?

Mr. J. READ: Who are the owners, other than Mackenzie and Mann, of the one-sixth of the stock that has not been acquired by the Government?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: As I stated the other day, the Government now hold $97,500,000 of the $100,000,000 of the common share issue of the company. The balance is held largely in England. I was hoping to have some more definite information as to the holders of those shares but it has not yet reached me. I will give it to the House when it is received.

Mr. J. READ: You did not acquire it all from Mackenzie and Mann. Who is the other nigger in the wood pile?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I did not catch the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. J. READ: Apart from the $97,500,000 which you acquire from Mackenzie and Mann, who were the other parties from whom you acquired stock?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Government were in possession of some $40,000,000 of the total issue two or three years ago. The difference between the $40,000,000 and the $97,500,000 was transferred to the Government by Mackenzie, Mann and Company, Limited.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I see that much of this information which is given by Mr. Hanna, and which has been communicated to us this afternoon by my hon. friend (Mr. A. K. Maclean) is being contested at the investigation which is taking place in Toronto before the commission of which Sir William Meredith, Chief Justice of Ontario, is the chairman. Would it not be well to have the evidence which has been taken before that commission before we deal with this matter.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: None of the information which I gave to the House can be contested before the commission. The general balance sheet might be open to dispute, but I cannot possibly think of anything else that might be open to question.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I noticed the other day that the Premier of British Columbia, the hon. Mr. Oliver, contested very materially the figures which were given by the Canadian Northern Railway representative before that commission.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is true. I observed in the press myself that the Premier of British Columbia makes a claim against the Canadian Northern Railway, but I know nothing more about it than does my hon. friend. Of course, the claim is not admitted, by the railway.

Mr. MURPHY: Might I suggest to my hon. friend that in view of the importance of this matter, and as the Premier of British Columbia is at present in Ottawa, my hon. friend might familiarize himself with the details of that claim so as to acquaint the House with the facts before we discuss the Bill.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I will do my best. I beg to move that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

BILL TO AMEND THE CIVIL SERVICE ACT AND TO BRING THE OUTSIDE SERVICE UNDER ITS PROVISIONS.

On motion of Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Acting Minister of Finance), Bill No. 53, respecting Civil Service of Canada was read a second time and the House went into committee on the Bill, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The progress made with this Bill has been much more expeditious than I anticipated. Probably there are some hon. gentlemen who wish to offer some general observations in regard to it, and I would not like to see them debarred from giving their views to the House. I would, therefore, suggest that after the several clauses have been considered, an opportunity should be afforded members to discuss the Bill generally upon the motion to adopt the preamble.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The discussion had better take place now, otherwise there cannot be a general discussion on the principle of the Bill.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I shall be quite satisfied.

The CHAIRMAN: Under the rules of the House, hon. members should have taken advantage of the second reading to discuss the principle of the Bill. It is only with the unanimous consent of the Committee that this general discussion may take place now. When it has been completed, I hope the Chairman will have the assistance of hon. members in securing the observance of section 5 of rule 13.

Mr. MOWAT: I would like to say how gratifying it is to many members of the House that the Government has seen fit to bring in a Bill of this nature. The measure is bound to be unpopular in certain quarters because of its radical provisions, but for that reason the Government is entitled to all the greater credit for having brought it forward. Did we not have a Union Government in Canada at the present time I doubt very much whether we should have seen such a Bill introduced, in view of the manner in which the Civil Service has been administered for so many years. The fact that it has done so is to me a proof that it does not fear unpopularity. For that reason I am glad to be a supporter, for the time being, of a Union Government. Legislation of this kind is bound to make the Government unpopular in certain directions. I am glad, for one, even if unpopularity should result, because it will demonstrate to the people that even at the risk of unpopularity the Government will enact such measures at it believes to be in the interest of the country as a whole.

We are only beginning here a policy which was inaugurated in older countries many years ago and hon. gentlemen will perhaps pardon me if I give a short resume of what has transpired in Great Britain with respect to this important question. As far back as 1823, nearly a hundred years ago, the evils of patronage were first drawn attention to in the British House of Commons. At that time Lord John Russell made use of these remarks:

> Offices in the Post Office and Customs are made part of the patronage of members voting with the Government. When an office is vacant the Minister seeing his advantage, writes to the member for the county and asks his recommendation.

In 1829, the Duke of Wellington said:

> The whole system of the patronage is, in my opinion, erroneous.

Coming down to 1849, we find that competent old statesman, Sir Charles Trevelyan, taking special charge of the question of Civil Service and of patronage. He said in a report of that year:

> The dregs of all other professions, and young men who have no chance in open competition are attracted towards the Civil Service, as to a secure asylum.

Readers of Charles Dickens, who are familiar with the novel "Little Dorrit," will recall how he described the efforts made by Arthur Clennam to interest himself, and how Little Dorrit was uneasy, and her great fear was that he was entering upon a dangerous proceeding. That exhibits the Civil Service as it was then. You will remember how Clennam went to the Circumlocution Office and first saw the son of Mr. Tite Barnacle, and how young Barnacle treated him when he began the sentence, "I want to know"— Young Barnacle said: "My dear fellow, you must not come round here saying 'I want to know,' you know, because that's very irregular." And so on, and how Clennam was passed down to Wobbler and then to Tite Barnacle at his house, and on to Clive, then how the old man in the other office advised him very tenderly not to proceed with the inquiry he was making because it would take a lifetime to get an answer. The writings of Charles Dickens exercised great influence in the change in the Civil Service in England. Then, in 1855, there was a joint report by Sir Stafford Northcote and Sir Charles Trevelyan, which provided for a personal examination to qualify only, and this is the same law as we have at the present time with regard to what is called the Outside Service. In the second place, it precluded a commission for interfering with the appointment of those who had the duty of nomination or appointment, and finally provided for the appointment of mature persons without examination. This consequently did not take the whole of the patronage away from political control.

Then Mr. Layard, afterwards Sir Henry Layard, moved a resolution with respect to merit and efficiency having been sacrificed in public appointments to party and family influences and to a blind adherence to routine which threatened to bring discredit upon the national character.

In 1860 a select committee recommended that a moderate and modified competition be held for these appointments. In 1870, which is a record year in the history of the Civil Service, Mr. Lowe, who afterwards became Lord Sherbrooke, approved an Order in Council making competitive tests obligatory in certain departments of the Civil Service, and he said—and with this I think many in this House will agree at the present time:

> Men who up to twenty-two years have been in no business or profession are superior to men who at eighteen have devoted themselves to the special duties of their calling.

In other words he believed that the best kind of civil servant was a man trained not only in business but in general literature and education, and who was not appointed until a more mature age. Such a man is more valuable to the state than one who entered the service and learned the routine of business at a very young age. In 1874, under Mr. Gladstone, as a result of the work of the Playfair Commission, the Civil Service was divided into four classes. First, administrative officers, appointed by promotion on account of their ability. Second, those in the higher branches of the Civil Service who obtained their offices by competitive examination. The third class were those for the lower branches appointed after a simpler competitive examination. The fourth class were the men on day wages who were appointed upon a qualifying examination only. In 1876, followed an Order in Council providing for a higher scale of pay. Then, in 1890, Sir Matthew White Ridley's Commission mentioned that men of more liberal culture were required, and that certain special appointments required men of professional and technical knowledge. In 1910, an Order in Council was passed, amending and consolidating former Orders, and which may be looked upon as the code of Civil Service regulation in the British Empire.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That was in 1910?

Mr. MOWAT: Yes. In 1914, a very important report was made by leading members of all classes, including our present Governor General, the Duke of Devonshire, who devoted a good deal of thought and consideration to the report, and who, at times, dissented in minority reports from the majority of the committee. Some other members were Lord Macdonell, a very competent and distinguished civil servant; Mr. Philip Snowdon, representing the Labour party or the socialist branch of it; and Mrs. Streatfield, representing the women of the country, who have more and more shown their ability to become efficient public servants. Their report is most comprehensive in dealing with the whole question both in theory and in practice, and reference to it may be of great value to those who are considering this question.

I propose to quote some extracts to the House for the purpose of emphasizing the importance of making the Civil Service of Canada not a mere trade or employment, but a profession. There is no reason why men should not go into the Civil Service profession as they go into medicine, law or engineering, because the Civil Service of Canada includes men who must be scientific in many branches, in matters of marine, of fisheries, of militia, of justice, copyright patents, and so. We cannot expect to obtain the best type of men unless we dignify the service and put it on a higher plane, taking it away from the influence of party politics, and giving opportunity for promotion and for increase in emolument, so that a civil servant can bring up his family in decency and give his children a good education. He cannot expect to do that unless we have a Bill which contains the principle of the Bill now before the House. It is a dreadful thing to me to think of a man, perhaps a graduate of a university, spending many years perfecting himself in the details of his department, studying the general literature which pertains to that department, giving his whole life to the service of his country in the Civil Service, having some one appointed over him because that person has had more practical experience in the political field and must receive a party reward. While men of that kind may be quite as good public servants as others—and it has proven so in our present public service—yet, taking the general run of things, the man who has devoted himself to the affairs of practical politics, and has acquired an influence which has enabled him to be shoved into the Civil Service, is not likely to be as valuable to the country as the man who has given his life to the profession. Therefore, it is gratifying to many members of the House on both sides, I am sure, that the Government have seen fit at last, after years of experiment in the Old Country and the United States, to bring in a measure of this range and character.

Mr. Dorman B. Eaton, who was Chairman, I think, of a House of Representatives Civil Service Commission in the United States in 1880, made these remarks upon the state of affairs which had come into existence with regard to their Civil Service. After the war an innumerable number of men besieged the departments at Washington to exercise their influence to secure appointments both for themselves and their friends, and the Civil Service got into a sorry plight; and American statesmen saw that they could not go on like that, that the public offices were overmanned, filled with incompetents and with men who did not give their whole time to the performance of their duties, and who could evade their strict duty because of the political influence they could bring to bear upon the heads of the departments. Mr. Dorman B. Eaton said this:

> Patronage creates a mercenary political class, an oligarchy of stipendiaries, a bureaucracy of the worst kind, which controls parties with relentless despotism, imposing upon them at the election issues which are prescribed not by the actual feeling and interest of the country, but solely by the necessities and profit of the oligarcy, while to secure this advantage, party spirit, the constant and mortal enemy of republics, is inflamed to the utmost. . . . . This system disgusts with politics and repels from them good citizens who cannot compete with the professional political class which gives all its time to a pursuit by which it profits.

While I do not say by any means that our Civil Service has got into any such direful condition as is depicted in that description, yet that is that tendency provided we go on with our present system. It is quite true that many of the best citizens of our country have not a high opinion of our political institutions and have a distrust of the doings of politicians, in the House of Commons or the Senate, or in the Civil Service. The reason probably is that he is unable to exercise any influence upon it; his relatives or his sons should, in his opinion, because of their possessing abilities superior to those of many public servants, have a chance to enter the Civil Service, but because they are not party politicians they cannot get a place.

The Civil Service would benefit by a system of competitive examination in the Outside Service. Since 1908 a system of competitive examination has been followed in the Inside Service, but in the Outside Service the examination has been merely a qualifying one and is quite insufficient. The Outside Service should have the same standing as the Inside Service. The practical result of a system of competitive examination in the Outside as well as the Inside Service would be the establishing of a public service consisting of a better class of employees than those who have hitherto been appointed. It may be said that a man who, because of his peculiar facility for answering examination questions and his knowledge of school and college work, may get a good place in a Civil Service examination, and yet may not be sufficiently practical or have the qualifications required of an efficient employee in the public service. That may be true in a few cases, but what we are trying to get at is a general principle under which we may arrive at the best results. The Civil Service Commission in England, which is composed of some of the best statesmen of that country, was correct when it reported that, on the whole, men who as a result of their school and college work succeeded in the Civil Service examinations made the most competent civil servants. So that if we get nothing else from this Bill than a system of examination for the Outside Service, we shall bring about good results. Some men who have been politicians and who are now in the Service have done well; we all know who and how competent they are; I need not mention names. But men in the Service with ambition to go ahead; men who desire to increase their efficiency and their standing, are dulled and frozen in the attempt; they become mere drones, doing their work day by day without hope of promotion or of increase in their salaries or standing; without hope of satisfying their reasonable ambition to become successful men as have their compeers and companions in the ranks of the private professions.

The working out of this Bill will produce complications at first; will give rise to troubles and irritations because of its newness. The same thing happened in England; the men of one department were known to resign in a body because they considered themselves unfairly treated. The member of Parliament became disgusted because his influence waned and he felt receding from him the committees which had steadfastly supported him in his constituency because they knew that Civil Service appointments would be given them or their relatives and friends. But the member acquired a new political backing; he acquired committees of a new kind and has been able to get very efficient political services from them—but not from those who expect to be Civil Servants. While the change, therefore, may cause temporary inconvenience and give rise to temporary irritations and opposition on the part of politicians, in a very few years it will so work out that the Service will be benefitted and political patronage will be forever eliminated.

A good feature of the Bill is that the status of those who are at present Civil Servants shall not be interfered with. This takes away a good deal of opposition to the Bill. The Civil Servants of Ottawa, of whom there are now thousands, welcome this Bill with enthusiasm—not the mere class enthusiasm which might be called selfish, but the enthusiasm of men who have thought on these subjects for years, and who have groaned under the inequalities and injustices of the Service. Undoubtedly these injustices have not been deliberate; they have arisen of necessity through various circumstances connected with our present system.

Under this Bill all appointments are relegated to a commission. We do not expect the commission at once to produce the condition of affairs in the public service which prevails in older countries, but we anticipate that by fair attention to their duties, by an intelligent grasp of the needs of the Service and by loyal support of the principles embodied in this Bill, they will eventually enable us to be freed from the injustices and inefficiency which have prevailed in many branches of the Service since Confederation.

Unquestionably a Civil Service Commission sitting in Ottawa cannot be expected to know the personal characteristics of their appointees; in that respect they will have to depend upon reports of post office inspectors, collectors of customs and other leading officials in the Service throughout the country.

I hope that the circumstances will not result in the impression being created that once a man passes an examination he is given a life job. Nothing could be more hurtful to the interests of the Service. If there is one thing that is a nuisance in this country it is the curt, impolite, grudging public servant. He does exist in places; we all know him and we have all been troubled by him. If a public servant of this kind is the result of the system of political appointments, then we can none too soon get rid of the system. The public servant should understand that it is his duty to be courteous and obliging, and if this Bill fails to reach that phase of the subject the principle of efficiency in the public service cannot be fully carried out. We must have men not only who understand the duties of their office, but who have common sense, who will take the trouble to satisfy the public with whom they deal. This result is much more apt to be obtained under a commission, which, on complaint being made regarding the manners or inattention of a public servant, have power at once to " sit upon him " and thus to make it generally known that the administration of the Civil Service is in charge of a businesslike commission which will see to it that public servants attend to their duties as they should.

On the whole, I congratulate the Government and, in particular, the Acting Minister of Finance who introduced this Bill, on their courage in attacking a grievance, belated as this action may be. We are, of course, not yet a great country, and we naturally must be somewhat imitative of others. We all regret that. I regret that we have not, to any great extent, customs and fashions of our own. We depend largely upon what goes on in other countries. The great country to the south of us is richer than we are, and it has a very active life; it has its own fashions and customs, and we are naturally inclined to copy them rather than to have our own. I sometimes wish we copied the customs of some older countries rather than those of newer countries, because we often imitate what is bad in the newer country to the South of us instead of what is good in it. Be that as it may, we cannot help being imitative, and we have now reached a stage when we are getting into this frame of mind, that we must have a modern Civil Service Bill of our own. We are ceasing to take things haphazard. By this concrete code of regulations, because that is what the Civil Service Bill amounts to; I believe we shall do good to our country and to the Civil Service; we shall elevate the Civil Service to a position it has never had before; we shall give new heart to those who have laboured for years in the service, and ten years from now, when this legislation works out as I hope it will, under the Civil Service Commission, we shall wonder why we ever permitted so long things to go on in their present shape.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I desire heartily to concur in the remarks that have been made with regard to the wisdom of the measure brought down by the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean), and at the same time to agree very largely with what my hon. friend from Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) has just said. I am pleased that the minister has allowed a little general discussion. I desire, in the first place, to approve entirely the principle of the Bill, and I think it would have been well if, in Canada, we could have had this legislation at an earlier date than this. The salaries paid in nearly all of the departments of the Government are less than they should be. Particularly is that the case in the Outside Service with which I am more familiar than I am with the salaries paid to civil servants in the city of Ottawa. But I believe, to a less or greater extent, it prevails in all branches of the service that, during war time, the men who have had to live on fixed salaries, have had very much the worst of it. The very high cost of living has not enabled those men to live in the comfort in which they lived in pre-war days. The advances that have been made in the various branches of the Civil Service are not such as; in my judgment, should have been made, nor have they been made as readily as they should. I speak with a good deal of feeling in regard to this phase of the question. What I say is particularly true of the Post Office Department. I think within the last two years at least ten representations have been sent in to the Post Office Department as to the under-payment of letter carriers and clerks in our cities and towns. The salaries of those men are not at all commensurate with the very important work they have to do. They are entrusted with handling registered letters, money orders, postal notes and thousands of dollars' worth of other valuable property in the way of parcels, and yet their scale of pay is not as high as an ordinary labouring man could get at the present time. Further, during this war time, men have been employed in the post office in my own district, the city of Brantford, for three and a half years, and the are still called temporaries. When the law was made in regard to temporary employees, a man was not allowed to be employed temporarily in the post office for more than six months at any one time or in any one year. That was, in my opinion a very strange law in itself; yet there are men who, during the war, have beeen acting as temporary clerks or letter carriers, that are still on the non-permanent staff and that are paid on the basis of temporary employees, and, in some cases, uniforms are not supplied as they are to the permanent letter carriers. That sort of thing should have ceased long ago, and I have put in very strong representations to all the Acting Pastmaster Generals that we have had in such plenty during the last two or three years. I regret we have not a Postmaster General to whom we can go and talk, and whom we can get to rectify these matters, but we have been in that position for a long time. I have, within the last six months, had five or six deputations on this matter alone, and I have told those deputations I shall do all I possibly can. I, therefore, take this first opportunity of impressing upon the Acting Minister of Finance, who, for the moment, controls the purse-strings of the public treasury, that he limber up a little on them, and that all of our permanent staff, whether they be in the city of Ottawa or in any of the outlying cities of Canada, or in the country districts, down to the man who carries the rural mail and the man who receives $30 a year for furnishing a place for a post office and for lighting and heating it, should receive better consideration. The whole Service is run on far too parsimonious a scale for the public to get the service we should receive. I am strongly in favour of having an all round advance for efficient service, and wherever service is not efficient, I would get rid of it. That is the way I do in business. I believe with my hon. friend (Mr. Mowat) that a man in a public office should be just as civil as if he had half a dozen others to compete with. Some public servants, by their attitude, seem to say: You can come or go; you can take this or that, and that is all you are going to get; you will have to do as I choose, or you will not do business with me. That should not be. A civil servant is given a position to serve the public courteously, and courtesy should be insisted on in every branch of the Civil Service. Most of our civil servants treat the public in a courteous manner, but there are some who do not. I should like to see this question of pay and this question of courteous treatment to the public receive attention, and I believe that the system of promotion for fitness, for efficiency, should, as far as possible, be carried out. A man who has been doing good service should be given promotion. I have endeavoured to make myself clear in regard to the matter of recompense. I have not read the Bill very carefully all through, but I do not think the salaries to be paid are specified.

As a member of Parliament I am glad to be relieved of the responsibility of the Civil Service as embraced in my own riding. But there are some few points which, as a practical politician, I wish to fully understand. I am trying to be practical. In the first place the members of the Civil Service Commission are located in Ottawa. I have the pleasure of knowing several of them, and I believe they are very capable men. The Civil Service of Canada is paid by the people of all Canada, and not by the people of Ottawa, and I think every electoral district throughout the Dominion is entitled to a fair quota of men from that particular district. I lay that down as a principle. I think the members of this House and the people of this country will have every reason to be dissatisfied if the appointment of the Civil Service Commission is going to mean that the members of the Civil Service in all the towns and cities from east to west and north to south are going to be sent from the city of Ottawa. I do not know whether that is the intention or not, but I want the minister to guard against that. I lay down as a principle that every riding is entitled to a certain number of its own people to administer its own business, subject to the rules and regulations laid down by the Civil Service Commission. That may be considered rather a narrow view, but I think it is a practical opinion. I think in all our communities we have men who are fit to discharge the various duties in all walks of life ,and I think the people of Ottawa, as fair-minded people, should not want to add to the eight or ten or fifteen thousand people they now have in Ottawa, and they are mostly Ottawa people, the appointments in every city and town and in every country district throughout the Dominion. I think every electoral district is entitled to have a certain representation in the public service of Canada, and I hope I have the backing of my fellow-members in making what I believe to be a very fair contention with regard to the Outside Service, as it is called.

I understand from a question that was asked in the House the other day by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) and answered by the Prime Minister, that members may or may not be consulted. Though I was in the House at the time, I must say that the answer did not appear to me to carry very strong conviction either one way or the other as to whether the member for a constituency was a proper man to be consulted as to who was fit to serve in any given position. If a member is not a fit man to be consulted in that matter, I think it is a reflection on his judgment and on his standing in his own community. If he is not a fit person I do not know who the fit man in that constituency would be to be consulted. I personally do not want to be charged with the making of appointments. It has got me into more trouble than it has ever done me good, because for every position to fill there are ten or twenty applications, but I say that if the members of this commission want the best testimony that can be got in the average constituency, they cannot go to a better man than the member elected for that constituency. I do not want to be considered as blowing my own trumpet; not at all. But the very fact that a member has the confidence of the majority of his constituents is a reason why he is entitled to be consulted. I do not say that his selection should be final by any means. I think the great trouble in the past has been that members in order to pay some political debt, or for some other reason of a more or less sordid character, have not used their best judgment in making nominations, owing to pressure perhaps or some other reason. But if the member will use his best judgment he can make a recommendation that will reflect credit on the position to be filled and credit on his judgment in the selection. But if this commission are not going to consult the member for a constituency, he should certainly be relieved from all responsibility for the administration of those offices. As it is now, if there is anything wrong in the post office, customs, inland revenue, or any other department, who hears about it first? The man who has a complaint to make runs direct to the member and says: "You are supporting the Government that is giving us this administration." The trouble comes home to roost with the member at once. The principle should be this: If members are not consulted, or, being consulted, their advice is not followed, the Civil Service Commission or the Government, who stand back of them, should relieve the member of the responsibility for seeing any particular office administered as it should be. I believe first, that members are fit and proper persons to be consulted, and that having been consulted, their advice should be followed, unless for some good reason. If a member is not consulted, he should be relieved from responsibility for any action taken by the commission or whoever may make the appointment.

A man who gets a position in the public service is required to pass an examination. It may be a fairly stiff one, and that is where the outlying districts are at a disadvantage again. Here in Ottawa a large number of young men and women will be passing examinations all the time, but in the country districts the people do not hear about the vacancy until the time in which to apply has expired. There is another point. A young man or a young woman may qualify for a position in the public service by passing an examination with high honours, and then find themselves without a job. How long are they to be kept waiting? That is a question for consideration. There should be a reasonable time beyond which the young men or young women who have qualified themselves for the public service should not be kept waiting. At present they may be kept waiting months or years, and eventually get tired of waiting and take something else. I do not find in the Bill any guarantee that if a young man or woman qualifies he will necessarily get a job. It appears to me there should be in every community a certain number qualifying for the positions likely to become vacant in that district, and when they have qualified themselves their cases should receive first consideration when the vacancy occurs. No outsider should be sent in until all avenues have been tried for finding a man in the riding; that is the proposition I lay down, and I think it is a perfectly proper one.

The personnel of the commission is, I think, a good one. I have the honour of knowing the chairman. He was for many years a member of this House and a minister of the Crown. He is a fair-minded, reasonable man, and I think he will endeavour to give a good account of himself. I also know another member of the commission, and I think we are safe in their hands, so far as we can be safe under certain rules. But it must be remembered they are going to be guided by these rules, and while we all wish to have proper rules set up, they should be elastic enough to enable the commissioners to take a broad view of the matter, to recognize that it is not the money of the people of Ottawa that is being expended but the money of the people of all Canada. We are all interested in having our public servants fairly paid, and in trying to avoid a feeling of discontent and disquiet because their reasonable wants have not been met, and I do not think they have been met in the past. I think we would do well if we got the Civil Service on a basis similar to the Civil Service in England; that we should advance our public servants gradually step by step as their length of service and ability warrants, and then they would have something to look forward to. At the present time there are men who have been thirty and forty years in the service at the same old job, and have had practically no advance to speak of during that thirty or forty years, and now in their declining years they have very little to retire on. Some get a small pension and others nothing at all. The whole question should be taken up in a very comprehensive way. Full salaries should be paid for the present and the retiring allowance should be arranged for the man, or the woman, in this particular walk of life. We will have a much larger number of women in the public service in the immediate future than we have had in the past. A retiring allowance or a pension should be provided so that those people who have served the public long and faithfully may spend their declining years in comparative ease and comfort.

Mr. NESBITT: I confess that I am very pleased to see the Government introduce a Civil Service Bill that will take appointments out of party politics. I think they could not do anything better. I have not had an opportunity of reading the Bill through and I do not know what its provisions are in their entirety but I noticed one clause to which I should like to invite the attention of the committee. It provides that, where a civil servant is transferred from one department to the other, if, in the department to which he is transferred, the salary is lower, he must go in at the lower salary. I think that is absolutely unfair. There is another clause saying that he shall be entitled within a certain time to increases up to the salary that he received in the position which he formerly held but in the meantime, when transferred, he must accept the lower salary. I repeat, that is unfair. I do not think that clause should go through.

As to the Civil Service Commission, I do not know whether they are fairminded men or not, but if they are not fairminded men we are putting a lot of power in their hands because influence might be exerted underneath the surface that ordinary people would not know anything about. If they are subject to that sort of thing, we had better consider before putting so much power in their hands. However, I take it that the idea and intention of the Government is that these men shall be absolutely unbiased and fair. But, if there is some secret influence by some members of the Government, or by some people who may be known to the commissioners, the system will be nothing but a curse and a nuisance. If they exercise this power fairly I am absolutely in favour of the Bill. I am in favour anyway of giving it a trial. The laws that we make here are not like the laws of the Medes and Persians, we can change them next year if the commission do not do what is right. The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) says that we members are more or less responsible for the conditions as they exist at the present time, but if this Bill passes we will not be responsible any more, and then we can tell those people who are clamouring for positions that we are not responsible and that they can go down to Ottawa and get after the Civil Service Commission with a gun, or club, or anything they like. That will be a relief to us, and as far as that is concerned I am not worrying about it. I am willing to give the thing a trial, but I would like to have some of these clauses amended. I am entirely in accord with the general principle of taking the Civil Service out of politics. It looks to me from such consideration as I have been able to give the Bill that there is too much power placed in the hands of the deputy ministers. Suppose that a man, or a girl, in the department offends the deputy in some way or other, he or she cannot get an increase of salary or a promotion without a recommendation from the deputy. I recently had something of that kind brought to my attention and I thought the young man in that case had been treated unfairly. I think we should give that clause our very serious consideration. Some of the deputies may be large-mined men and would not take a narrow view as to those who are in their department. On the other hand, there may be deputies who are not so liberal in their views, and we are putting a great deal of power in their hands when we say that a civil servant of any department can only get an increase of salary, or promotion, on the recommendation of the deputy. I think we should also consider the provision that a civil servant, upon being transferred from one department to the other, may be required to accept a lower salary. As I have already said, I am in full accord with the general principle of the Bill.

Mr. CRONYN: As this is a general discussion, I desire to draw the attention of the House, and particularly the attention of the Government, to one matter which has already partially been discussed during the session, and that is the position of those members of the Civil Service who are serving with His Majesty's forces. Under a late Order in Council, a copy of which I have not been able to obtain this afternoon, the civil pay of these men has been cut off and they are entitled now merely to their military pay and allowances. I have here what purports to be a copy of the Order in Council and, for the purpose of discussion and without at all guaranteeing its correctness, I propose to read it.

1. After the thirtieth day of June, 1918, the above mentioned Orders in Council shall be void and of no effect and no person in the civil employment of the Government absent upon service with the forces of His Majesty, or of any of His Majesty's Allies, shall receive any portion of the pay or salary which after that date would otherwise accrue in respect of such civil employment.

2. Any person in the civil employment of the Government absent upon service with the forces of His Majesty, or of any of His Majesty's Allies, shall be entitled upon the conclusion of the latter service, to be restored to his position in the civil employment of the Government if he remains qualified to discharge the duties appertaining to that position.

Now this question arose in a different manner during the Session of 1916 and I cannot do better, by way of explanation, than to quote the answer of the then Minister of Militia and Defence, the present hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton (Sir Sam Hughes) in answer to a question put to him:

Sir Sam Hughes: The rule in force is that members of the Civil Service who enlistel in the army prior to the 1st of November last draw their salaries as civil servants and also their pay and allowances as soldiers. Those who have joined the colours since the 1st of November, 1915, receive their military pay and an additional amount which brings it up to the amount of their Civil Service salaries, if their salaries in the service were larger than their military pay.

I think that succinctly covers the ground and shows what the position of these men was when they enlisted and went abroad. Earlier in the Session, when the matter came up, and it came up because of that difference being made, the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), as reported at page 822, Hansard 1916, is quoted as follows:

An Order in Council was passed in the early weeks of the war providing that persons in the Civil Service of Canada who enlisted for overseas service would be paid their salaries during the time they were so serving their country at the front. At that time it was not anticipated that the war would last so long, and we had before us at that time the example of municipal corporations and railway and other corporations throughout Canada that were proposing to do exactly the same thing. The idea was impressed on the Government that the country could hardly afford to be less generous with regard to men who were prepared to make the supreme sacrifice than private corporations throughout the country.

Then he goes on to explain the reason why the Order in Council was changed and why the date of that change was fixed at the first of November, 1915 and adds the following:

and later on:

When the war did last for such a very considerable period, in view of the increased additional strain put on the public service by reason of the duration of the war and of the greatly increased number of men we are sending, we came to the conclusion that some change should be made, and it was made along that line.

That is to say, the civil servant, instead of getting his full civil pay in addition to his military pay, was given sufficient from the civil list to make up, with his military pay, the amount of salary he had formerly been receiving.

In the same discussion, Hon. Mr. Roche, the then Minister of the Interior, and now the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission, spoke as follows:

I have explained the reason. Substitutes for civil servants who have gone to the front have to be paid out of the war appropriation, and we felt that there was too big a drain on it. That was one reason that led us to make the change. Hon. members who have spoken seem to think that the present system is the proper one, that is, only to pay these men the difference between their military and their civil pay, but they wish to go further and reduce the pay of those who enlisted prior to the first of November. I do not agree with that proposition, because it would be a breach of contract. All those men enlisted on certain conditions, and, as they did so enlist and went overseas, to reduce their pay would not be doing justice to them; but we are not doing any injustice to those who have enlisted since the first of November, because they know in advance what pay they are going to receive.

In the ensuing debate several of the members expressed their opinion on the subject. One hon. gentleman, the member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), who has just sat down, spoke as follows:

If these men joined under a certain understanding or promise, I do not see how the Government can honourably go back on that promise any more than an individual could. I am sorry I cannot advocate the cancellation of the first arrangement, because the men joined on the understanding that it would be carried out.

In other words, the member for North Oxford could not, and would not, agree that the men who first enlisted, prior to the first of November, 1915, should be cut down to the basis of those who enlisted after that date.

In the same debate the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) said:

I think the Government should give notice in the future of any change which they intend making. Any bargain you have made should be lived up to. If a man has gone under certain conditions, the Government cannot break the engagement.

[Mr. Cronyn.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, you will understand from the Order in Council which I have read, that not only those men who enlisted at the outbreak of the war, or prior to the first of November, 1915, but those who enlisted subsequent to that date, are to lose their civil pay and have to be content with their military pay and allowances. I think I need only state that proposition to the House to secure the disapprobation of the majority of the members to that course. I cannot conceive of any excuse for doing what a former minister of the Crown has stated would amount to a breach of contract. It does involve, of course, a considerable money outlay, and it may also be argued that it is a discrimination in favour of those men against any who have enlisted, or may enlist either under the Military Service Act, or otherwise, since the Order in Council of the 5th of April. I do not think either of those reasons should prevail, or, indeed, should have any effect whatever. I do not want to enlarge on it at this time, but I do urge the Government very seriously to reconsider their action in this respect, and acting on the suggestion of a minister in the former debate who asked for a concrete proposal, I am going to submit a recommendation, which I believe would be entirely workable. They tell me there are not very many of those original men still at the front, or abroad, that many of them have returned. I think the Government should say to those of them who do not come within the terms of the Military Service Act, those of them who are not liable to conscription: "We will withdraw you if you so desire, from the front, and return you to your post in the Civil Service. But if you remain, you must remain upon the terms of this new regulation, and receive only your military pay." That might take some little time, it would depend upon the numbers involved and the military positions held, but I think it would be dealing to some extent fairly with these men and with the country as well. Many of them are married men who would certainly come within the Act. Some are over the age, and others might, for some reason or other, be exempt from the provisions of the Act. All of these men, in my opinion, should be given the option of returning and resuming their places in the Civil Service.

This Order in Council also appears to affect, according to the information given to me, those members of the Civil Service who have joined the various postal corps throughout Canada. A copy of the Order which I read was sent to such a man who was employed in the postal corps of Military District No. 1, and who, up to the date of that Order, had been receiving a certain amount of pay from the Civil Service. He is now cut off and his statement is that he loses about $50 a month. He is a married man and he and his family cannot possibly live on the military pay of $1.10 a day and whatever other field allowances there may be. That man certainly should be given the option to return to civil life. There may not be many cases of that kind, but there is one under my hand to which that applies.

There is one other point in connection with this matter. As I understand it, although I have no authority to quote on the subject, all those civil servants who enlisted did so upon the understanding that upon their return they should be reinstated (provided they were fit of course), in the situations they held, but at the salary which they would have normally received had they remained in the country. The civil servants, I should judge from the Bill before us, get certain yearly increases up to a maximum amount, and a man who went away receiving a salary of $1,000 and remained away three years would come back expecting to find his salary increased to $1,150 or $1,300. If his annual increase was $50 it would be the smaller sum, and if the yearly increase was $100 it would be the larger amount. Now, I am informed that in certain cases some of the men who have come back have been reinstated at the old salary which they received when they enlisted. That does not seem to be fair. Their brother clerks, who have stayed at home—I am not, of course, casting the least reflection on them,—have had their increases in the usual course. I think that is a point which the Government should take up, and, if I am right in my statement of fact, the wrong should be corrected.

I should also, before sitting down, like to say one other word in support of what the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) said about the salaries generally of civil servants, and particularly of those in the post office, including the mail carriers. I understand the Government is considering that point, and I hope they will deal liberally with these men. There can be no doubt, with the tremendous increase in living expenses, when we are told officially that a dollar is not worth much more than fifty cents, that these men are having a hard time. Their case is made harder by the contrast to the man who is receiving a wage, and whose wage has largely increased. I know many institutions—some of them I have to do with myself,—have since the war, allowed a special war bonus, a high cost of living bonus. And while the Government, I understand, last year, did vote a special bonus of $100, that does not strike me as being sufficient to meet the needs of the men. I have had men come into my office, who were married, with large families, and lay down their family budget, and it is quite plain on the face of it, and with the knowledge I have of living expenses, that they could not get along on the salaries they receive.

Sir SAM HUGHES: With reference to section 9, concerning use of influence in getting appointments, I desire to ask the Acting Minister of Finance if there is any truth in the statement current around the city that the Auditor-General used undue influence upon the Government to have his son appointed Solicitor to the Commission, and then went personally and appeared before the Civil Service Commission, and as was stated, practically bulldozed the commission into appointing his son? The understanding is that the Government appointed him by Order in Council in the hope that the Civil Service Commission would not confirm the appointment. But the Civil Service Commission, having heard that the Government had anticipated such action, took what I take to be the proper course and refused to act in the premises until the Government would refuse to make the appointment. I ask the question, and if the minister has not the information now, I would ask him to let me have it at a later stage.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am not in a position to answer the question just put by the hon. gentleman. But I do not think the Government has anything whatever to do with the matter. At any rate, I shall answer the question later.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill No. 60, to incorporate Montreal, Joliette and Transcontinental Junction Railway Company.—Mr. Denis.

Bill No. 61, respecting the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company.—Mr. Stewart.

INTERNATIONAL BRIDGE AND TERMINAL COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill No. 67, respecting the International Bridge and Terminal Company—Mr. Manion—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On the preamble:

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not see the promoter of this Bill. It would seem that very wide powers are being conferred on this company. Where is the line to be built?

Mr. BUREAU: Who are the incorporators?

Mr. MORPHY: I would request that these Bills be distributed so that members can follow what is going on in the committee.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Bill has been distributed.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If the chairman of the Railway Committee can give us an explanation of this Bill, I shall be satisfied with any reasonable explanation.

Mr. CURRIE: This Bill, which was up before the Railway Committee, contained some contentious clauses. The railway company owning also the International Pulp Company at the International falls at Fort Frances, Ontario, have a railway bridge between the Canadian and American sides. This railway connects up their mills on the Canadian side. The railway crosses the bridge which the company own. This railway company and the pulp company desire to extend the railway line to a sawmill about four or five miles up or down the river—I do not know which, to provide cheap fuel for the pulp mill. They found that, under the Railway Act, they did not have the right to extend their line six miles on either side of their main line as provided in the Act. They had a charter of a bridge company which gave them a perfect right to build a railway track on the bridge and approaches, and they thought that, under that, they could come under the Railway Act and extend their branch lines six miles or so away from the main line on the bridge. The Board of Railway Commissioners decided that they did not possess that power because they were not a railway with a main line. There was also a dispute between the town of Fort Frances and this company. It appears that some time ago they had some trouble, and the town compelled them to build a revetment wall along the waterfront, and they wished to run this line of railway over that waterfront. Some clauses contained in the Bill give them the right to run over this embankment virtually without asking the permission of the municipality, and shutting the municipality from the waterfront. The municipality was represented before the Railway Board. The question was brought up there and amendments were agreed to which, I understand, were incorporated in the Bill by the clerk of the Railway Committee, and the Bill was then satisfactory to everybody in the committee, all interests being satisfied. Mr. Alexander Smith appeared for the town.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill No. 74, for the relief of Thomas Bailey Wainwright.—Mr. Fripp.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT.

The House resumed in Committee on Bill No. 53, respecting the Civil Service of Canada—Mr. A. K. Maclean—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: This is an innovation from the way in which appointments to the Civil Service have been made in previous years. That is, instead of the members undertaking the responsibility and a certain amount of worry in connection with patronage in the filling of positions, that work is now assigned to the Civil Service Commission. If that commission will give the necessary attention to this very responsible work, a considerable advance will have been made. If, however, that commission, after it undertakes the work, becomes indifferent and allows a good deal of this work to drift into the hands of the deputy ministers in the various departments, or perhaps leaves a considerable quantity of this work for the secretary to do, I question whether it will be as satisfactory as we would like to see it. If the work drifts into the hands of the deputy ministers and the secretary, and if the commission does not give it the necessary attention, an inner circle or ring will be formed that will cause a great deal of dissatisfaction. I think, however, this is a move in the right direction, and we should give the Bill a fair trial. If we find it is not working to the satisfaction of the members generally, some change may be made at a later date. As to beneficient action in regard to those who have voluntarily enlisted and gone overseas and those who have been drafted, I wish to compare the treatment accorded by the city of Toronto to its employees with that accorded by the Government to its employees. I do not think the Government has treated its employees as generously as the city of Toronto has.

At the outbreak of the war the city of Toronto continued to pay those of its employees who enlisted their full civil salaries, even in one case to the amount of $9,000 a year. These men drew their military pay as well, and some of them held pretty good positions in the army. During the second year of the war the city continued to pay them their full civil salary less the amount of their military pay, but reduced the amount of $9,000 which it was paying in one particular case, because they felt justified in making the reduction. The city of Toronto also insured for $1,000 all men enlisting in the city, and has paid out many hundreds of thousands of dollars in that way. This insurance is still kept up.

I have heard many complaints in connection with Government employees, and particularly in connection with the custom house. One young man that I know of in the Customs Department enlisted voluntarily and was granted both his civil and military pay, in accordance with the usual understanding that he would proceed overseas in a reasonable time. He was prepared to go overseas and so informed the department, but after some time had elapsed and he was not sent overseas, his civil pay was cancelled and he was allowed his military pay only. The same thing occurred with six or seven others in the Customs Department. This young man to whom I have referred was made an instructor, notwithstanding his desire to go overseas, and he still wishes to go. I got in touch with the department and suggested that he be allowed to go overseas or to revert to his civil position, but the answer was that he was to remain as instructor, and he is still carrying out that duty, receiving only military pay. It seems to me that is hardly fair treatment from the Government. It can certainly afford to be more generous than the city of Toronto, because of its large revenue and its power to tax, if necessary, the lands of the whole Dominion. The city of Toronto has been very generous, and in many cases has done what really should have been done by the Government.

Many employees of the Customs Department are receiving very small pay. They have made representations to the minister or deputy minister at various times that they should have an increase. I understand that many of them have not had an increase for several years. The minister may say that they were given a war bonus last year. It is true that a bonus of a hundred dollars was given, but not to the whole staff, for what reason I do not know. It has been represented to me that about forty members of the staff received no increase or bonus whatever, and that has created dissatisfaction. If the Government felt they could only afford to distribute a certain amount among the employees, they should have made an equal distribution of it amongst the whole staff, instead of giving a bonus to two-thirds and nothing to the rest. I think these employees have a real grievance and I trust that in the reclassification under this Bill they will get an increase and receive the treatment they should have received long before this. The same remark applies to the post office employees, in both the inside and the outside service, including the letter carriers. A deputation from Toronto made representations here for an increase a few weeks ago, but they received very little encouragement because the deputation was from Toronto. I understand the Government's answer was that representations had not been made generally throughout the Dominion, but from only a few employees representing the Toronto postal employees and letter carriers. I know some of these letter carriers in Toronto who have been in the service for from twenty-five to forty years and have not received an increase for many years. Their pay, considering the high cost of living, is very small. I trust that, when this Bill is finally passed the Government will see to it that these men are treated justly, even if they are residents of Toronto. I do not think the Government should require representations to be made generally throughout the whole Dominion. If no representations have been made by the West, it may be that conditions are better out there; perhaps they are getting better pay. I certainly think the cost of living is higher in the East than in the West, and I therefore think there should be a greater increase in the East.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In the West civil servants receive an increase of fifteen per cent per annum. This is due to the fact that the cost of living is higher.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: I sincerely trust that something will be done after the representations that have been made. This is a very important Bill, and inaugurates a new policy. There is to be a re-classification of the service, and a system of competitive examinations. I think that is a step in the right direction, but it does not always follow that the person who comes out on top in the examination is best fitted for the position. I have seen in my time a young man who was extra bright and clever and who could pass the examination but who, when he was placed in a position, displayed no ability or aptitude for his work. Surely positions in any part of the country are not going to be given to people, whether they have ability or not, just because they have taken fairly high standing at an examination.

If a position should happen to be available in Ottawa, or Quebec, a young man living in Vancouver would be eligible to be examined for that position. He might be clever and pass the examination, and he might possibly be given that position. Why should you bring a man from Vancouver to fill a position in Ottawa or Quebec when you could get perhaps five hundred or a thousand people just as capable of filling that position right in the locality? You should give consideration to the claims of those who pass the examination and who reside in the locality where the vacancy occurs. Surely amongst them you will get some who possess the ability as well as the qualifications which the passing of the examination gives them. While you insist on an examination to test the qualifications of the candidate, you should assure yourself of his ability to carry on the work successfully. It should not be left entirely to deputies or to the secretary. I am inclined to fear that a great deal of the work of selection will be assigned to subordinate officers instead of being carried on under the immediate direction of the commissioners. However, I trust I may be disappointed, and that my opinion as to what is likely to occur will not be verified. It may be that my judgment as to what will take place is not good. If this Bill works out in a satisfactory way we will all be perfectly satisfied and glad of the change.

[Mr. T. Foster.]

Mr. COOPER: Although I have read this Bill through, I am not prepared as yet to pass on its merits or demerits. I think that probably a year's trial will disclose its weak and its strong points. There is a question that I would like to bring to the attention of the Government, and that is the position of the lower-paid public servants. I do consider, speaking more especially for the Far West, that some of our letter carriers and men in the employ of the Customs Department are quite inadequately paid. I would like to go on record as urging very strongly that they should receive a bonus or some other consideration to meet the increased cost of living. With regard to civil servants who are also soldiers, I have been very strongly opposed to those preferred soldiers. I felt that the Government had no right at any time to give a preference to any men that fought for the country, but as the Government made the contract with these men, that contract should be lived up to. If the Government's intention is to cancel all payments to those civil servants on the thirtieth of June, any men who did not fall within the operation of the Military Service Act should be allowed to break the contract on their side.

Mr. CURRIE: This Bill is possibly one of the most important measures that has come before this House at this session, and I only regret that it was not brought down earlier so that more consideration could be given to it. The Bill deals, we know, with both the inside and outside services. I have heard some of the discussion and I must confess that I do not think a case has been made out yet for a great many clauses of the Bill. It is argued that the Outside Services ought to be placed under a commission, and England is quoted as a great country that has its service under a commission. With all due regard to our desire to look up to England for everything, what do we find? We find that when war broke out the Civil Service of England was so cluttered up with incompetents that they had to break their regulations and call in outside practical men to take charge of various departments of the Government. I might point out, for instance, the case of Sir Frederick Geddes. It is only a few years since this gentleman, who is now in charge of one of the greatest and most important departments of the British Government, was a railway contractor. Other departments might also be mentioned in regard to which the Government had to break their regulations with reference to the Civil Service, get the best men they could and put them into the service of the country. Those who know anything about the Civil Service under this Government, especially the inside service, know that possibly one-third of the service do all the work whilst the other two-thirds spend all their time in endeavouring to keep out of the way so that nobody will know whether they are earning their salaries or not. I knew cases in the old House before it was burned of men who had sinecures under the Government and who got away into a corner in a room and had the space occupied by them partitioned off so that nobody would be able to see what they were doing. I often wondered whether they did not crawl in and out of the window for fear that they might be seen going through the corridors. The difficulty is that there is no arrangement, such as there is in the United States, where there is a special inspection for supervising the work of different departments. When they adopted Civil Service reform in the United States they found it was necessary to supervise all the departments from time to time and under their law they appointed an Efficiency Board that goes through the departments from time to time, and if the head of that department or anybody else is incapable, the board will fire him. Here we have made no such provision. If a man once gets into the Service in some of these departments it will take a ton of dynamite to get him out, it does not make any difference whether he does any work or not. I know a good deal about it and that is exactly how the case stands. Every minister knows that he is encumbered with men in his department that he cannot get rid of. I repeat that one-third of the men are doing the work and the rest are doing nothing.

So much for the Inside Service. We come now to the Outside Service. We are going to put the Outside Service under a commission and have examinations. Can the minister tell me what kind of an examination you are going to have, for instance, for a man who shovels coal into a furnace? A lot of these men in the Outside Service are men employed to shovel coal, feed furnaces, sweep sidewalks and wash windows. What qualifications will you require of a man who is employed to wash windows? We go farther afield and come to the most important branch of all, the post office. Now in the case of a small post office in the country the postmaster or postmistress must pass a qualifying examination. Formerly they had to be examined by the post office inspector who had to find out whether the party nominated was fit for the place or not. But that is not going to be the case in future. As it is now a man who has a post office in his store sells out to another man who is duly qualified to take his place and run that post office. The man who is running that store then, instead of getting the appointment of postmaster, with a salary of $50 or $60 a year attached to it, has to pass the qualifying examination and when he does perhaps he has not got the job. Somebody will be sent to take that job, somebody perhaps from the Northwest or Three Rivers or some other section of Canada, to take the position.

A great many appointments will have to be made from time to time in the Outside Service. What will we have then under this Bill? A position perhaps may have to be filled in the outside service in Toronto. Well, one man will perhaps come from Vancouver, another fellow from Hull to fill it. Toronto will be ignored. With respect to the Inside Service when it was under investigation and fire a few years ago, it was discovered that eighty-five per cent of the appointments made to it were made from the city of Ottawa. Now, when all the appointments for the Outside Service are made in the city of Ottawa, how many appointments do you think will be made from the country to the Inside Service? When I had the good, or bad, fortune to take my seat on the Government side of the House in 1911, I made an investigation into the Inside Service here to find out how many men from my riding had positions in the Inside Service and how they had fared. I found that only one man from my riding had been appointed to the service and his appointment dated away back to 1887. So you see there is little or no chance whatever under this measure for anybody outside of Ottawa to get a job of any kind. As far as appointments outside are concerned there is a great deal of talk in the papers about the "uplift" and the terrible evils of patronage, and all that sort of thing. I have never experienced any trouble about patronage. I have had a little trouble when I appointed incompetents to office and had to deliberately fire them, and I have not hesitated, when men that I had recommended were found to be incompetent, to see that they were removed, and others who were competent put in their places. Somebody must be responsible for the management of the Outside Service all over the country, and to whom do the people look? Do they look to the deputy minister? No, they look to the member and if anything goes wrong they blame him for it. Now, the members, to my knowledge, have always seen to it that the people they recommend for position in the Outside Service were invariably respectable people and well behaved, but what guarantee has the Government that all kinds of people will not get into the Outside Service now? There is no arrangement made that they shall be furnished with recommendations or anything of that kind. If a man seeks a position in the establishment of Sir John Eaton in Toronto what happens? The applicant has to give the names of two or three prominent citizens in the place from which he comes, and to each of these people will come a document from Eaton's saying, such a person has given your name as one who has personal knowledge of him, and accompanying it is a series of questions from the firm asking about that man, just the same as though he was recommended to a position in the Government. That is not patronage, that is purely and simply a guarantee that the man you recommend to Eaton's is a respectable person. You will not recommend a thief to go there. It should be the same with the Civil Service. A man, unless he is carefully recommended, may have a record that is not altogether too good, and the result will be appointments such as were made last year. Some appointments were made in certain departments of the Government without any reference to members, and to my positive knowledge—I do not want to name any party—two of the men that were appointed were more fit for the asylum than for a job in the Civil Service, or any other service. There are all kinds of people chasing Government jobs, and the great difficulty is to select the proper party. When you do so you must shed a tear over his career, because you know he is being put in some place where he is not going to get what he deserves. There are meritorious people who do not get what they deserve, and often those who are not meritorious get a good deal more than they deserve. I think some provision should be made in the present Bill to meet the difficulties I have pointed out. The old Act that we have been working under gave the Government power by Order in Council at any time to place the outside service under the Civil Service Commission. That was all right, but no case has been made out for the great change which is proposed here. Whilst there has been lots of talk and questions raised about appointments, the only cases where difficulties have occurred by reason of appointments in the ridings have been where members of Parliament have deliberately placed their own friends in office. We will have the same thing here; a deputy minister will place all his relations in jobs under the Government, and the people from other parts of the country will not have anything to say about it.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the Auditor General?

Mr. CURRIE: I do not know anything about the Auditor General, who is a good old Scotchman, except that he is a very efficient officer. On several occasions in this House I have had to take his reports as proof where certain things had occurred that he would not let through. We have had him before committees on a number of occasions, and we invariably found the Auditor General was a straight and honest man. But there is a great tendency to nepotism in human nature, which extends away back to Biblical times. There is a great tendency to give jobs to your relations and I confess it is very difficult to get over at times. This tendency it will be very hard for the deputy ministers and the ministers to combat.

From my knowledge of what has taken place in this House, both when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, and when the Conservative Party were in power, I do not think that there were half a dozen cases brought before the House in which it could be said that wrong appointments were made through the instrumentality of the members. The member is responsible, and if he recommends an evil person to take a position everybody on the opposite side of politics in his own riding will be down on him for it. The result will be that he will have to have that appointment cancelled, or insist that whoever gets it shall walk in the straight and narrow path.

There is another thing to be considered. We are now having to deal with returned soldiers. The Government passed an Order in Council that no one should have a position who was of military age except a returned soldier. That was very much appreciated by the men who are fighting the battles of this country, whether they have returned from the front or not. Many men will return with empty sleeves and wooden legs. So far this Government has provided positions for those men, and I feel satisfied that after the clamour and excitement of war have passed these men, without exception, will do their duty, because they have learnt the idea of discipline, which ninety per cent of Canadians who have not gone to the war know nothing about. Furthermore, the returned soldiers will know what efficiency is. We find that this Bill makes no provision for placing representatives of the men who are at the front on the Civil Service Commission. I have nothing to say against the present members of the commission, but I think that provision should be made for enlarging its membership whereby at least two, if not three, members should be men who have served at the front, men who have received wounds and served their country with honour and distinction. If we do not do that what is going to happen? There are going to be examinations and we hear it said that the soldiers are going to be put at the top of the lists, and all that sort of thing. Well, we have absolute confidence in the present members of the Civil Service Commission, but none of those gentlemen have a permanent lease of life. I would not like to see them disappear, but they are not going to live forever, and their places will be taken by others who may have no sympathy with the war or with the soldiers. The result will be that the soldier will be constantly cheated out of office by trick examinations. For that reason I would ask the minister to put representatives of the returned soldiers on the commission to see that there is no such thing as trick examinations imposed on the returned soldiers.

There are other departments of the Government in the Inside Service where examinations have to be passed. I do not wish to mention any names, but unless a man belongs to a union he gets a trick examination and has no chance to get an appointment. If he belongs to a certain union, he has every chance, and if he does not belong to that order he is out in the cold. So, in this case, if you are going to give a preference to a returned soldier, and you are honest about it, and the House is honest about it, then make provision that there shall be people on this commission who will fight for the returned soldier and see that he gets his proper due. I think these are sentiments which should touch the heart of gentlemen who are sitting within the sound of my voice, and I am not asking too much when I ask that this board be enlarged. I have no right to ask for the expenditure of a larger amount of money than the Government is providing for this measure; I would be called to order by the chairman if I did. But perhaps we could have some soldiers put on that commission who would serve for nothing and not ask for salaries.

I want to refer to another point in connection with the returned soldier. The matter has been referred to by the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn), who has placed his case very clearly before the House. I have spoken already this session on this matter, and perhaps it would not be right for me to say another word. I only desire to answer the suggestions that have been made that the men who went to the front in 1914 should be asked to return and revert to the Civil Service, give up all they fought for in France, or else give up their salaries. That would affect four generals at the front, who went over there as juniors and have received their crossed swords on the battlefield. They were men of the permanent corps holding Civil Service appointments. You ask these men, who are highly qualified officers, many of them the best officers we have, to return under this regulation, men who have been engineers in the service, qualified as artillerymen and observers. You say to them: We don't want you to serve your country any longer, you must give up what you have there and come back.

What would they get when they came back? I know one officer who went over as a permanent non.-com. in the service, a corporal of the permanent corps when he left. He went to Europe, distinguished himself, and rose to the rank of major. Through illness he was invalided to Canada. Whilst he was recovering an order went forth that no officers who were invalided to Canada were to be allowed to go to the front from here, and he had to remain at home. He was not willing to do so. But what were the conditions under which he returned to duty? Although he had won his commission and crowns on the other side, he had to go back in the permanent corps as a corporal. There is no guarantee, and there has been no guarantee, provided by this Government for any man who has left for the front from the permanent corps or militia and who obtains a promotion abroad. When he comes back he reverts exactly to the rank in the army or the militia he had before the war. This Parliament might very well have given consideration to amendments to the Militia Act in justice to officers who have gone overseas and won their promotion. But we are in a hurry to get away from here and important matters have been forgotten. If hon. gentlemen waver in the right, and will not live up to its obligations, as a man who represents the soldiers in this House I insist on justice and that the contracts are carried out. Sir John Eaton is not asking, nor is any other of the great business houses of the country, to get out of the voluntary contracts they have made with the men who left their employ for the front, and they are paying the wives what was promised when the men left. Surely this House of Commons has not degenerated so much since the war began that it wants to do what is a rank injustice and a breach of contract so far as the men at the front are concerned.

There are one or two other matters in connection with this Bill which I think it would be well to consider seriously before proceeding to give it its final touches, and I hope the minister will take them home to-night, and bring in a few amendments, especially that there shall be representatives of the returned soldiers appointed on the commission. We all express so much sympathy for the returned soldiers here, but he gets so little of it when it comes to practice. It is time we did something more than talk about it. There is another clause in the Bill which deals with technical men. Technical men are the young fellows who come from the universities as draughtsmen, surveyors and designers, and enter the departments, nearly all of them with the Bachelor of Science degree. They are put in Class 2 according to this Bill. Why should the best brains which enter the service—chemists, draughtsmen and men of ability—be put into the Second Division? The Bill provides that architects and draughtsmen shall be put in that division, and the hardship of it is that these men, according to the Bill, can never be put into the First Division, can never become heads of departments. I hope the minister will reconsider that. I want to assure him right now, from my experience all over the country, and from my experience as to what the soldiers are saying, the men I suppose chiefly interested in the Bill, they do not think there is any great necessity for all this row about putting the Outside Civil Service under a commission. That is going to be a tremendous work. It should be undertaken after the war is over, when we would have plenty of time to pass a carefully considered Bill. It has not been proven that there is any merit whatever in what is known as Civil Service reform, because in England and in the United States they have had to put the best men in the country at the head of their departments. Charles M. Schwab was put the other day at the head of the ship construction.

9 p.m.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Mr. Schwab has not entered the Civil Service. He has entered the public service, just as Sir Auckland Geddes did in England.

Mr. CURRIE: He is the head of a department.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: And so is Geddes. Mr. Schwab has not become a member of the Civil Service.

Mr. CURRIE: Of course, these men would not think of becoming members of the Civil Service. Why should men like that want to enter the Civil Service? My observation is when it comes down to the point where we need real men we cannot get them from the Civil Service. Therefore, as far as this Bill is concerned, I do not think it has justified so much stupid talk about it. I heard the speech of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) this afternoon. And I thought if that was all that could be said on behalf of the Bill there was not very much to be said. If you pass this Bill you will get whole groups of men in office, and you make no provision to get rid of them if they are of no use. Neither the deputy head nor any other sub-head has any authority to dismiss a man or to establish discipline in the service, not even the minister. That is dealt with by the Governor General in Council. Suppose a man away out in the country will not do what he has been ordered to do: the superior refers the matter to the officer next higher up; that officer passes it on to the deputy minister, and the deputy to the minister; the minister puts it before the Cabinet and the Cabinet has to decide whether a postmaster drawing $25 a year shall be dismissed. The whole thing, to my mind, is absurd. The Bill should be better framed than it is. I do not think any argument has been advanced by either the minister or anybody in this House which has satisfied me that there is any crying desire for Civil Service reform of this kind. The cry for reform comes altogether from those people who have failed to get appointments.

Mr. HOCKEN: I was quite surprised to hear the member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) say this afternoon that this Bill would be unpopular. As far as my observations go it is popular with pretty nearly every class in the community. I do not know any class of people with whom it should be so popular as the members of this House. I congratulate the minister upon the Bill which he has brought down. It is not perfect, but I do not think we should look for perfection in legislation enacted by human beings. However, I wish to bring to the attention of the minister a few of the imperfections by which I have been impressed.

I heartily approve of the principle laid down in the Bill that the returned soldier should be taken care of. In many parts of the country institutions are training returned soldiers who intend to take up different occupations from those in which they were engaged before they went to the war. Many men who were not in the Civil Service before they went to the front may on their return prepare for and perform efficiently the duties of civil servants, and in this respect there is work for the Department of Soldiers' Re-Establishment. These men have risked their lives, endured all kinds of hardship and, in some cases, of misery, in order to protect our homes, and if there is any class of people to whom we should give special consideration it is the men who return from the war. This Bill provides that even if such men are not as well qualified on the competitive examination as some others may be, they are eligible for appointment. That is only fair, and I believe that such men will be most efficient. I hope that the Civil Service Commission will make that a particular feature of their work and that they will give the closest attention to it.

I was much impressed by the remarks made by the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt). It will not be satisfactory to send from Ottawa, Toronto, Hamilton or other eastern centres, men to take up Government positions, say, in Calgary or Edmonton. Those in the locality concerned who are qualified should receive special consideration. I do not say this because I want to have anything to do with appointments in Toronto; I am delighted to be relieved of that responsibility. But the local feeling with regard to appointments of this kind should receive the consideration of the Government. The member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) emphasized the wide power that is conferred upon deputy ministers. I want to get away from patronage; I believe that that is the sentiment of the people. But if the people are forced to choose between the patronage system and a family-compact system, they will prefer the former. Nothing is more repugnant to public sentiment than the filling of public offices with men connected by blood relationship or by marriage with some particular group of officials. This Bill puts it in the power of deputy ministers practically to take care of every relative they have, and every relative their wives have, and every person he is connected with in any way.

An hon. MEMBER: How?

Mr. HOCKEN: These appointments are made on the recommendation of the deputy minister. The man getting the highest marks in the competitive examination is appointed on probation, and if at the end of six months or a year the deputy minister wants to give the appointment to the second man on the list, who happens to be a friend of his, the probationary period may be ended with the dismissal of the man who was highest in the examination.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The selection is made by the Civil Service Commission. The deputy minister may dismiss, but there is an appeal to the Civil Service Commission. The probation is for a period of six months or a year.

Mr. HOCKEN: That is as I understand it. Let us suppose the second man on the list is the man the deputy minister wants. I do not charge deputy ministers with being concerned in any corrupt act, but they are just as human as we are, and if the man who comes second is a relative or friend of the deputy minister the probationary period of the highest man may end in a report by the deputy minister to the Civil Service Commission that his services are unsatisfactory; and the commission sends along the next man. The best man to determine the qualification or fitness of an employee is the deputy minister; I do not see how we can get away from that. But I should like to see in this Bill a provision that the annual report of the Civil Service Commission shall state not only the name of the appointee, his salary, and so on, but also how many relatives he had by blood or by marriage in the service. In that way a check would be put on those who are disposed for one reason or another to create a family compact.

Sir SAM HUGHES: If the deputy has the appointment, does that not mean that the minister will have something to say about it? because the minister has power to retire his deputy if the latter does not play the game. Moreover, is it not simply a left-handed way of letting the ministers have the patronage, instead of the members of Parliament?

Mr. HOCKEN: The appointment is made by the Civil Service Commission, but power is vested in the deputy minister to eliminate one man after another who may be so appointed by the commission. The suggestion which I have made would put a check on the deputy minister in the matter of his appointing half a dozen men of one family to positions in the service. If an investigation were made of the service here in Ottawa, it would be found that in some cases half a dozen different members of the same family are in the service, sometimes in the same department. They may be qualified, but the principle is repugnant to the feelings of the people. It is the last thing we should encourage, or even permit, and if it cannot be absolutely prevented, it should at least be discouraged by such a plan as I have suggested. Then, take the appointments for which no examination is possible. I assume that professional and technical men would include carpenters, plumbers, printers and men of that kind. The appointment of such men rests with the deputy minister, who makes recommendation to the commission. The Deputy Minister of Public Works, for instance, would have the appointment of I do not know how many carpenters and plumbers all over the Dominion.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Technical men are men of special or scientific knowledge—of mining, fisheries, and things of that kind. The expression "technical officers" would not include tradesmen.

Mr. HOCKEN: What examination can the Civil Service Commission set for carpenters? One carpenter is equal to another. How are you going to determine superiority of qualifications amongst men of that class? The same applies to printers and plumbers, large numbers of whom are employed. That responsibility all rests upon the deputy ministers, and that is altogether too much power to put into their hands, unless there is some additional check than that which is provided in the Bill as it stands at present.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Commission will find a method of appointing men of that class. The deputy minister has nothing to do with it.

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not understand that from the Bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I could not help feeling, while the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) was speaking about the influence that might be exercised by a deputy minister, that, as a rule, deputy ministers are not so unkind to their relatives as to wish to have them placed in the Civil Service. I have had some knowledge of the Civil Service for a few years, and, from my experience, my advice to my friends and acquaintances has been to keep clear of the Civil Service above anything else. If you have any ambition; if you ever expect to make any headway in the world; if you place any value on your initiative, your freedom, then, for Heaven's sake, steer clear of the Civil Service. If you want to become part of a machine by which you move along without exercising your initiative, then the Civil Service is the proper place for you. My sympathies have always been with those employed in the Civil Service. I want it distinctly understood that, if to-night I say anything that may, in some measure, reflect upon civil servants, I have no intention of casting any reflection on any one who is at present or who may in the future be in the Service. When the minister was pointing out the difference between the position occupied by Mr. Schwab and Mr. Geddes and the position of those in the Civil Service, it struck me that the difference was possibly an imaginary one. The minister told us that the former were in the public service, whereas the latter were in the Civil Service.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What I meant was that Mr. Schwab was appointed head of the Shipbuilding Commission because he had some knowledge of that particular business. The civil servants of the United States Government have no opportunity of gaining a knowledge of building ships. That is not their business. It is, therefore, only natural that somebody should be taken from the outside. There is quite a distinction.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I quite understand what the minister had in mind. In the positions in which Mr. Schwab and Mr. Geddes were placed, they were able to exercise their initiative, to do things and to control those placed under them. Some hon. members who spoke dealt with civil servants who enlisted voluntarily and went overseas with the first and second contingents, and with whom the Government entered into a contract to pay them their Civil Service salaries in addition to their military pay. I think that almost without exception those who spoke in reference to that matter said that it would be a breach of contract on the part of the Government with those men if that contract was not carried out to the very letter. I hardly look at the matter in that light. We are, at the present time, passing through a condition of change. The war has revolutionized everything in the world. Conditions to-day are not what they were six months ago or a year ago. Changes are rapidly taking place. When these men entered the military service, we had the volunteer system. To-day we have compulsory military service in this country. While it would be advisable and obligating to carry out that contract with men not eligible under the Military Service Act, as regards any man who is to-day eligible for service under the Military Service Act, I do not consider that this Government or any other is justified in giving him preference over any one else. The same argument applies to the clamour that is being raised to-day throughout the country with regard to the cancellation of exemption of farmers. Some safeguards might be provided whereby, in certain instances, where a great hardship is going to ensue, exemptions might be made; but in so far as keeping faith with those men is concerned, changed war conditions have relieved the Government of any such responsibility. The very fact that we have to-day in Canada compulsory military service does not justify the Government in singling out civil servants and paying them salaries in addition to their military pay. Every one in this country ought to be on an equal footing with regard to this war. We ought to have, in so far as is possible, an equality of service and of sacrifice on the part of every one.

In my opinion, this is a most inopportune time for the introduction of a Bill respecting the Civil Service of Canada. There is no justification for taking any class of the people in this country or in any other country and cuddling them along and placing safeguards around them so that they are safeguarded from competition with other people. You give them privileges that other people do not enjoy, and you do a great deal of harm in that respect. It is true you kill, you strangle initiative in them, and in that way you do a great deal of injury to them. I should like to see, if it were only possible, some way of providing for promotion for merit in the Civil Service. I do not believe that has always been the custom, and I do not think it will be possible under this Bill.

By placing the Outside Service in the hands of the Civil Service Commission, we are departing from an established rule that has been in existence in the British Empire for many years; that is, responsible and representative government. I believe a government ought to be responsible to the people for the administration of the affairs of the country. I do not believe you can delegate those responsibilities to any commission and say: The commission have done so and so; the Government cannot interfere in the matter, and we are not responsible for the action of the commission. We have not had a great deal of experience in Canada with regard to commissions; but there is at the present time a feeling so intense burning in the veins of our people with regard to one commission that has been appointed in Canada, that it should cause us to hesitate, to reflect as to what the consequence may be of placing another commission in a position in which they will be able to exercise as much authority as that one is empowered to exercise, and I see that the powers are almost identical. You may rest assured that until some very serious misdemeanour is committed the Government will not call for the resignation of a member of any commission. As long as we have responsible and representative government in this country, responsibility rests upon the members who are elected to represent the people in Parliament, and a commission should not be beyond the reach of those so elected. I do not think it is right or fair that such power should be placed outside the control of the representatives of the people. A great deal has been said about the abuses that have crept in in connection with the distribution of patronage. While it may be true of certain constituencies where there is a great deal of patronage, in the inland counties, one of which I represent, there is little or no patronage, and I do not, as a result, hold the same views on this matter that some others do. I know that if the Civil Service Commission have the right to select some one to occupy a position in the county where I live, and some one was brought in from some outside place to fill a vacancy, the people of my constituency would be very indignant indeed, and justly so, and that is the very thing likely to occur under this Act. I received in my mail only the other morning a notice from the Civil Service Commission that applications would be received for the position of postmaster at Lethbridge, and I can imagine what the consequences would be if some one from Oxford was selected to fill that position. But this is likely to happen under present conditions. My hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) has spoken of the influence that may be exerted on behalf of friends, and it may be that some would like to see a friend who was not competent to fill any other place secure a position where he could be taken care of. I think there is greater danger of abuses under this Bill than under the old system. So far as the constituency I represent is concerned, I do not think I have secured the appointment of more than two from that constituency during the seven years I have been its representative, so I have no need to feel anxious about the number of appointments that would come to that constituency. In one case I recommended a very able and competent young man who had the qualifications for almost any position. He was taken on, and was later put on the permanent staff, and if ever a man was crucified that man was, and he will regret to his dying day that he ever entered the service, and I also regret ever recommending him for that position. Outside of the two I have mentioned, two others were appointed in the railway mail service, and that is the amount of the patronage that has come to the constituency of South Oxford during the last seven years, and I do not anticipate there would be much more come to it in the next six or seven years if conditions remained as they were under the old Act. So I do not speak of this measure with the feeling that it will affect me in any way if I should continue to represent that constituency.

I am speaking in this way because I feel this is an inopportune time to introduce a measure of this kind when we have coming back from overseas every day men who are maimed for life, and who will find it difficult to follow their old vocation. These men should surely be given the preference, but I cannot see within the four corners of the Bill anything to safeguard their rights in any degree. It is true that an Order in Council has been passed, but so far as the Bill itself is concerned—I have looked it over very carefully—no safeguards have been provided. On the contrary, the examinations that may be prescribed by the Civil Service Commission will probably debar a great many of these men from entering the Civil Service, who under present conditions might be appointed. Why is it that to-day practically the only positions you can get for a returned soldier are caretakers of public buildings or some other menial employment of that kind? It may be that in other parts of the country returned soldiers are being given positions, but I am speaking of what is taking place in the rural districts and smaller towns and cities.

Reference has been made to the postmen of this country, who are not receiving salaries commensurate with the work they are doing. It is true an increase was granted last year, but what about the poor rural mail couriers in the country who have driven through the snowbanks all last winter and have had to pay $1.25 for oats and a similarly high price for hay for their horses? These men have to contend with a double increase in the cost of living; the cost of living both for themselves and also for their horses has gone up. In scarcely a single instance are these men being paid anything like what is being paid to the postmen in cities and towns, and there is nothing in the Bill providing for them. If this Bill should become law I trust the minister will consider the conditions under which the rural mail couriers are working and take care of them as others in the public service are being taken care of. In view of the increase in the cost of living and of everything these men have to provide, it is a disgrace that men who have taken contracts for four years, with a year or two still to run, should have to carry on at the same rate and at a loss under the abnormal conditions of to-day. The new contracts are being let for three, four and five hundred dollars more on twenty-mile routes than was granted under the old conditions, and the contracts in the cities and towns are being let for many thousands of dollare more than a few years ago. The only redress the rural mail courier has is to ask to be relieved of his contract. New tenders will then be called for, and someone else may be given the position he holds, and he may not be fit to do any other work. These men find it absolutely impossible to carry on under present conditions, and all the Government says to them is: You can resign if you can't carry on, and we will call for new tenders, and may, perhaps, appoint somebody else. But that is not the way they are looking after the people in the cities and towns; these are being taken care of and given an increase every year. Why not put the couriers on an equal footing with others in the Service who are receiving extra pay in view of the present conditions?

I say this is not the time to introduce a measure of this sort. It is not right that our returned soldiers should be prevented from occupying positions they are competent to fill simply, it may be, because they cannot spell "Bolsheviki" correctly. I say we could well afford to let this measure stand over until a more opportune time, and the same remark applies to a good deal of the legislation we have had before us this session.

The times we are living in are strenuous ones indeed, and let no one labour under the delusion that they are going to improve very soon. Let me warn the people of this country that we have not seen the worst yet. The day will come, and speedily come, I believe, when the people of this world are going to have great difficulties in getting food to maintain themselves and their families. That is the condition confronting us to-day, and it will continue to confront us until the people of this country realize that that condition cannot be improved by getting a comfortable position in the Civil Service or some other appointment at a substantial salary, but only by going out on the land and by hard labour produce something from the soil to feed the people of this country and of the world. It can only be accomplished in that way. It cannot be done by going out and telling people what they ought to do and how they ought to increase food production. We have hundreds of these people well paid going around the country doing that to-day. The people must realize that they have to go out and labour on the land in order to produce food. The present condition would have come about in any event in the course of a few years as a result of the world-wide movement from the country to the cities that existed before the war, but the war has hurried it on. A critical situation stares us in the face to-day. One side or the other of the contending forces will fail in this war as a result of the food situation. It is not going to be a victory by superior force of arms, but it is going to be a matter of laying down arms from starvation. There is no getting away from that. That sage of the West, the late J. J. Hill, some years ago made the prediction that the people of this world would be up against starvation inside of twenty years and it is unfortunate that it should arise at this critical time. I do not think this Bill ought to be put through this House at the present session. Let it remain until we see what the conditions will be at the end of another year. Let there be no obstacle placed in the way of the men who are coming back from the front being placed in the positions that are covered by this Bill.

Mr. NICKLE: Let me assure the House that it is my intention to take up only a very few minutes of its time but as this debate has become somewhat of a general experience meeting I should like to place on record one or two transactions that have recently taken place in the riding from which I come since the patronage was taken from the hands of the members and since we were advised by circular that we would no longer have a voice in the selection of those who were locally to occupy public office. These experiences will show that no matter how perfect a scheme may be in so far as its documentary form goes it will not amount to much unless the men who have to work it out are actuated by the purest of motives and are determined that the public interest shall not suffer from their administration. I do not know that there is a riding in Canada, in which in comparison to its size there are more public favours to be given, more patronage to be distributed, than in the compact little riding that I have the honour to represent. I think that probably the majority of my constituents would say that during the time of Mr. Harty, who preceded me, and in my administration of the riding, there has been a recognition at least in the great majority of the appointments, from men chosen from the political parties in power at the time, that the public service had not suffered by the appointments that were made. I do not want it inferred, however, that I am not in favour of the Bill. I favour the Bill and am prepared to give it a fair trial, because my political experience has taught me that from the point of view of a public man there is precious little to be obtained by him from what is commonly called the cohesive power of patronage. We all recognize that while the member was supposed to have the power of appointment, it was only the power of recommendation that was vested in him, because when you come to analyse the conditions that prevail, the member really only had the power of recommending. He had the power of recommending to the administrative officer of the Crown the name of a man who, in his judgment, would be a suitable person to fill a certain position. If a man was not able to do the work that was entrusted to him, the Government at all times had the right of dismissal. In connection with much of the patronage that was administered in my riding, recommendations were made to the executive officers there, they would take men on probation for a definite time, and if they were found unsatisfactory, the man responsible for the administration of the office would say: "Your selection is not suitable; the man lacks the essential qualities to win success, and I must ask him to give up the position and ask you to select and recommend another to take his place." Responsibility and power were united We had the power to make recommendations, but the people held us responsible for the selection of proper men with an eye single to the public service. But, remember, all that is changed with this Bill, and we must consider it in the light of the instances to which I shall call the attention of the House. The members of this House are going to be placed in this position, that we are going to have the responsibility without the power. We, as members, are going to be held responsible for appointments made in our ridings of which we know nothing and about which we have not been consulted. It is idle to say that we have no responsibility. Under our form of government you cannot get away from responsibility. We have a responsible government. The men who occupy seats on the front benches are only a committee of this House. The positions which they occupy as members of the Cabinet they occupy only by virtue of the support that we give them. Let a substantial number, enough to command a majority in this House, transfer themselves to the other side of the House for one vote and the ministry who sit before us must resign from office and allow somebody else to take their places unless we should vote to retain them in power or they are sustained by the people. For the appointments that are going to be made the people are going to hold us responsible. I am not asking that we be consulted but what I am asking is that the ministry in carrying out this Bill shall see that a system shall not be established by which nepotism, favouritism and the power of deputy ministers be increased to such an extent as that the positions of members of Parliament shall become so dwarfed as to be a negligible quantity. The reason why I speak of deputy ministers will be apparent when I read certain correspondence that recently passed between a deputy minister and a government officer in my own riding. Less than a month ago a complaint came to me from Kingston that a certain position in the Kingston post office had been filled by the transfer from the Department of Public Works of a stenographer. A stenographer of the Public Works was transferred to the post office in Kingston. A woman who had had so far as I know, no experience whatever in post office work was sent from Ottawa to Kingston and given a position at $1,100 a year. The people said: "Why?," when the public service in Kingston did not demand any such position being filled and there was no need of an appointment being made. They held me responsible for the economical administration of the service in the riding and they wanted me to learn why this appointment had been made. I am not very large and I got warm right straight through because you know little bodies heat up quickly and I was quite warm. I had heard nothing about the appointment when I left Kingston, but after coming here I found why and how it had been done. I hope hon. members will listen to this correspondence because it shows that dangers which I have pointed out are not imaginary but that they are real, and within a short time members will have nothing to do with appointments and a small group centralized in Ottawa will become all powerful while the members of this House will become helpless. That is why I want to read this correspondence to the House. I am going to read names and I am going to be perfectly frank in what I read. Some people are going to get hit. I am going to read the names into this debate because I want the House to realize that if we are going into Civil Service reform we must be careful lest we get instead centralized favouritism. The first letter I read stirred me up, it was a letter dated the 4th of March, 1918. It is a letter addressed to Mr. James Stewart, postmaster of Kingston, and reads thus:

Ottawa, 4th March, 1918.

James Stewart, Esq.,
Postmaster Kingston Post Office,
Kingston.

My dear Postmaster:

Up to a short time ago the Deputy Minister of Public Works, Mr. J. D. Hunter, has had serving him as secretary a gentleman of the name of Mr. Narraway. Mr. Narraway volunteered for active service and his wife, Mrs. M. B. Narraway, is employed in the Public Works Department also, and is desirous of getting a transfer to Kingston, in order that she may be near her husband who is stationed there. Mr. Hunter is very anxious to do what he can to help his secretary by obtaining a transfer to Kingston for his wife, and as a matter of courtesy to another official I would like the matter to be arranged if possible. My reason for writing is to ask when you could possibly make use of her services in the Kingston Post Office.

Mrs. Narraway is a competent stenographer and her chief gives her a most favorable report. I do not wish to overload your staff, but if you could possibly help me in this matter I should esteem it a great personal favour.

Yours very truly,

Robert Fowler,
Assistant Deputy Minister.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will admit I am sympathetic to the returned soldier. I am sympathetic to the man who is anxious and willing to do something for his country, and before I decided to bring this matter before the House, I said to myself: I am going to find out how much salary Mr. and Mrs. Narraway were getting before he undertook the responsibility of being a soldier; and I am going to see what work Mr. Narraway is doing as a soldier. I want to give the gentleman every credit. Mr. Narraway volunteered for active service. He joined the Signal Training Depot, Canadian Expeditionary Force, on the 12th of June, 1917, and when that unit left for overseas, he was transferred to No. 3 Special Service Company owing to his low category. That simply means, Sir, that Mr. Narraway was willing to undertake the responsibility of being a soldier but owing to the state of his health he could not go to the front. I will give the gentleman credit for his good intentions and will say that it was his misfortune and not his fault that he did not go overseas.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I did not catch the reason why you said he could not go overseas.

Mr. NICKLE: He was transferred to No. 3 Special Service Company owing to his low category. He reported for duty at Kingston, and transferred to No. 3 Special Service Company on the 28th of December last, and was detailed for office work at District Headquarters. He is now paid as a sergeant as follows: Pay per diem, $1.35; field allowance per diem, 15 cents; subsistence allowance per diem, 80 cents; making $2.30 in all per day. Mrs. Narraway is in receipt of a separation allowance of $25 per month. If you will compute those amounts, Mr. Chairman, you will observe that Mr. and Mrs. Narraway are receiving $1.139.50 per year from the Government of this country in respect of Mr. Narraway's military services. I find on inquiry from the Auditor General that prior to Mr. Narraway becoming a soldier he received $1,150 from the Public Works Department, with the result that he was short in his pay only $10.50 by virtue of the fact that he became a soldier. He is not getting his board for the reason that he was paid 80 cents subsistence allowance, but in all probability he was getting his uniform—as to that I cannot speak definitely because I do not know. On learning the fact that he was receiving $1,139.50, in lieu of $1,150, which he had previously received, I must say that my sympathies for Mr. Narraway and his peculiar financial embarrassments were not as acute as before I had made inquiry. Now if you will refer to the letter I have just read you will observe, the reason Mr. Hunter wanted the wife of Mr. Narraway transferred to Kingston was so that she could be there with her husband, but the Government would have to pay $1,050 to Mrs. Narraway for the convenience of her being near her husband when the Minister of Finance is telling us that we must have economy in the public service.

Now I want to be quite frank in my recital. I took the matter up with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), who was Acting Postmaster General, and proved to my own perfect satisfaction that he knew nothing whatever about the transfer, and that it had been done behind his back. The moment he found out what had been done active steps were taken to recall Mrs. Narraway from Kingston, and within a few hours of my having put the facts before the Acting Postmaster General Mrs. Narraway was, I am glad to say, advised that Ottawa was a more congenial climate than Kingston for a woman of her temperament. Now how was the arrangement carried out? The assistant deputy minister, Mr. Fowler, told me that Mr. Narraway came to him with Mr. Hunter's card, and with a message that Mr. Hunter was anxious that Mrs. Narraway should be transferred to Kingston, and said that courtesy demanded that one deputy should pay respect to the request and recommendation of another deputy. We were not to consider the expenditure to the country that was involved, we were to consider the courtesy that one deputy owed to another. As a result Mr. Fowler wrote to the postmaster at Kingston, and let me again read the last clause of the letter:

> Mrs. Narraway is a competent stenographer, and her chief gives her a most favourable report. I do not wish to overload your staff, but if you could possibly help me in this matter I would esteem it a great personal favour.

"If you can possibly help me" from the assistant deputy minister to the postmaster at Kingston. In other words, "Do what I ask you to do, if you do not want me to remember that you did not do what I asked you to do." The Kingston postmaster is a man for whom I have regard, and upon receipt of Mr. Fowler's letter he wrote the following day this reply to that gentleman. It is dated Kingston post office, March 5, 1918:

> Robert Fowler,
> Assistant Deputy Minister,
> Dear Mr. Fowler:—
> I beg leave to acknowledge the receipt of your personal letter of the 4th instant.
> Some few weeks ago the department gave me two young girls, but as per my conversation with you this morning—

I will explain that in a moment or two.

Mr. George A. Macdonald has been appointed Inspector of Taxation, and he informs me that he requires a stenographer and has asked the military authorities if they can furnish him with one. I thought it better to telephone you and get the Finance Department to wire Mr. Macdonald not to engage any one until he heard from them.

Mr. Stewart knew that there was no vacancy in the Kingston post office. He knew there was a possibility that there was a stenographer required for Mr. Macdonald, who had recently been appointed Inspector of Taxation, and with an eye possibly to his own interest, and being desirous of pleasing his chief, he said to Mr. Fowler, "Get the Finance Department to get another deputy to get after Mr. Macdonald, and possibly the lady you are so anxious to please may be placed in the Finance Department if she cannot be placed in the post office." There was a danger to him, he did not want to exactly close the door in the face of a superior officer, so he closed his letter with this significant sentence:

If you do not get Mrs. Narraway placed I can find work for her here as two of my senior clerks—men of over 30 years' service—are away on sick leave, and it will be months before they return. I require two male clerks.

Very sincerely yours,

James Stewart,

Postmaster.

Now there is a little hiatus. I had a talk with Mr. Fowler; it was not altogether calm. I also had a talk with Mr. Stewart. Mr. Fowler says that Mr. Stewart called him up, about two weeks later and said, "There is a vacancy in my office, I can take Mrs. Narraway." Mr. Stewart says that no such conversation ever took place.

That was about the day she landed and a few days later I got busy. On April 16, 1918, Robert Fowler writes to James Stewart again, as follows:

James Stewart,
Postmaster,
Kingston.

Dear Mr. Stewart:

With reference to previous correspondence and previous conversation over the telephone I beg to give you the necessary authority to employ Mrs. C. A. Narraway in your office.

Mrs. Narraway is being transferred from the Public Works Department, Inside Service, to your office as a second class clerk, Grade "B", with salary at the rate of $1,100 which is her present salary. She may be paid at that rate as from the 16th instant. Please send the usual forms to this office.

Yours very truly,

Robert Fowler.

Now, I want the House to observe that while the temporary clerks in the Kingston post office are being paid at the rate of $600 a year, or thereabouts, and though I have married men working in Kingston on the temporary staff who cannot get the annual increase because they are on that staff—I have married men working there at $600, and the average highest wages paid to the most efficient stenographers in Kingston do not exceed $600 or $700 a year—here was a woman being transferred to Kingston as a stenographer, to undertake work for which she had no training, at a salary of $1,100. How are you going to have an efficient public service when men who are working for $600 find that somebody is transferred from the Inside Service to the Outside Service at a salary of $1,100, and without experience for the work at all? It is ridiculous to contend that such a thing should be done. Then I have a letter dated April 18, from Mr. Stewart to Mr. Northrup, which reads as follows:

B. M. Northrop, Esq.,
Superintendent Staff Branch,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir:

As per instructions received from Mr. R. Fowler, Assistant Deputy Minister, I beg to report that Mrs. M. B. Narraway, who has been transferred from the Public Works Department, Ottawa, to my office, reported for duty this morning. The usual forms have been forwarded under cover to Mr. Fowler.

I am, sir,

Your obedient servant,

James Stewart,

Postmaster.

Then on April 25, which is the date I learned of this appointment and began my inquiry, the first man I tried to see was Mr. Clarence Jameson, a member of the Civil Service Commission, and I did not approach him in a very friendly frame of mind, because I thought he had made the appointment, and I was prepared to say some things more forcible than polite. He held up his hands and said, "I don't know anything about it; I have never heard of it; do not put the responsibility on me." Nobody could have been more kind than he. He came over to the Deputy Postmaster General with me, and I took it up with Dr. Coulter. I said: "This appointment has been made; there is no justification for it; I want to know who made it." Dr. Coulter told me that he did not know anything about it, and that he would try to find out. And being a man thoroughly zealous for the efficiency of the department, he asked for the correspondence file, which was brought in shortly, and we read it over.

What we found is what I have read. All the correspondence was there except one letter which was not on the file. Then I said to Dr. Coulter: "I want to clean this thing up.' "Very well," he said, "I am quite willing, what shall I do?" I said, "I want you to call up Mr. Stewart, the postmaster at Kingston, and ask him if he ever asked for assistance in Kingston; if Mrs. Narraway was appointed because he directed the matter to the attention of the authorities, and if he needs her there now." He called Mr. Stewart up on the long distance 'phone, and he told me that Mr. Stewart said, "I never asked for her; she was sent to me from Ottawa; I don't want her because there is nothing for her to do." Then Mr. Fowler came in, and there was an exchange of pleasantries, and they were pleasantries, but I think in the end I convinced him that Mrs. Narraway was not actually needed in Kingston. I wanted to be fair to everybody; so on April 25 I wrote to Mr. James Stewart as follows:

Re Appointment Mrs. M. B. Narraway Clerkship Kingston Post Office.

In reference to this appointment, I would appreciate certain information which perhaps can be best had by my directing your attention to certain conversation which I have had to-day.

In a talk I had with Mr. Fowler, Assistant Deputy Postmaster General, he advised me that some time ago he telephoned you to know if there was a vacancy in the Kingston post office to which Mrs. Narraway could be appointed, and that he was interested in her going to Kingston as her husband was engaged in military work there. Mrs. Narraway had been engaged as a clerk in the Public Works Department. That you then advised him that you had no need of help, and that there was no vacancy; you suggested that a position might be had for her under the Inspector of the Finance Department of Income Tax. Mr. Fowler states that about a week later you communicated with him and advised him that if he had not been able to secure a position for Mrs. Narraway, that you could accommodate her in the Kingston post office, 10 a.m. as you were in need of help. On this representation from you Mrs. Narraway was sent to Kingston.

This afternoon I was in Dr. Coulter's office when he called you by long distance telephone, and he told me that in reply to his enquiries you told him—

Remember, I did not hear the conversation; I only heard it as it was repeated to me, and I made that abundantly clear to Mr. Stewart in my letter. This is what I said Dr. Coulter had told me that Mr. Stewart said:

—that you had not asked for Mrs. Narraway's appointment; that you had not made representations that you were in need of assistance; that Mrs. Narraway's appointment was made on instructions from Ottawa, and that her services were not required in Kingston.

I would appreciate an immediate reply as to the correctness of the statements that I have made, and any explanation you may have to offer as to the apparently conflicting declaration alleged to have been made by you. Immediate attention will be appreciated.

Yours sincerely,

That letter was signed by me. Under date April 26, Mr. Stewart writes me as follows:

W. F. Nickle, Esq., K.C., M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—

Referring to yours of the 25th instant re Mrs. M. B. Narraway—allow me to say that on the 4th March Mr. Fowler wrote to me and said that he would like to have Mrs. Narraway transferred from Ottawa to Kingston where her husband was employed. I advised him to try and secure employment for her with the Taxation Inspector. This could not be arranged. On the 13th March Miss Allen, one of the young ladies in the Reg. office, did not report for duty, and I informed Mr. Narraway when he called here that she was absent from the office and two other clerks—Mr. Wells and Mr. Darcy were also absent.

I want you to observe that although Mr. Stewart told Mr. Fowler that there was no vacancy for a woman in the office, Mr. Fowler had told Mr. Stewart that he wanted Mrs. Narraway sent to Kingston, and Mr. Narraway, so Mr. Stewart says, who was in Kingston, kept dinning it into Mr. Stewart's ears. It was obvious that Mr. Stewart was to understand that his superior officer wanted Mrs. Narraway sent to Kingston. I might say of the two employees referred to that Mr. Darcy was dead and Mr. Wells was ill. The letter goes on:

He [Mr. Narraway] must have reported this to Mr. Fowler. I had no further communication with him until this letter of the 16th reached me stating that she had been transferred to my office. The enclosed copy of the correspondence will give you all the information.

I have read this correspondence to the House.

I might add that Miss Allen's return to duty made Mrs. Narraway's services unnecessary. Mr. Fowler instructed me by a wire to have Mrs. Narraway return to Ottawa and she left on the noon train to-day.

Sincerely yours,
James Stewart,
Postmaster.

So much for the correspondence. Let me read a section of the Civil Service Act. Section 50 reads:

An exchange of positions between two officers serving in different departments, or in different divisions of the same department, and the filling of a vacancy in one department by a transfer from another division of the same department, may be authorized by the Governor in Council to be made without examination of either officer.

2. Such exchange or transfer shall be made without increase of salary of either of the persons exchanging or transferred.

That section lays down the principle that no transfer can take place without the consent of the Governor in Council, and yet Mrs. Narraway was transferred to Kingston by the Assistant Deputy Postmaster General without any Order in Council being passed, and nobody apparently knew anything about it until I unearthed it, because nothing was said in regard to the change in her pay. And this is proved by an inquiry I made of the Auditor General. I wanted to find out in respect to what department Mrs. Narraway was drawing pay, whether the Public Works Department was paying her, or whether the thing was being done as a fraud on that department or the Post Office Department. I wrote the Auditor General in the latter part of April or early in May. Here is what Mr. Sutherland, the Assistant Auditor General, says in reply, under date of May 2:

Mrs. Narraway was paid as a clerk in the same department—

That is the Public Works Department.

—up to April 15th last. Her salary since last July was $1,050 per annum.

The Public Works Department paid the salary up to April 15, 1918, the day she left that department, but there was no record so far as the Assistant Auditor General's letter shows, in the Auditor General's Department to show that she had been transferred to Kingston. It was not until I began to stir the matter up that the attention of the Government was directed to the fact that this change had been made behind the back of the minister and practically behind the back of everybody else, because I knew nothing about it until the change had been made. Any Civil Service reform proposed by this Government should be carried out in an honest and straightforward manner. As an independent Unionist, I will stand behind them if they play the game fairly, but if they do not play the game fairly; if deputies are not restrained, I shall be quite as candid in my criticism of ministers as I am in my criticism of their deputies. I believe that the ministers are thoroughly sincere in their desire to carry out the Act, and what I say to-night is not in the nature of a threat. I know that they will appreciate the spirit in which I make these remarks. If these deputies want to advance the interests of their friends, it is not fair to the Unionist party that they should do it at the expense of the political prestige of members of this House. When I raise the point that this is an irregularity; when I say that the public service is losing $1,050 or $1,100 a year that might be saved, I am told that it is none of my business, and, in the language of a Chesterfield, I am committed to a region more celebrated for its heat than for its frigidity. I go to a minister or to a deputy, and say that I object. I am told, in all politeness: "What do you know about these things? The efficiency of the service must be maintained, and we propose to maintain it in such a way as we think best." Well, the efficiency of the service is to be maintained by transferring to the post office a woman who has been a stenographer, and who, so far as I know, has had absolutely no experience in post office work. The efficiency of the service is to be maintained by sending a woman to Kingston at a salary of $1,100 a year, a salary larger by hundreds of dollars than that of men who have worked conscientiously and well in that department for years. The efficiency of the service is to be maintained and the public cheerfulness is to be kept up by the payment of $1,100, through the intrigue of a deputy minister, in order that an officer doing clerical work in Kingston might have the privilege of having his wife by his side. I tell members of the Government that the country will not stand for this; now is the time when things of this kind should be crushed in their inception.

Examinations to determine efficiency may be all right, but I went through school and through college and I have known many men who, though standing high in examinations because of their facile pen and retentive memory, were not worth much when it came to administration. I do not think I am going beyond the mark or reflecting on the brilliant students with whom I was associated in my university days when I say that the men who have gone furthest have not been the men who got 85 and 95 per cent in their university examinations, but those who had a broad knowledge of human nature, who understood the commonplaces of life, who learned how to do things and had courage, pluck and initiative. If the Civil Service Commission gets down to the simple basis of examination and personality is forgotten, the public service will be as dead as the fungus that attaches itself to a rapidly decaying tree.

The Government served on me several months ago an Order in Council which I welcomed as I had welcomed but few documents, because it met with a principle that I desired to put into effect. This document said that in the matter of appointments preference should be given to returned soldiers, to the men who had fought for their country. Every recommendation that I made after that Order in Council came to me, and many recommendations that I made before, I gave to returned soldiers; but since I have lost the power of recommending and my control of appointments, returned soldiers have been and are being neglected, because the men who have the power have not the sympathy; efficiency counts more to them than respect for the obligation that we owe to the men who went overseas. When we stood on platforms throughout Ontario and appealed to the men to undertake the country's cause, we said to them: "Don the uniform and go to the front; if you are disabled we will pay you a pension, and whether you are injured or not we will endeavour to secure employement for you if the position that you filled before you went is gone." The ministers of this Government, in the organization of their departments, should not let efficiency blind them to the duty that they owe to the returned men. I do not say that efficiency should be overlooked. We must have efficiency; we cannot put men in positions to do work that they have not the ability to do. But before you appoint an official, before you make a temporary man permanent or before you readjust your staff—there are ministers sitting in the House who know to what I allude; I am not going further—it is fair that you should make careful inquiries to see whether returned men, particularly if disabled, are available, and to see to it, if they are available, that they are given preference over everybody else. I do not say this in any jingoistic spirit, or with any desire to make myself solid, so to speak, with the returned soldiers. I am appealing on what I think are sound national grounds; I am trying to enunciate what I believe to be the sentiments of the great masses of the people.

I wish to take up the question of Civil Service pay to the men who went overseas and to say a word or two with regard to that Order in Council to which the attention of the House was so forcibly directed to-night by the member for London (Mr. Cronyn). When the German troops went through Belgium, a certain German chancellor said of the treaty guaranteeing Belgium's rights: "It is only a scrap of paper; it is something that is not to be respected." That statement of international morals shocked the world and was the foundation of the dislike—shall I say, the hate?—that has arisen in the hearts of neutral nations against Germany. What is this Government doing if it cancels the Order in Council under which agreement was made with the men who went overseas that their Civil Service salaries should be continued? This Government should consider carefully the entire question of the position of members of the Civil Service who have gone overseas. If a man who formerly was a member of the Service has gone overseas and would fall within the class of men who would be called out under the present Orders in Council—that is unmarried men within the ages specified—it does not seem unreasonable that his pay should stop, because the Government would have the right to recall him to Canada and he would automatically then become liable to military service and would have to take the military pay that goes to his rank. But when married men, or men not within the classes now called, voluntarily enlisted for overseas service, many of them laying aside substantial salaries and taking positions of great inferiority in the army, it is a great injustice to them—particularly to the married men—that the Government should cut off their pay and make their wives and children do work which they never did before. The other evening I had a talk with the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) in regard to this matter, and I want to do myself the honour of believing he was very favourably impressed with what I had to say. Speaking as I do to-night, I want to raise this point, hoping the members of this House will express sentiments similar to those which I have expressed, and will make the Prime Minister understand that we, the representatives of the people, believe that the national compact must be carried out, and that if anything is done with reference to a reduction of pay it will be only with regard to those men who come within the classes called out and that the others should get the pay we agreed to give them. Anything else would be radically unfair and unjust; it would be a blot on the national escutcheon, and I do not believe the Canadian people want it said that they have broken faith with the men who have gone to the front on representations made by the late Government.

The points I want to emphasize are these, and I want to say them very quickly: I believe, if the Civil Service Act is going to be made a success, in the first place the principle must be recognized that local appointments must be first given to those in the locality, provided they have the ability to do the work. My second principle is this, that preference must be given to the returned soldier particularly if he is disabled, and that before appointments are made careful, honest inquiry must be had to see if returned soldiers are available. My third principle is this, that too much attention must not be paid to mere academic qualifications, but that the question of personality, of individuality, of administrative force, must be considered; because I say it to-night, in all seriousness to the Government, in all kindness to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) who has many appointments to make in Kingston, that if he appoints as guards or instructors or keepers in the Kingston penitentiary men who have only academic qualifications as a merit, without regard to their physical qualities and without regard to their high sense of truth and honesty, he will soon find a system of trafficking has entered his institution which will destroy it. I do not know how the Civil Service Commission intend to work out this legislation. I do not know from what source they are going to get their information. I am not anxious that they should consult me. I say frankly that, if they consult me and if the people know the responsiblity is on me for recommendations and an expression of opinion, then the Civil Service Commission should act on the representations I make to them; and if they are not prepared to act on my representations, then I do not want them to ask me for recommendations. If the responsibility for the recommendations is going to be given to me, then they must give me the privilege of having it known amongst my people that if I have the responsibility the recommendations that I make are followed, and that I am not going to be held responsible for positions which are filled, in regard to which I have nothing whatever to say.

As I began in saying that the administrative officers of the Crown in Ottawa will, without doubt, be influenced in making appointments to make selections from those with whom they have a sympathy, I sincerely trust that what I have put on record to-night in this House will be seriously considered by the Government. I put it on record because I want some specific instance to show that the dread expressed by the gentlemen who sit around me is not a mere chimerical fear, but an actual one at this particular time, that the system that we on the outside dread is beginning to get established, and if something is not done soon, Civil Service improvement will, in my judgment, become disrupted; the people will become disgusted with the Civil Service Act, and those of us who would like to see the public service elevated and improved, are going to see the whole thing brought into public indifference, if not into contempt.

[Mr. Nickle.]

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I shall speak for just a minute, because the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) has taken up fifty per cent of the time that I intended to occupy on this question. From what I have listened to this evening, it is clear to me that hon. members are feeling somewhat sorry that the patronage system is passing out of existence. We are absolutely losing the point of view of the Bill which is now before the House. The principle underlying the Bill is this: In the past we have had so many people seeking to get something in a manner other than the rightful manner; instead of making efficiency the qualification for a position the erroneous principle of party adherence has been a dominant qualification, and as you had more party adherents than you had positions, the cries of those who had been denied the spoils became much louder than the shouts of exultation on the part of those who had secured positions.

The Bill which is to-day presented for our consideration is one which commends itself to every right-thinking person who wants to get away from the principle of dispensing patronage on account of the fact that you are elected a member of Parliament. All hon. members will remember the statement made in the House by Sir Clifford Sifton, whose speech on the need of Civil Service reform swept away the last vestige of Liberal opposition to the principle. Amongst other things he said this:

> The present system is a source of great trouble to all, involving, as it does, the constant harassing of members by their supporters for something which it was impossible to make go round all.

Many cases similar to that which has been cited this evening by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) could be cited by hon. members. You are very lucky to have a Minister of Justice this evening, for something took place in his department that I did not like. But for a solitary case which may not be to the advantage of the constituency that I represent I do not propose to condemn the whole Bill. If the cases multiply themselves to the extent that I see that there is not honesty nor sincerity in the Government in its endeavour to remove the evils that patronage brings, I hope I shall not lose my voice, but, like the hon. member for Kingston, let me tell you, Sir, some Scotchmen can rise to a pitch of heat. It is in the power of the members of this House to take this Bill and to make of it what they like by refusing to pass clause after clause. There is in the Bill a provision dealing with returned soldiers. If it is not in accordance with the wish of the members of this House, it is within our power to say that we will not pass it as it stands, and that we will have it passed in a certain form. I do not see why we should not pass from clause to clause and make this Bill applicable as soon as possible. There is on the part of some hon. members a desire to maintain in their control the patronage which they had in the past. I am opposed to that principle, and I shall be pleased to support the Bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON: The Government introduced this Bill in response to what I thought was an almost unanimous request of the country, and when they find such criticism as has been indulged in to-night, not by the two previous speakers, but by others, they must think of the old couplet:

> You shall and you shan't, you will and you won't;
> You'll be damned if you do, you'll be damned if you don't.

We give the Government credit for endeavouring honestly and effectively to deal with this patronage question. It is perfectly true that almost any hon. member could pick the Bill to pieces if he chose, but what we want is something along constructive lines. My hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Mackie) referred to the deliverances of Sir Clifford Sifton on the question of patronage. He was undoubtedly a man with very great political experience and in a position to speak with authority. Sir Clifford told the country in a public address that the patronage system was a curse, and I think every hon. member, if talked to some months ago, would have agreed that it was a curse, and there went up a shout of approval throughout the country when ministers of the Union Government announced that an end was to be put to the patronage system. Now the minister has brought down a Bill. It is true that almost anybody could pick holes in it, but let him who is disposed to pull the Bill to pieces tell the Government what he would do under the circumstances. I have not observed any hon. member who has risen in his place to denounce the Bill offer a valuable suggestion. We all agree that patronage has been a great curse in the past. The Government is making an honest endeavour to meet the question and deal with it fairly and effectively. We have had public deliverances of the able Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) on this question. Pledges have been made to the country that patronage would be abolished, and the Government is endeavouring to do it. Let us join then with the Government in at least making the experiment. No matter what we do, I do not think we could possibly have a worse system than has prevailed in the past years, and I would appeal to hon. members at least to give the Government credit for the earnest efforts it is making, and let us deal with the Bill clause by clause and pass it. Let us make the experiment, and then I believe we shall all find that a great reform has been accomplished. I am not afraid to take the responsibility. I do not believe that all these deputy ministers are fiends incarnate. I do not believe they are going to conspire in order to "do" the people. I am sure when we listened to the petty intrigue that was displayed in the case of the deputy minister cited by the hon. member for Kingston, there must have come to the mind of every hon. member the conviction that that man at least should be dismissed from office. Public opinion is such that no deputy minister and no set of deputy ministers will dare defy it; they are amenable to public opinion. I do not fear the results of the administration of patronage by the Civil Service Commission. We have at its head Hon. Dr. Roche, a man whom I have known personally for thirty-five years, a man of the highest probity, of the finest integrity, and of spotless public reputation. I believe that as head of the Civil Service Commission he will endeavour to administer this Act in the interest of the people. Let us trust him. As a representative of a constituency, I am not afraid of having the inspector of the district in which my riding is located come out and find the best man for any particular office. He may make a mistake. Perhaps I might make a mistake if I exercised the patronage. I shall be glad to assist him if he asks my advice in any matter. I believe if we give this commission our hearty support and our confidence we shall find we have accomplished a very much greater reform in the country than we have ever dreamed of.

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Lethbridge): I have been surprised at the diverse views expressed on this measure in committee to-day. I thought hon. members were unanimously in favour of appointments of the Civil Service being taken out of their hands and put in the hands of an independent commission. I have had very little experience with patronage, but the knowledge I have had leads me to say that I do not want anything to do with it. Another thing I should like to see in our Government service in every department inside and outside is business administration. Under the patronage system we do not get business administration. Why should we not have the same principles adopted in our departments of Government that the Canadian Pacific adopts in its departments, or that the banks adopt throughout the length and breadth of Canada? When we have such a system in vogue we shall have efficient administration, and men who go into the Government service will realize that efficiency will win recognition and promotion. Under the patronage system that certainly does not exist, for a man may be in the service for twenty or twenty-five years and give the best of satisfaction to the community where he is serving the Government, and some person may come along at that period and chop off his head because he does not like him. You cannot have efficiency in any department of government under a system of that kind. This Bill may be full of faults; the patronage system is certainly full of more faults. I am prepared to trust this Bill for the present, and when we find the faults we can remedy them, until we get a measure that will provide for efficient service in the departments of Government throughout this Dominion.

There is another point I should like to emphasize. I am an advocate of economy in the public service. At the same time I do not believe that we treat the efficient officials in the service of the country as we should treat them. I know of two instances in my own city where young women who had been in the post office some years and had gained good experience, so that they were probably the best clerks in the office, have recently taken positions in banks in Lethbridge at a considerable increase in salary. If these young women were valuable to a bank they were equally valuable to the Post Office Department, and they should have been treated as valuable clerks in the service.

Mention has been made of the payment of certain grades of the service, particularly the letter carriers. I agree that those men should be given better treatment than they have received in the past. The cost of living is advancing all the time, but the salaries of these men and of other men in different departments of the public service are not advancing proportionately, and as a result the Government is losing the services of some of its best men, because they are attracted to other positions that offer better salaries. I should like to see the Government service put on a business basis, and men paid a salary and promoted according to their merits, and if this Bill will provide such a system I believe the people of Canada will strongly favour this Government for having introduced it and, I hope, for having passed it at this session.

Mr. GEORGE B. NICHOLSON: After the prolonged discussion we have had on the principle of this Bill one almost hesitates to interject another remark. But I feel I should be unfair to myself and to my constituents were I to remain silent in the face of the criticism that has been levelled against the principle of the measure. As I listened to the expressions of opinion from a number of hon. gentlemen who took part in the early discussion of this Bill, the thought came to me what a study in psychology hon. gentlemen presented. I have taken some little interest in politics during the whole of my life and I do not think I have yet heard a member of Parliament on the public platform, particularly if he was berating the party in power, who did not curse the patronage system. That has been the theme ever since I first knew anything about politics. How are we going to get rid of the patronage system unless we make an honest effort? If the details are not right, as the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Mackie) and preceding speakers have said, we should go through it clause by clause and make them right. If we find when we come back here after a year that there are some things which we should amend we can then make the changes which are necessary. The whole argument of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) as to what took place in the Kingston post office seems to be a justification of this Bill. If the hon. member for Kingston had been a little more human, if he had had those weaknesses that are applicable to most of us, if he had had the disposal of the patronage in Kingston and if the deputy postmaster general had presented the case to him as he did to the postmaster in Kingston, in all probability the same action would have been taken and we would not have had the hon. member for Kingston to check up what had been done. Every member of this House will have in his own hands not only the right but the power to see what is being done. If the deputy minister of any department makes an appointment in my constituency I shall consider it my duty to find out all about it. If the members of this House are doing their duty as the representatives of their constituencies they will see to it that the appointments are as they should be and that an efficient service is given. One word with regard to the suggestion offered by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan). I agree heartily with what he says that if we are going to get an efficient civil service reform we must put it on a business basis and get it nearer to what is being done by private companies. Instead of saying that deputy ministers are as we have had them represented to-night I would say: Place the deputy minister in charge of the department, hold him responsible for the efficiency of the organization of the department and leave the whole thing in his hands. If the Canadian Pacific railway appoints a general superintendent they will not say to him that he cannot dismiss a man if he is inefficient.

Mr. BEST: Would you ask the Government to dismiss a deputy minister if it is proven that he has done wrong?

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I have not the slightest doubt that the Government will deal with the deputy ministers if they have done wrong. If they do not the members of the House can deal with them. I am not going to put any question to the Government with regard to what they may do about the case raised by the hon. member for Kingston, that is a matter between the Government and the hon. member. Both of the political parties have been clamouring for years for Civil Service reform and the abolition of patronage. Patronage has been recognized as the curse of the Civil Service, and when we are asked to take one step in the direction of getting rid of it let us respond by passing this Bill.

Mr. SHEARD: I want to say a word in support of this Bill. Representing a city where we have been administering patronage for a long while, I want to say that if there is anything in my judgment that contributes to a lack of efficiency in the public service it is the administration of patronage as in the past. Hon. members have spoken in this House about their influence in reference to patronage. I have had to do in an indirect way with, or have seen administered, the patronage system of Toronto pretty well in all the ridings, and I do not believe there is a single member from the city of Toronto who has had the slightest voice in the distribution of the patronage there. It is left to the various ward associations, and the member of Parliament is almost invariably constrained to support their recommendations. Sometimes he experiences considerable difficulty because there are men pulling one way and the other and he has to do the best he can in the dilemma. I heartily commend the Bill to the House. We should be glad to get rid of the patronage question, which I contend this proposed Bill will do most effectively if it is thoroughly and properly lived up to. It is just like anything else in that proper methods must be adopted in carrying it out. You can talk about the administration of the Canadian Pacific railway or any other business organization, but to have efficiency you must have good men and hold them responsible. You must have first class men in charge of the various branches of the Government and hold these men responsible for the administration if the proper results are to be forthcoming. If you have inefficient men administering the Act, I do not care what its provisions may be, the whole thing will fall down. It is up to the Government to see to it that the deputies are thoroughly qualified to administer their departments, and if this is done we will get the service that the country demands and expects. I realize quite fully, as has been illustrated upon the floor of this House to-night by the case cited by the hon. member for Kingston, that there is danger. If this matter does not receive the close scrutiny of the various members of the Government there may be developed in the city of Ottawa a bureaucratic officialdom which will be twenty times worse than the patronage system, bad as it is. We have had an illustration in the question asked by the hon. ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes), in reference to the Auditor-General, in reply to which there is on record on the Hansard of this House the statement that six or seven members of the Auditor General's own family have been provided for at comparatively lucrative salaries. An hon. gentleman stated that he was a Scotchman. I do not want to reflect on some of my hon. friends opposite, but somebody has defined the Scotchman as a man who kept the Sabbath and everything else he could lay his hands on. This gentleman, being a Scotchman, and true to his principles, seems to be tenaciously holding on to everything he can, and he seems to have a sort of family compact under his own roof. I have no hesitation in saying, irrespective of what his nationality may be, that he is utterly unfitted for the public service if that is his idea of the proper administration and enforcement of the law in any department of the Government.

With reference to the question raised by the hon. member for Kingston, if the facts are as stated, I unhesitatingly say that it is the duty of the Government to dispense with that man's services without any further delay. We want the ministers to understand that they must instruct their departments to carry on the public service in such a way as to produce efficiency, and if they do they will be supported by the country and by the members of this House.

While I say that I want to add that there are some branches of the public service that are suffering. Reference has been made to the services of the postmen. The postmen are scandalously underpaid in the city of Toronto. You have postmen who have been working in the city of Toronto for ten or fifteen years receiving $700 a year and trying to live and pay the high rents of that city, something which is an absolute impossibility; you cannot do it in the large centres. The postmen should be well paid—every one working for the Government ought to be well paid. If a man is efficient he ought to be promoted and he should know that from the time he enters the public service, and as long as he discharges the duties of his office faithfully, the country will appreciate and promote him and he will eventually receive the highest position available in the work in which he is engaged.

If you are going to put over his head people coming from outside, you will be doing something that will not contribute to the efficiency of the service, and I think that in this Bill the Civil Service Commission should be instructed to consider the appointment of local men to local positions as far as possible. There are cases where that is not possible, but if it is at all possible regard should be paid to that policy.

Now, with reference to the question of examinations. I have been conducting examinations of students for over thirty years, and I desire to say in reference to examinations in medicine, as illustrated in the colleges of this country, that if I wanted a man who was most impractical, the most inefficient, as a rule, for practical work, I would take a student who had confined himself to preparing to pass an examination, and I would probably get the most impractical man I could possibly get for a practical job. I would twenty times rather have a man who had good common horse sense, integrity and alertness, and an eye which was pretty keen and cunning, and give that man charge of a department. In scholastic attainments—in reading, writing and arithmetic—he might be lacking and might probably not be able to do a single sum in quadratic equations or algebra, but he would make a mighty efficient, good public servant, and I think every corporation in the Dominion will bear me out when I give such testimony on the floor of this House.

Mr. CROTHERS: What kind of an examination would you subject him to?

Mr. SHEARD: I would first take into consideration what work he had been engaged in. If a shorthand writer who had been in that work for five or six years as an ordinary stenographer wanted to take charge of the post office in the city of Toronto I would undertake to say the chances are that she would be an entire and utter failure. I would govern myself by all the circumstances, I would form my opinion to some extent on the past history of the applicant, his or her experience, and the work that he or she had done, and the efficiency displayed in the particular branch in which the party had been engaged. If I were to undertake to give an opinion on a lawsuit, for instance, as to the grounds for submitting a case to the Court of Appeal, I would probably make a fool of myself, and I have not the slightest doubt that if a lawyer who undertook to give an opinion upon a complex medical case the same thing might be said. We must have regard for the work, vocation, and life experience of the applicant, unless we are going to start them in the public service from the lowest position up, and if you want an experienced and efficient man in that way surely you have got to give him some guarantee of continuity of service, to support him in his promotions, and to vouchsafe that recognition which ought to always follow efficient service.

A word now in reference to the returned soldier. I hope the country will not go back upon its pledges to our men who have gone overseas. I am not at all concerned with any fear that the boys who have fought and sacrificed in France and Flanders are going to be unloaded on the country on their return to the Dominion. To the extent of the country's ability and power I hope these men will be recognized, and I hope that the Civil Service Commission, who will be charged specifically with the duty, will see that every returned man, whether his sleeve be empty or full, will receive any available position he is qualified to fill, and that no examinations will be allowed to stand in the way of his receiving it. That is what the people of this country, if I understand their wishes, desire. They mean to keep faith with the returned soldiers, and they ought to keep faith with them. I venture the prediction that no Government could long stand that dares to break a single pledge which it has made with the boys who have gone overseas to fight for liberty and the preservation of our homes. For that reason I submit that the first claim upon the Government, the first claim for consideration upon the members of this House, the first claim upon any commission, over and above every other test and every other consideration, is the claim of the returned soldier, and if his qualifications are in any degree commensurate with the requirements of the place for which a man is needed, the returned soldier should have the job.

I want to close with a word of commendation with respect to the Bill in general, and to congratulate the Government for bringing down even a tentative measure which will, in a sense, do away with this farce of patronage. For it is a farce, the placing of men in the public service who are utterly disqualified for any such duties. In the past we have got about the worst class of men for the job, speaking generally, and if this Bill will work the slightest improvement, if it will improve the service in the slightest degree, I say let us give the Bill a trial; let us give it our hearty support; let us give the Government an opportunity to carry out its pledge in this regard. For my part, I will be very glad to assist the Government to the utmost of my ability in strengthening the hand of the departments, in establishing the principle that the minister at the head of a department shall run it absolutely and entirely, and that the deputy under him shall be responsible to him. If we do this I say, in all confidence, that we shall then get a degree of efficiency in the public service that up to now this country has never known.

Mr. PARDEE: Much has been already said, and practically very little remains to be said on the subject of this Bill. Doubtless, as we consider the measure clause by clause, we shall find many provisions that are not workable. But there can be no doubt about the fact that there has been a demand throughout the country for many years that patronage should be abolished and some measure of Civil Service reform brought about. That was a pledge that was given to the country, and something to which I personally pledged myself. I have always been desirous of Civil Service reform, and am equally strongly in its favour to-day. The Bill may not be perfect, there are undoubtedly some provisions that are imperfect; but we owe it to the country, whether this Bill be perfect or imperfect, that a start shall be made in the way of abolishing patronage and introducing Civil Service reform.

We have heard from the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) to-night the statement that he could look through the window of a departmental office and see from twenty to thirty clerks, not one-third of whom would be working. To my mind that is one of the principal objections to the present system of patronage, which simply means this: That the member, and the Government through the member, is very often overwhelmed with applications to appoint this man or that man to office because his financial position is not such that he can continue to keep himself. As a consequence what happens? From goodness of heart, from motives of humanity—and very often, and very largely, through political considerations—men are put into departments of the service who are no more needed than the fifth wheel of a coach. I venture to make the prediction that if a proper Civil Service Bill is finally enacted by the House—not perhaps this session, but with amendments next session, and amendments the session after that, if necessary—a saving can be effected in the civil list of this country of from thirty to forty per cent. If you take the cost of the whole Civil Service of the country as it stands to-day, and our overhead charges generally, they run into figures that are absolutely astonishing. Hon. members owe it to the country to aid in curtailing expenditure in every way they possibly can in order to meet the great needs of Canada both now and in the time to come.

Therefore, I say again that although there are some provisions in this Bill that I do not agree with at all, we will have an opportunity to discuss these when the Bill is taken up clause by clause. Too much power is placed in the hands of the deputy minister, because although it is said that the commission finally has the appointment, yet, mark you, Sir, the appointment is made through the recommendation of the deputy minister, which leaves in the deputy's hands very great power. I do not believe, so far as I can see at the present time, that the method of taking a person from Toronto and transferring him to Windsor or Sarnia or somewhere else is practicable. It appears to me there are just as good brains in Toronto as in Ottawa, and vice versa—just as good brains in one part of Canada as in another part. Under the proposed system of competitive examinations there will be a waiting list, and the Bill should empower the commission to see to it that appointments to local offices shall be made from successful candidates in the locality where the office is to be filled. To my mind, that is the only way to work it out. I shall not discuss the sections farther until the Bill is taken up clause by clause. I heartily agree with all that has been said regarding the returned soldier. I want to refer to the circular mentioned by the hon. member for Kingston. We were all told that the department sent out a notice, very properly to my mind, that the returned soldier when competent should be appointed to any vacancy occurring in the Civil Service. In some way, Sir, that has yet to be worked out. We have no right, nor should we have a right, to break in any way the implied contract made with these men who are deserving of it. These remarks, I know, do not touch the very essence of the Bill, but to my mind that is something that the Government ought, and must make an effort, to do, and in doing which it will be commended by the members of this House and by the country generally.

Mr. MORPHY: I support the principle of the Bill. Personally, I have not been troubled with patronage in my riding, and I cannot fall in line with the gentlemen who have spoken of the tribulations coming through it. I want to make a plea that may come before the members of the commission and the Government to deal with the under dog in the matter of salaries. Take the letter carriers in the cities, the rural mail delivery men, and the collectors of letters, and all the inferior services, where men are working for 312 days in all kinds of weather throughout the country at the munificient salary of about

[Mr. Pardee.]

$700 a year, many of them with a wife and four or five children. It is about time that the country awakened to the great disparity in pay and salaries between the officials I see about Ottawa, who are ensconced in their lovely offices supplied with all modern conveniences, and the men in the country who have to plod wearily through wet and snow and heat and cold doing the drudgery work of the country on a mere pittance of $700 or $800 a year. I hope the Civil Service Commission which, to my mind, is composed of a splendid body of men—men of careful habits, kindly disposition coupled with, I think the necessary firmness to do a splendid duty—will take note of the remarks that have been made by many members not only as to the returned soldier but as to those other branches of the service which are so badly underpaid. I would like the minister to take note of the branch I have referred to and go over the whole range of it and see if a better scale cannot be brought forward so that the country will not be held up to opprobrium and shame for the way they are treating what may be called the "inferior" service though their service is extremely valuable. I agree with the remarks made and the points raised by the hon. member for Kingston, which seem to show the necessity for this Bill. Such grave irregularities could not have happened under the Civil Service Commission's administration; no deputy would have dared to do what was done.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: He would not have the power to do so under the proposed law.

Mr. MORPHY: I would like to ask the minister if the system is going somewhat to pieces because the Postmaster General, Mr. Blondin, is not at home. If he had been at home, does the minister believe that any deputy would have dared to do what was done? "When the cat's away the mice will play." Why is the Postmaster General not here? Why is his position not filled? There are plenty of Liberal-Unionist members on this side of the House; there is lots of room for them in that place. I think it is a public scandal that the position is not filled to-day. Who is it being kept open for? I think that is a matter that had better be attended to, so that the Government shall be complete. I also wish to argue the same point with regard to the deputies. It is all right to say that the Civil Service Commission have the power; they have not the power. Humanly speaking they cannot have the power to override the deputy. The Civil Service Commission is a tribunal with mixed powers. There is a quality of power. When the clause comes up, I propose, if I can, to shift the responsibilities and the privileges that are being given to and imposed upon the deputies to the ministers themselves. I think the ministers should take the responsibility of recommendations to the Civil Service Commission. You may tell me: "Oh, the minister doesn't know." Well, he has to know, and, to my mind, he has his deputy, and the deputy will know, and he will tell the minister. If we are going to have an up-to-date, efficient reform in the Civil Service there must be ministerial responsibility and not deputy-ministerial responsibility, and I propose to argue as strongly as I can that the minister, not the deputy, shall take the power and bear the responsibility. As to the commission itself, I heartily approve of it. It is about time that efficient administration in the public servce is brought about, and I believe the Government are on the right track. They have a good personnel in the commission. There is no mention in the Bill as to what the secretary of the commission shall be paid. There is provision for the salaries of the commissioners—

Sir SAM HUGHES: It should be increased.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. member says it should be increased. As a corollary to my argument about the under dog, I would like to put on record what I find to be the salaries paid to some of the deputies. The Paymaster General, Militia, gets $6,000, and the Accountant General, $6,000. Other salaries are as follows:

Commissioner of Commerce, $6,000.
Railways: General Consulting Engineer, $6,000.
Chief Engineer, Western Division, $6,000.
Military Hospitals Commission, Director General, $6,000; Under Secretary, $5,000.

I have never heard who the Under-secretary of the Military Hospitals Commission is, but he gets a pretty fair salary.

Deputy Fuel Controller, $6,000
Chief Commissioner, Railway Commission, $12,500; Assistant Chief Commissioner, $9,000; Deputy Commissioner, $8,000; two Commissioners, each $8,000.
International Waterways Commissioners, each $7,500.

What have these commissioners been doing for the last two or three years? Have they had sittings? Have they made a report? This commission, I understand is in idleness, and the country is paying them this money. This list proceeds:

Secretary, War Board, $6,000.
Cost of Living Commissioner, $7,000.
Chairman, Scientific and Industrial Research Commission, $10,000.
Assistant to Minister of Railways, $5,000.
Chief Engineer, $5,000.
Law Clerk, $5,000.
Chief Architect, Public Works, $5,000.

No building is going on; everything is tied down in the Public Works Department, but the salaries are kept going.

Chairman of Food Board, $7,000.

A very important position; the Department of Food Control is one of the biggest departments we have.

Pension Commissioners, each $5,000.

Several others are also paid $5,000 a year. Meanwhile rural mail carriers get $450 a year for travelling twenty miles a day, winter and summer, wet or dry, in heat or in cold. Postmen who trudge through the streets of cities, most of them married men with large families, get $2.75 or $3 a day. These are the under dogs. I have given only the fringe of the long list which I have before me. It is a public scandal and a shame if the Civil Service Commission and the Government cannot get together and do something to give these men better remuneration, allowing those who receive the larger salaries which I have mentioned a reasonable competence to live upon. With regard to the returned soldier, I agree that the examinations should not be too hard. I have confidence in the personnel of the Civil Service Commission; I believe that they will do the fair thing for the returned soldier. It is unfair to say in advance that they will set trick questions; I have too high a regard for the men who constitute the Commission at present to believe that. They are men of methodical habits and kindliness of disposition; they have the best interests of the country at heart. The returned soldier will find in the Civil Service Commission a friend at court who will give them a fair show and do all they can for them consistent with their fitness for any positions for which they are applicants. I have great pleasure in supporting the Bill and in commending the principle of it and I hope that we shall be able to get its various clauses in such shape that the country's interests may be served and the Service benefited.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This afternoon I requested one of the members of the Civil Service Commission to prepare a statement showing, as far as was possible in the short time given him, what work had been done by the Commission since the passage of the Order in Council on the 13th of February, and the manner in which that work was done. I have that statement under my hand, but before reading certain portions of it I want to say a word or two with reference to the principle of the Bill. I believe strongly in the principle of this Bill and trust that the House will accept it practically as it has been presented. Members of Parliament should, I think, more than any other class of the people, support any legislation which has in view the elimination of patronage. It is not fair to members of Parliament or to the country that the representatives of the people should waste their time over matters of patronage as they have in years gone by. Public servants are selected to perform a service to the State, therefore the State should select them in the manner which seems best and which will produce the greatest efficiency. The member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) expresses the view that this is an inopportune time to introduce a reform of this character. On the contrary, I believe that this Bill is introduced at an opportune moment. It is the first time in the history of our country that such legislation has been possible, and when this Parliament expires, having passed this Bill, it will have rendered a greater service to Canada than any Parliament that has existed since Confederation. Not only is it desirable politically that this Bill should be enacted; it is an economic necessity at this period in our history. Greater efficiency in the public service will result, and the public business will be disposed of much more economically than it has been in the past. The case to which the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) referred is a very regrettable one indeed, but under the patronage system that same thing has happened every week of the year. Under the present Bill that could not possibly happen. The section of the present Civil Service Act to which the member for Kingston referred was not applicable to the case at all; nothing in the present Civil Service Act would prevent the Assistant Deputy Postmaster General from doing what he did—at least, that is my reading of the Act. Nevertheless, I thank the member for Kingston for bringing the facts of this case to the notice of the committee; he has simply performed his duty in doing so, and his action cannot fail to have a salutary effect.

There is a misapprehension, I fear, in the minds of some hon. gentlemen as to the scope of this measure. It is not intended that all appointments to the service shall be by competitive examination. Section 41 says:

> Except as herein otherwise provided, and except in the case of deputy heads, appointments to positions in the public service shall be by competitive examination which shall be of such a nature as will determine the qualifications of candidates for the particular positions to which they are to be appointed, and shall be held by the Commission in accordance with regulations to be made by the Commission and approved by the Governor in Council.
> Provided, however, that the provisions of this Act shall not apply to positions in connection with the Government railways or any railway owned or controlled by His Majesty, or to any position on any ship of His Majesty until the Governor in Council otherwise directs, and the Governor in Council shall have power to make this Act apply in whole or in part to any of the said positions. Provided, also, that in any case where the Commission decides that it is not practicable to apply this Act to any position or positions, the Commission, with the approval of the Governor in Council, may make such regulations as are deemed advisable, prescribing how such position or positions are to be dealt with.

There must inevitably be a great number of appointments made to the Civil Service under the regulations provided for by this section, particularly as regards the class of employment which was referred to by an hon. gentleman a short time ago.

Mr. BUREAU: Who has the appointing power under this Act?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Civil Service Commission.

Mr. BUREAU: Under what section is that provided for?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Subsection 3 of section 42. The hon. member (Mr. Morphy) seemed to be under the impression that deputy ministers recommended all appointments to the commission. That is not correct. Any department requiring the appointment of an officer makes a request to the commission for an appointment, and the commission proceeds to make the selection and appointment.

Mr. BUREAU: Subsection 3 of section 42 reads:

> From the list of successful competitors the Commission, on the application of the deputy head, shall supply the required officers, clerks and employees.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is on the application of the deputy head.

Mr. BUREAU: The deputy heads do not appoint them?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That means that the deputy head informs the commission that there is a vacancy to be filled or that a new office is to be created. The commission makes the appointment. The deputy head does not even make a recommendation. There is, however, one exception to that general statement. Section 16 provides that:

> In any case where, in the opinion of the Commission, the knowledge and ability requisite for any position in the public service are wholly or in part professional or technical, the Commission, on the recommendation of the deputy head, may appoint a person to such position without reference to the age limit.

It is only, therefore, when persons having professional or technical knowledge are to be appointed that the deputy head is permitted to make a recommendation. In all other cases the appointments are made by the Civil Service Commission, and the deputy heads have no power of recommendation whatever.

The statement which I desire to read to the committee will indicate the policy now pursued by the commission in carrying out the Order in Council.

No permanent appointments have yet been made in the Outside Service by the Civil Service Commission, except in the case of rural postmasters. Temporary appointments only have been made by the Civil Service Commission since the Order in Council of the 13th of February, 1918. Altogether, since the passage of the Order in Council, 465 permanent appointments and 2,409 temporary appointments have been made. The document from which I am reading will explain why so many temporary appointments have been made. It may be of interest to the committee for me to read the names of the departments in which permanent appointments have been made by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: How long will a temporary appointment last?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It will last only until there is available a list of qualified persons, and that list should be available very shortly, because examinations will soon be held at many points in Canada.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: There is no specified time limit for a temporary appointment?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, and the temporary appointments have all been made on the express understanding that they are but temporary, and the incumbents of the office so understand it.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Supposing there are no applicants, as will be the case in some instances, what will happen?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I cannot understand that ever happening.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I have known instances of that kind where it was necessary to go after someone to take the position.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Commission will have to meet that difficulty when it arises. This is a statement of the permanent and temporary appointments made by the Civil Cervice Commission since February 13, 1918:

Mr. DEVLIN: Who made all the other appointments under the Canada Food Board?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They were made before the passage of the Order in Council, and I think they were probably made under Orders in Council on the recommendation of the Canada Food Board.

Mr. DEVLIN: After the passage of this Bill, by whom will such appointments be made?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: By the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. DEVLIN: Will they be brought into the inside service by this Bill?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, they do not become a part of the Civil Service, but all appointments to the war commissions are to be made hereafter by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. DEVLIN: The outside service is not brought into the inside service by this Bill.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The distinction between the outside service and the inside service still remains, but appointment by competitive examination and promotion by merit are now being made applicable to the outside service whereas they are now applicable only to the inside service.

Mr. DEVLIN: Under this legislation?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. DEVLIN: What about section 55?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I shall refer to that later.

Mr. FIELDING: Have these appointments been made after examination?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The persons appointed permanently must have been qualified. The temporary appointments are made because there is not available a list of persons qualified for permanent appointments. Hereafter, examinations will be made at any point in Canada upon request of five candidates.

Mr. BUREAU: What was the test in these examinations?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I really cannot say. Probably a number of these who were appointed, took the examination some time ago. The following statement explains the procedure in making appointments:

The method of selection of such temporary employees has been,—

(a) From the application on file with the Civil Service Commisson in the order of seniority of aplications where necessary qualifications were met;

(b) Recommendation from the Deputy Head of a department of a suitable person;

(c) Selection on the ground by the responsible officer of the department when thereto authorized by the Deputy Head of the Commission; he being held to strict accountability for the selection being made without regard to personal or political considerations and being the most suitable of those applying or available therefor.

In all cases returned soldiers are given the preference.

The reason temporary appointments only are being made is that there are as yet no eligible lists throughout the country from which to make assignments for permanent appointments. These will be built up as a result of Civil Service examinations.

Heretofore examinations have been held semi-annually in the months of May and November, but in future they will be held more frequently if found to be necessary in order to keep the lists in a healthy condition.

Where possible and expedient in the public interest, the principle of promotion will be observed in the Outside as well as in the Inside Service. Where this is impossible the lesser positions will be filled by assignment from the eligible lists and the more important ones thrown open to competition and advertised.

Heretofore permanent appointment in the Inside Service was based solely on the result of an educational test (the candidate being otherwise suitable, of course, as to age, health, character and habits). This gave to the candidate fresh from the class room, and yet lacking in experience, a great advantage over the educated and altogether more suitable person who possessed business experience but might be a trifle rusty in some of the subjects written at the examination.

In future it is proposed in appointments to both the Inside and Outside Services to give a rating for business experience, and thus, while not lowering the standard of the educational test, enable the public service to be recruited from the really most efficient of those who successfully compete at the examinations.

As already outlined, where a vacancy arises in a Postmastership, a Collector of Customs or the like, in an important centre, the same will where possible be filled by promotion. If the public interest would not be served thereby the position will be thrown open to competition and applications invited from persons possessing the necessary qualifications and who have been residents of the city or vicinity for a stated period.

There is naturally a very strong feeling throughout the country that positions should, wherever possible, be filled by the appointment of local persons and that except in the case of transfers, which might occasionally become necessary, "outsiders" as they are regarded should not receive preferment.

The United States Federal Civil Service system recognizes this principle, and in advertising the higher positions, such as Postmasters, etc., limits the eligibility of applicants to the vicinity of the particular town or city concerned, a year's previous residence being required.

Our Civil Service Commission purpose following quite closely the rule adopted in the United States.

In rating applications for such positions the business experience of the applicants would be considered, together with their educational standing as evidenced by school or collegiate record, while satisfactory information as to character and habits would also be required.

The method of passing upon the representative qualifications of applicants for such positions would be along the following lines:

The Civil Service Commission would appoint a Board of three suitable persons to whom the applications would be submitted for examination and report. The members composing such a Board would be selected with due regard to their fitness to judge of the necessary qualifications in a candidate to properly fill the vacant position. If the position required a certain degree of technical knowledge and skill the Board would be composed in part at least of technical men. If the duties were chiefly of an administrative nature the Board would probably have as a member one or more administrative officers of the department together with a business man or men of experience and outstanding ability. All required information would be afforded them upon which to base their opinion and where a position required administrative ability a requisite of the applicant's experience would be a certain number of years in the administrative capacity.

As an illustration of how such a Board would act, two cases recently dealt with may be cited. The first was that of three skilled Accountants required in the Public Service. The positions were advertised, a large number of applications were received, experience and reference being fully given. These were referred to a Board consisting of two Chartered Accountants in general practice and the Head of the Accountant's Branch in the department concerned. These gentlemen reported the names of three applicants who in their judgment were best qualified and the Civil Service Commission approved the report.

Another case was that of Assistant to the Board of Historical Publications, Public Archives. A Board consisting of Dr. Doughty, Dominion Archivist, Professor Wrong of Toronto University and Profesor Colby of McGill was appointed. The applications were submitted to each member of the Board and were rated by him. They were then returned to the Commission and in summarizing the Reports it was found that the three members of the Board agreed upon one candidate as being the best qualified, but differed with regard to the rating of the other applicants. It happened, however, that the candidate obtaining the highest rating accepted the position therefore no necessity for a meeting of the Board to arrange the order of merit of the remaining candidates.

Appointments to the clerical grades of the Outside Service would be made from the eligible list—those who had successfully competed at the regular examinations—regard being had so far as possible to the desirability of the appointee being a resident of the district or community concerned.

The employment of temporary labourers who in some centres at least have heretofore been assigned from the lists kept by the political managers of the party for the time being in power will in future be based upon the necessities of the public service and the fitness for employment of those appliying therefor.

Vacancies in positions on the Canals have this year largely been left with the respective Superintending Engineers to fill, as there was no time after the passing of the Order in Council of the 12th of February last for the Commission to invite applications and create an eligible list. The appointment in the main to the Canals are for the period of navigation and recur yearly; those who prove satisfactory in the opinion of the Superintending Engineer being re-engaged each season. This policy it seems desirable to pursue in future.

In a few instances applications were made direct to the Civil Service Commission for specific positions on the Canals which had become vacant owing to death, resignation or removal. In such cases returned soldiers were assigned in the order in which their applications were received, conditional upon their possessing the necessary qualifications to satisfactorily fill the position in the opinion of the Superintending Engineer.

It is proposed at the close of navigation, in future to request the Department of Railways and Canals to supply the Civil Service Commission with a list of positions to which new appointments will require to be made the following spring and to give notice thereof in the districts concerned.

This method will extend also to certain classes of officials in other departments, as for instance Fire Rangers in the Department of the Interior, Light Keepers and Life Saving Crews acting only during the season of Navigation. Such officers when they have proved satisfactory to the department, having gained experience, should, if available, be re-engaged in the public interest.

I have read that statement in order to indicate the procedure adopted in carrying out the terms of the Order in Council of February 13. I think this statement will remove some of the objections to the Bill which were stated this evening by some hon. members.

Mr. FIELDING: Does it touch rural postmasters?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: When the Order in Council was passed the Civil Service Commission requisitioned the assistance of the post office inspectors in the several provinces. I think the Civil Service Commission make requests for recommendations from the post office inspectors of the several provinces. This form of letter is sent out to the post office inspectors and possibly to other people:

Ottawa,.....

Dear Sir,—

The Postmastership at..... having become vacant through..... the Civil Service Commission has been asked to make a new appointment. I am directed by the Commissioners to ask that you will be good enough, by inquiry in the district, to secure the name of a suitable candidate for office, and that you will submit such name or names for their consideration with the least possible delay. The essential requirements are (a) that the candidate should possess the ability and education to efficiently perform the duties of the office, (b) that his character and habits should be vouched for by three reputable citizens of the community. It is, of course, understood that where a returned soldier is available and qualified, he should be given the preference, that no personal or political favouritism is to be exercised, and that your recommendation of any candidate should include substantial reasons for his selection.

Yours truly,

Secretary.

Mr. BUREAU: To whom is that letter addressed?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: To the post office inspectors of the several provinces. It is hardly wortth while discussing the full scope of the Bill. I do not purpose referring to any of the sections of the Bill at the present time but we will discuss them clause by clause as we proceed. Substantially the Bill is the same as the present Civil Service Act. There are very few changes. The Order in Council is being given statutory effect, and to accomplish that end it was necessary to insert in the Act new sections. The Civil Service Commission is substituted for the Governor in Council in every case where the latter approved of any appointment, or made any appointment. Outside of that the changes are not very substantial and I think the Committee should deal very expeditiously with the Bill when we come to consider it clause by clause.

Mr. CAHILL: Were the appointments of registrars for taking the man power of the country made by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not know, but I think not. I would hardly suppose that the registrars would become part of the Civil Service.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: How were they made?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not know how they were made, but they were not made by the Government.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: I would like to know how they were made.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They were appointed by the Registration Board, of which Senator Robertson is Chairman. I did not know who were appointed even in my own county.

Mr. BUREAU: The same here.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: Before the appointments were made I received a communication asking if in the previous enumeration the returning officer had been satisfactory. I answered that he was not quite so, and I named for the place a returned soldier who had been in the trenches for eighteen months, and who was one of six brothers who had gone overseas, one missing, one killed, one in hospital, one on his way over and one returned.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think my hon. friend is mistaken in saying he had that request from the Civil Service Commission. It was from the secretary of the Registration Board.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: It was from the secretary, Mr. Foran.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Mr. Foran is the secretary of the Civil Service Commission.

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: Well, that is the man who signed the letter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. BOYCE: The person who signed the letter I got was Mr. Hoey. I recommended the appointment of our returning officer and he got the appointment.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: I recommended the returned soldier of whom I have spoken a man who was quite qualified to occupy the position. The doctrine has been preached, and the departments have concurred in it, that where he had the qualifications, the returned soldier should be given the preference. Notwithstanding the fact that I named a returned soldier whose family had made such a sacrifice, he did not get the position, but one whom I did not recommend did get it. I do not know who made the appointment. If I am asked to give information again in view of this experience, I do not know that I shall comply with the request.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I should be surprised if the hon. gentleman received a request for a nomination from the Civil Service Commission, but I should like him to advise me to-morrow about the matter. The requisition, in all likelihood, was from the secretary of some office of the Registration Board. However, I am very sorry that the nomination made by my hon. friend was not acted upon.

Mr. D D. McKENZIE: I might say that I had a somewhat similar experience to that of the hon. member who has just spoken.

Mr. J. R. WILSON: As coming from Saskatchewan, I wish to voice the view which is held by the people of our province in regard to the proposed legislation. Not only on the platform, but throughout the press of our province during the last election, the view was expressed that the abolition of patronage would be one of the greatest and most needed reforms that could be brought about. There is no well-informed person but has realized that under the old patronage system the country was not getting that efficient service from its employees that it should get. Merit was not taken into consideration when appointments were made, but if regard was paid to anything it was the faithful services that had been rendered to the party. Only from a government constituted like the present could we expect such a needed reform, and, as the present seems to be an opportune time, I am glad that the Government has taken advantage of it to introduce this legislation.

I was very much surprised to hear certain hon. gentlemen this evening endeavour to throw cold water on the Bill. If a measure of Civil Service reform is not passed by the present Union Government, when may we expect to see it enacted? In connection with the matter of salaries I would urge upon the Government that they should not deal in a penurious way with the Civil Service. At present there are a number of federal employees who are giving good service to the country, but who are unfortunately underpaid. We hear of many business concerns who have had to increase the salaries of competent men in order to retain their services, but that policy has not been followed in the Civil Service. According to the statistics furnished by the Labour Department, the cost of living in 1914 for a family of five was estimated at something over $14. In 1917, the cost for a family for food, including rent, but excluding clothing and other necessaries, had advanced to $19.33, an additional cost per week of about $5.05. Now, there are a number of employees under the Post Office Department who deserve consideration, and notably the letter carriers. The letter carriers, I understand, receive about $2.50 a day. A war bonus has been granted of about $100 a year, or $8.33 per month, making their total earnings $73 and some odd cents per month. According to the cost of living figures, not reckoning the expense of clothing, doctor's bills, and other incidentals which are bound to occur in any family, no matter what care is exercised, the outlay per week is greater than the amount that is allowed by the Post Office Department to the letter carriers. These men are performing important duties and they have to turn out in all kinds of weather, and they should certainly be given a living wage. They should be given more than that: The stipend which they receive should be such as to permit them to lay by a little for a rainy day. The same thing might be said with respect to the clerks who occupy positions of importance and responsibility in the post office itself.

I think the case of the country postmasters should not be ignored. They have to turn their residences into what might be termed "public buildings." They have to be on duty all hours of the day to hand out mail for the public, and to discharge the duties required of them, and in return they receive the munificent sum of $50 per annum. In some few instances the remuneration is $75; I know of one man who is getting that much per annum. I do not think a department such as the Post Office, which is able to exhibit a substantial surplus every year, should remunerate the worthy people who render such important service to the public by paying them such a comparatively insignificant sum.

Reference has been made to the appointment of registrars in connection with the registration of man-power. I wish to say that if the appointments made are as satisfactory as in the city which I represent, namely, the city of Saskatoon—although I had nothing to do with it—every person will be perfectly happy. I notice from a newspaper received to-day that a returned soldier was appointed in the city of Saskatoon. In my opinion that appointment is a very worthy one and will undoubtedly prove satisfactory.

There seems to be a great deal of fear as to the appointments to be made by the Civil Service Commission. My experience as a member only dates from the 17th of December last, and if other hon. gentlemen have had the same experience as myself—even although I have not had numerous applicants for positions—they will feel very pleased to be rid of the responsibility of having to recommend men for positions in the service. Viewed from any angle, the change which is proposed ought to afford members great relief. Judging from the experience of the past, for every friend a member makes when he recommends an appointment, there will be forty or fifty disgruntled constituents. Therefore, I do not think any member should feel that he is being deprived of a privilege but rather of a burden to be relieved of patronage. We want to see the public service run on business principles, and in that way obtain the best results. In my opinion the method proposed by the Bill tends to bring that about, and we may therefore look for a great improvement in the public service.

Mr. McKENZIE: I was reminded of my own position by the observations of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Foster) that he was consulted about a certain appointment, and after he had given his views they were not followed. I was not looking for or expecting any patronage; but the returning officer appointed in my county last year, appointed, of course, without consulting me, was a very good respectable Tory. They appointed sixty enumerators also, every one of them Tories of the highest orthodoxy. We were told that everything was to be "fifty-fifty," but that is the kind of "fifty-fifty" we got. I did not complain; I was not disappointed; I was looking for that kind of thing. After appointing this returning officer—and I hold the acting minister (Mr. A. K. Maclean) responsible for it, he is the only minister we have in the province except the Prime Minister, who has other things to look after; patronage of this kind, I believe, is handled by the Acting Minister of Finance.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What kind of patronage?

Mr. McKENZIE: Later I was asked to say if the man appointed returning officer would be satisfactory to me. I wrote back: Certainly. When I was going to get Tory anyhow, I preferred a decent Tory; so I said, yes, the old man was good enough for me. But was he appointed? No, he was too good, too decent. They went to the poorest kind of a Tory they could get and appointed him over the head of the other man. So I sympathize with my good friend who is disappointed, for I am in exactly the same position.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: Not exactly. In my case the man is a returned soldier who should have been appointed.

Mr. BLAKE: There has been a lot of talk about patronage to-night directed at this Bill, but it has not hit at the mark at all. The patronage which is objected to is not the few appointments made by the member. I have been in control of the patronage in my constituency for four or five years, and I don't think I secured appointments for more than one person each year to post offices and so on, and there never has been a complaint against one of them, although I turned down dozens and dozens of men. That is not what the people are kicking so much about to-day, but rather at the matter of letting contracts to friends at exorbitant prices with the object of having some of the money turned back to the party funds. I do not see anything in this Bill to remedy that state of affairs. That is the big thing the people mean by "patronage," and not the few appointments made here and there by members. When there is an appointment to be made of a postmaster in some rural constituency, who knows better than the member where that post office should be situated if a new post office is to be opened up? I think that members, with the majority they have behind them this year, and the independence which characterizes members in this House, would feel that they could defy their constituency, or one or two people here and there, and be big enough to locate the offices where they would best serve the community. There is an injustice done here, and under this so-called reform havoc will be wrought in the Civil Service and a great deal of displeasure and more harm caused. I think that, where there is more than one application for a postmaster, at least the opinion of the member should be taken. It is not only a matter of shifting a man into this department or into that. The Bill as constituted is an excellent thing. But where there are more than two applications for a post office, or where there is a vacancy for a postmaster caused by the opening of a new office or by death, I think the member could be consulted first and no harm result. If this Bill is to fulfil the promises of the Government, something should be put in it to provide that every tender for dredging or any other work or for any supplies should be sealed and left in a designated place until the time comes to open it, and it should be opened in public. In that way we will get away from patronage in the big sense of the word.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is provided for in other legislation, by Order in Council. It has nothing to do with the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. BLAKE: That is a form of patronage that may well be embodied in this Bill instead of in an Order in Council. I am not taking up the cudgels about Orders in Council; I have endorsed some of them. But this is going out as a Civil Service Bill, and is not a complete reform of patronage. I have no doubt that the intention of the Government, as enacted by Order in Council, will be followed out faithfully and to the letter, and that the lowest tenderer will receive the contract in each case. That would accomplish the strict abolition of patronage.

Mr. MURPHY: As many members began work in committees at ten o'clock this morning, and it is now midnight, and I assume we will be adjourning before long, I do not wish to take up very much time. With the general principle of the Bill I am in hearty agreement, as I said when it was first introduced. Anybody who was born in Ottawa and has lived here all his life, and who has had anything to do with politics must assuredly welcome any measure to put an end to patronage. The very fact that a man has been born in Ottawa and lived here all his life and has had something to do with politics makes him look at a measure of this kind even with a more critical eye than that of my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Blake), who has just spoken. I agree with him that what the public understand in the talk about patronage is the wider meaning covering every kind of distribution of party or Government favours such as my hon. friend indicated.

Mr. BUREAU: The prevention of graft.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. minister who is in charge of this Bill read to the committee a statement from the Civil Service Commission purporting to detail what they have done since February 13 last, when the management of the Civil Service was practically turned over to them—and as my hon. friend said just now this Bill proposes to give statutory authority for the power that was then vested in the Civil Service Commission. I presume that, owing to a rush of work, the Civil Service Commission overlooked an important part of their work with which I think I should acquaint the committee, because I think it has an important bearing on the Bill. It has this bearing on the Bill, that unless something is done to give the House and the public some assurance that different methods will prevail, the Civil Service Commission is not likely to meet the views and the wishes of the people who desire that patronage should be abolished. The Order in Council transferring the management of Civil Service affairs to the commission was passed on February 13 last, I understood my hon. friend to say. On February 18, five days after the commission was put in sole charge, they issued a circular and blank form, which I hold in my hand, and on which applicants for positions were expected to give their name, address, age, position desired, experience, and two classes of references, one as to ability and one as to character and habits. In the city of Ottawa, I am informed, hundreds of these forms were sent out, and each person who received one received at the same time a circular from the Civil Service Commission in these terms:

> The enclosed form of application for temporary employment is sent you at the instance of Mr. A. E. Fripp, M.P.

Mr. PROULX: No!

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

> It should be filled in and returned to the Office of the Civil Service Commission.

Patronage was supposed to have been abolished by this Order in Council on February 13 last.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Who issued that letter?

Mr. MURPHY: The Civil Service Commission.

Mr. CALDER: It is an application form?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, and a covering letter is sent with it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It does not sound like anything that would come from the Civil Service Commission. I do not doubt that the letter is authentic, but I hardly imagine that it was issued by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. BUREAU: Unhappily these things are judged not by sounds but by words.

Mr. MURPHY: I am assured that that is where it came from and that the forms, as this circular states, were to be filled in and sent to the commission.

Mr. CALDER: Is that the original document?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes; I will send it to my hon. friend. Even assuming that this circular was not sent out by the Civil Service Commission, it requests that the forms shall be filled in and sent to that body. The Civil Service Commission, therefore, cannot be absolved of all connection with the transaction.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It may not have been very objectionable, anyway. Perhaps the Civil Service Commission desired to establish a list of those who would be available for temporary employment in Ottawa. Quite likely they have lists in some of the departments, but the commission may have required further information. I will make inquiries and say something about the matter to-morrow.

Mr. MURPHY: The reason suggested by my hon. friend is a most extraordinary one. What necessity was there for the Civil Service Commission sending out a circular saying "the enclosed form of application for temporary employment is sent to you at the instance of Mr. A. E. Fripp, M.P.." If this was done because of the reason suggested by my hon. friend, that the commission desired to establish a list of those desiring temporary employment—

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I did not say the Civil Service Commission sent it out.

Mr. MURPHY: Why the mention in this circular that it was sent out at the instance of Mr. Fripp? These forms, when signed, were returned to the Civil Service Commission, which, on the date on which this letter was issued, February 18, were in complete control of the situation. The Civil Service Commission will be no more in control of the situation after the passing of this Act, than they were on the date mentioned. What guarantee have we in the Act that practices such as this will not be continued after the Act shall have been put in force? I do not cite this occurrence for the purpose of objecting to the Act or of putting any obstacle in the way of bringing about the reform that we all desire. I am simply pointing out that even after this reform was supposed to have been instituted, we had an occurrence such as the one that I have acquainted the committee with. I am told that these forms were sent to hundreds of people in Ottawa. I draw this to my hon. friend's attention so that the matter may be considered during the discussion of the Bill and so that some provision or provisions may be inserted in the Bill whereby the public will have a guarantee that neither the Civil Service Commission, nor a member of Parliament, nor any individual can do anything of this kind in the future. The acting minister will agree with that most heartily, because I am sure that he is seriously desirous of effecting the reforms which this Bill aims at. Like some other hon. gentlemen, I have been disappointed that those on the other side who have criticised the Bill—because the discussion has been carried on chiefly by supporters of the Government—did not offer some suggestions to take the place of the sections to which they have objected. Possibly that may be done in future; in any event I hope it will.

The CHAIRMAN: If all hon. members who omitted to speak on the second reading have now spoken, I am sure I shall be pardoned if, before taking up the Bill clause by clause, I read paragraph 5 of rule 13. It is as follows:

Speeches in Committee of the Whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

On section 2—definitions:

Mr. BUREAU: There will be some discussion on this clause. We meet at 11 in the morning, and many hon. gentlemen were called to committees at 10. I think that we ought to adjourn.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I should like to pass section 2. It is a short one.

[Mr. Murphy.]

Mr. BUREAU: There will be some discussion on it; it deals with definition of Inside and Outside Service.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If hon. gentlemen insist, I agree.

Progress reported.

On the motion of Mr. A. K. Maclean, the House adjourned at 12.15 a.m., Saturday.

Saturday, May 11, 1918.

The House met at Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

APPOINTMENT OF MR. J. P. A. CHEVASSU.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have directed the Clerk of the House to lay upon the table of the House the report of the Clerk and my recommendation in the matter of the appointment of Mr. J. P. A. Chevassu to the Hansard Division of the Translation Staff of the House of Commons.

REPORT.

Details of remuneration paid in connection with the Victory Loan.—Hon. A. K. Maclean.

PRIVATE BILL LEGISLATION.

SUSPENSION OF RULES RELATING TO PRIVATE BILLS.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved:

That owing to the advanced period of the session, the following rules relating to Private Bills be suspended for the remainder of the Session, viz.: Rules 28, 28a, 52, 103, and paragraph (a), subsection 3 of rule 89, and that Private Bills reported on Private Bills days by any Select Standing Committee be placed on the Orders of the Day of the same day for consideration in Committee of the Whole amongst Private Bills, or if reported on days other than Private Bills days, then immediately after routine proceedings.

He said: This motion is recommended by the Clerk of the Private Bills Committee, and it has been submitted to me by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), who has gone over the rules that are mentioned in the motion, and who is of the opinion that those rules should be suspended in order that Private Bill legislation may be properly advanced.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I should like to have this motion stand until Monday, so that I may have an opportunity of looking into the matter.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Certainly.

Motion stands.

FIRST READING OF SENATE BILLS.

Bill No. 89, respecting The Fire Insurance Company of Canada.—Mr. Nesbitt.

Bill No. 90, respecting The Church and Manse Board of the Presbyterian Church in Canada.—Mr. Nickle.

Bill No. 91, for the relief of Francis Newman.—Mr. Lalor.

Bill No. 92, for the relief of Henry Ernest Saxby.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 93, respecting a patent of Jacob David Wolf.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 94, to incorporate L'ordre des Dominicans ou frères prêcheurs au Canada.—Mr. Chabot.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

NOTICE OF MOTION RE CENSORING WITHDRAWN.

On the notice of motion:

Resolved, That the Rules of the House be amended by inserting the following rules immediately after Rule 24:

Censoring the Official Report of the Debates.

24A. The Speaker of the House of Commons, of his own motion, or upon the report of the Chief Censor, may order that any adverse statement, report or opinion, concerning the causes of the present war, or the motives or purposes for which Canada or the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or any of the allied nations, entered upon or prosecutes the same, which may tend to arouse hostile feeling, create unrest, or unsettle or inflame public opinion, or any unfavourable statement, report or opinion concerning the action of Canada, the said United Kingdom, or any allied nation, in prosecuting the war, or any statement, report or opinion, which may tend to weaken or in any way detract from the united effort of the people of Canada of the prosecution of the war, made by any Member or Members of the House of Commons, shall not be included in or shall be deleted from the official report of the Debates of the House of Commons.

24B. The Speaker of the House of Commons may, in cases where he deems it necessary, order that the printing of the official report of the Debates in the House of Commons be suspended for such time as he may fix in order to afford opportunity for the making by the Chief Censor of a report as provided for in the last-mentioned section, and the determination by the said Speaker as to whether any portion of such report should be excluded or deleted.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In view of the advanced stage of the session, it is not the intention to proceed with this motion during the present session. It was intended as a corollary to the Order in Council with regard to censorship which has been laid on the table of the House.

Mr. BUREAU: May I ask the Prime Minister the reason why he is dropping this motion? Is it only in view of the advanced stage of the session, or is it because he now thinks that there is no reason for having given such a notice?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I explained that it was on account of the advanced stage of the session. It may or may not be necessary to take it up at the next session. I also said that it was a corollary to the Order in Council with regard to the censorship which was passed a few weeks ago and which was laid upon the table of the House.

Mr. BUREAU: That is very unsatisfactory, as I look upon this motion as an attempt to introduce " club " rule.

Notice of motion dropped.

LIBRARIAN OF PARLIAMENT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): May I ask the Prime Minister if the report published in this morning's Citizen is true, namely, that Mr. A. D. DeCelles, C.M.G., Librarian of Parliament, is going to be superannuated? Has he been consulted in regard to his superannuation, and is it true that the Hon. Mr. Sévigny is going to succeed him? Perhaps I might qualify my question by stating that everyone who knows Mr. DeCelles knows that he is in perfect health and is a most excellent official. Further than that, he is an ornament to the Library, because he is one of the great students of Canada.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have heard nothing of the matter, except what is contained in the observations of my hon. friend.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

THIRD READING.

On the motion of the Hon. Mr. Doherty (Minister of Justice), Bill No. 69, to amend the Criminal Code, was read the third time and passed.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT.

BILL FOR TEMPORARY CONTROL OF IMPORTS AND EXPORTS DROPPED.

On the Order being called for the second reading of Bill No. 16, to amend the Customs Act and to provide for the temporary control of exports and imports:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: On account of the advanced stage of the session, and in view of the fact that the War Measures Act gives for the time being authority for doing what was sought to be done by this Bill, I beg to move that this Order be discharged.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS. —SUSPENSE ACCOUNT.

RESOLUTION DROPPED.

On the Order being called:

House again in Committee on a proposed Resolution to provide that the working expenses of the Canadian Government railways and of any railway under the charge and management or direction of the Minister of Railways and Canals shall be paid out of the receipts and revenues of the said railways, etc. —Hon. Mr. Reid.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is not the intention to proceed with this resolution, and I beg to move that the Order be discharged.

Motion agreed to.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

BILL TO AMEND THE CIVIL SERVICE ACT AND TO BRING THE OUTSIDE SERVICE UNDER ITS PROVISIONS.

The House again in committee on Bill No. 53, respecting the Civil Service of Canada.—Mr. Boivin in the Chair (from May 10).

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee adjourned last night we had completed the general discussion of the Bill and had begun its consideration clause by clause. Section 1 has been adopted.

On section 2—Definitions:

Mr. BEST: I hold in my hand a circular I received this morning from the Civil Service Federation of the Dominion of Canada, which reads in part as follows:

It would appear from recent items in the press that some influential agency is endeavouring to dissuade the Union Government from proceeding wtih the Bill for Civil Service reform by the abolition of patronage in appointments and promotions to the public service. This great measure of reform was one of the principal planks in the platform of the Union Government, held a similarly prominent place in the speech from the Throne, and was enthusiastically acclaimed by the public and press of the country.

I do not know an hon. member of this House who has been approached by any agency with a view to influencing him against Civil Service reform. Certainly I have not been approached, but I hold in my hand this circular from the most influential agency there is to-day in the Dominion of Canada trying to influence the members of this House to pass this Bill. As far as I can see the public servants of the Dominion are just as honest as anybody else, but I believe hon. members of this House are just as straightforward and honest as the civil servants. We had an example only last night, which was amply proved by the correspondence produced, that hon. members of this House are at least just as straight as deputy ministers. I believe that if power is taken out of the hands of the peoples' representatives and handed over to deputy ministers or to the Civil Service Commission, ten mistakes will be made in the future for every one that was made in the past. I do not pretend that mistakes have not been made in the past; there have been mistakes of course. But for the life of me I cannot comprehend how two or three men sitting in Ottawa or Toronto can possibly know what is the best thing to be done in the counties of Dufferin or Simcoe. I agree with a great deal of what was said last night in reference to postmasters not receiving sufficient salary.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is entirely out of order. By the unanimous consent of the House last night we decided to observe the rules, after having, by unanimous consent, violated the rules all afternoon and the particular rule we decided to observe was that hon. members should make their speeches relative to the clause under consideration.

Mr. BEST: This is a very important Bill, and I think it should not be pressed through the House in the dying hours of the session. I believe it would be in the public interest if the Bill was left over and a committee were appointed to examine it carefully and report at the next session of the House. I firmly believe that something should be done in the way of Civil Service reform, but in my opinion this Bill is altogether too drastic.

Mr. CURRIE: I think my hon. friend (Mr. Best) was perfectly in order in discussing the action of the Civil Service Federation in reference to this Bill. I say that if the man who wrote this insulting circular to the members of this House got his just deserts he would be brought to the bar of this House. The circular is an insult to every hon. member. Talk about influence! Why, that organization is the influence that is at the bottom of the whole thing. It is a countrywide organization, and is endeavouring to force this Bill through. I think it is time the members of this House took cognizance of its actions. What an insult to insinuate that members of this House are influenced by some mysterious agency behind the scenes! The mysterious agency behind the scenes is the influences these civil servants are trying to exert, and the men who wrote that circular are after promotion for themselves; everybody knows that. I think it is high time these men were called to time. The Government should find out whether or not these men have a right to send such an insulting circular to members of this House. I think it was perfectly in order for my hon. friend to read the circular.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would my hon. friend read the whole circular?

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman has received a copy as has everyone else.

Mr. COOPER: Honi soit qui mal y pense.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Read it in full.

Mr. CURRIE: It is a circular of the Civil Service Federation of Canada. As I have your permission, Mr. Chairman, I shall read the circular.

The CHAIRMAN: I resent the remarks of the hon. member as to my having called the former speaker to order. I did not call the hon. member to order because he was discussing the circular. I called him to order because he was discussing the salaries of postmasters in Canada, which is altogether different.

Mr. CURRIE: I suppose that comes under another clause and we can take it up when that clause is under discussion. At the top of this circular is "The Civil Service Federation of Canada." And at the side I find the names of the officers and a list of affiliated organizations, as follows:

President—Walter Todd, House of Commons, Ottawa; Vice-Presidents: Maritime Provinces—S. W. Wilkins, St. John, N. B.; Quebec—H. McLaughlin, Montreal; Manitoba—C. A. Hives, Winnipeg; Saskatchewan—Charles Gardiner, Regina; Alberta—A. Venables, Calgary; British Columbia—J. E. Fagan, Vancouver; Secretary-Treasurer—F. Grierson, Finance, Ottawa, (P. O. Box 484); Assistant Secretary-Treasurer—L. D. Burling, Mines, Ottawa; Organizing Secretary—T. T. Hawkins, P. O. Inspector, Ottawa.

Composed of the Following Affiliated Organizations of Civil Servants.

Dominion Postal Clerk's Association (35 branches); Dominion Customs Association, (20 branches); Railway Mail Clerk's Federation, (15 branches).

Local Organizations.

Charlottetown, Quebec, Ottawa, Perth, Sarnia, Sault Ste. Marie, Vancouver, Victoria.

Class Organizations.

Excise: Sherbrooke, Stratford, London, Hamilton; Immigration: Niagara Falls, Winnipeg; Marine: Halifax; Meat Inspectors: Toronto, (2); Militia: Halifax; Naval: Halifax, Esquimalt; Public Works: Toronto, Hamilton, Winnipeg.

Then the circular goes on to say:

Dear Sir,

The Public Service, performing alike in peace and war the national business, is surely one of Canada's greatest assets. We are addressing you because you are one of the directors in Canada's business enterprises and so responsible for the results. We are addressing you at a time when events afford you the opportunity to co-operate in an Act that will remove a serious handicap to national efficiency and so contribute to the one great aspiration of all Canada's public men,—the winning of the war.

Every one who wants a little salary always thinks that it must be granted to him in order to win the war.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. CURRIE: My right hon. friend knows that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do.

Mr. CURRIE: The circular continues:

It would appear from recent items in the press that some influential agency is endeavouring to dissuade the Union Government from proceeding with the bill for Civil Service Reform by the abolition of patronage in appointments and promotions to the public service. This great measure of reform was one of the principal planks in the platform of the Union Government, held a similarly prominent place in the speech from the Throne and was enthusiastically acclaimed by the public and the press of the country.

That is by the public service, I guess.

In view of the foregoing facts, the good people of Canada look with alarm upon any attempt to defer the passage of this much needed measure and the undersigned on behalf of the organized Civil Service—

Bear that in mind.

—plead the privilege of pointing out to you the ill effect upon Canada's part in the war that will ensue in the event of failure to place this measure upon our statute books.

I suppose they are all field marshals in their own minds.

Patronage as a means of winning the war has little chance of success in competition with the business like methods of the enemies of the Allies.

May we therefore appeal to you to support this great measure of reform, so that we may offer to the world one more indication in the national history of our country of a rennaissance born of the sorrows and chastisements of a universal calamity.

On behalf of the Civil Service Federation of Canada.

Walter Todd,
President.

F. Grierson,
Secretary.

The minister in charge of the Bill is here and he can stand up and tell the House whether there ever was any elaborate organization endeavouring to put a stop to this great measure or whether this letter is all bunkum and an attempt to coerce the members of this House into the passing of a measure without due consideration. As one member of the House I do not object to real Civil Service reform but when we have a measure of such vast consequence to the whole country and one by which we will tie ourselves down to a lot of bureaucrats, it should be placed before a committee of this House and threshed out for a whole session so that we would know what we were doing. Nobody really seems to understand what the measure means. I have read this circular and I say unhesitatingly that if I were a minister of the Crown and a man in the Civil Service with whom I had anything to do wrote an insulting letter like that to me and to members of the House I would suspend him immediately. What right has a man who is a servant of this House to address this House in such a contemptuous way?

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I would like to say a word in reply to that sweeping condemnation of the Civil Service for presuming to represent their position to their employers the members of this House and the representatives of the people. I have in my experience heard similar statements made in regard to other large bodies of employers when their employees would presume to represent their case to their employers as the Civil Service have done here. I do not see that it is inconsistent with the good of the public service that civil servants should be organized if they wish to be just the same as the servants of any other large employing body. It matters not whether they are in the employ of a large corporation or of the people of Canada. I question very much whether the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) would object if some one came along with a proposition that involved a large organization of capital and that was going to be the employer of a large body of men. Any one who stands up and indulges in a sweeping condemnation of any group of men for presuming to organize and present their case to their employers is taking just the same position that a great many of the autocratic employers took a generation ago but who have been compelled to get down from that lofty pedestal. The observations made by the hon. gentleman have no reference whatever to the merit or genius of this Bill. The Bill is either good or bad according to its details. The object is to take the Civil Service out of politics and to get rid of the curse of the patronage system, a principle which ought to commend it to every one. There is nothing inconsistent with the good of the public service that the men who are engaged in that service should have an honest desire for promotion. Why should not a man entering the Civil Service have the same right to want to get to the top as the man in the service of a railway company or of any other employer?

Mr. CURRIE: Why should he not get to the top—the Bill provides that a man in the second class can never get to the top.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: Simply because some member of Parliament with sufficient pull, whenever a position is open in the Civil Service that is worth anything, railroads some of his friends into it. That is why they cannot get to the top. The opportunity for promotion does not exist in the Civil Service as it does in any other line of business simply on account of the patronage system. If this Bill is not complete in its details this House can improve it. If we find when we have gone through it that there are some things that are incomplete, we can take it up another year and make the necessary improvements. But, the principle is the right one. The public service ought to be put upon the same ground as any other class of service.

Mr. CURRIE: Just a moment. I desire to answer the hon. gentleman (Mr. G. B. Nicholson), and I shall do so in a very few words. The gentleman who has sent the circular, Mr. Grierson, sits in the gallery constantly watching the proceedings of the House. He is the secretary, or occupies other official position in the Civil Service Association, and publishes the Civil Service paper, The Civilian. It is a shame—I would not for one moment stand it if I were a minister of the Crown—the abuse that ministers are handed out in every issue of that paper. When a minister tries to exercise any discipline over any official in his department he is subjected to a torrent of abuse from the paper published by this man, Mr. Grierson, one of the signatories to this circular. The hon. member (Mr. Nicholson) comes down here full of enthusiasm and thinks he is going to regenerate the whole world through the medium of this Bill. I do not object to a man who is selling his labour belonging to any organization, but I say that it is a danger—a danger to the country—that the officials of Canada should be allowed to set themselves up in an organization of this kind and make these raids on the treasury. I speak as a public man, not as one who is going around looking for votes, and this organization—the very thing that has destroyed Russia— is alarming. It is a thing that is going to create all sorts of factions in this service whereby it will be nothing more than a series of disjointed units and broken links. I say that the ministers henceforth should put their foot down on these men who have the audacity to insult the House of Commons with a circular of this kind. This organization has nothing to do with the Federation of Labour, or any of the trades unions that are trying to render a service to the country in these troublesome times. It is only a short time ago since the greatest labour man on the whole of this continent stood upon the floor of this chamber and called upon everybody to perform public service. Can anybody tell me that public service is linked up in the organization which has expressed its sentiments in this circular? The members of this organization are united for the purpose of raiding the treasury and bringing pressure to bear upon members of this House and the ministers—especially the ministers—and it has been done to the extent that a minister, as far as I can see, is only a cipher to register in his department the acts of an organization which is not responsible either to the House or the people of the country. For that reason I think the Acting Minister of Finance should make a statement and say whether there has been any organized movement to try and stop this Bill, or whether these men are only indulging in further misrepresentations.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I did not catch the wording of the circular. Does it give practical reasons why this Bill should be supported, or does it insinuate that the members are not doing their duty?

Mr. CURRIE: The circular consists of a string of insinuations from start to finish.

Mr. BUREAU: They say that to win the war you have got to have such a Bill.

Mr. STEVENS: Paragraph (a) of clause 2 of the Bill defines "Civil Service" as meaning and including:

All classes of officers, clerks and employees—and so forth—

—appointed by the Governor in Council or other competent authority before the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two or thereafter appointed or employed in a manner provided by the Civil Service Act for the time being, in force.

Is there not a better way in which that definition could be stated? I understand that the Civil Service includes practically all the employees of the Government of Canada. In that case why limit the definition to those employed "in the manner provided by the Civil Service Act for the time being enforced" which I presume is the old Civil Service Act? Why not say that all the employees of the Government come under this Act?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. BUREAU: And all the officials.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I wish to distinguish between the Civil Service and the Public Service.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the difference?

Mr. STEVENS: That is the point I want to make. Why make such a distinction when you are going to abolish patronage and bring all the employees under the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There are a great number of war commissions operating today in the city of Ottawa whose employees are but temporary, and on the cessation of war these commissions will cease to exist. While the Civil Service Commission should have the right to appoint hereafter all persons employed by these war commissions, it was not deemed desirable to consider such persons as part of the Civil Service.

Mr. MORPHY: Are the Dominion police part of the Civil Service, and if not, why?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Mounted Police are not part of the Civil Service.

Mr. MORPHY: I said Dominion Police, not North West Mounted Police.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The press gangs going round the city and country.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Dominion Police, I think, are part of the Civil Service.

Mr. MORPHY: Is the minister sure? I am told they are not, and why is it so?

Mr. CURRIE: I asked the minister a very important question whether any organization had approached the Government with a view to stopping the passage of this Bill?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am very sorry, but I did not have the opportunity of answering the question put by my hon. friend from Simcoe. I quite agree with the principle enunciated by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Nicholson), but I am inclined to agree with the views expressed by the members for Dufferin and Simcoe as to the impropriety of the Civil Service bombarding members of Parliament in respect to the passage of this Bill. I have been flooded during the past week with telegrams from every part of Canada, and I have taken pains to let the officers of the organized Civil Service know that I resent the manner in which they have approached members of Parliament during the past few days by circular and by telegram. So far as I know there has been no organized effort on the part of anybody to defeat the passage of this Bill. I should like to say in connection with clause 2 that subsections a and b are substantially as they now appear in the present Civil Service Act. The only difference in c is that there is an addition to the officers named as Deputy Heads, such as the Controller of the Mounted Police, the Superintendent of Insurance, the Dominion Archivist and the assistant to the chairman and secretary to the Commission of Conservation. The purpose of making these officers deputy heads within the Act is that they control their staffs, and therefore it is necessary for the proper working of the Act to define them as deputy heads.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the exact meaning of clause 2? Subsection (a) defines "Civil Service" as including all classes of officers, clerks and employees. Subsection (c) defines what is meant by "deputy" or "deputy head" and so on. I want to know whether the deputy is comprised in the Civil Service or not?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The deputy ministers are part of the Civil Service but they are appointed by the Governor in Council.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The deputy heads should be part of the Civil Service and they seem to come within the meaning of subsection (a). They are employees of the Government and they are in the Civil Service.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: A deputy minister is an officer—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: He is an officer and therefore part of the Civil Service.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: He is part of the Civil Service but he is appointed by the Governor in Council.

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understand that and I do not disapprove of the appointment of deputy ministers by the Government but he is also a member of the Civil Service, and you make a special provision for him.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Section 41 of the Bill provides:

> Except as herein otherwise provided, and except in the case of deputy heads, appointments to positions in the public service shall be by competitive examination.

Mr. BUREAU: That excludes deputy ministers from the examination, but not from membership in the Civil Service.

Mr. STEVENS: In the large or small post offices, customs offices, and inland revenue offices throughout the country we have some very excellent officers in technical, clerical or official positions. Why should they not have the dignity, if there be any dignity attached to it, of being in the Civil Service instead of being classified as the Outside Service. I understand the object of this Bill is to change present conditions. The Civil Service is practically limited to Ottawa and to a few technical positions outside of Ottawa; the rest of the public servants are called the Outside Service. If we are to have real Civil Service reform, men of an equal standing outside of Ottawa should be in the Civil Service.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: I refer especially to men on the permanent staff, not those on the temporary staff, employed for a few weeks under rush conditions. My reference is to the permanent officers of the Customs, Post Office, Inland Revenue and such other departments as have permanent officers throughout the country.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Very strong representations were made to me by representatives of the Outside Service that the distinction be abolished between what is known as the Inside and the Outside Services, and that all be known as the Civil Service. My reply to these representatives was that at the present time we could not very well give favourable consideration to their request for the reason that it is necessary to have some reorganization and re-classification of the Outside Service before the distinction could be abolished. For instance, if the distinction were abolished to-day, the Outside Service would come under the classification found in section 45 of the Bill; there would be a first, second and third divisions, and various grades within the divisions. Clearly that would not apply to the various branches of the outside public service. Take the customs service, for instance, it would hardly do to classify the outside customs service as the inside customs service is classified to-day. In many cases, salaries of $100, $200 and $300 a year are paid, and that is all the recipients expect, and all they deserve for the service performed, which frequently only requires one or two hours work a day. This Bill provides that after its passage the Civil Service Commission shall report to the Government and to Parliament some scheme of reorganization of the inside and outside services, and as soon as that report is made the Government shall take into consideration the matter of the abolition of the outside service.

Mr. STEVENS: This is practically a temporary Bill?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. TURRIFF: Would it not be better to leave this Bill over until the commission report what they propose by way of amalgamating the outside and inside services? I think it would be a good thing to have that done, and to have the whole service taken out of politics as far as possible and to do away with patronage. It seems to me that the Committee of the Whole is not a good body to deal with this Bill clause by clause. We have not the time now at the end of the session to discuss it fully. If the Bill is now dealt with I venture to say there is not one member in ten—and I will be one of them—who will understand what the Bill means when we get through. A committee should be appointed to deal with it, such as the committee dealing with pensions, which would investigate the matter fully and report during the next session, by which time we will have the report of the Civil Service Commission. The House would then be in a position to deal with it to the satisfaction of both the Civil Service and the country. There is something in the circular sent to members—though I do not blame the service very much—that I do not like, that is the suggestion that the winning of the war depends on the passing of this Bill to suit the Civil Service. The Civil Service have no complaint to make in my judgment in connection with the war. Many of those who went to the front have been getting two salaries, and it does not become them to come before Parliament and say that the passage of this Bill is necessary to the winning of the war. That is only a bit of buncombe. I move that this matter be left over until next session, and that a committee be appointed to study the matter before we deal with the Bill.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There has been lots of buncombe about the winning of the war—

Mr. CURRIE: I rose when the hon. gentleman did to second the motion of the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is there a motion?

The CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. member please repeat the motion?

Mr. TURRIFF: I would move that a committee be appointed to consider this Bill and make a report at the next session.

The CHAIRMAN: I have to rule the motion out of order, as not being competent to be moved in Committee of the Whole. The only motion that could be made by the hon. member at this stage would be that the committee rise and report progress, so that the House may deal with the question.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Mr. Chairman,—

Mr. LEMIEUX: Before my hon. friend proceeds, I would like to have an explanation from him. When my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) concluded his remarks by asking if the Bill was presented as a temporary measure only, I understood the acting minister to nod assent. I desire to know if this is a permanent measure or only a temporary. If it is a temporary measure, I shall have something to say about it later on.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: When the member for Vancouver used the word "temporary," I assumed that he did not mean that this Bill when enacted would be but temporary; I assumed he meant it was not to be considered as a complete Bill, and that it would be subject to amendment later.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What amendment?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It will be subject to amendment later as any other Act. It is not a temporary Bill. We must have a Civil Service Act as we have always had. I admit that the Bill may contain defects which we hope to remedy later. In answer to the member for Assiniboia I want to say that substantially there are but eight or nine new clauses in this Bill; the whole Bill is substantially as it has been for the last ten years, and there is no reason why the House should delay many hours in its passage.

Mr. MORPHY: To win the war.

Mr. CHABOT: Reference has been made by an hon. member to the effect that the Outside Service was to be dealt with in this Bill, and I would ask whether in the reorganization and reclassification of the Outside Service it is the intention through this Bill to place that service on the same footing as the Inside Service as regards appointments, promotion, salaries, and superannuation.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The purpose of the Bill is to apply to the Outside Service the principle carried out in the Inside Service in the matter of appointments. Otherwise the Bill is not applicable to the Outside Service, nor is it possible to make it so until we have the report on the reorganization and classification of the Outside Service which the Civil Service Commission purposes making during the recess.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am in favour of Civil Service reform, that is, a real reform. If the object of this legislation is to carry out what was contained in the Act of 1908, it is not a great reform, because under that Act the Government could at any moment, by Order in Council, bring the Outside Service under the Civil Service Commission. I am sure that my hon. friend knows how to handle Orders in Council; there has been a literal manufacture of them by the Government. Why this legislation in the last days of the session, when the Government could, by Order in Council, bring the Outside Service under the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is true that there was such a section in the old Act, but it was not workable.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Why?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Civil Service Act now in force was designed to apply solely to the Inside Service. It is true that the Act gives the power to put the Outside Service under its operation, but it is not practicable that this be done. For instance, if an Order in Council was passed putting the Outside Service under the operation of the Civil Service Act, the salaries of the Inside Service would automatically apply to the Outside Service. The section to which my hon. friend refers was carelessly drafted; it had not sufficient consideration at the time it was passed, and it could not possibly be put into operation.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Is it not a fact that the Outside Service has been brought under the Civil Service Act by Order in Council? I received notice from the Government that appointments were to be made by the Civil Service Commission, and that I should have nothing to do with them. Appointments have already been made in my riding in that way.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This legislation gives statutory effect to the Order in Council.

Mr. LEMIEUX: An Order in Council has no statutory effect, then?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It may have the effect of a statute, but there is some doubt about it. In a case of this kind it is better to give statutory effect to the Order in Council.

Mr. BUREAU: This is an Act respecting the Civil Service of Canada. Clause 2, paragraph (a), defines "Civil Service" as follows:

> "Civil Service" means and includes all classes of officers, clerks and employees in or under the several departments of the Executive Government of Canada and in the office of the Auditor General, etc.

Who is to control the various commissions that have been appointed? I do not see why members of such commissions should not come under the same Act as that which applies to the ordinary civil servant who works in a particular department.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: So far as appointments are concerned, they will be under the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not see anything in this Bill that says so. Even if these commissions are only temporary, they should, unless otherwise enacted by the statute creating the commission, come under the provisions of the Civil Service Act. This would prevent the substitution of an Order in Council for Parliament, and would give members of Parliament at least a dim realization that they have a little say in the administration of the country's affairs. In the old Civil Service Act, as found in the Revised Statutes, the definition of "Civil Service" is practically the same as the one given here, except that the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta and the Northwest and Yukon Territories were then excluded from its provisions. Later, in 1908, the definition was enlarged to include employees in Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Yukon Territory. Between the two another Act was passed concerning the superannuation and retirement of persons employed in the Civil Service, and in that Act "Civil Service" was defined as including all officers, clerks and employees under the several departments of executive government who were paid a yearly salary and to whom the Civil Service Act applied. Included also were all such officers, clerks and employees of the second or outside division as the Governor in Council might from time to time designate; the permanent officers and servants of the Senate, the House of Commons, and the Library of Parliament; and so on. The definition given in that Superannuation Act is a great deal broader than that given here. I do not see anything in this Bill which says that the permanent employees of the House of Commons are included in that definition. As to the Commission, let us set out in the statute appointing them what regulations the members and employees of them shall be subject to. If the Governor in Council appoints a commission let the officers of that commission come under the operation of the Civil Service Act. I am in favour of the principle of this Bill; I think it is right. Since we have been in opposition we have not been overburdened with the distribution of patronage. That is a great relief, and I thank God for it. Another cloud that I want to disperse, another glory that I want to put into its proper place is the statement that this is a new thing, and that this legislation is being enacted to redeem the pledges made during the elections by Union candidates. We heard it said last night in this House that if the Union Government did nothing but enact this particular legislation, a monument should be erected to perpetuate the great good they have done to this country. The acting minister (Mr. A. K. Maclean) has just declared that this is the very Act that was placed in the statute books in 1906, and that was revised and amended in 1908. Just a few sections, he says, are different.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They are new.

Mr. BUREAU: I suppose those sections that are new are the ones that are to bring the Outside Service into the Inside Service. We shall have an opportunity of discussing that question later on. This is not new legislation; this is old legislation; and, instead of investing money in a monument, we should invest it for the purpose of paying the salaries of those poor soldiers whose salaries are to be cut off, although they enlisted on the understanding that they were to get their Civil Service salary in addition to their military pay. Let us have no more camouflage. With the exception of the heads, let all the other officials and employees of commissions appointed by the Governor in Council come under this Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They do.

Mr. BUREAU: I fail to see where that is provided for. If that be the case, let us put into the Bill a definition that will include them.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The hon. member should look at the definition of "Public Service," clause (g), of section 2.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not see much that relates to Public Service. Why make a difference between "Public Service" and "Civil Service?" If I were to make any such definition, my definition would be this: I would clasify, under the head of "Public Service," all men not employed by the Government, but employed by a commission created by virtue of an Act of Parliament, the duties and the scope of jurisdiction of which commission is defined by this Act of Parliament, and which commission is not subject to the Civil Service Act. That is what I would call the Public Service. But all commissions appointed by the Governor in Council and paid by this country should be under the Civil Service Act. No exception should be made in any case. In the Estimates of 1918-19, I find at page 92, item 287, an amount of $600,000 that we are asked to vote for salaries. The item reads:

> To provide for the administration of the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, and the Income War Tax Act, 1917: Appointments for the purpose may be made without reference to the provisions of the Civil Service Act, $600.000.

It is things of that sort that we want to guard against. It was said last night by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Blake) that this did not exactly meet the evils that the people wanted to cure by doing away with patronage. He was absolutely right in his statement, and, for once, I must say I am with him heart and soul on this particular question. What the people want this Parliament to protect them against is what is commonly called graft. The word may not be parliamentary, but I am going to use it to express my idea. Graft is not caused by the appointment of a clerk at $1,000 or $2,000 a year, but graft is found, in the various contracts that are handed out, in the changes that are made and the extras that are paid on those contracts after they have been signed. The other day I called the attention of the Minister of Public Works to a case of this kind which happened in my own riding where, to favour a particular friend, a contract was given at a price lower than that of the lowest tenderer, and then the contractor, expecting to make up the difference by extras, received shamefully large amounts for shamefully small jobs, such as receiving $400 for turning a stone around in a wall. I am, however, getting away from the question. Why should we pass a Civil Service Act, if any minister of the Crown can come into the House with an appropriation to provide for the administration of certain things, and then attach this rider which seems very inoffensive per se, but in the tail of which is the old venom:

> Appointments for the purpose may be made without reference to the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

The Government have changed the phraseology so that the old members will not understand it. The former phraseology was "notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act contained." It is things of that sort that we want to take precautions against. If we are going to make the appointments, one thing that the people are complaining about and from which they want to be protected is, not so much the matter of overpaid civil servants, as the matter of over-crowded offices. If the minister will accept my suggestion, I shall draft a little amendment for the purpose of putting into the definition of "Civil Service," all commissions or officers employed by commissions appointed by the Governor in Council, and into the definition of "Public Service," all commissions whose duties and jurisdiction are established by Parliament. When we create such commissions by Act of Parliament, we can say what officers shall be appointed and how they shall be appointed.

Mr. CHABOT: My hon. friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) has referred to pre-election promises and also to the erection of a monument in commemoration of the passage of this Bill. If I properly understand the tenor of this Bill, its chief purpose is to abolish political patronage, which has been a curse to this country and a bane to some of the representatives of the people and to myself in particular.

Mr. BUREAU: You have always had my sincere sympathy.

Mr. CHABOT: I think at all times patronage has been opposed to the best interests of the Civil Service and has to a large extent, contributed to the defeats of many Governments in this country. After 1911, political patronage in this city was thrust upon me with a vengeance, and my life in Ottawa from 1911 to 1917 was a regular political hell on earth. If this Bill abolishes political patronage, which I consider at all times, an unsatisfactory and unfair method of making appointments, it will remove a grievance and the people of this country will be thankful and satisfied. Since the passage of the Order in Council abolishing political patronage, my peace of mind has been greatly enhanced; a huge load has been taken off my shoulders, and I feel that my life has become worth living. If this legislation abolishes patronage, it will render the Civil Service more effective and efficient, and it will render to the people of this country a very valuable service.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am sure every member of this House who is acquainted with my hon. friend (Mr. Chabot), would like to relieve him of the difficult position in which he has been placed since 1911. A political hell is about as bad a hell as one could expect. I do not, however, think that many of the members of this House from the various parts of Canada are persecuted in the same way as the hon. member is. As this is the seat of government, one can readily understand how conditions here would be different from what they would be in other parts of the country. I want to point out that the abolition of political patronage is not going to be accomplished by this legislation.

Patronage, as the people understand it, is not affected by this Bill at all. I quite agree with my hon. friend from Winnipeg and the hon. member for Three Rivers that it is the expenditure of public money on public works in this country that is the kind of patronage the people of this country are desirous of abolishing. Patronage in appointments is comparatively a trifling matter, so insignificant, in fact, that in the part of the country from which I come the people do not try for Government positions at all. We expect to have very little patronage of that kind in the inland counties of Canada. Does the Pension Commission come under this Bill?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, as to its employees.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: And the Pensions Commissioners?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I presume that the powers of the Civil Service Commission are very similar to those exercised by the Pensions Commission, and if that is the case I must record my opposition to having the Bill gone on with until we have a little more light on the subject. I have always felt that commissions can perform a very useful service in this country provided they have a good man at the head, but if proper jurisdiction is not exercised over them they can be guilty of great abuses. The definition of the powers of the commission does not, in my opinion, go as far as it should. I do not think the Government should delegate to a commission matters for which they themselves ought to be held responsible.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is a matter of policy, and has nothing whatever to do with the Civil Service Bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: As the section defines the scope of the commission, I think my remarks are pertinent.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member will look at section 4 he will see that the duties and powers of the commission are set forth therein.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In reply to my hon. friend from Three Rivers—"Public Service," as used throughout this Bill means and includes all officers, clerks or employees in the service of the Crown or of Parliament; so no person is omitted. Section 41 provides that all appointments to positions in the public service shall be by competitive examination. There are certain other provisions empowering the commission to provide regulations for appointments to the Outside Service where it is not practicable to apply this Act.

Mr. CURRIE: I think the hon. member for South Oxford was quite in order in discussing on this section, which defines "Commission," the question whether the other commissions that are governing half this country should not be included under this Bill. We are here defining "Civil Service" and the hon. member for South Oxford wants to know whether these various commissions are included in that definition.

Sir SAM HUGHES: In all countries there has been more or less difficulty in managing the Civil Service. Alexander Pope long ago referred to the matter in these lines:

> For forms of government let fools contest,
> Whate'er is best administered, is best.

Some departments of the Civil Service are administered splendidly. Again, one branch of a department will be administered splendidly, while another branch will be badly administered; it depends upon the administrator in each case. The Civil Service in Ottawa is very fine in many respects. I deeply sympathize with the two members for Ottawa. I have had considerable experience with them. I can well remember getting a letter from one of these distinguished gentlemen requesting that such and such a person be forthwith appointed. I passed the letter on without comment, and about a month later received another letter from the member demanding to know by what authority this particular person had been appointed. It seems that a certain fellow wanted to get in the service, and when he went to see the head of a department he was told to get a letter from my good friend the junior member for Ottawa. He wrote a letter of introduction, knowing no more about the fellow, I suppose, than about a stranger in the street, and the fellow got the job. Later on the other letter came wanting to know how he got appointed. It is true that sort of thing does not occur very often, but it is an instance of the routine that is gone through. After all, it is the heads of departments who engineer the appointments nine times out of ten, but the member of Parliament gets the blame; the member is simply the cat's-paw in the game. With regard to this circular, I know the two gentlemen who signed it. I was a little annoyed at receiving it. They are good fellows, but they have been in the service so long that, like a good many others, they think the period of leisure has arrived for them. Their talk about winning the war and what the people of Canada want, is piffle. I think these gentlemen should not interfere with members of Parliament. If these gentlemen had furnished us with some good reason why we should support the Bill, I would have been delighted to do it. But a sloppy thing like that circular is merely annoying.

Mr. BUREAU: Let us forget it.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Yes. Is this Bill going to control the appointment of senators? In the last election, a minister of the Crown is supposed to have bought off a candidate by offering him a senatorship. This minister was an old hand at the business, as he had done a similar thing before. In another case, a new hand at the business was concerned. I should like to know if cases of that kind come under this Bill.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The hon. gentleman will have to renew that question at another time.

Mr. J. READ: I notice in the editorial column of the Citizen, which, I presume, is a Government organ, the following:

> The Government has every reason to be displeased with the report, sent broadcast across the country, that the Civil Service Bill would be postponed till another session. The parties responsible for giving out such misleading information are apparently not anxious to see the Civil Service reformed by the abolition of patronage. Such reports tend to undermine the position of Union government; especially now that the government is undertaking the responsibility of railway ownership on a national scale, with the Canadian Northern added to the government railway system, it is essential that political patronage should be eliminated.

Paragraph (f) says:

> "Outside Service" means and includes the other officers, clerks and employees included in the public service, not being part of the Inside Service.

Then paragraph (g):

> "Public Service" means and includes all officers, clerks or employees in the service of the Crown or of Parliament.

That seeems all right, but at page 13 of the Bill you exclude the railway service. Some hon. gentlemen, like my hon friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) fortunately have not been in contact with the Government railway system of the Dominion. They do not have any Government railways running through their parts of the country. But eventually this Government is going to take over the railway systems of Canada, including the Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk Pacific, so that we will have extensive Government ownership. If Government ownership is going to be thus extended, it is absolutely essential, if this Bill is going to be any benefit in eliminating patronage, that it be applied to the railway service as well as to any other part of the public service. If you were in my province, where we have one mile of Government railway to every 300 inhabitants and observed the position in regard to patronage, you would appreciate the importance of what I am trying to tell the committee. In the name of common sense, why should the railway service be eliminated from this Bill? It looks to me very suspicious. If the Government are really in earnest in their desire to give us this reform I am in favour of it.

[Sir Sam Hughes.]

The reason for my attitude with regard to this measure is that I have seen the system worked out in England. In the Old Country they have almost entirely done away with the curse of patronage as administered by politicians. The system has done more than that. It has enabled a man, upon entering the public service, to know that his salary and his job are going to remain with him as long as he behaves himself and that he is not subject to being fired with a change of Government. The result is that men can afford to take a less wage, and millions and millions of pounds have been saved to the people of Great Britain from the very fact that they have adopted this principle of Civil Service reform. That is what is going to happen here. A great deal of the legislation that is passed now-a-days has particular reference to war times but this measure should be framed to meet the conditions which will exist when the war is over. An hon. gentleman on the other side pointed out that this was a good time for the Union Government to do something. In the name of common sense, let it do something under this Bill because up to the present it has done nothing beyond putting the country in a state of turmoil. I would strongly urge placing the Government railway system employees under the operation of this Bill.

Mr. BUREAU: I would like to call the attention of the minister to the definition of "Public Service."

> "Public Service" means and includes all officers, clerks or employees in the service of the Crown or of Parliament.

Are not all classes of officers, clerks or employees "employed in or under the several departments of the executive government of Canada" employees in the service of the Crown?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: Well then "Public Service" includes the whole service of the Dominion?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It includes everybody who is in the employ of the Government, or the Parliament of Canada and only excepts railway and steamship employees and lighthouse keepers, I think.

Mr. BUREAU: "Public Service" includes the Civil Service?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It does not include soldiers?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. BUREAU: But it includes every person in the employ of the Crown. I fail to see any difference.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Subsection (a) defining "Civil Service" might be struck out for all practical purposes. It does no good there, but it has been in the Civil Service Act for a great many years and I did not think it desirable to strike it out. It can do no harm and I wanted to follow the old Act as far as possible. The term "Public Service" is in the present Civil Service Act, but without any definition.

Mr. BUREAU: Let us take that section. You use "Civil Service" and "Public Service," and they mean the same thing?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The words "Public Service" are used throughout the Act. It is the better term and it includes everybody in the service.

Mr. BUREAU: Is there an accepted definition for the term public service?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Not other than this.

Mr. BUREAU: In the old Act there was a schedule to determine who were civil servants, and in the Superannuation Act they extended the definition to cover all, whether in the Inside or Outside Service.

Mr. MORPHY: Have the Civil Service Federation of Canada, on whose letter paper this circular was written, had this Bill before them and have they approved of it?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I cannot say whether they have approved of it or not. I know they had it before them and that the association made representations to the Government about certain clauses in the Bill.

Mr. MORPHY: What do the Government think of the federation, through their secretary and president, writing a circular to the members containing these words:

> We are addressing you because you are one of the directors in Canada's business enterprises and so responsible for the results.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is addressed to members of Parliament.

Mr. MORPHY: Yes.

> It would appear from recent items in the press that some influential agency is endeavouring to dissuade the Union Government from proceeding with the Bill for Civil Service Reform by the abolition of patronage in appointments and promotion to the Public Service.

Apparently the Civil Service have no confidence in the Union Government. Does the minister share the view that the Government should be under suspicion by Mr.. Grierson that the Government has been influenced in some way in regard to the passage of the Bill? Why should not members of Parliament have the same right and opportunity of seeing a Bill of this kind in advance, that is offered to the Civil Service? The Bill is sprung here one morning, and a day is given for general discussion, before the members of the House have even been able to read the measure.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Bill has been on the file of the hon. gentlemen for at least two weeks, and probably three or four weeks.

Mr. MORPHY: Quite true, the Bill has been on the members' files and the fact of the minister saying that it is on the files would indicate he thinks that every member should have read it. There is another Bill on the files, the Bill to amend and consolidate the Railway Act, and I presume the minister would say because it is on the files that it should be read, digested and understood by the members of the House who, by their multifarious duties morning, afternoon and night, with committee work and correspondence, have no time to read either Civil Service Bills or Railway Bills of voluminous nature and fulfil their ordinary duties. I am beginning to feel that there is a nigger in the fence with regard to this Bill when the secretary of the Civil Service association, or the federated union, can dare to use language warning the members of the House that they are directors of the country's business and that they are responsible. If that responsibility is to be attached to me I am going to side with those who have already requested either that a committee be formed to look into this subject and bring forward a Bill next session, or that we take all the time necessary to go into every clause of this Bill so that we may know when its consideration is concluded what "Civil Service" means.

I have an item which I think I should bring up here with regard to appointments. I am entirely in favour of the principle of this Bill, and I am anxious to get rid of every vestige of patronage. When I was first elected to Parliament I went to the local committees and asked them to take the patronage away from me, because I did not want it. The cry was then raised, "You will be responsible, you will have to take it yourself." Well I have had no trouble, and the matter has not bothered me. The only trouble I have had has arisen since I came here lately, concerning a certain appointment. A deputy undertook to recommend to a minister the appointment of a man in my county to a responsible position upon an international cheese board. The Government appointed a man who had the capacity all right, but whose son was married to a girl who had four brothers at the front. That man was out against Union Government in the riding that I represent, in South Perth, and in West Huron or North Huron.

Mr. BUREAU: He was a wise man.

An hon. MEMBER: He's all right.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. member for Three Rivers says this man was wise, and another hon. gentleman says he is all right. I am not complaining, the party in question is a free man. The young woman to whom I have referred was married to this man's son, had four brothers at the front: one had been just killed, another has since been killed, the third has been wounded, and the fourth is still on active service. The husband's father and the husband both declared that the woman would never be allowed to poll her vote. They prevented her from polling her vote as a soldier's sister, and she did not poll it. Now the appointment of that man to the position in question seared and shocked the conscience of the loyal people in the county which I represent. It seared and shocked the conscience of those who had not voted. I think it seared and shocked the conscience of a few pro-Germans, the thing was so heinous in its character. I spoke to the minister about the appointment, and he said that for his information he had depended upon his deputy.

I do not blame him, he was new in the position, but I want to tell hon. gentlemen that deputies assume powers that usurp the ordinary functions of members of parliament who ought to know about these appointments. The deputy in question might have inquired from somebody. I do not want to be consulted in such matters, but as member for the riding I do not want to be insulted, and I shall not stand for that sort of carelessness in the future, either from the Civil Service or anybody else. I think there should be some decorum displayed in connection with these matters, and some courtesy, and reasonable attention paid to the position of the member by ministers and deputies, so that a man will not be held in contumely and contempt by things being done in his riding for which people hold him responsible, although he has had nothing to say in regard to them.

I hope the Civil Service will remember that there are duties devolving on them towards the public men of this country, and if members are not to be consulted as to who is to be appointed to positions, at least they should be consulted as to whether any reason exists for not selecting such men as I have described.

Mr. Du TREMBLAY: Will the minister be kind enough to tell us why the employees of the Government railways do not come under this Bill?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: An exception was made of the employees of the Government Railway System because it was found difficult to apply the Act to that service. When the resolution was before the House some four or five weeks ago, I stated that during the recess the Civil Service Commission were to make an investigation into that class of employees and endeavour if possible to arrive at some method of putting them under the Act, and if the Commission are able to make any practical suggestion, next session it will be considered.

Mr. DEVLIN: May I ask the minister if the Civil Service Commissioners themselves come under the operation of this Bill?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Commissioners are deputy heads.

Mr. DEVLIN: I understood the minister to say that deputy heads come under the operation of the Bill.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They do. They are under the Civil Service Act, of course, except as to appointment.

Mr. DEVLIN: Will the deputy ministers hereafter be appointed by the Commission, or by the Crown?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: By the Crown.

Mr. DEVLIN: And the Civil Service commissioners will be appointed by the Crown?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. DEVLIN: A few minutes ago the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) spoke of other commissions such as the Hospitals Commission and the Food Control Commission. What about the members of those bodies?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They will be appointed by the Crown.

Mr. DEVLIN: And will the members of the War Purchasing Commission, and these other commissions, also be appointed by the Crown?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, but not their staffs.

Mr. MURPHY: I understood the minister to say in the early part of his remarks that public service covered all the temporary employees at present employed under any of these commissions or war boards?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: Later on, the minister in answer to some other gentleman, gave another explanation that seemed to enlarge the scope of his first statement. I refer to his statement that the expression "public service" extends all through the Act. Will my hon. friend explain what he meant by that?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The words "public service" occur in the present Civil Service Act but they had no definition. I really do not know why they were put in. The definition of Civil Service, my hon. friend will see by reference to subsection (a) of section 2, includes officers, clerks and employees in all of the several departments of the executive Government of Canada. We thought that the definition of public service was somewhat wider and would include everybody in the employ of the Crown, or of Parliament, and particularly it was designed to cover the employees of commissions, such as the Canada Food Board and the War Purchasing Commission, so that hereafter the employees of these commissions would be appointed by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MURPHY: Then the Bill covers more than a temporary purpose?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. PROULX: Are the heads of these commissions to be appointed by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. PROULX: Why?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think it would be desirable or practicable that heads of commissions should be appointed by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. PROULX: I understand that under this Bill only deputy ministers will be appointed by the Governor in Council?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. PROULX: That refers, then, to the members of the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is true.

Mr. PROULX: Why should not the heads of other commissions be appointed by the members of the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The heads of commissions are but temporary employees, and they are selected for a special purpose. I do not think it would be fair or practicable that they should be appointed by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. DEVLIN: I would like to follow up the questions I asked a few minutes ago respecting these outside commissions. They are classed, I understand, as in the Outside Service. Am I right?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think they are classified at all either as Outside or Inside. They are temporary employees.

Mr. DEVLIN: Well, then, they are not classified by this Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They come within the definition of public servants. They do not belong to the Civil Service properly, either Inside or Outside, but they are in the public service.

Mr. DEVLIN: I understand that, but the moment this Act passes it will apply only to what is known as the present Inside Service, not to what is known as the Outside Service.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is not correct. I have stated more than once that all appointments to the Outside Service will fall within the Bill, subject to some exceptions. I wish the hon. gentleman would leave the consideration of that matter until we reach the section.

Mr. DEVLIN: It has reference to this very section. If I left it I could not come back to it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have explained that matter several times and have called the attention of the Committee to the exact clause, section 41. I think it is hardly fair we should be discussing it again.

Mr. DEVLIN: I don't want to be unfair to the minister; I don't think I have been—

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I want to make progress, that is all.

Mr. DEVLIN: I did not have section 41 in mind at all, but rather section 55 dealing with the Outside Service:

> 55. The Commission shall, as soon as practicable after the passing of this Act, after consultation with the several deputy heads and other principal officers and employees, prepare schedules containing lists of the positions and the duties and salaries attached thereto.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That clause has reference to the organization of the outside Service and also of the Inside Service.

Mr. BUREAU: I am not satisfied as to the definition of "public service." If the term "public service" includes everything, we can leave out the definition "Civil Service," and I still stand by my proposition that it should be defined as follows: "Public service" means and includes all officers, clerks and employees in the service of any commission constituted by virtue of an Act of Parliament, whereby the mode of appointment, dismissal, and so on, are therein determined. That would bring the employees of the Senate and the House of Commons under the definition of Civil Service. As the definitive clause is now drawn we do not know what it means. It says:

"Civil Service" means and includes all classes of officers, clerks and employees in or under the several departments of the Executive Government of Canada and in the office of the Auditor General and in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, appointed by the Governor in Council or other competent authority before the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two—

I suppose these men might request superannuation or take advantage of any law passed by this Parliament to protect Civil servants for performing faithful duty to the country. Men employed since 1882 have worked for thirty-six years for the Government, and I suppose they are entitled to some recompense. The clause goes on:—— —or thereafter appointed or employed in the manner provided in the Civil Service Act for the time being, in force.

We do not know what employees these are, or anything about them. I would substitute for that definition the following:

"Civil Service" means and includes all officers, clerks and employees in the service of the Crown or of Parliament.

I want to protest against anything which will take away from the Act, if we are going to pass it—and I am in favour of it, and think we should pass it,—the power to appoint the personnel of commissions such as the Bureau of Public Information headed by Mr. Nicholls, and other commissions which are the result of the very prolific Orders in Council we have to-day.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is why the definition of "public service" was put in the Bill, to cover just such cases as my hon. friend suggests.

[Mr. Devlin.]

Mr. BUREAU: May I ask why the term "Civil Service" has been defined, if it covers everything?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That word rather denotes the purpose of the Bill. It is an old section, and it was not considered desirable to revise entirely every section of the Act. We might very well drop the definition "Civil Service" altogether, but I do not think it would be well to do that.

Mr. MORPHY: Why not say that the "Civil Service" means all officers, clerks and employees in the service of the Crown or in the public service?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Except that the word "public service" is used in another sense throughout the Bill.

Mr. MORPHY: Why not leave "Civil Service" out and say that the "public service" means all that the former term includes?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In speaking on this matter yesterday, I expressed my inability to distinguish between "Civil Service" and "public service," and that may account for my inability to see where this section covered the Pensions Commission. I understand from the explanation that has been given that that commission would come under the term "public service."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The Bill says:

"Public Service" means and includes all officers, clerks or employees in the service of the Crown or of Parliament.

I would assume from the wording of that section that it would include the men who are in the public service across the sea at the present time.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is military service, not Civil Service.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I would imagine surely that that is public service.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is public service in a sense, but strictly speaking it is military service, and there is a separate statute covering matters of that kind.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: May I ask if the public service has been administered in this sense since the passing of the Order in Council on February 13? In listening to the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) relate what had taken place in his constituency, I felt that as the representative for the constituency from which I come I possibly ought to know something about conditions in that riding.

An appointment has recently been made there which, I assume, would not come under the Civil Service Act. In this appointment is suggested one of the reasons to which I attribute the breaking down of the Military Service Act. The official to whom I have reference was appointed representative of the Department of Agriculture on the Leave of Absence Board for military district No. 1, although he had stumped the constituency during the election campaign in opposition to Union Government and to the Military Service Act.

Mr. BUREAU: It would appear from a return respecting the staff of the Food Controller's office that the chairman of the Food Board reserves to himself the power to say anything he pleases, notwithstanding the Civil Service Commission or anything in the Civil Service Act. In an Order in Council respecting staff and salaries of the Food Board I find the following:

> The minister observes that the Food Controller states that the above method of using item numbers to denote the maximum salaries that different members of the staff may be paid enables him to discharge incompetent persons and engage others without the necessity of having an Order in Council in each instance, and that this method has received the endorsation of the Auditor General.

Instead of saying: I want one clerk to copy letters, another to stamp envelopes, and so on, he says: I want so many men at from $1,000 to $2,000 a year each. This means that we are substituting a commissioner for the Governor in Council. The chairman of the board, who is not under the control of the Civil Service Commission, may say, as is sometimes done in the Estimates, that notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act or any other law, $600,000 shall be paid out under the patronage system to the staff of the commission. I insist that this Act should cover every commission, and that no exception should be made unless set out in the statute creating the commission. Let us have a real Civil Service Act, not a mere camouflage which will make the people believe that something has been done and for which those who have promoted the Bill may take credit.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 2 carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BUREAU: I submit that in what I have said the very basis of the whole Act is involved. If we do not define what really constitutes Inside Service or Outside Service, the Act is useless.

At one o'clock the committee rose.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Paragraphs (f) and (g) of section 2 read:

> (f) "Outside Service" means and includes the other officers, clerks and employees included in the public service, not being part of the Inside Service.
> (g) "Public Service" means and includes all officers, clerks or employees in the service of the Crown or of Parliament.

By reading that, we really have very little knowledge of what may be included in the Outside Service. On the canals and in many other places in Canada we have men employed, some for eight months, others for shorter terms. Some of them are called permanent employees and others temporary. I should like to know under what heading they will come. Will they come under this Act?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I do not want to be understood as opposing this measure. I have said that I agree with the principle of it, but I think we have, perhaps, gone a little far afield. The clamour throughout the country in the past has been, not so much in regard to the appointing of men to swing a bridge or run a post office, as against the patronage slate for all purchases in the various departments at Ottawa, as well as throughout Canada. In the past we have had to comply with that patronage slate, and I quite agree with the Government in their endeavour to abolish it. We have, however, very little information in regard to this Bill, and the acting minister has acknowledged that it is, to a large extent, a temporary Bill. If we read the clauses respecting the Outside Service, we see that the commission, immediately after the passage of this legislation, is to get together and formulate rules and regulations in connection with the Outside Service. I entirely agree with the sentiments expressed this morning by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), that such an important Bill as this, involving as much as it does, should not be brought up in the dying days of Parliament in the endeavour to have it rushed through. The members of this House are entitled to all possible information before the Bill is permitted to become law, and I would seriously recommend to the acting minister to take into consideration the advice given this morning by the hon. member for Assiniboia, to withdraw this measure for the present and refer the matter to a committee of this House who may confer with the Civil Service Commission and with the heads of the different departments and have the regulations and rules all consolidated and brought down at the next session, as will evidently have to be done. We can then deal intelligently with the situation. Since the Order in Council was passed a few months ago we have been making appointments to the Outside Service in all parts of Canada. Why not let us go on during the recess under this Order in Council as we have been doing? Then perhaps by the next session of Parliament we shall have a better knowledge of how this legislation will work out, especially if the committee sees fit to appoint a committee of this House to consult with the Civil Service and the heads of the different departments.

Mr. TWEEDIE: I am absolutely opposed to the withdrawal of this Bill. It is the duty of the present session of Parliament to pass this Civil Service Bill, because of the solemn agreement entered into with the people of Canada. I do not see that there is anything to be gained by standing this Bill over until the next session. As was suggested by the Acting Minister of Finance, there may be some defects in the Bill, but I have never yet seen any Bill, except perhaps Bills relating to private legislation, in which there have not been some defects, and which have not, from time to time, required amendment. The suggestion of the hon. member is that this Bill be reintroduced into this House at the next session, and that a committee of members be appointed to work out a measure in the interests of the country. If there are defects in this Bill, I know of no method by which those defects can be made more apparent to the Government and the public than by enacting the Bill and putting it into force. I know of no body of men more competent to observe the defects in the operation of the Act than the members of the Government themselves, and more particularly the members of the Civil Service Commission, who will have charge of the administration of the Act. If we find that the time between now and the prorogation or adjournment of Parliament is not sufficient for us to discuss and pass this Bill, then it is our duty to come back here in August, as was suggested by the Prime Minister, in order to give the Bill full consideration. But it is the duty of this Government to the country and to the Civil Service at large that this Bill be placed upon the statute books this year and put into operation as speedily as possible.

[Mr. Sexsmith.]

Mr. COWAN: Like the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Tweedie), I desire to see this Bill passed, because I am anxious to get back to Regina, and should not like to return to that city if this Bill is not passed, because I know the attitude of my constituents in regard to this matter. After the explanation of the Acting Minister of Finance as regards section 2, I find it quite easy for me to support it. As I understand his explanation, this Bill brings within its operation all the employees of the Dominion of Canada, with the exception of the deputy ministers, the Civil Service Commissioners, the Militia of Canada, and the railway employees, and, as the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) has said, the senators of the Dominion. The deputy ministers should be left out of the operation of this law, because, as a firm believer in what is termed the pyramid system of organization, I feel that this Parliament should hold right under its control a certain body that will be directly responsible to it. As I take it, these deputy ministers will, hereafter be responsible to the ministers, the ministers being undoubtedly responsible to this Parliament, so that we shall have direct control over those deputy ministers. If at any time a deputy does something that he should not do, as we were told yesterday, by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) that one of them did, it would not take this Parliament very long to get rid of such a deputy minister, and in that way we would have the necesary efficiency in that particular department. The militia, of course, should be exempted from the operation of this legislation. The Civil Service Commisioners should also be exempted, because the commission should be directly responsible to this Parliament. I may be wrong, but I do not think we should ever attempt to bring the employees of the Government railways under the operations of this Act. Those railway employees should in my opinion, be under a separate commission, just as independent as this one will be, and just as subject to Parliament, but absolutely free from political control or interference. Where we have such a large body of men technically trained as railway men are, we should not attempt to bring them under the control of a commission such as this, which could not attend to the work as efficiently as a commission of technically trained men, specially delegated for the purpose, could do. I think, therefore, everybody that should be reached by this legislation, is being reached. We should bring all of the Inside and Outside Services under the operation of such a Bill as this. The Bill may not be perfect, but I do not think that any law that could be regarded as absolutely perfect was ever passed by this or any other Parliament.

If they were all perfect, there would be no need for us to come here year after year to improve them. We must therefore treat this Bill as we would any other Bill. It must be considered in relation to present conditions and we can make any amendments in the future that are deemed desirable. I have no doubt we shall find defects in the Act, but we can deal with them next year just as we are dealing with the Bill to-day. The people in the section from which I come are very anxious to have this Bill passed, because they have seen some of the evils of patronage. I do not know whether this Bill touches the question of patronage in the matter of buying supplies, but that is a different matter altogether. Let us clean up patronage in the matter of appointments, and we can deal with the other matter later. I unhesitatingly support this Bill.

Mr. BLAKE: I suppose the public hangman comes under this clause. I think it is very important that we should include some one empowered to act as Civil Service executioner, for we know that many departments are over-manned. In the Printing Department, for instance, I am informed there are two hundred surplus men floating about doing nothing, and when I brought that fact to the notice of a responsible member of this Government he told me it would be political suicide to clean that department up. In the Statistics Branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce there are a hundred and thirty men doing what it takes only seventy-four men to do in the United States, and there would be between seven and eight hundred men in this branch in the United States if they engaged men on the scale we do in proportion to the amount of work to be done. I do not see in the Bill any provision for remedying these conditions. The hon. member for Lambton has said that the Bill will reduce our expenditure on the Civil Service by thirty or forty per cent. I have no doubt it should be reduced to that extent, but I do not see any means provided in the Bill for doing so. Section 10 of Part 2 provides that the present status of employees shall be preserved. Section 25 deals with the employment of extra assistance. It may be necessary to have extra help in certain departments at certain times on account of the growing business of the country, but I think the main business of the commission should be first to deal with the overmanning of departments. I think they could set a fine example to all municipal governments in this country, because I think I am safe in saying that there is hardly a municipality where three men are not employed to do the work of two. I think this matter should be considered, while we are dealing with the definitions under this clause.

Mr. THOMSON: I listened attentively this morning to the criticisms of this Bill. Most of the critics were in favour of the principle of the Bill, they said. I do not wish to question their sincerity, but it seems to me they took a very strange way of showing their love for the Bill. As the discussion proceeds, it seems plain either that we shall be here all summer or that the Bill will be talked out. I think in these strenuous times, when the news from the front is so serious, members of this House could be better engaged than in wrangling over this or any other Bill. I am an enthusiastic supporter of the principle of this Bill and of the abolition of the patronage system. It would seem from the discussion that some have a lingering love for the old system. We have heard about the benefits of having appointments made on the recommendation of the member for the constituency. That sounds very well, but as a matter of fact it has not been the practise in the past. In the constituency I represent the recommendations have not been made by the member for the last thirteen or fourteen years. When I was rejected by the people of that constituency, it was I who recommended the appointees, and not the member, and when I was elected as their representative I had nothing whatever to say about patronage; and that was the situation in nearly half the constituencies in Canada under the old system. I am very anxious to see this Bill go through at once. Whatever defects there are in the Bill will appear when the Act is in operation, and we can rectify them next session. This will not be the last session of this House, we hope. Let us put the Bill through at once and get away, because I think we could be better employed elsewhere. But if the Bill is to be held up or talked out, and that seems to be the intention, I would beseech the Government to keep in force the Order in Council doing away with patronage. I am not much of a lover of Government by Order in Council, but the situation is such that I think the Government would be justified in retaining the Order in Council if this Bill does not pass this session. I am satisfied that the vast majority of the people of Canada would approve such action, and I am satisfied, notwithstanding all we have heard this morning, that a pronounced majority of the members of this House are favourable to the principle of this Bill and favourable to the abolition of the system of patronage.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I absolutely agree with my hon. friend that we could be better engaged than in discussing this Bill. That is one of the main reasons I urged that the Bill be withdrawn, and I again ask the minister to withdraw it. So far as I can see we are operating just as effectively with respect to the Inside and Outside Service under the Order in Council passed two months ago, as we could operate under this Bill. The Government could apply the Order in Council, and then next session after we have discovered the defect in the system we could discuss the matter more intelligently. If it is not true that the Order in Council is as effective as this Bill, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: During the last election the Prime Minister pledged himself to the elimination of patronage in appointments to the public service. This Bill has been introduced to implement that promise, and I therefore cannot acquiesce in the suggestion that it be withdrawn. It is true that we are now operating under the Order in Council, but that was largely a direction, and not an enactment, and there are grave doubts as to the power of the Government to pass an Order in Council covering the appointments to the Civil Service in the manner indicated in the Order in Council. It is therefore considered wise and businesslike on the part of the Government to give statutory effect to the principle of the Order in Council. If this Bill were entirely new, I could appreciate the objections raised by hon. gentlemen. But ninety-five per cent of the clauses are old and have been the law for many years. The substance of the new clauses was set forth in the resolution upon which this Bill is founded, and we had quite a lengthy discussion when that resolution was moved. That was some four or five weeks ago. Therefore, I fail to appreciate the contention that the House is taken by surprise in being asked to enact this Bill. This morning there were some suggestions made as to clause 2, particularly the definition of "Civil Service." As stated this morning, paragraph (a) of section 2, which defines the term "Civil Service," is really not necessary, and so I propose that the clause be struck out. I therefore beg to move:

That paragraph (a) of section 1 be struck out; that paragraph (e) of section be amended by striking out the words "that part of the Civil Service" and inserting in place thereof the words "those officers, clerks or employees who are"; that paragraph (d) of section 2 be amended by striking out the word "Public" and substituting therefor the word "Civil" and by striking out the words "or Parliament" and also that the paragraphs be relettered from (a) to (f) inclusive.

I suggest the striking out of the words "or of Parliament," because that is covered by a subsequent clause.

Mr. CURRIE: The Acting Minister of Finance said that members have had considerable time to examine this Bill during the interval since the Bill was introduced, and also that there had been some discussion on the resolution. The members of Parliament have been getting a little bit of information about this Bill, and about the activities of these gentlemen, and this is one of the things that I intend to bring before the House. This morning I made a reference to a letter that was written by a member of the Civil Service threatening, and endeavouring to intimidate, the members of this House into supporting this measure. We have also heard speeches in the House endeavouring to intimidate threatening that if it did not carry immediately this House would be prorogued until next August. Well, we are not afraid of having this House prorogued until next August. We have had sessions lasting almost a year, and that sort of thing does not go down with the members of this House at all. We might continue in session for four or five weeks longer with benefit to the public interest. There are many things that we might go into and discuss; for instance, the appointment of a curator of German property which has never been made although we have been at war for four years. A committee of this House might spend a few weeks investigating some of the commissions that have been operating under this Government. In reference to the question of patronage, there is patronage and patronage. The most odious form of patronage is nepotism. The outcry of the public against the administration of patranage has not been in reference to the appointment of people. I challenge any of those hon. members who have been talking about the evils and troubles of patronage to point out one single case that has occurred in the last eight or ten years where any great mistake has been made in reference to appointments. There is such a thing as patronage in the Public Works Department and matters of that kind and those are the things that the people are talking about. The Civil Service is divided into two parts, the Inside and the Outside Service. The Inside Service has been under the commission and the Outside Service has not. Anybody who knows anything about these services will unhesitatingly say that in the great majority of cases the men of the Outside Service have higher qualifications and do much harder work than those in the Inside Service, although they do not get the same money at all. They have had this organization formed amongst the civil servants to get a little rise in pay. For my part, with reference to the Outside Service, I think we might have adopted the principle adopted in England and given them a war bonus of, say, ten per cent, because everybody knows that it is very difficult for the members of the Outside Service to live under the conditions that exist at the present time. Instead of giving them a ten per cent rise you give them this Bill, which means that when they ask for bread you give them a stone. There are two kinds of patronage. This Bill is the result of an agitation that has been carried on by the Civil Service organization. The circular I read this morning shows that that organization is endeavouring to intimidate members of Parliament. I shall go further and read you a letter that members of this organization have issued in order to carry on their agitation and to extend it to all parts of the country. I hold in my hand a letter issued by the secretary of the Canadian Postmasters' Association, in which he says:

Aurora, Ont., April 19, 1918.

Dear Postmaster:

Postmasters more than any other class feel the hardships of war prices owing to the small allowances given them by the Government.

It has been decided by our Association that the time has come when we should make a determined effort to secure relief.

You must help if success is to be achieved that is, if you desire it, we believe most if not all do—you ask how—well by writing to the Member for your district at Ottawa. Explain the amount of work done in your office each day—show the cost of hired help, if any—duties of office, hours of service, rent paid, and the amount paid you each month—compare the Government pay with what you could earn with the same labour on a farm or at some other occupation, but do not find fault with any Postmaster's salary as compared with your own. Write this letter in your own words but do it at once.

If you have a local paper published in your town or village will you kindly see the editor or publisher and have him print an article calling the attention of the public and the Government to the hardships imposed upon us through the adoption of commissions dating back to Confederation—explain to him how the war has added many millions of letters and circulars, etc., sent out by the different departments of the Government upon which there is so much extra work but not a cent of pay.

Now for a big united effort and don't fear to talk plain to your Member. If you feel like quitting your job in disgust, say so. When you have done this sign the attached counterfoil and mail it to me.

This came from the town of Aurora, which I understand is also the native town of the Deputy Postmaster General. In every other department a similar agitation, a similar propaganda, is carried on, and we know very well that the agitation has blossomed forth in respect to this Bill. Now, hon. members will wonder what is going to happen to the patronage business? When this House divests itself of its power, as it is going to do under the Bill, it will have deprived itself of one of its ancient privileges and prerogatives—the right to say who shall be appointed to positions in the public service. Then the right of appointment will come not from the Crown, not from the minister, but from the Civil Service Commission. Will the commission make the appointment? I am going to tell hon. members that when the commission want to appoint somebody in their districts they will send a letter to the postmaster or the custom house official there, and these men will nominate appointees to the Civil Service in Ottawa. That is how the appointments are going to be made. Is not that patronage? One of the most prominent men in the city of Toronto was filling the columns of the papers a few months ago with weird appeals and complaints about the appointment of people to the Civil Service, and at the very same time he was seeking the appointment of his own daughter to a job in the Civil Service, and she got the position. There is a lot of hypocrisy in this world, but I think I am talking to a lot of hard-headed men who do not take any stock in hypocrisy. Will the public interest be better served by having appointments made by the member, through the minister who is responsible, or by leaving the appointing in the hands of irresponsible people who will select whoever they like?

Now, a word about appointments to these commissions, and which are not to come under the operation of the Civil Service Act, although those staffs will. I think it is time we called a halt to the appointment of commissions for everything. This attempt at the devolution of responsibility from the Government to commissions, is something the country is wide awake to now and is taking notice of. The other day as I sat at luncheon in one of the prominent clubs in this city, a gentleman who occupied the seat alongside of me, said: "Currie, you notice all these people who are sitting here; let us count how many representatives of commissions are sitting around this room?" We started to count, and we named nineteen of them. Each one of these commissions performs functions that should be discharged by some department of this Government over which the Government should have authority to rule and as to whose proceedings they should have a say. This Parliament is becoming nothing but a rubber stamp to initial the doings of these different bodies.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The gentlemen to whom the hon. gentleman has referred were all club men.

Mr. CURRIE: They were all club men sitting round a table in that club. You can go there every day and count nineteen or twenty-five of them if you wish. I think the time has come for Parliament to put itself on record, to speak plainly and act openly. This Civil Service Commission is another commission whose hands we are strengthening and to whom we are furnishing greater powers. What is happening already? Everybody knows well, and nobody better than the ministers of the Crown, that there are several services so organized here that the members of the service, from the deputy down, will defy a minister and evade what he asks them to do, and he has no recourse. There are many men going around the Civil Service who do not do a day's work, in fact they are doing nothing but stirring up trouble, and at the same time drawing money from the people of the country. The people would be very much shocked to know that but it is a fact. These men do not do a minute's work, let alone a day's work, in their departments. They are walking around here, going to public meetings and organizing various societies, and setting themselves up as censors of the public, and all that sort of thing. If the minister in charge of a department says a word as to what is happening he is met immediately with a threat that the majority of his staff will walk out. Talk about the tyranny of the labour unions. There is one thing about the labour unions, they have men over them who are sensible and will not let them walk out without cause—they are subject to discipline. But this Bill takes the control of the discipline of the Civil Service entirely out of the hands of a minister; it will deprive him of all power to do anything with the men under him. As I said you are loading a gun that has not got a trigger on it. You cannot fire these men even if you want to, they will stay in the service for all time.

The Acting Minister of Finance has said that this Bill has been a long time before the House. Certainly it has, and the longer it is before the House the more we realize what a great mistake was made in introducing it. The Prime Minister is a very human man with a big heart. Very often his attention is called to something, and great pressure is brought to bear upon him to carry into effect what is sought. The propaganda to which I referred is worked upon him, in the same way as it is worked upon the members. He receives thousands of letters about a certain thing, and in the fullness of his heart he decides that it is better to do what is asked than to have difficulty. The demands of the Civil Service have been before this House for many years. A few years ago experts were brought in from the four quarters of the earth to go through the Civil Service and to make recommendations with the object of rendering it more efficient. The experts went to the departments and they made recommendations. Those recommendations were laid on the table of the House and Parliament was supposed joyfully to adopt them. I do not think any one of the recommendations made at that time has ever been carried out. There may be one, but if so, I do not know of it. Why the Civil Service organizations were so strong the ministers could not take action. As I have already said, the ministers are defied and they know that as well as I do. What we should do with the present Bill is to put power in the hands of the ministers so that they shall have the power of dismissal.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We have the power.

Mr. CURRIE: But you do not exercise it. I can name two or three men who have made themselves offensive to the whole Canadian public, and you do not dare to dismiss them.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Name.

Mr. CURRIE: I could name them, but I will not do so. It would only make trouble and I am too good a Canadian to start trouble unnecessarily. But these men have done things that they should not have done, and the organ of the Civil Service in Ottawa is continually filled with denunciations of the Government. I would like to take that journal and read its contents to the members of the House, and I have no doubt at all they would throw this Bill out in five minutes. The columns of that journal are continually filled with attacks not only on members of the Government, but on gentlemen on the other side. When hon. gentlemen opposite were in office they often received a broadside from behind consisting of high explosives from the journal of the Civil Service. Those hon. gentlemen when they were in power could not do anything in their departments but what we of the Opposition knew all about it, showing that many members of the Civil Service are not true to their salt. I do not class all the members of the Civil Service in that category. Many of them are entitled to the highest praise, big men, who are receiving far too little money for the services they are performing. These men are doing three-fourths of the work, and the other one-fourth is distributed amongst chaps who do not do anything but walk around and look nice. Some of the members of the House are sympathetic towards this Bill, and other similar measures, because they are of the opinion they are going to pass something which will be of benefit to the public. It is not the appointment of men to office that has raised the cry about patronage. That cry has originated from such jobs as the building of sawdust wharves, and the expenditures of large sums of money on works that are not necessary in the interests of the public at all. That is what constitutes patronage, so called, and not the appointment of a few civil servants to office. In my opinion the people of this country will not stand for the appointment of men to the public service not being in the hands of the member whom they have chosen and whom they have made responsible. They certainly will not approve of handling those appointments over to the local postmaster or the local custom house officer instead of to the member for the constituency.

That is the system that is shown clearly through the method of organization they have introduced, and if the hon. member for South Perth had the means of finding out how the appointment he mentioned was made, no doubt he would find that some postmaster wrote a private letter to the department.

Mr. MORPHY: It was one of the deputies who undertook to do the job.

Mr. CURRIE: Did the deputy know the man?

Mr. MORPHY: No, he did not, or he would not have appointed him.

Mr. CURRIE: How did he get his name at all? Who sent the man's name to him?

Mr. MORPHY: You will have to ask the deputy.

Mr. CURRIE: It was probably the postmaster.

Mr. MORPHY: No chance.

Mr. CURRIE: However, that is the condition of affairs, and if members of this House feel like absolving themselves of all responsibility for appointments, and turning them over to postmasters, customs and excise officers, landing waiters and men like that, of course, they may go ahead and do it. That is what this Bill provides. If the acting minister thinks there should still be one particle of responsibility attaching to members of this House—and some responsibility should attach to them in their own ridings—then let the Bill stand. We have an Order in Council dealing with this question now. I say, let us try out the system outlined in that Order in Council and see how it works out for six or seven months, and then we will know whether or not it is a good system. The Government can cancel an Order in Council at any time, but if you pass a Bill like this it is necessary to come back to Parliament to have the matter righted. That is my argument, and I think I have put on the records of the House sufficient evidence to show hon. gentlemen how the oracle will be worked in their ridings. I do not think any man of sense would stand up in this House and support that method of patronage as the proper one as against the method that has prevailed.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have listened to what the Acting Minister of Finance said a moment ago, and he needs not to be assured of my full sympathy for Civil Service reform. But I do not think he is backed up by his own friends. There seems to be a cleavage between the goody-goody element in the Unionist party and the other fellows. Indeed, it seems very clear that the Prime Minister himself, who, my hon. friends claim, is in favour of the Bill, is not much enamoured of this legislation, otherwise he would be in his seat and would stand by my hon. friend and see that the Bill is carried through. What have we seen since the beginning of this debate? I have seen my friend, the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. J. D. Reid), smiling quietly not saying a word. Of course, the railway employees do not come under the jurisdiction of the commission; they will remain under the close jurisdiction of the Minister of Railways and Canals. When my hon. friend from Regina (Mr. Cowan) said we must not expect the railway men to be put under the Civil Service Commission because they are experts and technical employees, and so on, that the commission could not deal with them, he does not seem to know that the technical officers of every department come under the jurisdiction of this same commission. I say to the acting minister: If you want to abolish patronage, do not give us a sham, give us the real article, and put every railway employee from one end of Canada to the other under this commission, otherwise you will not be sincere in the eyes of the people. The acting minister, turning to his friends—I do not know if he was addressing himself to the Tories or to the Grits—addressing my friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) with some severity, said that the Prime Minister had given a solemn pledge at the last general election that there would be Civil Service reform. Surely my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance is not serious. He knows just as well as I do that the pledges given by the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government cannot be taken seriously by the country more especially on this question of Civil Service reform. He should remember when we were sitting together on this side of the House, and poking the ribs of his present leader. He recollects that in 1907 the Prime Minister, in his celebrated Halifax platform, a platform which was engineered to defeat my hon. friend (Mr. A. K. Maclean) just as much as his friends on this side of the House, had for the goody-goody element of the country a Civil Service reform plank. Here is what he said, when my hon. friend was the running mate of the right hon. gentleman in Halifax, that is in 1911, when he was running against him.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Prime Minister said—

Mr. TWEEDIE: I rise to a point of order. What paper is the hon. gentleman reading from?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am just using a refresher.

Mr. TWEEDIE: Mr. Chairman, I think I am entitled to the name of the document from which the hon. gentleman is reading, or else he should lay it on the Table.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend is too fresh.

Mr. TWEEDIE: I may be too fresh, but I would not be ashamed to give the name of any document I quoted from.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member for Maisonneuve has the floor, and no interruption, of course, can be allowed without the permission of the member who has the floor. Hon. gentlemen will remember that the same rule which applies in the House applies also in committee. While I am on my feet I shall ask the hon. member for Maisonneuve not to wander too far away from the clause under consideration.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am simply reading the article for the benefit of the acting minister.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: You need not read that article for me; it was read the other day and I remember it quite well.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The other day, when the matter was up, the acting minister said that later on we would be dealing with this Bill, and then it could be brought before the House. I wish to say to my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Tweedie) that I did not wish to be rude to him. After I am through I will send him the paper. But I would like to ask the acting minister: Is it not a fact that during the election of 1911 the then leader of the Conservative party, the stern, unbending leader, when he was running against the Acting Minister of Finance in Halifax, gave his pledge that he would bring about an extension of Civil Service reform? The years 1911, 1912, 1913, 1914, 1915, 1916 all passed. In the year 1917 my hon. friend (Mr. A. K. Maclean) was a candidate again in Halifax. He had lost his running-mate, (Sir Robert Borden) who ran in King's county, but this time my hon. friend ran for the Union Government, and again the Prime Minister comes out before the public with the pledge, and on the 15th November last he gave a pledge of Civil Service reform, as follows:

Civil Service Reform.

With a view to extending the principle of the present Civil Service Act to the Outside Service, and thus to abolish patronage and to make appointments to the public service upon the sole standard of merit, the Civil Service Commission has already been directed to make a report to the Prime Minister as to the necessary steps for that purpose. Such arangements will be subject to the existing regulations, which give preference in appointments to returned soldiers who are duly qualified.

That pledge was given. What happens? How can we believe, how can my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance believe, in his present leader's pledge? He did not carry out the pledge of 1911; he did not carry out the pledge of 1917, because shortly after the elections, in defiance of the goody-goody element in his new Cabinet, he appointed Mr. Acres as postmaster at Ottawa. He made five or six appointments after the passage of that famous Order in Council, disregarding completely the pledge he had given the country and the susceptibilities of the goody-goody element. This promise was made by the right hon. gentleman at the last election in order to sway the public in favour of the Union Government. By whom is this Bill supported to-day? Observe our silence on this side; the quarrel is on the other side of the House. And who is most anxious to railroad this Bill through the committee? The President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) who has given Mr. Beaufort and the secretarial organizations all the fat jobs in his department in order to boom himself before the people; who is so anxious to cross the ocean to represent Canada at the Imperial Conference and advertise himself as the great saviour of the cause of union in the last election. This scheme is at the bottom of this legislation, otherwise why this agitation, why this precipitation? If my hon. friend is sincere he will accept the views of the member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson) who sat on this side during the last Parliament, and whose remarks a moment ago were common sense. Do you not see that your house is divided against itself?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Are you in favour of the Bill?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am in favour of the Bill, but not of a sham reform. Will the hon. gentleman put railway employees under the proposed Act?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I gave good reasons why they should not come under it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The hon. gentleman gave not good reasons, but pretexts. He cannot make any progress with his legislation in this form. If he will follow the sound advice given by the Hon. member from Qu'Appelle, he will let this Bill stand for further investigation and when next session comes we will see what can be done.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: To whom does my hon. friend refer when he uses the expression "goody-goody"?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I will drop a line to Mr. Beaufort; he will let me know.

Mr. CHABOT: I hold no brief for the Civil Service in Ottawa, nor am I here to defend their rights or interests or to eulogize them. The attack, however, which has been made on the service in Ottawa by the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) is both unwarranted and uncalled for. I consider his criticism far too caustic, too harsh, even unfair. If the picture which he draws of conditions existing in the service is a true and accurate one, members of the House and the people of Canada must come to the conclusion that the Civil Service is a very inferior body and that the cases of inefficiency and incompetency among them are too numerous to mention. Canada is not leading the way in the matter of Civil Service reform. Civil Service reform has been carried out in other countries with very gratifying results and if Canada could emulate the examples of other countries in that respect, our service, which at present is second to none, would be materially improved in efficiency. I have had a great deal to do with the civil servants of Ottawa. My relations with them have been very intimate; my experiences in that line have been varied and extensive. While some men in the service are not up to the mark and some departments are overmanned, we have in the service men worthy of the positions which they occupy, men thoroughly well qualified, men who do honour to themselves and to the positions which they hold.

4 p.m.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: Either I expressed myself very imperfectly, or the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) has misunderstood or misrepresented me. I did not intend to suggest that the Bill should be held over and that we should act under Order in Council. I strongly advised the Government to push the Bill through at once, but I suggested that in case the Bill were talked out, as it appears likely to be, the Order in Council should be kept in force so that we should not go back to the miserable old system from which we desire to be freed.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is what I understood my hon. friend to say. He suggested what should be done if the Bill were talked out, and I pointed out that the Bill was being talked out by members not on this side, but on the other side of the House.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: My hon. friend is helping.

Mr. TWEEDIE: The member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) intimated that he would not be induced to alter his opinion because of any threats which had been made. I made no threat. I suggested that it was the duty of Parliament to deal with the Civil Service Bill during this session, and that if we were crowded for time it was our duty to come back here in the fall and dispose of this, or of any other legislation which required attention. I was surprised to hear the attack which he made on civil servants generally. If he formed the impressions which he appears to have from the civil servants with whom he is associated in his riding, it is time that we had an investigation of that body and cleaned them all out.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The member for North Simcoe said that practically no one in his riding was in the Civil Service.

Mr. TWEEDIE: He talked about civil servants as if they were blacklegs and thieves; as if they were bringing undue pressure to bear on members of this House.

Mr. CURRIE: That is unparliamentary language, and should be withdrawn. I said nothing of the kind. The hon. member is putting words into my mouth that I never uttered.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I think so.

Mr. TWEEDIE: Mr. Chairman, if you ask me to withdraw those words, I shall withdraw them.

The CHAIRMAN: All I ask is that the hon. gentleman who now has the floor (Mr. Tweedie) accept the statements made by the member for North Simcoe.

[Mr. Thomson.]

Mr. TWEEDIE: I accept the statements which he made, and I interpret them as nothing more or less than a distinct insult to the whole body of civil servants throughout Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Tweedie) is trying to put me in wrong with the civil servants. I have been more in touch with the civil servants of Canada than the hon. member for Calgary has, and during my public career I have had their support; with the hon. gentleman it is different. I did not insult the public service. I said that there were a great many good civil servants in the outside service and that the Government should supplement their salaries.

Mr. TWEEDIE: My hon. friend has made this statement—

Mr. CURRIE: I have the floor now; the hon. member is young in this Parliament yet. With regard to my saying that civil servants were continually threatening the ministers and endeavouring to have their own way, it is only a few hours since the member for Ottawa (Mr. Chabot) who is now so zealous in his commendation of civil servants, said that since appointments and promotions had been taken off his hands—a promotion means the same as an appointment—he had felt as if he were in a new heaven.

Mr. CHABOT: I referred to the system.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. member used to have a levee every morning when we were in the old building. I have seen queues of applicants almost a quarter of a mile long waiting to get into his office.

Mr. CHABOT: The efficiency of the Civil Service has, no doubt, been improved by the appointments made through my influence or upon my recommendation.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. member has hardly had time to eat his meals on account of the numbers of applicants for positions. With all due regard to my hon. friend and with all due regard to the Civil Service, I have said again and again that there are good people in the Civil Service, the best people in the country—the Civil Service could not get along were it not for such people—but I say that there are in the Civil Service a number of people whose services could be dispensed with. I have been on committees that have had to do with departments of Government, and I know whereof I speak. I have no hesitation in saying this. I am not afraid of the Civil Service, neither in my own riding, nor at Ottawa, and threats by the Civil Service or by any hon. member, be he layman or lawyer, in this House representing the Civil Service, cannot frighten me. If I have to say a word about the Civil Service, I shall have my say and shall say it without hesitation.

Mr. TWEEDIE: I rise to a point of order. Is the hon. member to be permitted to make a speech? The hon. member rose to correct a statement which I made. I was perfectly willing that he should do that, but he is going on and delivering a speech. The hon. member has delivered a speech against the civil servants; now he is compelled to deliver one in their favour.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CURRIE: It is not necessary for you, Sir, to rule. You know the hon. member is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I desired to rule that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) had the floor and was entitled to make a speech, but I wished at the same time to appeal to the parliamentary experience of the hon. member for North Simcoe and to ask him to confine his remarks to the clause under discussion. The clause under discussion is a definition of the words and terms and expressions used in the Bill, and I think the hon. member will himself admit that he is going a little too far afield.

Mr. CURRIE: I do not think the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Tweedie) asked you to rule as to whether I should go away from the point or not. I think he said I was making a speech.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. If the hon. member for North Simcoe does not wish to abide by the ruling of the Chair, he has no right to discuss it; all he can do is to appeal to the House for a decision.

Mr. CURRIE: There has been propounded in this House a new rule, that when the Speaker makes a ruling the matter should not be argued. It has always been one of the principles of the House of Commons that when a ruling is made it is possible for members to express themselves as to whether they think the ruling is right or not; and if the Chairman does not think a point is well taken, I have seen the House of Commons adjourn and the Speaker even go and consult the ancient authorities. All I said was that I accepted the ruling of the Chair as far as not wandering from the point was concerned. What the hon. member for West Calgary asked a ruling on was not that; he asked a ruling as to whether I could make a speech or not. I think I am perfectly in order in making a speech.

Mr. TWEEDIE: That was not my point of order. While I was making my speech, the hon. member for North Simcoe rose to interrupt, and I sat down. Now the hon. member is going on and making a speech. I sat down in accordance with your suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN: I understood, perhaps, wrongly, that the hon. member for West Calgary had terminated his remarks when I gave the floor to the hon. member for North Simcoe—

Mr. TWEEDIE: I had not finished.

The CHAIRMAN: —but I shall make it a point, the moment the hon. member for North Simcoe has terminated his remarks, to see the hon. member for West Calgary and give him an opportunity to continue his speech.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. member for West Calgary sat down before I rose at all. He is drawing on his imagination when he says that I interrupted him before he finished his speech. If he is anxious to take the floor, I shall give it to him for a while.

Mr. TWEEDIE: I accept with a great deal of pleasure the laudatory remarks which have been uttered by the hon. member for North Simcoe in regard to the Civil Service. I wish to call the attention of the committee again to the question of threat which was referred to by the hon. member. He read a letter which was sent to him by the Postmasters' Association, and he indicated to the committee that that was in the nature of a threat; that that was duress which was being used by the members of that association to force legislative action by the members of this House of Commons. He resents the fact that any organization of civil servants should have the presumption to address their requests and demands to this House or to any individual member of the House of Commons. The class of civil servants with whom he has had experience must be vastly different from those with whom I have in the past had experience, and while he may not personally care to receive deputations or correspondence from the members of the Civil Service in his riding, I can assure you, Sir, that I am only too glad at any time to receive any communication or any deputation, or to hear any complaint which the civil servants may have in regard to the treatment received by them at the hands of the Dominion of Canada. This House has, in the past, always received deputations in regard to various trade matters. Have we ever heard the hon. member for North Simcoe utter a word of protest in this House because the Canadian Manufacturers' Association has sent deputation after deputation to lobby the members of this House? Have we ever heard protests from him because they have put into his mail box in this House circulars pleading their particular cause? Have we ever heard complaints from him because people have come here seeking bounties on lead or zinc, or bonuses for various industries which are being carried on throughout this country? Are we going to allow such people to importune the members of Parliament, individually and through the Government, and then as representatives of the people, say here that no organization of members of the Civil Service shall have permission to send deputations to make complaints to members of this House? It is our duty to receive their protests, to hear their representations, and to give our earnest consideration to them, just as much as it is our duty to see that any other class of people in this country receive justice and fair treatment at the hands of this House.

So far as I am concerned, and as long as I may be in the public service, I intend to give heed to their complaints and to do whatever I can to ameliorate the conditions under which they may be working. Every member of this House realizes that the conditions under which the civil servants have been working for the past number of years have been more or less in the nature of an outrage. We realize that there has been no uniformity of pay for various clerks in the different departments doing the same kind of work; that there have been bonuses given to some and not to others. We realize that the highly paid employee will sometimes receive a bonus of $100, whereas the small salaried man will receive a bonus of only $50. Such treatment is wrong. The duty of this Government is forthwith to revise the whole scale of salaries paid to the lower employees throughout the Dominion, and to see that they get at least a living wage. We have had one petition presented by the postmen throughout the Dominion, asking that they be started at a minimum wage of $1,000 per annum, and that they be allowed to work up to $1,400, no matter how long they are in the Civil Service. Is there anything unjust or unfair in that request? How is it lowering the dignity of the members of this House to receive such a petition or to discuss such a question? We now realize that those men are working for a wage on which they cannot meet the ordinary cost of living. It is absolutely impossible for many civil servants in this country to live a decent, honest and comfortable life. We must not think that because they are Dominion civil servants, they are slaves who can be ground under our heel.

I congratulate them on organizing associations, whether it be of postmen, mail clerks, land's title men or any other body. I think they have come to the realization that in unity there is strength, and that they must have organizations through which to present their claims to the members of the House of Commons and to the Government itself, to get justice not only for the individual, but for every class of civil servant. So far as their communications and delegations are concerned, I submit that it is the duty of every hon. member of this House to hear their complaints, and when he realizes they are suffering, his efforts should be directed towards ameliorating the conditions under which they are working. They should be as highly paid and are as respectable a class of employees as those who are to be found working for the large corporations doing business in this country. With very few exceptions, I have nothing but praise for the civil servants. The hon. member for North Simcoe says he has heard no complaints from the civil servants themselves, and that the difficulties that have come before him have been wholly in connection with patronage in the letting of contracts and the purchase of supplies. I have heard complaints from the civil servants for years. I have heard them complain because some person with pull in the post office or some other department has been appointed at a higher salary over the heads of men who have served for ten and fifteen and even twenty-five years. That is the main grievance of the civil servants, and there has been a demand from the civil servants themselves throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion and a demand from the public; which must be heeded by this Parliament, that steps be taken towards relieving the conditions under which the civil servants of this country have been suffering for a number of years.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: If I may be permitted to say a few words—

The CHAIRMAN: I do not want to have it said, after the hon. gentleman has begun his speech, that I am calling him to order, but I must once more read the rule which I read last night, and again this morning, but which seems to have been forgotten:

Speeches in Committee of the Whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

We have wandered very far from that rule. Yesterday we did it with the consent of the committee, but to-day, unwittingly, the members one after the other have failed to observe the rule. It is a very difficult position for the Chairman to be in. A moment ago I called to order the hon. member for North Simcoe, who was no more guilty than the other members who had preceded him. There must come a time when hon. members must be called to order or no progress whatever will be made with the Bill. I appeal to the hon. members to assist the Chairman in enforcing the rules of the House, and to confine their remarks as much as possible to the clause under consideration.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think if the Chairman will maintain that stand, the House will support him.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: What I intended to say is not relevant to the clause under consideration. It had been my intention simply to refute some of the arguments that have been made against the Bill by hon. members. I could cite cases by the hour on the other side to show that the Act is really required, but I shall not make the argument, as I will not be the first to offend against the rule.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 3—Civil Service Commission:

Mr. DEVLIN: I think it is somewhat unjust to pay the Civil Service commissioners a lower salary than is paid to some of the men they appoint, or at all events a lower salary than men will receive whose qualifications must be certified to by the commissioners. I call the minister's attention to what seems to me an injustice.

Mr. CHABOT: I agree with what my hon. friend has said. I think the fair-mindedness, integrity and ability of the Civil Service commissioners is universally recognized. The placing of the Outside Service under the commission will bring about forty or fifty thousand more men within their jurisdiction, and their scope of action will necessarily be widened. I think that putting the Civil Service under the commission will save the country many thousands of dollars a year, and for these reasons, and many others I could enumerate, I think the salaries of the commissioners should be increased. I think they should get the same salaries that other commissioners in different spheres are receiving, because the Civil Service Commission, in my opinion, is the most important of them all.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Representations have been made by several hon. gentlemen to that effect, but the decision of the Government has been that no increase shall be made this year, but that the matter shall be considered at the next session of Parliament. I might point out that the latter part of this section is a new one, namely:

Provided, however, that any commissioner hereafter appointed shall hold office during good behaviour for a period of ten years from the date of his appointment, but shall be removable by the Governor General on address of the Senate and House of Commons, and shall cease to hold office upon reaching the age of sixty-five years.

I think this is practically the same clause that appears in the Railway Act with reference to the railway commissioners.

Mr. BUREAU: I think the present railway commissioners are appointed for life or until they reach the age of fifty-five.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The present Civil Service commissioners hold their office for life.

Mr. BUREAU: But any appointed hereafter are limited to ten years, or less than that if they should reach the age of sixty-five before their ten years has expired. For the sake of uniformity I think we should delete the word "hereafter" and say that the commissioners shall hold office during good behaviour for a period of ten years.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Up to date there has been no limitation as to the tenure of office of members of the Civil Service Commission. When the present members were appointed it was with the understanding that the appointment was made during life or good behaviour. We do not wish to apply the new provision to the present members.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The powers of the Civil Service Commission are very wide, and justly so. They have to supervise the Inside and Outside Services throughout Canada. They will be flooded with correspondence and they will have to conduct investigations into the various services. I see it is provided that they shall have full power to investigate conditions in the service from one end of the country to the other. There are inequalities in the service. Take, for instance, the salaries paid to the commissioners. The Hon. Mr. Roche is given $6,000 and the other two commissioners $5,000 each. They will have jurisdiction over deputy ministers. Is it fair that deputy ministers should get more salary than the commissioners? I know of at least four of the deputy ministers whose salaries will be higher than those of the commissioners themselves. Since you are making a reform you should correct any inequalities that may exist. It is not fair that Mr. Jameson, Mr. Larochelle and Hon. Mr. Roche should have lower salaries than those over whom they have jurisdiction.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They have not jurisdiction over the deputy ministers.

Mr. LEMIEUX: They have jurisdiction over the Civil Service and the deputy ministers are a part of the Civil Service.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They have only jurisdiction in the matter of appointments and promotions.

Mr. LEMIEUX: They are under the commission. They have to submit to the rulings of the commission, and it seems to me there should be a readjustment of salaries.

Mr. MORPHY: Would the hon. gentleman be willing to cut down the salaries of the deputy ministers and adjust it in that way?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am not saying that, but you might perhaps increase the salaries of the commissioners.

Mr. DAVIS: Do I understand lines 31, 32 and 33 of paragraph 3 section 3 to apply simply to the commissioners who have hitherto been appointed? There seems to be a conflict between that and the provision beginning with line 35. I suggest that lines 31, 32 and 33 might be struck out altogether, and then the other clause beginning with line 35 would read:

Provided, that any commissioner hereafter appointed shall hold office during good behaviour for a period of ten years from the date of his appointment.

—and so on. I do not see why the commissioners already appointed should not have that limitation of ten years as well as those hereafter appointed.

[Mr. Lemieux.]

Mr. PEDLOW: I do not see why lines 31, 32 and 33 should be included at all, because the point appears to be covered by the next paragraph.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The last provision is intended to apply only to appointments hereafter made. The Civil Service Commission has been in existence for a good many years and some of the present members were appointed a long time ago. It would hardly be fair to limit their tenure of office to ten years. I think that should only apply to future appointments.

Mr. DAVIS: As the clause now stands, there is no limit of age imposed upon those who are already appointed. It is only those who may be hereafter appointed who must cease to hold office on reaching the age of 65 years?

Mr. CURRIE: There was one feature to which I referred last night when the Bill was under discussion, and that is the representation of the returned soldiers on this commission. Further on we are to deal with the matter of giving returned soldiers a preference, but when the commission is being appointed some representation should be given to the returned soldiers on that board. I suggest that the commission should be increased in number from three to five. I do not think that the returned soldiers' associations will be satisfied with the Bill as it stands, because in a great many instances, since the commission has taken charge, they have been set aside. The Government passed an Order in Council about two years ago laying down the principle that no one should receive an appointment in the Civil Service who was of military age if there was a returned soldier available. That secured the appointment of a great many men who were slightly deficient, a finger or a hand lost, but who were still able to do good work in the Service. Since the commission has taken charge of the matter that rule has been changed in this respect, that it does not apply to married men in Class 1, under the Military Service Act, up to a certain age. The result has been that married men of military age have been getting appointments in preference to returned soldiers. The returned soldier has a very difficult position when he goes into the service. For some reason—I do not know why—officials in the service, in the majority of cases, make it very difficult for a returned soldier to get along. I am referring to the returned soldier not alone in the English-speaking parts of Canada but to other parts as well. The same thing will occur on the other side of the Ottawa river when a soldier comes back with a leg or an arm off. Men in that condition are perhaps a little short of temper and they have great difficulty in getting along in the Civil Service. I fear that, unless something is done while this Bill is before the House to see to it that in new appointments returned soldiers get a fair chance, their claims to preference will be overlooked. It is all very well to employ fine words and to say this and that shall be done, but excuses will be found for evading the provisions of the Act. Under this Bill the minister can appoint anybody to any position he likes on the understanding that he is appointing him for some technical purpose. The returned soldiers are anxious that representation should be given to them on this board. There are a lot of officers returning with empty sleeves and they could fill a $5,000 position very well. This board takes on a heavy responsibility when it undertakes to manage the whole of the Civil Service from one end of Canada to the other. It is a greater undertaking than that of the Railway Commission. The commissioners should receive the same remuneration as the railway commissioners because their position is equally important, equally responsible and there is far more work than these three men can do. The Railway Commission is much larger than this commission and I do not see why the latter should not be enlarged and divided into sections to deal with certain portions of the work. I do not wish to delay the Bill in any way, but I am going to press an amendment, and if it is defeated I will accept the decision of the committee cheerfully. I am only endeavouring to do my duty to those men who have returned from the battle front.

Another thing is that there is no provision made as to who the examiner shall be to pass upon the examination. It is easy to trick a man out of his examination. If you are going to pass this law you must give the returned soldiers a square deal, or convince the House and the country that there has been an effort to do so. That is all I want. I ask the minister if a definite decision has been arrived at on that point?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The suggestion that the commission be enlarged from three to five members is not at the present time favourably received by the Government. However, this Bill will be, in one form or another, before Parliament next session. In the meanwhile, I promise my hon. friend that due consideration will be given to the suggestion. I do not say that it is without merit, but I do not think we should enlarge the commission now.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I agree with the hon. member from North Simcoe in the principle which he has enunciated with respect to returned soldiers, and my reason is that there has already been a disposition shown to turn the soldiers down and not give them a fair show. In my own province quite a considerable number of the best offices in which vacancies have occurred have been given to old partisans rather than to returned soldiers. As this commission should be a purely judicial one, I would suggest the appointment of two returned soldiers, so as to equalise that body as far as possible and eliminate the personal equation as it applies in politics.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: I quite agree with the suggestion of the hon. member from North Simcoe. We must appreciate the fact that we have, or will have soon, some five hundred thousand men overseas, and the number may reach one million. We are now engaged in considering a Bill that will greatly affect these men, and in which they will be considerably interested. It has been suggested that the ministers do not approve of making an enlargement of the board at the present session. As I understand it, however, the Bill is before the House for its approval, and if a majority of the members decide that the commission shall consist of five members instead of three, I think their decision should go into effect. I cannot quite understand the course of the Acting Minister of Finance in objecting to the suggestion.

Mr. MURPHY: A short time ago the hon. member from Neepawa (Mr. Davis) asked a question with reference to the age limit of the Civil Service Commissioners. I did not hear the question answered, and perhaps the hon. gentleman would restate the point.

Mr. DAVIS: My question had reference to the enforcement of the age limit in the case of commissioners hereafter appointed—I understand it does not apply to those already in office. Am I correct in my understanding?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, that is the intention.

Mr. DEVLIN: Judges on the Supreme Court Bench are held to be competent after they have reached the age of sixty-five years.

Mr. CARVELL: At any rate they sit.

Mr. DEVLIN: They sit and are held to be competent. Why should the Civil Service Commissioners be thrown out, without any provision apparently being made for them, after reaching the age of sixty-five? I think we should at least place the age for retirement at seventy, and after that grant them a pension, or do something for the poor fellows. Do not throw them completely on the street.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The purpose in limiting the age was that there would be a vast amount of work to be done by the commission, largely on account of the additional duties imposed upon them by this Bill, and it was thought that men, after reaching the age of sixty-five, would be unable to properly perform the work.

Mr. DEVLIN: Is there to be no provision for them after that?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No provision is made in this Bill. If Parliament ever adopts a superannuation Bill I believe it should be made applicable to them.

Mr. PEDLOW: If the principle of increasing the number of commissioners from three to five is adopted I would suggest that one of the two additional commissioners be a lady. A large proportion of the Civil Service staff at the present time consists of ladies, and in consideration of that fact I would deem them to be entitled to representation on the board. I would also suggest that a capable business man be appointed for one of the positions. If the selection of candidates for the Civil Service is left in the hands of university men, the Service will become a dumping ground for university graduates and those only. From information that I have received from many members of the Civil Service, that is one of the grievances under which they labour in the matter of appointments at the present time. Men who have been in the employ of the Government for years have to be satisfied with a lower salary than is given to recent university graduates appointees of the commission. Young men fresh from the university, because of their educational qualifications—which often have no bearing on the duties they are to perform —are brought to the Civil Service and placed in positions at much higher salaries than are paid to other persons who have been working for the Government for years. That is an injustice which is causing great irritation among the great body of civil servants, and I would like the Government to bear this point in mind when they are introducing reforms.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I also agree with my hon. friend from North Simcoe as to the desirability of appointing a returned soldier to the Civil Service Commission. I believe that for many years to come the returned soldiers will not only be applicants for positions under the Government, but will be selected in preference to others, and naturally so.

Furthermore I believe that now we have accepted the principle of women's franchise—notwithstanding the fact that I voted against the Women's Franchise Bill for the reasons I gave at the time; I thought it was a question which was not relevant to this Parliament and should have been decided by the Provincial Legislature—and now that the women of Canada are so numerous in the Civil Service, and are such excellent employees, they should have a representative on that commission.

Take the Civil Service in Ottawa: I have had some experience as Postmaster General. There were a large number of young ladies in the departments, and I am proud to say that they were about the best employees we had. I think the same compliment may be paid to the ladies who are in other departments. Throughout the land, and in all the large centres, there are also ladies employed in the outside service in the Post Office Department and elsewhere. I see my hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) smile; does he not believe as Minister of Labour that the women of Canada should be entitled to a representative on this commission? Take the inspection of factories and other places where large numbers of women are employed; public opinion has forced municipal and provincial governments to appoint female inspectors. It seems to me that as the Civil Service will be open to men as well as women there should be a representative of the women of Canada on this commission.

Mr. MORPHY: With reference to the question of salaries, I would like to know from the minister what will be paid to the secretary of the Civil Service Commission, so that the House will know what this board will cost? There seems to be no provision made for the secretary. The present secretary is a very capable man——

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: His salary is provided for in the estimates.

Mr. MORPHY: How much is it?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: He is now receiving $3,800.

Mr. MORPHY: Is that all?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. MORPHY: Well, he is a man of great experience, and has been secretary of the commission for about ten years, and is a very active, capable and painstaking official. It seems to me that this Bill should provide a reasonably decent salary for Mr. Foran in that position.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think the estimates provided an increase for him this session.

Mr. MORPHY: Of how much?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: An increase of $700.

Mr. MORPHY: Making his salary $4,500. I notice that the Railway Commission has a pretty heavy salary list, the Chief Commissioner is paid $12,500, the Assistant Chief Commissioner $9,000, the Deputy Chief Commissioners $8,000, and two commissioners each at $8,000. If the Civil Service Commission is to be of effective service to the country, there will come within its jurisdiction five thousand Inside Service employees and sixty thousand Outside Service employees. This undertaking will relieve the members of enormous work and will consequently put a tremendous strain upon the commission. I do not like to fall in just now with the appointment of either a lady or a returned soldier to the commission, because taking the personnel of the commission, I am satisfied that the interests of the returned soldier will probably be better looked after by men of this calibre who are not returned soldiers than if a returned soldier were added. The commissioners, not being of the returned soldiers class, are in a better position to render absolute justice in every case. Will an appointment such as that of Mr. O'Connor, the late Cost of Living Commissioner come under this Bill?

The CHAIRMAN: I am afraid the hon. gentleman is out of order. His question has nothing to do with the number of commissioners or the salaries paid to them.

Mr. MORPHY: Probably I am out of order, but I do not like to be always talking.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think if a commissioner were required to investigate specially some particular subject, he would probably be appointed by Order in Council and would not come under the provisions of this Bill. But Mr. O'Connor, I think, is a member of the Civil Service, and was merely assigned to certain duties as an investigator by the Labour Department.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. CURRIE: Before it is carried, I would like again to impress upon the minister the advisability of making an arrangement for the appointment of a returned soldier. Members of this House, or at least, some of them, owe their seats to the soldiers, and here is an opportunity to do something substantial for the soldier in a practical way. Instead of doing it for the soldier, with all due regard to the present personnel of the commission, it has been a little "bit" for politicians. Let us be frank about it, and take this clause into consideration before the Bill is declared passed. We have not done very much for the returned soldier this session. True, there is one measure about pensions, but pensions will not interest more than fifteen per cent of all the soldiers who return after the war is over; in fact, a great many will come back far more efficient than they were when they went away. Everybody was clamouring for the soldier when he went away, and it is "Tommy this and Tommy that" when the war is on, but after the war its Tommy get under the barn or out in the woods so far as any position is concerned. The House is sympathetic toward the returned soldier, and I think that the Government should seriously take into consideration increasing the number of commissioners to include a returned soldier. If they do not, I can assure them, that, the soldiers will come to the conclusion that they are not being considered in the matter at all. We are inclined to do a great deal of talking about the soldier and very little acting if we can avoid it. For that reason, I would ask the minister to let this section stand, and go on with some others, and to sleep over it on Sunday and see what can be done. I am not asking anything unfair when I ask that the soldiers have a representative on that commission. I am doing it in all earnestness, and I think I am supported by members on both sides of the House. There is a feeling abroad that this Bill is not doing justice to the soldiers, and here is a chance to prove that it is.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think it is quite likely that the additional work which will be imposed upon the commission by this Bill will render it necessary to enlarge the personnel of the commission. I do think, however, that the commission should not be enlarged for the present year, at least while the new Act is being tried. After an experience of ten or twelve months with the new Act, the present commissioners will be able to reach a much sounder conclusion as to the increase which should be made in the personnel of the commission. I do not object to the suggestion of my hon. friend; it is quite a proper one, and has much merit. But I do think that the matter should stand over for another year. As I have already said, this Bill will almost of necessity be before Parliament next session. The Civil Service Commission in administering the Act will find many defects in the legislation, and I have no doubt they will be back at the next session of Parliament asking for amendments and additions to the present Act.

Mr. CURRIE: My reason in asking for this now is this: The Government has already appointed these commissioners, they are political appointees, and there is not a returned soldier amongst them. Not that a returned soldier has any particular merits for a position of this kind simply because he is a returned soldier, but if we are going to give returned soldiers the preference why not start by appointing two of them to this commission? I should be willing to trust the work of this commission to two Liberal returned soldiers. I fought alongside Liberal soldiers, and found them just as good as Conservatives. In the trenches there is no politics; all are equal; the only thing required is obedience to authority. I could use very strong language with regard to this matter. Every commission lately appointed that has done well has a returned soldier on it, while, strange to say, some of the commissions which do not include returned soldiers are giving the Government any amount of trouble. Take, for instance, the Food Board. If that body was in charge of a returned soldier he would make the people "stand round." We should know whether we were breaking the law at breakfast time, because a returned soldier knows what discipline means. If two men are to be added to the commission, it is well to appoint them now. The country will not grudge the salaries of two additional men, and we shall know whether the Government intends to implement its promises and pledges to the soldiers during the election—that the Government would support them both in the trenches and after they returned to Canada. Now is the time to implement that promise, but that is not being done. Before this Bill is passed the acting minister should take this matter into careful consideration with the other ministers, who, I know, are sympathetic, and with the Prime Minister, in whom the soldiers have confidence. Let us have a real Bill so far as returned soldiers are concerned; let us not leave the returned soldiers to the mercy of examiners or of the recommendations of inspectors, postmasters and customs officials throughout the country.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We could not now amend the Bill so as to enlarge the commission. It would be necessary to introduce a new resolution and to give forty-eight hours' notice of it.

Mr. CURRIE: I do not think the House will object if the acting minister introduces a resolution of that kind. I have seen authority to spend $50,000,000 go through this House in a few minutes, and if the acting minister will bring down a provision such as I have suggested, I am confident that members will be willing to stay the rules and to pass it in half an hour. No man here would raise his voice against doing justice to the returned soldier.

Mr. PEDLOW: I agree with the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) that in the event of its being possible to increase the number of commissioners to five, one of them should be a returned soldier who is capable of filling the position. It has been urged by several speakers during this discussion that Civil Service appointments in various localities throughout the country should be made by the selection of local candidates as far as possible. I am informed that a returned soldier was recently sent from Montreal to fill a position in the Immigration Department in western Ontario. I am glad to know that it is possible to find in Montreal a returned soldier capable of filling a position in western Ontario, but unfortunately the appointment was resented in western Ontario. The appointment of a returned soldier on the Civil Service Commission would prevent anomalies of that kind, and ensure that returned men capable of filling positions in particular localities should be taken from those localities if at all possible. I repeat again my suggestion that a woman should be appointed on the Civil Service Commission. A large number of civil servants are females who require consideration not only in point of ability but in the matter of their surroundings and in other respects, in both the Inside and the Outside Service. It is desirable that a capable woman should be on the commission, not only to assist in the selection of female employees, but also to look after their interests after they have been appointed.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I strongly support the proposal that a returned soldier be appointed to the commission and I should raise no objection to the introduction of a resolution to accomplish that, even at this late stage of the session. The business of the House would not be delayed. But I should like the Acting Minister of Finance to reply to my suggestion of a moment ago. The women of Canada have been given the franchise, and have been declared competent to take their responsibility on national issues. Women have been admitted as members of the legislatures of Alberta and British Columbia. In view of the large number of women in the Civil Service—and future Governments, whether Tory or Grit, will no doubt see that the widows, mothers and sisters of soldiers get the preference in the service—my suggestion that a woman be appointed on the commission is worth considering.

Mr. BLAKE: It should not be the business of this Government to go about creating appointments which have not been asked for. In this case we have had a request from returned soldiers that one of their members be appointed to this commission, but the Government does not seem disposed to accede to it. I agree that at least one returned soldier should be made a member of that commission. There is no reason why the membership of the commission should not be four as well as three or five. As to the appointment of a woman on the commission, it will be time enough to consider that when the women's organizations take the matter up and press for the appointment.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I see no objection whatever to the appointment of women to the Civil Service Commission. I do not think the statute prohibits it. At the present time, however, there is no vacancy, and it is hardly practicable to consider the question unless we decide to enlarge the commission. The commission, I think, must very shortly be enlarged, but it would be better to wait for a year and ascertain just to what extent it ought to be enlarged. The commission will in that way be able to gain a great deal of knowledge in administering the Act during the next six or ten months. If there is no objection to passing this clause, I shall during the next day or two present the suggestion of the hon. member (Mr. Blake) to the Government for consideration, and if the Government decides to enlarge the commission, a resolution will be introduced and the suggestion made effective.

Mr. NICKLE: As the acting minister has stated that the commission must very shortly be enlarged, I suppose that he will not be averse to going the length of saying that if that is done he will keep in mind the recommendation of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) that a returned soldier should be appointed, because in my opinion it is very essential that somebody should be there who will constantly watch the interests of those men.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have no hesitation in saying that.

Mr. CURRIE: I understand then that the minister is willing to come back to this section and give us a statement as to whether or not the Government has considered this matter.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: Under this section the ten year tenure of office seems to apply only to commissioners who may be appointed in the future. Why is a distinction made betwen present and future incumbents.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The present commissioners were appointed for life. That was the effect of the statute at the time. It would hardly be fair to cut down the tenure of office of the present commissioners.

Mr. MURPHY: What is the reason for the change?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think the change is a good one to introduce.

Mr. MURPHY: I am not questioning it, I am only asking for an explanation.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It was based on the analogy of the Railway Commission.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have already stated to the committee that we are applying to the Civil Service Commission the principle which is now found in the Railway Act in respect of the appointment of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If the principle laid down by the minister is a proper one—and it is a proper one—that if a man has been appointed for life, the period of his services to the State must not be changed, surely the same principle should apply to the members of the Civil Service who enlisted under an Order in Council granting them during their time of service their full salaries in addition to their military pay. Why should there be a difference between their case and the case of the Civil Service Commissioners? Another Order in Council is passed, and the civil servants are now refused that which they were solemnly promised by the first Order in Council.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not wish to enter into a discussion as to the merits of that Order in Council. It is not relevant to this section.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is, by analogy.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Before getting away from the proposition of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) that two returned soldiers should be appointed as Civil Service Commissioners, I should like to say that the statement of the acting minister is quite satisfactory in one respect, but I hardly think the appointment of the commissioners has been in accordance with what we understood was to be the policy of the Government as regards the filling of vacancies in the public service of this country, that is, that returned soldiers should have the preference. With regard to the question of salaries, just brought up by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), I presume that if two returned soldiers are appointed this year or next year, they will be appointed for a ten-year term, whereas the present commissioners are appointed practically for a lifetime. The returned soldier problem is not a new one. Our soldiers have for a number of years been coming back in large numbers, and they will be coming back in increasing numbers for some time. In view of the fact that we have to-day compulsory military service in this country, the returned soldiers have the first claim to be represented on commissions that are being appointed. The feeling is very strong amongst returned soldiers that they are not, in many cases, receiving at the hands of the Government the attention to which they are entitled. That matter has been very forcibly brought to my attention in the last few days in regard to a matter which is not quite pertinent to the subject with which we are now dealing. It goes to substantiate the argument advanced by the hon. member for North Simcoe that returned soldiers should be represented on the Civil Service Commission, particularly in view of the fact that it is proposed to put the Outside Service under the jurisdiction of this commission. It is also another very strong argument why this Bill should stand over for the present session.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The principle of the Bill and the time of its introduction have been discussed for a day and a half. I have been obliged to call many hon. members to order, and the House a few moments ago agreed to support the Chairman in keeping the debate relevant to the clause under discussion. Whether the Bill should be introduced now or not has certainly nothing to do with the number of commissioners to be appointed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I submit, Sir, to your ruling. I was referring to the fact that the proposition of the acting minister was that, in the future, it might be advisable to appoint further representatives on this board, and I am of the opinion there is a connection between the two. That is the reason why I brought the matter to the attention of the committee. I should like to say a word or two as to the advisability of increasing the salaries and also of extending the scope of the commission. This is a matter we ought to consider very seriously. The financial condition of the country is such as to demand that we should exercise the greatest economy with regard to all matters of administration. We cannot see very far into the future, but I think the man is blind who cannot foresee great difficulty in carrying on in this country in the years to come. We are fixing salaries, and the minister intimates that next year it may be advisable to increase those salaries very materially; that other commissioners are receiving larger salaries. I have not anything to say with regard to that more than that I do not agree with a good many of the statements that have been made. There are, apparently, always many people who are anxious to get into the public service, and after they are once in the public service, their efficiency, in the minds of a great many people, is judged by the amount of salary they are drawing. I do not think there is any connection between the two. A man should only be appointed to a Government position because of the eminent qualifications which he possesses. If that policy were carried out in its entirety I would have no objection whatever to the present Bill going into effect immediately, but that policy certainly has not been pursued in the past, and I do not expect it will be pursued in the future. The idea that a large salary indicates efficiency or ability on the part of the recipient is something I do not agree with.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—duties of Commission:

Mr. DAVIS: I cannot find any clause giving the commission power to recommend dismissals or reductions in the staff. I thought that one of the evils of the Civil Service was over-manning. I know of one case where the sub-head of a department has been brought before the deputy minister for inefficiency, but no one has urged this man's dismissal. I am told that on account of the introduction of machines in the Statistics branch, seventy-five to a hundred men in the Department of Trade and Commerce statistics could be dispensed with. The work of that branch is done by seventy-four men in the United States, and if they employed men there on the scale we employ them, in proportion to the work to be done, seven or eight hundred men would be required in that branch in the States. If the commission is going to effect what the people and Parliament of Canada desire, we must have some means of getting rid of supernumeraries. There is provision in the Bill for transferring supernumeraries from one department to another, but not for dismissing them from the service. Is the principle we adopt that once a man gets a Government job he has a job for life, and must be maintained whether the Government has any use for his services or not? If that is the principle, it should be clearly recognized.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The power of dismissal rests with the Governor in Council, and is provided for in section 30 of the Bill. I do not think it would be wise to put this power in the hands of the commission. Clause 4, I think, gives the commission ample authority to make recommendations to the Governor in Council, and there is on the Order Paper to-day a resolution providing that the Civil Service Commission shall prepare a list of employees who owing to advanced age, failing health or lack of experience or ability, are not capable of rendering efficient service. These men may be dispensed with on pecuniary provision to be determined by the commission. This resolution will be introduced in the course of a day or so, and I think it will give the commission the power my hon. friend desires. One of the difficulties in the past in dispensing with the services of employees has been that we have no Superannuation Act providing for the retirement of civil servants at a certain age, say sixty-five years. I think it would be in the interest of the State if we had a Superannuation Act, and that matter will have to receive the consideration of Parliament some day soon.

Mr. PEDLOW: I understood that five per cent was deducted from the salaries of all civil servants.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That goes to a retirement fund, not a superannuation fund. It is paid to the civil servant on his removal from office or to his dependents in the case of his death.

Mr. CURRIE: Would it not be advisable to incorporate this resolution in the Act, with one change? If instead of the word "forthwith" we substituted the words "from time to time," that would allow the Civil Service Commission to appoint a board to make an investigation of the different departments from time to time with a view to the removal or superannuation of the inefficient. In the United States efficiency experts go through the different departments from time to time for this purpose, and if they find a man who has done no work for six months or is an idler or inefficient, they have power to remove him. If we made this resolution one of the sections of the Bill, with the change I have suggested, it would invest the commission with this power.

Mr. MOWAT: In all business concerns it has been the rule that the appointing authority shall be the dismissing authority, because that gives more power from the very moment the appointment is made. While it is proper that the Governor in Council shall assent to any dismissal, I think it would work out better if the dismissals were to be recommended by the Civil Service Commission and not to become effective until approved by the Governor in Council. Otherwise, we would seem to be returning to the old system of making the dismissals a departmental, and to some extent perhaps political, matter. Would it not be better and more convenient for the Cabinet to have action taken in the first place by the commission?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The dismissing power, while resting with the Governor

General in Council, virtually is under the deputy head. It must be so because nobody but the person under whom the civil servant works will have cause for dismissing him. I do not think it would be proper that the commission should have the power of dismissal because they could only do it on the recommendation of the deputy head. So long as the technical power rests with the Governor in Council that is a protection for the members of the civil service against the deputy heads.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I think that what my hon. friend from Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) says is right. If you are going to abolish patronage you should abolish it for good. Appointments are to be made on the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission. We are arranging that the Civil Service may be investigated by the commission, and when a dismissal takes place it should be by virtue of powers conferred on the commissioners; otherwise, the ministers and the Government would be pestered all the year round and patronage really would not be abolished. There would be some political influence to maintain in office a man who otherwise would deserve to be dismissed. If you are going to abolish patronage, wipe it out completely. The only way to do that is to leave the handling of the Civil Service, both the appointment and dismisal, to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: If this Bill passes it assumes to place under the Civil Service Commission some 70,000 public servants throughout the Dominion. It seems to me that to expect three men in Ottawa to see that all these officials are efficiently carrying out their duties is to place upon their shoulders a responsibility entirely beyond their ability to successfully carry out. It brings us back to the point that if we are going to abolish patronage, we must place the power of dismisal in the hands of the man who is employing the official.

Mr. CURRIE: The commission employs him here.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The commission is the employing head just in the same degree as the executive of the Canadian Pacific railway in Montreal is the employing head but I question very much whether you would expect the president, and his first and second vice-presidents, to determine whether a section foreman was doing his duty on one of the Pacific divisions of the road. It is in that relative position that you place the Civil Service Commission. If you impose upon them the responsibility of determining whether any one of the 70,000 public servants was or was not doing his duty. The work of even investigating the circumstances surrounding those 70,000 public servants would be too great for them to do. It would be a physical impossibility for any three men you could find on the top of this earth. Some one must be placed in control of each individual who will see whether he is, or is not, doing his duty, and he must have the power to dismiss any who are not properly attending to their work. Otherwise we will get back to the point at which we started.

Mr. DAVIS: It seems to me that in this matter we are trenching on a question that is fundamental to this Bill and it is this: When this Bill comes into force who is going to be held responsible for the efficiency of the Civil Service? It is going to be the duty of the Civil Service Commission to see that we get efficient men, and they are expected to see that there is no favouritism in connection with the different employments. Should not one of their powers be to recommend that only so many men shall be employed and to determine how many may be required? They should have some knowledge as to this.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: How could they get that knowledge? They will be busily engaged in performing the duties of their office, making appointments, holding examinations and attending to promotions. How could they acquire knowledge as to the proficiency of any particular official? That knowledge must be with the administrative head of the department; I do not see how you could look to anyone else.

Mr. DAVIS: Is this board only to be an examining board as to the competency of candidates for the Civil Service, and is it to have nothing to say about promotions or anything of that sort?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Promotions are to be made by the Civil Service Commission, but it is largely an appointing body. It was never intended that the Civil Service Commission should have to examine into the efficiency of departments from time to time or make inquiries as to the efficiency of any members of the service.

Mr. CURRIE: I think that is one of the weak features of the Bill. The hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) pointed out what is absolutely correct, that in the conduct of a business, say of a railway such as the Canadian Pacific, the man who is immediately over the employees, that is the superintendent or the foreman, employs the men and he must necessarily have the power of dismissal. But such is not the case under this Act. This is a peculiar Act. The party that employs here is the commission, and the party that promotes is the commission. The only party that can dismiss is the Governor General in Council. There is no provision made whereby, if a minister has an efficient employee he can dismiss him unless the deputy head approves. The Civil Service Commission should have an inspection staff whose duty it would be, where complaints were made, to investigate and, when good reason is shown, to have the employee dismissed. The postmaster of Ottawa, or of any large town, will have nothing to do theoretically with the appointment of his staff. An appointee may not be a local man or may come from any part of the country. The hands of the postmaster are absolutely tied whether the members of his staff are doing their work properly or not. I quite agree with the hon. member for East Algoma that some arrangement should be made for the maintenance of discipline in the various departments. You cannot have discipline unless the power that appoints is also the power that dismisses. There should be an appeal from that power to the Governor in Council if a man thinks he has been unjustly dealt with. The Civil Service Commission not only has the power of appointment but has the power of promotion. That means that the commission must know whether a man is carrying on his work properly and is entitled to promotion. If you are going to have promotion for anything else except for length of service—in which case a man goes up automatically—you must have some provision for determining the merits of the candidate for promotion. If you are going to have promotion for merit you must have some inspection whereby the merit of the man can be judged. I have in my mind the case of a man of high qualifications, a man who, in private life, would be drawing a salary of $5,000 or $6,000 a year. If I required his services for the business he is in I would be very glad to give him $5,000 a year. He is drawing only $1,800 from the Government, and he finds himself in the position that his salary is not adequate for him to live on. That man is an expert accountant, who could undertake the inspection of any one of the largest banks in Canada, and still he is compelled to live on such a paltry salary. How are you going to arrange matters so that the commission shall take cognizance of such cases and give these men their deserts? I want every man in the service who is doing his work well and properly to receive proper recognition. No provision is made for that in this Bill. If there were some kind of inspection bureau whose business it would be to consider the service which each person was rendering, a deserving man could come before this bureau and say: I have been working very hard night and day for the Government; I do not get paid for my night work, but I get the work done; a great deal of additional work has fallen upon me because of the war—or for other reasons—but I am willing to stand up to it and I want you to consider my conditions of employment and grant me an increase of pay. In such a case the bureau of inspection would verify the man's statement and forward his case to the Civil Service Commission accompanied by the recommendation "this man is deserving." Or an officer in charge of the business of a custom house, might say: "I have a lot of men here, but I can get along with fewer; there are three or four loafers who are doing nothing but sit round; they are all the time smoking cigarettes instead of doing a good day's work and they simply defy me." The inspector who is investigating the case would say: "Suspend these men, because we are going to report." The men would come before that inspector and would have to prove whether they were entitled to remain on the staff or not. I think that is the procedure that would be followed in the case of any large business institution. Why not make this Bill a thoroughly business measure? Otherwise we are only wasting the time of the House and doing great injury by changing the present law. Under that law you have some responsibility in connection with appointments, but unless you introduce business methods under the present Bill that responsibility will disappear.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Might I draw the attention of the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Davis) to subsection (b) of section 4. That seems to give the commission power, upon the request of the head of any department, to make an investigation as to the efficiency of a department or any branch of it.

Mr. MORPHY: I was looking at the section when the minister spoke, and it seems to me that all these subsections give the commission all the powers that are required, without, however, the power of dismissal. Therefore if a man in one of the lower grades of the Service has been guilty of an act which would warrant his dismissal the commission has no power to deal with his case, even though they appointed him, and the matter must go to the Governor in Council. It does not seem to me consistent with modern conditions that the commission that has the supervision of all the members of the Service within the classes mentioned, and who appointed the man—

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It would seem quite proper that the employer should have the right of dismissal. The Civil Service Commission will scarcely ever be in a position to exercise a reliable judgment in respect of the dismissal of any person. They would have to act upon information given to them by the deputy head, or some other officer of the department under whom the person who is recommended for dismissal worked. I think the suggestion that the power of dismissal ought to go to the Civil Service Commission is unsound in principle, and, I think, will not be found in the Civil Service Act of any country.

Mr. DAVIS: I did not suggest that the commission should have the right to dismiss, but that they should have the right to recommend that the number of employees in a department should be reduced, and possibly, on investigation, that a certain person should be dismissed.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think we have that power now.

Mr. DAVIS: I doubt whether it is contained within the limits of section 4.

Mr. HOCKEN: I understand from the minister that the dismissal has to take place on the report of the deputy minister. I was wondering what would have happened in the Kingston post office had the deputy minister reported that Mrs. Narraway's presence was not necessary there and asked for her removal. It just emphasizes what I said, that we are putting altogether too much power in the hands of the deputy ministers. We are making the deputy head, in the last analysis, the sole referee. Then, if I understand correctly, promotions are also made upon the recommendation of the deputy minister to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

[Mr. Morphy.]

Mr. HOCKEN: You make promotions dependent on the recommendation of the deputy minister, and he has the power to promote those who may or may not be efficient.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What could you put in place of that?

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not suggest putting anything else in its place, but I do suggest that in framing this Bill some check should be placed upon a deputy minister, and when we come to the proper clause I may have something to suggest in the way of strengthening the Bill so as to discourage that favouritism and nepotism which it is alleged now prevails.

Mr. PEDLOW: I take it that the management of the business of the Dominion Government is no different in principle from that of any other large business concern in the country. You must have centralized authority having sole control and being supreme in arranging matters of organization, filling vacant offices, making promotions, carrying out dismissals and dispensing with supernumeraries. I think it is the intention of the Acting Minister of Finance to make provision by means of this Bill along those lines. The Civil Service Commission is the best power to take the place of centralized authority, and corresponds to an individual in a personal organization. When you begin to develop the business along definite lines you must appoint heads of departments. Now, the business of this country has been developing for years, and at the present time is developing along larger lines than it has ever done before. Consequently you must organize new departments under special heads. If you want to hold the special heads—deputies, or whatever you like to call them—responsible for the working out of their departments you must place them in control of those departments. We had an exhibition in one of the departments of the Government a few days ago of the mistake of following a different course. In the Department of Labour a junior employee upset the whole machinery of the department and caused the dismissal of the best department head that the Government has had for many years past, a man who gave good service to the Government. But his work and the work of the employees under him was interfered with by the man over his head. It is a very difficult matter, as I see it, to draw the line through any mechanism of the Government machinery, but I insist that the steps should be by easy grades, so that there will be no confusion caused by the reorganization undertaken by the Civil Service Commission throughout the many ramifications of the business of the country. The commission holds the department head responsible. He can only be held responsible provided he has control over those under his immediate charge. In that case I contend that in the case of an appointment which is unsatisfactory to the department head he should have recourse to the commission. Again, if the department head has been guilty of unfair treatment of an employee, that employee should have recourse to the commission, but only through the department head. In that way, you avoid friction. I claim, therefore, that in every case the employee should be responsible to the man immediately above him, and that man to the department head and the department head to the commission. In the case of the Department of Labour, the individual complaint—and I merely mention that to illustrate the principle—should have been to the department head, from the department head to the minister, and from the minister to the commission. And the commission, or else the Governor in Council, should have the last say in the retaining or dismissing of any employee. The same would hold good with supernumeraries. There is provision in the Bill enabling the commission to enter into any department and investigate it. I understand from Part II. that that investigation is for the very purpose of dealing with supernumeraries. In my judgment, if you are desirous of having a perfect working machinery in the Civil Service it must all work from a centre and to a centre. If there is overlapping you will have difficulty just as there was the other day with the Department of Labour.

Mr. MURPHY: In subsection (d) of this section, one of the duties of the commission is, " to obtain the assistance of competent persons to assist the commission in the performance of its duties." May I ask to what class of assistance that subsection applies?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It would apply, for instance, to examiners to hold examinations throughout the country. That is what it was intended for.

Mr. MURPHY: Not to the clerical staff of the commission?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It has no reference to that at all.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Illegally obtaining examination papers.

Mr. MURPHY: May I ask where these examination papers are printed?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They are printed in the offices of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MURPHY: Under their supervision?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. CURRIE: May I ask who prepares them? Is any provision made in this Bill whereby these examination papers will be prepared by a board, or who the board will be?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The papers are prepared by examiners specially appointed by the commission.

Mr. CURRIE: Who are the examiners?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They change from time to time.

Mr. CURRIE: Are they permanent?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Oh, no, they are not permanent.

Mr. CURRIE: Where is the authority given the commission to appoint examiners?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In sub-paragraph (d) of section 4.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Soliciting appointments.

Mr. MURPHY: If a capable and deserving official who, by reason of some feeling on the part of the deputy minister, is not given the promotion to which he is justly entitled, has representations made to the minister by the member for the constituency from which he originally came, would that be an offence under this section?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think the section means that he is confined to making such representations to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MORPHY: Who is to apply the principle of dismissal?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Dismissal is by the Governor in Council.

Mr. MORPHY: Is that the intention of the Act? This board which determines a man's qualifications and selects him for appointment should be responsible for him; if he commits flagrant offences which justify his dismissal, the board should have power to dismiss him. To limit the commission's power in this respect is like shearing Samson of his locks. The commission should be a strong body, with all the powers necessary to their duties, not an inefficient body, of no avail in the public service. If they have power to appoint men, they should have power to reject them.

Mr. MURPHY: Subsection 2 of section 9 says:

> Any person who, directly or indirectly, solicits or endeavours to influence any Minister of the Crown or the head of any department in favour of his appointment or promotion or to increase his salary, shall be deemed to be unworthy of such appointment, promotion or increase, and it shall not be accorded him; and if he is employed in the public service, he shall be liable to immediate dismissal.

I am speaking of a case of which I have knowledge, and in which, in an endeavour to obtain some attention at the hands of the minister and the justice that the official claims he is entitled to, representation has been made to the minister. Would such representation be deemed a contravention of the subsection which I have read.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think it would be.

Mr. MURPHY: Then how is such an official to obtain justice?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: By putting his case before the commission.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Subsection 3.

Mr. MURPHY: If he does put his case before the commission, the deputy minister, who would be complained of in the submission of the case, would probably make the man's life unbearable.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I should think that the commission would have the right to make a representation to the minister.

Mr. MURPHY: Surely the minister is not absolved of responsibility by this subsection.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not say that. My hon. friend inquires,—does he not?—how the case may be brought to the attention of the minister, assuming that the deputy minister is unfair?

Mr. MURPHY: Partly. Representation has been made direct to the minister on behalf of the official.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Rightly or wrongly, the section seems to provide that instead of going to the minister the man himself or the person who acts on his behalf shall go to the Civil Service Commission, who, if they deem it a case of injustice, may make representations to the deputy minister. If they find those representations unavailing, they would naturally take the case to the minister. That is what I understand by the section.

Mr. CURRIE: This is a very drastic clause. Take the case of a town or village close to a recently established munition work. The customs officer there suddenly finds that he has to take care of a customs revenue of from $500,000 to $2,000,000 instead of $20,000 a year which came in before the munition work was established. If a member of Parliament should make a suggestion to a minister of the Crown that more men be appointed in that customs office and that salaries of the employees be increased, he renders himself liable to the pains and penalties of this Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Subsection 2 of section 9 would appear to be too drastic. I am willing to drop it if hon. gentlemen think that that should be done.

Mr. CURRIE: The whole section is nothing but camouflage. The importuning of ministers of the Crown will go on just the same. The clause has been in the Act since 1908, but as a matter of fact ministers have made scarcely any appointments without first being importuned.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think the note "1908 s. 42" is accurate. The provision was not in this form in 1908.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Section 42 of the present Act reads:

> No person shall, directly or indirectly, solicit or endeavour to influence a member of the Commission with respect to the appointment of any person to the Service.

And so on. Subsection 2 prohibits direct or indirect solicitations to influence a member of the commission.

Mr. CURRIE: Now the words "member of the commission" are omitted and the words "Minister of the Crown" substituted therefor. May we canvass members of the commission, but not ministers of the Crown? It would seem that ministers of the Crown want to avoid all responsibility.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT.

The House resumed in Committee on Bill No. 53, respecting the Civil Service of Canada,—Mr.. A. K. Maclean,—Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

On section 9—soliciting appointments:

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: Subsection 2 might be all right in so far as it relates to the minister of the Crown; but when you extend it to the point where you forbid an employee in any department to appeal to the immediate head of the department, the officer under whose direct control the employee may be, for promotion, or an increase of salary, or in regard to any other question that may relate to his service in the department, and instead of that pass him over the head of his immediate superior and send him on to the commission, which, as I understand it, will be the head of the Civil Service, you are entirely reversing the system under which any large body of persons can be employed. If I understand anything about the maintenance of system in the employment of any body of persons whatever, the principle is that the employee shall appeal for a recommendation to his immediate superior before going to the head of his department, and unless he receives that recommendation I do not see how the executive, if I may be permitted to put it in that way, can intelligently deal with the case. Subsection 2 might well be struck out of the Bill.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If it is the judgment of the committee that subsection 2 be struck out, I am quite content.

Mr. BUREAU: Subsection 1 of section 9 reads:

> No person shall, directly or indirectly, solicit or endeavour to influence any minister of the Crown.

Would it not be better to prevent any influence being brought to bear on the members of the commission? If they are to have the direct recommendation, and if we are going to punish anyone who solicits a minister for appointment or promotion we should also protect the members of the commission, because they are the ones to whom you are to apply in the last resort if you are going to procure the appointment or promotion.

Mr. SHEARD: Section 9, in my opinion, could very well be struck out of the Bill. Subsection 1, if interpreted strictly, debars me from giving a testimonial of character to any applicant who may wish to enter the Civil Service. If a civil servant has been unfairly and unjustly treated in a department surely the minister at the head of that department has a right to hear that civil servant and to go into the merits and demerits of the case. Otherwise, representative government is at an end so far as that department is concerned. It is the privilege and right—and it has been so stated on the floor of this House during this session—of any subordinate to go to the head of his department and to make any representations he sees fit and proper to make, and I do not see why we should deprive him of that right. This clause contravenes the broad spirit of British liberty as I understand it, and debars a subordinate from appealing to the head of his department whom we in this Parliament hold responsible for the proper administration of that department. Instead of striking out clause 2 of section 9, I move that the whole clause be struck out, as I can see no good purpose in it. We desire, if I interpret the spirit of the committee correctly, that the minister shall be the head of his department with absolute control and that the various promotions shall be subject to his approval.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is good sense in the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Sheard). In endeavouring to accomplish a reform we must be careful not to defeat the very object of that reform. What is the channel of communication between the people, whom we represent, and the commission if it is not the member? Many people have no other means of communication with the Government or commission. It seems to me this clause would reduce to nil the role of the people's representatives. Suppose I have in my constituency two or three returned soldiers, humble, modest fellows who do not know the ministers or the commissioners. They would naturally come to me for a testimonial, and could I refuse to give them a letter of introduction to the minister or the commissioners? One word as to the commission. It consists of three members. One from the province of Nova Scotia, one from the province of Quebec, and one from the province of Manitoba. I hold no brief for the great province of Ontario, but it seems to me that that province should certainly have a say on the commission. How will a returned soldier from the back concessions of Nipissing or Algoma communicate with the commission? Let us not turn down the representatives of the people in that way. I represent the people of my constituency and I must speak for them. If I am impelled by any unworthy motives the criminal law will look after me. But nobody must assume that the representatives of the people must not go to a minister or a commissioner to say whether in his opinion Tom, Dick or Harry is a good man for a certain position.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Apparently it is the judgment of the committee that this clause be withdrawn, and I accordingly agree.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am not going to oppose the dropping of this section, but in view of the statements made by the last speaker I want to say a word as to how an applicant is going to have his case brought before the commission. The commissioners are naturally possessed of the instincts that were characteristic of them before they were appointed to their present positions, and they have their social connections, as people have in other walks of life. The result, I am afraid, will be that those who come in social contact with the commissioners will have a great advantage over those who do not, and the consequence will be that an humble individual who is not in a position to advocate his own claims will not have the same chance as the designing individual who would see to it that some one got next to the commissioner or deputy minister and argued his case, not in a way that would render him liable under this Act but in an insinuating way that would nevertheless accomplish the purpose in view. I think this section indicates that the Bill was not drafted with very much care, or it would not have contained this clause. I am heartily in accord with the views of the committee that this section should be dropped.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I do not wish to oppose the dropping of this section, but it seems to me that hon. gentlemen who have made that suggestion have entirely lost sight of the third clause of section 9, which says:

> Any person shall have the right to submit to the Commission a representation in writing with respect to the appointment of any person to the public service or with respect to the promotion, transfer of or an increase of salary to any officer, clerk or employee in the Public Service.

It seems to me that leaves it perfectly open for any hon. member to make any representation he likes to the commission, which, I understand, is to be the supreme body in connection with the Civil Service. The other parts of the section are simply to prevent any influence being used with the ministers of the Crown, the political heads, and that is simply following out the idea of getting rid of political patronage.

Mr. STEVENS: How is a member to know what representations to make to the commission if no one first makes representations to him? The first part of the section says distinctly that no one directly or indirectly shall solicit any assistance. So how can I tell which one of all my constituents wants to make representations unless he first applies to me? Clause 3 is absolutely idiotic unless the two preceding clauses are removed.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: The first clause says that no person shall directly or indirectly solicit or endeavour to influence any minister of the Crown. That is simply providing against bringing political influence to bear. It does not remove the opportunity for making representations to the commission.

Mr. SHEARD: I submit that clause 3 in the broad interpretation is somewhat of a gratuitous impertinence. The first two clauses deny the right to representatives of this House to any influence in the public service. In the drafting of this Bill the commission are hedged around with more red tape and precautionary measures than attach to His Majesty the King. It is going beyond all reason to say that the people's representatives shall not have the right to submit representations to their majesties the commissioners.

Mr. CURRIE: I do not wish to oppose the dropping of this section, but I wish to say a word over its funeral. During the last session I listened to the great representative of the French Government preaching democracy—Mr. Viviani. I shortly after listened to the eloquent representative of Great Britain. They told us that this was a war for democracy. Democracy means representative and responsible government. Yet, this is an attempt largely to set up a bureaucracy. It is opposed entirely to the principle of democracy to set up such a system as that, just as if we were in Prussia where nobody would dare approach the bureau, or communicate with it, or do anything of the kind. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Sheard) is a student of democracy, and he will very readily understand. The clause, to my mind, is an impertinence, especially the third sub-section. I suppose we cannot even look at the commission with a spy glass. I have objected largely to all the clauses of this Bill, and I think that if the ministers will look at it from the proper standpoint they will realize that it is an entirely undemocratic measure during war time. If anything can be said to win the war, it is certainly not going back on democracy. The best thing we can do is to drop this clause and go on with something else.

Mr. MURPHY: I would like to say a word just to clarify the situation so that we may understand the effect of dropping this clause. I would ask hon. members to realize what it means, and particularly those of my colleagues in this House who have been expressing their great delight that this Bill relieves them of any further annoyance in connection with patronage. If this section is dropped—and I am not opposed to dropping it if that is the wish of the committee—it throws the whole situation open again, and gives an opportunity to any one in this country to worry and harass every public man and candidate, ministers, members of the commission, deputy ministers and heads of branches just the same as in the good old days. If my hon. friends desire that situation, I can stand it as well as they can. I deem it my duty to point out that this will be the effect of dropping that section. If the desire of the committee is to drop it, I am not going to oppose it.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not see how leaving the clause in would prevent any person from doing what is here prohibited. The clause says that no person shall attempt to influence any minister of the Crown, but supposing he does, there is no fine or penalty. This merely expresses the opinion of this House that he should not do it.

Amendment (Mr. Sheard) agreed to, and section dropped.

On section 10, paragraph 1—Organization of departments; how effected:

Mr. SHEARD: We want the word "minister" to be inserted there. The section provides that the commission shall prepare plans for the organization of the department after consulting with the deputy heads, heads of branches, and other chief officers. We want to hold the minister absolutely responsible for the administration of his department, and therefore the section should contain a provision that the minister also should be consulted.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Bill practically does contain the provision that my hon. friend (Mr. Sheard) suggests. This clause merely enacts that the commission shall consult with the deputy heads with respect to the matter of reorganization and then report. The commission could get no assistance from a minister of the Crown that would be of value in the reorganization of the department. At least very few ministers would have that exact and detailed knowledge of the work of the department which the deputy head would have. But, when the recommendation of the commission is made, it must be approved by the Governor in Council, and accordingly the minister approves of any recomendation that may affect his department. The matter now stands just as my hon. friend would like to have it.

Mr. CURRIE: The minister should have the right to reorganize his department if he wants to without reference to the deputy head at all. Deputies have bucked against ministers in the past. When the reorganization is taking place the minister should be able to see that his department is organized in accordance with his ideas and not in accordance with the ideas of the deputy. We all know that the deputies have stood in the way of reform for years. We have had men go through the departments and we have spent large sums of money in investigating and studying the conditions, but no reorganization has been effected, because the deputies have always hung back and opposed any change and have carried on in the same old way. The ministers should be supreme over the deputies. Why should we desire to detract from the minister's responsibility and from the authority which the minister should possess in his own department? The day has gone by when we can put square pegs in round holes in managing the departments. The minister must take charge of his department and run it. We have ministers in this Government who are capable of doing that and I propose that we shall give them the opportunity. For that reason I support the suggestion of my hon. friend from South Toronto (Mr. Sheard); I think it is one that the Government should adopt.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Governor General in Council cannot approve of any report submitted by the commissioners for the reorganization of a department unless it has the express approval and sanction of the ministers. The clause simply enacts that the commission, after consulting with the deputy head, shall report a system of reorganization. But it has to be submitted to the Governor General in Council for approval, that is, it must have the approval of the ministers of the several departments. It would be impossible for the commission to work out any scheme of reorganization unless they consulted with the deputy heads. I cannot see any objection to the clause.

Mr. SHEARD: I am satisfied with the minister's explanation.

Mr. CURRIE: I am not quite satisfied, because I think that the clause ignores the minister altogether. The initiative is entirely left to the deputy heads and the commission, whereas the suggestion as to what shall be done in the department should come from the minister.

Mr. COWAN: I do not think that it ignores the minister. The Bill gives the commission power to consult with the deputy heads and the heads of branches, but they may also consult with the minister and with as many other people as they have a mind to. We ought to give this commission power to get all the information they can get and to use it. Unless they get that information we cannot expect any sensible result or proposal from them. It is utterly impossible that any minister could have technical knowledge of all the branches in any one of the departments. In the case of a department of half a dozen branches under half a dozen technical heads the commission must consult with these heads in order to get the knowledge necessary to make an intelligible report.

Mr. CURRIE: I know ministers in this Government who are just dying to take hold of their own department and straighten them out. They have so stated publicly. Let us give them a chance by inserting the word "ministers" in the clause.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I understand the minister to say that after the deputy has drafted the regulations the minister must pass upon those regulations before they are adopted?

Mr. CURRIE: That is the Cabinet, not the minister.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: The Cabinet is an assemblage of the ministers. If I understand the matter as presented, the ministers must necessarily pass upon what the deputy heads have placed before them.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The recommendations get to council by the submission of the minister who is the head of the department.

The CHAIRMAN: If hon. gentlemen will allow me I will read the subsections before any discussion takes place:

(2) If, after such approval, the duty head or the Commission is of opinion that any such plan of organization might with advantage be in any way changed, the Commission shall in a similar manner prepare a report upon such proposed change, and shall submit the same for the approval of the Governor in Council. No change shall be made in the organization of any department until it has been so reported upon by the said Commission.

(3) As soon as any plan of organization is confirmed by the Governor in Council, the deputy head shall, subject to the approval of the Commission, forthwith cause the officers, clerks and employees affected thereby to be reclassified for the purpose of placing each officer clerk and employee in a proper place under such plan of organization.

(4) If after such organization and classification has been effected, the number of officers, clerks, and employees in any portion of the public service, or in any class or grade thereof, is greater than the number allowed under such organization, the remainder shall be supernumeraries in that class or grade respectively in which they rank, and shall so remain until they are placed in any vacancies that may occur or until they are transferred to another portion of the public service, or until they leave such service.

(5) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to prejudicially affect the status or the present salaries or rights to future increase of any officer, clerk or employee, whether permanent or temporary, who is in the public service on the date of the coming into force of this Act, and if any such officer, clerk or employee is placed in any position where the maximum salary is smaller than the maximum salary of the position or grade in which he is now classified, he shall be eligible for increases until he reaches the maximum heretofore fixed for the position he previously occupied. 1908, s. 8, amended.

Mr. PEDLOW: I think the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) is right and that the words "a minister of the Crown" should be inserted after the word "commission," otherwise you overlook the minister entirely. I understand the Governor in Council is included, but I think a minister of the Crown is an entity distinct from the Governor in Council and should be included in the section.

Mr. MURPHY: I desire to make a suggestion which, in the light of actual experience, I think will improve the section referred to. The first Civil Service Act, as the minister knows, was passed in 1908 under the Government of which I happened to be a member, and the administration of the Act was attached to the department of which, at that time, I had charge. It was found that there were a good many anomalies in the departments owing to the fact that the same system of organization and classification was not carried out throughout the service. I take it that this new section is designed to remove those anomalies, and secure a levelling up throughout the service. That will be difficult unless some specific direction is given to the commission, so as to secure similar organization and classification in each department—in other words, so that the anomaly may not be presented, for instance, of men in different departments but doing the same class of work being paid different salaries. There are many such anomalies in the service in Ottawa, and I would suggest adding after the words "public service" in line twelve, the words: "Such organization, as far as possible, to follow the same general principles in all departments." If some authority such as that be not inserted, the commission will find it very difficult, indeed, to secure co-operation in all the departments.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am willing to accept the hon. gentleman's suggestion, and I move that there be added after the words "public service" on the twelfth line, the words:

Such organization as far as possible to follow the same general principles in all branches of the Civil Service.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BUREAU: A question was raised as to the reorganization being made. Reorganization is effected by consultation on the part of the heads of the departments, or the deputy heads, with the commission. Then subsection 2 provides:

No change shall be made in the organization of any department until it has been so reported upon by the said Commission.

That reorganization is in force and effect the moment it is approved by the Governor in Council. Following the reorganization, there will have to be a classification of the various employees who have heretofore been in the department, as provided in subsection 3. After this is done and the organization is complete, why not submit that organization and classification, with all the recommendations of both the commission and the deputy heads, to the Governor in Council?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That would be simply going over the work a second time. Nothing would be accomplished by that.

Mr. BUREAU: The fact that a plan of a house has been drawn does not exempt from accepting delivery of the house to complete the contract. A plan of organization may be elaborated and approved of by the Governor in Council, but the carrying out of the organization and classification is done by the deputy heads, and approved of by the commission.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. SHEARD: Before we go further I would ask the minister if there is any provision in this Bill for the dismissal of a public servant?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, we will come to it later.

Section 11—Tenure of office.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is no change in this section. It is the same as in the present Civil Service Act.

Mr. McKENZIE: The section provides that appointments shall be during pleasure. Under the old condition of things that was always understood to be the pleasure of the Crown. Whose pleasure is it now?

Mr. BUREAU: The pleasure of any party that is in power.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The pleasure of the Crown.

Mr. BLAKE: There are a lot of regulations providing for appointments to the Civil Service, but there seems to be no way of effecting dismissals.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—Addition to salary on appointment:

Mr. BUREAU: Is there any change here from the old Act?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The section is just the same, except that the sum stated in the third line is $200 instead of $500.

Mr. BUREAU: I asked the question because the note at the end of the section would indicate that it was a repetition of section 33 of the Act and the amendment is not shown by brackets. Why has the amount of $500 been decreased to $200? There must be some specific reason.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The reduction is made because under section 46 there is to be a reclassification of the several divisions. On reference to that section it will be found that there are more grades provided and that there is not the same difference in salaries between the grades as heretofore. For instance, in the first division the minimum salary at present is $2,800 and the maximum $4,000. There is now to be inserted between those two amounts another grade, and the rises are more frequent.

Section agreed to.

On section 14—Appointments to be on probation:

Mr. A. K .MACLEAN: I move to strike out the words in subsection 1: "And the cause of the rejection shall be reported by the deputy head to the commission," and to add at the end of that subsection the words: "and the cause of rejection, or the reason for extending the period of probation shall be reported by the deputy head to the commission." It is practically putting at the end of the clause the words which are struck out in the middle.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The clause does not state whether or not the commission shall investigate the cause of rejection as reported by the deputy head. The deputy head may be ill-tempered—people grow old and do not retain the same equanimity as when they are young. The deputy may have a grudge against, or may not like, the employee on probation, and may at once report to the commission that So-and-so is rejected. Will the commission investigate the cause of rejection?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Look at subsection 3.

Mr. LEMIEUX (reading):

The Commission shall decide whether the name of a rejected person shall be struck off the list as unfit for the service generally or whether he shall be allowed a trial in some other position for which he may be eligible.

Mr. BUREAU: He might remain on the list and lose his job in the department.

Mr. LEMIEUX: On second thought, this subsection is not so clear as it seemed to me at first. It could state, by inserting a word or two, that the commission, when such a report is made by the deputy head, shall investigate. Let us take a concrete case: Suppose I am deputy head of a department and a clerk is appointed on approbation, and I do not find him, or her, as the case may be, a proper officer even on probation. I give some reasons in my report to the commission. Now the commission will decide whether or not my report shall be accepted. Will there be some investigation to ascertain whether the causes stated in the report are valid or not?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I really do not think it is necessary to provide for that in the section, because the commission are obliged to make some investigation before they can render a decision.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is not very clear.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: However, if the committee think that there should be an amendment, the words "after investigation" might go in after the word "shall", in the first line of subsection 3, which would then read:

(3) The Commission shall after investigation, decide whether the name of the rejected person—

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is what I mean.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: In addition to that, there might also be added a rider giving the commission authority to retain the employee in the regular service. I would suggest the addition of the following to subsection (3): "or the commission shall have the power to decide whether the rejected person shall be retained in the original position."

An hon. MEMBER: The same or some other.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It would hardly be wise to retain the employee in the department after the deputy head has reported him to be incompetent or inefficient. I think it would be for the good of the Service that he be not sent back to that same department.

Amendments agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 16—Professional and technical positions:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I move that the word "competitive" be inserted after the word "without" in the 13th line of this section, so that it will read "either with or without competitive examination."

Mr. BUREAU: Is this not against the principle laid down in this Bill? The deputy head is supposed to accept the man selected by the commission.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The only difference between this clause and the clause in the old Act is that the approval is to be by the commission instead of by the Governor in Council.

Mr. SHEARD: Why does the minister put in the word "competitive"? Would a surveyor who is a Bachelor of Science be expected to enter a competitive examination in order to take a position in the Department of Public Works?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would put the same question with regard to architects and translators. When the old Act had been in force only a few months we were in need of a competent translator for the Labour Gazette. I suggested the appointment of the late Mr. Lanctot, and the question arose whether a translator was a technical officer. I submitted that a competent translator was a technical officer; the matter was discussed in Council and referred to the Minister of Justice, Sir Allen Aylesworth, who prepared a memorandum on the subject which may now be found in the Department of Justice. Would an architect have to pass a competitive examination before he could be appointed to a position in the Public Works Department? It is represented to me that under this Bill he would.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: This clause provides that the commission has authority to make such appointments without competitive examination.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: When departments require officers with professional or technical knowledge, in some cases advertisements are placed in the press and applicants are requested to communicate with the Civil Service Commission. If two or three of the applicants appear to have equal merits, the commission would likely adopt the procedure which I outlined last night, that of appointing a board to consider the relative merits of each. In that case some sort of examination might be prescribed. The commission are not obliged to do that, however.

9 p.m.

Mr. McKENZIE: Wherein does this section differ from the old section 21?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: "The Commission" is inserted in place of "The Governor in Council." That is practically the only change.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I think that is a mistake. The old section was intended to check the appointment of experts by requiring the submission of each case to the Governor in Council. The members of Council, sitting around a table, will not agree to the appointment of a man as an expert if he really is not an expert. I had occasion last year to look into the administration of section 21 under the present Act, and I found that considerable abuse existed. In a return brought down to the House it was shown that 175 appointments of so-called experts had been made under section 21. I found that the appointees were mostly men who were over age and who were receiving small salaries such as $1,100, $1,200 or $1,500 per annum. They were not experts at all, but they were favourites of the administration and they were called "experts" to avoid examination and placed in those positions under section 21. If you open the door any wider and allow the commission to appoint, without examination, any person that they may call an expert, we might as well dispense with the Civil Service Act altogether. I would suggest to the minister that he maintain the language of section 21, so that there will be some check in the appointment of these technical officers.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would submit to my hon. friend that the old section, to which he refers was claimed by many members of Parliament to be subject to abuse. It was urged that frequently men were promoted upon the ground that they were technical or professional officers and, on the recommendation of the deputy head and the approval of the Governor in Council, such men might be promoted to a higher position and receive a higher salary. The purpose of this new section was to remove that power from the Governor in Council, which is always a political body. I thought the House would agree that the approval shall be placed in the hands of the commission just to avoid possible abuse. I think this section is much preferable to the old section 21.

Mr. MURPHY: There is just this about it, that the remodelled section may lead in its operation to a conflict between the Civil Service Commission and the deputy head, because it makes the appointment rest on the recommendation of the deputy minister. I am aware that the suggestion has been made to my hon. friend, possibly he has not had time to consider it, and I do not want to press it, but I think it proper to bring it before the committee, so that when it is sought to invoke this section, the intervention of the deputy minister should be confined to asking for an appointment.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I propose changing the word "recommendation" to "request."

Mr. MURPHY: I appreciate what my hon. friend says as being a move in the direction of meeting the situation which I am about to disclose, that is, that the deputy minister should be restricted to asking for an appointment in a certain grade and not for the appointment of a certain individual. That feature of the appointment should be determined by the commission, and not by the deputy minister. The section, as it stands, would prevent that being done by the commission. I do not know whether my hon. friend has had time to go into the details of the question, but I desire to draw attention to it, so that if the change is not made now, it may be considered when the Bill is brought up again.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I beg to move:

That the word "recommendation" in the tenth line be struck out and the word "request" be inserted.

Mr. SHEARD: I submit to the minister that the word "competitive" before the word "examination" is an injury rather than a benefit. If, in these technical examinations such as the one illustrated, a first-class man was an applicant, I doubt very much if he would submit to enter into a competitive examination, especially if he had university or other qualifications which proved his status beyond peradventure. I know I would not if I were making application. I would say that I had got beyond that stage in my professional career. I do not think it is desirable to put in the word "competitive."

Mr. DENIS: I would like to see the words "professional or technical" in the ninth line defined. We are simply trying to avoid a difficulty by not defining those words. I wonder, if the question were asked the members of this committee individually, if there would be two opinions alike. If we do not assume the responsibility of defining those words, how will the commission define them? I would suggest amending the first clause by adding to it a paragraph defining those words, "professional or technical," or else putting at the end of section 16 a definition of those words. It is no use trying to avoid the difficulty, it will come before the commission.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Will my hon. friend offer the committee a definition of the words "professional or technical?" I do not think it is possible to draft a section which would meet his suggestion. It rests with the commission to decide whether the knowledge and ability requisite for any position is professional or technical. I do not see how you could possibly define the words.

Mr. MORPHY: The difficulty arose in regard to section 21 in connection with the famous case in the Militia Department. An issue was raised between the minister and the commission as to the definition in connection with the appointment of a military tailor. I do not think they got beyond the regulations.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Those words were used in the British Civil Service Act and in the United States Civil Service Act, and I do not think either the British Parliament or the United States Congress has been able to find any words to define the idea.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What necessity is there for technical officers in the Outside Service. I had the honour of sitting in this House at the time the original Act was passed, and it was represented to this House that occasionally eminent engineers or men from the outside would be required to do such important work as designing the Quebec bridge or other work of that kind; that such men would not submit themselves to an examination before any commission, and that section 21 was necessary, when a case of that kind arose, to enable the Government to secure the services of an eminent technical expert for carrying on such work. It strikes me that we do not require the section so far as the Outside Service is concerned.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Take the engineers of the Public Works Department.

Mr. SINCLAIR: They are in the Inside Service.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, not in the several provinces. There are engineers in the Marine and Fisheries Department. In the Outside Service many technical officers are required, and, of course, a great many in the Inside Service.

Mr. CURRIE: Take the case of the Marine and Fisheries Department. Inspectors of boilers and hulls have now to pass a special examination provided by the department. Will they now be examined by the commission?

Mr. BUREAU: I do not see that the section is improved by the amendment that has been moved. The Minister of the Interior may make a request for a surveyor and it is for the commission to do the rest. Under the old Act, the appointment was made by the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the minister of the department.

The recommendation of the minister was based on the report in writing of the deputy head, and the man, before being appointed, had to get a certificate from the Civil Service Commission that he was qualified to fill the position. When all these steps had been taken we had a record showing what the deputy head had reported in writing to the minister, the minister's recommendation, the certificate of qualification by the commission, and the Order in Council making the appointment. To-day all a minister has to do is to make a request to the commission that he requires an expert accountant, we will say, and we have no record showing what the man is required for or whether he is qualified. I think the clause ought to be further amended so that if a request is to be made it shall be made in writing, stating the reasons and the particular service for which the man is required.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think this clause is preferable to section 21 in the old Act, which permitted a man to be appointed when the qualifications required were "professional, technical, or otherwise peculiar." We are striking out the words "or otherwise peculiar."

Mr. BUREAU: That is not what I object to. I say the request should be in writing.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Under the old Act it was possible for the deputy head to read almost anything into the wording of section 21, thereby rendering the section liable to great abuses. We are here restricting the appointments to those offices requiring professional or technical qualifications.

Mr. BUREAU: That is all right. What I object to is that an appointment can be made at the request of the deputy head. Under the old Act the recommendation was made by the minister upon the report of his deputy, and then the applicant had to get a certificate of qualification from the commission. The section reads:

> If the deputy head reports that the knowledge and ability requisite for the position are wholly or in part professional, technical or otherwise peculiar, the Governor in Council upon the recommendation of the head of the department based on the report in writing of the deputy head, may appoint a person to the position without competitive examination and without reference to the age limit, provided the said person obtains from the Commission a certificate, to be given with or without examination, as is determined by the regulations of the Commission, that he possesses the requisite knowledge and ability and is duly qualified as to health, character and habits.

The deputy head had to make a report in writing to the minister showing the necessity for appointing a man with technical or professional knowledge. The record was there in writing. But under this section all the deputy head has to do is to send in a request for a technical man and the commission may appoint him. I do not object to substituting the commission for the Governor in Council, but I want to know for what particular purpose the expert accountant or land surveyor is required and what branch of the service he is going to be employed in.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Under the old Act it was necessary for the report to be in writing, because the Governor in Council had to approve the appointment. If we compelled the deputy head to make a report in writing to the commission to the effect that a technical officer was required for some particular work it would rather tie the hands of the commission. A member of the Civil Service Commission informs me that just a few days ago they were requested to appoint a technical officer, but upon investigation they found that the work was not of a professional or technical nature. I think it is better not to embarrass the commission by a report from the deputy head as to the necessity for a technical man. The commissioners should be allowed to decide whether or not it is a technical position.

Mr. BUREAU: Perhaps I did not make myself clear. The minister says that a report in writing had to be made because the recommendation had to go before Council. We all know that, the report in writing was to enlighten the minister, so that he could discuss the matter before the Governor in Council when he made his recommendation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the old section say that the commission shall certify that the man required is a professional or technical man? I would not object to the section in the old Act if we gave the commission power to decide whether or not the man required was a professional or technical man.

Mr. BUREAU: The Governor in Council appoints the man provided his qualifications are certified by the commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But under the old Act the commission had no say as to whether the office is really one requiring a technical or professional man. I understand that the complaint in previous years, of course mostly prior to 1911, was that the Governor in Council virtually decided that any office they wanted to fill was a professional or technical office, and in that way drove holes through the Civil Service Act. If it were inserted in the Bill that the commission should decide the character of the office, and whether a technical or professional man was required, I think the old clause would read very well.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would point out further that under the present Act the recommendation of the deputy head names a person. Under this section the deputy minister is not called upon to recommend any person, but simply to advise the commission that there is a vacancy for which he requires a person having technical or professional knowledge, and the commission finds the man for him.

Mr. BUREAU: The Acting Minister of Finance has just answered my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, for he said that the deputy head advises the commission he requires a person with technical or professional knowledge for a certain position. If the deputy head is to decide whether a technical man is required or not, I do not see where the commission come in. Under the old Act they had to certify that the applicant was qualified. What does the word "request" mean? I say that the request should be in writing, stating the reasons for the appointment, so that we would have a record of all the steps gone through up to the appointment.

The insertion of this word "request" means that the deputy is going to ask for a certain man. Then the commission will send a man and say: "We certify that Mr. John Jones is a chartered accountant having all the qualifications necessary to fulfil the requisition sent in by the Deputy Minister of Finance."

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: The argument of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) presupposes that the Civil Service Commission are going to make wholesale appointments to the Civil Service for which there is no justification.

Mr. BUREAU: Not at all.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: If it is necessary that this clause should define the manner in which the requisitions for appointment should be made the same thing is necessary with regard to every other clause. Otherwise the commission will be going ahead and appointing men without any restraint in the way my hon. friend suggested. We must assume that the commission will only appoint men when they are necessary. The clause simply states that in any case where, in the opinion of the commission, the knowledge and ability requisite for any position in the public service are wholly or in part professional or technical the commission may make an appointment with or without examination. If a man is not required in the public service, we must assume that they will not appoint him.

Reverting to the question of the old clause which provided for leaving it to the Governor in Council, we have heard from the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) that to his own knowledge when that system prevailed they loaded up the Service with unnecessary appointees.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not want it to go on record that I am advocating leaving the matter in the hands of the Governor in Council or that I am afraid that the Civil Service Commission are going to make wholesale appointments. On the contrary, I want to help them and I want to trust them. They will make an appointment at the request of the deputy minister. The deputy minister makes a request and I want that request to be made in writing, stating exactly what the position is that he wants to fill. Otherwise they might send a telephone message and which would not become a matter of record. I do not doubt the ability of the commission to judge of the qualifications of the applicant, but the request from the deputy head should be a matter of written record.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: If that is all the hon. gentleman requires, why not put in a blanket clause providing that a record should be made in connection with every appointment to the Civil Service?

Mr. BUREAU: We want to have a record of the requests that are made.

Mr. CRONYN: I beg to move:

That clause 16 be amended by adding, after the word "request" the words "in writing", and after words "deputy head" the words "giving his reasons for such request."

That will preserve a record of the whole transaction and meet the suggestion of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau).

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MURPHY: May I draw the attention of the minister to the possible necessity of an amendment to the last part of the section by reason of his having introduced the word "competitive" in the thirteenth line? The section originally provided that the appointee should be selected either with or without examination. My hon. friend inserted after the word "without" the word "competitive." The last portion of the clause reads:

An appointment as a professional or technical officer shall not qualify a person for appointment or transfer to any other position in the public service open to appointment upon competitive examination only.

In view of the introduction of the word "competitive," will the last part of the section still apply?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, I think so.

Mr. MURPHY: Why should it apply to a person who has been appointed in a competitive examination?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think my hon. friend understands the situation. The section provides that if one obtains entrance into the public service upon the ground that he is a technical or professional officer, he cannot later be transferred to another position the appointment to which is made by competitive examination.

Mr. MURPHY: I can conceive of a case where a person might be selected in the first instance and be debarred in the other, but if my hon. friend has given consideration to it, I shall not press the point.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 17—Promotion to be for merit:

Mr. MURPHY: Should not you change the word "recommendation" to "request" and make it conform to the previous section?

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I read in the first line "public service." Should not that be "Civil Service"?

The CHAIRMAN: The minister struck out the first paragraph of section 2 and replaced the words "public service" in the last paragraph with the words "Civil Service;" so that all through the Bill the word "public" should be replaced by the word "Civil."

Mr. McKENZIE: This section will now, I understand, apply to the Outside Service as well as the Inside Service. The promotions in the Outside Service, I presume, will be more systematic and regular than they have been in the past. I would like to know what the machinery will be for making promotions in the Outside Service. In the Inside Service it is readily understandable how the deputy head can get knowledge and promote men. But, how has the deputy head sufficient knowledge to promote a man in the custom house in North Sydney? There must be some machinery by which the deputy head can get, regularly and properly, and without the possibility of pull as it is being used now, knowledge of the Outside Service so that everybody in that service will get promotion regularly according to his merits without being subjected to the influences that are at work now and which in past years have kept men back and put other men forward who did not deserve to go forward because they happened to have influential friends at court.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: A later clause in the Bill provides for a reorganization and classification of the Outside Service, in so far as it is possible to classify it. For instance, the customs service, the inland revenue service, and the post office service in the larger cities and towns may be classified; to some extent they are classified now. In such cases, promotion will be made according to seniority and merit. The commission will secure such information as they desire from the chief officer of that branch of the Outside Service.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is understood, then, that it will devolve on the chief officer in any such service—the post office, for instance, or the custom house—to grade his officers and recommend promotions as he may deem it advisable?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The classification will be made by the commission where none exists. The head of the branch of the service affected might possibly make recommendations. I do not know whether the commission will ask him to do so or not, but he can give them such information as they desire.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is just what I want settled and not left to haphazard. We have it well defined and laid down in this Bill, as far as the Inside Service is concerned, that promotions will be made by the commission on the recommendation of the deputy head. But as regards the Outside Service, no defined machinery exists for that purpose. I readily understand that the employees are to be graded, but how are the promotions to be carried forward according to this grading afterwards?

Mr. CRONYN: It seems to me that section 55 deals with that question as regards the Outside Service. Under that section the commission would have to go into the matter with the several deputy heads and other principal officers and employees.

Mr. BUREAU: Do I understand the word "promotion" to mean that when a public servant is changed from one position to another his condition is bettered? Or does it only mean passing from one class to another?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is what it means.

Mr. BUREAU: Just from one class to another class, not from one position to another which would improve his status?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It means from one grade to another.

Mr. BUREAU: The section requires that in case of promotion the man must do work of greater importance and responsibility; he abandons the work of one class to take up that of another. The subsection provides that the deputy head may at any time during the period of probation cancel the promotion. The old Act provided that when the promotion was cancelled the employee returned to his former position. Now, suppose that an officer has been promoted, another man has been taken on in his place, and at the end of six or eight months the deputy head chooses to cancel the promotion. What is going to happen to the man whose promotion has been cancelled unless we provide that he shall return to the position he formerly held? There is no provision to that effect in this Bill, although there was in the old Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is no express provision for such a case.

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

Mr. BUREAU: There was in the old Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: But he is not retired from the service.

Mr. MURPHY: Would he not go upon the list of supernumeraries?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: He would probably fall into the list of supernumeraries.

Mr. BUREAU: "Probably" is not an answer.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The man is not retired, at any rate.

Mr. PAPINEAU: If the deputy recommends cancellation of a promotion that should be reported to the commission, and the party concerned should have a chance to defend himself.

Mr. BUREAU: I have the old section here and it provides in case a promotion has been cancelled:

He shall then return to the performance of the duties in which he was previously engaged.

I think that is a fair provision. If a man has to abandon one class of work to take up another set of duties, the man who replaces him should be on the list of supernumeraries or hold the position temporarily. Then, if the promotion is cancelled, the temporary man can step out and the other go back to his old position.

Mr. PEDLOW: I would suggest adding after the word "promotion" in the last line of subsection 2 the following words:

"And the cause of such cancellation shall be reported in writing by the deputy head to the Commission.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BUREAU: I would suggest the following addition to the subsection:

The person whose promotion has been so cancelled shall then return to the performance of the duties in which he was previously engaged—

Mr. CROTHERS: Would that not follow if his promotion were cancelled?

Mr. BUREAU: I do not think it necessarily follows.

Mr. CROTHERS: I think if you read the old section you will find this: A man may be promoted, that is on approbation, and that promotion may be confirmed by the deputy head, or cancelled. If cancelled he goes back to his former position.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bureau) move an amendment?

Mr. BUREAU: The section can stand while I draft one.

Mr. MURPHY: Is provision made in a later section of the Bill for an annual report?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: By the commission. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: Are the appointments made under section 16 to be set out in that report?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We can discuss that when we come to the section which deals with the matter.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would move that subsection 2 be further amended by adding the following words at the end of the subsection:

And the person whose promotion is cancelled shall then return to the performance of the duties in which he was previously engaged.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think we are creating a difficulty there. Suppose the position he formerly occupied is filled by somebody else, it would necessitate a rearrangement all around. Is it not well to leave it in the hands of the commission?

Mr. BUREAU: His successor in the old position is on probation also.

Mr. PEDLOW: I would favour leaving the disposition of the individual in the hands of the commission; it would not disturb the department so much.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am informed that the party filling a position from which another has been promoted is also on probation, so that there will be no trouble in the one promoted on probation reverting to his former position.

Mr. PEDLOW: It would be an injustice to the other man if he had been filling the position on probation for six months.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 18—exchanges and transfers.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I would ask some explanation of the words "or in different branches of the public service." Under this provision, is it not possible for instance for an Ottawa man to be sent to Edmonton? We have already a number of Ottawa people, and a number from Calgary. We like these gentlemen very well, but we also like to see our men getting positions, and I submit that some protection should be given to our own people. I quite understand that a department may have a surplus of men or women, and it may be in the interest of the Government to send these people to the different branches in the Outside Service, but it creates a great deal of friction. The matter has been discussed fully and I do not care to repeat the arguments used, but I submit we should be protected so that the commission cannot say to those who are to be transferred: "You shall go to Calgary, and you shall go to Edmonton."

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I quite agree with my hon. friend from East Edmonton (Mr. Mackie). I look upon this section with a good deal of suspicion, as to how "the filling of a vacancy in a department by a transfer from the Inside to the Outside Service or from the Outside to the Inside Service in the same department or in different departments, or in different branches of the public service" will work out. That is where we are going to have the very trouble referred to by the hon. member for Edmonton, and to which I drew the attention of the committee yesterday. It appears to me that there should be some limit set. I would suggest that no more men be sent from the Inside Service to the Outside Service than are received from the Outside to the Inside Service. That is the least that can be done in the way of straightening the matter out. We want our people employed as far as possible in their own localities. They are the likely people to occupy such positions. I, for one, certainly think that the powers of transfer should be decidedly limited both with the deputies and the Civil Service Commission itself, though I think the matter is safer in the hands of the commission than in the hands of the deputy head. I understand, however, that they are both more or less concerned in the transfers, one cannot do it without the other. That is where the great difficulty will come in. It will lead to friction and dissatisfaction in the working of the Act if a large number of Inside Civil servants are sent throughout the country and placed in constituencies where they are not wanted. That is the way the Kingston affair turned out, which was mentioned by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) last night. The minister should devise some means of limiting the powers of transfer.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I would suggest the following amendment in line 2: after the words "public service": "the transfer from one branch of the public service to another shall not be made without the written approval of the responsible minister."

Mr. SIFTON: That could be included in a new sub-section.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: It could be, but what I desire put in the section is that a transfer will not be made from one branch to another without the written approval of the responsible minister.

Mr. BUREAU: Or the head of the department.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I prefer the responsible minister. Then the commission will be very careful in making transfers.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The only objection I see to the suggestion is that you are introducing a minister into Civil Service appointments. The purpose of the Bill——

Mr. SIFTON: A transfer is not an appointment.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is the approval of a transfer. If it is a transfer, that means a new appointment for somebody. It is not so very objectionable, of course. It is possible that this section might give rise to the abuses suggested by my hon. friend, but, having regard to the approving power of the commission, we should at least wait until we find that it is being abused before we change it.

Mr. SIFTON: Within the last two weeks I stopped four transfers from Ottawa to the Outside Service in another province.

Mr. PARDEE: I am not prepared to offer an amendment to cover the case, but I think that some provision should be made whereby new appointments shall not be made outside the districts within which the work is to be done. I quite understand that in the event of civil servants not being required in a department in Ottawa or Toronto, places would have to be found for them in the Service. I am in favour of Civil Service reform, but I am not in favour of a number of men being sent from Ottawa to my constituency, because men in that constituency are quite able to pass the competitive examination and to carry out the duties of any position that may be vacant within it. Until some amendment is offered to cover this point, I think the clause should stand.

Mr. PEDLOW: Employees in the office of a minister or a deputy minister are sometimes sent to another branch of the department as typists or in some other capacity and are continued at such salaries as $1,400 to $1,700 a year. These persons so transferred are often not able to earn, in their new positions, the salaries which they had previously been receiving. Is the minister making provision against such an anomaly as that?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is no provision in the Bill for a case of that kind.

Mr. PEDLOW: Such cases have occurred in different departments.

Mr. CROWE: I agree that positions which are vacant within a province should be given to persons living in that province. Two or three weeks ago a notice was sent to members of the House, from which I quote the following:

> The Civil Service Commissioners hereby give public notice that applications will be received from candidates qualified to fill the following positions in the Civil Service of Canada.

The first position was that of postmaster at Lethbridge, and it was announced that the examination would take place in Ottawa. Why should that position be filled from Ottawa? Should not that examination be held in Alberta and the appointment made of a person in that province? The same applies to British Columbia; if a position is vacant there, why should it not be filled by someone from that province? Not long ago a matron went from Ottawa to fill a position in a convalescent home out there. Surely that is not right.

10 p.m.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am surprised to find this parochialism prevailing among our extreme protectionists. To say that a man should not be sent where his services are most required is protectionism running mad. I was told by the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) the other day that I never moved very much from Cape Breton and that my knowledge was confined practically to herring. Of course, I accepted that good-naturedly, but may I point out that I live in a province where we have to take men from Montreal, Quebec, New Brunswick—all along the line of the Intercolonial. The management of the Intercolonial send their men where they are most needed, or where they can suitably fill positions. If a man is sent from Montreal to look after the station at North Sydney we do not say a word about it. It is good policy that a man shall not be transferred from one province to another if that can reasonably be avoided, but I think we may safely leave that to the department. It is altogether too parochial to say that in this great democratic country of ours a man should not go from one province to be employed in another. The disposition of civil servants can well be left as a matter of policy to the commission and to the departments concerned.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Last evening I read from a statement prepared by a member of the commission setting forth their policy in respect to transfers from one town to another or from one province to another. I will read again that portion of the statement:

> There is naturally a very strong feeling throughout the country that positions should, wherever possible, be filled by the appointment of local persons and that except in the case of transfers, which might occasionally become necessary, "outsiders" as they are regarded should not receive preferment.

As the member for North Cape Breton says, it may be quite necessary at times to make a transfer from the Outside to the Inside Service, or vice versa. I do not see how you can prevent that by legislation. Would it meet the view of the member for Edmonton (Mr. Mackie) if this section were amended by adding after the word "of," at the end of the 4th line on page 8, the words "the heads of the department or departments affected, and by"?

Mr. MACKIE: I would rather throw the responsibility on the acting minister. My only point is the necessity of some safeguard against the making of unnecessary transfers. I may say to the member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) that we are not parochial, and that we are not running mad—but we do not desire to run amuck. Because we do not take two hours to explain our views here, is no reason why we are not sensible in presenting these amendments.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not wish to half-do things myself.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: In the western provinces the population is increasing very rapidly and men naturally, as they come into that country, expect to get positions. Consequently, there are men who should be promoted who will be prevented from being promoted by having some individual from some other town taking the higher position. I understand, of course, it is sometimes necessary for a department to make a transfer, but I desire to guard against a wholesale use of transfers.

Mr. McKENZIE: I suppose there is a good reason why the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. H. A. Mackie) is afraid of competition from the outside world. As a Nova Scotian, I am not afraid of any such competition. We in Nova Scotia are ready for all-comers, and our own breed and our own production will be so superior to theirs that we are not afraid of competition. I can readily understand that men coming from some other places—I am not going to name any place in particular—may be afraid of the enlightened competition that might come from the outside world. Nova Scotia is, however, not one of those places.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: In the western provinces we hope very shortly, not many years from now, to put into practice the policy which these gentlemen suggested, but which during their whole administration they did not dare to put into practice.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I beg to move:

> That after the word "of" at the end of the fourth line on page 8, the following words be added: "The head or heads of the department or departments affected and by."

The clause will then read:

> Or in different branches of the Public Service, may be made on the recommendation of the deputy head or deputy heads, as the case may be, with the approval of the head or heads of the department or departments affected and by the Commission.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: What does the minister mean by the "head" of the department? I understand that is the minister.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Then why not say "minister"? If we said "minister," there would be no doubt about the matter. In some departments the supervision is more or less divided.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The interpretation section says that the "head" of the department is the minister.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I quite agree with the original draft of the section. Not only is it very much in the interest of the country that these exchanges should be made from one province to another, but it is desirable; and, as a matter of fact, the Civil Service Commission has already been making a considerable number of transfers. In Prince Edward Island we often have visits from agricultural representatives from Ontario, and we, in exchange, send our Prince Edward Island men to Ontario. Exchanges of that nature, especially in the agricultural department, are very desirable, because a number of Ontario farmers know more along certain lines than our farmers do, and vice versa. You know that two knives sharpen each other when you rub them together, and so we are going to enlighten those western people a little, and we are endeavouring to do it all the time by sending our people out West, and we want our western friends to visit us in the East, and we shall show them some things that they do not see in the West.

Mr. MURPHY: Section 18 says:

> The Commission shall in each case determine whether a person sought to be transferred or exchanged possesses the requisite knowledge and ability and is duly qualified as to health, character, age and habits.

It is intended to restrict the work of the commission solely to that which is defined there, or is the commission to have anything to say as to the sufficiency or otherwise of the reasons of the transfer?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The former part of the section says that no transfer can be made except with the approval of the minister and the commission. They must approve the transfer, and then they must satisfy themselves as to the requisite knowledge and ability, health, character, age and habits of the party transferred.

Mr. MURPHY: I am afraid the amendments have created a redundancy and a confusion there.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. PEDLOW: The matter to which I called attention some time ago deserves more than passing notice. It is an important item, and it should have been dealt with under clause 2 of this section. I would suggest that all the words in that clause after the word "shall" be struck out and the following inserted instead:

> —not necessarily carry with them the salary that the individual has been in receipt of in the previous position.

That means that that feature of the transfer will be left open to be dealt with by the commission and the deputy of the particular department. The individual may not necessarily be worth as much in the department to which the transfer has been made as in the previous position. The individual may not have been giving satisfaction in the previous position and may be transferred for good reasons, and if he is transferred to a lower position, he should not necessarily draw the higher salary. A great deal of dissatisfaction has been caused in Ottawa where transfers have been made, such transfers carrying with them the higher salaries that the parties transferred are not capable of earning.

[Mr. Read.]

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not see what arrangement could be made in the case of a member of the Civil Service who has been receiving a stated salary in some special grade or division of the public service, and who is transferred to another department and doing work of less importance and still receiving the old salary. I think it would hardly be fair in any cases to reduce the man's salary.

Mr. PEDLOW: I think the same rule should be followed as obtains in private business, where if a man is not capable of earning his salary he is dismissed. But the Government are more lenient. I do not see why a change to another department should carry with it a larger salary than employees of that department are earning. The instances I gave are of typists earning $1,700 a year, who were transferred to a department where the employees were receiving only $1,000 a year and had been longer in the service than the ones who were transferred. I think we should provide against cases of that kind.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I cannot suggest any method at the moment of meeting the case which my hon. friend suggests, but I will give it consideration between now and Monday, and we can then revert to the consideration of this section.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It is not only the transfer from the inside to the outside service that we might object to, but the transfer from one place to another. For instance, a party might go from Ottawa—we expect most of them will,—to Toronto, or from Montreal to Toronto, and that is what we want to avoid. We do not want the large centres to get more than their share of appointees. We do not want them to be sent into the smaller places where there are comparatively a small number of offices to be filled. I do not want to be construed as objecting to a person being sent from one province to another; I never suggested that. We object to the moving from one part of one province to another part of the same province as much as we do to the transfer from one province to another. We want to get the proper number for each electoral district, and I think the minister should add something to the effect that employees shall not be transferred from one city to another city, or from one city to a village, or from one electoral district to another electoral district; I think "electoral district" is the better word.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Before a transfer can be made under the section as amended, the recommendation of the deputy head must be approved by the minister and by the commission. I do not see how any greater protection could be afforded.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. PEDLOW: I thought the section was to stand for further consideration.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No. If I can find any amendment to meet the case mentioned by my hon. friend, which I do not think is possible, we can revert to the section. The amendment, however, need not necessarily go in this section.

Mr. PEDLOW: The matter will not be lost sight of?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. BUREAU: It will only be forgotten.

On section 20—Annual increases, how made:

Mr. FIELDING: Why do you limit it to the word "annual?"

Mr. FOURNIER: Take the case of a young lady appointed temporarily to the Post Office Department, we will say, on the first of December, 1912, and who was appointed permanently in 1913, and promoted in 1914. If the deputy head has a grudge against her, he need not recommend an increase, and she will be left in the cold. What was the procedure under the old Act? Did the civil servants receive an increase every year?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The present section is practically the same as the old. In reply to my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding), the word "annual" is inserted because the increases are statutory annual increases.

Mr. PEDLOW: I understood that the Outside Service got a statutory increase of $100, and the same grade in the Inside Service an annual increase of $50. Does this section cancel that?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There are no statutory increases for the Outside Service.

Mr. BUREAU: Under the old Act the increase was automatic, some getting an increase of $50 and some $100 a year.

Mr. SIFTON: The increase is made by Order in Council every year.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I think there is a well understood rule that the letter carriers get, perhaps without statutory provision, an advance each year until they reach a certain maximum, and it appears to me that this section is going to knock that on the head. I do not think that is desirable. I think every one who gives good service is entitled to his annual increase to the maximum of his class. Under this section, the letter carriers will not get it until every case has been considered by the Deputy Postmaster General. I think now the letter carriers get an increase of 25 cents per day each year up to about five years, until they reach a maximum of $2.75 or $3; it is certainly not less than $2.75, and perhaps it is more in the West. I think that increase should be continued without any reference to the deputy head.

Mr. PEDLOW: I had understood there was provision in the Act for a statutory increase. There is certainly discrimination between the Inside and Outside Service, if I am correctly informed, because while the Outside Service receives an increase of $100 the same grade in the Inside Service receives only a $50 increase every year. So a man in the Inside Service after ten years' service would be no better off than a man who had been in the Outside Service five years. That seems to be an injustice.

Mr. CURRIE: Section 47, which we have not reached yet, says:

> There may be given to every officer, clerk or other employee in the first division an annual increase of $100, and in the other divisions an annual increase of $50, until the maximum of the grade is reached.

That is virtually imperative. But the section now under consideration changes that. It says:

> No officer, clerk, or employee shall receive any annual increase of salary except on the report of the deputy head, concurred in by the Commission, that such officer, clerk or employee is deserving of such increase.

That clause permits a great deal of what we may call the old political spirit, and I think it should be amended to say that:

> Every officer, clerk or employee shall receive an annual increase of salary, except on the special report of the deputy head, concurred in by the Commission, that such officer, clerk or employee is not deserving of such increase.

Then the increase comes automatically, unless the officer has a black mark against him and the deputy can show any special reason why he should not have his increase he will get it. As it stands there, when one side of politics gets in, the fellows of that political colour get their increase automatically every year and the other fellows do not. If we are going to take the service out of politics, or drive all kinds of partisanship out of it, I think it would be only fair to change that clause in that way.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That clause has been in the Civil Service Act for quite a number of years. It was never intended that the increase should be received by a civil servant as a matter of course. I doubt very much if that amendment should be carried. That section was drafted having in mind the Inside Service and, I am going to ask the committee to allow me to drop it here and when we reach the clauses having reference to the Inside Service we will take the matter up and it can be considered.

Mr. CURRIE: That clause has caused more canvassing and difficulty than anything else in the service. Civil servants, within three months of the time when the annual increases are given, start writing to members and importuning them to go and see the ministers in order to help them to get their increases. This removes that difficulty. If the civil servant knows that his increase will come to him automatically if he has done his duty and if his conduct has been good, he will not bother about it and that difficulty will be overcome.

Mr. TRAHAN: If the suggestion of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) is adopted, there will be a report from the deputy head stating that the officer does not deserve an increase and that report must be concurred in by the commission. Would it not be just to the employee that the report, before being sent to the commission, should also be sent to the employee so that he will have the right to defend his case before the commission? That will prevent an abuse of power by the deputy head.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would not think that would be in the interest of the Civil Service.

Mr. TRAHAN: Why not? It is in the interest of the public service that when a report is made against an employee he shall have an opportunity to defend and protect himself. That is the way to protect civil servants. If you have a deputy who wants to persecute some employee without reason and make adverse reports concerning him why should you not give that employee a chance to defend himself before the commission and to contradict if possible the adverse report that is made?

Section dropped.

[Mr. Currie.]

On section 23—salary to be raised to new minimum:

Mr. BUREAU: I see that the grades are changed by this Bill. We shall come to that later on. Take a person in 2B under the Act of 1908 with a salary of $1,600 and who has been for over a year at the maximum. He is eligible for promotion to 2A, the maximum salary of which is $2,100, on the recommendation of the deputy head. Does this clause mean that that employee shall be classified in grade D under this Act, with salary beginning at $1,700 and rising to $2,100? He has reached the maximum of his class but he finds himself in a higher class, under the new classification, than the one which he has now reached. Yet this Bill provides that there shall be no promotion from one class to another. What is to become of that officer?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If under the new grading the maximum is below the maximum in the existing division or grade that officer goes to the present maximum.

Mr. BUREAU: He will have the benefit of the higher grade in order to reach the other maximum?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. PEDLOW: Has this section any relation to the employees in the Customs Department?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It has relation to the employees in all the departments.

Mr. PEDLOW: Then I would like to refer to the Customs Department where the employees are underpaid.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Will the hon. gentleman please reserve his remarks on the subject of salaries until we come to section 46?

Section agreed to.

On section 24—Additional payments forbidden.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What significance have the words "permanently employed" in the fourth line of this section? Under section 3, which we have passed, the officers are employed on their good behaviour, and in section 11 it is provided, that except where otherwise expressly provided, all appointments to the public service shall be during pleasure.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: "During pleasure" means a permanent appointment.

Mr. CURRIE: Does this section bar the granting of additional salaries by Order in Council?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. PEDLOW: A great many employees in one department are working overtime in another department. Will this section debar them from receiving payment for that overtime?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It does do that.

Mr. CURRIE: What about customs officers who, as the minister knows, work overtime for extended periods?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Remuneration for that is voted in the estimates.

Mr. PEDLOW: I have knowledge of the fact that some employees in the Post Office Department are doing night work, at the present time, in the Department of Finance, and are being paid for their overtime. Will this section prevent those employees from doing that work and getting paid for it?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think it does prevent that.

Mr. PEDLOW: I think they should be permitted to do this work, if it is necessary, and be paid for it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think at one time that was permissible, but it led to certain abuses and Parliament prohibited the practice. I do not know to what extent abuse has occurred, but I think it is better that those in the public service should not be allowed to engage in additional work after hours—it leads to favouritism and disturbs the service.

Section agreed to.

On section 25—Temporary employment.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This section is exactly the same as the present section 23, except that the authorization has now to be made by the commission instead of by the Governor in Council.

Mr. CAHILL: Should not the request referred to in the section be a written request?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I think this section is too drastic for the requirements in some branches of the service when it necessitates that no one shall be employed, practically, unless they have passed the Civil Service examinations. During the Christmas season in all cities and towns there is a large requisition for temporary employees for work that will last a week or ten days. At that season in the Brantford post office for several years past from twenty to twenty-five persons are temporarily employed many of whom are school boys of sixteen years of age and less. All they require is a go-cart and a pair of good legs to help the postmen to deliver the mail. Surely it was not intended that no one can be temporarily employed in such work as that without passing a Civil Service examination?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Another section in the Bill provides that the commission may make regulations regarding appointments of that character, and I should think that in such cases an examination would not be exacted.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: If that is going to be done all right. I wish to draw the attention to the provision that temporary employees shall not be employed more than six months. That is not going to be lived up to at all, nor is it likely to be lived up to unless the regulations are entirely changed. As I pointed out in my remarks last evening there are many employees in the Brantford post office at the present time who have been at work there from three to four years and they are still called "temporary" employees. These men are relieving other employees who have gone to the war. It appears to me that a man who has been employed for three or four years in any branch of the public service should no longer be classed as a temporary employee. He is there nobody knows how long, but until the war is over. Perhaps some of the men will never come back; some will be killed, others maimed. All through these four years these so-called temporary employees have had to submit to the status of temporary men—and did not get statutory increases, their uniforms were not supplied, and many other perquisites that would go to the regular occupant were not given to them, because they are classified as "temporary" employees while really they are permanent employees. This system is decidedly wrong.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I quite agree that possibly there have been abuses. It has been a method employed to get persons into the service. I trust now that the commission will have jurisdiction, the Act in this respect will not be subject to such abuses in the future. My hon. friend inquires how the temporary employee may be kept in the position which he fills during the absence of the civil servant on military service. A way in which it could be done is that a new employment could commence at the end of the six-months' period.

Mr. MOWAT: The last clause provides for that.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: When a man has thoroughly mastered his job, he will be changed off or dismissed at the end of six months? That is not the intention.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That last part of the clause reads:

> One or more extensions of such period of employment may be granted by the Commission, but each such extension shall be limited to a period not exceeding six months.

Mr. BUREAU: That is a new clause?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, provided especially to meet cases of that kind.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I think it is very objectionable.

Mr. Du TREMBLAY: Instead of the extra assistance being secured on the report of the deputy head, it should be asked for by the minister, because it calls for expenditure, and the minister is responsible to Parliament.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am afraid, if the minister is to make the authorization, there will be a very much greater expenditure of money.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: I want to keep the minister responsible to this House as much as possible.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think it is much safer to have the authorization made by the commission.

Mr. CAHILL: I would suggest that in the third line of subsection (1) the word "written" should be inserted so that it will read: "on the written request of the deputy head, that such extra assistance is required."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think the word "report" is more suitable than the word "request."

Mr. SIFTON: There is no objection to inserting the word "written?"

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, that can be inserted.

Mr. MURPHY: There should be some limit set upon these six months' periods. If not, they may be continued for such a length of time that temporary employment would really become permanent employment.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is quite true that there might be room for abuses, but I do not see how you can provide against that very well.

Mr. MURPHY: Unless you would limit it in the case of a particular individual to a certain number of renewals.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is a difficult case to provide for in a Bill.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It has resulted from war conditions.

Mr. MURPHY: It is an abuse that existed before the war, and which has been aggravated by the war.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We shall see how it works out this coming year.

Section agreed to.

On section 27—Holidays.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I would suggest that the word "may" in the first line of this section be struck out and the word "shall" substituted. I think it only right that civil servants should be entitled, as a matter of right, to eighteen days' vacation as provided in this section, that it should not be left to the deputy head to decide whether or not an employee shall get his holiday. In my constituency it has been brought to my notice that there are employees in the public service who have received no holidays whatever for some years, and I have been requested to bring this matter to the attention of the House and to point out that there has been an injustice in some cases. I suggest that the minister consider the advisability of making this section mandatory instead of permissive.

Mr. PEDLOW: I would suggest in addition to the first part of this section. It reads:

> The deputy head may grant to each officer, clerk or other employee a yearly leave of absence for a period not exceeding eighteen days in any one fiscal year, exclusive of Sundays and holidays.

I would add the words "after they have been one full year in the service."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to propose that as an amendment?

Mr. PEDLOW: Yes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I shall accept that amendment.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I think eighteen days is too short a time for a vacation.

Mr. SIFTON: It is really twenty-one days, the Sundays are not counted.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Even so, take for instance the inspector at Edmonton, Mr. Cairns, a very efficient man, who has been in the service a long time. That seems a very short holiday to give an efficient public servant. There seems to be no discretion to grant a longer period of vacation than twenty-one days. I submit that it should be left to the discretion of the deputy head.

Mr. SIFTON: There is provision for a longer absence under certain conditions.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment moved by Mr. Pedlow carry?

Mr. BUREAU: What about the first amendment substituting the word "shall" for "may"?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In answer to the suggestion of the member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie that the word "shall" be substituted for "may," I wish to point out that this section applies to both the Outside and the Inside Service, and in many cases it would be impossible to grant members of the Outside Service a holiday. I do not think it should be obligatory in any event. As a matter of fact, the Inside Service regularly get their holidays, I think, with rare exceptions, but it might happen in some years that a great number of employees could not be spared for one reason or another. I think we may well trust the administrative heads of departments to see that all employees get the regular holiday unless there is some good reason why they should not.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Why is it not possible to arrange holidays for employees of the Outside Service as well as for those of the Inside Service?

Mr. SIFTON: In many customs offices where only one man is employed, the office would have to be closed if he took three weeks holidays. Besides, in many cases the employees have no desire to go from where they are.

Mr. McKENZIE: As to the question of using the word "may" or "shall," when you are dealing with the prerogative of the Crown the word "may" is always used, but it is construed to mean "shall." In this case the deputy minister is exercising the prerogative of the Crown.

Section agreed to.

On section 30—Dismissal:

Mr. BUREAU: We are closing one end of the pipe of patronage and opening the other. If a man does not suit the gentlemen who are running the department, he may be dismissed on the recommendation of the Governor in Council.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not see how this section can be amended. The power must remain in the Government to dismiss.

Mr. BUREAU: So far as appointments are concerned I have no complaint, but there should be a safeguard also in the matter of dismissals. Let this section stand and we will think it over on Sunday and come back on Monday with some inspiration in the matter.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Let us pass the section, and we will revert to it later.

Mr. BUREAU: How can we revert to it if we pass it?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: By consent of the committee.

Mr. BUREAU: I understand that the idea is to pass the Bill to-night, and then we shall hear no more of it. If the Bill is not to pass to-night, all right; I reserve the right, with the consent of the Government, to come back to this section later.

Mr. MURPHY: By section 2 "deputy," or "deputy head," is stated to mean the Auditor General, in all cases in which such meaning is not inconsistent with his powers and duties under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act. The Auditor General cannot be dismissed except by a vote of Parliament.

11 p.m.

Mr. SIFTON: The Auditor General is really not a deputy head.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: He is given the position of deputy head for the purposes of this Act. All persons who are in charge of a number of employees are called deputy heads.

Mr. MURPHY: I direct the attention of the Government to this so that the argument may not afterwards be made that the dismissal of the Auditor General was provided for or intended by this section.

Section agreed to.

On section 31—suspensions:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I move:

That, in clause (a) of subsection 1, the following words be stricken out: "or from the receipt of his salary."

They do not seem to serve any good purpose there. The words rather suggest that a man might be performing his duty by working in a department and not receiving his salary. That would hardly be fair.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BUREAU: I beg to move:

That in the first line of subsection 2 after the word "suspension" the words "with the reasons therefor" be inserted, and that after the word "reported," the words "in writing" be inserted.

The subsection will then read:

All cases of suspension with the reasons therefor shall be reported in writing by the deputy head to the Commission.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 32—commission to control staff:

Mr. BUREAU: This is an entirely new clause. In this Bill we have so far been dealing with the Civil Service Commission and the commissioner or commissioners. This section says: " or other members composing any commission or board appointed by the Governor in Council." What commission or what board will that be?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This would apply to any commission appointed by the Governor in Council. It is designed to put the commissioner or commissioners in the position of deputy heads under this Act. For instance, one or more of the pension commissioners would make all such recommendations as are made under this Act by deputy ministers.

Mr. BUREAU: That does not answer my question. Power is here given to the Civil Service Commission to "oversee and direct the officers, clerks and employees under its, his or their control," By this section this power is also given to "other members composing any commission or board." Why does the minister not say: " or the commissioner or head of the commission appointed by the Governor in Council?"

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That would be just the same. If my hon. friend will read the last two lines of the section he will there get the reason for the section. The last two lines reads:

And shall, with respect to such officers, clerks and employees, have all the powers conferred by this Act on the deputy head of a department.

Frequently throughout the sections which we have passed, the hon. member will notice, the deputy head will make a request to the commission to make an appointment. In the case of these commissions, outside of departments, that request will be made by one of the commissioners or by them all. I think it is necessary to have that clause.

Mr. PAPINEAU: I understand that there will be a commissioner who will have all the power of the deputy head, so that he will replace him in the department.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: A commissioner will have the power of a deputy head for the purposes of this Act only. If the Railway Board wants to make a transfer or a promotion, the head of the board makes the request in writing to the Civil Service Commission, just as the Act now requires a deputy head to make that request.

Mr. BUREAU: In a department, the deputy head has to make that request. In the commission or board, any member of the commission or board may make it?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: I should think that the chairman of the Railway Board, or in his absence, the vice-chairman, would make the request. I do not think it would be well if any member of the commission might make requests. By this section we are giving members composing any commission or board appointed by the Governor in Council wider powers than the deputy heads now have. The duties of the deputy heads are defined by Act of Parliament, but here you have members of a commission or board each acting as an independent deputy head.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What does my hon. friend suggest?

Mr. BUREAU: I would suggest that the section read:

The Civil Service Commission, the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission or the acting Chairman, and the Chairman of any board or commission appointed by the Governor in Council, or the acting chairman for the time being.

Mr. DAVIS: If in line 28, after the word " conferred," the following words: " and be subject to all the duties imposed " be added, so that the clause would read:

And shall with respect to such officers, clerks and employees have all the powers conferred and be subject to all the duties imposed by this Act on the deputy head of a department.

Would that not meet the case?

Mr. BUREAU: That does not affect my suggestion. My idea is to have the head of a commission or board or some one acting in his stead, perform the duties and take the responsibility.

Mr. FIELDING: In some cases there is only one commissioner.

Mr. BUREAU: Then so much the easier.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think this section is entirely superfluous. We have now the Civil Service Commission with a head properly appointed, and certainly he has all the powers necessary for the working of that commission. Now you are making him and the two other members of that commission deputy ministers. In the case of a commission with half a dozen men they would all be deputy ministers. That seems to be creating confusion unnecessarily. I think the Order in Council appointing any commission should define its powers.

Mr. DAVIS: Having in mind clause 3 of section 4, I beg to move that after the word "conferred" in section 32, there be inserted the words "and be subject to all the duties imposed." Clause 3 of section 4 reads:

> The deputy heads and all other officers and employees in the Public Service shall give the Commission such access to their respective departments and offices and such facilities, assistance and information as the Commission may require for the performance of its duties.

Amendment stands.

Section stands.

On section 34—Oaths.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I object to schedule "B," which reads as follows:

> And that I will not, without due authority in that behalf, disclose or make known any matter or thing which comes to my knowledge by reason of my employment as (as the case may be).

We do not want a civil servant to be a spy, but at the same time he is an officer paid by the Government of this country to fulfil his duties conscientiously. This oath of secrecy would prevent him from divulging any scandalous proceeding, we will say, that came under his notice in the performance of his duties.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This is applicable to the Clerk of the Privy Council.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It extends to other employees. Clause 2 reads:

> In the case of the Clerk of the Privy Council, and all officers, clerks and employees under him, and in the case of any officer, clerk or employee of whom the Governor in Council requires the same, there shall be added to the oath at the asterisks, in the form of the oath in the said Schedule A, the words contained in Schedule B. to this Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is, when designated by the Governor in Council for special reasons. This has always been the law, and I think it is a very good provision.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I should like a better reason than that from my hon. friend.

Mr. DAVIS: What force does my hon. friend attach to the words "without due authority in that behalf" in schedule B?

Mr. LEMIEUX: A civil servant may discover in the performance of his duties some gross disregard of the public weal; something scandalous may be going on, but he may be debarred by the deputy head or some other person in authority from divulging what he has seen. He might say "I am under oath of secrecy and cannot divulge these things." I quite agree that there must be secrecy in some things. For instance, the Clerk of the Privy Council cannot divulge what takes place in Council. If it should apply only to the Clerk of the Privy Council I would raise no objection, but this subsection is not at all clear. I am only raising the point in order to make it clearer. It applies to "any officer, clerk or employee of whom the Governor in Council requires the same."

Mr. SIFTON: The Dominion Police force, for instance.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I quite understand that detectives must take an oath of secrecy and must not divulge what takes place. You ought to make it clear so that there will be no ambiguity. The Government might appoint a commission or a board and the Governor in Council might direct the deputy head to give special instructions to the men employed under him not to divulge what should take place.

Mr. SIFTON: They would have to go before the Clerk of the Privy Council and take an affidavit to that effect? A mere instruction would not be of any use.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) can understand how and why there might be many officials in the Naval Service or the Militia Department who should be bound to secrecy. This section has been in the statute for a long time; it has not created any difficulty in the past and I think it is a very wise provision.

Mr. BURRELL: Take the case of confidential documents being sent down to the King's Printer to be printed; it is necessary to have all the clerks in that department bound over to secrecy.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not object so much to that, but I would like to know the reason why the law is being changed. In the old law it is provided that the officer shall take and subscribe to the oath of allegiance and also the oath contained in schedule C, which is as follows:

I....solemnly and sincerely swear that I will faithfully and honestly fulfil the duties which devolve upon me as.....and that I will not ask or receive any sum of money, services, recompense or matter or thing whatsoever, directly or indirectly in return for what I have done or may do in the discharge of any of the duties of my said office, except my salary or what may be allowed me by law or by an order of the Governor in Council.

I think that is a wise oath. I would like to know the reason why that oath, as well as the oath of allegiance, has been suppressed.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The oath of allegiance is referred to in connection with section 34, but it is not in the schedule. We will insert the oath of allegiance when we reach it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Surely the oath of allegiance is in the schedule.

Mr. MURPHY: The text is not given, but it is referred to in the section.

Mr. CURRIE: I cannot understand why that schedule A is amended. With reference to schedule B, wherein the officer declares that he will not make known any matter or thing which comes to his knowledge by reason of his employment, why should a man be debarred from telling his superior, or the deputy minister, if anything occurs to the detriment of the service? He is precluded from doing that now. He has to close his eyes to anything that takes place.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is exactly what I am saying.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The schedule will stand.

Mr. LEMIEUX: You will amend the form?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: Then how can we pass the clause? The clause is subject to certain conditions and those conditions are contained in the schedule.

Mr. SIFTON: You can put in any conditions you like.

[Mr. Burrell.]

Mr. BUREAU: But schedules A and B are part of the clause. If you pass the clause you cannot change them.

Mr. SIFTON: My hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance says he is going to make new sections.

Section agreed to.

On section 35—Voting at elections permitted, but partisan work forbidden:

Mr. BUREAU: I think the last words in that section "dismissed from the public service," are sufficient. All that is necessary is to provide is that the person violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of an offence and shall be dismissed from the public service.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Does that mean that he is debarred from taking part in a municipal election?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think not.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Should you not mention that?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. BUREAU: It says in any Dominion or provincial election.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: But it does not say that he is not debarred from taking part in any municipal election.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is better as it is; he is at liberty to do so.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: He is not debarred.

Mr. FIELDING: The clause, I believe, has been in the law for some time, but I happen to know that in a matter of very great importance the word "provincial" was held to cover everything municipal inasmuch as the provincial authority creates the municipality.

Mr. MOWAT: Very often the postmaster or the collector of customs occupies the position of reeve, or other office in a municipal council, and it would be a pity to deprive them of the enjoyment of that privilege.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Would this be considered partisanship: A postmaster is a road foreman under the provincial government. He has power to engage men and dismiss them as he likes, and I know of instances where he has exercised the power just as he fancied. Would that be called partisanship?

Mr. MACLEAN: This section would not cover that case.

Mr. CURRIE: Would he not be using party funds? As the schedule does not contain a definition of what "party funds" are I would like to know from the minister what is meant by the term?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not know, perhaps my hon. friend would undertake to give a definition.

Mr. BUREAU: Nobody in this House could define what party funds are.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Let us be serious. I consider that the last line of the first section advertises Canada in rather a wrong way. It smacks of corruption and I would drop the expressions used there.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: "Party funds" need not necessarily suggest corruption.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Generally it does.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Not always.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Generally it does, from what I have seen in the case of others. I do not think it is a line that should be allowed to remain there because you seem to say by this section: "You A, B and C in the Civil Service being electors and on the list can cast your vote. I, your chief or your party leader, may receive and deal with any money or any party funds, but not you." It seems to me that we should not advertise in this way the political corruption that may take place in the country.

Mr. CURRIE: We will take another round out of this clause which reads:

No deputy head, officer, clerk or employee in the public service shall be debarred from voting at any Dominion or provincial election.

As a matter of fact I understand that in some of the provinces, Dominion civil servants are not permitted to vote at provincial elections. I think that is the case in the province of Ontario. It would seem as if this section confers upon such civil servant the right to vote in provincial elections which we have no power to do. As long as we say that they are not debarred from voting in the Dominion elections, that is as far as we can go. The section goes on to say:

If, under the laws governing the said election, he has the right to vote; but no such deputy head, officer, clerk or employee shall engage in partisan work.

—and so on. Now we have discussed what constituted partisan work in this House and we have had some very violent arguments about it. It was declared at that time that partisan work was not objectionable unless it was of an offensive character. The mere fact that a man went around in the company of a few party friends smoking his pipe peacefully, or attended a political meeting, was not regarded as partisanship as long as he did not do anything offensive or act in a partisan way. But we are leaving the word "offensive" out altogether in this Bill, and a man who simply attended a political meeting would be considered guilty of an offence as the Bill stands. A member of the Civil Service who went to a political meeting and merely listened to the speakers, he would be regarded as having engaged in partisan work. I think the minister would be well advised if he inserted the word "offensive" in the section. That would give a man in the public service a chance to justify himself who happened to be in a crowd listening to a soap box orator who was delivering an arraignment against this Government, because that man could say, "I did not take any part in the proceedings. I was only an on-looker." The clause as it now stands is a very drastic one and could be construed in a very drastic manner. Under the old definition everybody in the service knew what was meant; they could attend a political gathering and they could vote, but they could not become agents or canvassers or take an offensive part in an election. That is only fair; I would not deprive any man in the service of the right to attend a political meeting. He has the right to vote and before voting should have the right to listen to both sides if he so desires. For that reason I would ask the minister to insert the word "offensive" before the words "partisan work." Hundreds of men have been charged with violation of the law and taking part in elections offensively and it all hinged on whether they were offensive partisans or not.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who shall decide whether a civil servant has been engaged in political work such as to merit dismissal?

Mr. BUREAU: The judge.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If dismissal was a penalty I suppose the minister, the deputy head or the commission should decide that. I think it very important, now that the Civil Service Act is being made applicable to the Outside Service, that all public servants abstain from taking part in elections. They are, of course, entitled to the right of attending meetings and to vote.

Mr. LEMIEUX: You invite them under this clause to take part in politics. They are not debarred from voting at elections.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They have the right to vote but not to engage in partisan work. I mention this in the interest of the service—and I think it is also in the public interest—that hereafter they abstain from taking part in an election.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who shall decide whether an officer has been offensively partisan and deserves dismissal? Will it be the minister, the deputy head or the commission?

Mr. BUREAU: The Governor in Council under section 30.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would say the commission.

Mr. BLAKE: The word "active," if inserted in the section, would solve the problem. There is no harm in a man attending a political meeting, but if he goes out and canvasses, or does any work in the election on behalf of any candidate, or takes any part in organizing, he is an active partisan.

Mr. CURRIE: I object to the clause as it stands, because it is open to such wide interpretation. The Elections Act provides that a man taking part in an election must either be an agent or a canvasser, drive voters to the poll, and so on. All these things are clearly defined as taking a partisan part in an election. If we are providing a penalty of $500 or imprisonment, we should not leave the interpretation of political partisanship so wide open. If a public servant happens to stand on a street corner when a political meeting is taking place, he might be charged with partisanship, taken before a magistrate and fined $500. The wording of the clause is altogether too loose with a penalty so high as that, and in justice to these men it should be clearly stated what partisanship consists of, whether attending public meetings, speaking, canvassing for votes, driving voters to the polls, treating or entertaining them in any way.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is no more treating.

Mr. CURRIE: There is, in some parts of the country. Some definition should be included in this clause similar to that contained in the Elections Act. There are certain definitions in that Act of what "taking an active part in an election" is, and of what an "agent" is. But this section is open to any construction whatsoever.

Mr. HOCKEN: I think the section is correct as it stands. I do not think any person in this House will have any difficulty in deciding whether or not a man is taking a partisan part in an election. And I do not think you can make this provision too strict. I think that men appointed to positions in the public service should absolutely eschew partisan politics; they should not do any more than cast their ballot. That is what this clause gives them permission to do. I think we are splitting hairs. I do not think this section can be misunderstood by any person. And if any civil servant is in doubt as to its meaning, it is his business to be on the right side, and if he keeps on the right side he won't be fined $500.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Might I call attention to what I consider to be a somewhat drastic provision. We are all actuated by the desire to punish men on the opposite side of politics, and we are always prepared to condone anything our own friends do, and candidates always try to get everybody to do as much as possible on their behalf. This section provides that any person violating its provisions shall be tried summarily. But who is going to lay an information against an individual whereby he is going to be penalised and fined $500?

Mr. BUREAU: The other fellow.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Who is going to take the responsibility of seeing such a man go to jail and his wife and family suffering because he has been induced to do something which has been created a wrong by this section? Is it not sufficient to have that man dismissed? Another objection to the clause is this, and I think some of the ministers in the House will confirm what I say. You proceed under summary conviction and go before a justice of the peace. Now I know how these gentlemen are appointed, and I am free to say that if there was a Conservative Administration in the province of Alberta they would probably dismiss every justice of the peace and put their own people in.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Why?

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Because it is done in practice, the same as it is done in all the provinces of Canada.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is a reflection on the Minister of Customs (Mr. Sifton).

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: The Minister of Customs would not do it himself personally.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It would be done by others more criminal still.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: It may be more criminal. However, it is a fact, as the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) knows, that this practice pertains not only to the province of Alberta but also to the province of Quebec.

Mr. BUREAU: Oh, no.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Then I should like to live there and learn the political ethics of that fine province.

Mr. BUREAU: You would learn to put in more of your friends but not to dismiss the old ones.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I am not going into any vicious practices in Alberta. But from my experience there, the justices of the peace are all good politicians, and I fancy you would have to take appeals in all of these cases and go before the district court. I think the section is a little too drastic. And if the public servant does anything politically which he ought not to do, under this section, it seems to me, that he has a fairly good punishment if he is put out.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the old law?

Mr. BUREAU: The old law had no sanction at all.

Mr. MURPHY: No penalty?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is no penalty in the present Act.

Mr. BUREAU: I move that the words "be guilty of an offence and liable, upon summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars or imprisonment for any period not exceeding one month and to" be struck out. Under the Elections Act a penalty is provided for certain offences. The fact that a man is a civil servant does not prevent his coming under that law, but here, because he is a civil servant, we make a further punishment. We all know that in an election feeling runs high. If I saw a civil servant running against me, while I might not personally say anything, my political friends will say: "I will have this fellow fined." That is not fair.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is dismissal sufficient?

Mr. BUREAU: Certainly. I think it is the only power we should exercise.

Mr. CURRIE: Why put impossible and sumptuary legislation such as this on the statute books? We all know very well that when an election takes place in some quarters of the country feeling runs high and hot, and men have been taken and locked up in jail, habeas corpus and everything else forgotten, simply because they have been found as strangers at a hotel. We should put an end to that kind of nonsense, and clearly define in this section what partisanship shall consist of. I would like the minister to have inserted after the words "shall engage in partisan work" the words "such as canvassing, speaking" and so on, or put in the definition which is in the Elections Act as to what constitutes agency. In that way the public servant will know exactly what he can be convicted of.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall this clause stand?

Progress reported.

On the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean the House adjourned at 11.58 p.m.

Monday, May 13, 1918.

The House met at Eleven o'clock.

OFFICIALS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. Speaker informed the House that he had directed the Clerk of the House to lay upon the Table his recommendation and the clerk's report in the matter of the promotion of Mr. W. H. Dickson, Chief Reporter of the Committees of the House, to the position of Reporter of the Official Debates of the House of Commons.

COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS.

YUKON ELECTION.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Solicitor-General) presented the second report of the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and moved:

That the second report of the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections be taken into consideration on Thursday next.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: From the tenor of this motion I cannot tell whether my hon. friend intends to move that the report be concurred in. If he has no such intention, I think it would be advisable to have the evidence printed before we take the report into consideration.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No evidence was taken before the committee. The only document before the committee was the official return which has been printed and distributed amongst hon. members. Apart from that, we only had the statements of the parties concerned and of their counsel; I believe those statements were taken down and would be available if desired. It is not my intention to move that the report of the committee be adopted by the House, because I do not apprehend that it is my duty to make such a motion. As chairman of the committee it is my duty to report to the House the committee's finding, and also, as laid down in Bourinot, on page 553:

It is usual for the Chairman to move, after he has presented his report, that it be taken into consideration on a future day, and it shall be placed on the Order Paper for that day. After that motion, when it is on the Order Paper, it is open to any member of the House to make such motion in regard to its adoption as he sees fit.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is not a very graceful way of dealing with a report.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie) confirms my understanding that strong arguments have been made on both sides of the question, and as notes have been taken of the argument I think it would be advisable to have them printed for the information of the House.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not know to what extent they are available, but I shall confer with the Solicitor General, and if the statements are available there is no reason why they should not be printed.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

Abstract of statements of insurance companies of Canada for the year ended December 31, 1917.—Hon. Mr. Reid.

THE GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMMISSION.

INTERIM REPORTS PRESENTED.

Hon. FRANK CARVELL (Minister of Public Works): I beg to lay on the Table interim reports Nos. 2 and 3, by Mr. Sanford Evans, of the Georgian Bay Canal Commission. A number of copies of the first report were printed, and I understand there are still on hand some 2,113 copies of that report in English and 1,369 in French. I therefore beg to move:

That five thousand copies of these two reports be printed in English and five hundred in French, and that Rule 74 be suspended in connection therewith.

Mr. MURPHY: I would suggest that the number to be printed in French be one thousand.

Mr. CARVELL: I have no objection. The statement which I have had prepared at the request of the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) shows the number printed in French and English is: English 7,800, cost $2,045; French 1,900, cost $787.

They were distributed as follows: English 5,347; French 491. The demand for French copies was very small and I believed that 500 would have been sufficient but I have no objection to accepting the suggestion of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MURPHY: The demand might be larger now.

Mr. CARVELL: It might be larger now and I will make it a thousand in French and 5,000 in English. The motion will therefore read:

That 5,000 copies of these reports be printed in English and 1,000 in French, and that rule 74 be suspended in connection therewith.

Motion agreed to.

JUDGES' ACT AMENDMENT—SENATE BILL.

On the motion that Senate Bill No. 88 to amend the Judges' Act be read the first time:

Mr. LEMIEUX: That Bill was debated last session by the House of Commons. It had been grafted on another Bill introduced by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty). I see that the Hon. Senator Ross of Halifax has introduced the same principle in this Bill by itself. If my hon. friend the Minister of Justice would explain to the House whether this Bill is objectionable and, if so, how, it might be possible for the House to dispose of it now. As I understand, the Bill is not distributed yet.

Mr. SPEAKER: Properly speaking the order should stand because on the first reading there can be no debate.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not prepared to say at present in what respect the Bill is objectionable or if it is objectionable. Before taking it up there are some matters which it raises that require consideration. I would like to look into them before taking a position on it and that is the reason I do not desire to take the Bill up at the present time.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

FIRST READING OF SENATE BILLS.

Bill No. 95, for the identification of traders in German goods.—Mr. Currie.

Bill No. 96, to incorporate the Christian Community of Universal Brotherhood.—Mr. John F. Reid.

DELEGATION OF FARMERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MURPHY: I have been requested to ask what time and place have been fixed by the Government for dealing with the delegation of farmers who are to be in Ottawa to-morrow.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Really, I do not know. I think my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) will be glad to give that information later on. He has had the matter in hand.

Mr. CAHILL: With the consent of the House might I ask the Prime Minister if he would now give an answer to the question put by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) as to the meeting place for the farmers? I see the Minister of Agriculture is now in his seat.

Hon. Mr. CRERAR: The Department of Agriculture has secured the Russell Theatre for the forenoon and afternoon, and I understand it was arranged that whatever members of the Government could attend would meet them there at 11.30 a.m.

CENSORSHIP REGULATIONS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (North Simcoe): I would like to ask the Government a question with regard to the position of the Order in Council No. 915 brought to the attention of the House on April 16, 1918. This Order in Council dealt with the publication of information and also the expression of opinions by people throughout the country. I want to know whether the Order in Council has been laid on the table of this House and if so has it been disposed of in any way.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It was brought down and laid on the table of the House. I do not quite understand the other part of my hon. friend's question. The Order in Council has been operative since it passed.

Mr. CURRIE: If an Order in Council or regulation of a department adopted under a statute, is objectionable, according to the authorities—May and Redlich—it is competent to take action with regard to that Order in Council or regulation on a motion for an address. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, some time before to-morrow, to consider that point, to consult the English authorities and to find out whether it is competent for a private member to move an address upon the order for motions dealing with a document of that kind provided no minister has done so.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall make inquiry.

BELLEVILLE PRINCE EDWARD BRIDGE COMPANY.

On the motion of Mr. Richardson the House went into Committee on Bill No. 28 respecting the Belleville Prince Edward Bridge Company—Mr. Porter—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Directors to have power to regulate tolls.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have the tolls mentioned in the Bill been agreed to by the opponents of the measure? I understand there was very strong opposition to this Bill from the people of Belleville and the surrounding municipalities.

Mr. RICHARDSON: In the absence of the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter), I undertook to look after this Bill, and I might explain that the Private Bills Committee spent nearly three sittings considering the measure. A subcommittee of the Private Bills Committee, of which the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) was a member, also considered it privately, and the rates set forth in the clause under consideration were agreed upon as the result of a compromise. Originally the bridge was started by the city of Belleville and the surrounding municipalities, who expended upon it some $33,000 or more. They then got to the end of their financial tether and borrowed from an estate an amount equal to about $50,000. They were unable to pay that obligation, the bridge came under the hammer and was bought in by the estate that had advanced the money, and which has since been operating the bridge at, they contended, a considerable loss. The committee decided that they would have an investigation, so the whole matter was referred to Mr. Clarkson, the accountant, who, after a week's investigation, brought down a report which was considered by the subcommittee referred to, and it was arranged that a clause should be inserted in the Bill giving the municipalities the power at any time to purchase the bridge for $72,500, which was an amount agreed upon by the two interested parties.

Mr. BUREAU: Within six months.

Mr. RICHARDSON: They have six months in which to make the purchase.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was the price fixed?

Mr. RICHARDSON: The price was fixed in the Bill, and the bridge can be taken over at any time.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the price?

Mr. RICHARDSON: The price is $72,500. The chartered accountant who was asked to look into the matter, reported that if the estate who own the bridge were allowed six per cent on their money, they would receive $117,000, and if allowed five per cent the amount would be considerably less. There were certain disputes as to when the period should begin, but the amount fixed was a compromise arranged between the parties, and all those interested agreed that the increase in tolls was a fair one, and would not produce more than five per cent on the money invested.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was Mr. Parliament, the local member for Prince Edward, a party to the arrangement?

Mr. RICHARDSON: He was a party to it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Did he accept the tolls agreed upon, and also the price?

Mr. RICHARDSON: He did.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And the new conditions?

Mr. RICHARDSON: He accepted the price and the tolls. The ex-reeve of the municipality was also present and also agreed that the tolls were reasonable.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Then the objecting parties were satisfied?

Mr. RICHARDSON: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: The hon. member for Maisonneuve has asked if Mr. Parliament attended the Committee. I do not believe he was before the sub-committee, or at the last meeting of the Committee, but he was present previously. The city of Belleville was represented by its solicitor and mayor, and the township of Prince Edward by Mr. Dempsey. The Sutherland estate was represented by one of the estate and by their solicitor, Mr. Kilmer. By arrangement, Mr. Clarkson, accountant, was chosen to make an investigation, and the sub-committee reported that all the interested parties had agreed, although I may say that the city of Belleville gave instructions to Mr. Pringle not to consent to anything. But we put the restriction within the Bill that within six months the municipalities would have the right to purchase for the sum of $72,500, and to complete the purchase within one year. So as to make the terms more convenient between the parties, the tolls, which were based on recommendations made by Mr. Clarkson, and which permit of a reasonable profit figured at five per cent to be made by the operators of the bridge, will not come into force before three months from date. The object of this is to allow all parties to get together, and take advantage of the provision which was introduced into the Bill, that upon giving notice by any municipality interested in the bridge within six months it can be purchased for the sum of $72,500. Nobody was left in ignorance on the matter, everybody interested was invited to state their views, and the sub-committee reported, after all the evidence had been taken and everybody had been given a chance to present their claims.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I might further explain that the municipalities interested sent representatives to wait on the Ontario Government to see what assistance they would grant, and that government agreed to assist to the extent of at least forty per cent, with the object that the parties concerned might be able to so arrange it that the bridge would become a public work.

Mr. MURPHY: We may assume then that whatever objection originally existed with respect to the tolls to be charged has disappeared, in view of the compromise arranged in regard to the purchase of the bridge?

Mr. RICHARDSON: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: Absolutely.

Section agreed to, and Bill reported and read the third time.

Tribunal No. 159: J. A. Perrault, services of member, $79.18; Jos. Beaudry, services of member, $75; I. Beaudry, services of secretary, $37.50; Emile Ethier, services of constable, $30; E. Ethier, rent and caretaking, $35. Total, $256.68.

4. All accounts received from the above tribunals have been passed for payment, but amounts due cannot be ascertained until further accounts have been received.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

Mr. BOURASSA:

1. Have all the Judges of Exemption Tribunals established under the Military Service Act, 1917, been paid the fees to which they are entitled in connection with their work?

2. If not, when does the Government intend to settle with them?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. All accounts received have been paid or are in course of audit and payment.

2. Any accounts not paid will be paid as soon as the amount justly chargeable can be ascertained.

M. D. No. 4 ADVANCES.

Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. Has the attention of the Minister of Militia and Defence been called to the two items which appear in Vol. 4 of the Auditor General's Report, recently tabled, under the expenditure for the Fourth Military Divisional Area (Montreal): Capt. W. H. Suckling, advance unaccounted for, $5,500, Hon. Lt.-Col. Du Verger, advance unaccounted for, $1,000?

2. Have the above amounts unaccounted for been remitted?

3. If so, when?

Major-General MEWBURN:

1. These two items represent advances on account of recruiting expenses, 242nd Battalion, $5,500; 150th Battalion, $1,000. Both items have been under observation. Capt. Suckling has submitted vouchers which were returned for correction on February 27th last, to the headquarters of the Battalion in France. The Paymaster, Military District No. 4, submitted vouchers from Lt.-Col. Du Verger on 18th March last, for additional information. No replies have come to hand in either case. A reminder has been sent out in both cases.

2. No.

3. Answered by No. 2.

THE PARASITES PROHIBITED.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Has the Government suppressed or Forbidden the circulation of a book or pamphlet edited by the Rev. Benjamin Spence, Toronto, containing an article wholly or in part written by Arthur Mee, on Temperance?

2. Was such book or pamphlet printed in the city of Toronto?

3. Was any member of the Government aware of the fact that such book or pamphlet was being prepared, before the same was in print?

4. What action has the Government taken to suppress such book or pamphlet?

5. Will the Government produce the said book or pamphlet for the information of the members of the House?

6. Is a criminal proceeding now pending against the Rev. Benjamin Spence for publishing and circulating such book or pamphlet? If so, what are the grounds for such criminal proceedings?

7. Was the said book or pamphlet published or circulated by the Rev. Benjamin Spence with the knowledge or sanction of any member of the Government?

8. If so, what member of the Government was aware of its publication or circulation?

9. Has the said Rev. Benjamin Spence or any of his friends interviewed or conferred with any members of the Government regarding the criminal proceedings now proceeding against the said Rev. Benjamin Spence? If so, what took place at such interview or interviews?

10. Has the said Rev. Benjamin Spence written or communicated with the Premier or any members of the Government regarding the criminal proceedings which are now pending? If so, what was the nature of such communication?

11. Did any members of the Government answer in writing any of the written communications received in connection with the book from the Rev. Benjamin Spence, or any of his friends? If so, what was the nature of the replies?

12. Has any member of the Government interviewed or conferred with the Censor regarding the said book or pamphlet edited by the said Rev. Benjamin Spence?

13. Did the Censor make any report to the Government for the suppression of the said book or pamphlet? If so, what was the nature of the report?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. No.

4. Suppressed under the authority of the Censorship Regulations.

5. As distribution of the book was prohibited it is obviously undesirable to have it produced.

6. It is understood that the local authorities instituted proceedings.

7. No.

8. Answered by No. 7.

9 and 10. A lawyer representing Mr. Spence saw the Minister of Justice and suggested that in view of Mr. Spence's submission to the Order criminal proceedings be dropped, and was informed that action in such a matter was a question for the Attorney General of the province and the Government had no desire to interfere.

11. Various letters were received and some answered. It was pointed out to Mr. Spence that it was not considered desirable to remove the decision arrived at.

12. The Chief Censor conferred with the Secretary of State and recommended the suppression of the book.

13. Answered by No. 12.

[Mr. Casgrain.]

MR. E. BEAUFORT.

*Mr. PROULX:

Referring to the answers of the Hon. Mr. Burrell to questions regarding one E. Beaufort, as reported on page 1413 of Unrevised Hansard:

1. Did the said Beaufort go to Halifax to perform work in that city while he was employed on the Chief Press Censor's Staff?

2. While so employed on the Press Censor's Staff did any letters, telegrams or other correspondence of the said Beaufort come into the hands of the Chief of the Dominion Police?

3. If so, would the said correspondence have come into the hands of the said Chief of Dominion Police if Beaufort had not been watched or placed under surveillance?

4. Since the said Beaufort has represented the Christian Science Monitor in the Press Gallery of the House of Commons have any letters or other correspondence between him and the Christian Science Monitor come into the hands of the said Chief of the Dominion Police?

5. Is it not a fact that within the week ending March 23, 1918, the Chief Press Censor stated publicly and within the hearing of more than one person on a street car in the City of Ottawa, (a) that Beaufort had worked on his staff; (b) that he had in his possession letters and telegrams compromising the said Beaufort, and (c) that it was in consequence of this correspondence and of the general suspicion attaching to him that Beaufort had been dismissed or let out—or let go—or words to the like effect?

6. Before recommending the said Beaufort for appointment, did the Chief Press Censor look into his Winnipeg record?

7. What was the total amount paid Beaufort by the Government?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1, 2, 3, 4. Matters of the character alluded to are necessarily confidential.

5. The Government has no such information.

6. Yes.

7. $1,322.93.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT.—CENTRAL APPEAL JUDGE.

*Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. Has the attention of the Government been drawn to an article in the Montreal Star of April 27, 1918, under the heading:

"My Canadian Visit—Continued."
"By the Right Hon. Sir Frederick Smith, Bart., His Majesty's Atttorney-General, Treasurer of Gray's Inn, Hon. Fellow of Wadham College, Oxford", and containing the following:—

"Thursday, January 24.—In the morning we skated again.

"We lunched at the new hotel, the 'Chateau Laurier,' with the members of the Canadian Club. Judge Duff, one of the ablest members of the Bench, who is to-day sitting in final appeal over the decisions of the tribunals in the Province of Quebec, was in the Chair. Sir Robert Borden and many other ministers were present."

2. Did any member of the Government inform Sir Freedrick Smith that Judge Duff had to deal only with appeals from the Province of Quebec?

3. Was any such instruction or direction given Judge Duff as Central Appeal Judge under the Military Service Act?

4. If so, what other Judge was appointed to deal with appeals from the other provinces?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN:

1. No.

2. No. Mr. Justice Duff, under the provisions of the Military Service Act and as Central Appeal Judge, deals with the appeals from all the provinces.

3. No.

4. Answered by No. 3.

Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. Is the Government aware that Mr. Justice Duff, appointed Central Appeal Judge under the provisions of the Military Service Act, is also President, or Chairman, of the Round Table Club or Circle, of Ottawa?

2. Is it not a fact that one of the chief features of the Round Table Club propaganda is to promote in the Dominions Overseas the policy of Compulsory Military Service?

3. Has the attention of Mr. Justice Duff been called to the impropriety of acting as Central Appeal Judge as long as he remains President, or Chairman, of the Round Table Club?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1 and 2. The Government has no information.

3. No.

POST OFFICE LOWER L'ARDOISE.

Mr. McKENZIE:

1. Who is the Postmistress at Lower L'Ardoise?

PRESS CENSORSHIPS.

*Mr. CHISHOLM:

1. Have the Press or Cable Censors for Nova Scotia at any time during the years 1917 or 1918 reported to the Chief of the Dominion Police or to the Chief Press Censor regarding communications addressed to a person in Halifax and signed in some instances "Five" and in others "Beaufort"?
2. If so, what action was taken with regard to such report or in connection with the said communications?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1 and 2. It is not customary or in the public interest to disclose particulars regarding censorship matters.

TRANSFERS FROM ROYAL FLYING CORPS. TO C. E. F.

Mr. NICKLE:

1. Has a Canadian, while in Canada, enlisted in the Royal Flying Corps or Royal Air Force, the privilege of transferring to the Canadian Expeditionary Force?
2. Has the Canadian Government jurisdiction or control over Canadians in the Royal Flying Corps or the Royal Air Force?
3. Is a Canadian, while in Canada, enlisted in the Royal Flying Corps or Royal Air Force transferable against his wish to the British Infantry or other units of the British Forces, if he does not wish to continue as a member of the Royal Flying Corps or Royal Air Force?

Major-General MEWBURN:

1. He has no right of transfer.
2. No.
3. No.

Lt. BERTRAM DIMOCK.

Mr. Du TREMBLAY:

1. Is Bertram Dimock in the employ of the Militia Department of Canada or Great Britain, or attached to any Militia Unit of Canada or Great Britain? If so, what is the rank of the said Bertram Dimock, what salary, if any, has he received to date, and what is the total amount so received?
2. Has the said Bertram Dimock served any time in the trenches in France or Flanders? If not, why?
3. Who was sent to England in command of a draft from the British Expeditionary Force stationed at Windsor?
4. Is it the policy of the Government to give commands to returned soldiers? If so, was the party who took the draft of the British Expeditionary Force which left Windsor on the first, second or third of April, an officer or soldier who had seen service in the trenches?

Major-General MEWBURN:

1. Bertram Allison Dimock holds the rank of Lieutenant in the 81st Hants Regiment, Active Militia. He is not now actively employed. He was appointed to recruit and take charge of No. 13 Reinforcing Draft, Canadian Railway Troops, on May 3, 1917, and proceeded overseas with the draft on August 3, 1917. He was returned to Canada in October, 1917, and struck off strength of C.E.F. on October 29, 1917. Whilst in Canada, Lieut. Dimock of No. 13 Draft, Canadian Railway Troops, received the pay and allowances of his rank, amounting to $295.10. Whilst in England, he received the pay and allowance of his rank.

2. No. This information is being obtained from the overseas authorities.

3. If the hon. member will give further details as to which draft is referred to, the desired information will be obtained.

4. Yes, when returned officers are available. A draft which sailed from Halifax on April 9, 1918, from Windsor, N.S., was in charge of Major H. H. Stearns. This officer proceeded to England with the 202nd Battalion. He has not seen service in France.

MAJOR F. W. D. BREMNER.

Mr. Du TREMBLAY:

1. What position, if any, does W. F. D. Bremner, of Falmouth, in the county of Hants, hold in the Active Militia of Canada?

2. If the said Bremner is in the Active Militia of Canada, what is his salary, how much has he received from the department from the outbreak of the present war to date?

3. Who went overseas as second in command of the 112th Battalion, Canadian Expeditionary Force, and where is the said officer at the present time?

4. Is the wife of the said Bremner in receipt of Separation Allowance? If so, how much has she received to date?

5. Was the said W. F. D. Bremner stationed at Halifax in the Active Militia of Canada since the present war began, in command of, or in connection with any battalion or company of soldiers? If so, was he relieved of his command, and what was the cause of his being so relieved?

Major-General MEWBURN:

1. Captain in the 81st Hants Regiment. Employed recruiting for Canadian Engineers.

2. The pay and allowances of his rank, totalling $4,068.40.

3. Major F. W. D. Bremner, C.E.F. (Captain in the 81st Regiment). Employed in Military District No. 6, headquarters at Halifax, N.S.

4. Separation allowance was paid at $40 per month from November 26, 1915, to February 29, 1916, and at $50 per month from March 1, 1916, to February 28, 1918; a total of $1,326.

From March 1, 1918, the account was transferred for payment to District Paymaster, Military District No. 6, and it is presumed payments are still going forward regularly at $50 per month.

5. (a) Yes, this officer—for cause—was relieved of his command, but on account of the excellent reports from his Commanding Officer, and the O. C. of the District, he was reinstated, by authority of the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence.

EXEMPTIONS IN BERTHIER.

Mr. GERVAIS:

1. Has the Government, through Mr. Arthur Ecrement, a Notary of Montreal, and a defeated candidate in the Constituency of Berthier at the elections which took place on the 17th of December, 1917, or any of its members received exemption demands from certain conscripts residing in the Parish of St. Cuthbert in the Electoral District of Berthier?

2. If so, has the Government or any of its members granted, or are they willing to grant said exemption or exemptions asked for?

3. What are the names of the conscripts who have also been exempted through said Arthur Ecrement?

4. Has the Government or any of its members authorized the said Arthur Ecrement to state that the electors of the constituency of Berthier who had voted in his favour at the last election would be exempted, and that those who had voted for Dr. Gervais would be enlisted as conscripts?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Stand.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am informed that many persons are exploiting the good faith of the farmers by promising to secure exemptions for them. If a statement were made to the House and the country that such methods as are mentioned in this question should not be adopted, I think much good would result.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: This question relates entirely to the enforcement of the Military Service Act, and should be answered by the Minister of Justice, who is, of course, prepared to make a statement. Indeed, the statement can now be made. No person in this country has the slightest authority to promise exemption by the tribunals; it is entirely out of the question that there should be any such condition. The stand taken by the members of the Government with regard to this is that such matters must be determined by the tribunals according to their best judgment; the Government will appeal whenever it is considered desirable in the public interest that appeal should be asserted. But no person, I repeat, has any right, through members of the Government or otherwise, to influence the decision of the tribunals in respect to exemption.

THE KENT HOUSE.

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. Has the Government considered, or is it considering the proposal of taking the Kent House and adjacent buildings and cottages at Montmorency Falls, near Quebec City, for the purpose of using same for a military hospital?

2. If so, what does the proposal consist of in the way of rent or other conditions?

3. Is the Government aware that the Kent House is a summer resort visited each year by thousands of people, is situated at a short distance from the golf links, and offers too much attraction and noise to turn same into a hospital?

Major-General MEWBURN:

1. Yes, an offer has been made.

2. A rental of $6,000 per annum is being asked by the owners.

3. The Board of Medical Consultants have reported strongly in favour of its use as a hospital, but no decision has yet been arrived at by the Government.

MEMBERS OF Y.M.C.A. AND SALVATION ARMY IN GOVERNMENT EMPLOY.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. How many persons formerly in the employ of the Y.M.C.A. are now in the employ of the Government? What are their names?

2. How many former officers or employees of the Salvation Army are now in the employ of the Government?

3. Were all these appointments made on the recommendation of the President of the Privy Council?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL: If the hon. gentleman will make this question a little more specific, it will be possible to answer it. Otherwise, it should stand as an Order for Return.

Question stands.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. CURRIE:

For a copy of all correspondence between the Registrar, E. Hart Nichols, under the Military Service Act, Halifax, N.S., and the Military Service Council or any member thereof, during the years 1917 and 1918; concerning non-compliance with the Military Service Act in Lunenburg County, N.S.; also for copy of all correspondence between the Military Service Council, or any member thereof, or the Minister of Justice, or the Deputy Minister of Justice and Mr. William Duff, M.P., Lunenburg, N.S., during the years 1917 and 1918; also a copy of any statements, affidavits and declarations now on file in the Military Service Council in respect of the administration of the Military Service Act in the County of Lunenburg and more particularly in respect of any alleged interference by Mr. William Duff with the proper enforcement of the said Act.

Mr. CURRIE:

For a copy of the contract made between the Government of Canada and Mr. Mosher of Feltzen South, in the County of Lunenburg, for the carrying of His Majesty's mails between Feltzen South and Rose Bay, in the County of Lunenburg. Said contract being executed during the month of September, October or November, 1917, and having as one of the bondsmen on the said contract Mr. Wm. Duff, of Lunenburg, in the County of Lunenburg.

Mr. McKENZIE:

For a return giving a copy of all complaints, correspondence, letters, memorials, telegrams, etc., since the 1st day of September, 1917, passing between the Post Office Department, the Post Office Inspector for Nova Scotia, and any other person or persons relating to the Post Office at Lower L'Ardoise, Nova Scotia.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

For a copy of the Order in Council appointing Mr. Main Johnson and passed under the War Measures Act as mentioned by Hon. Mr. Rowell on page 1350 of Unrevised Hansard.

Mr. CANNON:

For a copy of all documents or correspondence between the Hon. Albert Sévigny and the Director General of Government Railways or the Superintendent of said railways; also copy of the reports or inquiries held in connection with J. W. Boivin, Transcontinental Agent at St. Malachie, Dorchester County.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS:

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER:

1. Is the Government aware that in the past sixteen months in the Cities of Winnipeg, Hamilton, Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal, the following quantities of foodstuffs are reported to have been ordered to be destroyed as unfit for human consumption:—

(a) Meats: Winnipeg, 7,262 lbs.; Hamilton, 4,874 lbs.; Toronto, quantities not given in lbs., only sides, quarters, legs, etc.; Ottawa, 7,787 lbs.; Montreal, 105,898 lbs.

(b) Poultry: Winnipeg, 11,364 lbs.; Hamilton, 8 fowl; Montreal, 2,344 lbs.

(c) Fish: Winnipeg, 9,066 lbs.; Toronto, 74,587 lbs., weight not given, only number of packages for remainder; Montreal, 137,903 lbs.

(d) Vegetables: Winnipeg, 265,565 lbs.; Toronto, 5,855 lbs. cabbage, the rest weight not given, only crates, baskets, etc., also recently 48,010 lbs., or 24 tons of food unfit for human consumption; Montreal, 13,940 lbs.

(e) Eggs: Winnipeg, 3,013 lbs.; Hamilton, 40 doz.; Toronto, 1,050 doz., 6 tubs, 1 pail, and 8 gallons yolk.

(f) Butter: Winnipeg, 3,374 lbs.; Hamilton, 22 lbs.

(g) Fruit (fresh and dried): Winnipeg, fresh, 46,375 lbs., dried, 37,207 lbs.; Hamilton, fresh, 12 baskets; Montreal, fresh, 3,362 lbs.

2. If so, what action does the Government propose taking to prevent a continuance of such waste?

Mr. CHISHOLM:

Referring to the statements appearing in a despatch from Ottawa to the Toronto Globe, on Friday, April 19, 1918, in regard to Power for Munition Needs and the Government's connection therewith:—

1. To what extent has the Government assisted the Imperial Munitions Board financially?

2. When was Sir Henry Drayton appointed Power Controller?

3. Had he been investigating matters connected with Power for Munitions or other important undertakings in advance of his appointment as Power Controller? If so, for how long?

4. Had Sir Henry Drayton any actual previous experience operating large steam or water-power producing machinery?

5. Did Sir Henry Drayton in or about the month of November, 1917, direct the Toronto Power Company to deliver a large amount of power to the Ontario Power Company or to the Hydro Electric Power Commission? If so, upon what authority was the direction or message based?

6. Has the Toronto Power Company rendered bills for supplying the power referred to in Question No. 5? If so, what is their total amount?

7. Did the Power Controller make any arrangements whatever for the payment of the bills referred to in Question No. 6 either at the time referred to in Question No. 5, or at any subsequent time? If so, (a) what arrangements were made; (b) when were they made, and (c) what amounts, if any, have been paid and upon what dates were they paid?

8. If Sir Henry Drayton failed or neglected to provide in advance for the payment of the bills in question will the Government or the Imperial Munitions Board be compelled to deal with them?

9. The public press of April 19, 1918, credited Sir Henry Drayton with the following statement:—"I am sorry to have to report that, so far as hydraulic power is concerned, no more power is at present available." Upon what date did Sir Henry first learn that no more hydraulic power was available?

10. Has Sir Henry Drayton authority to enforce the carrying out of any order or other direction, to (a) The Ontario Power Company, and (b) to the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario, to deliver power to essential munition works or to other important war undertakings? If so, has he issued any such directions?

11. When and in regard to what works or other undertakings were such orders or directions issued and have they been obeyed?

12. Referring to another statement credited to Sir Henry Drayton in the public press of April 19, 1918, as follows:—"The power shortage on the Hydro lines has to be admitted as resulting from contracts the Hydro has already made or assumed,"—can the Power Controller or the Government provide any measure of financial relief to those with whom the Hydro has failed to execute its contracts?

13. Has the Power Controller issued lists of specific places or works to which power must be supplied in advance of all other places or works, on account of their importance as war works or necessities?

14. If so:—(a) What places or works were enumerated? (b) Upon what dates were the lists issued? (c) How many horse-power were involved? (d) How many of the orders were obeyed, and when, in each case?

15. Referring to the statement attributed to Sir Henry Drayton in the said Globe despatch of April 19, 1918, "that munitions plants were being insufficiently supplied with power, and that the nation's war effort was thereby hindered and impaired,"—upon what date did the Imperial Munitions Board first make such complaint?

16. Referring to Sir Henry Drayton's statement that power had been supplied to the American Cyanamide Company, which was making fertilizers, but "in view of the emergency this supply was very properly cut off,"—did Sir Henry Drayton have anything whatever to do with the cutting-off of power to which the reference is made?

17. When was that power first "cut-off," and what are the names of the more essential war works to which the power in question was diverted?

18. Referring further to the alleged statement by Sir Henry Drayton that "under an order made by me, electricity is continued to be supplied by the Canadian Niagara to the Power Commission,"—has Sir Henry made any provision, upon which the Canadian Niagara Power Company can rely, for payment for the power to which he refers? If so, what are the details thereof?

PRIVATE BILLS LEGISLATION.

SUSPENSION OF RULES RELATING TO PRIVATE BILLS.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That owing to the advanced period of the Session the following Rules relating to Private Bills be suspended for the remainder of the Session, viz:—Rules 28, 28A, 52, 103 and paragraph (a), subsection 3 of Rule 89; and that Private Bills reported on Private Bills days by any Select Standing Committee be placed on the Orders of the Day of the same day for consideration in Committee of the Whole amongst Private Bills, or if reported on days other than Private Bill days then immediately after Routine Proceedings.

He said: This is the motion which stood over Saturday at the request of the leader of the Opposition.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I hope that my right hon. friend will not persist in this motion, which has reference to the safeguards which are provided in the rules of the House with regard to Private Bills. Many of the Private Bills which come before the House affect the rights of third parties—divorce Bills, for instance, or applications for patents, which we have before us very often. All the rules mentioned in this motion safeguard the rights of third parties who may have objection to such Bills. Without going in particular into any one of these rules, let me call attention to one or two. Rule 52 says:

Every Bill shall receive three several readings on different days, previously to being passed. On urgent or extraordinary occasions a Bill may be read twice or thrice, or advanced two or more stages in one day.

If we dispense with this rule a Private Bill may be railroaded through the House and a party who may desire to present his objections to it will have no opportunity of doing so. This rule has very seldom been departed from.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think it has been usual at the end of each session to make some departure from the strictness of the rule.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Not so wide a departure as this.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Perhaps this motion goes too far. I am not very familiar with its terms; it came to me from the Private Bills Committee. Possibly it may require some modification.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I should say so. Of course, in the case of a Bill of special urgency, it might be necessary to dispense with the rule that every Bill shall receive three different readings on different days, but to dispense with the rule altogether seems to be a very dangerous proceeding.

Mr. STEELE: As Chairman of the Private Bills Committee, I wish to say that if we are going to finish the business of the House this week, as I am sure every hon. member desires, practically all Private Bills will, unless there is some suspension of the rules, be blocked from now on.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many Private Bills are left?

Mr. STEELE: Quite a number. There are the Bills on the Order Paper to-day, and there are still some others to come over from the Senate. Under the ordinary rules it will be quite impossible for any of those Bills to be considered by the committee, brought back to the House, put through the House in the usual way, and then go to the Senate and pass there. With the suspension of some of the rules, thus enabling the Bills to come before the House without the delays consequent upon the rules, those Bills can be got through.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Let my hon. friend bring his suggestion before the House in regard to each Bill. While there are many Bills, such as Bills of incorporation, to which I am sure no objection can be taken, which do not affect any private rights, there are other Bills, such as Bills for divorce or for renewal of patents, in regard to which the rules should be rigidly enforced, because rights of third parties may be affected by them. If my hon. friend, who is Chairman of the Private Bills Committee, will explain the nature of such Bills, I think, by unanimous consent, they could be passed. It would be better to let the motion stand for to-day.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I entirely agree that the rule as to the readings might be eliminated from the motion, because that is a matter of importance.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It would be better to let the motion stand for to-day, so that the Chairman of the Private Bills Committee may inquire to see how far his wishes may be met.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not remember ever seeing rule 52 suspended with regard to Private Bills. It seems to me that my right hon. friend is quite right in regard to that. The House, in regard to each Bill, should and can determine by unanimous consent. As far as the other rules are concerned, I do not see that there is any great importance connected with them. I have looked over them just now, and they seem to relate altogether to details, such as posting and other matters of that kind, which are really not very essential, because my impression, from more than twenty years' experience in this House, is that very few members go to the trouble of ascertaining whether the matter is posted or not.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Unless a member has a Bill of his own.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: He will do so with regard to his own Bill, but as regards Bills of other members, he does not pay much attention to those details.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The hon. member (Mr. Steele) who so efficiently presides over the Private Bills Committee, attends the sittings of the House when any of the Bills come up, the House will accept his word that all interests have been safeguarded, and we can then proceed with the Bills.

Mr. STEELE: Besides that difficulty, there is the difficulty of getting the Bills before the House. Under the rules, the Bills which are on the Order Paper to-day, which came over from the Senate, cannot be considered by the Committee for at least twenty-four hours. That will preclude the report of the Committee on those Bills coming before the House until Friday evening, the first occasion on which, after Tuesday, Private Bills can be considered. One can well understand, if the House is to prorogue on Saturday, that we cannot deal with them after that.

12 noon.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I should think that perhaps the suggestion of my right hon. friend would be fulfilled if we struck out rule 52 and paragraph 3, subsection (a) of rule 89, with regard to fees. Those would properly be determined in respect to each Bill. The other rules relate only to matters such as posting and other details, which, while very desirable, are not absolutely essential at this stage of the Session. The motion would then read:

That owing to the advanced period of the Session the following Rules relating to Private Bills be suspended for the remainder of the Session, viz.:—Rules 28, 28A, and 103; and that Private Bills reported on Private Bills days by any Select Standing Committee be placed on the Orders of the Day of the same day for consideration in Committee of the Whole amongst Private Bills, or if reported on days other than Private Bill days then immediately after Routine Proceedings.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

BILL TO AMEND THE CIVIL SERVICE ACT AND TO BRING THE OUTSIDE SERVICE UNDER ITS PROVISIONS.

The House again in Committee on Bill No. 53, respecting the Civil Service of Canada.—Mr. Boivin in the Chair (From May 11.)

The CHAIRMAN: When the Committee rose on Saturday, we had reached section 35. The hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) had moved, in amendment, that subsection 2 of section 35 be amended by striking out all the words after the word "shall" in the second line of the said subsection, as far as the words "be dismissed from the public service" in the last line, so that the said subsection would now read:

Any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall be dismissed from the public service.

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section, as amended, be adopted?

Mr. TURRIFF: I was not here on Saturday when this section was adopted. Was subsection 1 passed as it is in the Bill?

The CHAIRMAN: Section 35 has not been adopted as yet.

Mr. TURRIFF: I think subsection 1 should be amended to provide that all civil servants appointed in the future should not have the privilege of voting. The Civil Service should not have the vote, but I should not like to take the vote away from any of those who were appointed in the past when that was the law of the country. But if we now amend the Act to provide that any civil servant appointed in the future should not have the vote, then no one would have anything to complain of because, if a person wishes to retain the vote, he need not take a position under the Government. It would be much better for the Service and for the country if the Civil Service did not have the franchise. We now propose to bring the Outside Service under this Act, and the Government is taking over a big mileage of railways and we shall have thousands and tens of thousands of officials under the Government, so that the question of this vote may be a serious one. It has been found better in the Old Country that civil servants should not vote. Very few of them now vote, and there is no doubt, if civil servants did not have the vote, we would have a better service, and there would be less politics in the Service and fewer dismissals of officials when there is a change of Government. I should like to see that subsection changed.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It was the desire of the Government, in presenting this Bill to Parliament, to avoid the introduction of any new matter other than was absolutely necessary. My hon. friend's suggestion involves a very important principle, which will have to be considered some time, but I would not be disposed to view it favourably this session. When the Government consolidates its railway interests in this country, it is probable that some provision will have to made in respect to the railway employees voting at elections. In one of the provinces of Australia, I understand the railway employees have the right of selecting a parliamentary representative from among themselves. I do not know just what the details of the legislation are, but there is undoubtedly something to be said in its favour. For a great number of years the civil servants in England were debarred from voting; that rule was afterwards relaxed, but in the last fifteen years I understand that efforts have been made on many occasions by members of the British House of Commons to revert to the old rule. However, I think it is too late in the session to take into consideration a matter of such importance.

Section agreed to.

Mr. BUREAU: Before proceeding with the next section I would remind the minister to what took place last Saturday in connection with section 30. I took exception to that section as not being absolutely in line with the principle of the Bill, which was to abolish the abuse of patronage, and the minister said:

Mr. A. K. Maclean: Let us pass the section, and we will revert to it later.

Mr. Bureau: How can we revert to it if we pass it?

Mr. A. K. Maclean: By consent of the committee.

Mr. Bureau: I understand that the idea is to pass the Bill to-night, and then we shall hear no more of it. If the Bill is not to pass tonight, all right; I reserve the right, with the consent of the Government, to come back to this section later.

I should like to come back to this section for just a moment. The exception I took to this section on Saturday was this: During the general discussion of the principle of this Bill it was stated by every member who addressed the committee that the object was to make the Civil Service a career so that the best possible men would come into it, and with that in view, political influence was to be abolished in the matter of appointments and dismissals. I am in favour of that principle, and in favour of this Bill, but I do not want a sham Bill, or a Bill whose pretended good effects will disappear as soon as the legislation has been put on the statute book. The great complaint about patronage in the past has been not so much concerned with appointments as with dismissals; for every ten lines of Hansard relating to appointments there are ten pages relating to dismissals. I claim that if we want to make the Civil Service efficient, if we want to induce men of ability to enter it, we must give these men some protection. Now, this section gives no protection whatever to the men who enter the Civil Service. Of course, I may be told not to think that the heads of departments are going to act in an arbitrary way. But we never know what may happen. We have seen things done in the last few years which we never would have dreamt of. But assuming that the head of a department or the deputy head will never arbitrarily dismiss a man, there nevertheless remains the fear in the heart of a man who may seek an appointment that he is liable to be dismissed at the caprice of the minister or the whim of the deputy head. When I brought this question up on Saturday the minister said that he did not see how the section could be amended. The power to dismiss must remain in the Government, he said. I do not share the view of the minister. The object of this Bill is not only to control appointments, but to show the people of this country that the Union Government is determined to carry out its promise of abolishing patronage. I understand that its object is to better the conditions of the Civil Service so that men of ability will be induced to devote their services to the country, that salaries will be increased, and that there will be a more careful picking of the best men. The Minister of Customs said on Saturday that he did not see how the section could be amended very well. Now, I have prepared an amendment which I am going to submit to the committee. If it is rejected I shall nevertheless feel I have done my duty by trying to protect the Civil Service as far as possible. I therefore beg to move that the following be substituted for section 30:

Subject to the provisions of section 3 of this Act the power to remove or dismiss any deputy head, officer, clerk or employee shall vest in the Commission.

Before exercising such power the Commission shall require a statement in writing from the minister in the case of a deputy head, and from the deputy head in all other cases, giving the causes, reasons and facts invoked for such dismissal. Upon receipt of such statement in writing the Commission shall forthwith communicate a copy of same to the deputy head or other employee whose dismissal is sought. The deputy head or employee shall within three days after the receipt of copy of said statement file with the Commission a statement in writing in answer to such charges, in default of which the Commission may proceed on the statement submitted asking for dismissal.

That provides for notice being given to the man whose head is at stake that he is charged with such and such an offence. and gives him the opportunity an accused enjoys in any court of law of making answer to those charges. If the accused does not submit an answer within three days, the commission can proceed ex parte on the statement submitted asking for dismissal. I think this amendment, if adopted, will protect the civil servants; it will also serve to test whether this Bill has not been brought forward knowing that it is lame in many respects. If we are going to improve the Civil Service we want people to know that the country is willing to protect the members of the service, and we do not want to leave in the hands of a minister or deputy minister the right to dismiss an employee at will. Some one may object that section 30 does not provide for dismissal by the minister or deputy minister, but by the Governor in Council, but we all know how that works out. The Cabinet is now composed of twenty-three or twenty-five members, and each member has ten or a dozen commissions to supervise, as well as the legislation of his department to look after. The consequence is that when a minister comes before council with a recommendation for such a paltry thing as the dismissal of an employee, the recommendation will not be inquired into very closely, and the minister's colleagues will let it go through as a matter of courtesy. My amendment may be voted down, but, I repeat, I have submitted it for two purposes, first to protect Government employees and secondly, to test the good faith of those who are promoting this Bill.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not understand why it is necessary to suggest that the amendment is submitted to test the good faith of those who are promoting this Bill. My hon. friend, I think, is illogical there. It is quite true that the question of dismissals from the Civil Service has been more or less a political question. But the Governor in Council has never been in the habit of dismissing employees of the Inside Service; at least, I know of very few cases in which any employee of the Inside Service has been dismissed by the Government except for cause. I think that every regard has been paid to that part of the Civil Service in which appointments are made by competitive examination and promotions made upon merit. Inasmuch as the system of competitive examination and promotion by merit is to be applied to the Outside Service, I think it is not necessary to suggest that the power of dismissal be placed in the hands of the Civil Service Commission. Many hon. members have been protesting against this Bill on the ground that it will create a powerful bureaucracy. This is carrying that idea farther. I think it is perfectly sound to say that the power of dismissal should rest with the Governor in Council. Civil servants are employees of the Government, and I do not think the power of dismissal should rest anywhere except with that body. I do not think the civil servant would suffer in any respect whatever by the power resting with the Governor in Council. It is preferable that it should be there.

Mr. H. A MACKIE: Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bureau) allow his amendment to stand until we have had an opportunity of seeing it in writing and studying it? Some of the things suggested by the hon. gentleman commend themselves to me, but I would desire to criticise some other portions of the amendment. I do not, however, feel like doing so until I have had an opportunity of seeing the amendment in writing and considering it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We will revert to that when we reach the end of the Bill.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Might I suggest to the hon. member (Mr. Bureau) that he should shorten his amendment and confine it to the question of whether the power of dismissal should rest with the commission or the Government; leaving out the provision that in each case there should be a trial to determine whether a man should be discharged or not? That seems admissible to a certain extent, but it might not be a good idea to have a trial in every particular case. It seems to me that that would be impracticable. If the amendment could be confined to the question as to whether the dismissal should be made by the commission or by the Government, and if that question were dealt with by itself, it would perhaps be better.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My hon. friend (Mr. Bureau) might have copies of his amendment made at noon and circulate them among the members. We shall revert to that clause when we come to the end of the Bill.

Mr. BUREAU: I just drafted the clause since I came into the Chamber, but I have thought it over. I am willing to accept any suggestion, the adoption of which will ensure the protection of the civil servant. I do not object to the power of dismissal remaining in the Governor in Council, but I think we should make a provision that when a minister makes a recommendation to Council for the dismissal of a civil servant the brief of the employee answering the charges made against him should be attached to the recommendation so that the Governor in Council may have both sides. The hon. the Acting Minister of Finance says that I am illogical, but my position is this: This Bill is brought before the House for the purpose of keeping a political pledge, and if so all these various clauses are useless. The pledge that was made, as shown in the Order in Council of the 13th February, 1918, and in the words of the Prime Minister was "Civil Service reform with the view of extending the principle of the Civil Service Act to the Outside Service." I want to impress the Committee with a realization of the meaning of these words; they mean abolishing patronage. The promise was made that patronage should be abolished and that the Outside Service, as well as the Inside Service, should be brought under the Civil Service Commission. If that is all you propose to do, I do not see why you should pass this Act. On the other hand, if your object is to improve the Civil Service Act, I would say: Let us go into it, make our suggestions, discuss them and see whether we cannot improve the existing Act. It has been stated by the Acting Minister of Finance that there are only a few clauses to be changed. I think we ought to change more if we are going to take the matter up. I believe in improving the Act, and I believe in doing it this session. To say that we can amend the Act again next session, is no reason why we should not pass the best Bill that, in the limited time at our disposal, we can agree upon.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We will let the clause stand and I will confer with my hon. friend with regard to it.

Section allowed to stand.

On section 36—record of attendance:

Mr. McQUARRIE: The punctuation of this section is defective. If you will look at the last part of it you will see that it says:

> At such times as are determined by the deputy head of the department or some other device.

I take it that the other device is not going to determine the time, but that it means that there shall be a book or some other device or system for keeping a check on the attendance of employees.

An hon. MEMBER: A time clock.

Mr. McQUARRIE: A time clock, for instance; I suppose that is the idea.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, that is what is used now.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I suggest that after the word "determined" in the 43rd line you put in a semicolon, or some other proper punctuation.

Mr. PEDLOW: Is it not the rule that time clocks are used for this purpose in almost all departments of the service?

Mr. TURRIFF: Under this clause as it is proposed each department will be able to have a different system. At present there is a great deal of difference in the manner in which the departments record the attendance of their officials. Usually there is a book to be signed. In some of the departments the officials have to sign the book when they come in, when they go out at noon, when they come back after lunch and when they leave. In other departments the official signs the book when he comes in the morning and when he goes in the afternoon but at no other time. In some of the departments at half past nine a red line is drawn below the signature of those who have come in on time and all those who are late sign under the red line, thus there is a record showing whether they are late or not.

In other departments there is no red line drawn and no record taken. The official is allowed to mark his time whenever he likes. If he comes in at 9.30 a.m. and chooses to mark his arrival at 9.15 a.m., that is all there is to it and he gets no black mark. I claim there should be some uniformity in the system that is followed. If only to sign twice is the proper thing, well and good, but have it apply to every department. I think it is a mistake to leave it to the deputy minister, or the head of the department, to say what system shall be followed. The Civil Service Commision should have the necessary power, and there should be one uniform rule for every department in the Service.

Mr. MORPHY: I would suggest that the best way to fix the matter would be to have a short section reading something like this:

> There shall be kept and used in each branch of the Civil Service a book, system, or device, approved by the Commission, for preserving a record of the attendance of officers, clerks, and employees.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am willing to accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: The section as amended will now read:

> There shall be kept and used in each branch of the Civil Service a book, system or device, approved by the Commission, for preserving a record of the attendance of officers, clerks and employees.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 37—Part of Act to apply to officers of Parliament.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This is the same as the old section.

Mr. LEMIEUX: We are retaining control of the employees of the House of Commons and the Senate?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 38—Work during recess.

Mr. TURRIFF: Will the minister explain just what privileges the staffs of the House of Commons, the Senate and the Parliamentary Library, enjoy during recess.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: A number of the staffs of the Parliamentary Library, the Senate and House of Commons are only employed for a few months of the year, or, perhaps, during the session only. In the case of some employees their remuneration is a per diem one, and the present provision is to enable them to take outside work at the close of the session. The clause is an old one.

Mr. TURRIFF: The leading officials of the House of Commons, the Senate and the Library are all permanent officials, as I understand, and are paid salaries on the same scale as the officials in the other departments—I mean deputies, chief clerks, and the higher classes of officials. They are paid annual salaries and are not employed simply for the session.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I suppose the Hansard reporters come under this clause?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Hansard reporters have always been permitted to work outside after the close of Parliament. That has been the rule. But the number who are continually employed is growing, I understand, each year. I do not know much about the personnel of that part of the Civil Service.

Mr. RICHARDSON: It seems to me that all these officers should come under the supervision and direction of the Civil Service Commission. It may be that we pay large salaries to a large number of these officers, for the few months of the session, sufficient, perhaps, to keep them. Then, if they are able to earn other large salaries, perhaps their income is too great. I think they should be put under the control of the commission, so that the commission may see that the country avails itself of the services of these officials during the period they are not working for Parliament.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend will see that we must not curtail the privileges enjoyed by the House of Commons and the Senate. We must observe the traditions which exist not only here but in England. We have the same traditions as they have in England, and there the Hansard reporters are on exactly the same footing as they are here. Take, for instance, the Hansard reporters: they work during the session, and everybody will admit that they do excellent work. After the session, what prevents them from being engaged in reportorial work, for instance in investigations and matters of that kind? They are supposed to be the most expert stenographers in the country, and, for my part, after they have done arduous work during a long session, I would not object to their acting as reporters in investigations.

Mr. MURPHY: The information sought has reference not to exactly the class of officers of which my hon. friend from Maisonneuve has just spoken, but to the staff employed by the Parliamentary library, I understand, having regard to the wording of this section. My impression is that in addition to the regular and well known employees of the library, with whom all members of Parliament and the public generally, are constantly in contact, there are several extra taken on during the session, and that a distinction obtains with reference to their employment under this section, and that it applies rather to that group. However, I would suggest to the acting minister that he might make inquiries and inform the committee this afternoon.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think a great deal will depend upon what salary is paid the officials of Parliament and of the Library. If they receive a very substantial salary, then I think their whole time should be devoted to the public service. The Speaker of the House of Commons is now engaged in the preparation of a report upon the reorganization of the staff of the House, and while I am not sure that it will be presented to Parliament this Session, it will be next Session; and after we have received that report we may take into consideration the suggestion to amend this clause.

Mr. CURRIE: Is this the same clause we have been working under in the past?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is an old clause; there is not a word changed.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Because it is old may be a very good reason why it should be changed.

Mr. CURRIE: So far as I can see this affects the reporters and the sessional clerks, and assistance brought in during the Session. There has been no complaint that officers who are getting large salaries go away and leave the Library or other offices in the interval between the Sessions and neglect their work.

Mr. LEMIEUX: They are doing excellent work.

Mr. CURRIE: Yes; and the Library is open during the Recess as it is during the Session. But after the Session is over, there will be nothing for the Hansard reporters to do but to sit down and waste their time around here, and they are not paid sufficiently well to warrant the House in retaining their services. They go outside and do outside work as the ex-minister has stated. I think it is only fair to them that they should be allowed to do that extra work, because if we do not allow them to do that, we must substantially increase their salaries; which would involve adding fully one-third more to the expenditure of the House.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We must have the clause in in some form.

Mr. RICHARDSON: On the assurance of the minister that we shall get a report from the Speaker—

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Speaker is now engaged in the preparation of a report on the organization of the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON: If this House could get a report from the Speaker, or some authoritative official, as to the number of men included in this clause, the salaries they get, and the amount of work—

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The character of the service.

Mr. RICHARDSON: The character of the service, and the period of service they render to this House, I would be disposed to withdraw any objection. But I do not agree with my hon. friend from Maisonneuve that we should have any particular regard to British or any other traditions. What this House wants is service, and service from all officers, and if it does not get it they should be dismissed. We should insist on service.

Mr. TURRIFF: I think the minister's idea of waiting for the report of the Speaker of the House is a very good one. I have not the slightest intention of interfering with the official stenographers during recess; they work here, I understand, by the day during the session. Under this clause as it stands, the permanent officers of the Senate and of the Commons and of the Library of Parliament, drawing from $2,000 to $5,000 a year in salaries, can, this year, for a ten months' interval, go out and compete with others who have not a big Government salary at their back. I do not know that they do that; I have never heard of their doing that; and I do not think it is likely. At the same time, it is quite possible for them to do so under this clause, and I think it should be amended in that respect. It is all right now, when labour is scarce, and when several departments are looking for workers all the time, for these officials to do extra work. But, ordinarily, it is not fair to the outside public to have an official drawing a big salary from the Government go out and compete with ordinary labour during one-half of the year.

Mr. MORPHY: For the benefit of the Civil Service Commission, I would like to speak of a practice that prevails here in Ottawa. The employees of the Members' Stenographers' branch in the House receive $75 a month, and I believe they occupy their positions only temporarily. But some of the departments of the Government are very hard pressed to get stenographers and are paying $1,200 a year, whereas the employees I have referred to, during the temporary period, which period usually brings larger pay, because Parliament cannot go on without them, are getting $900—

Mr. McISAAC: At the rate of $900 per year.

Mr. MORPHY: Yes. I mention the fact so that the Civil Service Commission can consider the anomalous situation which apparently exists. I know that some members of that staff have been here for some years, and were induced, through the importunity of the chief of the members' stenographers' staff, to leave positions paying them $1,200 to come and work here.

There came a time during this session when the staff was thirty short. Mr. Smith told me that it was very difficult indeed to get the number necessary to complete his staff; he had to advertise for them throughout the country. The efficiency of this service is impaired because of the fact that those engaged in it are not sufficiently paid.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think the deficiency was due to the fact that the several War Commissions required large numbers of stenographers. They employed their own stenographic staff before the passage of the Order in Council, but since that date employees of these commissions have been appointed by the Civil Servce Commission, and there is not that wide discrepancy in the salaries that prevailed last year. I think $900 is the maximum ordinarily given to stenographers, outside of these commissions; though possibly in some of the departments where experts are required higher salaries are paid.

Mr. McISAAC: This section provides that Hansard reporters may engage in other work during the recess. Does this mean governmental work—in connection with investigations or such work as the Government may have—or outside work?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They may engage in private work.

Section agreed to.

On section 39—Civil Service list:

Mr. BUREAU: What changes have been made from the old Act?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: "April" is substituted for "July," in the provision as to the date of submitting the report. The words "the appointments and promotions made" have been inserted in line 39; the words "transfers, exchanges" in line 41, and the words "both Houses of" before the word "Parliament" in line 44.

Mr. HOCKEN: I wish to move an addition to this clause, in the following words:

2. The Commission shall prepare a report separate from the Civil Service list of Canada, giving the names of all appointees for the current year, the positions to which they have been appointed, and their salaries; also the promotions, transfers and exchanges made during the year and the names of any of the relatives by blood or marriage that any of them may have in the Civil Service or the public service at the date of their appointment, promotion or transfer.

My object is to give publicity to the names of appointees who have relatives in the service. The proposal is not to exclude from the service any person who has relatives in it, but to provide a check on the deputy ministers, which is possible only through a report to Parliament.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If we are to have appointment to the service on the basis of competitive examination or of promotion by merit, surely relationship to somebody else already in the service should not make any difference. My hon. friend's suggestion is rather destructive of the principle of appointment to the service by competitive examination.

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not agree with that, because if the Act passes in its present form a deputy minister may set aside, after a short period of probation, the man standing highest in the competitive examination and put somebody else in. This Act puts the whole service into the hands of the deputy ministers.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. HOCKEN: Everything is done on the recommendation of the deputy minister; in the last analysis he has control of the appointments. The fact that an efficient man might not suit him is recognized by a provision that a man selected by the commission and rejected by the deputy may appeal to the commission. There cannot be any objection to our getting full information with regard to appointments and promotions, and that information should include a list of those appointed under the competitive system and of those who, selected by the commission, have not been found satisfactory by the deputy minister and have been replaced by some one else.

Mr. McQUARRIE: It does not make any difference how many members of one family or how many persons of one relationship are in the Service, provided each one is capable of carrying out his duties properly Something has been said by way of criticism of the Auditor General because a number of his relatives are in the Service. I do not know anything about the facts of that particular case or the capabilities of the different members of his family who are in the Service, but the point is whether or not they are doing their work properly. I think that this part of my hon. friend's proposed amendment should, in any event, be struck out.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Is it possible, in the order of selection by the commission, that relatives of those already in the Service can have precedence over anybody else? If it is possible, in the making of selections, for heads of departments to choose whom they please, then my hon. friend's amendment is apropos; if not, I do not see that it is necessary

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The heads of departments make no appointments. They make recommendation for promotion, but that is subject to the approval of the Civil Service Commission. If they desire the appointment of an official, they make a request to the Civil Service Commission for such an appointment, and the commission proceeds to make the appointment. My hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) seeks to destroy nepotism by publicity—I presume that is the purport of his amendment—but it is open to the objection which I stated a few moments ago. Under the Civil Service Act, appointments are to be made upon the competitive system. If that principle is sound, then I think relationship with any others in the Civil Service should hardly be a bar to promotion or appointment.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the objection?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There was some criticism of recent appointments made by the Auditor General, and perhaps that criticism may be well founded. Generally speaking, however, I do not think there have been in the past years abuses of that kind in the Inside Service at Ottawa. At least, I have never heard of them.

Mr. HOCKEN: Although I have been in the House only a few days, I have heard of a great many cases, and I am surprised that the minister has not, during all the time he has been in this House, heard of cases of that kind. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) who spoke first on this Bill, referred to the very grave dissatisfaction that existed in the old country when the Civil Service Act was first put into operation there, and one of the chief objections raised was that there was nepotism exercised in the service to the exclusion of those who were not connected with important officials. I may be peculiar in my views, but I am frank enough to say that if I had to choose between the present system and a system which makes a family compact possible, I prefer the present system. I do not think there is anything more objectionable than to fill up the Service with the friends or relatives of a certain group of men who may be in important positions. Notwithstanding what the minister has said, my information is that this practice has been going on in Ottawa for a good many years. While I have not had an opportunity of analysing the Civil Service list for this purpose, I am convinced that, if you take the Civil Service list as it is to-day, you will find case after case where there are in the service just as many relatives of a certain official as there are in the case of the Auditor General. I am not saying that those men and women are not doing their work efficiently, but that is information that should be placed before Parliament, and surely, if there is nothing to cover up, there can be no reason why this amendment should not be agreed to.

At one o'clock the committee rose.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

On section 39—publication of Civil Service list:

Mr. HOCKEN: I beg leave to withdraw my amendment.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. HOCKEN: I now beg to move that section 39 be amended by adding after the word "made" in line 39 the following:

—and the names of any relatives by blood or marriage that any person so appointed, transferred, or promoted may have in the Government, in the Senate, in the House of Commons, or in the Civil Service at the time of such appointment, transfer or promotion.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the object of the amendment?

Mr. HOCKEN: It is to have a report by the Civil Service Commission of the number of relatives that each person may have in the Civil Service at the time of his appointment, transfer or promotion.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I presume the object is to obviate nepotism, which is so rampant at the present time.

Mr. CAHILL: What has that got to do with this Bill?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It is an effort to put a stop to nepotism.

Mr. CAHILL: I do not think it matters whether a man has relatives in the service or not. We should trust the Civil Service Commission and the officials of the Government.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It can do no harm.

Mr. CAHILL: What good can it do?

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: It seems to me we would make very much more sensible progress, to say the least, in discussing a matter that deals with the whole Civil Service of Canada, embracing some seventy thousand employees, if we came down from the air and treated the whole subject from a practical point of view. Just such a step as is contemplated by the amendment was taken by some of the large corporations in this country some twenty or twenty-five years ago but it was found to be absolutely unworkable and inapplicable. The plan followed by the most successful corporations in this country in employing men is not to discourage the appointment of those who have relatives in their service, but just the reverse. They do not consider it a detriment to a man to have relatives already in their service. To my mind the amendment would bring into contumely efficient public servants just because they had in some other department of the service a cousin or a brother or a father. The whole thing is entirely out of harmony with what in my judgment should be the aim in securing an efficient public service. If the apprehensions that have been expressed on the floor of this House with regard to the deputy ministers and those in charge of departments are justified, I think it is time we set about to find a group of honest men to place at the head of those departments. Personally it has not been either my pleasure or my misfortune to be brought into very close touch with the cloven-hoof breed from which these men are evidently recruited if they are what they have been represented to be. If they are of that breed, we should certainly try to find means of getting rid of them, because in an efficient public service it is necessary to have honest men at the head of departments. I do not wish to be understood as casting reflection on these men. I have heard them referred to in commendable terms as being efficient, honest, hard-working and painstaking officials, anxious to do their duty to their country. But to entertain the suspicion that they are constantly trying to load the public service with inefficient employees just because they happen to be their relatives is to my mind an insult. That is what the amendment is to my mind. If the men at the head of departments of the public service are so small and narrow as to be influenced by considerations of that kind, we had better get rid of them and find other men big enough to do the work.

Mr. HENDERS: I quite agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Nicholson). If the Civil Service Commission has not for its object the elimination of the evils that are sought to be prevented by this amendment, I fail to see of what use the commission is. As the commission is to hold competitive examinations they and the deputy ministers and the ministers should be responsible for seeing that the proper persons are appointed to the service, and if the commissioners do not do their duty the Parliament of Canada can get others in their place.

Mr. MANION: In what way would the commission find out what relatives a man had in the public service?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Personally I am not favourably disposed towards this amendment, and I fail to see how the commission could get the information. They may be able to get it to a certain extent, but it would entail a great deal of work and, I should imagine, an increase in their staff.

Mr. MANION: If this amendment were carried it seems to me it would be simply putting a premium on lying. The only way the commission can find out the relatives of an applicant is by asking him, and if the man happened to be inclined to tell a lie would simply say he had no relatives in the service, but if he is truthful, and says "I am a cousin or a distant relation of the Minister of Finance" why should we cast a slur upon him? His appointment might be just as legitimate as that of anybody else to the service. I do not think the amendment is a good one.

Mr. JOHN H. SINCLAIR: I wish to record my opposition to this amendment. It is not so important that we should spend a great deal of time in discussing it, but I do not think it adds anything to the Bill, and it would be rather undignified for the House to pass it. The responsibility must rest upon the commission to appoint the best men they can get. I do not care who the man may be related to if he happens to be the best man available for the position. The only party that would be accused of nepotism in connection with appointments to the public service would be the party in power. The ministers of the Crown are the parties who have the say as to whether a man should be appointed or not, or who would have any opportunity of influencing the commission. I regret that the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) has so little confidence in the administration as to move such an amendment as this.

Mr. CURRIE: I do not think this amendment would have been moved had it not been that several times during this year the question of nepotism has come up in this House and has caused what we might call a mild form of scandal. There is the case of the Auditor General, a man whom we all respect. It has been stated in this House that he virtually compelled the commission to appoint his sons to lucrative office in the public service. The Auditor General is the man who supervises the service of everybody in the department, and he would be a rash man, indeed, even if he were a minister, who would refuse him an appointment. Another case is that of my esteemed and gallant friend, Colonel Labatt. Colonel Labatt is a man who is quite capable of standing on his own merits anywhere, but he has the political misfortune to be related by marriage to three ministers of the Crown and his case has been cited all over the country as being one of nepotism and favouritism and sneers have been indulged in with regard to his appointment. In view of the fact that these prominent cases have come to our attention, I think the time is opportune to take some stand with regard to the matter.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Civil Service Commission never issued any certificate in connection with the appointment of the son of the Auditor General.

Mr. CURRIE: How did he get the appointment?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: He did not get a certificate.

Mr. CURRIE: He did not need a certificate because, being a lawyer, his technical qualifications were such as to qualify him for the job.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The case is in dispute yet.

Mr. CURRIE: I do not object to Mr. Fraser's son getting an appointment; he may be the very best man in Ottawa for it. I do not think this case should influence anybody but still the fact remains that it has had a certain effect upon the public mind. The suggestion is made that when the House is dealing with this matter now it would be advisable to have something put in the Act as a check, or a brake, on deputy ministers so that they would not put all of their own families into office. We are all human; everybody is human. This would not prevent a deputy minister from putting his son into a job in the service that possibly called for a very high salary, such as a position in the first division, but if the deputy minister knew that he would have to state that the man whom he had appointed was his son and that that report would be presented to this House, he would hesitate. It is puerile to say that all this information cannot be easily obtained by the Civil Service Commission and that before a man is appointed the commission cannot ascertain whether he is the relative of any person already in the service, whether he is a Protestant, a Roman Catholic, or a member of any other religion, his age and whether married or single. To find that out does not require a staff of 300 or 400 people. In view of the agitation which has gone out all through the country because some of these things have come to the attention of the public within the last four or five months, we should do something to avoid any complaint in the future as far as nepotism is concerned. Everybody knows that possibly 65 per cent of the deputy ministers of the Crown are either ex-members of Parliament, defeated candidates or men who have been in politics. I think they are a very efficient lot of men but my experience is that both out of office and in office they are very strong partisans. I found during the regime of the old Government that when I recommended an efficient man for appointment to the service, because he belonged to one party and the deputy minister belonged to the other, the appointee's tenure of office would only be a few months. Some excuse was found and he would be put out of his position. Those deputy ministers belong to the old regime. Until we create a set of deputy ministers who are neutral we will have this strong party bias manifested in the administration of the departments. The old political parties are not dead yet. There is a lot of the old Adam in people at the present time and you cannot eliminate it. Perhaps after all, it is better that we should stick to the party system because my researches in history have shown me that the only safety for the people's liberties lies in party and not in faction.

Mr. MORPHY: I fail to see that there is anything wrong with this amendment. I have not heard any strong argument why such an amendment should not be passed, and I think some very forcible arguments have been presented why it should be passed. There is no doubt that in the public mind the idea is that nepotism and favouritism exist; that is the putting into positions, sometimes with large emoluments, of people who have nothing to recommend them except the pressure and influence exerted by their friends. It is no doubt true that in the city of Ottawa there are many families who have extraordinary advantages, in that members of these families have been placed one after another in positions in the Civil Service. Living next door to a widow with a couple of girls who have no influence, no one to go and put in a word for them, you may find a family with six or seven members in the Civil Service and another one growing up and also getting into the Civil Service, while the widow and her two children have no chance whatever. It is all very well to say that this is done by examination. Of course it is, but the fact remains that one can bring pressure and influence to bear and the other cannot. I do not say that necessarily the commission would be unduly influenced, but, as the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) says, we are all human. The principle of the amendment offered by the hon. member for West Toronto is something that this House and the country can understand. What wrong will be done by giving the lever to the Civil Service Commission that this amendment will give, and enabling it to say, when somebody wants to get a position, "It is true you have passed the examination, but here is a person who has also passed the examination; you have six members of your family in the service already; you cannot get the position." It is about time that somebody took hold of the affairs of the country along the line which the amendment suggests, so that favouritism shall be abolished.

What do we hear every day from the military service point of view? The cry is put up: This family has two boys gone to the front, you should not take the last one. By analogy I would like to see—when a family has been well taken care of in the Civil Service by a number of its members being employed,—the same principle act in the opposite way, and have it declared: You shall not go into the Civil Service, because there has been enough done by the country for your brothers and sisters. I find myself in this matter desirous of corroborating the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken), because to my knowledge, obtained in a casual way, there is a great abuse in the practice which is aimed at and sought to be stopped by this amendment. It does seem to me that unless some sound reason to the contrary is furnished, the amendment should be adopted. It does not do merely to say that because certain persons are competent to do the work, that therefore they should be appointed. I am assuming the competency of ten members of a family, but I do not see why those ten persons should be given positions when there are other persons standing by who ought to be chosen, who are equally competent, who have passed the necessary examination, but are not able to get a hearing before the powers that be—they have not got the aggression or knowledge of the way to go about it,—and, therefore, they suffer.

Mr. RICHARDSON: It seems to me that we should not worry about the possible effects of this amendment. It is not going to interfere with any appointments that are being made, it is not going to prove a bar to the appointment of even relatives. Hon. members who have studied the Civil Service, and know anything about the condition of affairs, will agree with me that we ought not to be too delicate about hurting the feelings of civil servants in this country. We have had whole families living at the public crib; sisters, cousins, and aunts, have all piled in. The average member of Parliament knows nothing about this, but it is an absolute fact. The amendment of the member for Toronto is only designed to guard against a certain state of affairs, and to protect the public and the Civil Service itself. As I said, it is not going to prove any bar to the appointment of any person to the Civil Service, but the amendment embodied in the Act will be a deterrent to deputy ministers and to other civil servants, and through its agency we will probably put a check upon nepotism. Those of us who know anything about the conduct of the Civil Service know that nepotism has been rampant in the country for the last thirty or forty years. We need not worry about whether there is a precedent for our action or not. This is a Union Government, composed of, and supported by, two parties, and it can afford to establish precedents. What do we care about British or other traditions in connection with this matter? We are trying to do the best we can for the people, and God knows they need some service at the present time. If, by the introduction of this amendment, we can prevent nepotism and assist the people of the country in saving a little money, by all means let us adopt the amendment.

Mr. CAHILL: As I apprehend it, the Civil Service Commission are to conduct examinations and pass on all appointments. I, for one, am assuming that the Civil Service Commission is composed of honest and honourable men. If they are, I cannot understand why we should clutter up their report with the names of aunts, cousins, brothers, sisters or any other relatives that may be in the service of the country. If there is an application from a person to be appointed to the Civil Service, and he is not qualified, having a brother or a cousin already there is not going to get him into the service. If he is qualified for the position the Civil Service Commission will recommend him, otherwise they will not.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: If there were ten relatives of an official of the Government who made application for an examination, and all passed, how will the amendment prevent any one of them from being appointed?

Mr. RICHARDSON: It does not prevent their appointment; that is why I say it should pass.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Then what is the use of the amendment?

Mr. RICHARDSON: It would not prevent it if there were fifteen such persons. Even supposing there were twenty-four members of a family, coming, say, from the province of Quebec, where they raise large families, they might all get into the service, and this amendment would not prevent it. But surely there is no harm in adopting the amendment so that a light should be thrown on what is being done, and, moreover, as I say, it constitutes a check upon nepotism.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The remarks I made this morning upon a previous amendment apply equally to the present one, and I have been wondering whether the mover of the present amendment has really considered what it means. It provides that upon the appointment, transfer or promotion of persons the names shall be given of any relatives, by blood or marriage that any of them may have in the Civil Service or public service. In my opinion, the thing is absurd. Take my own case, for instance. My wife has sixty first cousins, and I have about thirty. Besides, there are uncles and aunts, and grandfathers and grandmothers.

An hon. MEMBER: And grandchildren.

Mr. McQUARRIE: And grandchildren. It seems to me there must be some limitation to the degree of consanguinity in applying the word "relatives." Otherwise, you impose a task on the Civil Service Commission that would take up all their time.

Mr. BUREAU: They would need a staff of investigators.

Mr. McQUARRIE: They certainly would need an additional staff to work out the family tree for generations back, and include it in this report of theirs. Speaking seriously, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that, the amendment is impracticable, and that it is a joke.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I did not have the good fortune to hear the discussion on this question this morning, as I was attending the sittings of a committee of the House, but I can see very little objection to the amendment which has been offered. We were given to understand that one of the objects of the Bill was to do away with the influence that might be exerted in securing appointments. Now, we are told that it would be a reflection on some people if lists of their relatives were published. I have been in public life, more or less, for sixteen years—including service in the provincial as well as the Federal House—and during that time, so far as I know, not one relation of mine, either by blood or marriage has occupied a position in the service, of either the province or the Dominion. Therefore, I am not as sensitive about publication in this matter as some other gentlemen may be. There is a suspicion in the minds of the people, and it is useless trying to ignore it, that friends of the Government have received favours indirectly at the hands of those who have a right to recommend appointments. You cannot pick up a newspaper these last few days without reading a reference to something of the kind. I think the amendment is a very good one, and it will tend to check anything of that nature. I regret that it should be necessary to provide such safeguards, but I have no more confidence in the Civil Service Commission than I have in a great many other people, and for that reason I do not see any reason why the light of publicity should not be flashed upon every appointment made to the Civil Service in Canada.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: My main reason for not supporting the amendment is that I do not see what purpose will be served by it. As my hon. friend from Edmonton has said, there will be nothing to prevent the appointment of nine or ten members of the same family provided they pass the required examination. The amendment will not remedy the evil complained of. As to the evil of nepotism in the Civil Service and its elimination, I agree entirely with the hon. gentleman, but it should be made a matter of a special amendment, as it is in the American Civil Service Act. There is a section in that Act providing as follows:

> 9. That whenever there are already two or more members of a family in the public service in the grades covered by this Act, no other member of such family shall be eligible to appointment to any of said grades.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: As to the objection offered by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) a few minutes ago as to the meaning of the word "family," I notice a decision which has been rendered stating:

> The family consists of those who live under the same roof with the pater-familias—those who form....his fireside; but when they branch out and become heads of new establishments they cease to be part of the father's family.

So my hon. friend's conscience need not be troubled.

Mr. McQUARRIE: If the hon. gentleman has reference to me, I did not speak about the meaning of the word "family," but the word "relative." That is quite a different thing.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I see the difference.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I agree with the hon. gentleman regarding the word "family."

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: It would be easily overcome by using the word "relative," instead of "family." So I will say to my hon. friend that if, instead of pressing his amendment, he moves to have a special clause in the Bill similar to that in the Civil Service Act of the United States, I shall be inclined to vote in favour of it.

Mr. HOCKEN: There is nothing in my amendment which will prevent the hon. member introducing a clause such as he suggests, and it might very well supplement my amendment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw yours.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HOCKEN: There seems to be a misunderstanding on the part of the hon. member for Algoma that I am trying to exclude a man from the public service who already has a relative in the public service. That is not the purpose of the amendment at all.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is no advantage secured by the hon. member's amendment, and it will cost several thousand dollars a year to get the information.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It would cost several thousand dollars, and it would probably require volumes as large as the three volumes of the Auditor General's Report.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Two thousand have been added to the Civil Service since the thirteenth day of February by the Civil Service Commission, and it may very well happen that in a full year five or six thousand would be appointed. If such appointees had relatives to the number the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) has intimated, a simple mathematical computation would ascertain what size of a volume it would take. Did my hon. friend hear the section which is in the American Civil Service Act?

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes. I was going to say, Mr. Chairman, that the purpose is not to put in this report every relative in the world that an appointee may have. I do not want to know the names of the grandmothers or grandfathers unless they are in the service. The member for New Westminster seems to have got the wrong idea entirely. He seems to imagine that if a man is appointed to the service the report must contain the name of every relative he has. That is not the idea.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What I suggested was—

Mr. HOCKEN: It is to put in the name of every relative he has in the service.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I did not mean that exactly. What I meant was that you would require a family tree for every man and woman in Canada if this law went into force.

Mr. HOCKEN: You would not require anything of the kind, Mr. Chairman. Here is a point I would like to submit to the House. I have never found any objection on the part of any man to the widest publicity if he has done anything that he can defend. Now, whether we are going by this Act to establish a system that will result in a very serious degree of nepotism can only be ascertained from the information we would get in this report. As the Civil Service stands to-day you can go over the Civil Service list with some person in the service familiar with it, and pick out a great many cases where there are four or five, or half a dozen or more, of the same family in the service. To make an investigation of that kind would be an exceedingly difficult thing to do, and take months to complete. But if we get a report such as I am suggesting every year we would be able to tell each year how far this practice of nepotism is getting into the service. If it is not getting into any degree which seems to us to be dangerous, that ends it. If it is getting in, we will have the information in such a way that we can see it at a glance. If that happens—and we are making it a possibility under this Act, Mr. Chairman—and we discover it in the first, or the second, or the third year, then this House will take some action to put an end to it. Unless it has that information the House cannot proceed at all. I submit there is no other way, no better and no cheaper way. The acting minister says this will take one large volume, perhaps two. That only proves my case, because if they are going to make so many appointments that it will take two or three volumes to print the names of their relatives already in the service we ought to know it. I do not think there is any information that will be more desirable or interesting to this country than would be contained in those two or three volumes. If the cost will be as great as to require the printing of two or three volumes, it would be necessary for this House to take some action at the next session of Parliament.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I would like to understand the hon. gentleman. He says that if we found a great number of such appointments we would put an end to it. Suppose he found there were five or six relatives of an appointee in the service already, would he propose to throw them out?

Mr. HOCKEN: I would submit, in answer to the hon. member for Red Deer, that, if it is found from these reports presented to this House from year to year that the practice is going on of filling up the service with the relatives of deputy ministers, assistant deputy ministers and other men in important positions of that kind, there would be an amendment to this Act, and it would be based upon the information obtained in the manner I propose. I do not propose that if a man is appointed he shall be dismissed because he already has a relative in the Service. I say we do not need to go that far, but we can prevent it going any further.

Mr. ROBB: A few moments ago the Acting Minister of Finance made a statement as to the number who had been added to the Civil Service list since the thirteenth of February, and there seems to be some doubt on this side as to the correctness of the figures. Would he mind repeating the statement?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I said two thousand had been appointed since the thirteenth of February. There were 465 permanent appointments and 2,409 temporary appointments.

Mr. FIELDING: If this Bill has any merit at all—as to this some hon. gentlemen seem to have doubts—it is that we are to abolish patronage and favouritism; that we are to have a free-for-all, the best man to win. If the Bill does not mean this, it is all humbug. This being our object, why should we stop to inquire about a man's relatives? The motion of my hon. friend (Mr. Hocken) implies that it is a great wrong to have several members of one family in the public service.

Mr. HOCKEN: It does not imply anything of the kind.

Mr. FIELDING: Then why does my hon. friend want the information? Appointments to the public service are not to be viewed as favours; they go to those who receive them as a matter of right, on their merits and qualifications as disclosed by the examinations. If that be the case, why should we inquire whether one, two, or a dozen members of the same family are in the Civil Service? If the principle of examination and competition is to prevail—and that is professedly the very essence of this measure—surely we do not need to inquire how many relatives the candidate has in the public service. Reference has been made to the Auditor General. I have not looked into his case; I only know that he is an able and faithful public official. But if any son or daughter of the Auditor General submitted himself or herself for examination and won the prize legitimately, why should he or she not receive the appointment? Is the member for West Toronto not defeating the whole purpose and intention of this Bill in the amendment which he has submitted? True, he does not say that you must not appoint more than one or two members of the same family, but if his amendment does not mean that, what is the object of getting all this information, of investigating family trees and holding these inquests from ocean to ocean? If the principle of this Bill is not that of establishing a system of open, free, public competition, then, as a distinguished statesman once said, "There hain't nothing to it." Let men be appointed simply on merit, regardless of colour, creed, politics, or relationship.

Mr. MURPHY: May I suggest to the member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding), who was not here on Saturday evening, that the striking out of section 9 robbed this Bill of the only principle which my hon. friend rightly says entitles it to consideration?

Mr. BUREAU: The member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) said that he had heard no reason why the amendment should not go through. It is for the mover of an amendment to make good his case, and in the remarks which the member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) has made I see no reason why the amendment should be accepted. He suggests that the Acting Minister of Finance has proved the worth of the amendment by saying that, if it were accepted, it would cost the Government a lot of money to carry it out. I do not think that that proved the case at all. Investigation may be made whether an applicant has a relative in the Senate, the House of Commons or the Civil Service, and it may be shown that he has none; but in every case a special staff of inquisitors will be required. It has been pointed out that if you rely on the statement of the applicant as to his family connections, you open the door to his giving false information. In other words, the making of this provision would be detrimental to the country, first, because of the expenditure involved in carrying it out, and, second, because of your opening the door to a man's avoiding the truth in order to further his own ends. It would give members of this House a chance to vent grievances they might have against other members or to hold other members up to the country as having come into the House for the purpose of getting their relatives into the Civil Service. I can speak on this subject quite freely, because I have not a relative, either near or distant, in the Civil Service. I do hope, for the sake of my relatives, that they never will be in the Civil Service. I do not say that as a disparagement to any one. We want civil servants, and we want good ones, but they should not be subjected to the criticism of members of Parliament because they happen to be related to members of the Civil Service Commission, deputy ministers, or members of this House or the Senate. It seems to me that the only object of this motion is to give to those who desire to obtain political advantage the chance to come into the House and say: So-and-so has been abusing his powers, So-and-so has come here solely for the purpose of getting members of his family into the Service. I agree with all that has been said by the member for Shelburne and Queens. This legislation is either a camouflage or the basis of a real law. I think it is to be a real law, and that everybody in the House is endeavouring to do the best he can to make it a good law, in the short time that we have at our disposal. I look upon this motion as a reflection on the motives of members of this House. It suggests that gentlemen come here with no other purpose than that of getting their relatives into the Civil Service, and if only for the sake of the dignity of the House, I shall oppose the motion.

Mr. TURRIFF: The member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) is putting up a man of straw for the purpose of knocking it down. There would be no difficulty whatever in getting the information. When a candidate for a position applies to the Civil Service Commission he has to answer certain questions and if he were asked what relatives he had in the Service, the information could be obtained without expense and without the services of a large staff of inquisitors. Moreover, two or three volumes will not be required to publish the names. The suggestion that a report of this kind would be voluminous, is in itself a reason why the amendment should carry.

Mr. BUREAU: That is locking the barn when the horse is gone.

Mr. TURRIFF: Those who have been in Ottawa for years and know something about the Civil Service realize that members of the Civil Service themselves have far more influence in the matter of appointments than all the members of the Senate and the House of Commons put together. The amendment is not designed to prevent any class of persons from entering the Service. I would not for a moment suggest that a man should be debarred because he has two or three sons or daughters in the Service, but there is no reason why the information referred to in the amendment should not be given to the House and the country. That is why I support the amendment.

Mr. BUREAU: If this amendment is intended to combat or to prevent an evil, let us determine by legislation the degree of relationship that will prohibit a man's entering the Service. This amendment is designed either to prevent nepotism or to serve some ulterior purpose which has not been divulged.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: The member for West Toronto suggested that I had misunderstood the object of his amendment; that it was not to prevent those who had relatives in the Service from retaining the positions which they had or from obtaining appointments. I appreciate the intention of my hon. friend's amendment. If it is not to prevent persons who have relatives in the Civil Service from obtaining appointments, it is at least to provide a means by which odium can be cast on efficient public servants, and is based purely on the assumption that when a man enters the public service he gets something in the nature of a gratuity. My understanding of the relationship between employer and employed is that the employee gives, not the employer. The whole thing narrows itself down simply to this, that by this amendment we say that, if a man who is in the public service, permits a relative of his also to get into the public service, reflection is going to be cast on either the one or the other. With regard to the opportunity for ascertaining whether a man has a relative in the public service or not, I question very much whether the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) could tell us where all his blood relatives and the blood relatives of his wife happen to be.

Mr. HOCKEN: There are none of them in the public service.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: It is absolutely necessary that you know where they are if you know they are not in the public service.

Mr. HOCKEN: No.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My hon. friend means the Inside Service only.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I refer to the employees of the Crown from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Is there, in this House, an hon. member who can say that there is no relative of his or his wife, distant or near, somewhere employed in the public service?

Mr. BUREAU: Somebody unknown to him.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: Who may not be known to him. This amendment, however, implies that you must give all this information. It has been said in this House that the whole country is agitated on account of the degree to which nepotism has already existed. The whole country may possibly be agitated, but if it is agitated at all, that is due to the unwarranted emphasis which has been placed by hon. members on the fact that some of our public servants may have a relative somewhere giving service to the people of this country.

Mr. PROULX: I do not approve the amendment moved by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken). A more effective measure to include would be a provision, like the one in the United States Civil Service Act, limiting the number of the members of a family who can obtain employment in the Civil Service.

Mr. CURRIE: The United States will allow only two.

Mr. PROULX: I understand so; in the same grade.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: In all grades.

Mr. PROULX: That is only the same family, those living under the same roof. I would approve a provision, if the minister would include it in this Bill, limiting the number of the members of the same family who could obtain employment in the Service.

Mr. CURRIE: That would have to come under another clause.

[Mr. G. B. Nicholson.]

Mr. PROULX: After this amendment is disposed of, we could add another clause. I do not think we should extend this provision to the Outside Service, but in the Inside Service we could very well limit the number of members in a family who could obtain positions.

Mr. CAHILL: If this amendment does not assume that the same old patronage is to prevail, how is the commission to be influenced by members or senators? I have no relatives in the Civil Service, and I am satisfied that several hon. members who have spoken in opposition to this amendment have no relatives in the Civil Service. But we shall have this list before us next year, and we shall have some cheap political sniping at people in the Civil Service by hon. members who have nothing better to do, just as we have heard during the consideration of this Bill, imputations being made against certain men who are employed in the Service. If you have any charge to make against members of the Civil Service, make it, but do not make imputations against them.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I have listened very carefully to this discussion, and I must say that I feel disposed to vote against the amendment. It appears to me that both the mover of the amendment and his chief supporters put it up and then ran away from it. I put to the mover of the amendment a direct question as to what its effect would be upon relatives already in the Service, and he obviously shrank from saying that he would take any steps to remove people who are now in the Service. My hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson), and my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), said that they would not take any steps to prevent, or they did not understand that the amendment, if carried, would prevent numerous members of a family from being appointed. Then in the name of common sense, what would it do? The only possible answer is that given by my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau), who, I think, put his finger on the real objection to the amendment when he said it would afford an opportunity for holding up to odium those who are already doing good honest public service; otherwise, I presume they would not retain their positions. Not only would that apply to the discussion in this House, but the members of the public would have recourse to this public list, and animosity, strife and trouble would be raised without the supporters of the amendment doing anything to cure the evils created by this method of appointment. The evil exists, and yet my hon. friends shrink from saying they would cure it as far as it already exists. This evil has grown up under both political parties and under the Government of this country. The only purpose of this amendment would be to cure this evil, but it would not cure it. The only practical suggestion I have heard has come from my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe). Without stirring up strife and animosity and raising invidious comparisons between the families of the country, let us be practical and bold. If there be an evil, then do not let us go on the limping logic of my hon. friend. The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) says, in one sentence: I do not want it passed because it would prevent ten relatives being appointed to the public service. In the next sentence he says: It would be a good check on nepotism. If you are going to make it a check, do not make it a check on future appointments, drawing from it the possibility of dealing frankly with past appointments. Let it be a workable check, and if we can, let us adopt the provision in the American Act to which my hon. friend has drawn attention.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I remember there was at one time a discussion, in connection with Government matters, as regards a certain appointment. I had the honour of proposing a gentleman with a very distinguished Canadian name, and the question was raised: How many of the Casgrain family are to be found everywhere in the Dominion? I thank God for it, men of that ability and character can be found, and it would be better if more of them could be found. The Casgrain family was mentioned then and I hope I may be excused for mentioning it here. The point is not that there are many members of a family in the Civil Service, but that sometimes improper means may be taken to put them there. Then it is time for the Government to know that. The question is not whether a clerk may happen to have two or three brothers or sisters in the Service, but whether the power behind those people is improperly used to get those positions. I have had occasion to refer to a particular case in this House, and I maintain that improper influences are used to get members of certain families in this country in certain positions. I do not want to blacken the name of any civil servant, but I do want, if possible, to stop—and this Civil Service Bill, I presume, does so,—those people getting their friends into positions through improper influence. I understand the Civil Service Commission was bulldozed by a gentleman holding a prominent position in Canada, to make an appointment which they did not consider advisable to make. That was improper influence. I do not see anything whatever in the amendment.

Amendment put to the vote in the Committee. Amendment negatived: ayes, 19; nays, 73.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I would like the annual report of the commission to show the number of transfers made from the Inside to the Outside Service and from the Outside to the Inside Service, with the origin and destination of the transfer in each case. I do not think there can be any objection to that. It would not require a great deal of extra work and would enlighten the country to what extent transfers were being made from Ottawa and other large centres to the country districts. That is valuable information, and though its publication would not prevent the transfers being made, it would inform the members what was being done. I beg to move therefore that after the word " appointments " in line 39 the word "transfers" be added.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON: The report has to contain the names of the successful competitors and candidates. I think the word "and" in line 39 should be "or." Otherwise the names of all unsuccessful candidates would have to be published, and there might be many thousands of them.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I beg to move that the words " competitors and " in lines 38 and 39 be struck out.

Mr. BLAKE: I think it is very important to leave the section as it stands. It is very necessary that we should know who tried the examination. If everybody passes, the examinations would simply be a farce and not worth the time and trouble. We should see that the examinations are being conducted properly.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The section as it stands does not require the names of the unsuccessful candidates to be given.

Mr. BLAKE: I would understand it to mean that the names of all the candidates should be given.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is not the purpose of the section.

Mr. BLAKE: Will the number of those rejected be given?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 40—regulations:

Mr. BUREAU: Is that a new clause?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No. I beg to amend this section by prefixing to it the words, "The Commission with the approval of," by changing the word "he" to "it," and by adding after the word "Act" the words "and such regulations shall be published in the Canada Gazette."

Mr. McKENZIE: Would the minister object to having a copy of the regulations laid before Parliament? That is done as a rule.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is provided for in section 39.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not quite sure whether that would cover it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Section 39 provides that the "regulations made during the year respecting appointments, promotions, etc., shall be presented to both Houses of Parliament."

Mr. McKENZIE: If the minister thinks that covers it, I have no objection.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Why should the Governor in Council have the initiative? Why not say the commission shall recommend to the Governor in Council?

Mr. A. F. MACLEAN: That is the effect of my amendment.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not see that that gives the commission the initiative. I would say "the commission may recommend to the Governor in Council."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The commission can make regulations, but before they become effective they must be approved by the Governor in Council. That is tantamount to a recommendation.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 41—appointments to be made by competitive examination:

Mr. McQUARRIE: I propose two amendments to this section. I beg to move:

That section 41 be amended by inserting after the word "Council" in the eleventh line thereof the following words:

"Except as to the city of Ottawa all such appointments in any province shall, so far as possible, be made from bona fide residents of that province; and that there be inserted after the word "practicable," in the twentieth line the words "advisable or expedient."

It is hardly necessary for me to elaborate on what the effect of the first part of the amendment would be, namely, that all appointments should, as far as possible, be made from residents of the province in which the appointments are to be made. It may be said, perhaps, that I am drawing upon my imagination in suggesting that there is any real necessity for a provision of this kind. When applying, within the last two or three days, for an additional stenographer in one of the offices in New Westminster, I was told that if another stenographer was needed we could have one, but that one would have to be sent from Ottawa instead of being appointed from my own constituency, where a number of capable stenographers are available. A provision of this kind is a very reasonable one. When it comes to appointments in the city of Ottawa, the capital of the Dominion, where so many of the head offices of the departments are situated, it would be objectionable to provide that all appointments should be from residents of the province of Ontario. I know very well that, in so far as we of the province of British Columbia are concerned, it is very easy for the people of Ontario and Quebec to forget that we are in existence at all. It seems to be the tendency for people in Ontario and Quebec to think that they constitute the whole of the Dominion. I say that without any disrespect at all, because I happen to come from the province of Ontario myself; I was born in the city of Ottawa, about 200 yards away from this very building. But when you have the Civil Service Commission composed of residents of Ontario and Quebec, as I suppose it, perhaps, always will be—

Mr. BUREAU: There is no Ontario representative on the commission.

Mr. McQUARRIE: They are all from Quebec?

Mr. BUREAU: They are all western men.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Oh, no. They are likely to forget that there is such a province as British Columbia, and they will make all the appointments from the East. I am not going to elaborate on that argument; the point is self-evident to everybody. If you are in favour of it you will support it; if not you will vote against it.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Would the hon. gentleman object to treating this as two separate amendments? The amendment deals with two separate questions, and if he would deal with them separately he might find that some hon. gentleman might support one and not the other.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I shall be glad indeed to accept the suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the committee that the hon. gentleman has leave to divide the amendment?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. McQuarrie moves that section 41 be amended by inserting after the word "council" in the 11th line thereof the following words:

Except as to the city of Ottawa all such appointments in any province shall, in so far as possible be made from bona fide residents of that province.

Mr. LEMIEUX: We would like to hear from the acting minister as to that.

Mr. FIELDING: If this amendment is to have any meaning you must limit it to applications from the different provinces. There is no use of throwing the competition open to the wide world if an outsider is not going to get any chance of appointment. I am not objecting to the principle that is put forward in the amendment but you should say that applications shall only be received from each province.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Before that amendment is put to the vote I want to express my own view in reference to it and to call the attention of the committee to what seems to be involved. In the first place, when the amendment was read, it grated upon my feelings as a citizen of a united country. It seems to me that the principle involved in this tends to cut us off into provincial sections, to can us in sectional compartments. It therefore puts up a barrier against the free currency of the service and the talent of the whole country as devoted to the work of the whole country. It seems to me that it tends to cultivate provincialism rather than nationalism. What reason in the world is there why a man who is born in British Columbia and has talents and capacity should not have an opportunity of serving in the public service in any part of Canada? From my point of view that seems to be the broad ground upon which we should develop. If, on the other hand you make a regulation by which you virtually say that no one but a British Columbian shall be allowed to act in the service of the Dominion in British Columbia, no one but a Quebec man shall be allowed to act in the public service anywhere in Canada except in Quebec, and so on throughout all the provinces, you rather bar the current of communication, sympathy, active service and nationality. I do not think there is any better basis than that the appointments which are to be made by the Civil Service Commission will be made for the good of the service. I should think that it would be the inevitable tendency that for the larger proportion of the offices there would be sufficient material in the different localities of the different provinces to look after the public service in those localities. But I think also there is a very great advantage in having free currency so that the stronger and better minds in public service work may have free access to, knowledge of, and communication with every part of the Dominion.

I should be sorry to think, if I were an applicant for a Civil Service position—it might be a medium position, it might be one of very great importance—that I was debarred from seeking that in any but my own province of New Brunswick, or my own province of Ontario. I simply give expression to the feeling produced, that it rather works, as it seems to me, against a full and broad citizenship of the country, against that nationalism which we all wish to cultivate, and that it rather tends to can us up into small divisions, and to perpetuate the feeling of provincialism rather than of nationalism, and I say that in the broadest sense. For my own self I would be sorry to see a principle like that embodied in the Civil Service Act.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister permit me to point out that in the majority of the advertisements for examinations issued by the Civil Service Commission, it is utterly impossible for a candidate from British Columbia to compete, because the advertisement will probably reach there about the time the returns from the examinations should be in Ottawa, or about the date of the sittings for the examinations. A case occurred about a week ago where a vacancy in a certain position was advertised. Dozens of persons in British Columbia wished to compete for the position, but British Columbia was not on the map as far as that advertisement was concerned, and no examination was held in that province at all. The date of the examination fixed in the advertisement would not permit of a candidate coming to Ottawa in time, although when I brought the matter to the attention of the commission they did make provision. The same thing applies to tenders. It is impossible to get a tender to Ottawa by the date fixed in the advertisements. If the commission will make provision for the ten days needed to send out the advertisement and get the examination papers back, thus giving applicants in British Columbia the same chance as candidates in Ottawa or other parts of the country, there would not be very much ground for objection.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend refers to a point that I was just rising to direct his attention to, and it is a thing that is absolutely wrong. In advertisements announcing examinations to choose persons for the public service, sufficient time should be allowed to afford equality of chance to every section of the Dominion. I think that is the way to cure the evil complained of. I would rather cure it by having a sufficiency of time provided than by attempting to cure it in the way proposed.

Mr. FIELDING: If there is a vacant position in British Columbia, why should any man be asked to travel from that province to Ottawa for examination? Why should not the examination be held in British Columbia?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: So it will be.

Mr. FIELDING: To that extent I am willing to be a provincialist. On the larger question my sympathies go very largely with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but I certainly think that if there is a position to be filled in British Columbia, the examination should be held in that province. That would work out probably that, practically speaking, only British Columbians would apply, and the result might be reached in that way; but I am strongly of opinion that the attempt to hold examinations for all these services in Ottawa ought not to be made.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Act provides for an examination at any point in Canada upon the request of five persons.

Mr. FIELDING: Such examinations should be held without any request, it seems to me. If there is a vacancy in an office in British Columbia, certainly I would be provincialist to the extent of saying that the examination should be held in that province, so that the candidates there might certainly have the advantage, and that advantage I would willingly give them.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Will the Chairman read the proposed amendment again?

The CHAIRMAN: It has been moved to add after the word "Council" in the eleventh line, on page fourteen, the following words:

> Except as to the city of Ottawa, all such appointments in any province shall, as far as possible, be made from bona fide residents of that province.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I think the minister took an extreme view of the proposed amendment which only says "as far as possible". That is a very limiting phrase, and I think it is a very wise one. This is a very important question to outside members, and I think that we are justified in taking very strong grounds upon it. A gentleman who sits on this side of the House, after the discussion the other night, said to me that recently two appointments had been made in his riding, both at comparatively large salaries, and both made from Ottawa, apparently without consulting him. But, he said, when it comes to a position of $300 or $400, and they fail to get anybody from Ottawa who will go up there they will say to me: "You can make a suggestion with regard to that." That is not the sort of thing that we want. My hon. friend has made a very fair proposition. British Columbia is an integral part of the Dominion, and I do not think he is at all provincial in the proposal he makes. He simply is looking after the interests of his own people, and his own constituents to some extent, so far as the administration of the Civil Service is concerned. Every district is entitled to a certain number of officials of that kind, and the reasonable place to take them is from the part of the country in which they live. The question simply resolves itself into this: If we do not put into the Bill some such safeguard as this, all the big plums in the service will be taken by men or women from the Capital or from the large cities, and when it is not worth while to send any person from those places to fill a three or four hundred dollar job, the member will be told "You can have that for some person at home." The proposition of my hon. friend from New Westminster is absolutely reasonable, and while I generally agree with the Minister of Trade and Commerce in all these matters, I certainly do think—even if it be construed as being narrow and provincial—that the member for New Westminster has made out a very good case. I do not think any harm will be done because it simply says "as far as possible". If it is not possible the views the Hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has suggested will prevail, and the appointee will come in from the outside; were it is possible and practicable, appointments will be made from the province where the vacancy occurred. I have much pleasure in supporting the amendment.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I would in general agree with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, because we do not want to be provincial, but it seems to me that the more settled provinces of the East are not wishing to have reciprocity with us, and it has been so in the past more than it is to-day. I might broaden my statement more by digression, and say that both political parties in the past have had in view the ignoring of the Western Provinces. As an illustration of my contention, let me say this: Two years ago, when I was proceeding by water to the extreme northern limits of my constituency, about four hundred miles from Edmonton, we found a chief fire ranger sent from Ottawa. Upon making inquiries it was found he had been sent there for certain reasons; the atmosphere in Ottawa was too warm, or something of that sort, and they sent him out where he would be removed from temptation. I found both sides of the river Athabaska, for a distance of three hundred miles, on fire, and if you want to look up the records you can go to the Department of the Interior and read where I made it imperative that a change should be made at once. They did make some changes. We also find homestead inspectors in Alberta that are sent from other provinces, and heads of departments that are sent from Ottawa and other cities. I will give a concrete instance showing that the folks in Ottawa are not willing to play the fair game with us. A young lady came from France not very long ago with her brother and sister. Her brother went to the United States, her sister got married, and she was left alone. She does not know the English language very well, and I tried to place her in some office in Calgary; she received temporary employment with the Belgian Consul. Since I have been here, trying to respect the spirit of the Order in Council which has been passed, I did not bother with any of the ministers, nor did I go to Dr. Roche and see if he could do anything for the young lady. I have endeavoured to secure an appointment for her as a French stenographer to one of the departments here, but there is nothing doing. They do not want this young lady here, it is too far to bring her, they would not have any use for her here; but officials here can send stenographers from Ottawa to New Westminster. We do not want to be provincial, but if you in Ottawa are going to be provincial, watch our smoke.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I hope that the remarks I am going to make will not grate upon the feelings of my hon. friend (Sir George Foster). I am as good a Canadian as he is, yet I believe the whole spirit of the British North America Act breathes provincialism. We have established provinces and there are local liberties and customs in these provinces, and a circumambient air which we must recognize. That is the case in every great confederation. Now it may be that I will be frowned upon as a narrow provincialist, but the case of British Columbia appeals to me just as the case of Nova Scotia would. I put the case before my good friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce: "Suppose there is a vacancy in the postmastership at Halifax, Pictou, Sydney, or St. John, don't you think, Mr. Chairman, that it is only human that the people of those localities should think that the appointment should be made after competitive examination?

Sir SAM HUGHES: No.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Not after competitive examinations; I have no use for them.

Mr. LEMIEUX: They should be made from that province at least, if not from that city or locality. It seems to me only fair and only human, and there is nothing narrow in the fact that a member should advocate respect for local rights and customs. Let me raise another point, and I hope that again I will not be labelled a parochialist or a narrow provincialist. Take the case of my own province of Quebec. I will not speak of Montreal, the metropolis of Canada, where there is a very large English-speaking population, and where almost every one speaks both languages. But outside of Montreal and a few other centres where the people at large speak both languages, suppose there are some positions open where it is absolutely necessary that the incumbent should speak both languages. If you open that position to competitors from one end of Canada to the other, both languages being official in federal matters, you may have to appoint in some centres a gentleman or a lady, as the case may be, who speaks only one language. Why stir up the feelings of the people when by a commonsense application of this Act it can be prevented? I have been a minister of the Crown myself, and every now and then when I was in the Post Office Department and the Department of Labour I had difficulties of that kind to settle. It seems to me the amendment of my hon. friend should be supported to avoid trouble. Let us avoid trouble as much as possible by a sensible application of this Act. Personally, I do not object to gentlemen, if competent, from British Columbia occupying positions in Montreal, nor would hon. gentlemen from New Westminster or Vancouver object to a gentleman from another part of Canada occupying a position in their province. But that is not the point. You must respect local customs, and, as much as possible, avoid stirring up trouble through the drastic application of the Act. I wish it to be well understood, Mr. Chairman, that I am not a narrow provincialist or parochialist at all; but you are sure to cause trouble by making outside appointments. Take the case of Quebec City, or Trois Rivières, or Fraserville, would the Minister of Trade and Commerce tell me that it would be practicable and feasible to appoint some one from, say, Muskoka or Winnipeg to a position there? The amendment of my hon. friend is drafted in a proper spirit, and, for my part, to avoid troublesome racial and language questions in my province, let us adopt it.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Mr. Chairman, I agree with all that the hon. member from Maisonneuve has said, but I go much further. In the first place, I do not believe in these so-called competitive examinations. They are a farce on the face of them, as any one who has ever had anything to do with educational work knows.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would my hon. friend qualify that statement by giving facts? I always thought that the competitive examinations under the system—

Sir SAM HUGHES: I remember an examination paper brought before the Cabinet which took office in 1911. I do not think there were three members of the Cabinet that could spell the words or answer the questions set on that paper for candidates to write on to fill a position in a little one-horse place. To ask candidates to spell the word "Bolsheviki," or to think up technicalities like that, is no way of testing their fitness to hold positions. As the hon. member for South Toronto said the other night, the men who stand foremost in all the walks of life, in law, medicine and other professions, are not those who pass highest in examinations, but men with some breadth and force of character, who would not waste time in getting up the little technicalities and prize puzzles set by these examiners. The point I want to make is this: there are two classes of servants: one Dominion servants, who deal with the offices here in Ottawa, and the other those in customs offices and post offices throughout the country, or what we may call constituency appointments. I have always taken the ground that constituency appointments should be made from the constituency.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I stand on that ground to-day. To say that the riding I have the honour to represent, or that some other member may represent, cannot supply the men or women to fill any jobs in that constituency is belittling, and this belittling of our own people is becoming too much the custom in Canada to-day. We have thousands of men and women in our constituencies able to fill any job. Why is it necessary for any one in British Columbia or Nova Scotia to be sent to fill a job in Northumberland, or vice versa? Every person required to fill a constituency job should be furnished by the constituency. If there is a position to be filled in a province, let it be filled from the province; or if the position is a federal office, let it then be advertised all over Canada and get the best man. So far as competitive examinations are concerned, I do not know whether the clause dealing with them is passed or not, but I trust that the committee will bear in mind what was said in this regard by the hon. member for South Toronto the other night: that a competitive examination is not a test of fitness at all. I have observed—and any minister or ex-minister who ever had anything to do with the Civil Service will agree—that those who have not passed examinations are the best officers in the department. I believe that every constituency should furnish its own local officers out of its own locality; and that every province should furnish its officers out of that province, except in the case of those positions applying to the general service of the whole Dominion.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I wish to recall a statement, prepared by one of the commissioners, from which I read on Friday night. It contains the following in reference to appointments within the locality where the position is to be filled:

> There is naturally a very strong feeling throughout the country that positions should, wherever possible, be filled by the appointment of local persons and that except in the case of transfers, which might occasionally become necessary, "outsiders" as they are regarded should not receive preferment.

That is a declaration of the policy of the commission. This principle, particularly as applied to post office appointments, has been recognized in the United States, where the eligibility of applicants is restricted to those living in the vicinity of the town, city or county where the appointment is to be made. Another portion of this statement says:

> Heretofore permanent appointment in the Inside Service was based solely on the result of an educational test (the candidate being otherwise suitable, of course, as to age, health, character and habits). This gave to the candidate fresh from the class room, and yet lacking in experience, a great advantage over the educated and altogether more suitable person who possessed business experience but might be a trifle rusty in some of the subjects written at the examination.

It would also appear from this statement that the commission are to give a rating on the business experience of applicants for appointment for any position in the Civil Service. A great deal may be said in favour of the amendment and a great deal against it; but I am disposed to accept it, with some slight alteration. This Act departs very radically from the present Civil Service Act and it is important that it be accepted by the people. If this provision is contained in the Bill, it will very materially assist in the administration of the new Act. I suggest that the amendment read as follows:

> Excepting as to the Inside Service, all appointments to any position in a province shall, so far as practicable, be made from bona fide residents of such province.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Is the Inside Service all in Ottawa?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I understand that post office inspectors cannot be appointed without passing an examination and receiving the necessary authority from Ottawa. I submit that the Inside Service is not restricted to Ottawa.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Is it possible to carry this amendment into effect? Many of the civil servants in Ottawa come from British Columbia, and many from Prince Edward Island. Some Ontario men are in the Government employ in Prince Edward Island—the appointment of some of these has been objected to. But the exchange of officers in certain departments is often very desirable. It may be a good thing to have an Ontario man in the Maritime Provinces, and vice versa, because they exchange ideas. This amendment may be valuable as a declaration of policy, but I do not see that it will carry much weight as a matter of law.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: As a matter of principle, my hon. friend's criticism is sound. On the other hand, if such a provision would make the Act more acceptable to Canada it had better be accepted, and we may leave to future Parliaments whatever further amendment may be necessary. "Inside Service" is defined as follows:

> "Inside Service" means and includes that part of the Civil Service in or under the several departments of the Executive Government of Canada and in the offices of the Auditor General, the Clerk of the Privy Council, the Governor General's Secretary, the Public Archives, and the Commission of Conservation, employed at the city of Ottawa, or at the Experimental Farm Station or the Dominion Astronomical Observatory near Ottawa, and the staff of the Civil Service Commission employed at Ottawa.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Accepting as correct the minister's assertion that the Inside Service is confined to Ottawa, I am prepared to concur in his suggestion. I regret that this resolution has grated on the highly strung sensibilities of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). I should be the last in the world to cause him the slightest feeling of discomfort, because I have the greatest respect for him. I regret that he looked upon my resolution in the way he did, because I did not intend it to be provincial; I merely considered it my duty to look after my constituency and my province. British Columbia has I think sent about ten per cent of her total population to the war, and the people of that province are entitled to some consideration. When it is said that we should be national, not provincial, may I point out that in this august legislature and departments connected with it, in responsible positions you will not find one person from British Columbia? The same condition prevails in a great many other departments. When appointments are made, some of the people in Ontario and Quebec forget that there is such a place as British Columbia.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It may be necessary further to amend the proposed provision by inserting after the words "Inside Service" the words "and Commissions and Boards at Ottawa." Otherwise, appointments to these boards would be restricted to the province in question, and I do not think that is the desire of any hon. gentleman.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I move to amend the section further by inserting after the words "case of" in line five the words "commissioners and other members of any Royal or other commission or board and". The section will then read:

> Except as herein otherwise provided, and except in the case of commissioners and other members of any Royal or other commission or board and deputy heads, appointments to positions in the public service shall be by competitive examination.

The purpose of this amendment is to exempt from the provisions of the Act appointments of commissioners and other members of commissions or boards. Those, of course, should be directly appointed by the Government.

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) moves further to amend section 41 by inserting after the word "practicable" in the twelfth line thereof, the words "advisable or expedient".

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not see the force of that amendment. It would not improve the section very much to insert those words. The word "practicable" is wide enough to give the commission any discretion that may be necessary in the administration of the Act. It is a question of whether or not it is practicable to apply the Act. We want the Act to apply to all appointments, if it is practicable to do so. If it is not practicable, we do not want to apply it.

Mr. McQUARRIE: One of the objects of this amendment is to cover the case of returned soldiers who, perhaps will not be able to pass the necessary examination, although they will, in every respect, be competent to fill the position for which the examination is being held.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That ought to be considered under section 42, clause (a).

Mr. McQUARRIE: The Acting Minister of Finance has said that he thought "practicable" would be a suitable word, a word which would be large enough to include every occasion that might require it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: When I was speaking, I had in mind the purpose of the particular part of the section which is now under discussion. This provision of section 41 was intended to give the commission power to make regulations providing for appointments to office in some other forms, when they thought it was not practicable to hold competitive examinations, but my hon. friend is raising another question altogether, which was not in my mind when I spoke, and I desire that his suggestion stand until we come to section 42.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I was endeavouring to point out the meaning of the word "practicable". I took occasion to look up the meaning of that word in the Standard Dictionary, and I found "practicable" meant "that can be put into practice, possible of execution or performance." I take it that almost every case is practicable, possible of execution or performance. On the other hand I found that "advisable," according to the same authority, means "agreeing with sound advice," and that "expedient" means "seeming to promote a desired end or interest, suitable under the circumstances." So that we find that the last two words, "advisable" or "expedient," are much more extensive in their meaning than the word "practicable." I am not pressing this amendment because the acting minister thinks it should not be inserted. He has studied this Bill a great deal more than I have, and in matters of this kind I prefer to accept his judgment. But it would not hurt the Act, and it would be useful in this particular instance, to include the words "advisable or expedient" or perhaps one of them.

5 p.m.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would suggest that my hon. friend refrain from pressing his amendment to this section.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I accept the minister's advice, and I withdraw the amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I move to amend section 41, paragraph 3, as follows: By striking out all the words after the word "with" in the thirteenth line to the word "any," where it appears for the first time in the fifteenth line, and also by striking out all the words after the words "His Majesty," in the fifteenth line, to the end of the said section. That will put the Government Railway system under the Civil Service Act. I want to direct the attention of the Acting Minister of Finance to the Prime Minister's promise, and also to the Order in Council which bears upon this question and which reads:

> Pending the enactment of the necessary legislation hereinbefore alluded to, the following rules shall be observed in all departments of the Government in respect to appointments to the public service.

The capitalization of the word "all" is my point. The intention of the Order in Council was to include "all" services, including the Government railways, in the Civil Service. As I pointed out before, it is most important that the Government railways be brought under the Civil Service Act at this time, because, although the number of present employees runs into some thirty thousand, this is only small comparatively with the number of civil servants there will be in the employment of the Government railways when the Government has taken over what it now contemplates. The Government has already taken over a part of the Transcontinental from Quebec to Winnipeg, and when it shall have taken over the balance of the road from Winnipeg to the Pacific, and when it shall have taken charge of the Canadian Northern railroad, as I understand the Government is about to do, we shall have a tremendous army of civil servants who will make it difficult for any Government to pass a Civil Service Reform Bill that will apply to them. There will be such a large number of people engaged in one service that we will have a railroad despotism in this country. It must be remembered that Canada is a very narrow country, relatively to the way it is peopled, and when we have a railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific with all its branches and ramifications we will have a condition of things that hon. gentlemen would be well advised to protect themselves against while they have the opportunity. Otherwise, these organizations will be a menace to any Government in this country They will be a dominating force in politics, unless they are eliminated entirely from politics, and the only way to eliminate them from politics is to eliminate patronage, and the only way to eliminate patronage is to put the railway employees under the Civil Service Commission, and the time to do it is now, before they get big enough to dominate any Government of this country. If any more amendments are necessary beyond the one I have submitted, to satisfy the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, or any other railway brotherhood we can incorporate them in the Bill.

Mr. JOHN H. SINCLAIR: I understood from the Acting Minister of Finance some days ago that steps had already been taken to place the railway employees in the Civil Service. I came to that conclusion by reason of a statement made by the minister in the House on April 12 as follows:

> Mr. A. K. Maclean: At the present time, and since the passage of the Order in Council, the management of the Canadian Government railways has been given absolute freedom to appoint such persons as he may see fit and to disregard any representations which may be made by any person to him.
> Mr. Bureau: By any member of Parliament?
>
> Mr. Copp: Has he been ordered to disregard representattions?
>
> Mr. A. K. Maclean: I do not know whether he has been ordered, he has authority to do so.

Can the minister produce the ruling that has been made in regard to this matter?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am not in a position to say whether such instructions were in writing or not, but I shall inquire of the Minister of Railways and advise my hon. friend this evening.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: If the ruling is in writing I presume the minister will bring it down after dinner.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I wish to support the amendment of my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Read). I see no reason why railway employees should not be placed under the Civil Service Commission the same as any other branch of the public service. No good reason has been given why that should not be done. It is this department more than any other that has suffered from patronage in the province from which I come. The Intercolonial railway has been abused by the patronage system to a certain extent from the time it was first built, and I think it would be a great reform if we could get rid of the patronage evil in connection with the Government railways in Eastern Canada. The fact that every young man who applies for a position as telegraph operator, cleaner, brakesman, and what not, has to bring with him a certificate from a member of the patronage committee or from a member of Parliament shows that the whole system is permeated by patronage. The man who is selected in that way may not prove suitable.

Mr. NESBITT: How would my hon. friend get over the difficulty caused by the delay in the Civil Service Commission appointing a fireman, we will say, who was required immediately?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Regulations could be made to meet that case.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I am not proposing that that class of employee should be put under the board. I am urging that the superintendents and shop foremen should have power to select their employees in the same way that the superintendent of an industry has power to select his men. Under the present patronage system a man may be sent into the round-house who will never make a cleaner or a driver, but the superintendent cannot dismiss him like the superintendent of an industry can dismiss any one whom he thinks will not prove suitable for the work. If the superintendents and foremen had this power they would be able to gather together a good staff, but when men are appointed promiscuously under the patronage system it is impossible to get a good staff, and that is one of the reasons why the Government railways have not been successful in the past. Here is the opportunity to get rid of that difficulty and to put the road under proper management. Employees of railways may be divided into two classes, the clerical staff, who could be selected on competitive examination by the Civil Service Commission, and the operating staff, who, of course, could not be selected by the Civil Service Commission, but could very well be appointed by the men in charge of the round-houses and the superintendents of the road. If we would give these men power to select their employees, and make them responsible for the character of the men they select, it would remove the difficulty at once. Announce that it is not necessary for applicants to get a recommendation from the patronage committee or from any member of Parliament; that the superintendents have a free hand in selecting the men they will train for engineers, conductors, and other posts in the railway service, and the whole difficulty will be solved as far as that branch of the railway is concerned. The Minister of Public Works has already accepted this system, and who will say there should be any difference in this respect between the Government railways and the Department of Public Works? The Department of Public Works consists of a large number of men employed in manual labour and other kinds of work. They also have in that department engineers and men who ought to submit themselves to examination. I cannot see any material difference between the Department of Public Works and the Department of Railways and Canals as to the application of this Act. I trust that the minister will accept this amendment. This is one of the most important clauses in the Bill. If we are to have Civil Service reform in this country, it will only be a half measure unless it applies to the Government railways the same as to other departments.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I think it would be a great mistake to accept the amendment of the hon. member for Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. J. Read). I presume that both the hon. member who proposed that amendment and the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), who supports it, have read the report of the Drayton-Acworth Commission. The commission proposes that several of the most important railway systems in the country shall be placed under Government ownership. We now own the Canadian Northern, we have the Intercolonial, we shall have the Transcontinental and we cannot avoid taking over the Grand Trunk Pacific; so that we will have a great system of railways owned by the people. The Drayton-Acworth report which, I assume, is acceptable to the Government and to the country, proposes that all the Canadian Government railway systems shall be placed under the control and management of an independent commission composed of the best and most practical men that money can secure. These commissioners will be responsible, not to the Government but to Parliament, so that their independence may be absolutely guaranteed. If you are to place the employees of the Intercolonial railway under the Civil Service Commission you will be taking these people away from the control of the commission that it is proposed to establish. If the Government fails to appoint this commission after it has secured control of these railways it will make a mistake that the country will never recover from. That is the only possible way by which a national railway system can be made a success. If you are to place the employees of the Intercolonial under the control of the Civil Service Commission, you will deprive us of the opportunity of placing them under the control of the proposed railway commission that will be appointed to manage the national railway system.

Mr. J. READ: How would we be depriving ourselves of the right to put them under the railway commission afterwards? We would simply take them from this and put them under that.

Mr. RICHARDSON: You now place them under the control of the Civil Service Commission, whereas it must be clear to every logical mind that, in order to make a success of the Government owned railways, they must be under the control of a railway commission.

Mr. READ: You could do that by Act.

Mr. RICHARDSON: If the Government fails in its clear duty to adopt the only possible method by which the national system of railways can be made a success, then in the next session it will be in order for our friends to move this amendment, and I shall be very glad to support it. But I do not see how any hon. member who has given any study to the railway situation can fail to realize that it is imperative upon the Government, in order to make a success of the railway system, to appoint a commission of experts independent of the Government and responsible only to Parliament.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend (Mr. Richardson) is aware that the Drayton-Acworth report has been before this House for two years and that it has not been acted upon. The Government appointed that commission at very great cost to the country; the commission travelled from one end of the country to the other and engaged specialists and technical experts to examine the railway situation. We then took cognizance of the report. It had been discussed day in and day out in this House, but the Government has discarded the report absolutely. There is a commission sitting in Toronto to-day because of the discarding of that report, and as a result of the legislation that was passed during last session. Therefore, my hon. friend may be quite sure that there is no hope that the Government will ever take any action based on that report which is a most excellent one. I have never read a report so complete and so sane as regards the Canadian railway question. Yet the Government has discarded it. My hon. friend says that the railway officials and employees of this country ought to be under the Canadian Railway Commission. Of course, that is nonsense, because the Government will never adopt any such system.

Mr. RICHARDSON: They must.

Mr. LEMIEUX: They must but they will not.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: How do you know?

Mr. LEMIEUX: The experience of the past teaches me that they will not. Has my hon. friend (Mr. Richardson) any promise from the Government that, acting on the Drayton-Acworth report, a commission would be appointed? If he has, he has been deceived as we have been deceived. There will be no such commission appointed. Meanwhile, what injury will it cause to the country if we put the railway employees under the Civil Service Commission as regards appointment as has been explained by my hon. friend from Guysborough? If, later on, the Government come to their senses, and accept the conclusions of the report, will the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) say that there is anything to prevent this Parliament saying by special Act that in future the railway employees will be put under the control of the railway commission, and that we cannot prepare any legislation that will meet the case?

Mr. RICHARDSON: Was my hon. friend and party with which he is associated in favour of adopting the Drayton-Acworth report?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Then, if that is true, and the influential and best elements of the old Liberal party are united on this side of the House, the Government has no choice. This is a Conservative-Liberal, or Union Government, and the strongest, the dominating element not only in this House but all over the country, that was identified with my hon. friends on the other side, being part and parcel of this Union Government, will insist on this repart being adopted. There is nothing else the Government can do; they must adopt it. I do not see how they can possibly avoid doing so.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I will make this bargain with my hon. friend; it is an open bargain and there is nothing mysterious about it: If he induces the Government during the present sesion to pass such legislation as he contemplates I will withdraw all objection and I will give him my best support.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Will my hon. friend repeat that?

Mr. LEMIEUX: If my hon. friend will induce the Government to pass during this session such legislation as he proposes I will give him my best support.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I shall certainly promise to do the best I can.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The hon. the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Maclean) and the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) are there; can my hon. friend extort from them even a qualified promise that in the distant future there will be such legislation? He cannot. He will not obtain such a promise.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I will do my level best.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am serious in this. I do not believe that the Government intend to act under the Drayton-Acworth report but if they do my hon. friend will enlist me as one of his supporters.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: If the subject of the Drayton-Acworth Report on the possibility of the Government taking over large systems of railway and putting them under the control of one commission were a matter for discussion, it would be very easy to answer the arguments which the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) has addressed to the committee, particularly bearing in mind the attitude that the hon. member for Maisonneuve, and the party he supports, took with respect to the management and operation of Government railways during their regime. But that is not the question. The question is a practical one; it is whether we are going to put the railway employees on the Government railway system under the Civil Service Commission. I say that if you attempt to put the railway employees on any comprehensive system of Government railways under the Civil Service Commission, it will result in utter chaos. As an example of the methods followed by the Civil Service Commission let me read a question from an examination paper that was sent out through the country for men to pass who were called upon to take positions as egg candlers. This is it:

First Simplify: $(\frac{5}{7} \div \frac{4}{5}) - (\frac{3}{7}$ of $1\frac{1}{8}) + (\frac{5}{6}$ of $\frac{1\frac{3}{5}}{16}) \div (\frac{3}{8} + \frac{2}{3}) \times \frac{4}{5}$.

This illustrates the kind of examination paper that would be sent out to some man who was an applicant for a position as brakesman, if the Civil Service Commission had charge of the appointments.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is an easy question.

[Mr. Richardson.]

Mr. NICHOLSON: Does my hon. friend say that is an easy question?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Certainly, I will answer from memory.

Mr. NICHOLSON: My hon. friend may be able to do so, but I tell him that the class of men who are operating our railway trains in this country are not going to answer such questions as that.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: To whom was the question sent?

Mr. NICHOLSON: The examination paper from which I have quoted was sent out on the eighteenth of April to men seeking to be appointed as egg candlers. Let me ask what knowledge has the Civil Service Commission, sitting in Ottawa, of the qualifications for train despatcher, locomotive engineer, conductor, or any other class of men employed in the operation of railway trains? If the Government owned railways are ever going to be a success there is only one system of management that can be adopted, and that is to engage railway men who are competent to operate those railways—to put men of that kind at their head and give them authority to choose their employees just as do the leading officers of private owned railways. A superintendent, a master mechanic, a train-master, or a chief train despatcher on any of the private owned railways would not submit the class of men they employ to examinations of such a character as that to which I have referred. An hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island has said we are going to bring ourselves under the domination of a class of Government railway employees that will ultimately control this country. I tell the hon. gentleman that if the whole Civil Service of Canada was organized on the same system as the private owned railways of this country it would not be necessary for two hundred and thirty-five members of Parliament to be wasting their time in the city of Ottawa considering this Civil Service Bill at all, because each man would be in the place he was fitted for, and would be kept there so long as he did his work. My hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) says there is no possibility of the Government accepting the Drayton-Acworth report. My hon. friend knows nothing about it. The Drayton-Acworth report was presented to Parliament less than a year ago, and if we wanted to go into a little ancient history we might find that there were many things that it took the hon. gentleman and his friends, when they were in office, very much more than a year to deal with, matters of much minor importance than are involved in the adoption of the report in question. But that is outside of the issue. The point I want to emphasize here is that the talk of bringing the railway employees of this country under the Civil Service Commission is nothing less than rot, because it is impossible.

Sir SAM HUGHES: How many questions are there on the examination paper from which you quoted?

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: There are eight very similar questions.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Other hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The CHAIRMAN: In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. LEMIEUX: On the understanding that the Drayton-Acworth report will be adopted by the Government?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Government is not making any such terms, but I might repeat what I have already said two or three times this session, namely: That during the recess the commission is going to give study and consideration to some method of bringing the employees of the Government railways under the operation of this Act. Now there are probably on the Government railway system twenty thousand employees, and it would require a special commission at Moncton, probably the year round, if the suggestion was to be acted on immediately. There are endless difficulties in the way; it is impossible and impracticable at the present time. Since the passing of the Order in Council the commission have been busy, the Government have been busy, and it is unfair to suggest we could deal with the question immediately.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: How many of the twenty thousand employees are on the clerical staff and how many on the operating staff?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We cannot deal with the subject piecemeal; it must be taken up and dealt with as a whole.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Cannot you eliminate the patronage system from the Government railways, or is it the intention of the Government to continue that system?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understand the Government does not commit itself on the Drayton-Acworth report, and no action is going to be taken this session with reference to it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I did not say that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) says that the Government will accept that report.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I certainly feel sure that they will. I do not see how they can do anything else. If the members of the Government are intelligent men, if they have intelligently studied the whole railway question, and have a due sense of responsibility to the country, I do not see how they can possibly avoid adopting the Drayton-Acworth report. Whether it should be adopted right off I am not prepared to say, but personally I propose to hold the Government responsible later on for its adoption. They have promised to take the matter up when the present Canadian Northern arbitration is ended—I do not think they ought to wait that long. I think no time should be lost in acting on that report, because the railway question is knocking at the door of Parliament in a manner such as no other issue in the country has ever done, and it is really second in importance only to the war. I believe the Government will realize that, and it is for the members on both sides to bring pressure to bear upon them so that they will solve this question and apply the solution as rapidly as possible.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Civil Service reform is one thing and patronage is another. Cannot the minister take steps immediately to abolish patronage on the Government railways?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: So far as I know it is abolished now.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Oh, no.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Materials required for the Canadian Government Railway system are now purchased by the War Purchasing Commission.

Mr. BUREAU: Patronage in the case of the Government railways, if I understand the minister aright, has to do with purchases and contracts, whereas when my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Blake) indicated that it was one of the things we should reach in this Bill, it was declared that appointments constituted patronage. There seems to be a clash in the interpretation of what patronage is in the two cases. What about the appointments?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They are made by the managing officials of the road.

Mr. BUREAU: On a recommendation, I suppose.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not know. I never made any.

Mr. BUREAU: On the recommendation of the members, or those who have the pull, or the patronage committee.

Mr. DEVLIN: Can any member of the Government tell us how these appointments are made?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They are made by the managing officials of the road.

Mr. DEVLIN: Upon whose recommendations?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Upon nobody's recommendation.

Mr. DEVLIN: Upon nobody's recommendation? Then, a minister never recommends, or if he does recommend, his recommendation is not acted upon?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If he does make a recommendation it need not be acted upon.

Mr. DEVLIN: The reason I insist upon this point is because I hold in my hand a letter from the Union Government dated Ottawa, November 21, 1917, signed by every member of the Government, addressed to the soldiers of the Canadian Expeditionary Force in the trenches, and I find in that letter this paragraph:

> This non-party Government has wiped out the patronage system in the purchase of supplies, the awarding of contracts and appointments to the public service. That is more than any party Government ever did or ever could do.

I presume that there are no appointments made in any Government service now under the old patronage system. Am I right in supposing that since November 21, 1917, there are no patronage appointments?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The management of the road have authority from the Government to appoint anybody they desire, and appointments are made without any interference on the part of the Government or any member of the Government; and the management has been instructed to exercise the greatest independence possible in selecting those whom they desire in the railway service.

[Mr. Bureau.]

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What does the minister mean by the "management of the road?" Take for instance, the management of the roundhouse in a place like Stellarton, N. S. Is the superintendent of that roundhouse at liberty to receive the application of any young fellow who comes to him without reference to a recommendation by a member of Parliament or a patronage committee on anybody else? If he does receive it, will he be backed up by the Government, and will any appointment that he may make under those circumstances be ratified by the head of the department?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I cannot answer that question, because I do not know what the rules of the management of that railway are in respect to appointments.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I want to assure the hon. acting minister that patronage is as rampant on the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railways as it has ever been.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I know it, as a matter of fact. I wrote to the minister long since the election and put it straight up to him, that at the new Port Borden, named after the right hon. leader of the Government, where the new car ferry lands, a large number of men were required to take up the various new positions, and I told him: "Now, I suppose since the Union Government has been returned, that you will implement the promises made to the people and do away with patronage; I want to know whether in the appointment of the men there will be any preference given to one or other because of his political colour." I received a letter from him in which he said that, of course,—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member is out of order. The question of abolition of patronage after the last general election has nothing to do with the clause under discussion. It may have had something to do with the amendment which was proposed by the hon. member in so far as it had relation to railways, but that amendment has been disposed of, and I must rule that the hon. member is out of order.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Is it not a fact that the hon. member had a son appointed as ferry keeper—

The CHAIRMAN: That is absolutely out of order. The question of the appointment of any particular person is out of order.

On section 42—Computation of number of probable vacancies—soldiers to have preference:

Sir SAM HUGHES: There is one point to which I would like to direct the attention of the minister. This section speaks of overseas soldiers and does not discriminate. There are soldiers in Canada, as I pointed out in this House not very long ago, who from the very outset have been anxious to go to the front, and who could not possibly be permitted to go. This section would militate against these men, and would put a premium upon a class of men who are no more deserving than are they, although all may be deserving. I should like to see the soldiers classified into combatants, or those who faced the foe in the field, and those who have been in Britain in offices since the beginning of the war. That is the distinction which I wish to direct the attention of the minister to, and I hope he will take it into consideration. There are men by the hundred in Britain —good fellows, I am not saying one word against them; they are doing very useful work—who have not been to the front or in the firing line at all, and who are not as much entitled to consideration as are many of the boys who were desirous of going to the front but who have remained in Canada occupying positions against their own wishes. The minister is doing an injustice, unintentionally, of course, to that class of soldier, and he is hardly putting the premium on the combatant fellow that I would like to see put on him. My heart always warms up to the fellow who faces the music in the trenches.

Mr. McQUARRIE: At the suggestion of the Acting Finance Minister, I withdrew the second amendment to section 41, and I now move it as an amendment to section 42. It is as follows:

That section 42 be amended by adding at the end of paragraph (a) of subsection 2 the following words:

Provided also that the Commission may, in the case of any such person, decide that it is not expedient to require such person to pass the said examination and may, without such examination, place such person on the said list of successful candidates in such order of merit as they may deem advisable.

"Person" herein referred to is set out in paragraph (a) of this section as meaning any person who has been on active service overseas on the military or naval forces of His Majesty or of any of the Allies of His Majesty during the present war. Men who have served in the overseas forces should be placed in a different position from that occupied by ordinary individuals so far as examinations are concerned. In proper cases—of which the commission will be the judges—it is only right that returned soldiers should be so placed on the list without being required to take the examination. There is nothing unusual about that. In British Columbia in my own profession it has been decided in a great many cases by the Benchers to dispense altogether with intermediate and even with final examinations in the case of men who have served overseas. Such men are given their degrees without examination. The Civil Service Commission should give every consideration to the men who have fought our battles at the front. If, therefore, we place returned soldiers in a more favourable position than we place civilians, it will not be doing too much for them.

Mr. TURRIFF: Thousands of men have gone from Canada, have used the uniform to enable them to keep from getting within sound of the guns, have remained in England and through political influence have secured high positions there. If this amendment is passed as it is worded, these men, when they return, will be able to use the same political influence that kept their skins safe when they were in England in order to get high positions here in the Service without passing an examination. I object most strongly to that. If my hon. friend will make his amendment apply only to men who have gone across the channel and fought in the trenches, I will support it, but I protest against these political soldiers who took good care not to get in line with the bullets, being given any special advantage over anybody else when they come home.

Mr. NESBITT: While we have all respect for the men who have served at the front, it would not be in the interests of the country to appoint men to the Civil Service who are not capable of filling the positions. As it is, the clause provides exceptional treatment for returned soldiers. It says that all persons who have been on active service overseas and who obtain sufficient marks to pass the examinations shall, irrespective of the marks they have obtained, be placed on the list of successful candidates above all others.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: And age does not count against them.

Mr. NESBITT: That is so. It is dangerous to suggest to the commission that we want them to appoint men without regard to merit or qualifications. The use of the word "may" suggests that the commission "shall;" I think that we should not adopt an amendment of this kind. I agree with the Acting Minister of Finance that any favouritism which is shown should be extended to those who have seen actual service at the front. I should not like to say anything against the men who have gone to England with the intention of fighting. As the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) says, some of them may have exercised political influence to keep them from danger, but I am not saying anything about that; I am not making any insinuations. As the section is worded, it gives returned soldiers a distinct preference. The examination will not be a serious matter to these men; besides, as I have said, it would be dangerous for us to suggest to the commission that they select for appointment men without merit—I mean, not individual merit, not the merit of having served overseas, but the merit which qualifies them for a Civil Service position. If, therefore, the section is so worded as to give preference to the men who have seen actual service in the trenches, I think it will be all right.

Mr. ANDREWS: I am very much interested in this soldier problem, and I wish to tell hon. members that I never saw a soldier who went overseas for the money that was in it or who came back with the idea of getting a job which he was not fit to hold. I am very strongly opposed to the amendment. If returned soldiers are not competent to hold the positions, they do not want to take them, and we do not want to put them into those positions. We do not want to make paupers of them. If we have to take care of the returned soldiers, we shall do it in some other way.

Mr. BUREAU: This amendment is one which might lead a person who opposes it, and who is not in the position of my hon. friend (Mr. Andrews), to be criticised and sniped at hereafter. This Bill is brought down for the purpose of rendering the Civil Service more effective and improving conditions as they now exist. I see a number of difficulties if we are going to begin to create classes by exceptions, as is suggested by the amendment of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie). In presenting his amendment he cites a precedent; he says that in his province—I conclude he is a lawyer—the bench in the case of men who have served overseas exempts from examination students or those who are preparing to practice the legal profession. I do not see the connection between exempting a lawyer from examination and exempting from examination a man who has gone into the Civil Service. After a man receives his diploma or his certificate to practice as a lawyer, he hangs out his shingle; and if he can make good, that is all right. If he cannot, he has to suffer for the favour which was intended to be done to him and which did not turn out as he expected. In this case, I think the amendment as moved by the Acting Minister of Finance goes the limit. We say: You shall pass qualifying examinations. For the protection of the service, we all admit that they are necessary. We tell the soldier: "You deserve consideration at the hands of the people, and we are willing to give it to you; supposing there are fifteen candidates, and by marks there are fourteen ahead of you, you are qualified to hold a position, but the superior qualification which you get for having risked your life for your country gives you the preference over the fourteen others who, under ordinary circumstances, would have been ahead of you and would have set you back." Let us take the argument of my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff). Supposing we are going to make differences between those who went across the channel and those who did not, and between those who went into the trenches and those who did not, there may be men who went overseas for the purpose of going into the trenches, but who, from circumstances beyond their control, were unable to reach the trenches. They may have been sick; they may have been under conditions which prevented them from reaching the trenches. It may have been decided that their services on one side of the channel were of more benfit than on the other. The same thing may apply to a man across the channel ready to go into the trenches. He may become sick, or, on account of circumstances beyond his control, he may not be able to reach the trenches. An injustice would be worked to such a man. Those are some of the objections and difficulties which we may have to meet if we accept the amendment according to the suggestion of the hon member for Assiniboia. I agree with the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. G. W. Andrews) that we ought not to jeopardise in any way the Bill that is now before us and which we are going to make law. We might render a bad service to the soldier himself. Supposing by mishap a man unqualified should be put into a position, that would create a certain feeling against that man. It would tend to take away from that particular man the sympathy to which he is entitled, and we ought not to expose any one to that condition.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I quite agree with the remarks that have been made by some hon. gentlemen to the effect that we must take the greatest interest in the welfare of the returned soldier. Nobody, I imagine, would dispute that. This country must see to it that the soldier who has performed services across the seas is properly cared for, but when it is proposed to empower the commission to appoint returned soldiers to competitive posts without examination I must say I am not prepared to agree. Section 41 enables the commission to declare that the Act shall not apply to certain positions where its application would not be practicable, and positions of that class will be open to returned soldiers. Section 42 also gives preference to returned soldiers by enabling the commission to put them ahead—if they pass the examination—of all other candidates qualifying. That is a distinct preference. The age limit has also been removed in the case of returned soldiers, so I think hon. gentlemen will agree that some preference has been shown to this class of the community. It is rather a serious thing to suggest that appointments should be made to the Civil Service without examination of any kind. We must have a Civil Service in this country; it should be an efficient one, and I should not like to see power placed in the hands of the commission or any other body to wholly eliminate examinations for any one class. I hope this view will prevail with the committee, and particularly with the hon. member for New Westminster, who I hope will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. BURNHAM: From what I have gathered since coming into the House I certainly disagree with the minister. I strongly hope that every preference will be given to the returned soldier outside of examinations altogether. I have been through many examinations myself, and from first to last I have never found that they fitted me for anything. Anyone who has taken examinations himself or knows those who have, knows that it by no means follows that the person who passes an examination is fit for the position he is seeking. This Bill is founded on the assumption that where recommendations are required the members of this House are not fit to make recommendations. That is one of the most extraordinary assumptions that could well be made. For my part, I most heartily disapprove of the Bill and everything in it, since a very important portion of it takes out of the hands of the people's representatives that which they should retain. We all know that candidates at examinations are graded according to the number of marks they obtain; we all know that a very large portion of the Civil Service is within the control and jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. Well and good. But outside of all that, there are many cases where recommendations must be made, and if recommendations are to be made, surely they ought to be made by the people most concerned, and the people most concerned are the people in the constituencies where these appointments are to be made, and the person who should be called on to make the recommendation is the man, or woman it may be, who represents that constituency for the time being. That is logical and decent.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Very frequently the defeated candidate has the power of recommendation.

Mr. BURNHAM: I am not complaining about that. I am not speaking of the defeated candidate, but of the man who represents the people. Do not let me be misunderstood. I am not talking of cases where recommendations are not to be made, but I say that where a recommendation has to be made, and the power to make that recommendation is taken out of the hands of the people, it is a direct insult to the people's representative for one thing, and a violation of the constitution for another. There is no guarantee whatever that the appointment will be worth the paper it is written on. Furthermore—I do not wish to be insulting—it looks to me as if the deputy ministers, being amenable to nobody except the minister and having all power in their hands, will hand that power over to the minister so that the power of recommendation will be taken out of the hands of the people where it rests now with more or less satisfactory results, and will be centralized in the hands of the Government. And pray, since when has the Government had a greater moral right to say who shall be recommended than the members of this House? If the members here are not gentlemen of common decency, fit to bear the responsibility cast upon them, or if they fancy for one minute that they can sidestep that responsibility or are not capable of making an honest recommendation, then for Heaven's sake let them resign and let some decent men take their places. But to suppose that the standard of representative life in this country has fallen so low that some person or persons unknown may recommend appointments in a constituency, avoiding as if he were the plague the representative of that constituency, is to suppose something that the House and the country will not accept. You may pass this Bill, but the House and the people will not pass it and it never will go.

Mr. McQUARRIE: In view of the statement made by the acting minister a few days ago, that this Bill was considered to a certain extent more or less as a temporary measure, and that amendments would probably be brought down after it had been tried out, I think I can safely withdraw the proposed amendment. I hope, however, that next session the minister, and some other hon. gentlemen, will have changed their ideas and that they will finally decide to support this amendment. I feel that it is only a proper one and although I must agree with the remarks of hon. gentlemen to the effect that we do not want to have anyone in the Civil Service who is not capable of carrying out the duties of his office, I still think that men from the front should be given different consideration from others. I would, therefore, if the committee agrees, withdraw this amendment.

Amendment (Mr. McQuarrie) withdrawn.

Mr. BUREAU: I desire to direct the attention of the committee to subsection 3. Last year I asked the acting minister where the appointing power rested in the Act and the answer I got, as recorded in Hansard, was a reference to subsection 3 of section 42, which reads:

> From the list of successful competitors, the Commission, on the application of the deputy head, shall supply the required officers, clerks and employees.

I think that is not the appointing power. Glancing through the remainder of the Act, I cannot find any place where the appointing power rests. Of course, the commission designates the man who is to occupy the position and under the present system he is required to serve on probation for six months. Then he may be either retired, denied the privilege of continuing in his office, or kept on. But there is no appointing power. There is a distinct provision in clause 30 about the dismissing power.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The appointing power in the commission?

Mr. BUREAU: The appointing power of the commission itself.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If the word "supply" were struck out and the word "appoint" put in, would that not cover it?

Mr. BUREAU: That might be better. If the amendment I proposed this morning is carried, the appointing and dismissing power would rest with the same body.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I beg to move:

> That the word "supply" in the second line of sub-clause 3, in the 12th line of page 15, be struck out and the word "appoint" be inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. MORPHY: I would like the minister to explain the meaning of the words "successful competitors." Suppose there are five or six successful competitors, under what form of selection will the commission decide as to which one shall be appointed?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The commission would select the one whom they thought best qualified from the list of successful competitors.

Mr. MORPHY: A candidate writes on the examination and has 100 per cent, a perfect paper, and 70 per cent is sufficient to pass. The candidate having 70 marks out of 100 might be preferred to the one who has a perfect paper?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They are put in the order of their marks.

Mr. MORPHY: That is what I want to get at. Is it understood that the highest-marked candidate shall have the preference in the selection?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. MORPHY: That will be arbitrary and imperative?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Sub-section 2 of section 42 says that:

> Immediately after each examination, a list of the successful competitors in the case of a competitive examination, and of the successful candidates in order of merit in other examinations shall be made out, and the list of succesful competitors and candidates shall be published in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. BUREAU: Subsection 4 of section 42 says:

The selection shall be, so far as practicable, in the order of the names on the list, but the Commission may select any person who in his examination shows special qualifications for any qualifications for any particular subject.

Mr. MORPHY: That is what I want to get at.

Mr. BUREAU: Suppose, as my hon. friend has suggested, that 70 points are required and there was a man who had 80; the man who had 80 should have a preference over the one who had 70 unless he was a returned soldier.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Also unless he had special qualifications.

Mr. BUREAU: That is a different thing. I would understand that provision that the selection shall be so far as practicable in the order of the names on the list to mean according to the number of marks obtained at the examination.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is the same thing.

Mr. SHEARD: Is it intended to determine the qualifications of candidates by examination and that alone? It appears to me that if that is the idea the provision is going to be too narrow and that we are going to get those who are more distinguished for their scholastic attainments than their practical efficiency. I could name a great many instances where a man might fall down on a written examination and yet be the best man for the position because he would probably have more practical experience and ability. I do not think that a written examination can qualify a man for a practical position in any walk of life.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I stated on Friday evening, and again to-day, the practice which is now being followed by the commission. It is outlined in the statement which I read on Friday night, and which was prepared by a member of the commission:

Heretofore permanent appointment in the Inside Service was based solely on the result of an educational test (the candidate being otherwise suitable, of course, as to age, health, character, and habits). This gave to the candidate fresh from the class room, and yet lacking in experience, a great advantage over the educated and altogether more suitable person who possessed business experience, but might be a trifle rusty in some of the subjects written at the examination.

A little later the statement proceeds to set forth:

In rating applications for such positions the business experience of the applicants would be considered, together with their educational standing, as evidenced by school or collegiate record, while satisfactory information as to character and habits would also be required.

Mr. McKENZIE: We have nine provinces and a different standard of education in each province. I presume that whoever will examine the papers will do so according to some one standard, and I would like to have an understanding as to how this is to be arranged. Take the question of English composition, there is possibly a difference as to that in each province in Canada. Doubtless when the questions on that subject are set they will be set according to the standard of composition that obtains in Ontario. Therefore, a Nova Scotian answering that standard would give an answer that would not be regarded as satisfactory. I am simply taking that as an illustration. It is, therefore, absolutely necessary, in order that justice be done to all the candidates, that there should be some uniform standard of test—whether it be in English composition, arithmetic, algebra, or geography, the same standard should prevail throughout.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The questions that are prepared are applicable to all parts of Canada, there is no variation whatever.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister does not grasp my point. There are certain questions set in composition and English grammar, and they are answered, probably, according to the definitions given in the Ontario English grammar, and the Ontario standard work on English composition, which are entirely different from those in use in Nova Scotia. A man from Nova Scotia answering according to that standard will get no value at all for his answers.

Mr. BUREAU: With respect to subsection 6 I would suggest that the word "appointed" be substituted for the word "supplied" in line 26. I would also suggest that in subsection 8, "the commission may select for any office," the word "appoint" be used.

Mr. BUTTS: Is there any intention to provide a substitute examination? For instance, speaking of the Maritime Provinces, the matriculation examinations in Mount Allison, St. François Xavier and Dalhousie universities, are taken as the equivalent of the primary examination in law and medicine.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No other examination is accepted as the equivalent for the Civil Service examination. In answer to the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau), I may say that I am willing to accept his suggestion, and accordingly move that the word "appointed" be substituted for the word "supplied" in the subsection.

Mr. MORPHY: Will the minister tell me what distinction there will be between examination and test? For example, take the position of stenographer. I am informed that the practice now is for the applicant to appear before the necessary committee of the Civil Service Commission and undergo a test. Are these examinations all subject to being held at the one time, or is there an easy way of getting through without waiting for a definite period? What is the present practice, and what is likely to be the practice in the future?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: For the purpose of securing an employee of the class described by my hon. friend the Civil Service Commission would hold an examination at any time.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 43—Notices and examination to be in both languages:

Mr. BUREAU: I do not remember anything in the Act providing that those who hold the degree of Bachelor of Arts or Bachelor of Letters of the several universities of the Dominion can be admitted to certain positions without examination. Might I ask the minister if there is such a provision?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is no such provision.

Mr. BUREAU: Does the minister not think there should be?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That would be giving an unfair advantage. Some other person might possibly defeat the college graduate in a competitive examination.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the good of publishing notices of examination in the Canada Gazette? The minister might just as well put them in the cellar as in that publication. Very few people see the Gazette, and there should be plenty of notice of these examinations in some local paper. I do not know for how long the notice should appear.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Notices are published in the local papers as well.

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

Mr. McKENZIE: Why not provide for that under the law?

Section agreed to.

On section 44—Appointees must be British subjects unless special exemption—age limits—age limits for civil servants competing at examinations:

Mr. BUREAU: May I ask the acting minister why there is a restriction that persons not British subjects can be admitted to the Civil Service? The other night the question was raised by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) about having the oath of allegiance included in the oath to be taken by a civil servant. I understood the purpose was to make it impossible for a man to apply for a position unless he was a British subject. In this section it is provided that a man not a British subject can be appointed on the authority of the Governor in Council. I do not see how any case may arise, unless that of an interpreter, or under very extraordinary circumstances, in which a person who is not a British subject will be required to fill a position in the Civil Service.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The purpose of this section is to enable the Governor in Council, under special circumstances, to employ the services of one not a British subject because he possesses some special knowledge upon a certain subject. For instance, two or three years ago the services of a distinguished Norwegian were secured by the Government in connection with our fisheries, and he remained in the service for a year or more. He has since ceased his connection with the Civil Service. I understand that a little difficulty would have been experienced in employing such a person were it not for this section, which is intended to cover cases of that kind.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Is there any age limit at the present time for examination for the Inside Service?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It varies from 18 to 35 years. It is different in the Post Office from other departments; and then in respect of some positions it is different from others.

Section agreed to.

On section 45—Classification:

Mr. BUREAU: This section says that in the classification of the second division, grade A shall consist of clerks and other employees working under supervision; grade B shall consist of clerks and employees working under supervision, and of stenographers and typewriters; and that grade C shall consist of clerks and employees, and of stenographers and typewriters whose duties are copying and routine work under supervision. I do not see that there is much use for a stenographer in doing copying, or what particular work they can perform.

Mr. SHEARD: I think that draftsmen and architects' assistants should not be classed with clerks and stenographers; they are a higher grade of skilled workmen. Many of them have training. In Toronto, many have degrees as Bachelors of Science and have taken their course in the School of Practical Science. They have technical knowledge, and although they work more or less under supervision and direction, it appears to me that they should be put in a higher class, possibly in the first division. I suggest that to the minister.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am proposing,—

Mr. LEMIEUX: Before the minister proceeds, I wish to endorse what my hon. friend says. I think architects should be in a higher category.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I propose striking out those four lines altogether so that these classes will be located in the grade that appears suitable. It is rather a mistake that the words occur there. I move to strike out the following lines: In these last three grades shall also be included photographers, engrossers, draftsmen, architect's assistants, technical assistants and such other employees as the Governor in Council may direct;

Mr. McMASTER: Before the amendment carries, may I ask the minister where he proposes to put these technical folk? I suppose they will have to be in some grade.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They will apply to some grade in either of the divisions, whichever appears to be the proper grade. I wish also to strike out lines three and four of section 45, "Technical officers and persons possessing professional or other special technical knowledge and experience." As the Bill now stands, these are put immediately under "Deputy Heads." I propose that they shall go under the First Division where they were before.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I move that the words "deputy ministers" in the 23rd line, page 16, be changed to "deputy heads", and that the words "professional, technical" be inserted after the word "administrative" in the 24th line.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Translators, I understand, are classified in the First Division, Grade D. Translators are technical officers, requiring expert knowledge and experience, and they should be put in Class C.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They would not be put there by legislation. It would be a matter of proper classification to put them there if their services should be considered professional or technical.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I remind my hon. friend that in a memorandum submitted by Sir Allen Aylesworth some years ago, the conclusion was reached that translators should be considered as technical experts.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I should think so.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

On section 46—Salaries:

Mr. MURPHY: Is the word "technical" defined in the Act?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No. We discussed that matter the other evening. I said that I did not think the word was capable of definition and that if we attemped to define it we might get into difficuly. The words "professional and technical" are used in the Civil Service Acts of most other countries; apparently they have been unable to improve upon them.

Mr. MURPHY: I do not agree that it is impossible to define it. Some difficulty may be encountered if a definition is made, but there has been a great deal of abuse of the provision for the appointment of professional and technical officers. Appointments have been made under that head of people who possess absolutely no technical qualifications.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The old Act has the words "or otherwise peculiar"; consequently there was opportunity of abusing the powers under the Act. These words have been struck out, and the section now applies only to purely professional and technical officers.

Mr. MURPHY: I assure my hon. friend that several appointments which I have in mind were "otherwise peculiar." If difficulty be experienced in defining the word "technical," I suggest, through my hon. friend, to the commission that in the regulations which they will draft, and which may make the Act more practical in its application and more flexible in its use, this matter be not lost sight of, because undoubtedly there has been great abuse of appointments under this head. I cited the other night the famous case that held up the business of the country for a week or two, when the question was discussed whether a military tailor should be considered as a technical officer.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Technical officers should be in Grade A; that would remedy the difficulty. We dispense with examination in these cases because the officers in question are of high standing as professional experts.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Some technical men have higher ranks in the service than others; it would hardly do to put them all in one grade.

Mr. DAVIS: In what grade will the man be classified who gets $3,450?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In Grade A, First Division.

Mr. DAVIS: Should the classification of the grades not read: "$2,900 and under $3,500;" "$2,200 and under $2,900," and so on? Would that not make it plainer?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Section 45 establishes the divisions and the grades, and describes the class of work assigned to each; this section prescribes the salary in each division and grade. I do not see how we could improve on the present arrangement. An increase of $100 is provided in the case of promotion from one grade to another.

Mr. MORPHY: How does the acting minister justify the provision of only $600 a year for messengers, porters, sorters and packers? This is another case where the under dog is being neglected. I have talked with the messengers about here from time to time, and I find that a quiet feeling of—

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Unrest.

Mr. MORPHY: My hon. friend calls it "unrest." At any rate, in these days, when we talk of billions with a glib tongue, and with the price of bacon running up to 50 cents and 60 cents per pound, it is hard to understand how a messenger who has a wife and five, six, or seven children to support can get along on $600, $700, or $800 a year. Let us get a little democracy into this enactment. How can the Government justify paying a messenger who is married and has four or five children, $600 a year?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: As a matter of fact, I would think that messengers who had been married and been in the Service for a number of years would probably be getting the higher salaries. The salary of $600 would be paid to the young boy or young man, most likely unmarried, on entering the service.

Mr. MORPHY: And the returned soldier. I see some of the recently appointed employees are returned soldiers. Are you going to start men who have fought for their country at $600? What I protest against is that the rule should be hard-and-fast. When there are so many positions to be filled, a man who has fought the battles of his country is going to ask for a decent job at a decent wage, and the country wants to give that to him. If a man has been in the service for some time and has not fought for his country, he gets $1,200; but a man from the front, crippled, perhaps gassed, but still fit to do an honest year's service, should be given $1,000 a year, and you should not let him wait for the period of his death to reach up from $600 to $1,000 by the grace of somebody. The point I wish to impress is this: If you do not do it in any other way, do not fix the minimum at $600, but start at $900.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We can start at $800.

Mr. MORPHY: This is a difficult Bill to understand, but I see $600 set as the minimum. I see some of these returned soldiers upstairs. They are bright young men; they have gone through the agonies of war, and yet they are employed by a grateful country at a salary—unless the commission has its attention drawn to the matter—of $600. It is not fair. Far too much attention is paid in this country to the fellows getting $5,000, $7,000, $10,000 a year and too little to the man who has fought for his country.

Mr. MURPHY: Without joining issue with my hon. friend in any respect, I may say that under section 12 there is a possibility of appointing a man in that grade at an increase of $200 above the minimum.

Mr. COWAN: I quite agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Morphy). I do not think Canada is so nearly dead broke that we need ask any man to work for less than $800 a year, and a man who works for less than $800 a year is not worth very much, unless, he is driven to take such a position. Some years ago I had the handling of what is called the "patronage" in the constituency of Regina, and in that connection it was my duty to recommend many men for positions in the post office and other places. There are quite a number of those officers who start at $725 a year, and I have never yet succeeded in getting a good man at that salary. Those men would quickly tell me that they could make more money than that by working on the streets of Regina, and that is true. We had to accept a poor class of men, and we endeavoured to make good men by taking a poor class and gradually working them up into permanent positions. I would like to see a minimum salary fixed of not less than $800 a year to start with in all the services in the Dominion.

Mr. NESBITT: It is not necessary for those men to start at $600. In grade C, $600 to $1,000, it is in the discretion of the commission to say what the salary shall be. There are in the Service certain branches in which young men may be employed who might very well be started at $600, and then they would be receiving more money than they could earn in other walks of life. For instance, boys in the banks do not start at $600. Boys who go into the retail mercantile service or even the wholesale mercantile service do not start at $600; they have to work up. As my hon. friend (Mr. Cowan) has said, he has often recommended people to take positions, and they would rather work at some other job than take those positions. There is nothing to compel any of those persons to accept positions in the Civil Service. This leaves it optional with the commission to say what salary shall be paid, and I have no doubt, in the case of men who have been overseas, no commission will ask them, if they are capable of filling the position to which they are appointed, to start at $600 a year. There are in the Civil Service many positions in which people are well paid,—and think they are well paid—at $600. I remember at one time a very young man, who was drawing $800 a year in one of the departments, applying to me to see if I could not get him a raise. In answer to a question he told me he had held his position for a year. I knew for a fact that, although he was a capable young man, he could not possibly command that salary in the banking or mercantile service anywhere in Canada. He was being better paid than he would be in any other walk of life that I knew of. He was anxious enough, when he first got the position, to accept it at $800 a year. If it was necessary for everybody to start at $600, I would quite agree with my hon. friends that the minimum should be increased, but $600 might be quite acceptable in regard to certain positions in the service.

Mr. COWAN: That is all right, but the service itself is suffering. There are in the Regina post office some sixteen vacancies, and men cannot be got to fill them, and girls will not accept the salaries paid by the Government. The result is that business is not being done, and that unless we are prepared to start those 9 p.m. young men at higher salaries we shall not get them at all, with the cost of living and everything else increasing as it is. The minimum salary should be much higher than it is.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I quite agree with the hon. gentleman who advocated making the minimum salary more than $600. Such a salary is a shame. There has been some sacrifice entailed in the education of any young man, however young he may be, and in large centres, such as the city of Montreal, any labouring man receives more than $600,—it is not even the wage of an apprentice at the present time. The Government should reconsider the matter so far as the big centres are concerned, where it costs so much to live. Generally speaking, those young men are supporting their mothers or fathers. Why say that a young man should not, because he is young, be paid just as much as a man of middle age? Sometimes he is doing as much work, and perhaps more, than older people. The minimum salary should be $800. In the city of Montreal you cannot secure help unless you pay $2.50, $3 or $4 a day, and yet the Government starts those young men at $600.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I heartily support the suggestion of the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy). The whole class should be increased very materially, and so far as the soldiers are concerned, the language used was very moderate. It is a shame that we should start them at such a low salary. There cannot be any salary paid commensurate with the sacrifices they have made. In whatever class they are put, it is the duty of this country to see that they commence at a proper salary.

Mr. BLAKE: Evidently those gentlemen are talking for Hansard. As the Acting Minister of Finance has pointed out, an extra $200 may be added to the $600, and that is more than many of the school teachers in this country are getting to-day. There are very few school teachers in the rural schools of Ontario, and they pay bigger salaries than the city schools, who are drawing more than $650 to-day.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Is the hon. gentleman talking for Hansard?

Mr. BLAKE: These stenographers who start in after a three month's business course do not stop at $600. They are getting much better salaries than the school teachers of this country. The Toronto Globe, for instance, two or three months before last midsummer, carried two or three columns every day of advertisements for teachers, with a second class certificate, at a salary of $500 to $700. I think we should leave it to the commission to decide each case on its merits and if they think a man's training justifies them in granting an extra $200 he will receive it. A school teacher has to spend a much longer time in study than a stenographer, and paying her way during all that time.

Mr. MORPHY: I do not put the returned soldier on the same basis as the civilian school teacher, and I do not think it is right for the hon. gentleman to do so. When these men left this country to fight the battles of the Empire the whole country in an ebullition of popular feeling bade them Godspeed and a safe return, and promised that the country's last dollar would be spent in making them comfortable when they came home. Talk about school teachers! Why, one commission connected with the Trade Department of this Government got an Order in Council put through the other day to employ thirty-eight stenographers in Ottawa at $1,200 a year each. I think the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Blake) is a military man himself and did some good service, and surely he should stand up for his brother soldier and see that he gets treated in a decent way—I do not say in a generous way, but we should at least provide him with what a man ordinarily requires to live on. I am prepared to move that a special clause be inserted on page 17 limiting grade "C" of the second division to the returned soldier who has seen active service in France.

Mr. STEVENS: What about other fronts?

Mr. MORPHY: And on other fronts. I would not apply this provision to soldiers who have only been to England, although many of them may be deserving. I beg to move that a special clause be inserted limiting grade "C" of the second division to returned soldiers who have done duty overseas, except those who have remained in England, and that the minimum salary be $900 and the maximum $1,500, instead of $600 and $1,000 respectively.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would point out that by section 46 the maximum of this grade is increased by $200, compared with the salary under the old Act. I would also call attention to section 12.

Mr. MORPHY: I do not think that is doing much for the soldier, when we remember that there is now a tax on tea and coffee and that the price of bacon and all other articles of food has gone up. I am rather surprised that the Acting Minister of Finance takes that view. Section 12 does not grant an increase of $200; it only gives the commission power to grant it if they see fit. Now, I do not wish to see the returned soldier at the mercy even of the Civil Service Commission, or of the minister or the deputy head. I would like to see this Parliament bold enough to toe the mark and say that the soldier has earned a decent wage, and we should make provision for him here in the Act.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I rather like the idea of embodying the suggestion in the statute, because we all remember that at the outbreak of the war, with a view to inducing civil servants to join the colours, an Order in Council was passed promising civil servants who enlisted both their military and civil pay; but only a few weeks ago the Government cancelled that Order in Council and went back on the solemn pledge they gave to the men who left Canada. I say it was a shame and dishonourable to break a solemn pledge in that way.

Mr. WIGMORE: It is true the commission have power to give an additional $200, but I do not like leaving it to the commission or even to the minister. I think Parliament should have courage enough to come forward boldly and say, "We want this thing arranged in this very way." The amount we are offering to the returned soldier is not large enough. The only positions that are open to him are messengerships and positions of that sort carrying only a small salary. Many of these returned soldiers were earning very much bigger salaries before they left Canada, but now through wounds or disablement they have to take these lower-salaried positions with $600 or $800 to start with. I would support an amendment that the minimum salary for the returned soldier be $1,000, and that would only be carrying out to a very small extent the pledge we gave to these boys when they left our shores. Many of them to-day are walking the streets of our towns and cities because there are not enough positions to go around. I think we should redeem our pledge to them at least to the extent of giving them a minimum salary of $1,000, and I beg to move accordingly.

Mr. MANION: I would like to make a couple of points. One is in regard to what the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Blake) said. I notice in the House that whenever an hon. member takes a stand in regard to keeping down expenses somebody stands up and says that he is taking a whack at the returned soldier. I do not think that is playing the game. I do not think that the hon. member for North Winnipeg took any whack in any shape or form at the returned soldier. I did not hear him say anything that reflected in any way upon the returned soldier. I happen to be a returned soldier myself and if he had said anything at which I could have taken offence I would have done so. This thing is being carried to an excess in this country. I believe we are getting hysterical about people taking whacks at returned soldiers. That is one point that I desire to make. The other point is this: I have sat in this House and heard a good many hon. members hitting at the soldier who has not got beyond England. I may speak upon that because I got beyond England myself. I wish to say, in justice to the man who has not got beyond England, that many good men have not got beyond England because they could not help themselves. After a man gets to England he is turned over to the overseas military authorities and he cannot say where he shall go. It took me seven months of hard work, breaking orders and ignoring rules in order to make myself so useless in England that I would be sent to France. If I had not done that I would have stayed in England and been one of those despised men who stay in England. A great many of the men who stay in England do just as hard work as the majority of those who go to France. There are a great many men in France who are sixty miles behind the firing line and they are just as safe as if they were sitting in this House of Parliament.

Mr. NESBITT: What about the long-range guns?

Mr. MANION: They could shoot to England just as well as they could shoot to the bases in France. I think there should be a little more justice done by hon. members to the man who goes to England and who probably does his best to get to France but does not succeed in getting across.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This is a Civil Service Act and we are basing the salaries in the Act upon the theory that we are merely creating a Civil Service. It is quite true that many of these positions should go to returned soldiers. But inevitably a great many of these positions will be filled by persons who are not returned soldiers. I would think that a boy of fourteen or fifteen who happened to be a messenger, packer or sorter and was getting $700 or $800, was doing very well indeed. True, that sum may not be a fair reward to the returned soldier of older age, and perhaps with a family. However, I do not say that the suggestion is not worthy of consideration, but I want to point out that an amendment is not possible now to increase the minimum or maximum in that division. That would require a fresh resolution to be placed on the Order Paper, and it would have to be assented to by His Excellency the Governor General. I have no doubt that all these matters in reference to the returned soldiers will have to receive due consideration by the Government in the early future.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There is no compulsion to force people into the Civil Service, and consequently I would not be in favour of having the minimum salary too low. But I do think that the amendment that was moved in regard to the returned soldier has something to justify it. We have heard a great deal about the returned soldier, the generous treatment that he has received, and should receive. We discussed that question earlier in connection with this Bill. The fact that the returned soldiers are not represented in the personnel of the commission justifies the criticism that is offered of this measure and the endeavour to provide all the safeguards that are necessary to ensure that they shall receive the treatment that they are entitled to. The hon. member for St. James (Mr. L. A. Lapointe) pointed out the difficulties that people living in large cities, such as Montreal, experienced in trying to live on less than $1,000 a year. When I heard the hon. gentleman make those remarks I could not help but think of all the people in this country who never see $1,000 from one year's end to the other, and who are labouring hard in order to secure a living for themselves and their families. That is particularly true of a certain class who are engaged in the public service. I refer to the rural mail carriers. These people have been taking contracts and delivering the mail year after year at a salary such as is not mentioned in the Civil Service list at all. I would just like to contrast the position of these public servants with that of the people who have a wall of protection all around them, whose hours of labour are regulated, who are superannuated in their old age and who receive much more generous treatment than those who are engaged in this branch of the public service to which I refer.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I recognize very fully the unpopularity that one is likely to invite if he says one word that might be construed as not boosting the returned soldier. Yet the Government have a solemn duty to perform in a matter of this kind. I will not take backwater from any member of this House in my persistent devotion to the cause of the returned soldier. I recognize quite as much as the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) what this country owes to the men who have gone to the trenches thousands and tens of thousands of whom have laid down their lives and hundreds of thousands of whom have fought for the liberty that I enjoy. We all recognize that. But, I know how easy it is to be a demagogue in reference to this question. I want to say a word in reference to my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Blake) who had the temerity to stand up and plead for a fair deal in the interest of the country. He gets the retort that he is going back on the returned soldier. I have known my hon. friend from North Winnipeg a great many years, and I can tell those who wish to reflect upon him that there is no physician in the city of Winnipeg, and I believe no physician in the Dominion of Canada, who has done more than he has in his way for the returned soldier and the returned soldier's child and family. But he does not talk about it. He is too decent a man to refer to that in this House. He is willing to stand up and face the danger of the cry "You are not fair to the returned soldier" in pleading that this country has some interest that must be kept in mind. The Government is doing the best it can in reference to these salaries. It is not necessary for returned soldiers to be given just $600. The commission has the option of giving them more.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Up to $1,200.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Up to $1,200. Probably there will be very few returned soldiers who would care to accept a menial position at $800. But some soldiers with a pension of $600 or $700 or $800, might do very well with that amount of money. But if you throw the throttle open wide and say that the returned soldier must start in at $1,000 or $1,200, this country is going to feel it in the long run. We have got the taxes piling up at an enormous rate, and while I intend to see that justice is done to the returned soldier the representatives in this House have some other duties to perform. They have to see that this country is protected. I appeal to hon. gentlemen. Sometimes I have said that I am pleased that I am growing old and will soon pass off this stage.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I would ask hon. members to hear my reason. It is that I fear that we will have the cry dinned into us for the next fifteen, twenty or thirty years, nothing but the returned soldier. God bless the returned soldier, we will try to do justice to him, but let us be fair to the country itself, and let us not be swept off our feet by the voice of the demagogue constantly crying out, "The returned soldier!"

Mr. MORPHY: I cannot quite appreciate the minister's position in saying that we must have a special resolution before we can do what is proposed. I apprehend that the whole of section 46 is subject to amendment. If it is not so, I do not know where parliamentary practice comes in. Does the minister say we cannot knock out the whole clause if we like?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: A motion may be made to reduce expenditure, but a proposal which involves an increase must be initiated by a resolution, accompanied by the consent of the Governor General. My hon. friend will remember that this very Bill was introduced by a resolution, solely because it involved an expenditure of money.

Mr. MORPHY: Very well, there is a very simple remedy. Let us take $1,000 off Grade A and another $500 off Grade B. Then we can raise the pay of the returned soldier from $900 to $1,500. Then we will not commit a breach of the constitution.

My hon. friend is specious in his arguments, and if I may be allowed to use the expression, there appears to be subterfuge, to which my hon. friend is not prone. In regard to the hon. member for Springfie'd (Mr. Richardson) seeking to impugn other people's motives, I want to tell him, and tell you, Mr. Chairman, that I never was more earnest in anything in my life than when I rose to-night to try to do something if I could that would compel the Government to make decent provision for men who are back from the front. I know of men that are back here who, to use a slang phrase, are on their uppers. Many of them have not got the means to come to Ottawa, others who are here are out of employment, knocking at the door of the Government, and yet grumbling at the fact that the Government have nothing to offer them. I am no demagogue, Mr. Chairman, I want you to understand that when I take up a case of this kind I take it up from conscientious conviction. What I said on a previous occasion is true, this Government has always been very prolific in its salaries to the "big guns" of the country. There is Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, who has drawn the sum of $17,500. There is Professor Macallum of Toronto University, the chairman of some scientific research committee, whom nobody has ever heard of, nobody knows what he has ever done, or what benefit he has been to the country, and yet he is getting the sum of $10,000. I read a list of salaries here the other night which ranged from $10,000 down to $6,000. Never a kick about that; but the moment a man stands up to make an ordinary plea, free from demagogism, for the returned soldier, he is met by a gentleman who shouts, "wolf, wolf!" I want to give the member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Blake) the credit for having done good service, and if that hon. gentleman had something said to him it was because he impugned other members' motives, and accused them of talking for Hansard. I do not have to talk for Hansard, Mr. Chairman, and I resent that sort of talk. I am going to move my amendment, and I am going to put it to the vote of the committee. I am going to move that the higher grade be reduced and that we raise grade C in the Third Division so that instead of being from $600 to $1,200, it shall be from $1,000 to $1,500.

Mr. KEEFER: The trouble with the Civil Service, as I understand the matter, is not the amount at which we start anybody, but the amount that we are paying those who have been rendering efficient service to the public but are carried off into other avenues of employment. The difficulty has been the leakage from the Service of the good men at the top. It would be a terrible mistake, in my judgment, to attempt to reduce the salaries that are paid to those in the Civil Service, who, by their experience, their talents and by their faithful service, have earned higher and better stipends. Those are the men that we want to keep, but, unfortunately, they are continually leaving the public service, to be promptly engaged by private corporations. What inducement have you got to offer to a clever young university man? Is it the $600 salary at the bottom, or the $5,000 salary at the top. Never dream for a moment of reducing higher salaries, but rather increase them if possible so as to hold your good men. A salary of $600 is quite ample for messengers, porters, and employees of that class to start with, and they can climb to the $1,200 as in proposed clause. Some reference has been made to the Food Control Office, with which I happen to be connected, and some persons have talked about stenographers being paid $1,200 a year in that department. I think there is only one stenographer who is getting $1,200 a year, our practice being to start them at $50 or $60 a month, and as they progress and show their worth to increase their salaries. I agree that we should not play fast and loose with the public money. We should not start the minor officials at high salaries; if they prove their worth they will rapidly rise. I do not want to say anything about the question of the returned soldier, a subject which has been harped on too much, although I may say I have been elected by the returned soldier, and I believe in him. It is not necessary for us to say anything for the returned soldier here, because we all know and appreciate his worth.

Mr. DEVLIN: How much does the hon. gentleman say the stenographers in the food control office are getting?

Mr. KEEFER: It has been said several times that the stenographers are paid $1,200. To my knowledge there is but one, who, for good reasons, is being paid $100 per month, the best one in the office.

Mr. DEVLIN: What about the others?

Mr. KEEFER: The others start from $50 to $60 a month. There have been a lot of misstatements indulged in with respect to the food control office, but we have not thought it worth while to refer to them. We are endeavouring to run that office on a business basis, promoting from time to time those of the employees who have served efficiently and faithfully. Some of the officials that have come in from the outside have been referred to. My hon. friend from Wright (Mr. Devlin) spoke of a gentleman coming in from Eaton's who is being paid $2,400 a year. Quite true, the gentleman was brought from Eaton's. We had to establish regulations with respect to the export and import licenses, and six men were sent to us as volunteers. One of them was getting $2,400, and we kept him on in the license department. However, this is not dealing with the subject matter under discussion. As I have already said, I think that $600 is ample for persons to start with in the minor positions, such as messengers.

Mr. DEVLIN: I find in a return brought down that there is a page full of stenographers who are not paid at the rate of $50 or $60 a month. I will take the very first page I come to, I do not care to give the names.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: In what office?

Mr. DEVLIN: The food control office. The first is a stenographer getting $950; the next a young lady getting $1,000; the next one, a married woman, getting $1,100; the next a young lady stenographer getting $950, another at $950; and another at $1,000.

Mr. MORPHY: In what department?

Mr. DEVLIN: The food control office, to which my hon. friend alluded. I see the following amounts also, all to young ladies $1,000, $950, $1,000 and $1,000. Would my hon. friend like me to go on?

Mr. KEEFER: Are any of them paid $1,200? That is the statement that was challenged.

Mr. MORPHY: If the hon. gentleman will permit me what I said was not that. What I said was that an Order in Council had recently been passed permitting that board to employ 38 stenographers up to a maximum of $1,200.

Mr. KEEFER: That is quite correct.

Mr. BLAKE: Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DEVLIN: I have not finished.

Mr. LEMIEUX: You have a long list.

Mr. DEVLIN: It is too long to read tonight; I would not take the time to read it in committee. I find in this return that there is a chairman——

Mr. KEEFER: Are there any $1,200 stenographers?

Mr. DEVLIN: Do you want me to look over the whole list again?

Mr. KEEFER: See if there are.

Mr. DEVLIN: Yes, I see one right away. My eye falls upon one; she gets $1,200.

Mr. KEEFER: Are there any more?

Mr. DEVLIN: But I must add, in justice to my hon. friend, that her appointment is only temporary, and that she is also a cartoonist. Would my hon. friend now like me to read the salaries of the $5,000, $4,500 and $3,500 men in that return

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I am sorry, but I cannot allow the hon. gentleman to accommodate his hon. friend.

Mr. BLAKE: Before we leave this clause—

Mr. DEVLIN: I have not finished. I did not want to give my hon. friend any more information, Mr. Chairman, though I have bushels of it here. What I did really want to say, if my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Blake) will allow me—and it will prevent my having to take the floor again,—is this: I find that the big salaries are paid to those who are appointed by Order in Council, and do not fall under the Civil Service at all. They are paid, I have no doubt, in proportion to the service they render, and I do not want to find fault with any of these appointments; I do not know them; I do not know the personnel; neither do I want to underestimate the personnel. But the salaries of those who come under the second division, and in fact the salaries of a good many of those in the first division, seem to me away below the mark. The cost of living has been going up so rapidly for so many years that I think the acting minister might try to put the poor people in the service on a little bit better footing to earn a living. He will remember that Sir George Murray, in his report to the Government some years ago, recommended that the maximum salary of the class which is now styled grade A of the second division was to be $1,800. It is still $1,500, although years have elapsed and the cost of living has gone on increasing. I would be the last man in the House wishing to burden the list of expenditures, but we must be just in all cases. And the poor man who is forced to work for his living, whether within or without the Government, should be alloted a salary that will permit him to live. I have had men come to me, who had worked in the service for sixteen years, with their overcoats practically threadbare. Men have come to me who had married on the assumption that they would be able to live on the increase of $50 a year, but who found themselves very much in debt. I want to say to the minister again this year, as I have done in years gone by, that I strongly recommend an increase.

Mr. BLAKE: Before we leave this section, under that rule which was put through some time ago and which was placed on Hansard, I would beg to retract what I said in my first sentence, that nothing may go out derogatory to any hon. gentleman.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Nobody misunderstood the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BUREAU: In section 45 the divisions are established and in these divisions there are stenographers, typewriters, etc. In section 46 salaries are determined for the same divisions. In the Department of Justice and other departments I know men employed as stenographers who are now getting $1,600 a year. That salary would put them in the first division, but according to the position they occupy, under section 45, they would be placed in the Second Division. I may be anticipating, but for the purpose of the answer which I want to get, I must read section 48, subsection (2), which says:

> There shall be no promotion from the second division to the first division and there shall be no promotion from the third division.

According to section 45, stenographers are placed in the Second Division, where the maximum salary under section 46 is $1,500. These men drawing $1,600 would be placed in the First Division according to section 46, but according to their classification as stenographers they apparently are not entitled to be placed in that division and under section 48 there are to be no promotions. I want to know how these men would be classified and where they will be put. Will their salaries be reduced or will they be put in the First Division?

Mr. TWEEDIE: In regard to the matter of salaries of the lower grade employees, I agree to a certain extent with the suggestion made by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy), and with that made by the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin). Of course, the suggestion made by the hon. member for Perth is open to this difficulty. If we limit the payment of increased wages to the men who have returned from overseas then we shall have two members of the same class of civil servants working side by side performing the same duties, one receiving a salary of $300 a year higher than the other. If we follow that suggestion out to its logical conclusion, we would have the wives of men who had been killed at the front entering the Civil Service; they would not come under the class of returned men. The wife of a soldier who has been killed at the front would be obliged to work at a salary $300 less than that paid to a soldier who had been spared his life and had returned. The son or daughter of a man who had been killed at the front would be compelled to work side by side with the returned man at a much lower salary than the returned man was receiving. If we base this legislation on purely sympathetic grounds, the sympathy should be extended to the widows and orphans of the men who have been killed overseas, and following out the argument of the member for North Perth, such persons as I have mentioned should receive higher wages than men who return from the front. The Dominion Government should not employ men at a lower wage than they are entitled to receive. The Government is the largest corporation in Canada and cannot afford to treat its employees any less generously than any private corporation treats its employees. No married man, no woman with children to support, should be employed in the service of this or any other corporation at a wage on which it is impossible properly to maintain himself or herself and family. We should have great consideration for the younger generation; we should see that children are brought up in good surroundings and are given a good education. We should not ask men to perform a service for the country at a low wage in order that taxes may be kept down; we should adjust our scale of wages as do the large railway corporations and manufacturing industries. Unless these people enter the Service in the capacity of apprentices, we should give them a sufficient wage to enable them to live decently and comfortably, and if our doing so makes additional taxation necessary, then that taxation should be imposed. Without supporting his resolution, I join the member for North Perth in his suggestion that the Government endeavour to provide that the minimum salaries of these lower-grade employees be higher than is provided in this section of the Bill, and that no able-bodied married man be asked to work for the Government at less than $750 a year.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I should like to know more of the facts before I pass an opinion on the particular case referred to by my hon. friend (Mr. Bureau). I think he will find that rather than being merely a stenographer, the person to whom he referred had been promoted to some higher grade. However, the latter part of section 46 protects that person, at least for the present. It says:

Provided, however, that, until the Inside Service is re-organized under the provisions of section ten of this Act, the classification and salaries heretofore prescribed and paid shall continue in force with respect to all officers, clerks and employees appointed before the date of this Act.

Mr. BUREAU: Suppose a man entered a department as a stenographer and worked up to $1,600 a year. Section 45 says that he shall come under the Second Division. Section 48 says that there shall be no promotion from the Second to the First Division. Section 46 provides that the maximum salary of the Second Division shall be $1,500. My hon. friend says that this official will get $1,600 until the reorganization is effected, but nothing in the Act says that when the reorganization is effected he will be given any higher classification than that of stenographer.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What division was this person in?

Mr. BUREAU: I do not know, but he had reached the maximum of his class, $1,600.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: He may be promoted to the next division.

Mr. BUREAU: Section 48 says that there shall be no promotion from the Second to the First Division.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The old Second Division is now the Third.

Mr. BUREAU: Section 45 provides that the Second Division, Grade B, shall consist of clerks and employees who work under supervision, and of stenographers and typewriters. This means that by statute the official to whom I have referred is classified in the Second Division, Grade B, the maximum salary of which is fixed by section 46 at $1,500. Where is this man to stand when the reorganization is effected?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Section 10, subsection 5 provides that this Act shall not prejudically affect the status of any officer now in the service.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: If hon. members who are supporting the proposal for an increase in the minimum salaries to civil servants can suggest a way by which that proposal can be properly carried out, it will have my support. When the estimates are before the House, I shall be ready to urge upon the minister to grant increases to all those poorly paid officials, but I am ready to take the risk of saying that I do not think it is in the interest of the Civil Service or the returned soldier that the amendment of the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) should be adopted. For us to set two scales of remuneration all through the different classes of the Civil Service or the public service, one scale for the civilian who has not been overseas and another scale for the soldier who returns from overseas, will create a condition that will not be for the good of the returned soldier. I am ready to go further and say, with the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson), that we are devoting too much of our time to a consideration of what the returned soldier is going to get when he enters the Civil Service. There will be four or five hundred thousand returned soldiers, and we cannot jam them all into the Civil Service. My opinion is that we shall be doing what is ultimately in the best interest of the returned soldier if we direct our attention more to getting him back into civil life in some position into which he can fit, and, if possible, in the work which he was doing before he went overseas. If we get into our mind that the Government have to find positions for all the returned soldiers, it is inevitable that we shall be trying to drive a lot of square plugs into round holes and vice versa, and we shall ultimately get the returned soldier into a position for which he will curse us. I am not afraid of being classed amongst those who are,—if you will permit me to use the term—batting the returned soldier. I am not advertising my feelings towards the returned soldier. They are just as genuine as those of any other hon. member, and I am just as intensely interested in the men who are overseas. But I repeat: We are placing the returned soldier in a false and invidious position when we are constantly harping on the necessity of the Government putting him into some position for which he is not fitted. Let us, if we can, devote our attention to getting the returned soldiers back into the class of work for which they are fitted, getting it into their minds that the whole four or five hundred thousand soldiers cannot be put into this class of positions, and that if the country is to carry on, there must be a levelling up and getting the returned soldiers into the class of work they can do. Any returned soldier in whom I am interested will never be urged by me to take a position under this or any other Government. I shall try to get him into a position for which he is fitted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Does the hon. member think a returned soldier could discharge the duties of a member of the commission?

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I have not the slightest doubt that a returned soldier could be found who could discharge the duties of any man on this commission or any other commission, of any man in this country. That is not the point at all, and the hon. member has not put me the least little bit up a tree when he asks me that question. There are returned soldiers capable of doing anything that can be done in this country, but we are not going to assist in getting them into those positions by discussing whether we shall set one scale of wages for the returned soldier and another for the civilian, with the idea that we are going to force returned soldiers into positions for which they are not fitted. We shall be doing the best thing in the interest of the returned soldier if we devote our attention to finding out what he is capable of doing and getting him into that position, whether it be in the Civil Service or in some other walk of life. If possible, we should get him into the position in which he was before he went overseas, and we should get it into the heart and mind of the returned soldier that that is going to be his ultimate destiny and in his own interest. The worst thing that can happen to the returned soldier is the idea that we are going to pauperise them, and everything contained in the discussion that takes place in regard to the Government taking care of the returned soldier simply means that we are going to make wards or paupers of them as if they were not independent men.

10 p.m.

Mr. CURRIE: I cannot let the remarks of the hon. member (Mr. G. B. Nicholson) pass without a word of protest. I am a returned soldier and a member of the Returned Soldiers' Association. I refrained from saying a word on the debate with reference to the returned soldier, because I thought the discussion was reaching limits that perhaps some of the hon. members who spoke would regret later on. Most of the hon. gentlemen who have opposed anything with respect to the returned soldier owe their seats in this House to the returned soldier and to the soldier, and they should have regard to their electorate. Let us look at this question candidly and clearly. About a year ago the Government passed an Order in Council whereby all positions in the Civil Service were to go to returned soldiers, except in the case of men who were unfit for military service. At that time military service was for men between the ages of eighteen and forty-five. Since then there has been a change in the regulations, and only men in the first category are excluded from positions. The Government has settled that. Eighty or ninety per cent of the returned soldiers, after the war, will have just as sound and clear brains and will be physically as sound as my hon. friend, if not much more so. They will not be looking for Government jobs. They will not be and are not the parties that we can put into the Civil Service. The men who desire to be put into the Civil Service are those poor unfortunates who have been disabled, many of whom have left situations carrying salaries of four or five thousand dollars a year—and I know a number who are older than the hon. gentleman, who left good positions and went to the war, and many of whom are still serving in the war. I know men of sixty years of age who left good positions in which they were drawing $3,000 or $4,000 a year, and who have been serving in the trenches constantly day and night since they went overseas. In many cases those men come home wounded, and their wounds and injuries are of such a character that they are unable on their return to take up the positions that they previously occupied. I know one man, for instance, who used to earn a large salary as a moulder. He has only about one-quarter of a lung left owing to German gas. I know a man who was a surveyor on railway construction work, a man of high attainments. One of his legs is now one and one-half inches shorter than it formerly was and the other is two and one-half inches shorter, so that he is lame and unable to go around. This man must seek some other occupation because he could not take the same place as he had before. The idea of the Government, and that of anyone who has in his heart a soft spot for the returned soldier, is that the Civil Service shall be for those men whose efficiency has been impaired. Hon. members say that a civil servant should be one hundred per cent efficient. This returned soldier is unable to take up his old position and he is only efficient to the extent of forty or fifty per cent. A returned soldier may have lost an arm, but still he may be capable of filling a position at a desk in the Civil Service and doing his duties just as well as a man who has all his limbs and faculties. It is those men for whom we want positions, not for returned soldiers like my robust hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion), who has just returned from the front.

We must get the injured man a position, and his wife and family must be looked after, and no man to-day can look after himself, let alone a family, on much less than $1,000 a year. I think it is only right that we should raise the minimum salary for the soldier. I do not want to give details, but I know of sad cases of soldiers with large families to look after who have been disabled by service at the front and have had to take positions in the Civil Service at $600 a year, and that is the limit that pretty nearly all of them are getting. To that is added a pension of $150 or $200 a year, or $600 if the man is totally disabled. No matter what a man's attainments might be, if he has served as a private he only gets a portion of a private's full pay when he is disabled. I say he must have something beyond that pension, and while I do not want to be considered as making a raid upon the treasury on behalf of the returned soldier, when the next election comes they may be able to look after themselves and possibly attend to those who have looked after them, but in the meantime when we are dealing with an Act that is supposed to do something for the returned soldier we should see to it that he gets the first call for the higher-salaried positions as well as the lower. If you are going to give the returned soldier a position, give him a salary that he can live on and bring up his family, a salary that will not keep him in a state of continuous poverty. This country ought to be ashamed of itself. I saw a list to-night of about two hundred names of men who have been in the public service for years, many of them in the city of Toronto in the Customs, Inland Revenue, and other departments, none of whom had ever got more than $800 or $900 a year. That used to be a fortune thirty years ago, and it was a large sum before the war, but things have moved very swiftly since and everything has gone up in price; wheat is now three and four times the price it was before the war. We must meet the situation in some way. I repeat, I do not want to raid the treasury; I do not want more than is fair and right for the returned soldier; but I do not want to hear the returned soldier reviled in this House and told he has no more rights than the ordinary member of a labour union. I say that he has more than the member of a labour union. I know where the attack on the returned soldier comes from and we will attend to that when the proper time comes. I say it ill becomes any man who sits in this House as a returned soldier's candidate, a man who has received the votes of returned soldiers, to stand up and say they have no rights and should have no privileges, that they should be pauperized, and that they have no special privileges coming to them more than to the ordinary individual. I trust we have heard enough on this subject, and I almost feel inclined to say to the minister, let us pass on to the next order of business, and by the time the Bill is ready for its third reading the minister may have thought out a way of meeting the situation.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I am not going to permit the hon. member to insinuate that I reviled the returned soldier or that I said he was not worthy of the same treatment as a member of a labour union. I can tell the hon. member and all other members of this House that I am quite willing to have the returned soldiers and the soldiers overseas judge me by the manner in which I have treated them. I have stood on the floor of this House and said what I have said because I feel we are not doing the best for the returned soldier or for any other soldier when we undertake to set up such a standard as the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) would set up by his amendment, whereby the returned soldier would be given a position at a higher rate of wages than the man who is working alongside of him. The returned soldier does not want that. If the salary of the civil servant is not sufficiently high for the returned soldier, that is an entirely different question.

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) after dealing with this question to his own satisfaction, suggested the advisability of passing on to another item. This is not the first time he has thought in this House that everything had been said on a question when he had concluded his speech. There are others, however, who hold views on this matter, and while I was not privileged to be in the House this afternoon when this matter was being discussed, I have been here since eight o'clock and I have heard nothing said that could be construed by any person whose brain was in normal condition of health to be an attack on the returned soldier. As a member of this House who recognizes his responsibility to his constituents, I believe that every member of this House, whether or not it has been his privilege to tread the soil of France and do his part overseas—and that is a great privilege in my estimation—and whether sitting to the right or the left of the Chair, is desirous of doing his duty to the returned soldier and giving him more than a fair share. I had understood, since the Government made their announcement that the returned soldier was to get the preference in appointments to the Civil Service, that we had to take into consideration the man's fitness for the position that was vacant. I had understood that if the returned soldier was qualified for the position, he unquestionably would have the preference over every other person, and I have not heard any person in this House or outside question the wisdom and correctness of that view. I believe the judgment of hon. members of this House is that the returned soldier shall be given the preference for the higher-salaried positions as well as the lower if he possesses the necessary qualifications. But how can any person logically maintain that we must leave out of consideration the qualifications of the applicant for the position? How can any man who recognizes his responsibility to the people—and we must certainly recognize that responsibility when we appoint a man to a position in the Civil Service—agree to the appointment of a man to the Civil Service just because he is a returned soldier, regardless of his fitness for the position? The proposal strikes me as absolutely illogical and indefensible. First of all, the returned soldier must possess the qualifications necessary to fill the position that is vacant, and if he possesses those qualifications I am in the judgment of every member of this House when I say that he should be given preference over any man who has not been overseas. I did not understand the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) to say anything different from that, nor do I believe the hon. member for North Simcoe was justified in the attack he made on the hon. member for East Algoma.

In regard to this question of salaries, last session when the question of salaries in a certain department of the Government was up for consideration the principle was laid down, by the granting of a bonus of a certain amount, that this bonus should apply to men whose salaries were under $1,000 a year and not to men whose salaries were over $1,000 a year. If that was a correct principle last session why should it not be a correct principle this session? It meant that the Government recognized that men cannot maintain their families on less than $1,000 a year. If that was true last year it is just as true this year. I agree with much that has been said with regard to the salaries of the higher officers in the Civil Service. A man who has been for years in the service of the Government, who has shown his fitness for the position that he occupies, I believe, is entitled to look forward to a gradual increase in his salary, according to his years of service, always having regard to his fitness to discharge the duties of the office he holds. I cannot understand the justice or fairness of telling a man who happens to be in one division that he is thereby excluded, notwithstanding his merit, from passing up to another division.

There is another feature of this salary question that properly comes in here. I do not know whether it is because there are several thousand civil servants in Ottawa or not, but ever since I have had the honour of a seat in this House, that is since 1908, periodically the question of salaries affecting people in the Civil Service in Ottawa has come before the House and it has always been just a little before an election. But there has been no consideration given—and I want the full emphasis to be placed upon the word "no"—to the salaries of the people in the Outside Service. Not only has there been no consideration given to the salaries of the people in the Outside Service but in many places it is impossible to get the least bit of encouragement when the matter is brought to the attention of the various departments of the Government. Let us take the case of the country postmaster; all his time is taken up by his duties, which begin at half past six in the morning and continue until nine o'clock and often till ten in the evening. He can not engage in any other occupation as he is in the service of the Government or the service of the country. If he is in the service of the country, why should he not receive consideration for the service which he renders? In a village in my own county there is a postmaster whose total remuneration, allowing for rent and everything, amounted last year to $870. That means that he is expected to give faithful service to the people of this country in the position he occupies and maintain his family on $800. Members come here year after year and session after session and consider the rights of the civil servants in the city of Ottawa. Why? Because the civil servants of the city of Ottawa number several thousand and they can back up their demands with their solid vote. That is the reason why. Because these people in outlying country districts are only scattered voters here and there and have no particular voting strength when the election comes on, their claim is ignored. In considering this matter I want to tell you another thing. While every hon. member of this House has a right to state what he considers is a proper salary for a civil servant, is it not right that every member should protest against men in high places deliberately stealing from the treasury of this country and putting the money in their own pockets? Deliberately stealing—what else do you call it? A specific vote of $2,500 is granted to him for the purpose of paying his expenses when he goes over to Great Britain to attend the sessions of the Privy Council. He does not go over to attend this session but he continues to draw this $2,500 a year. If a man took $2,500—yes, $25—wrongfully from a neighbour he would be brought before the court and put behind the bars, but when a Chief Justice of Canada takes $2,500 a year—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. EDWARDS: Of course you will rise to a point of order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Certainly I do. Unless you move to impeach a judge you cannot attack him as you are attacking this one in the present instance.

Mr. EDWARDS: There is never an occasion when anything can be said in this House with respect to the judiciary of this country and I have as much respect for the judiciary as the hon gentleman . . . .

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. EDWARDS: Who is out of order now?

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. gentleman to refrain from casting any reflection on the judiciary of the country. It is contrary to the rules and usages of the House with which my hon. friend is certainly conversant. The only rule we have on the subject is the following:

> No member shall speak disrespectfully of His Majesty, nor of any of the Royal Family; nor of the Governor or person administering the Government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either House, or against any member thereof; nor speak beside the question in debate.

but I will remind my hon. friend that Bourinot in his work on Parliamentary procedure says that—

Mr. EDWARDS: May I go on while you, Mr. Chairman, are looking up the rule?

The CHAIRMAN: You asked me to read the rule and I propose to read the holding by Bourinot.

Mr. EDWARDS: Just rule, Mr. Chairman. I asked for the rule.

The CHAIRMAN: My ruling is that the hon. gentleman cannot, according to the rules and usages of the House of Commons, make the statement which he has made concerning the judiciary of Canada. If the hon. gentleman wishes to appeal from that ruling he has a perfect right to do so.

Mr. CURRIE: Just a moment, Mr. Chairman. We are getting a little fed up on a few of these regulations. When the Speaker is asked to rule on a question it is necessary that he shall produce the rule and explain it to the House so that we will understand it. This idea of immediately appealing to the House without due regard to the ancient precedents and to the old rules and customs of this House is contrary to the practice.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. CURRIE: I am in order.

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Chairman, I ask for the rule which I have violated. If you will kindly refer me to it I shall be very much obliged.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member will consult Bourinot, at page 358, he will find:

> All references to judges and to courts of justice and to personages of high official station, of the nature of personal attacks and censure have always been considered unparliamentary and the Speakers of the British and Canadian Houses have always treated them as breaches of order. They have always insisted that, "such expressions should be withdrawn."

Mr. EDWARDS: For the convenience of members of Parliament, we are provided with a copy of the rules of the House, a little volume which is easily slipped into the pocket. We are not provided with a ten or fifteen-pound volume of Bourinot, a volume which we are supposed to read from cover to cover, but which cannot be carried round in the hip-pocket. I was told that I had violated one of the rules of the House. I have asked for that rule, but as yet it has not been mentioned. You have informed me, Mr. Chairman, that according to Bourinot, a member must not refer in disrespectful terms to the judiciary. Am I to understand that a man must refrain from telling the truth in this House with regard to the judiciary or any person else? If that truth when told casts a reflection upon the judiciary, who shows the disrespect to the Bench, he who tells the truth about the acts of the judiciary, or the judicial personage who has violated the well-understood rules, usages and customs of this country? Is there any rule in Bourinot which places a censorship on the conduct of judges to see that they walk the straight and narrow path in which they make others walk? If there is, we would like to have it? I shall not break any rule of Bourinot in referring disrespectfully to judges. May I then be permitted to leave the judges out of the question and call attention to certain acts which have been performed in this House, to call attention to certain votes which have been passed in this House, with the sanction of the Government, whereby $2,500 a year was voted to a certain gentleman, whom I am not permitted to mention, for a specific purpose, which that gentleman did not carry out. The money was voted and taken. The next year the money was again voted and taken for that specific purpose, although that specific purpose was not carried out. The third year the money was voted for the same specific purpose, which purpose again was not carried out, but the money was taken. That, Sir, I would characterize if it was not any person other than a judge, as a species of profiteering. If John Wesley Allison—Colonel John Wesley Allison, at one time Honorary Colonel John Wesley Allison—had got away with that $2,500, I would be permitted as a member of the House, without any violation of Bourinot or any other authority, to call him a scoundrel. I would be permitted to say he was a thief, I would be permitted to say that he had taken money from the treasury of the country that he was not entitled to; but if the party concerned is a member of the Royal Family, one of the knights of the realm, a baron or lord it may be in this country some person of that kind, the rules of Bourinot conveniently come to his rescue and between him and the just punishment which he merits for his acts. That is the present situation in this country.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Do the rules permit us to think?

Mr. EDWARDS: Not out loud. However, my purpose in discussing the salary question was to say this: As one member of the House who is responsible to a certain section of the community, I want to enter my protest against that sort of thing, and I have a right to do so while we are discussing the salaries of other men who are working long hours and trying hard to earn those salaries. Now, I think I have made my position clear with regard to that. It is all right enough to talk profiteering. We have got profiteering in this country. We have men in Canada who have squeezed water into pork in order to make eighty per cent out of it. I do not know whether I dare mention any particular name. I do not know whether according to Bourinot one has a right to mention a knight of the realm. Am I out of order, Mr. Chairman, possibly I am?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman is out of order. And this time I will cite, not a usage, but a rule of the House. Rule 13 provides that:

> Speeches in Committee of the Whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

Mr. EDWARDS: I have much pleasure in submitting to your ruling, or rather I have much pleasure in acknowledging the correctness of it. At least, upon this occasion I think you are right, therefore, I shall not follow that subject any further.

There are some other matters I would like to refer to in connection with salaries, and to point out how salaries are augmented in this country. We have a man who has been appointed to the Civil Service. Let me say that he is not a judge, neither is he a lord, nor baronet, nor knight of the realm. He is not a member of the Royal Family, so I imagine I can refer to him by name without violating any rule of Bourinot. He held the position of purchasing agent for the penitentiary, and he bore, and still bears, the euphonious name of Dillon. He was drawing a salary of $3,300, but, Mr. Chairman, it was not necessary to follow the classification of Class A in the First Division or Second Division in this case, in order to augment his salary. How was it done? They put a uniform on him and called him captain, and let him draw the pay of that rank in addition to his regular pay in the Civil Service. I want to protest against that method of increasing salaries in this country. It is a roundabout way of doing things which does not appeal to me as being exactly square and proper. Other men have had their salaries increased by roundabout methods, which I equally condemn. As far as it is possible, this country should provide for the returned soldier and give him a fair salary, and we will be able to deal more generously with the returned soldier, having regard to the financial condition of the country, if the finances of Canada are not allowed to be looted by men occupying positions which render them immune to criticism on the floor of this House.

The CHAIRMAN: There are before the committee two amendments, one of them, moved by Mr. Wigmore, of St. John City and counties of St. John and Albert, reads as follows:

Provided that the minimum amount in the third division for any returned soldier who has seen active service at the front shall be $1,000.

There is also an amendment moved by Mr. Morphy, which I have accepted as a sub-amendment for the time being, which says:

That returned soldiers in the third division shall be paid from $1,000 to $1,500.

I did not wish to rule immediately that the amendment and the sub-amendment were out of order because the subject matter of both could very properly form the basis of a suggestion to the minister. I cannot accept them as an amendment and sub-amendment owing to clause 54 of the British North America Act which says:

It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill for the Appropriation of any Part of the Public Revenue, or of any Tax or Impost, to any Purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by Message of the Governor General in the Session in which such Vote, Resolution, Address or Bill is proposed.

This Bill was preceded by a resolution approved by the Governor General, and therefore no amendment increasing the amounts in this Bill can be moved by a member or even by a minister without first being preceded by resolution also approved by the Governor General. May, in his Parliamentary Practice, at page 460, says:

Contingent or prospective charges upon the public revenue.....come within the purview of these standing orders; therefore before clauses in a Bill can be considered, which apply the Consolidated Fund, money to be voted by Parliament.....as a guarantee for sums to be raised, paid, or borrowed for any purpose, such clauses must receive the preliminary authority of a committee resolution, founded upon the recommendation of the Crown.

It is clear that what cannot be done by a minister cannot be done by a private member, and I must therefore declare both the amendment and sub-amendment to be out of order.

Mr. MORPHY: I have another amendment on the subject which I will read presently. But before doing so, speaking to the clause, some question was raised tonight about the salaries paid stenographers in a certain department, and the argument was advanced to show that the poorer-paid workingmen in the Third Division had not received and do not receive the same kind of treatment as other favoured individuals in the country. I have before me Hansard of April 4, and find there that there are a large number of barristers and stenographers employed on the staff of the Central Appeal Judge. One stenographer receives $180 a month, a pretty fair salary; another gets $150 a month. There are five stenographers at $110 per month; one at $96, one at $90, six at $55, eight at $80; three at $80, three at $75, one at $70, one at $65, and so on. Then there is an agricultural examiner there at $105 per week. Mr. Chairman, just get that idea into your head—an agricultural examiner at $105 per week in the office of the Central Appeal Judge! I don't wonder members of the House stand aghast at the way in which men in high places get their money, while the lower branches of the service have to fight their way through against rules, orders and factious objections. The list is long, and I won't read it; but I have given enough to show that when we are considering a clause of this kind, when the cost of living is taken into consideration, in an attempt to get $1,000 as a minimum for a man with a family of three or four children it is shameful that it has to be fought for in the face of records bristling with the prodigality of expenditure in regard to people higher up. What I have here is a motion as follows:—

That clause 46 be not concurred in, and that it be resolved that a special clause be inserted to provide for payment to the returned soldier in the third division from $1,000 to $1,500.

In that way, if this motion is carried, it does not increase the expenditure; it is open to this House, I believe, not to concur in the whole clause but to vote this one clause, and let us put the House to the test of its sincerity as to whether or not we really believe that the returned soldier entering the Civil Service should have a decent start because of the generosity we profess to extend to him.

The CHAIRMAN: I am sorry to say that I consider this motion to be of the same nature as that formerly moved by my hon. friend from North Perth. The hon. member by proposing to pay $1,000 to $1,500 to all returned soldiers in the Third Division is requesting the committee to vote an amount which is not based on a resolution approved in advance by the Governor General and I fear I must also declare this motion out of order for the reasons given in the previous ruling.

Mr. McKENZIE: We have been discussing for the last twenty years, I suppose, or longer the question of Civil Service reform. I agree at once that the salaries of civil servants are too small. But some eight or ten years ago the hon. gentleman (Sir Robert Borden), who was then leader of the Opposition and is now Prime Minister, put the position of the Civil Service in a very laconic and precise sentence. He stated in this House that the Civil Service was overmanned and underpaid. I think that impresssion is abroad yet, and I would suggest to the Government and to the commission that they would be doing justice to the Civil Service if, at the earliest possible moment, they were able to say that the Civil Service contained only the number of men requisite to carry on the country's business. When that is done we will all be in a happy mood to deal properly with the question of salaries. There is a notion abroad that we have, perhaps, three times the number employed that are necessary. This notion may be all wrong. But this question can be settled once for all by a report from the Civil Service Commission or from the department of Government responsible for the Civil Service, at the next session, that we have exactly the number required, and I, for one, will be glad then to start in and give them the proper salaries.

Section agreed to.

On section 47—Annual increases.

Mr. MURPHY: Might I suggest to my hon. friend, in view of the increased cost of living and changed conditions, the propriety of a uniform increase of $100 a year, and not discriminate, as was done in this section, by giving the larger increase to the officers receiving the larger salary and the smaller increase to those receiving the smaller salary. Those who receive the smaller salaries are much more in need of the larger increase than those who receive the larger salaries.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I shall be pleased to submit the matter to my colleagues for consideration. It is being considered with a view to accomplishing the same end in another way.

Section agreed to.

On section 48—Promotions:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This section provides that there shall be no promotion from the Second Division to the First or from the Third Division to the Second. That provision was always in the Act, and it was fair, because the examination varied according to the division. It would not be fair to allow a person who had passed merely the examination to the Third Division to be promoted right up to the First Division. It has always been provided that by passing the necessary examination a candidate was eligible for appointment to the First and Second Divisions. But in order to make clear the exact meaning of that section I propose amending it by adding at the end of subsection 2 the following words:

But any person in either of these divisions may enter for examination for appointment to a higher division.

Mr. PEDLOW: I suggest that the minister add to subsection 3 the words "Or on the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission". Often a clerk or employee in a minor position qualifies, after long service, for promotion, in which case a special examination would appear to be unnecessary. I see no reason why a man so qualified for a position in the higher division should not be promoted forthwith on the recommendation of the deputy or with the approval of the commission.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Any appointment from a lower to a higher division must be made by the commission. I do not see the necessity, therefore, of adding such words as my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. PEDLOW: But my point is that the promotion should be made without examination, on the recommendation of the deputy.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think that would be fair.

Mr. PEDLOW: If the man was qualified it would be fair.

Mr. McCREA: The acting minister was financial critic of the Opposition during the last five or six years. If my memory serves me correctly, he criticised very severely the extravagance of the late Government, and among other things he contended—and, I think, rightly so; I hope he has not forgotten it—that every department of the Government was overmanned. I believe that condition still exists, and I suggest that the minister deal with this matter in an intelligent and businesslike way by reducing the staffs to a number sufficient actually to carry on the work, and then proposing increases of salary which are really in keeping with the increased cost of living. An increase of $100 to a salary of $800 or $900 is not at all in keeping with the increase of the cost of the necessities of life. At this time there is a shortage of labour in every direction, and if those whose services are not required are dismissed, they can get positions without the least difficulty. But this condition may not prevail after the war is over, and it is clear that this is the proper time to cut the staffs down and to provide reasonable increases to those whose services are necessary.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is one of the purposes of the Act.

Mr. PEDLOW: Section 17 provides that promotions or increases of salary shall be made for merit by the commission on the recommendation of the deputy head. I do not see why that principle should not obtain in respect of promotions from one grade to another, in cases where special qualifications or abilities are shown.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In a case of that kind the official can take the examination for the higher division. Those who are in the higher division were obliged to take a much more severe examination than was taken by those who went into the lower divisions. Moreover, no one in a lower division is debarred because of advanced age from taking examination for a higher division.

Mr. DEVLIN: A great many civil servants have asked me this question: A man receiving the maximum in the Second Division of $1,500 passes a promotion examination which brings him into the First Division; at what salary would he be classed in the First Division? Would he be classed at the minimum salary grade F, or would he begin at a salary equal to that which he was in receipt of when he left the Second Division?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: He would start at $1,600.

Mr. BUREAU: The question which I put under section 46 comes again under this section. The case that I submitted is not like the one my hon. friend (Mr. Devlin) has just submitted. Supposing the civil servant has reached a salary of $1,600 and the maximum in the second division is $1,500. My hon. friend referred me to subsection 5 of section 10, which reads:

> Nothing in this Act shall be construed to prejudicially affect the status or the present salaries——and so on. But the subsection does not later on say that a man who is receiving $1,600, and who, on account of the position he occupies, is classified under section 45 in the Second Division, shall receive an increase; it only says that he shall be eligible for increases. There ought to be a provision that those who have reached the maximum in such a case as I have mentioned shall be put into the higher division.

Mr. PEDLOW: I find that the point I raised is covered in subsection 3, section 48.

> Any person may be promoted from the second division to the first division under the provisions of section 17.

Section 17 says:

> Promotions or increases of salaries in the public service shall be made for merit by the Commission on the recommendation of the deputy head.

You have to incorporate subsection 3 of section 48 with section 17. That is my point.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That covers promotions made prior to 1908. That is for a different purpose.

Mr. BUREAU: The reason I rise again is that the minister said just now that a person to be promoted from one division to another must pass a new exam-

11 p.m. ination. In the case of which I spoke the salary enjoyed is higher than the salary of the division in which he is classified under section 45. Will he automatically go into Division 1 if he receives $1,600 to-day?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think so.

Mr. BUREAU: Then he will remain in Division 2?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Except that section 10 provides that his status shall not be prejudicially affected by this Act.

Mr. BUREAU: What is the prejudice—that he shall be eligible?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: You cannot affect his salary.

Mr. BUREAU: Section 10 says that he shall be eligible, but there is nothing to guarantee that he is going to get the $1,600. If it is not considered desirable to promote such a man, he will remain in Division 2, the maximum of which is $1,500.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think my hon. friend is wrong. I move to strike out the words "had theretofore" at the end of the third line of subsection 3 of section 48, and to substitute instead the word "have." That will make the reading clearer.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. PEDLOW: Before we leave this section, there is a matter of unfinished business from Saturday night. The Acting Minister of Finance will remember that we were discussing a matter of transfers. I refer to section 18, subsection 2.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member cannot revert to section 18 unless he has the unanimous consent of the committee. There was an understanding with the Acting Minister of Finance that two or three clauses should be reverted to when we had concluded the discussion on the Bill, but I do not think I could allow the hon. member to revert to them at this stage.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I will consent to that when we have reached the end of the Bill.

Mr. PEDLOW: Very well.

Section agreed to.

On section 51—who to act in absence of deputy head:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I move to amend subsection 1 of section 51 by striking out the word "minister" wherever it occurs in the said subsection and inserting instead the word "head." It means the deputy head.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is subsection 2 of section 51 new? I see it is marked as an amendment.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The only change in that subsection is that the term "an Assistant Auditor General" is used instead of "chief clerk."

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the minister assure us that this does not in any way conflict with or weaken the clause in the Revenue and Audit Act?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would not think so.

Section agreed to.

On section 52—Private secretaries, appointment and salaries:

Mr. MURPHY: I observe that one of these clauses is new. Would my hon. friend explain the difference between it and the old section?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Under the present Act any person chosen to be a minister's private secretary may, without examination and irrespective of age, be appointed a clerk in Subdivision A of the First Division or Subdivision A of the Second, and he may be appointed permanently to that position when the minister retires. The result of that rule was to throw periodically a large number of private secretaries into the higher Subdivisions of the service, and frequently there was not employment for them. The purpose of this new clause is to prevent that practice. Of course, the minister may select as his private secretary some one already in the Civil Service. If he brings some one in from outside, Parliament must vote the salary, and in that event I assume it would be necessary to give a larger sum than is now being paid private secretaries.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: But the appointment would not be permanent in that case?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. MURPHY: Is it the intention to make a distinction in the annual vote for private secretaries? Heretofore, and at present, the estimates provide in addition to the salary for the private secretary, a sum of $600. In future, I take it, that rule will obtain only where the private secretary is a member of the Civil Service, and that if a new man is brought in, not a member of the service, he will not be voted the $600, but will get his salary in one sum and his appointment will not necessarily be permanent.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: He goes out with the minister.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not like the English of clause 2. It says "no salary shall be payable." The amount will be payable the moment the man earns it. I think "no salary shall be paid" would be better.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have used the same wording as in the present Act.

Mr. MURPHY: What is the purpose of that clause?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I suppose the idea was to circumvent any attempts to pay the ministers' secretary in any other way, by Order in Council, for instance.

Section agreed to.

On section 54—Census and election audit temporaries, appointment of and duration of service:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I move to amend this section by striking out the word "decennial," in line 18, and again in line 26. The reason for this is that a quinquennial census is held in the West. The wording of the section, of course, restricts the provision to a decennial census.

Mr. MURPHY: If a quinquennial census is held why not restrict the term of employment to less than three years?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: You could not make it less than that.

Mr. MURPHY: Two years would do for a quinquennial census. It was the large amount of work connected with a decennial census that was responsible for three years being specified. A quinquennial census will take less time.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In addition to the quinquennial census in the West we still have the decennial census.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 55—organization, classification and salaries of Outside Service:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The purpose of this section is just the same as that of section 10 with respect to the Inside Service. This will empower the commissioners to investigate and study the conditions of the Outside Service in all its details and make a general report to the Governor in Council in respect to it. Upon the adoption of that report by the Governor in Council, the reorganization of the Outside Service will take place. The section is intended to give power to the commission to carry on that work.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is the minister in a position to tell us when this classification and reorganization is likely to take place?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The commission purpose to do it during the year if it is at all possible to overtake the work. They hope, however, to do it during the summer.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is it expected that this classification will better the condition of any parties in the Outside Service? Are they likely to get more salary by reason of this classification than they now receive?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is hoped that the position of the Outside Service will be improved. A portion of it is now classified but a great deal is not. It is very desirable to have a classification of the service and I submit that it would be in the interest of the members of the Service.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am glad that one of the commissioners is here. I bring to his notice a condition of things that he will find in the country. He will find some men, say, in the Customs Department, who have been appointed for nearly twenty years, doing first-class work and getting $1,000 a year, while others who have been appointed within the last two or three years are getting $1,200 or $1,300 and doing an inferior grade of work.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We hope to remove those inequalities and injustices through this investigation.

Mr. McKENZIE: I hope they will be entirely removed. I am not saying that the fellow who is getting $1,300 is getting too much, but I say that the other fellow is getting too little.

Mr. MURPHY: Will the minister explain why this section is not made applicable to the railway employees? The question is brought to our attention again by an item in to-day's paper stating that the Government has purchased three new lines of railway in New Brunswick. There will be such an army of employees connected with the Government railways that patronage will be more rampant than heretofore unless these organizations are brought under the Act. What is the objection to bringing the railway employees under the Act?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: So many difficulties would be encountered in applying the Act to this service that we did not feel we could do it without a special study and investigation of that service. We hope during the year to have a special report from the commission upon the railway service.

Mr. MURPHY: But this Act is specially drawn so that it will not apply to that service.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Until it is brought into force.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Did the minister make any inquiry as to whether the instructions sent out to the railway management were printed?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have not had an opportunity of making the inquiry, but I will get that information.

Mr. FIELDING: Perhaps the question that I am about to ask has already been answered in the course of the discussion but I think it is desirable that the committee should have a clear understanding as to the application of this Bill. Am I correct in assuming that this will cover all classes of appointments to the public service of any kind in the Dominion of Canada except those specially excepted under section 41?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: All classes of the service in the Dominion of Canada except employees on railways and ships as already mentioned?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Deputy heads, members of commissions, and boards, especially appointed for particular work by the Government.

Mr. FIELDING: Would a returning officer be appointed under this Act?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, I think the Elections Act would cover that.

Mr. FIELDING: This is a later Act, and the later Act governs.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, I think not.

Mr. FIELDING: Will it take in the lighthouse service?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The lighthouse service would come within the Act.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Would the officials and staff of the High Commissioner in Great Britain and also the commission lately appointed at Washington come under the Act?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The staff of the High Commissioner's office in London would come under the provisions of this Act. The Canadian War Commission office in Washington would not, I think, come under the Act. It is a temporary war organization, and I hardly think it would come under the Act, though possibly it might.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It might continue for some years. If one is under the Act the other should be; it is a part of the public service.

Mr. MURPHY: The answer that the minister gave me about railway employees being brought under the operation of this Act cannot be correct, taking it in conjunction with the reply which my hon. friend gave to the question asked by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding), that they might be brought in under the Act, but by this Act they are specially exempted and excepted. Therefore, no work done by the Civil Service Commission during the recess could possibly bring the railway employees under this Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Except that we could base legislation upon that report. If the commissioners were able to devise some practical method of putting the railway employees under the Act we could amend this Act next session.

Mr. MURPHY: My point is that under this Bill the railway employees are excepted.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Certainly.

Mr. MURPHY: And I am asking my hon. friend why?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have explained that very many times.

Mr. MURPHY: By merely saying that there are difficulties in the way.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There are fifteen or twenty thousand Government railway employees in this country.

Mr. MURPHY: Which means fifteen or twenty thousand cases of patronage.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Which means that it would be necessary, as I stated this afternoon, to have the Civil Service Commission sitting at Moncton practically all the time, because employees are entering the service pretty nearly daily, and it would be impossible to administer the Act without having some branch of the commission located at that point. There are many other difficulties to be surmounted, and the Government concluded that it was not practicable to apply the Order in Council to that branch of the public service at the present time, but we purpose giving the matter consideration in the future.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I draw the attention of the minister to the Order in Council which says:

> The following rules shall be observed in all departments of the Government with respect to appointments to the public service.
> In any case where the knowledge and ability requisite for any position in the Outside Service are wholly or in part professional or technical, a person shall only be appointed to such position in the manner prescribed by section twenty-one of the Civil Service Amendment Act, 1908, for similar appointments to the Inside Service.

and no appointments shall be made under the rule to the Outside Service, or under section twenty-one of the Civil Service Amendment Act, 1908, to the Inside Service, unless the Civil Service Commission determines that the position is wholly or in part professional or technical.

Will that rule apply to railroad employees under the Order in Council which abolishes patronage?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Order in Council includes the canal employees of the Railway Department, but does not include the railway employees. I have left it entirely with the general managers to take on whoever they require in case a vacancy occurs. Since I have been in charge of the department I do not know of one appointment that I have recommended, or one appointment that I have asked the general manager of either road to make. Therefore, the procedure following is practically the same as if the Civil Service Act were in force with respect to the employees of Government railways. It would hardly be possible to apply the present Bill in the operation of the Government railway system. As hon. gentlemen doubtless know, there are organizations of almost every kind of employees on the Government railways. For instance, the engine drivers have their organization, and in case of a vacancy the next man in order of seniority must get the promotion, and there is no way in which the manager can interfere with that arrangement. There is an agreement with all of the different organizations. The conductors, the brakemen, and the baggagemen, all have their several unions, and we could not possibly promote the members of those unions in accordance with the terms of the present Bill. The only exception might be where new appointees came in and started their services under the Railways Department. I have felt that appointments should be left entirely to the head of whatever portion of the railway system it came under, and that system has been working well, and I shall continue it so far as I am concerned.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Will the minister give us his assurance that he will instruct the general manager that he is not to use political patronage? That will be quite satisfactory to hon. gentlemen on this side as well as to the general public.

Mr. J. D. REID: I have given him those instructions.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Does the minister say that he has given instructions to the general manager and the superintendents of the road in regard to the question of patronage?

Mr. J. D. REID: I have had the general managers here and have told them to use their own judgment in the taking on of employees wherever it is necessary, and to eliminate patronage of any kind. My instructions were to use their own judgment, and so far as I can see everything in that regard has been working very satisfactorily, and I have not heard of any complaint.

Mr. J. D. SINCLAIR: Then it is open to the foremen of the roundhouses and the different shops to take on any young man who applies for a position without any recommendation from a member of Parliament, or from any patronage committee? Will the minister say that is now the position of affairs—that the foremen are at liberty to make a selection without any recommendation whatever?

Mr. J. D. REID: All I can say is that I have left the matter to the general manager. I gave instructions to the general manager, and I judge that is the policy he is pursuing. Whatever he thinks is the right policy to follow in the best interests of the railway he is carrying out, and that system must be working very satisfactorily because I have received no complaints whatever. The same thing applies to the vessels that are owned by, or under the control of the Government Railway system. We have several steamships in connection with our railway system, and I have not interfered in any way, shape, or form with the employees that the general manager may think best to engage in connection with them. I feel that on the proper operation of the railway system, as well as of the vessels under our control, "safety first" should be the policy of the general manager and his staff.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Were the instructions given in writing or were they verbal?

Mr. J. D. REID: I think the instructions were verbal, but I will make search and see if any letter was written on the subject. If so, I would have no objection to producing it when the railway estimates are considered. I can look up and see if there was any letter written. If there was I will have no objection to producing it when I am on my estimates. But I know that I have told them that they were to use their own judgment, and I hold them responsible for the operating of the road and for the employees on the road.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I understand that you told them that they were to eliminate patronage entirely, not only told them to carry on the business to the best of their ability, but that they are distinctly to eliminate the old patronage system.

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I would like to know whether the various officers of the railroad, the superintendents, roadmasters and master mechanics, have been made aware of those instructions which the hon. gentleman says he gave the general manager?

Mr. J. D. REID: Perhaps it would be better to deal with that when we come to my estimates. I will give all the information in connection with the operation of the road at that time. I do not want to raise a discussion on railway matters when we are dealing with the Civil Service.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Yes, but we must eliminate patronage on the railway as well as in other departments.

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not know how much plainer I can make the matter. All I can say is that I have left entirely in the hands of the general manager the engaging of employees in connection with the Government railway system. I have not gone any further than the general manager in issuing any orders. Any orders from the general manager to those under him must be on his own responsibility. It is to him, and to him alone, they are responsible.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Of course, but we cannot speak to the general manager here, and we can speak to the minister. I would like the various officers of the railway to be made aware of these instructions so that they need not take into consideration the recommendations given by the hon. gentleman's political friends in the various constituencies along the line, to men who desire employment on the railway system.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I would suggest to the minister that he put his instructions in writing to the general manager, and that will settle the whole matter. It will only take a few minutes to write the letter.

Mr. MURPHY: In connection with the statement made by the Acting Minister of Finance that the Civil Service Commission will carry out an investigation during the recess with a view to the reorganization and classification of the service, and for the purpose of removing any inequalities, I desire to express my pleasure that a member of the commission is here this evening. There are two glaring inequalities which require to be removed. One of them is in connection with the salary of $10,000 paid to a gentleman referred to earlier in the evening by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy). His appointment and continuance in office is nothing less than a public scandal. This man is paid $10,000 a year for doing absolutely nothing of benefit to the people. My information is that the desire to get rid of him was so strong in Toronto University that they were at their wits' end to know where to dump him, and they finally dumped him upon this Government. I have been trying since the beginning of the session to ascertain what this gentleman does, and I can now tell this committee that he does nothing of any public benefit. I would suggest to the minister, and through him to the commission, that one of the first acts of the commission should be to put an end both to the job and to the salary. That is one inequality. Another inequality, just as farcical as showing the way public business is conducted in this country, will be found in another department of the Government. The commission will find a man in charge of 150 employees; they will find that man disbursing $12,000 per month as the pay-roll in that branch; they will find this man and these 150 employees handling and controlling, if my memory serves me correctly, over $30,000,000 in a year. Yet the man in charge of that branch gets the munificent salary of $1,800 per annum. That is as big a farce and as great a scandal as is the case of the ten-thousand-dollar-a-year man at the other end of the line. These are two inequalities to which I direct the attention of my hon. friend.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Who is the man last mentioned, and in what department is he?

Mr. MURPHY: There will be no trouble about locating him. I do not want to make the matter more plain at the moment.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would like to ask the Minister of Railways one question if he will permit me.

The CHAIRMAN: We are not on a railway matter.

Mr. McKENZIE: I know, but I draw the line. I do not want to ask the minister to write any letter, but will he permit me to write a letter to my friends saying that there is no patronage in employing section men and trackmen generally, that the section foremen—

Mr. J. D. REID: I will permit the hon. member to write and say that I have given instructions to Mr. Hayes that he is to employ whomever he wishes, that there is no patronage so far as I am concerned. There is no one writing me to have employees put on, and if there were it would be entirely on their own responsibility. There is no patronage list that Mr. Hayes is to go by. He must use his own judgment and I hold him responsible.

Mr. MOWAT: I would not like the remarks of my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy) to pass without some comment. Though I have a very slight acquaintance with the scientific gentleman he speaks of, and have no knowledge of how he came to be appointed, I have some knowledge of what he is supposed to do. The trouble with us always has been that in regard to scientific research we have been distinctly behind other countries. All countries were behind Germany in that respect. Germany was so expert and so secretive of her methods that she was able to take a place in mercantile affairs that was the envy of the world. We are now overcoming the secrets of Germany. If you leave scientific questions to business men alone, the outcome is that what is everybody's business is nobody's business. Professor MacCallum—there is no reason why his name should not be mentioned—has done in a short time work of almost incalculable benefit to certain businesses, and he proposes to have his laboratories here in Ottawa open to the employees of the different manufacturers so that they can come and experiment under direction and with certain apparatus. In all the big manufactories of the United States now, I am told, scientific men are employed to advantage for experimental and research work, and that is what is attempted to be done by this gentleman. I think my hon. friend is mistaken about his position, and he spoke with some heat. But I am sure that Professor MacCallum stood very high in the university, and they were very sorry indeed to lose his services.

Mr. MURPHY: I am much obliged to my hon. friend. If he thinks I spoke before with some heat, he will not think so now. If there is any doubt in the minds of the commission as to whether or not this gentleman should be displaced and returned to Toronto, that doubt has been removed by the explanation of my hon. friend from Parkdale (Mr. Mowat).

Section agreed to.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

On section 56—Repeal:

Mr. FIELDING: Ministers of the Crown have sometimes evaded the law by introducing into their estimates appropriations for some particular officers—possibly for just cause—adding to them the words: "notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act." That had been the subject of criticism, and a clause was inserted in the Act declaring that such words in any appropriation Act should have no force or effect. I am not quite sure that the object was fully accomplished; I rather think that in some cases ministers were still able to evade the Act. So far as I can see, that provision has been dropped from this Bill. Has my hon. friend's attention been directed to it?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The object was not accomplished by that provision in the Civil Service Act and it did not appear desirable that it should longer remain. It seemed peculiar that Parliament should in one Act say that salaries could not be voted in the estimates and then, in the same session, proceed to vote salaries in the estimates. However, during the present session an effort has been made to minimize the making of increases or providing of promotions through the estimates. It may have been done in one or two cases, but this year there are less than there ever were before.

Mr. BUREAU: At page 92 of the estimates there appears an item of $600,000, at the end of which I find the words: "appointments for the purpose may be made without reference to the provisions of the Civil Service Act."

Mr. MURPHY: Has any provision been substituted for the one which my hon. friend says has been dropped?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Section agreed to.

On schedule A:

Mr. BUREAU: Has the agreement which was made on Saturday, that these oaths should be changed, been carried out?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I did not understand that there was an agreement to change the schedules. It was understood that when we reached them my hon. friend might make his suggestions.

Mr. SIFTON: It was suggested that the oath of allegiance should be put in.

Mr. BUREAU: The old oath read as follows:

I.....solemnly and sincerely swear that I will faithfully and honestly fulfil the duties which devolve upon me as.....and that I will not ask or receive any sum of money, services, recompense or matter or thing whatsoever, directly or indirectly in return for what I have done or may do in the discharge of any of the duties of my said office, except my salary or what may be allowed me by law or by an order of the Governor in Council.

It was suggested by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) that the oath of allegiance should be included there.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My hon. friend does not suggest that the oath of allegiance should be put in the schedule? I do not see why that should be done. The oath of allegiance is not in the present Act; there is no reason why it should appear in any Act. The present oath, which my hon. friend has just read, is quite lengthy, and seems rather offensive in its phraseology. As given in the Bill the oath reads:

I (A. B.) solemnly and sincerely swear that I will faithfully and honestly fulfil the duties which devolve upon me as * * * So help me God.

The oath might very well end there, but the old form proceeded as my hon. friend has given it. I think the abridged affidavit in the schedule is preferable.

Mr. BUREAU: This is what took place Saturday night. The Minister of Customs (Mr. Sifton) was sitting where the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) is now, and the question arose of amending the form. Hansard reads:

Mr. Sifton: You can put in any conditions you like.

Mr. Bureau: But schedules A and B are part of the clause. If you pass the clause you cannot change them.

Mr. Sifton: My hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance says he is going to make new sections.

Section agreed to.

That has reference to the schedule.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If it is the judgment of the committee that the oath should be restored to its old form, I have no objection. Personally I do not think it should.

Mr. BUREAU: All right.

Schedule A agreed to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I move that section 32 of the Bill be struck out.

Motion agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: By consent of the committee we revert to section 30. The member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) has moved that the following be substituted as section 30:

30. Subject to the provisions of section three of this Act, the power to remove or dismiss any deputy head, officer, clerk or employee, shall vest in the Commission.

Before exercising such power, the Commission shall require a statement in writing, from the minister in the case of a deputy head, and from the deputy head in all other cases, giving the causes, reasons and facts invoked for such dismissal.

Upon receipt of such statement in writing the Commission shall forthwith communicate a copy of same to the deputy head or other employee whose dismissal is sought.

The deputy head or employee shall within three days after the receipt of copy of said statement file with the Commission a statement in writing in answer to such charges in default of which Commission may proceed on the statement submitted asking for dismissal.

Mr. BUREAU: I have already explained what I intend by this amendment. The power of appointment is, by the change that we made this afternoon, now vested in the commission. In section 42, subsection 3, we inserted the word "appoint" instead of the word "supply." We have, therefore, vested the appointing power in the commission, and I do not see why we should not vest the dismissing power in the commission. I do not desire to see an employee dismissed summarily; neither do I wish to see a man subject to any arbitrary action from any superior, and that is the reason why I have put in my amendment that he whose dismissal is sought shall have the right to know the reasons why the charges are made against him and the facts that are brought to justify his dismissal, and that he shall have the right within three days to file a statement in writing. My attention was called to the fact that three days was too short a time, because some Civil Service employees are quite a distance from here, say at the Coast. I am, therefore, willing that "three weeks" or "twenty days" should be inserted instead of three days. Within that period the employee has a right to answer the charges or justify himself in writing. Should the employee fail to write within the time limit, the commission, to whom the file is sent, may proceed ex parte and take into consideration the report and act upon it. If the object of this Bill is to do away with patronage, this amendment should carry. Patronage is exercised not in appointments only; the worst kind of patronage is exercised in dismissals. This Act has for its purpose to make the service efficient, to employ the best men and to make them feel they are going to be treated in the proper way by Parliament and by the commissioners, this amendment is just to protect them from any idea they may have that they may be arbitrarily dealt with by deputy heads, or heads of departments, or any other party under whose control they may be. It is only fair that a man who is going to lose his bread and butter, who is charged with an offence or misconduct for which he is subject to dismissal, should at the very least have an opportunity of stating his case, so that hereafter if anybody should desire to look into the matter, there will not be only one side of it, but we shall be able to judge the case on its merits having heard both sides. I put this as a test whether the Government are really in earnest in bringing down this measure. If they want to do away with patronage, so far as positions are concerned, leaving aside the other part of patronage which has been called to the attention of the committee by my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Blake), the power of appointment and the power of dismissal ought to rest with the same authority, and he who is to be dismissed ought at least to have the right to put his case before the body which is to decide as to his fate.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Does the hon. member desire that such an official should be in charge of his office during the twenty days? I quite agree that he should be given twenty days in which to state his case, but when does the dismissal take effect? Is he continued in office and paid his salary during the twenty days?

Mr. BUREAU: I think there is a provision by which the head of the department has the right to suspend the man and the payment of his salary. Under that provision, I take it that the head of the department, or whoever is vested with the authority, has the power, if he thinks the offence is serious enough, to suspend from the day he writes the report the man whose dismissal is sought. In that case, the man would not be paid his salary and would not have any authority in his office.

An hon. MEMBER: Section 31.

Mr. BUREAU: Yes, section 31 says:

> The head of a department, and in his absence the deputy head, may suspend from the performance of his duty or from the receipt of his salary any officer——and so on. The case is covered by that section.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: The amendment of my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) ought to be accepted. The power of dismissal is just as important, indeed, I think it is more important and more dangerous, than the power of appointment so far as political interference or patronage is concerned. Parliament has always considered that to be so. In fact, when this Parliament wants to place a public official or servant above political patronage and to be sure of his impartiality, it enacts that the official cannot be dismissed by the Governor in Council, and that only a vote of the two Houses of Parliament can dismiss him. It so enacts in the case of judges, the Auditor General, the Civil Service Commissioners and other officers. It happens that the Governor in Council is entitled to appoint gentlemen to certain offices, but that the authority which makes the appointment has no power to dismiss those officers. Under the Bill as it stands, we are legislating in the opposite direction. The Governor in Council would be deprived of the power of making appointments, but would have the right to dismiss the officers it has not right to appoint. If the Government wants to do away altogether with the plague of patronage and political interference it should accept the amendment of my hon. friend; the Civil Service Commission should be empowered to make the dismissals as well as the appointments, and the Governor in Council should not interfere.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I can only repeat what I have said two or three times in the earlier stages of the Bill, namely, that, in my opinion, the power of dismissal of its servants should rest with the Crown, and that power should not be bestowed upon any other body. It would, I think, be rather peculiar if the Crown delegated that power to any other body.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: It delegates the power to appoint.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: By a method of selection established by an Act of Parliament, the commission does select appointees to the Civil Service, but once they are appointed they are the servants and employees of the Crown, and the Crown should reserve the right of dismissal. There is no doubt that in the past, in the case of political appointments, the power of dismissal was abused by governments, but hon. gentlemen know that related almost entirely to the Outside Service. I never heard anybody complain about improper dismissals by the Government so far as the Inside Service is concerned, where appointments are made upon competitive examination and promotion depends upon merit. If dismissals have been improperly made from the Inside Service by the Crown in the past I do not know of any such case. Dismissals have been made, however, for cause. I hope that when the same principle which obtains in the Inside Service is applied to the Outside Service—appointment after competitive examination, and promotion upon merit—there will be no dismissals by the Government except for cause. I do not feel that the amendment should be accepted, and I trust that my hon. friend will not press it.

Amendment negatived: yeas, 21; nays, 38.

Mr. MURPHY: I understood that section 35 was left over for consideration.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I dropped that.

Mr. SHEARD: I understood from my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) before six o'clock that a clause was to be introduced copied from the United States Act limiting the number of members of the same family in different grades of the Service. I should like an expression of opinion from the minister on the advisability of inserting such a provision.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I will give consideration to the matter, and if it seems a desirable thing to do, I shall submit it to the minister in charge of the Bill in the Senate. The section in the United States Act reads as follows:

> Whenever there are already two or more members of a family in the public service in the grades covered by this Act, no other mem- of such family shall be eligible to appointments to any of said grades.

Mr. MOWAT: The Toronto police force, under Chief Grassett, is supposed to be a highly efficient force. One of the principal objects of Chief Grassett in looking for men is to get members of the same family, if possible, as he says it works out much better. The men support each other better, there is loyalty between them, and altogether they make the best officers.

Mr. SHEARD: The Toronto police force is not under the control of a political body, so the chief's reasons would not apply in this case. I dwell upon the value of such a clause if it can be worked advantageously in the Civil Service Bill, because whatever we may say to the contrary, instances such as those to which attention has been drawn on the floor of the House are interpreted by the public, whether rightly or wrongly, as due to some influence being brought to bear in the securing of appointments, and influence which ought not to prevail; that is the general impression, and members of the House are called upon to explain why these things happen. I do not affirm that it is even true, but if some provision could be included in the Act that would enable members of Parliament to be, like Caesar's wife, above suspicion, it ought to be included.

Mr. CURRIE: When section 3 was under discussion I suggested that the commission should consist of five members, two of whom should be returned soldiers, and I beg to move that amendment now.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I will make a statement on that point on the third reading of the Bill. Perhaps my hon. friend will withdraw his amendment in the meantime.

Amendment withdrawn.

Bill as amended reported, and amendments concurred in.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

On the Order being called for the second reading of Bill No. 70, to consolidate and amend the Railway Act—(Hon. J. D. Reid):

Mr. BUREAU: Surely the second reading is not going to be pressed on the House now. I was told in the lobby this evening that my hon. friends opposite had prepared for an all-night session by organizing relief squads.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. BUREAU: Why "Order"? We are not going to be treated like slaves. That is what I was told, and I have reason to believe it is true.

Mr. REID: I have no desire to go on with the Bill to-night if there is any objection.

Mr. BUREAU: There is objection.

Mr. J. D. REID: I thought we might get into committee and make a start on the Bill, but if there is objection I will not press the second reading.

Mr. BUREAU: There is no objection. I object to the principle of certain clauses.

Mr. CARVELL: I would like to state here that my hon. friend is entirely in error in stating there was any organization on this side of the House to keep this thing going all night by relief squads. Whoever told my hon. friend that was drawing on his imagination, because no such thing was planned.

Mr. BUREAU: If I am in error, I am glad to acknowledge it. I hope I shall not have again to refer to the same point.

Mr. CARVELL: Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.

RELEASE OF HON. DR. BELAND, M.P.

ANNOUNCEMENT MADE BY HON. MR. LEMIEUX AND SIR ROBERT BORDEN.

During the consideration of the Civil Service Bill in the Committee of the Whole:

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX: I may perhaps be out of order but I cannot resist the temptation of informing the committee that a press despatch has been received stating that Hon. Dr. Beland has been released and is coming home.

Mr. BUREAU: Three cheers for Dr. Beland.

Hon. members rose, gave three cheers for Dr. Beland, and sang "For He's a Jolly Good Fellow."

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have received a cablegram from Sir George Perley with respect to Hon. Dr. Beland's release, which reads:

London, May 13th, 1918.

The Prime Minister,
Ottawa.

Have telegram from Beland at Rotterdam saying he has been released from Germany Am personally delighted, and am sure this news will be most welcome to you and all other Canadians.

Perley.

Following the reading of the cablegram, hon. members rose in their seats and cheered.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I might add that I communicated to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, three days ago, I think, the news that Dr. Beland's release was likely to take place, but we were under injunction to say nothing about it in public. I am very glad that the anticipation then conveyed to us has now been fulfilled. All of us who know Dr. Beland have the very highest appreciation of his character, of his ability and of his services as a public man. We have all been greatly distressed by the fact that he has been detained so long in Germany and has endured such hardships, and there is none who will not join, as we have joined just now, in the most warm recognition of the fact that he has been set at liberty.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In justice to the right hon. the Prime Minister and to Sir George Perley, I might add that since the internment of our dear colleague, Dr. Beland, the Prime Minister and the Government have done their utmost to have him released.

On the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean the House adjourned at 12.17 a.m. Tuesday.

Tuesday, May 14, 1918.

The House met at Eleven o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

CENSORSHIP REGULATIONS.

OPINION OF MR. SPEAKER ON QUESTION RAISED BY MR. J. A. CURRIE.

Mr. SPEAKER: With reference to the question asked of me yesterday by the hon. member for North Simcoe, I beg to state that the proper manner for the House to express its disapproval with regard to any order passed by the Governor General in Council is to move a humble address to the Crown. The authorities are as follows:

"The subjects upon which addresses are presented are too varied to admit of enumeration. They have comprised every matter of foreign or domestic policy; the administration of justice; the confidence of Parliament in the ministers of the Crown; the expression of congratulation or condolence, and in short, representations upon all points connected with the government and welfare of the country." (May, p. 546).

Bourinot is to the same effect, as follows:

"It is now the usage to move for addresses only with respect to matters affecting Imperial interests, the regal prerogative, or the Governor in Council." (Bourinot, p. 2456).

"The subjects on which the two houses may address the sovereign or his representative in this country are too numerous to be detailed at length. They may relate to every matter of public interest, to the administration of justice, to commercial relations, or to the political state of the country; in short, to all subjects connected with the Government and the welfare of the dominions." (Bourinot, p. 259).

PRIVILEGE— MR. McQUARRIE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the privilege of the House to refer to a report which appears in the two Ottawa papers this morning in reference to the debate on the Civil Service Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member rise to a question of privilege?

Mr. McQUARRIE: Yes. I find in the Journal-Press of to-day, an article reading as follows:

Appointments Within Province.

W. G. McQuarrie, New Westminister, moved an amendment providing that, except as to the city of Ottawa, appointments in any province should, in so far as possible, be made from residents of that province. He said that, within the last few days, application had been made for an additional stenographer in the Government offices at New Westminster. He had been informed that one would have to be sent from Ottawa. He thought his amendment a reasonable one. It would not be advisable, of course, to have all the appointments made in Ottawa from Ontario.

Sir George Foster opposed the amendment on the score that its tendency would be to cultivate provincialism. The country, he said, should not be cut up into sections. There was no valid reason why a man from British Columbia should not have an opportunity of serving in any part of Canada.

H. H. Stevens (Vancouver Center) said that residents of British Columbia were not afforded proper opportunity to take part in competitive examinations. Owing to the short notice given it was impossible to compete and there were no examinations held in British Columbia at all.

Sir George Foster agreed that there should be equal opportunity given to residents of all the provinces.

Unless there were some safeguards provided, Mr. Cockshutt remarked, all the plums would go to residents of Ottawa and the large cities.

This is the particular part:

Sir Sam Hughes stated that when positions in the Civil Service were vacant they should whenever possible, be filled by men residing in the constituencies in which the vacancy occurs.

An amendment to this effect was moved by Mr. Maclean and carried by the House. It had no reference to the inside service.

Mr. McQuarrie's amendment stood over.

As a matter of fact, the last part of that report to the effect that the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) was accepted is not correct. I have in Hansard of yesterday the amendment which was finally proposed by the hon. the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Maclean) and adopted. It is this:

Excepting as to the Inside Service, all appointments to any position in a province shall, so far as practicable, be made from bona fide residents of such province.

The point being in regard to the province and not to the constituency as had been suggested by the hon. member for Victoria. The remarkable part of this is that the other paper, the Ottawa Citizen, publishes an exactly similar report in almost the same words. It seems to me a most remarkable thing that two papers of such standing as the Citizen and the Journal Press——

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. It is not in order for the hon. member to discuss the why and wherefore of the publication of certain articles in newspapers. If the hon. member wishes to take exception to any statement published in the press it is competent for him to do so.

Mr. McQUARRIE: In another part of the Citizen of yesterday, on the front page, there is a statement to this effect:

Mr. McQuarrie of New Westminster wanted soldiers to be exempt from examination, but Hon. A. K. Maclean, who is piloting the Bill through the House, thought that this would not be in the best interest of the service, although declaring that the returned soldier must be looked after. In withdrawing his amendment, Mr. McQuarrie expressed the belief that the House would be willing to adopt it next session.

I wish to deny that I made a proposal of that kind. What I suggested was in the form of an amendment to the effect that the Civil Service Commission should be given the power in certain cases, at their discretion, to exempt soldiers from taking this examination. I might also point out in this connection that this morning's edition of The Journal-Press has exactly the same paragraph, also on the front page.

DELEGATION OF CANADIAN FARMERS.

REQUEST TO BE RECEIVED BY THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. T. VIEN (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the conference of farmers now assembled in Ottawa have communicated with you requesting the favour of being received by this House. I would like to know whether my information is correct, and if so, whether it is your intention to communicate that information to the House for immediate consideration, as the conference is likely to conclude its work during the day, and if the House intends to appoint an hour to receive the farmers it must be done right away.

Mr. SPEAKER: In answer to the hon. member, I may say that I have just received a communication from the Chairman of the meeting at the Russell Theatre.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What is the gentleman's name?

Mr. SPEAKER: R. H. Halbert. It would perhaps be in order for me to communicate the letter to the House.

Russell Theatre,
Ottawa, Ont., May 14th, 1918.

The Honourable
E. N. Rhodes,
Speaker, House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Sir:

On behalf of several thousand Ontario farmers, I beg to transmit to you the following resolution just passed, and to say that, encouraged by the reception recently accorded the President of the American Federation of Labour, we are confident the request will be granted.

"That this meeting instruct the chairman respectfully to ask the House of Commons to receive him and two delegates he shall name, at the sitting of the House this afternoon, to hear their address upon the situation in the country and asking that democracy be honoured in the prosecution of the war and all other matters of Government."

The messenger who brings this will respectfully await an answer.

I am,
Most respectfully,
(Signed) R. H. Halbert,
Chairman.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Speaker, did you say the letter is from the Ontario farmers?

Mr. SPEAKER: The Ontario farmers. It is, of course, for the House to determine as to what its desire may be in the premises, but so far as I am aware there has not been a case where the course asked for in this communication has been followed. The reference to the presence in this Chamber of the President of the American Federation of Labour is hardly in point, because he was the representative of a great organization in another country. The right Hon. Mr. Balfour, and Mr. Viviani, were also received by this House. In all three cases the privilege was accorded to gentlemen from outside Canada, and it seems to me, with all deference to this organization, that it is a precedent which it may be somewhat dangerous to establish. If I may venture to say so, the receiving of one organization in this country will open the door for similar cases in great numbers to follow. However, I leave the question to the House.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Do I understand the communication comes from the farmers of Ontario, or from the farmers of the whole of Canada?

Hon. R. LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve) It comes from the President of the Ontario farmers.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: My understanding is that the request was to come, and did come, from all the farmers assembled in this city representing not only the farmers of Ontario but those of other provinces.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That makes the case all the stronger. There can be no doubt that Mr. Speaker, having given communication to the House of the request made this morning by the farmers who are assembled in the city, has discharged his duty. Mr. Speaker has no further power in this matter. If action is to be taken it must come from the House itself, and that action, of course, is expected to be directed by the leader of the House for the time being.

Your statement, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labour, belonged to another country, does not constitute a good precedent. I imagine that the representatives of a Canadian association should have as much privilege here as the representative of an association of another country. I would further point out that in 1910 the Canadian House of Commons received a delegation of farmers from the West who presented a petition on the subject of reciprocity with the United States. It is true that delegation was not received with the Speaker in the Chair, but they were received in the Chamber of the House, the Government and their supporters, and members of the Opposition, being present, But, of course, the matter is in the hands of the Government for them to take action.

Mr. SPEAKER: With respect to the delegation of farmers from the West, I was a member of the House at the time and I distinctly recall that they were not received by the House in session. The delegation merely had the privilege of entrée to the House of Commons Chamber, and there they addressed the Government. That is an entirely different matter. However, we cannot dispose of the matter on the Orders of the Day.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I think at the time the delegation came from the West they were given full control of the Chamber, and the ministers and members of the House were merely there for the time being as visitors.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point is that the House was not in session.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is correct.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Speaker was not in the Chair, that is all the difference there was.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I quite concur with the remarks made by the Speaker with reference to this matter. The leader of the Government is at the present time engaged with the same delegation at another place, and whatever action is taken should not, I think, be taken in his absence.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will communicate this request—or if not I, the Speaker of the House will communicate it— to the leader of the Government, and an intimation will be made at the opening of this afternoon's session as to what action will be taken. For myself, I would have no objection at all to the delegation being allowed, with the Speaker's concurrence, the opportunity of addressing the members of the House for a time after the House rises at six o'clock. That would place the present privilege on a parity with that granted on the occasion of the western delegation (which I remember perfectly well), of addressing members of the Government and members of the House.

DAYLIGHT SAVING ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Sir George Foster, Bill No. 86, to amend the Daylight Saving Act, 1918, was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon. Bill considered in committee, reported and read the third time.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY.

RENEWAL OR POSTPONEMENT OF PAYMENT OF INDEBTEDNESS OF THE COMPANY.

On the order to resume the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Maclean (Halifax) for the second reading of Bill No. 87, an Act supplementary to chapter twenty-four of the Statutes of 1917, respecting the Canadian Northern Railway system.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: At the conclusion of last night's sitting it was announced that we would proceed to-day with the Railway Bill, which was to be the first Order of the day. We were prepared to discuss that Bill this morning.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: May we not advance this Bill a bit?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have no objection at all, but that was not the Order which was set down. Yesterday we inquired what was to be taken up to-day, and were told the Railway Bill.

Mr. J. D. REID: It was the intention to take up the Railway Bill, but the Acting Minister of Finance thought it well to advance the Canadian Northern Railway Bill before we proceeded with the Railway Bill.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: All right.

On motion of Mr. A. K. Maclean, Bill No. 87 was read the second time, and House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On Section 1—Guarantee on renewal or postponement of payments.

Mr. CAHILL: Before this clause carries, I think the country is entitled to further information on the subject of the Canadian Northern railway. From the statement furnished by the Acting Minister of Finance on May 10th, as of September 30, 1917, the total liabilities are shown in round figures as $592,000,000. After deducting from that amount the total capital stock of $100,000,000; the stock of subsidiary companies, some $5,900,000; the reserves of $4,900,000; the affiliated companies advance account of $9,000,000, and the surplus of $34,000,000, there is a balance remaining to be assumed by the country of $437,000,000. According to the statement submitted to the Government by the Drayton-Acworth Commission appointed by the Government to investigate the value and assets of the Canadian Northern railroad, the maximum possible cost of the road would be $370,000,000. From this amount should be deducted the cash subsidies of $38,000,000, the land grant on which cash has been received to the amount of $16,000,000 and land on hand, making a total of $75,000,000. If we deduct this $75,000,000 from $370,000,000, it leaves a balance of $295,000,000 as the total investment in the road, exclusive of the cash subsidies and the land grant. Deducting that amount from $437,000,000 would leave a profit to the promoters of $142,000,000. This road comprises some 9,600 miles, which, divided into the total amount of $437,000,000, would make the cost $46,000 per mile. According to the Drayton-Acworth report, the cost should be $31,000 per mile. In other words, there is a profit to the promoters of $15,000 a mile. Sessional Paper 237, giving a statement of the Canadian Northern railway as of June 30, 1916, shows unguaranteed securities at $147,000,000, and from these reports, both the report submitted a few days ago and last year's report, it is apparent that there is a matter of $142,000,000 of promoters' profits.

It may be interesting to the committee and to the country to know if this $147,000,000 of unguaranteed securities represents the amount of water which has been injected into this capital of $142,000,000. The statement last year showed total liabilities of $578,000,000; the statement submitted on May 10 shows liabilities of $592,000,000. The property investment has also been written up $16,000,000 since the last statement was submitted to the House—from $494,000,000, to $510,000,000. No explanation has been offered of what these amounts represent. The committee is entitled to know what are the total assets of the Canadian Northern Railway company, the total assets and liabilities of the subsidiary companies, and the names of the stockholders and holders of securities. Apparently $140,000,000 of the country's money is going to somebody—the people would like to know to whom. We should also be informed who are the holders of the other $8,000,000 or $9,000,000 of common stock. This information has been asked for repeatedly in the House but has never been submitted. In their statement of May 1, 1918, the Canadian Pacific Railway company say:

> The total capitalization of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's transportation system, comprising 13,400 miles of railway in Canada operated directly by the company, with the rolling stock equipment and steamboat craft on inland waters, its splendid terminal stations and facilities, and other accessories, is $623,000,000.

If you divide 13,400 into the amount of capitalization of this company, you find that $46,000 a mile is the cost of the Canadian Pacific railway, containing over one thousand miles of double track, and including terminal facilities, hotels and steamships. We are asked to pay for the Canadian Northern Railway system an amount equal to the capitalization of the Canadian Pacific Railway company. It may be asked how the promoters of the Canadian Northern got this amount of money or these securities above the actual cost of the road. The answer is quite simple. The Government auditors, investigating whether Mackenzie and Mann made any money out of the Canadian Northern, come to the conclusion that they did not. But the auditors did not go as far as the Northern Construction company, which is another Mackenzie and Mann organization. This is the procedure. The Canadian Northern made a contract with Mackenzie and Mann at a certain amount per mile. Mackenzie and Mann let a contract to the Northern Construction company at the same price, and the Northern Construction company, in turn do some of the work and let contracts to sub-contractors. The Mackenzie and Mann Northern Construction Company get the profits; the Mackenzie and Mann Construction Company get the common stock—but the Mackenzie and Mann Northern Construction Company and the Mackenzie and Mann Construction Company and the Canadian Northern Railway Company are one and the same people. According to statements furnished by the Government and by the Canadian Northern, they have loaded this enterprise to the extent of $15,000 a mile, practically the cost of the road through the whole prairie section. We are told by the Prime Minister that the Government have safeguarded the interests of the people by appointing their own directors on the directorate of the Canadian Northern. Let me call attention to the names of these Government directors. There is Mr. William K. George, of Toronto, who has been in the Standard Silver Plating business, and I believe, is somewhat of a political acrobat. Then there is Mr. Graham Bell, an accountant, I understand, in the Civil Service, under the title of financial comptroller—a glorified name for bookkeeper. Then there is Mr. Edward Rogers Wood of Toronto, who is president of the Central Canada Loan and Savings Company, vice-president of the National Trust Company, vice-president of the Brazilian Traction Light and Power Company, director of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, director of the Toronto Street Railway Company.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: He is not a Government director.

Mr. CAHILL: My hon. friend has stated that he is.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Mr. Christie, Mr. George and Mr. Bell.

Mr. CAHILL: That is not the information given on Hansard.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Hansard may be wrong.

Mr. CAHILL: It should be correct.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The difference is not very serious, anyway.

Mr. CAHILL: The difference is not serious, because all the directors now on the directorate of the Canadian Northern Railway Company might be put in a bag and shaken up—and it would not matter which one the Government put their hand on and named as their director, for they are practically all the same. The information as to the Government directors was given by the Acting Minister of Finance during the course of his statement a few days ago in connection with the Canadian Northern Railway system. If we have no further interest in this enterprise than to appoint such men as these on the board of directors, at least we should, before we vote any further moneys, have a complete statement from the Government as to where these moneys are going and where we expect to end up in connection with this Canadian Northern Railway system. We seem to be getting in deeper all the time. Our liabilities have gone up $13,000,000 to $16,000,000 since last year, on account of this railway system—and the end is not yet. We have not taken over the road; we have not appointed directors who are taking an active part in its management. We are still handing millions to Mackenzie and Mann, and unless we can shake Mackenzie and Mann loose of this proposal the country will not stand for the payment of any further money to it. We should eliminate Mackenzie and Mann from the board of directors, lock stock and barrel, and put in charge men who can manage and operate the road in a businesslike way. You may say that Mackenzie and Mann are in a better position to manage the road than any new persons coming in. I submit that Mackenzie and Mann built the road for the profits that they made out of its construction, and the figures given by the Acting Minister of Finance prove this. Before any further money is voted, the committee should have full information on this subject. The Government have made no statement about what they intend to do in the matter. The question was raised yesterday whether the Government were going to appoint a commission to manage the road, and it was stated that they had formed no plan. Before we make further investment in the enterprise we should form some definite plan of management of the road.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I explained to the House on a previous occasion the purpose of this resolution and of the legislation which is to be based on it. Securities of the Canadian Northern Railway Company mature this year, which they desire to renew, with as small a payment upon principal as possible. That is a businesslike request, and I cannot understand why there should be any objection to it. Legislation was passed last year enabling us to make advances to the Canadian Northern Railway Company to an amount not exceeding $25,000,000.

That amount was disbursed largely in maturity and interest payments. A detailed statement of the expenditures was placed on the table of the House at an early date in the session. Hon. gentlemen will understand that, if the Government can assist the railway in renewing notes or securities maturing during the year, it is in the interest of the road and of the country. My hon. friend wants some more information. I thought I gave him all the information he could possibly require, and I really do not know of any other information I can give him.

Mr. CAHILL: The minister can give the names of the owners of the $9,000,000 worth of stock.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I purpose doing that.

Mr. CAHILL: He can also give the names of the owners or pledgees of the securities. He can give the names of the people to whom this money is to be paid, and he can give the whole policy of the Government in regard to this railroad.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not understand what my hon. friend means when he says I might give information as to whom the money was paid.

Mr. CAHILL: The graft money, $25,000,000?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The information with reference to the $25,000,000 is to be found in a return submitted to Parliament.

Mr. BUREAU: The return simply gives the name of the subsidiary companies on account of whom it was paid, but not to whom it was paid.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We could get that also.

Mr. CAHILL: The return says: Canadian Northern Railway Company, $9,000,000; Canadian Northern Pacific Railway Company, $2,000,000, and so on. It is Canadian Northern right through. The total is $25,000,000, and the dates on which it was paid are November 19, 1917, $12,500,000; November 28, 1917, $2,000,000, and so on down until February 4, 1918, making a total of $25,000,000. Where did this money go to? Who stands between the treasury and the people who are getting this money, if it is not the minister?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The authority for the payment of the amount referred to by the hon. member is to be found in an Act of Parliament of last year, and the amount was largely expended in respect to securities of the Canadian Northern railway which matured last year.

Mr. CAHILL: To whom was it paid?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: One cannot tell that. I suppose it is possible to tell who were the holders of the securities and who presented them, but that would be of little information to the House. If my hon. friend thinks it is important to him to have that information, I suppose we can get it for him. But these payments were made by the Government, of course, after investigation and audit, and the Government was satisfied that they were obligations which they had authority to pay.

Mr. VIEN: The minister said that the amount was expended largely in the payment of securities maturing. Did it cover them entirely or only in part?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It was expended in paying bonds maturing, interest, equipment notes and some construction work.

Mr. VIEN: We should like to have information in detail in regard to that, how much was for bonds maturing, how much for equipment, how much for interest, how much to banks for commissions.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I shall endeavour to have that on the second reading of the Bill.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We have passed the second reading of the Bill. When shall we have the information?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This afternoon. I was asked to give the names of the holders of the share capital of the company as held to-day. They are as follows:

	No. of Shares.
Minister of Finance and Receiver General of Canada in trust for His Majesty	910,000
Lazard Brothers & Co.	22,500
Mackenzie Mann & Co., Ltd., transferred in blank and deposited with province of British Columbia, Order deposited with Minister of Finance	16,000
Z. A. Lash	13,020
Mackenzie Mann & Company, Limited, in trust	12,660
Sir John Aird & H. V. F. Jones, in trust	10,000

	No. of shares.
The British Empire Trust Company, Limited	3,240
D. B. Hanna	2,600
R. M. Horne-Payne	2,520
Bank of Scotland	2,000
Lewis Lukes	2,000
D. C. Rea and E. B. McInery, in trust	1,000
W. H. Moore	1,000
A. J. Mitchell	1,000
William Mackenzie	100
D. D. Mann	100
R. J. Mackenzie	100
E. R. Wood	100
W. J. Christie	20
W. K. George	20
G. A. Bell	20
Total	1,000,000

The last three are the Government directors who have shares allotted to them for qualification purposes, and, of course, those shares are held in trust for the Government. That accounts for the total issue of capital of 1,000,000 shares.

Mr. BUREAU: How many shares has each of the three last named on the list?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Twenty shares each.

Mr. BUREAU: Is that what is required by the by-laws?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I assume so.

Mr. BUREAU: When was this stock transferred to the Government? When did the Government become the owner of the stock by transfer? That question has been on the Order Paper in various forms, and the date has never been given.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: $40,000,000 worth of the capital of the Canadian Northern was in the hands of the Government some two or three years ago. On October 1, 1917, the balance of its holdings was transferred to the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty.

Mr. CAHILL: Can the minister tell me the standing of the $40,000,000 worth of stock, whether we have acquired that completely, or whether it is still the property of Mackenzie and Mann?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We hold it completely, and have held it for several years.

Mr. CAHILL: As security.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, as proprietors.

Mr. CAHILL: Out and out?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: That is under the old Act.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: Will the minister give us an idea as to how much money will be required to renew certain of those obligations and on what dates he expects they should be renewed? That would be very important to know.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: During the present year?

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: Yes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We estimate an amount not greater than $6,028,000. That was contained in the statement I gave to the House on Friday last. It is, however, possible that the Canadian Northern railway may be able to renew in full the obligations maturing this year.

Mr. VIEN: Has the Government paid to the Canadian Northern or any of the shareholders thereof any amount on account of the price to be paid for the expropriation of their shares?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. CAHILL: In reading the names of the holders of the $9,000,000 worth of shares, I see that they all sound familiar, as being among the directors of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. The names of Mr. Lash, Mr. Christie, and Mr. Horne-Payne were mentioned among others, as being the owners of the balance of the stock. Why is this $9,000,000 worth of stock not being taken over with the rest?

Mr. A .K. MACLEAN: The Government have authority to acquire it at any time. Section 2 of chapter 24 of the statutes of last year says:

> Upon the making of said agreement, at least five-sixths of the said six hundred thousand shares shall be transferred to the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty, and if there be any of the said six hundred shares not transferred as aforesaid, the Governor in Council may declare the said shares to be the property of the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty, and the same shall thereupon become the property of His Majesty and shall be paid for pro rata with the shares so transferred.

Mr. CAHILL: On what basis would that be?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It would depend upon the award made by the arbitrators.

Mr. CAHILL: Why should we let Mackenzie and Mann hold out any of the stock?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They are not holding it out. My hon. friend forgets that this country owns the road. Parliament practically unanimously decided last year to take the road over; I do not think more than two members of Parliament were opposed to it. The only difference of opinion was as to the amount which should be paid for the equity. The road belongs to the people of this country.

Mr. CAHILL: The debts.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We are assuming the liabilities. As Parliament almost unanimously adopted last year the policy of taking over the road, we must, of course, assume the obligations of the road.

Mr. ROBB: Does the minister claim that the Canadian Northern Railway legislation was put through unanimously last year?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I speak subject to correction, but I think the policy of taking over the road was almost unanimously adopted by Parliament, the only difference being as to the amount paid for the equity.

Mr. ROBB: My recollection is that the legislation was put through by closure.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Not that part.

Mr. MURPHY: The whole thing.

Mr. CAHILL: If we own the road, why should we not manage it? Why should we leave Mackenzie and Mann and that ring still in control and coming to Parliament for further money? Apparently we own only the liabilities, and we have the privilege of handing out more money. The management of the road is a big business proposition and we should handle it ourselves. The management should have been taken over when the stock was acquired.

Mr. BUREAU: They run the country so they might as well run the road.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Minister of Finance last year, speaking about the appointment of a commission or a board to manage the road instead of the present board, said that the Government thought it advisable to leave the management as it was until the arbitrators made their award. In any event it will not be long before the Government will have full control of the road. It is undoubtedly a very important matter for deliberation as to how the road shall be managed. I do not know that the interests of the country have suffered by reason of the old directors remaining on the board up to the present time. We have representatives on that board.

Mr. CAHILL: Is that a statement of the Government's policy, that this same bunch shall operate the road? The minister says the road is not losing any money.

Mr. MACLEAN: No. I said that possibly the country's interests were not suffering by reason of the old board continuing to manage the road. However, it is the intention of the Government to select its own board very shortly.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Does not my hon. friend believe that it was the intention of the Government last year to select their own board? Does he not believe that this is the time for the Government to make a statement as to their policy on this very question? We shall have a statement as to their policy in a very few days, so why not now? If we cannot have it now, why not postpone the Bill? Why put off from day to day the statement of the Government's policy in this matter? These are supposed to be the last days of the session. The Government expects to prorogue this week or next, and in a matter of this importance we are told that we shall have the information some time later. What is the objection to giving the information to the House now? I must say the Government is not treating the House with proper respect. They are not giving us the information which is due to Parliament on this very Bill. We were to have the information, but we have not got it. We were to be informed how this $25,000,000 had been spent, but we have not got that information. This sheet the minister has prepared is not satisfactory; it is not such a statement as we should have. The Government last year determined to acquire the stock of the company, and that stock is ours to-day. The only thing that remains to be done in connection with it is the fixing of the price, and that matter is now in the hands of the arbitrators. Until the arbitrators have made their award the Government, after acquiring five-sixths of the stock, may make advances to the company. Here is the law:

Upon the making of said agreement, at least five-sixths of the said six hundred thousand shares shall be transferred to the Minister of Finance.

That stock has already been transferred. Then what takes place?

So soon as the said five-sixths of the said shares have been transferred as aforesaid, the Governor in Council may assist—

Mark the words:

—may assist the Canadian Northern Railway Company, or any company included in the Canadian Northern Railway System, in paying and settling any indebtedness of such company or postponing the payment thereof on such terms as may be agreed upon, and for such purposes may make advances out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund; Provided, however, that until authorized by Parliament, the total of such advances shall not exceed the sum of twenty-five million dollars.

Mark those words: The Government may make advances to settle any indebtedness of the company or to postpone the payment thereof. Under that section the Government have advanced to the road $25,000,000. The section continues:

A statement of any such advances, showing in detail the purposes for which they were applied, shall be presented to Parliament by the Minister of Finance within twenty days after the opening of the next ensuing session thereof.

There has been advanced to the road under that section $25,000,000, and a statement has been furnished to the House. What should have been in that statement? We should have been informed of the transactions which took place, and how much money was expended on each by the Government for the benefit of the country. All we know is that the company has received $25,000,000, as follows:

Nov. 19, 1917	$12,500,000 00
Nov. 28, 1917	2,540,421 97
Dec. 10, 1917	54,750 00
Dec. 27, 1917	1,983,503 47
Jan. 9, 1918	1,250,000 00
Jan. 18, 1918	2,000,000 00
Jan. 24, 1918	2,000,000 00
Jan. 30, 1918	2,017,460 77
Feb. 4, 1918	653,863 79
	$25,000,000 00

That statement shows the payments that have been made, out we want to know for what purpose those payments were made. Were they made to extinguish liabilities or simply to pay accounts. Were they made, as specified in the statute, in order that the money might be used.

—in paying and settling any indebtedness of such company or postponing the payment thereof on such terms as may be agreed upon.

What have we now? We have made them a loan of $25,000,000. Has that been used for the further construction of lines? No, it has been used to meet the following payments:

Principal of Construction Loans:
Central Trust, Co., New York, Loan repaid..	$1,750,000 00
Guaranty Trust Co., New York, payment in reduction of loan..	300,000 00
Columbia Trust Co., New York, payment in reduction of loan..	1,500,000 00

We have a right to know upon what terms this reduction of loans has been made. Was it upon the terms of the statute? There is not a word about that here. Is that treating the House with respect?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think that the return gives the right hon. gentleman a good deal of information. That return has been on the table of the House for two months and if it were not satisfactory it would have been easy for him to have moved for more detailed information.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: On the contrary, we should know how this money was applied. We should know whether it was used in payment for the redemption of securities?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The statement shows that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No, the statement does not show upon what terms the payment was made. Was it for increased interest? We have a right to know all this. There is no information upon these matters. Then we have:

Payment of principal of equipment bonds	$ 4,976,500 00
Payment of interest on equipment bonds	1,075,002 50
Interest and sinking fund on mortgage securities ranking prior to Canadian Northern Railway 4 per cent debenture stock guarantee by Dominion Government and interest on loans, etc.
Canadian Northern Railway	$ 9,136,083 18
Canadian Northern Pacific Railway	2,117,301 76
Canadian Northern Alberta Railway	165,374 91
Canadian Northern Western Railway	622,619 83
Qu'Appelle Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railway	202,056 00
Duluth, Winnipeg & Pacific Railway	570,552 87
Canadian Northern Ontario Railway	1,028,063 80
Central Ontario Railway	57,012 99
Bay of Quinte Railway	90,500 00
Mount Royal Tunnel & Terminal Co. Ltd.	582,741 58
Canadian Northern Quebec Railway	420,359 76
Quebec and Lake St. John Railway	172,363 32
Halifax and South Western Railway	233,467 50
Total	$25,000,000 00

Were all these securities extinguished?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Certainly; that is what the statement shows, in part at least.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is not what the statement says.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does my right hon. friend mean to say that we should present the name of the holder of every bond which was retired?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I say that you should give a full statement of the transaction showing how you applied that $25,000,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I submit to my right hon. friend that if this statement is not entirely satisfactory a request should have been made two months ago for further information.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No board of directors of any private corporation would be satisfied with such a statement as you have here. You should give full particulars of this whole transaction before you come and ask Parliament for further favours. I repeat that the Government is not treating the House with that respect to which it is entitled and is not giving it the information that it has a right to obtain.

Mr. BUREAU: The acting minister says that we have all the information that we require in this statement. I would like to ask him how much of the debenture stock has been transferred by the holders to the Government? Can he give us that information?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: How much of the debenture stock?

Mr. BUREAU: Yes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What debenture stock?

Mr. BUREAU: The debenture stock you mention in your return, page 2, you say that the money is being used to pay "interest and sinking fund on mortgage securities ranking prior to Canadian Northern Railway 4 per cent debenture stock guaranteed by Dominion Government." Has this debenture stock been assigned?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: When you pay debenture stock that has matured, it becomes extinguished.

Mr. BUREAU: When did this debenture stock mature?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: A certain amount matured last year.

Mr. BUREAU: Of the debenture stock?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not understand that. In our part of the country debenture stock is regarded as stock. It carries a certain rate of interest, but it does not depend on the fluctuations of the market.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, that is right, I had in mind bonds.

Mr. BUREAU: How much of that stock has been assigned to the Government?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: None of it has been assigned to the Government.

Mr. BUREAU: Where is it? That is not a mortgage or a bond?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is held by the public.

Mr. BUREAU: It is perpetual?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Certainly

Mr. BUREAU: And the Government has no assignment of it?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, and we do not expect to have.

Mr. BUREAU: And it is going to be outstanding?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Certainly.

Mr. BUREAU: Supposing under the by-laws of the Canadian Northern Railway Company the holders of this debenture stock are considered as stockholders instead of being considered as bond holders and should have a say in the administration of the railway.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It has no voting power.

Mr. BUREAU: That is information that this House ought to have. If the minister says it has no voting power I am willing to believe it, but there is nothing before the House to show the position of the ten or twelve railways which are subsidiary to the Canadian Northern or what special charters they may have. I have seen charters under which people holding debenture stock were entitled to have a say in the administration of the affairs of the company the same as those holding common or preferred shares. We know nothing about these companies. I submit, as has been said by my right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), this statement is absolutely incomplete and unless the person who made it thought we were better informed than he was, he must have come to the conclusion that we were such ignoramuses or know-nothings, that we did not deserve the information that is being sought. The comment made by my right hon. leader with reference to this statement is perfectly justified. May I be permitted to make a suggestion to the minister? This is one of the few Bills which I have seen which has come before the House without a preamble. I should like to have the date inserted in the Bill showing when the last amount of stock, making up the five-sixths, which was transferred to the Government. I would suggest that the following preamble be inserted in the Bill:

Whereas the five-sixths of the shares mentioned in section 3 of chapter 24 of the Statutes of Canada for the year 1917 having been transferred under agreement on the first day of October, 1917, as required by the said Act; therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

I think that would be better and would show the object of the Bill in addition to which we would have the distinct date of the transfer something that we have been seeking to get for such a long while.

Mr. J. D. REID: The date was given to the House in answer to a question some little time ago. The stock certificates for the five-sixths of the stock were transferred to the Minister of Finance on October 1, 1917. I witnessed the transfer myself; in fact, I accepted it on behalf of the Government. The stock certificates were then transferred by letter officially to the Department of Finance and they have those stock certificates for five-sixths of the stock in their own vault in the Eastern block together with the stock certificates for the $40,000,000 of stock which was transferred to the Minister of Finance some two or three years ago.

Mr. CAHILL: Is there a subsequent agreement?

Mr. RICHARDSON: I am not going to offer any remarks on this Bill at the present time because my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Hon. J. D. Reid) has promised, when he introduces his estimates—and I understand he is going to do it this afternoon—to make a statement to the House which I trust will cover the ground referred to by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I want to say to my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance that I think he slipped a cog. He is usually very cautious, moderate, and careful in his statements. A moment or two ago he said the country, or at least Parliament, seemed to be anxious and practically unanimous in its desire to acquire the Canadian Northern railway. I did not understand that that was the position at all. The Canadian Northern and, in fact, all the railways of Canada have been indulging in an orgy for the past twenty or twenty-five years and the people of Canada have been blind to the fact. And now we find the Canadian Northern dumping on the people of Canada against, I think, the will of the people, this appalling mess—I have thought the words over and I think they are moderate—a load of $400,000,000 of liabilities that the people have got to shoulder. It is only fair to say that one party is no more responsible for this mess than the other. Both parties have been to blame, and the people themselves have been to blame, but we have got to nurse the baby now, and we might just as well at the start face the issue, which has been dumped upon us.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is no more milk; we cannot nurse the baby without milk.

Mr. RICHARDSON: The milk may be thoroughly exhausted, but here we are with the system on our hands, and we have got to make the best of it, although one hon. gentleman suggests that we should wean the baby. There is no object in one side of the House indulging in criticism of the other side, because all politicians in the Dominion have been equally responsible for this railway mess, and I repeat that we may just as well make the best of it. I intend to wait until the Government makes its statement before indulging in some comments that I want to make to the House. In the meantime I have some sympathy with those who think that this railway should not be left in the hands of Mackenzie and Mann and the Canadian Northern directors. Why, all hon. gentlemen need do is to read the press for the last two or three months, and we find that practically the entire board have overlooked the operation of the road, and they are consumed with eagerness over the arbitration in order that they may bleed the country for the last dollar they can get out of it. After unloading liabilities on this country to the extent of $400,000,000, they are awaiting results of the arbitration to see whether we cannot give them some more money. The situation is an appalling one, as the Dominion will find very soon, when it undertakes to deal with these enormous liabilities.

Mr. VIEN: An amazing statement has been made to this House by the Acting Minister of Finance, who says that the policy of the Government cannot be given now, but that it is advisable to withhold it until the arbitration board now sitting to adjudicate upon the compensation to be paid to the shareholders, has given out its award. Why is this delay taking place? What is the connection between the award of the court now sitting and the administration of the road? And if the gentlemen interested are not satisfied with the judgment which may be rendered by the board, and take appeal to the Supreme Court, and from that court to the Privy Council, will we leave these thieves to administer this railway and bleed it in the way they expect to bleed the Canadian treasury by getting the big award that they anticipate? Will we leave them to bleed the railway and bleed this country until the Privy Council has given its judgment? I think that the hon. member who asked the Government for a definite statement of its policy before entering upon the consideration of this Bill, was justified in his question. The members of the House should not permit the Government to shunt their policy and sidetrack hon. gentlemen and refuse to give them that proper information which we should have before we are asked to give them a blanket authorization to spend money and to renew the liabilities. Before we give such a blanket authorization we should be told what the policy of the Government is to be, and I repeat it, there is no connection whatever between the award of the board of arbitration now sitting and the administration of the road; and if, as the Acting Minister of Finance has just said, the country owns the road, it should manage it, and not leave the management in the hands of those people who have wrecked the railway after having received from Canada more money than was required to build and operate the system.

Mr. MORPHY: I cannot conceive it possible that the remarks made by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Vien) can possibly have any effect at this juncture in the history of this railway proposition. If I thought that the great Canadian Northern Railway system, which the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) calls an abominable mess, was to be left in any uncertain position as to its management, I would certainly feel like withholding this Bill until the Government's policy was declared. I look upon this road as the people's road. It has got to be the people's road and to run independently of the Canadian Pacific railway, or any other large interest. Just here I would like to put a query to the Government, which they can answer when they like. —whether or not they propose to handle the Canadian Northern system, with its ten or twelve thousand miles of railway, running through a beautiful country in the West and having good connections, a road which brought forty per cent of the grain grown in the West out to the seaports last year, and thirty-three per cent for the last two years; whether they are going to run that system as an entity and run it independently, or whether they are going to link it up with the existing Government Railway systems? I think the country ought to know that. I think the country ought also to know the principle upon which the Government intend to operate the Canadian Northern system, which, to my mind, should be operated in the meantime independently of other Government roads, until it is put into the position where the public will be able to ascertain the facts, both as to the condition of the roadbed, and the value of the holdings, and determine what the future policy ought to be. Personally, I am not a pessimist in regard to this great railway. There may have been mistakes made in its administration in the past, but I believe it will yet be a great asset to the country. I have been over the system, I have looked at it with independent eyes, and have ascertained from personal observation that the most fertile country in the world, from an agricultural point of view, is served by this road. The Canadian Northern system has built up large sections of the West, and I look upon it with a great deal of hope in connection with the development of the country. It will be a great asset, and I am not going to deny to Mackenzie and Mann the courage and the vision they had—and the courage and vision of those who assisted them—when this road was built. I believe that there has been a mistake made in our railway policy. That mistake, however, did not lie in the Canadian Northern, but in the duplication of railways by the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental. I want to ask the Government whether this railway is going to be really a people's road, and whether their policy will have the effect of eliminating political influence from it? Will there be an independent board—which I submit there should be; an independent entity from the Railway Commission, presided over by either a strong railway man, or a man who has had to do largely with railway legislation, litigation, operation and work, whether in a real operative capacity, or as having had to do with large affairs through parliamentary life? Because herein lies the principle that can safeguard the situation. And in speaking of that, I come right back to the place which the road occupies: the Canadian Northern will be a competitor in the public interest with every other large railway corporation, both on this side of the international boundary line and on the other. This road will be a competitor to the Canadian Pacific railway. I hope the Government will not in any way relax their view of the people's interest by appointing a board which will be subservient to pressure from the Canadian Pacific railway. I think the safety valve for the future public interest in railway matters will be an absolutely non-political and independent board of administration. May I suggest to the Government what I think would be the proper basis? We have asked—I have not myself, but I have heard it asked four or five times this morning—if the Government have a policy and what is their policy.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We have all asked that.

Mr. MORPHY: I have heard it asked. We have had no answer. If the Government were prepared to say that they had not framed a policy, that would be an answer, and the natural reply to that would be that this Bill should not pass until the Government gave the House some idea of its policy. My idea of the way to run this road—and it seems probably presumptuous that a man should set up his idea, but I think that constructive criticism is fair criticism—would be to adopt the principle applied on the Suez canal. That principle was international, and was based on what ought to be the charge for tonnage passing through it. The charge at first was ten francs per net ton. In 1869 there were three million dollars collected in tolls on tonnage passing through the Suez canal; in 1916 there was over sixteen million dollars in tolls. The object in running that canal has always been to reduce rates. From 10 francs, the rate came down to 7¾ francs at one time; then it went back to 8½. But the law—it is the French company law that administers the canal—provides that if the percentage of profit reaches 25 per cent, the surtax on rates which they have applied in the principle of operation shall be reduced until it is wiped out, and ultimately it is hoped that the rates will be reduced to 5 francs per ton. That is a real principle which has been operated by an administrative board of thirty-two, ten of whom are English appointees, because the English tonnage and interest are very large on the Suez canal. Such a large board would be very cumbersome, no doubt, here. The reason it is so large, to my mind, is that there are so many countries interested that they must have representation.

I would not fix such a large board for Canada, but that principle should be applied here so that this system can be and shall be worked independently by the Government through an administrative council or independent board, which will have but one thing always in its eye, the reduction of rates, consistent with proper maintenance and expansion by branch lines, and so on. The public interest is in reduction of rates, both for the farmer in the West and for the industrial man in the East. I do not take very much stock in the cry about Mackenzie and Mann; I do not believe the Government are guilty of anything wrong in the fact that their name has to come up in this House, because I thoroughly believe that financially and so far as the management is concerned, they have been eliminated entirely, and that the Government have a free hand, as free as the air, in dealing with this railway. What I complain of is that the Government have not let the country know their policy; they have brought themselves under some opprobrium by creating, for lack of giving information, a suspicion that Mackenzie and Mann do own the Government. That is not so, and I do not believe it. But the sooner we get a statement of the Government's policy and the form the administration of the railway will take the sooner will the country's mind be settled and satisfaction will reign, particularly if such principles are applied in the railway policy as will result in a reduction of rates, by competition if necessary.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member for Lotbiniere (Mr. Vien) a few moments ago made the statement, if I understood him correctly, that no information had been given as to when there would be a change in the directorate of the Canadian Northern railway.

Mr. VIEN: If the hon. minister will let me correct him, I said that the Government did not give any information as to the policy they intended to follow in the administration of the road.

Mr. J. D. REID: A few days ago the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) complained as to there not having been a change in the directorate of the Canadian Northern since the transfer of the stock in October last. I replied to that hon. member that a change in the directorate would take place as soon as the arbitrators' award had been made. I think he raised the question that perhaps the award might be appealed to the Supreme Court and then to the Privy Council, and that it might be a year or two before a final decision was arrived at. I replied that there would be no time lost after the award, that even if there was an appeal a change in the directorate and a reorganization would take place.

Mr. VIEN: What is the reason for waiting until that award is made?

Mr. J. D. REID: I might say to the hon. member that the Prime Minister explained the reason a few days ago in the House. The reason, as I understood him then, and as we all understood, was that at the time the Canadian Northern was transferred, it was understood that the organization of the directors would remain as it was until the arbitrators' award had been made.

Mr. VIEN: Understood between whom?

Mr. J. D. REID: At that time we did not think it would take so long, we expected that the arbitration would have taken only two or three months and would have been over long ago. Complaint has been made several times this morning that the railway policy of the Government has not been given to the House before.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Why not give it this afternoon when the farmers are here?

Mr. J. D. REID: Let me say to the hon. member that this is really the first opportunity that we have had. We have not been on any railway estimate yet.

Mr. BUREAU: Yet you want to close the session on Saturday?

Mr. J. D. REID: I would say to hon. members that if the Prime Minister had not been engaged at the meeting with the farmers this morning he would, no doubt, have announced the railway policy.

Mr. MURPHY: Then my hon. friend cannot make the announcement in the absence of the Prime Minister?

Mr. J. D. REID: The reason it is hardly fair to ask me is that it has been asked to give the policy for the whole Canadian railway system. I am dealing entirely with the Canadian Northern system, and the Prime Minister is the person upon whom the duty of giving the whole railway policy of Canada devolves.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will he give it this afternoon?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Prime Minister will be here. So far as the operation of the Canadian Northern is concerned, some hon. gentlemen have asked what the intention of the Government is: Will it be operated as a separate system; will the other Government railways be kept separate from it; will political patronage be kept out of it? I think I made a statement here a few days ago that the Canadian Northern Railway system is a separate corporation. It is the intention of the Government to see that the operation of the Canadian Northern is carried on free from patronage in any shape or form. In its operation it will be kept as far from the Department of Railways as possible. We will re-organize the board of directors, the members of which, in respect of future operations of the Canadian Northern, will be selected by the Government.

Mr. MORPHY: Is the board to be elected by the shareholders under the charter of the company, or does the Government propose to institute a form of administrative council entirely apart from that?

Mr. J. D. REID: The directors would be selected under their charter by the shareholders of the company, being the nominees of the Government. I do not see the difference between naming a body as a board of directors and appointing a separate commission.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Can you organize a new system without legislation?

Mr. J. D. REID: It is not necessary to organize a new system. You can appoint directors who would have the same powers as a Government-appointed commission. Of course, the Government must be responsible for the men they name as directors. Every charter specifies the length of time during which the board of directors shall operate. It does not make any difference, whether we appoint this body as a board of directors or as a commission.

It has been asked whether the Government intend to operate the Canadian Northern railway system separate from the Canadian Government railways. My own opinion is that, so far as possible, the Canadian Northern railway and all roads owned by the Government should be tied up together and operated as cheaply as possible. It is my view that any railways that we own should be put under the same management as that of the Canadian Northern Railway system—under a commission, if you wish to call it that, or a board of directors. Why should the terminals of the Government railways and the Canadian Northern at Winnipeg be operated by two separate staffs? Why should they not be operated under one system? Why should not the same apply to other terminals throughout the country? Why should not the two roads running between Winnipeg and Quebec, one the Government-owned road and the other the Canadian Northern—the latter owned by the Government through the stock—be under one management in the matter of operation, but, in their relation to the department, as distant as the poles so far as political patronage is concerned? That is the way I feel about it. When the matter is taken up and discussed in Council, that is the position I shall take as a member of the Government.

Mr. MORPHY: Does the minister say that the matter has not yet been taken up by the Cabinet?

Mr. J. D. REID: We have not taken it up as to the personnel of the new board; the time for that will not have arrived until we have reorganized the board of directors. The present directors and their officials are operating the road in the interests of the country. They are not permitted to spend any money in new works or to make any abnormal expenditures without the sanction of the Department of Railways and Canals. In other words, they are operating the road with the least possible expense, pending the reorganization of the board. I feel that it would be much better if we did not do away with the identity of the Canadian Northern Railway system at the present time. The Government must go out to the markets of the world and renew the securities that are now falling due. We may have to borrow more money on the system, and, if we do, it may be necessary to raise money on bonds and securities of the Canadian Northern, which the Government must endorse. It would not make good reading for those to whom we apply for loans if expressions of opinion should go out indicating that members of the House have not the same confidence in the road that, perhaps, the Government have. The impression that might be conveyed is that the whole of the $400,000,000, representing the expenditures on the road, have been squandered. I have great confidence in the future of the Canadian Northern Railway system. Expressing my own private opinion, I believe that that system in years to come will prove to be one of Canada's greatest assets. Having regard to the $400,000,000, it is to be remembered that the construction of the Canadian Northern throughout the Northwest and in other parts of Canada has enormously increased the value of the lands and property through which it runs—practically to the extent of half the value of the road. This system is virtually bringing into the country $200,000,000 or $300,000,000 a year in the products that are raised in the vicinity of its lines. This the country would not have had if the Canadian Northern Railway system had not been constructed.

Mr. CAHILL: Or some other system.

Mr. J. D. REID: If the Canadian Northern system had not been promoted and carried on by those who constructed it I doubt whether other systems would have done the same work. Certainly they would not have done so without coming to this Parliament and getting the financial assistance that the Canadian Northern got.

Mr. ROBB: Is it the policy of the Government to acquire any of the other railway systems in Canada?

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not wish to be unfair to the hon. member, but he has asked me a question that I would like him to leave until the Prime Minister gives a statement in regard to the whole railway question. The hon. member has asked me to go outside of the Canadian Northern Railway system at the present time. I stated a minute or two ago that I would like that to be left until the Prime Minister makes to the House the statement that was promised at the time we went into the railway estimates. By the way, the right hon. leader of the Opposition a few minutes ago raised the question as to why we did not take up the Railway Bill this morning. Some of the hon. members say that they may have to leave soon. We thought it would probably be better, before we took up the Railway Bill, to have a statement on the whole railway question, and for that reason I intended, if we had got through with this matter, to have seen the Prime Minister and perhaps have that statement made this afternoon, and then we could go on with the Railway Bill.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: An excellent intention.

Mr. J. D. REID: This is, as I stated a few minutes ago, the first opportunity we had, and, therefore, I do not think there is any fault to be found at the present time. I think I have answered the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy), and the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Vien). If not, I shall be very glad to give any further information.

Mr. VIEN: I shall again put my question, because I do not think the minister has answered it. I asked why the Government was waiting, before determining upon its policy, until the award was given by the Court now sitting in arbitration upon the Canadian Northern. The minister has replied that, because an agreement was entered into between the Government and the managers of the railway, those managers would continue to administer the affairs of the railway until the award was given. That is no answer. That is no reason. Why was such an agreement entered into? Why did the Government enter into an agreement with the managers of the road to leave them in charge of the road until the award was given? The Government becomes the owner of the road and yet leaves the management of the road to persons who have no longer an interest in it. Will the minister kindly tell us the reason for making such an arrangement?

Mr. J. D. REID: I am sure, if the hon. member considers for a moment, he will see the unfairness of his statement.

Mr. VIEN: I do not see it.

Mr. J. D. REID: Supposing the hon. member was entering into an agreement to buy a piece of property, he surely would not expect to take possession of the property without even paying for it or saying what he will pay for it. We cannot take possession until the arbitrators come to some final decision. The agreement was made.

Mr. VIEN: The minister knows perfectly well that the moment the Government expropriates a thing, that thing is vested in the Crown by the mere expropriation of it, and the Crown takes immediate possession before the award is given. When the Crown, for any public purpose, expropriates land, it takes immediate possession. The land is vested in the Crown, and the owner has no longer anything to do with it.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member, who, I understand, is a lawyer, knows the difference between expropriation and agreement. He has read this Bill. He knows that we did not expropriate the railway.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Government cannot get away from the Bill.

Mr. J. D. REID: We have not expropriated the railway at all; we have taken it on an agreement, and we are going to carry out that agreement. The agreement is that we are going to take a transfer of the road, have the ownership in our name, and take over the absolute reorganization of the board of directors as soon as the final award is made.

Mr. MURPHY: Where is that in the statute?

Mr. VIEN: What is the reason for that agreement? What reasonable ground is there for waiting for the award before taking over the management of the road? I cannot get an answer. What is the reason? Why is the Government waiting? I cannot get any answer to that.

Mr. BUREAU: Did I understand the minister to say that, as soon as the award is given by the arbitrators, the Government will take control of the road? There was an objection raised as to that, that the award might be carried to the Supreme Court or to the Privy Council. The minister said that would not make any difference, that the moment the award was given, reorganization would take place.

Mr. J. D. REID: That is what I said.

Mr. BUREAU: Then the minister says the Government cannot take over its property until it is paid for, and it cannot be paid for until the price has been settled by some tribunal. The minister answers himself. He destroys the reason that he gives. If the Government is to take over the road after the first tribunal has given its award, the Government does not know what it is going to pay. The award may be reversed or modified by the Supreme Court. The reason given by the minister does not stand, and if that is the reason, it is no explanation to the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Vien).

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section pass?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MURPHY: Certainly not. The matter was opaque when the Acting Minister of Finance got through with it; it is now further obscured by the verbal fog which has been raised by the Minister of Railways, and which it will take all the ingenuity of the Government to dispel. The question that has been asked is a perfectly proper one, one that suggests itself to the minds of those who were members of the last Parliament, perhaps more readily than to the minds of those who are members of the new Parliament, although our new colleagues must be asking themselves the same question—why do the Government not take over the management of the road? Just for a moment let us look at what has happened. The Minister of Railways and Canals in one breath speaks of a statute under which it was provided to take over the stock of this company, and in the next he says that there was an agreement, thereby conveying, possibly not with the intention of misleading any one, an intimation that at the same time as the statute was enacted, an agreement was made or was embodied in the statute that the management was not to be taken over until the award was made and the amount paid. There never was any such agreement. Had such an agreement been mentioned at the last session, when this Act was under consideration, not even closure would have succeeded in getting that Act passed. There was no intimation that there was any such agreement. If anything of that kind has been done, then it has been done outside of the terms of the statute passed at the last session; it has been done without the authority of Parliament. What is going on at the present time by reason of the road not being taken over and by reason of the Mackenzie and Mann organization being left in charge of affairs just as they were last year? This is what is going on. This is the spectacle that is being presented to this country. An arbitration is taking place in the city of Toronto, the parties to the arbitration being on the one side the gentlemen that are interested in this road, and the parties presumed to be on the other side, the people of Canada, represented by this Government. By the fact that Mackenzie and Mann are left in charge of the organization, the people's side is being presented by Mackenzie and Mann. That is what is happening. There is no adjudication; there is no litigation being carried on with parties on opposite sides, with opposing interests, with their interests being represented through different counsel and so on. That is not being done. Mackenzie and Mann are left in charge of the situation. They are in charge of the books and records and all the information connected with this road. The people's interests are not being conserved or properly presented before this Board of Arbitrators, and this committee is entitled to know whether that is the reason why the management of this road has not been taken over by the Government. Is it because the Government are willing that all the information should remain in the hands of Mackenzie and Mann, that the people's case might be either improperly presented or not presented at all before that board of arbitrators, so that Mackenzie and Mann would get an award to which they would not be entitled if the people's case were properly presented? If the Government were in charge of this road and had possession of all the records of the company and knew all the details and ramifications of the workings of that organization, the people's case could be properly presented before the board.

Mr. J. D. REID: The Government's counsel, Mr. Tilley, had free access to all the books of the company and to all the officials of the company. They furnished him with all the information it was possible to get concerning the Canadian Northern railway. The whole Canadian Northern organization was working with him, that he might present his case to the arbitrators in the fullest possible manner.

Mr. MURPHY: I have the greatest possible respect for Mr. Tilley; I have great admiration for his legal ability, but that does not alter what I am saying or affect the situation in the slightest degree. The people's case, I maintain, is not being presented before that board of arbitration as it should be, and it is not being presented as it should be for the reason that the Government has not taken possession of the road and of the books and records of the company, showing all the details of the workings of that organization. Everybody who has had anything to do with the proceedings of the board of arbitration speaks of the situation in exactly the same terms as those I am now using.

At one o'clock the committee rose.

The committe resumed at three o'clock.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): I was prevented from being here this morning; otherwise I should have arranged to make a general statement in regard to the general situation as a matter appropriate to be considered in connection with this Bill. I shall make that statement to-morrow morning. In the meantime I beg to move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. We will take it on this Bill to-morrow morning.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY.

A FRENCH-CANADIAN BRIGADE.

FORMATION OF FRENCH BRIGADE ADVOCATED BY MR. DuTREMBLAY.

On the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean (Acting Minister of Finance) for the House to go into committee of supply:

Mr. P. R. DuTREMBLAY (Laurier-Outremont): Mr. Speaker, before the House goes into committee of supply, I would like to put before it a question which is considered of very great importance and that is the desirability and propriety of forming a French Canadian brigade for overseas service, commanded by officers speaking the French language. In the province from which I come this question is considered as being of paramount importance and as one affecting the best interests of the country. That is why I ask the indulgence of the House while I briefly present the reasons for the request which I shall make to the Government. I submit that the number of French-Canadian soldiers actually at the front, together with those who are in England and those who will be enlisted under conscription, will be sufficient to justify the organization of a French Canadian brigade; and therefore I strongly urge upon the Government to take this matter into their immediate and favourable consideration. As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, a brigade is composed of four regiments, or battalions, of 1,000 men each. There are actually, from the province of Quebec, seven regiments of which only one regiment is composed entirely of French Canadians and commanded by officers speaking the French language. The other six regiments are English regiments and are commanded by English speaking officers. The recruits that go from the province of Quebec to England are sent to a single unit depot and from that depot the seven regiments at the front secure the drafts necessary to keep their ranks filled. Whether they are English or French Canadians they draw from that unit depot all the soldiers they need. A few weeks ago a regiment in England composed entirely of French Canadians, the 150th Regiment, was disbanded. That regiment was commanded by a very competent and brave officer, who organized a regiment in Canada at the beginning of the war; he had been in France, had been wounded, came back to Canada, raised another regiment, and went with it to England. That is the regiment which has now been disbanded. Four hundred of the French Canadian members of this regiment were merged into English regiments from the province of Quebec. Only 100 of these men remained to fill the ranks of the 22nd, which is the French Canadian regiment commanded by French officers.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Did the hon. gentleman say the 107th regiment?

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: The 150th regiment commanded by Col. Barré.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It was in the 5th division.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: I would like to put before the House a copy of a letter that was sent by Col. Barré to Sir Edward Kemp, Minister of the Overseas Military Forces. It gives certain reasons why the French Canadians should be grouped together in their own battalions and I think it would help my request if I put this letter before the House. It is as follows:

Witley, Surrey, February 14th, 1918.

Sir Edward Kemp,
Minister of the Overseas Military Forces, London.

Sir,—

If I take the liberty of writing you this letter, it is not to protest against the military decisions or plead my personal case, but I have in view the prevention of a wrong to my men which is as useless as undeserved. It is therefore with confidence in your sense of fairplay and in the justice of my case, that I submit to you the following:—Canadian Headquarters have ordered the 150th Canadian Infantry Battalion to be broken up and its effectives disposed of in a certain way. I am convinced that this step, and the trend it exhibits, constitute a grievous error. And I would be remiss in my clear duty if I did not put forward certain considerations which militate against that step being taken.

If it had been intended to punish me and my battalion for a breach of discipline, no more drastic measure could have been adopted than the order to break it up and disperse its men, without their Officers, through the cadres of four different English speaking battalions.

I am now under orders to draft out five hundred men. Of these, only one hundred are to go to the only French Canadian battalion in the fighting line; the rest are to be posted to English Canadian units from the province of Quebec. Even if the necessity of breaking the cadre were conceded, from every point of view, the dispersion of the men is indefensible. The great majority of my command have a very poor command of English. As a direct consequence, many of them will have to carry out, and risk punishment for inadequately carrying out orders, the full purport of which they cannot gather. I urge upon you that this would work actual injustice, to say nothing of the resulting inefficiency.

Either the English Canadian battalions from Quebec have exhausted their proper recruiting sources, i.e., the English speaking population of the province, or they have not. If they have not, there can be no necessity for supplying them from other sources. If they have, they should be gradually withdrawn from the line and broken up to supply the remaining battalions fed from the same source. The only escape from this dilemma, under the territorial supply establishment, is by invoking sentimental reasons.

Now, on sentimental grounds the breaking up of my battalion is open to question. The proposed dispersion of its effectives is still more questionable. It can be proven, and after the war is over it will be proven that the provision of inadequate distinctive cadres for such French Canadians as offered to enlist was a potent check on recruiting from that element in Quebec. When French Canadian battalions were authorized, recruiting picked up somewhat but was again severely checked when unit after unit was broken up after arrival in England and their effectives dispersed through several different battalions. I noticed an immediate decline in voluntary enlistment when this was first done. A similar and proportional cooling off has followed the successive dissolution of French Canadian units until recruiting sank to zero.

At present, French Canadian minds are rather exasperated. It is not for me to seek the responsibility for their attitude. It is sufficient to note it as a fact, and to draw attention to it as a factor. Is it wise to furnish fuel to the incendiaries of public opinion in the province of Quebec, who will not fail to point out that this dispersion is like that of the Acadians, that it is made in pursuance of a determination to shed French Canadian blood without credit to the French Canadians, that it is dictated by a resentment of the recent vote cast by the province on the issue of conscription, and so forth?

May I suggest that if, as I am assured is the fact, the 1st Quebec Regiment and B. C. Reserves are not in a position to carry the burden of six battalions each at the front, the situation could be remedied by placing my battalion in the fighting line instead of a Montreal or British Columbia battalion on the point of growing too weak. This reasonable increase of French Canadian cadres would provide a reasonable and pleasant outlet for the French Canadian conscripts.

If this is too much to grant, might the battalion be drafted by companies, to which French Canadian conscripts could afterwards be sent, thus avoiding the injustice and inefficiency to which I have already drawn attention as resulting from lingual differences? I believe that this has been done in the case of one battalion ordered to be broken up.

This appeal to you is made with the greatest certitude that it shall have your serious consideration and dealt with the high spirit of justice and diplomacy which an officer who has been doing his duty since the first day of the war, can expect from his Minister of Militia.

This letter is signed by Hercule Barré, Lieutenant-Colonel 150th Canadian Infantry Battalion. A similar letter was sent to Sir George Perley, and to Baron Beaverbrook, but without any result.

A few weeks afterwards this battalion was disbanded and merged into English battalions. Now, Mr. Speaker, I lay down the principle that it is necessary to group French Canadians together for a strong reason which does not exist in the case of the men from the English-speaking provinces, namely, because of their speaking and understanding best the French language. Most of the French Canadians do not speak, and do not understand English. I know that English battalions from some of the other provinces were disbanded and broken up upon their arrival in England, just as was done with a number of battalions, or regiments, that came from Quebec. But the language difficulty which necessitates preserving intact the French Canadian regiment, does not exist in the case of the English-speaking battalions. If it is desired to secure to the fullest extent that discipline and that esprit de corps that is essential in all regiments and in all armies, and to achieve success in military measures, men from the same city, or from the same village, must be placed together. This principle, or what is called the territorial idea, is not new. It exists in France and in Switzerland, and it was accepted by Lord Roberts, and afterwards by Lord Kitchener. It is a principle of general acceptance, that men from the same village should be formed into a company, and men from the same district into a regiment, where their numbers permit. It is necessary when these men are at the front that pride of race and pride in their regiment should be aroused in them to such an extent that they are prepared to die, if need be, for the honour and glory of their flag.

The French Canadians come of a race that appreciate to the utmost what is meant by courage, honour, and sacrifice. In speaking thus, I do not wish to reflect on the other nationalities of this country, whose qualities I admire and recognize, but I am speaking now on behalf of my own people. The people of Quebec know full well the history of such famous regiments as the Legion Etrangêre, the Turcos, the Zouaves, and the Alpines, whose bravery is renowned the world over, and whose regimental flags have been decorated time after time by the Government of France. They know, too, that it is the greatest punishment and the greatest dishonour for a regiment to be debarred from attacking or defending a position of danger. And what has developed those ideals? It is the esprit de corps which prevails in those historic battalions and the desire to perpetuate their glory. Therefore, if we are to have amongst the sons of Quebec the highest efficiency, if it is desired to treat justly, the men of my race, the suggestion which I am making should be given effect to by the Government. The desirability for forming a French Canadian brigade is fully concurred in by the people of Quebec. Nearly all the men who have been closely identified with recruiting in my province, and almost all the newspapers, are in favour of this scheme, and I submit in this connection a splendid patriotic article which I read in Le Devoir a few days ago. I have translated this article, though I am afraid the translation will not do it justice. It is as follows:

For our Conscripts.

Our young men have come by hundreds to enlist during the last few days. Considerable groups have already voluntarily enlisted in the Flying Corps and in other dangerous services. They will go bravely. All will do their duty, as did the boys of the 22nd Battalion.

General Mewburn, Minister of Militia, noted specially the conduct of these boys, some days ago, and declared himself sympathetic with the idea of grouping them as much as possible from the start, and of keeping them together also on the battlefield. That would indeed be an excellent means to keep up their esprit de corps; it will encourage them if they are merged in one combatant unit, so that they will not feel themselves too far away from their country, and alone in a strange land. This is well understood in the English military centres. An English catholic chaplain, the Rev. Father O'Gorman, according to a despatch from London published by the Globe, wrote to the Times on the 15th of April as follows: "That it was urgent to increase the number of French Canadian battalions in France." This opinion comes at the proper time, now that thousands of our French Canadians entering under the conscription law, or voluntarily, are preparing themselves to go across the sea.

To give them officers of their own blood and language would be equally an excellent measure. The Gazette correspondent in London said the other day, on the oecasion of the merging of the 150th French Canadian regiment with an English regiment, that it was regrettable that these men had not been merged in a regiment commanded by Quebec officers. The Toronto News the other day was scandalized and astounded because certain Austrian soldiers had German officers to command them; so that newspaper will now understand the attitude of its English confrere and also the good sense of the words in the Star the other day, of Rev. Father Doyon, military chaplain, who said in London, on May 1st: "All that we desire is that the French Canadians as much as possible shall stay together and have officers speaking the French language."

It is also time to consider the question of the formation of a French Canadian brigade to form part of the Canadian divisions in France. For a long time, this project has been before the people without any result; circumstances were against it; it would appear also that it had the hostility of the higher functionaries. But, as the project of putting French Canadian conscripts in regiments commanded by officers speaking their language is highly commendable, the more ambitious project of forming a brigade of our men to be commanded by a general from our province should also appeal to the military authorities, if they are looking first and foremost to the best way of putting their conscripts in the best frame of mind before sending them to the front.

One of our European correspondents, well informed as to what is going on in the Canadian camps in England and in France, wrote us this authentic fact: "At Witley, a boy from Quebec province, being ridiculed, badly treated and unable to obtain his transfer from the Ontario Artillery to another unit where he could speak French and be well treated, committed suicide in a moment of despair." It would not be right to put our conscripts in such a position and expose them to such a temptation.

So we hope that General Mewburn, who seems to have good intentions, if he desires to be just, will take the necessary steps at London for the welfare of the French Canadians in the army. It is surprising also, as someone said, that it is at London and not at Ottawa that these details are settled. But, whatever the reason may be it is the duty of the military authorities to see that our conscripts are in charge of officers coming from their province.

These men are going on the battlefield. Numbers of them will meet death. They will fight with courage and with valour, and will prove to those who discredited them that they are not cowards and that what has kept them here far from the European front, were highly respectable motives. Surely, they have the right, at this supreme hour, to hear the language of their land to encourage them to go through fire and death; and we cannot refuse them at this last moment the right of French Canadian comrades to surround them, help them, and receive from their dying lips the last message to their families who are far away.

May it be that on the soil of France, these brave men will have the impression that they are fighting not among strangers but among friends and comrades who will recall to them their native land.

There is another article from L'Evenément, a Quebec organ friendly to the Government, of the same tenor as that I have read from Le Devoir, asking that a French Canadian bridgade be organized. I would also read to the House a letter sent to me by Colonel Mignault, who is well-known to the military authorities in Ottawa, who helped to organize the 22nd Battalion, who also organized the French Canadian hospital unit in France, actually operating in France to-day in St. Cloud. The letter says:

Montreal, April 29th, 1918.

P. R. duTremblay, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,

Referring to our recent conversation with reference to the drafting of the French Canadians into the English regiments, I have consulted with friends of prominence down here who understand the situation, and we feel most strongly that it is our duty to ask you to lay before the authorities the justice of the claim of the French Canadians to a brigade of their own at the front, or failing this, at least a new battalion. If only on the score of the more efficient work that will be derived having the French Canadians under officers speaking their own language, the request should commend itself, and as we are all working for a speedy and successful termination of the war, this argument would seem unanswerable. The sentimental aspect of the situation also is a very important one, as it is known that to-day the French Canadian recruits, as well as going to the 22nd Battalion, are also sent to the 5th C.M.R., the 13th, 14th, 24th, 87th and 42nd.

It is a simple calculation for the authorities to see how, with conscription, a French Canadian brigade could now be kept up, and the English regiments should, as has been done in the past, if they cannot keep up their own reserves, be merged.

Can anyone in fairness be asked to risk his life and the life of many others in taking instructions in a language he does not understand? This must happen in the near future if the present policy is continued. I could write much more on this subject, but as we have discussed it very fully, I must leave it to you to place before Parliament this most important and vital question to our people.

Of course, as I have already mentioned to you in our previous interview, it has always been, and still is to-day, my ideal that all French Canadians should be sent to the French Army.

Very truly yours,

Arthur Mignault.

This question of putting French Canadians in the French army has been discussed before. I know it was discussed with the President of France. The Prime Minister had an interview on the subject with Colonel Mignault. I understand that the Prime Minister, if not in favour of the suggestion, was at least inclined to look upon it as a good one. For one reason or another, however, the matter was dropped, and we did not hear any more about it.

In this connection I want to read a letter from a gentleman in Montreal who has done good service in the cause of French Canadian recruiting:

May 2nd, 1918.

My dear DuTremblay:

Having, as you know, taken a great interest in the French Canadian recruiting ever since the war started, having been one of the organizers of the 22nd., 41st. and other Battalions, to the 22nd, (I sent over six hundred men from this district), and being also a member, appointed by the Government, of the French Canadian Recruiting Committee, I write to you, as a member representing one of the largest French and English constituencies of our City. I would like to bring your attention very strongly to your duty, as pointed out by myself and the gentlemen that met you recently, of how necessary it is that the Government at once announce a strong policy of giving to these French Canadians, officers of their own, speaking their own language, and promise another French Canadian regiment at the front at once, with a French brigade in the near future, a wonderful step forward will be made. The fullest publicity of the French press, however, should be given to this. The whole situation has, however, been explained to you by French Canadians who have the welfare of their people at heart, military men and others. You, therefore, should be well posted and, apart from the justice of the claim, can lay the facts before the House, so that every fair minded man will understand the situation. It should be quite clear that a French Canadian, not speaking a word of English, cannot in a short time before he is sent into the firing line hope to learn enough English to understand the difficult explanations that he will need to be given, nor can be bring back and give in English the information he will gather. We understand that the authorities on the other side have many important questions at present to settle, and as they are over there in charge should be interfered with as little as possible, but in this case do they understand the present position and situation in the province of Quebec, and can they view it as we do? I think not, as otherwise there should be no hesitation in, at once, granting the French Canadians what they ask. The record of the 22nd needs no comment and, as you are aware, their commanding officer, Colonel Tremblay, a Kingston graduate, has a splendid record. He has, under him, officers who have been there since the beginning of the war, whose records, we understand, are of the best. Surely, in the question of the formation of a brigade, Colonel Tremblay could be asked if this could be done. He has the welfare of his people and his men at heart. This is only a suggestion, but might be brought forward, as I see by the press that the claim is made that there is no material for a brigade. With the recruiting that is now going on of the French Canadians, and taking the percentage of wastage at 2,500 a year for each battalion, this statement cannot stand. Sufficient reinforcements from this province can easily go forward to maintain a brigade, and if a school for young officers is formed in this province, a wonderful stride forward in the development of the situation will be made. Look into the enlistment of the young men, of French Canadians that have gone into the Flying Corps and the Tank Battalion in the last month, and you will see that now that conscription is the law it is going to be obeyed, but please do not hesitate to show the Government that the people of this province must be given men speaking their own language to command, and that they be put in a position to do their best and work up, if possible, the organization that will be a credit to the province and what they will be proud of. Understanding their mentality as you do, you know that it is far better to appeal to them than force them. They are law abiding and can fight if they wish, as the record of the 22nd shows. Do not hesitate to give them a full chance. We are all watching down here and will be glad to do anything to help the Government and yourself in this matter, if we are needed.

Your sincerely,
M. Scarth Stevenson.

P.R. DuTremblay, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

It is so obviously fair that the course which I have suggested be adopted, that hon. gentlemen will, perhaps, wonder why some action has not already been taken in the matter. One of the arguments made by the Prime Minister the other day was that we had not the material necessary to the formation of a French Canadian brigade. I shall not discuss the reasons why a French Canadian brigade was not formed, but I wish to point out that under the compulsory service law the men can easily be found, and one reason against it therefore disappears. How can the formation of a French Canadian brigade best be accomplished? Two suggestions have been made, one of which, I think, was considered the better by the Prime Minister in the interview which I had with him some weeks ago. On the battle line in France there are seven regiments from Quebec, one, the 22nd, composed entirely of French Canadians, and the other six commanded by British officers, each containing 200, 300 or 400 French Canadians. One way of forming the French Canadian brigade would be by furnishing reinforcements of French Canadians as these are needed. In this way, the units would soon become composed of French Canadians. The Minister of Militia and the Prime Minister are, I know, disposed to favour the grouping of French Canadians, but difficulty is met with in England because the military authorities there do not want to send raw recruits to the front; they want to send seasoned men.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What does the hon. gentleman mean by speaking of meeting difficulties in England? Who present the difficulties, the British Government or the Canadian Government, in England?

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: The hon. gentleman might better direct his question to his own side of the House, and seek a reply from the Prime Minister or the Minister of Militia. However, it is true that it may not be desirable to send to the front as a complete unit men who have never been under fire.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What I want to make clear is whether the British Government is the origin of the difficulties to which my hon. friend refers. If there is any opposition, it is not from the British Government. I do not want the British Government branded as interfering in Canadian affairs.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. gentleman (Sir Sam Hughes) is quite right. There was no suggestion from the British Government on the subject.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I should think not.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: I understand that these regiments must be composed of men who are prepared to fight in the battle line, and the difficulty would be in changing the officers. But officers competent to command French Canadian regiments may easily be found in large numbers. These seven regiments from Quebec could easily be constituted entirely of French Canadians, because under the present military service law four-fifths of the recruits from Quebec speak the French Canadian language. It is well, therefore, that the military authorities should decide this question at once and take the necessary steps to ensure that these regiments shall be reinforced by French Canadians and that men speaking the French Canadian language shall be in command of them.

A few suggestions were made to me by a French Canadian officer of high standing who went to the front and was wounded, regarding the formation of a French Canadian brigade. He suggested:

1. The initial step to be taken is to appoint a director of personnel and personal services in Canada and in England. This position is of great importance and must be filled by an officer of high rank and one who has full knowledge of past methods of dealing with these matters and intimate knowledge of present conditions in Canada. He must be given the rank of brigadier-general in order to afford him the necessary prestige and protection it is an absolute necessity that he have a good record. Lieutenant-Colonel La Flèche, D.S.O. Chevalier of the Legion of Honour, is one of the few suitable to fill this mission. Owing to his wounds he is not fit for duty at the front, and being decorated by both the English and the French Governments, makes an ideal liason between the two races. Special duty: to look after French Canadian man-power in Canada.

2. Brigade organization. Complement: officers 140, men 4,000.

He suggested that the command of that brigade be given to Lieutenant-Colonel Tremblay, D.S.O., officer of the Legion of Honour, who should be given the rank of brigadier-general. As hon. gentlemen are aware, Colonel Tremblay is the hero who to-day commands the glorious 22nd in France. He has already had the experience of commanding a brigade in France on different occasions, though he has not had the rank or the pay of a brigadier-general. It is evident that Colonel Tremblay would be well competent to fulfil the duties suggested. The officer further says:

Colonel Tremblay has commanded the famous 22nd Battalion for over two years, is known as one of the very best and bravest officers in France, and has on several occasions commanded the brigade. This officer is loved by all who have fought under him and who have known him. He, of course, should have full power to choose his own officers. The names of the following officers are given to prove that there are easily enough senior officers to supply a brigade: Major A. E. Dubuc, D.S.O., Chevalier of the Legion of Honour; Lieutenant-Colonel H. Barré, Chevalier of the Legion of Honour; Lieutenant-Colonel Desrosiers, Lieutenant-Colonel L. R. LaFlèche, D.S.O., Chevalier of the Legion of Honour; Major Vanier, M.C., Chevalier of the Legion of Honour; Major Henri Chassé, M.C.; Lieutenant-Colonel Piuze, Major R. L. Calder; Major DeSerres; Major L. Gauvreau; Major J. P. U. Archambault, Lieutenant-Colonel Dansereau; Captain Leo M. Duval, M.C.; Major Asselin; Lieutenant-Colonel Verret, D.S.O.; Lieutenant-Colonel Lefebvre.

There are at present enough officers with experience at the front to fill the positions of company commanders and platoon commanders. Most of the officers are in France or England, though several are now in Canada. To meet the wastage amongst junior officers, a school of officers should be organized in Canada.

We should have a French Canadian officers' training corps in the province of Quebec. I make the charge against the Government that if it wanted to have a full measure of enlistment from amongst the French Canadians in the province of Quebec, it should have established, since the beginning of the war, a school for officers in that province. The officer goes on. The letter continues:

Applicants to be very carefully chosen. They should be tried out in Canada, and when proven to be likely subjects to be sent to England, to complete their course where they would be ready to proceed to France to fill vacancies. This measure is most important, as many young men have not enlisted, and knowing that under present conditions they must go as privates, they are not satisfied. By overcoming this difficulty, a remarkable change will be felt regarding the Military Service Act, and while cultivating the very necessary esprit de corps, these men will bring popularity to the brigade, thereby creating a needed strength and sympathy for our fighting army and its members.

One thousand men, seasoned warriors now fighting in France (22nd Battalion) to be withdrawn and divided into four groups of 250 men. To each group 750 trained men who have not been under fire are to be added to form a battalion. Given that a sufficient number of trained men are now available in England, or if not, they should shortly be (draftees recently sent over), this organization should take between six to eight weeks. Recruiting under the present arrangements fully provides for wastage as French Canadian draftees are now expected to keep up over four English-speaking Quebec province Battalions, now at the front. All officers and men destined for this brigade should be recruited and trained in French-Canadian units, viz., Depot Battalions in Canada, and training battalions in England. This for maintenance of esprit de corps, development of self-confidence, pride of race and standardization of training.

As I have said, had this request been acceded to by this Government, certain misunderstandings in the province of Quebec would have been cleared away, because I am informed that French Canadian officers at the front would rather serve with their own people. The methods by which this end is to be obtained cannot be roundabout; they must be direct and to the point, and the Government should announce to the public that it is their intention to form a French Canadian brigade so that confidence may be restored to the people of the province of Quebec, and the Prime Minister knows well that confidence in the people begets confidence in the Government.

There is a special reason why a French Canadian brigade should be authorized in the province of Quebec, and that is the reason of language. The same reason does not apply in other provinces where there is unity of language. The Prime Minister seems to have good intentions in regard to this matter. If the Prime Minister will put aside criminal appeals from fanatics and follow his own good inclinations; if he will put himself on a high level of patriotism, then he will go down in history with the other great prime ministers as having been able to rise above petty questions of party and politics when a question of national unity and justice to the minority is at stake. I conclude with this appeal, that on this question the hon. members of this House will be true to themselves, aye, and above all, true to those brave boys who are fighting for us in France and Flanders, for our liberty and our future happiness.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend (Mr. DuTremblay) has spoken very earnestly on this subject, and I can assure him that, so far as his object can be carried out in conformity with military exigencies at the front, there is every disposition on the part of the Government to aid in every way. I am not altogether sure, and I think my hon. friend would not be altogether sure, that the mixing of men from other provinces with men from the province of Quebec in one company or one battalion would be without advantage. The difficulty in the past has been that men from different provinces have not been associated so as to know each other, to understand each other, to realize each other's viewpoint, and the good qualities of each other. That lack of understanding could perhaps, be obviated in the most effective way by putting men from different parts of the country side by side in the same company or the same battalion to fight for the same common cause. But I realize the force of the considerations to which my hon. friend has directed attention. We are not in the least unmindful of them, and we realize further the splendid courage and the fine achievements of French Canadians at the front, notably the 22nd Regiment. I speak particularly of that regiment at Courcellette, because, when Courcellette was captured, side by side with the 22nd Regiment fought a regiment from my own province. It unfortunately has been necessary to break up a good many units that have gone overseas, when it seemed almost cruel to do so. The Minister of Militia and Defence informs me that the city of Hamilton, from which he comes, has raised 10,000 men, and it is not represented at the front at present by a single distinctive unit.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Nineteen is the number of the Hamilton Battalion. It is still in harness.

Major-General MEWBURN: Only a company and a half.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We have had the same experience in Nova Scotia. The Nova Scotians raised a very fine body of men called the Nova Scotia Highland Brigade. They went across the seas as a brigade, but it was necessary when they got overseas to break the brigade up. One regiment went to the front, another joined the 5th division and two others were used as depot regiments.

I would like to say that the idea of raising a brigade of Canadians of French descent is not by any means new, and I would like my hon. friend to know this, and perhaps my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) can tell him something further; I remember that in June, 1916, I had a personal interview with General Lessard and asked him to undertake the raising of a brigade of French Canadians, and to take command of it and lead it to the front. He found himself unable to undertake the task at that time and it has never been undertaken since. My hon. friend (Mr. Du Tremblay) has alluded to a conversation which he had with me on the subject, in which I expressed, as I felt then and feel now, a great deal of sympathy with the purpose that he has in view. If French Canadians would like to have a greater number of distinctive regiments, and a French Canadian brigade, then so far as military exigencies will permit we ought to do everything possible to facilitate their formation. But my hon. friend will realize that it would be most unwise for the Government of this country to impose upon the military authorities at the front an undertaking which in the judgment of those authorities might be productive of disaster. It might be not only unfair, but positively cruel to send into the trenches a brigade of troops with only such training as they could get in camp, and without that acquaintance with the methods of trench warfare which is all essential. I was told in France a year ago last month that some of the methods of warfare in vogue a year before that had been absolutely discontinued. New conditions are developing all the time and new needs have to be met. Men have to be trained to the utmost limit before they are put into the trenches. I think, although I speak with no great knowledge of the subject, the usual practice is to put a portion of a new battalion in with men who have had experience in the trenches, in order that the new men may learn from their more experienced comrades how best to perform their duty and to meet the enemy.

But there is a possibility that something along the line of what my hon. friend suggests might be accomplished through the methods to which he alluded, or through some method analagous to that. I sent a telegram to the Overseas Minister, who communicated with Sir Arthur Currie with regard to it, and I received a reply giving expression to what Sir Arthur Currie thought might be done. The suggestion, in part at least, was this: that reinforcements for battalions and regiments at the front which at the present time contain a considerable number of French Canadians might be provided out of men of French descent who are now going forward from the province of Quebec, and in that way, by a gradual process such as my hon. friend has described, regiment after regiment now containing a certain proportion of French Canadians might be so supplied with reinforcements that eventually they would attain a distinctive character as French Canadian units, and in that way very probably a brigade might be formed. I do not know whether it would be practicable to form it in any other way. My hon. friend, who was good enough to communicate to me privately his own views which he has expressed on the floor of the House to-day, will realize, I hope, that I have the utmost sympathy with the purpose he has in mind, but he will also realize, I trust, that in respect of all these matters the Government must naturally take into account the judgment of the military authorities at the front, who are much more capable of judging what is possible and what is not possible in these matters than I or than any other member of this House could possibly be. So I leave the matter at that for the moment, subject to what my colleague the Minister of Militia and Defence (Major-General Mewburn) may say with regard to it. I emphasize once more my desire, so far as military exigencies will permit, to assist in the purpose which my hon. friend has at heart.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: May we hope to have a further communication from the Government on this subject before the end of the session?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have given really about all the information that has, up to the present time, come from Sir Arthur Currie, but if there is anything that I can usefully add before the end of the session I can assure my right hon. friend that I shall be only too glad to communicate it to the House. I shall use any further endeavours of which I am capable to assist in accomplishing this purpose.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I would respectfully dissent from the suggestion that the arrangement of these matters should be left to the Canadian command at the front. That practice should never have been followed in the first place, and should not be followed now. I know of one Canadian battalion which in three months after Lens wasted upwards of four thousand men. The 50th Battalion of Calgary in one year lost nine thousand men and one hundred and eighteen officers. The gentleman who so informed me is in the gallery to-day and was one of the unfortunates who were bowled out. It is this kind of generalship that has prevented not only the formation long ago of French Canadian brigades, but of a sixth division and two army corps in the field. In the summer of 1916 we had a plan for six division, two army corps, and a French Canadian brigade. The whole thing was thoroughly planned. One battalion was from the Eastern Townships; I forget the commander's name, but he was a cavalry officer, an Englishman; I think it was Colonel Gilbert. Nearly half of that battalion were French, and they were perfectly satisfied to come in with the other three French Canadian battalions. We were going to organize them into a brigade, but the whole plan was knocked on the head. It was not necessary, of course, to break up these battalions. The Nova Scotian Highlanders, one of the finest brigades that ever wore uniform, were broken up after the solemn pledge of the Prime Minister that they would go forward as a unit. It was some officer or power in England—I know what it is but I will not discuss it—that was responsible for the breaking up of this brigade, just as it was responsible for preventing the formation of a sixth division and two army corps, instead of one army corps and four divisions. Our losses with two army corps would not have been any heavier. Take the case of the Calgary battalion that I mentioned a moment ago. It lost nine thousand men in twelve months and was filled up, filled up, filled up, and filled up again in the twelve months. What difference would it have made if those nine thousand casualties had been spread over three battalions instead of one? I maintain that if my plan had been followed we would have had at the front to-day six divisions and two army corps, and then we would have avoided the troubles the Prime Minister will find among those men when he gets over there this summer. We would also have had a French Canadian brigade commanded by a French Canadian officer. There are scores of gallant French Canadian officers, without dragging in General Lessard, who have covered themselves with glory and were not afraid to face the music. We could have had all this in 1916 if the plans I laid down had been followed.

The right hon. the Prime Minister referred to the new conditions of warfare. General Rawlinson, with one man to a yard and a half, held back 25 Germans to the yard, trimmed them to a finish and held the trenches. He defeated the Germans 25 men to a yard and did not seem to have much trouble in doing it, and there was not a man between Rawlinson and Calais. These men were armed with Lee-Enfield rifles. The Canadian corps at St. Julien and at the second battle of Ypres with practically a similar number of men, one Canadian to every two yards, held back from 12 to 25 Germans to the yard. It chanced that the Canadians were armed with Ross rifles on that occasion. I am sorry to say that the conditions of warfare are very much changed since that time, that rifle shooting seems to have fallen back, and that bombs, hand grenades, and all those side shows have taken its place, with results that are not altogether too satisfactory, as is shown by the loss of Cambrai and St. Quentin, where we did not cover ourselves with too much glory. There is one thing more and that is that if you train the men to feel their own power there is no power in Germany that can drive them back.

Major-General MEWBURN (Minister of Militia and Defence): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I was unable to be present when my hon. friend (Mr. DuTremblay) spoke, but I should like to say one or two words because he was good enough to speak to me yesterday regarding his suggestion as to forming a French Canadian brigade. It would be very easy for me to get into a critical mood and go back to the early stages of the war and find fault with the organization of our Canadian forces. It would be an easy matter for some to play the old game of criticising my good friend the former Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes). But I must say that he is entitled to every credit for doing the utmost that any human being could do, and for the wonderful effort he made in raising the first and second contingents. I always objected to the methods by which he did it, and I do not hesitate to say so here. I have no hesitation in saying that if he had allowed the old militia units, which had been in existence for many years to have gone over, and held their original designations, and to raise one, two, or three battalions within themselves for reinforcements, it probably would have been better all round. We might have got better results if that policy had been adopted, but I shall not go into that now. I am trying to view the situation as it stands to-day.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Would my hon. friend have had each battalion of the old militia force represented at the front as a corps? If so, he would have had about 200 battalions.

Major-General MEWBURN: We have at the front today in the four divisions 48 infantry battalions, not including the pioneer battalions and line of communication troops. We had in Canada autogether about 120 infantry battalions including the rural corps. I believe it would have been a very simple matter to have allowed a certain number of city battalions, and also some rural battalions which could have been made into composite battalions, to have been trained and to have gone to the front under their own regimental numbers, allowing these units to have raised as many battalions within themselves as they could. Those were my views and the views of some other members of the militia at that time. In the fall of 1915 a good many of us asked the then Minister of Militia and Defence if he would permit us in Military District No. 2 to raise an Ontario division for the front. He agreed and promised a division from Ontario. It was raised and organized in all its component parts, except the Howitzer brigade, but the military situation was such that it did not work out as we had hoped it would, and we were told it was not possible to carry out the scheme as we had supposed. We still "carried on," did a lot of work, got men, and we did achieve very good results.

It is not within my power to-day to say that a French Canadian brigade may be raised from the province of Quebec; that it shall go overseas as a bridagde; and that we shall take out one of the brigades at present at the front and substitute for it a new brigade. But I think my hon. friend will agree that I have gone out of my way —and it has been a pleasure to me to do it —to meet in every way possible the views of my hon. friends who have shown such a magnificent desire to get men from the province of Quebec. I have done everything in my power to meet that situation. I realize the fact that not only in their interest, but in the interest of the service, it is most desirable that men coming from the same localities and men of the same condition in life should be kept together, and have opportunity of associating together both in training and at the front.

Let me refer to the formation of the first Tank battalion that has been raised in Canada. We received instructions from overseas to raise a tank battalion. We thought it well to immediately get in touch with the various universities in Canada, we communicated with them, and the result is that we have in the city of Ottawa to-day the first Tank battalion raised in Canada.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many men?

Major-General MEWBURN: Nearly 800 men. It will be the privilege of the members of this House to see that Tank battalion on parade in front of the Parliament Buildings on Friday afternoon before they leave for overseas. That is the first battalion of that kind that has been raised in Canada and it is most creditable to my friends from the province of Quebec that they rose to the occasion and raised their quota for that corps. The result has been so gratifying that the question has been asked me by some members, "Could we not attempt a second Tank battalion." I did not hesitate to say that I thought we could, and I have already cabled overseas to see if we can get permission to raise a second Tank battalion in Canada.

As to a French Canadian brigade, I may say we have been in communication with the universities in the province of Quebec, and I am glad to say that Laval University both in Montreal and in Quebec has met us in a splendid spirit, and has undertaken to raise two companies from the C.O. T.C. I shall do all in my power not only to secure further reinforcements for our troops but to promote that solid unity of sentiment that should exist between the people of the different provinces of Canada.

That is my fond hope and desire and just as soon as I can get away from Parliament I shall take a trip through the province of Quebec to see what further can be done to put that plan into effect. I hope and sincerely trust that the C.O.T.C. to which I have referred, will not be the only one in the province of Quebec. As to whether a French Canadian brigade can be authorized and raised, or as to whether a French Canadian brigade can be sent to the front, it is not for me to say. That must be left to the Commander of the Force in France.

SUPPLY—DELEGATION OF FARMERS.

Mr. T. VIEN (Lotbinière): May I remind the House that a communication was made to us this morning from the convention of farmers now in session in Ottawa? These farmers have asked us to give them an appointment so that two or three representatives from their conference might address this House. I have been advised by one of the members from Ontario of the executive committee, that they will be in session at the Arena from two o'clock until six this afternoon and that their executive is expecting the answer that was promised by your letter, Mr. Speaker, in reply to their communication of this morning.

I venture to suggest that it may be proper to determine, first, whether we are going to receive these farmers, then fix the hour for doing so; and then inform them of our decision without delay so that they could make arrangements to meet us at the appointed time.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I rise to speak with the permission of the House, because I have spoken already. I had the privilege this morning, for two hours and a half, of attending a meeting with the delegates to whom my hon. friend has made allusion, and it does not seem to me desirable at this stage of the session that the proceedings of the House should be interrupted for the purpose which he has mentioned.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am in a position whenever the House so desires to make it acquainted with the views which were expressed at that meeting, and under the circumstances I do not feel that the House ought to interrupt its proceedings for the purpose referred to. If these gentlemen would like, between the hours of six and eight o'clock, to address any members of the House who would wish to be present to hear them, there is not the slightest objection to it, but to interrupt for that purpose, the proceedings during the ordinary hours at which this House meets, seems out of the question under present conditions.

SUPPLY.

CAMP BORDEN.

PURCHASE OF LAND FOR THE CAMP SITE.

Hon. R. LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Militia and Defence to the manner in which the expropriation of land for Camp Borden was carried out. A motion in my name in regard to this matter has been on the Order Paper from the beginning of the session until lately, when, as it could not be reached, owing to the advanced state of the session, by agreement with the right hon. leader of the House, I allowed it to be dropped with the understanding that I should be free to bring the subject up on going into Supply. My remarks on this occasion will be short and to the point.

The matter in itself is of some importance. Prior to the war, Mr. Speaker, the military authorities in Canada had secured 359,000 acres of military camp ground. After the war my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence, acquired for the Government, and rightly so, the now famous Valcartier camp, which brought the total acreage of military camp grounds to 372,000 acres. Later on, in May of the year 1916, the Government further acquired what is now known as Camp Borden in the province of Ontario, comprising in the neighbourhood of 16,200 acres. In addition, Mr. Speaker, the Militia Department controls other areas of land known as the Dorval property, the old La Prairie camp, and the Rockcliffe and Connaught rifle ranges. The contract between the Minister of Militia and Defence and the would-be owner or proprietor of the property which has since become well known as the Borden camp, was made on the 10th April, 1916. The contract was entered into between the Hon. Edward Kemp, now Sir Edward Kemp —who was then the Acting Minister of Militia and Defence,—and a gentleman by the name of James Barr.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I might point out that it was not the Minister of Militia and Defence, it was the acting minister who entered into that contract.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am glad to be corrected by my hon. friend. It was the Acting Minister of Militia and Defence. The contract was for the delivery of 17,300 acres of land for the sum of $207,600, at the rate of $12 per acre. James Barr obtained the land. He was the owner of a certain portion, but obtained the balance from divers owners at the rate of $8 per acre, and in some cases even less. Barr represented himself as the Government agent, and offered to many of the parties, as I will show in a moment, from $3 to $8 per acre for the land which he sought to acquire, he himself having an agreement at that time with the then Acting Minister of Militia and Defence under which he was to receive $12 an acre. At first the owners resisted and protested when asked to dispose of their property. Some of them had enlisted and gone overseas, and the bargain was made with their wives or relatives. As there was on their part a fear of the law and of long drawn-out litigation and proceedings before the Exchequer Court, with consequent delays and appeals to the courts, most, if not all, of the owners, agreed to accept the amounts which were offered to them.

Now in order to make this case very clear and to show how those poor people were duped, I will first of all read the agreeement entered into between the Acting Minister of Militia and Defence and James Barr. I need not describe the lands themselves, which are well known in character. In the contract they are described as:

Property containing 17,300 acres, and which said property is more particularly shown enclosed within the red lines on the sketch hereto attached, at and for the price of sum of $207,600, it being understood that if said above-mentioned property exceeds the acreage of 17,300 that you are to pay me in addition to the above sum, a sum equivalent to $12 per acre on such overplus, and in case it does not amount to 17,300, acres there is to be deducted from the above sum, an amount equivalent to $12 per acre on the deficiency.

Barr declares himself to be the owner of some 8,000 acres of the above-mentioned land, so he had to acquire from third parties the balance of the property. This agreement was signed on the 10th of April, 1916, by James Barr and by A. E. Kemp, Acting Minister of Militia and Defence, and was witnessed by F. B. Poucher, Toronto, April 15th, 1916.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Who signs that as witness?

Mr. LEMIEUX: The witness is F. B. Poucher, evidently an old French name.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is he the land valuator of the National Trust Company?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have seen his name connected with the National Trust, but as to that I cannot vouch. Mr. Poucher could vouch, I suppose. Now, Mr. Barr evidently had in mind to get the balance of the property at as cheap a price as possible. He was already in possession of 8,000 acres. He retained the services of a gentleman named G. A. Radenhurst, solicitor, barrister, notary public and conveyancer, of Barrie, Ont. I will give the letter which this barrister wrote to the various parties owning the balance of the lots:

Barrie, November 25, 1916.

Dear Sir,—

I enclose you herewith the formal tender on behalf of the Crown—

You see, he represents himself as acting for the Crown, that is, for the Department of Militia and Defence.

—for the lands expropriated as part of Camp Borden. I would be glad if you would let me know whether it is accepted or not, and if not accepted the name of any solicitor who would accept service for you of the information to be lodged. Also if the lot named in the tender is not the property you are interested in, or if you are interested in any other property in the said site not settled for, please let me know. The Crown is only anxious—

Always speaking on behalf of the Crown, for the Department of Militia and Defence.

[Mr. Lemieux.]

and in the name of the Acting Minister of Militia and Defence.

—that what is fair and just shall be done, but as the purchasing agent and you differ as to values this is the only course we see that can be fairly taken to ascertain the value of the lands.

Yours truly,

G. A. Radenhurst.

Many of the unfortunate proprietors, fearing long-drawn out expropriation proceedings before the courts, yielded to the demand made by this would-be counsel for the Crown, and it was only after they had received the pittance presumably offered them by the Crown through Mr. Radenhurst, who, in fact, was acting only for James Barr, that they addressed a petition to His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught, then Governor General. I have that petition here, and shall put it on Hansard:

Mimico, Ont., September 26, 1916.

To His Royal Highness The Duke of Connaught, Governor General of Canada.

May it please your Royal Highness:

My husband, John Jepson, is a private in the 124th Battalion now in England, and my eldest son is at Camp Borden, and I am living here with my younger children. Four years ago we bought twenty acres which is part of the land taken for Camp Borden. We were well satisfied with the land and intended making our home there, paying for it by hard savings. We have already paid $333, and owe about $25 yet before we get our deed. A man saying he is the purchasing agent for the Government tells us that the Government has taken it and won't pay more than $160. This is a cruel injustice that the Government should rob us of $200, when the only wage-earners of the family are fighting for Canada.

I humbly petition your Royal Highness to save my family from this shameful robbery. My husband cannot attend to this himself and I do not know what to do; so I take this liberty which I hope you will pardon.

Your obedient servant,

Ada Jepson.

Simon Street,
Mimico, Ont.

The secretary of His Royal Highness acknowledged receipt of that letter, and said that it had been referred to the minister—the acting minister I suppose—who would see that justice was done. Mrs. Jepson, however, was nevertheless awarded $160, while James Barr, under his contract with the Acting Minister of Militia and Defence, got $80 profit out of it.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The hon. member says that this lady was awarded a certain amount. Who awarded it?

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Exchequer Court. Mr. Radenhurst got a deed signed by this lady in the absence of her husband, who was fighting in France for Canada, and fearing that it would come before the courts, and being under the impression that Radenhurst and Barr were acting for the Crown, she yielded.

Let us take the case of William Russell, No. 29 Rusholme Park Crescent, Toronto, County of York, also on the matter of Camp Borden. I have here his affidavit. He was the owner of twenty acres, Mr. Speaker, in that site taken for the Government for Camp Borden. He had paid $17 per acre for it, had bought it after personal inspection for his summer home, and was well satisfied with it. What took place in his case? He will recite the facts:

That in order to get me to sell for less than it cost, a man named James Barr claiming to be the Government agent offered me $8 per acre, stating that was all the Government would pay, and if I did not take that price it would be confiscated by the Government. Previous to that, he offered my wife $3 per acre, using the same threats to her and stating that he had got lots of the land at that price, which I quite believe if he used the same means to acquire it, especially when his conduct was endorsed by Radenhurst, the Government solicitor, who referred to Barr as the purchasing agent and repeated his offer at $8, stating that the Crown is only anxious that what is fair and just should be done, but as the purchasing agent (Barr) and you differ as to values, etc. I have since ascertained that at the time Barr tried to compel my wife to sell for $3 he had already sold my land to the Government for $12 per acre.

So there was a clear gain of $4 per acre inuring to James Barr. Russell continues:

My son bought the adjoining lot at the same time. He is now fighting with the Canadian army in France and he is treated in the same way as I am. We each are offered less than half our cost and have both costs to pay, while Barr's costs are paid by the Government. I have two sons in the fighting line including the one they are trying to rob.

(Signed) W. Russell.

Then there is another case in which the Government paid $160, by the same device, for land which had cost the owner $670, James Barr making quite a profit on the deal. A man by the name of George Behe, of Toronto, solemnly declares:

I am nearly sixty years of age, working in a factory for my daily bread, and bought this land by hard savings, to live on when too old for factory work. I am well satisfied with the land, and did not wish to sell it. I have sent three sons to the war; my eldest, George, was killed at Ypres; my second, Harry, was wounded four times, twice while acting as doctor's assistant and continued dressing the wounded after the doctor was killed, for which he received the D.S. Medal, and I have to-day received a telegram that my third son, Tom, of the 204th regiment is severely wounded. I am told that the Canadian Government have taken my land without my consent and offered me $160 for it. Canada, not content with my giving three sons to her defence, proposes now to rob me of $520.

(Signed) J. G. Behe.

Mr. BOYS: What are the numbers of the lots and concessions in the cases referred to?

Mr. LEMIEUX: This man Behe said that in November, 1911, he bought twenty acres in lot 28, fifth concession, Tossorontio, paying for the said lot $320. He says that wire fencing, clearing and putting under cultivation cost him $350, a total of $670. In the other cases the numbers and descriptions of the lots are not given, but my hon. friend may obtain the official numbers from the department. My object in moving for the papers in this case was to get the titles and papers generally from the Exchequer Court proceedings.

In another case the property of a soldier at the front was sacrificed to make a profit of $80 for this man James Barr. The affidavit in this case is given by a lady, Isabel Tubb, who solemnly declares:

Henry Herbert Tubb was the owner of twenty acres included in the site taken by the Government for Camp Borden, which cost him $16 per acre. That in order to get him to sell it for less than it cost, a man claiming to be the Government agent wrote to me from Barrie and offered $8 per acre and stated that was the highest amount the Government would pay. The said party making the offer was the Crown Solicitor acting for the Government in the matter. The said Henry Herbert Tubb is now overseas and all business has been transacted through me, his wife.

That is, through herself. She declares that she has full knowledge of the matters in question.

Another case was that of George Buxton, who was the owner of 20 acres, being part of lot 27 in the fifth concession included in the site taken by the Government for Camp Borden. It had cost George Buxton $350 and for it he was offered by James Barr and a man named C. F. Wright, both claiming to be Government agents, $8 per acre. Both said that the amount offered was all the Government could pay and that unless George Buxton would take that price he might have to fight the Government for three years and finally get nothing. According to Buxton's affidavit, both these men, Wright and Barr, stated explicitly that they were employed by the Government and that the Government would not give more than $8 per acre. Of course Barr was pocketing the difference between $8 and $12 per acre.

Another case was that of I. F. Berry, of Toronto, who solemnly declares:

On the 16th August 1911 I went up to Lisle with a friend and selected the forty acres after full inquiry and personal inspection. My friend bought forty acres at the same time. We tested the land and considered it worth a great deal more than the $15 we paid for it. It was better than the advertisement said as we found qualities which had not been mentioned. We went up alone and paid our own expenses. On February 1, 1916, I paid my last instalment after much saving and self-denial, intending shortly to go on the land. The forty acres has cost me altogether $700 and represents all my savings for six years, But my land had a special value. It was near the river and in developing the water power my land would be absolutely necessary. Mr. Radenhurst, the Government's solicitor, wrote me that the Government would not take my land without just and fair compensation and advised me to see Wright and Barr, College Street. Wright and Barr sent a man named Barnes to see me and said Wright and Barr had been appointed by the Government to buy the land and would give me $8 per acre and if I refused I would have to fight the Government and that such cases lasted for years.

He also said the Government was getting land for less and would not in any case pay over $8. I have since learned that Mr. Barr had already sold my land to the Government for $12, expecting to compel me by threats to sell for $8, so he could make $160 at my expense. Mr. Radenhurst helped him all he could to compel me to sell my land at a loss of $450. The Government should at least give me what I paid for the land and order Barnes, Wright and Barr to be arrested, if the sentiments of right and justice have any influence. The land is assessed for $400, and I have paid taxes on that valuation.

The mulcted third parties have, through His Excellency the Governor General in Council, petitioned the present Government, and I sincerely hope the Government will live up to that sense of fair play and justice which must animate every true Britisher and Canadian. Here are men whose sons are at the front, some of them having been wounded; here are men who have given as many as three sons to the cause of liberty and justice; here are women whose only support is a husband or a son at the front, and during the absence of those dear ones, speculators have the audacity to represent themselves as being Government agents and Crown solicitors, and by their representations they get signatures from those unsuspicious, honest people, because the latter fear that if they plead with the Government before the courts of the land, their cases will take many years to decide and thus they sacrifice the earnings and the properties which they have acquired after many years of hard and unremitting toil. I hope the sense of British fair play which ought to animate the Government in the present instance will exhibit itself, and that, after investigation, those people will be reimbursed the moneys that have been snatched away from them by those agents. I do not accuse; I make no charge against the Department of Militia and Defence; I make no charge against the Government; but I say that, now that I have made public the facts and that they are known officially, it is the bounden duty of the Government to hold an inquiry into those matters and to see that justice is done.

This is the petition which has been forwarded to His Excellency the Governor General in Council by the aggrieved parties:

Whereas, by a certain agreement entered into between the Hon. A. E. Kemp, Acting Minister of Militia for the Dominion of Canada, and James Barr, of the city of Toronto, province of Ontario, dated April 14, 1916, the Government of the Dominion of Canada undertook to purchase at $12 an acre some 17,300 acres described in the aforementioned agreement as situate, lying and being in the county of Simcoe and known popularly as Camp Borden.

And Whereas, after entering into this agreement, the aforementioned James Barr, as the representative of the Minister of Militia, acquired possession of much of this land at $8, and less, an acre from soldiers in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, their wives and widows, and farmers in none too opulent circumstances; and whereas, by the sale to the Government of this land at $12 an acre in pursuance of the aforementioned agreement between Hon. A. E. Kemp and James Barr, the said Barr realized an enormous, and altogether unjustifiable profit.

And Whereas, in the Exchequer Court of Canada, at a session in Toronto on May 17 and 18, 1917, the price paid by the said Barr to the original owners was ratified at expropriation proceedings, the learned trial judge holding that what Barr had obtained from the Government for the land had nothing to do with the value of the land and the price he paid for it:—

Now therefore, the following petitioners humbly pray that His Majesty's Government may in a spirit of justice deem it meet and right to order a further and more thorough inquiry into the transaction in all its ramifications with a view to determining what may be done further towards an equitable adjustment and award.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

Though I make no charge against the Government, I wish however to qualify my statement by saying this, that the Government should never employ go-betweens as between the Crown and the party whose property is to be expropriated. An agreement was made in this case between the Acting Minister of Militia and Defence and Barr by which a certain piece of property was to be bought by the Government for $12 an acre. Why should the Crown have made such a bargain with James Barr, when the Crown knew perfectly well that Barr was the owner of only 8,000 acres? The Crown knew perfectly well that the balance was the property of individual owners. The Department of Militia and Defence should have seen to it that the transaction took place directly between the Crown and the individual owners. From past proceedings and past evidence the department knew very well that any go-between would mulct the third parties in that instance. That is the fault I have to find with the Department of Militia and Defence. But cannot something be now done to right this wrong? We, the representatives of the people, are being asked by this Government on this very day to pay enormous sums to Mackenzie and Mann, to the Canadian Northern Railway company; we are being asked to be generous with a company which has already received millions at the hands of this Parliament. Mackenzie and Mann are presently claiming before a Board of Arbitration in the city of Toronto, one hundred cents on the dollar as the pretended value of stock which has officially been declared valueless by commissioners appointed under this Government. It was stated in the Senate at the close of the session last year that the Government was ready to pay up to $10,000,000 in satisfying the claims of Mackenzie and Mann. Surely, if this Government can afford to be so generous as that with an opulent syndicate, it can afford, not to be generous, but to do what is just and right for the unfortunate wives and young men who are being deprived of the ascertained value of their property at Camp Borden. I would appeal to the sense of fair play and justice in the Government. I do not know these individuals, but if any one in my own province had been treated as these British-born—I am told they are British born—have been treated, in the province of Ontario I would be grateful to any one who interceded for my compatriots thus mulcted in the province of Quebec. I say it is a crying shame to let these agents get away with the money of the poor lads who are fighting our battle in France.

Mr. W. A. BOYS (South Simcoe): Owing to the fact that Camp Borden is within the limits of my riding it may be proper that I should offer an observation or two respecting the matter the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) has just raised. I am sorry I did not know this matter was coming up to-day, for I have considerable information that would have been of great assistance to me, to cite, and which I think would have assisted this House in coming to a proper conclusion in the matter. I have therefore to speak purely from memory, with, perhaps, a reference to one or two matters that have just been placed in my hands by the minister. In the first place, if what my hon. friend says is strictly correct, not a very strong case has been made out. He refers to $80 in one case, and to about the same amount in another. But he entirely overlooks a feature which I think is a complete answer to what he has said. He has said that Mr. Barr—may I incidentally remark I hold no brief whatever for Mr. Barr, and have nothing whatever to do with him in any shape or form—he says that Mr. Barr stole eighty dollars. He proceeds upon the assumption that when Barr gets twelve dollars under the contract and only gives eight he is enabled thereby to pocket the sum of four dollars on each acre. If that were so, I would admit at once that, while the figures are not large, the ratio of profit would be exorbitant. But my hon. friend cannot have a knowledge of the facts, or I do not think he would have taken his seat leaving any such false impression with the House. If Mr. Barr was not compelled to give more than $12 for some of the lands he bought, or did not have to give more than eight in any case, his argument might be sound. I myself have a personal knowledge, I think I may say, of every case of a bona fide settler within the limits of Camp Borden. I have not a knowledge of the three or four cases my hon. friend refers to, nor have I a knowledge of perhaps the most important case, that of Enoch Thompson, a speculator in the city of Toronto, who had a large acreage within the limits of Camp Borden. But I think I have a knowledge of every case of a bona fide settler, for nearly all of them spoke to me and complained they were not getting what they thought was right. In one case a settler got $8,500—I may be two or three hundred dollars out because I am speaking from memory—another one got $7,000, another $6,500, and a number of others got all the way from $1,500 to the figures I have mentioned, all of which averaged more than, far more than $12 an acre. The question this House would require to be answered is to find out whether or not Barr was getting that to which he was not entitled reasonably: How much did he get for the total acreage at Camp Borden and how much did he pay? Figures were given to me—I cannot say whether they are absolutely accurate or not but if they are accurate I venture to say that no member of this House would have taken over the contract Barr had, and gone to the trouble he did for the profit there was in it. We cannot judge by an odd case here and there; we must have the price that was paid in every case, and perhaps the fairest test as to whether or not the Government have been dealing fairly with the owners of Camp Borden is the fact that out of the whole 16,000 acres only eight or ten claims have not been settled satisfactorily to the owners. In three of these cases there was hardship I admit, but no hardship so far as the action of the Government is concerned. The hardship was that eight or ten or twelve years ago these innocent, and as far as land values are concerned, ignorant people were induced by somebody, I know not whom, to purchase twenty-acre blocks of land. I know what I am talking about, because I have lived within fourteen miles of this very property all my life. It is pure sand, blow sand.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If, as my hon. friend says, they are ignorant people is not that all the more reason why the Government should protect them against the wiles of speculators?

Mr. BOYS: When I said ignorant I had reference to their lack of knowledge of land values in that part of Ontario. They may be cultured people in other respects, but they certainly had no knowledge of the value of this land or they would never have bought it. They were induced by speculators to buy this land at $16 or $20 an acre, not by Barr as far as I know. In expropriating this land does my hon. friend say it was the duty of the Government to accept as the true value the amount paid. In expropriating proceedings it is the actual value, I understand, not figured too closely, it is true, but rather a little on the generous side that should govern—would my hon. friend say that no matter what a man gave for his property that should be the price paid when expropriating it?

Mr. LEMIEUX: The least the Government could have done would have been to give these people the price allowed to Mr. Barr. Mr. Barr got more than the property cost these people.

Mr. BOYS: My hon friend cannot have appreciated the argument I made, perhaps feebly and inadequately. Mr. Barr had to give a great deal more than $12 for a great deal of the land he bought. If he had to give $12, and never less, for every acre he bought, and sometimes as high as $25 and $30 and $40 an acre for land where there were improvements or barns—there were not very many of them it is true—he would have been a loser in the transaction and could not possibly have carried it through. Therefore, he had to acquire some of these lands at less than $12 an acre to be in a position to pay more than $12 for other lands he had to buy. So after all, it comes down to the question, what has Barr made? Unless we know that, we do not know whether this thing is iniquitous or not.

The hon. gentleman says that there were very many cases. There were, all told, fourteen cases. He says that these will take years to dispose of in the exchequer court. Let me tell him that these fourteen cases have all been disposed of long ago. They went before Mr. Justice Cassels in the exchequer court, a judge in whom I am sure my hon. friend has every confidence. If the matter were of sufficient importance, and time would permit, I would go through these cases. In only two out of the whole fourteen were they successful. In many of the cases the demands were considered so exorbitant and the land so worthless that his lordship even saddled the claimants with costs. He heard evidence and he found the amount tendered was ample. Unless my hon. friend is prepared to contest what his lordship Mr. Justice Cassels has concluded is the proper way to dispose of values in expropriation cases, that is by giving the actual value and not what these people gave through their ignorance, that puts an end to the case. I do not think he will go so far as to say that what they paid should be the test. In each case my hon. friend has referred to I asked where the lands were. I visited the location and I found that they were at the west side of the camp in the township of Tossorontio. I found that the land was blow sand. That is also what was found by Mr. Justice Cassels. Since I have been a member of this House I do not believe there has been any purchase put through a department in the service of this country cleaner or fairer than the Camp Borden transaction and it will stand any investigation that my hon. friend may ask for. You will not find any irregularities there. On the other hand, you will find that there are only a few cases of dissatisfaction and in these cases these unfortunate people gave too much for their land. Mr. Justice Cassels held that what they had given for the land was not a fair test of what it was worth. My hon. friend has forgotten to state that Mr. Barr had to give more than $12 an acre for some of the land. I think it is hardly fair to accuse him of stealing $80, or the difference between $8 and $12 per acre, because he had to give far more than $12 for a very large acreage in the camp.

My hon. friend, I take it unintentionally and without knowledge, has done a great injustice to Mr. Radenhurst in this connection. If my hon. friend knew Mr. Radenhurst he would never have thought of doing such a thing. If he had not referred to the fact that Mr. Radenhurst was the agent of the department and assisted Barr I would not have thought it necessary to have dragged his name into this case because he is too respectable and well known in the town of Barrie to be brought into a discussion of this kind. But as my hon. friend has referred to Mr. Barr as stealing, and has coupled Mr. Radenhurst's name with the transaction, I feel called upon to protest in defence of one of the most respectable solicitors and gentlemen in the county of Simcoe. If my hon. friend will make any inquiry whatever in the town of Barrie, he will find that there is no one in that locality more honourable and more highly respected than Mr. Radenhurst. He is a man of the highest standing at the bar of the county of Simcoe, is President of the Simcoe Law Association and is as well known for his honesty and integrity as any man in that county. I think, in view of these facts, that my hon. friend will feel disposed to withdraw any insinuations he had made in regard to Mr. Radenhurst. The only way that my hon. friend can introduce him into the matter is by referring to his letter which he read, but I deny that this letter warrants any such insinuations as my hon. friend has made. In his capacity as agent of the Government, he did what was usual with regard to expropriation proceedings and answered enquiries of land owners telling them if they were not satisfied with the tenders made, the true value could be ascertained by expropriation. When I recall the investigations in the Public Accounts Committee, with regard to Valcartier, I am glad to be the representative of South Simcoe, of the conditions surrounding the purchase in which Camp Borden is, and I derive considerable satisfaction from a comparison of the conditions surrounding the purchase of lands for these two camps. I recall that men from the province of Quebec appeared before that committee and asked $35,000 for farms that were assessed for $900. We had nothing of that kind in the county of Simcoe. The bona fide settlers there were reasonable. Some of them, I thought, asked more than they were entitled to, and I told them so. Mr. Barr was in the office and so was his solicitor. I felt they were asking too much and I said to Barr: "As far as I am concerned I want this to be clean, to go through without criticism and without scandal. I don't want excessive prices paid. On the other hand, I want you to be fair to these people." The bulk of the settlers on these lands were humble settlers, although there were five or six good farms in one part. I asked him to loosen up a little bit and do the decent thing. I found Barr willing to do that, and he did it, but he did not do it to excess, in the cases my hon. friend referred to where the land was largely sand.

Sir SAM HUGHES: With reference to this particular case that has been referred to, were these not little blocks of land that had been sold as a summer resort some years before, where people thought they would have nice little orchards and gardens? There were 25 acres of this land.

Mr. BOYS: That is absolutely correct. The man who promoted that scheme must have had some faith in it because I found waterpipes laid down across the land, a gasolene engine and a private waterworks system installed. These lands on the west side of the camp were laid out in blocks and evidently he must have felt that something would grow on them but when I was there there were no signs of vegetation at all. Even the grass would not grow. It was, as Mr. Justice Cassels found, all blow sand. An effort was made to show that it was a sort of game preserve. The Pine river goes through some of this property and it was claimed that it was a fishing preserve, that mink, deer and wild animals of various descriptions were to be found and that this represented a certain amount of value. Every conceivable method was devised to add value to this property. I do not think any hon. gentleman will say for a moment that Mr. Justice Cassels had any idea of putting a lower value upon this land than the actual value. If my hon. friend will take the time to go through the six or seven typewritten pages of the judgment of Mr. Justice Cassels the ideas which he has as to the situation at Camp Borden will be very quickly removed with this one exception which I am free at all times to admit, and that is that a hardship exists owing solely to the fact that they paid too much when they bought years ago. If you are to lay down the law that because a man has given $20 per acre for his property, even if it is only worth $3, he should get $20, these men should have received more money. But I do not think my hon. friend can find any such law. Mr. Justice Cassels found to the contrary. There are some other features but I do not feel that it is desirable that I should take up more time at this stage. I want to point out in conclusion, for the benefit of those gentlemen who have not seen Camp Borden, that I do not believe there is any place in Canada where the Government could have secured 16,000 acres for anything like the same money more suitable for a military camp than the land within the limits of that camp. And in doing that I am not going by my own judgment. I have talked with officers who have been in the camps of Great Britain, and have been in all the camps in Canada—in Ontario and Quebec, at all events—and they have told me that all things being considered there is not a better camp in England or in Canada. There is, for instance, an abundant supply of the purest water that could be got anywhere. Artesian wells were sunk six inches across—one of them eight inches across—to a depth of 125 feet, thus securing an abundant flow of as fine drinking water as you could possibly get, and that is a most important feature in connection with such a camp. It is true that on one particular day of extreme heat, more than a year ago, there was considerable dust, mainly caused by the burning of hundreds and thousands of stumps, but you did not hear that complaint last year, and I do not believe you will hear it again. I only want to say here that I regret that the Minister of Militia and the department are not able to use Camp Borden to a fuller extent than it is going to be used this year. The Flying Corps, with a strength of some four to five thousand men, which is quite a good number, are located there, but there is room enough at the camp to accommodate thirty thousand—in fact, I think, fifty thousand—troops. The camp is well equipped and fitted to receive men at any time for training while this war goes on. I unhesitatingly say that, although there were some persons who suffered by reason of paying more for their land than they should have done, Camp Borden will bear any investigation that may be intituted and it is refreshing to hear of a case where the Department is accused of not paying enough money, generally the accusation is extragance.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): I have some personal knowledge of this matter through the fact that the legal firm with which I am associated represented some of these parties in the Exchequer Court proceedings, over these lands before Mr. Justice Cassels. I do not wish to approach this case from a sentimental aspect at all. It is purely from the legal point of view that I would like to say a word or two.

I would draw the attention of the House to a very extraordinary clause in the agreement between the Crown and Mr. Barr—the agreement which was referred to by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). It is in a letter addressed to the Hon. A. E. Kemp, Acting Minister of Militia and Defence, and signed by James Barr on the 10th April, 1916:

> If I am unable to procure any portion of the said property so as to convey the same to you on or before the 10th of May, 1916, you are then to exercise expropriation proceedings in regard to the said property.

"You are to exercise expropriation proceedings in regard to the said property." This is an agreement made by Barr with the Crown. The Crown agrees to pay $12 per acre for this land, and Barr, in order to secure himself, makes an agreement containing the proviso that if he should not be able to secure this land the Crown would give him the machinery of the Exchequer Court, which has hitherto always been reserved to itself, and with this machinery Mr. Barr would wrest from these poor English settlers the land, at the price fixed by the Exchequer Court.

Mr. BOYS: I think my hon. friend is aware that the proceedings in the Exchequer Court would have to be initiated, not by the department at all, but by the person who believes that his or her land is worth more than is offered.

Mr. JACOBS: These proceedings were instituted by the Crown.

Mr. BOYS: Oh, no.

Mr. JACOBS: I am surprised my hon. friend would say that, because I acted myself in the case for the parties against the Crown, and Mr. Radenhurst appeared for the Crown.

Mr. BOYS: After the offer had been refused.

Mr. JACOBS: Certainly.

Mr. BOYS: I agree with the hon. gentleman, but not until the party concerned was unwilling to accept the amount offered.

Mr. JACOBS: Certainly, but Mr. Barr offered $8 per acre to these people and they refused to accept it. He then threatened them with Exchequer Court proceedings, and when they still remained obdurate, we find the Crown appearing as plaintiff in the case, although they had made arrangements with Barr to purchase that property from him for $12 an acre. They gave him the machinery of the Exchequer Court so that he would obtain the land from these people at the price fixed by the court. The case came on and the Crown, mark you, that had made arrangements to pay $12 an acre for the land a few months before, placed witnesses on the stand to prove that the land for which it had agreed to pay $12 an acre was not worth more than $8 an acre, and the Court so found, and further found that some of the land was not even worth $3 an acre. It maintained Mr. Barr in his contention. My complaint against the Crown is this: Had it not made this arrangement to give Barr the machinery of the Exchequer Court to obtain this land, Barr would have been in the same position as any other man, and owners could have held their land against the world; they might have asked $10,000 per acre, and Mr. Barr would not have been able to take it from them. But under this agreement the people found they had to part with their land, not to the Crown, but to a private individual, and the quarrel I have with the Crown is that it should have prostituted its position, and handed over the machinery of the Exchequer Court to a private individual, for his own gain, so that these men had to part with their property for $8 when they could have held it for any price they liked. That is the position.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not know, Mr. Speaker, if I am in order to speak on the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes, the hon. member has already spoken.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Not on this question.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is entitled to speak only once on a motion.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): The language which has been used with regard to this transaction might, perhaps, be justified were it not that all the indignation indulged in is built up upon the assumption that the Crown bought the land of the particular people referred to at $12 an acre. Now, the Crown did nothing of the kind. The Crown required the whole block of 17,300 acres, and bought it from Mr. Barr for $207,000. Dividing that sum by the number of acres would give $12 an acre, but the Government did not buy each acre at that sum; they bought the whole area for a sum which would figure out at $12 an acre. However, it was perfectly known to them and perfectly known to Mr. Barr that each acre in the area was not worth $12; some of it was worth very much more, and other portions very much less.

Mr. JACOBS: Is it a fact that Mr. Barr paid in any one instance more than $12 an acre for that land?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: He owned some 5,800 acres, but what he paid for it I do not know. This much I do know; that before the Crown determined to buy the entire site at that aggregate price it had the land valued by two outstanding valuators of the city of Toronto, whose reputations certainly are above suspicion, who valued the entire area and put upon the land the price that was paid for it, taking one lot with another. We are not undertaking to say that each particular lot was worth $12. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Jacobs) asked if Mr. Barr paid more than $12 for any one acre. As I said I do not know what he paid for the land, but I would point out this fact, which establishes beyond peradventure that some thousands of acres of the land included in the original quantity were worth more than $12 an acre; that subsequently to that contract there was a further arrangement entered into in virtue whereof the Crown could abandon any part of the land which it found not to be required, and there was found to be a very considerable portion of it not to be required or, at least, not to be desirable to take, because it was crossed by roads that would have to be suppressed, and it was not considered proper that that should be done. Those were abandoned. But when they were abandoned there was a valuation made on those lots which figured them out to be worth $13.62 an acre, and there was deducted from the price to be paid by Mr. Barr, not $12 an acre for those lots, but $13.62 an acre, which shows that those lots —and I think there were about 4,000 acres in round figures of that land—

Sir SAM HUGHES: North of the Mad river.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. As I say, there never was a purchase at $12 an acre of the land of these particular people referred to at all. There was a purchase of that whole block at a sum total price, which if you divide it by acres, would figure out at $12 per acre; and that price was made after the most careful valuation by men of the very highest repute. The interest of the Crown to acquire that as a whole is perfectly obvious, as Mr. Justice Cassels points out in his judgment.

It is quite true that Mr. Barr did not own all the land, and it is quite true that it was agreed that whatever portion of it Mr. Barr could not acquire the Crown would itself expropriate, as it did itself expropriate it. We have heard something about the prostitution of the rights of the Crown. Why my hon. friend, who is a very distinguished lawyer, will quite realize that if we had not bought from Mr. Barr we would have gone out and expropriated the entire property.

Mr. JACOBS: And saved money.

Mr. DOHERTY: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. It was precisely because it was established to us by the valuation that I spoke of that it would be more economical for the Crown to pay this price which these valuators stood behind than to take the chance of exaggerated values in the expropriation that the transaction was carried out in the way in which it was. And the mere stipulation—this stipulation which the hon. gentleman qualifies as prostitution of the Crown's rights—it is hard to keep serious and so describe it—that, if Mr. Barr failed to deliver to us any of the property he had undertaken to sell to us we should exercise the methods which we had of acquiring it and charge him the difference in the price. If it cost us any more to expropriate it, we would charge him the difference; if it cost us less to expropriate it, of course then we had no damage to claim from him and he took his whole original price. I would like to point out that this price all through was $207,000, the price for the entire property. We deducted from that $13.62 an acre for the acres that were abandoned, and we set off against that whatever was paid when we expropriated the property.

What was this awful thing that was said to these people who complained? Mind you, I understand the people who complained. I do not as readily understand the indignation of the hon. gentleman, to whom I give credit for having, perhaps, a clearer apprehension of the actual facts. These people were very unfortunate victims, but they were victimized when they bought, not when we acquired the property. Mr. Justice Cassels points that out in his judgment. He makes reference to "what might mildly be termed the highly coloured literature" that induced these people to buy these "blow sand" hills for orchards and all sorts of purposes which on its face would give them an extraordinary value.

Mr. JACOBS: Is it not a fact that they purchased those very lots from Barr originally?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not aware whether they did or not. And I am not interested in the slightest degree in the question whether Mr. Barr is a saint or a sinner. What I am trying to point out is that these people, so far as this Government is concerned, got absolutely every dollar that they would have got if we had proceeded in the ordinary course to expropriate, and as we did with regard to other lands and that they were not injured one iota, because if you figure out the total price which we were to pay Barr for the whole amount it would have been $12 per acre. We did not pay Mr. Barr anything for that acre; we charged over against the price that we were to pay Mr. Barr whatever the courts said we ought to acquire that property for at the expropriation rate. So that I fancy that if I am capable of making anything clear I have made it quite clear that under that contract there never was bought the land of those particular people at $12 an acre.

Now as to what is complained of that these people were told. In so far as Mr. Barr may or may not have said that he was the agent of the Government—if he so said I do not think he correctly described himself—but in so far as Mr. Radenhurst or anybody else told these people that if they would not accept the price that the Government offered them they would have to be subjected to expropriation, why they were told the simple truth. That is described as an awful threat. Well, it is what happens to any proprietor when for public purposes the Crown believes that it is necessary for it to take their property. These people were offered, I think, $8 an acre, which was the price mentioned with regard to these particular cases. I know a number were offered $8 an acre, and some were offered less; and some of the lots were found when it went before the court to be worth less than that. If I followed correctly the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), he was speaking of the people who did not go to court. It is very unfortunate for those people, because they were told, which was the truth, that inasmuch as the Government required that land, if they would not accept what was offered they would have to resort to expropriation proceedings. If, because they were told that, they parted with their particular properties at anything less than they were worth, that is very unfortunate. But that is something that is not peculiar to them; that is what happens to any man whose property is expropriated by the Crown when the Crown does not feel justified in offering him an amount which he is willing to accept. The cases which did go before the court, as my hon. friend has pointed out, and as the judgment of Mr. Justice Cassels which I have before me shows, demonstrated that the offers made to all of these people were, in the words of Mr. Justice Cassels, "generous offers."

His lordship deals with the question of how he is to proceed to value. He endeavours not to fail to be as liberal as a man can be, but he does not think it proper for him to be generous with the money of other people. He points out what I am sure both my hon. friends will not dispute, that the mere fact that these people had bought their lands at a price vastly more than they are worth did not justify him in allowing—nor would it, I think, justify the Crown in paying—more than they were worth. Looking at the facts of the case, therefore, I fancy that my two hon. friends will realize that their indignation was at least a little over-warm. Most assuredly the Crown had no desire to do these people out of one dollar of value that they owned. Reference has been made to the fact that some of them were soldiers and that some had soldier relatives. Surely it is not suggested that that would be a reason why the Crown would not want to do them justice. We were acquiring this property on behalf of the country and it was our duty to take the best available method of securing it at a reasonable value. We did secure the entire property at a reasonable price. We acquired it as a whole and were able to deal with it as a whole. No individual was thereby placed in any worse position than he would have been in had we exercised our undoubted right of expropriating without any transaction with Mr. Barr at all.

Mr. JACOBS: $75,000 might have been saved if the Crown had expropriated.

Mr. DOHERTY: It was because of the very best advice we could get on the subject—advice to the effect that we would save a large sum of money by making the acquisition in this way—that we proceeded as we did. My hon. friend has had enough experience in expropriation proceedings to know that what has happened in this particular case is rather the exception than the rule in expropriation proceedings. If the Crown had proceeded to expropriate this entire 17,300 acres, there was danger of its finding itself mulcted for more than the valuation put upon it. That is the experience of most people who have had to do with expropriations. Having been in touch during the last seven or eight years with the expropriation proceedings of this Government, I know that it is only rarely that on expropriation proceedings we do not pay more than in the judgment of our valuators the property is worth. The price fixed for the land we abandoned goes to demonstrate that, for a very large proportion of it at all events, we certainly would have paid more than $12 an acre had we proceeded by expropriation. I can understand that the situation of these people is such as to command our sympathy and very easily—with a little goodwill, perhaps—to arouse the very warm feeling that has been expressed. But with the facts before us, it must be clear that no wrong or injustice has been done any party in this connection save that which was suffered by those unfortunate people when they were induced to purchase this land at absolutely fictitious prices. I hold no brief for Mr. Barr; I do not know him; I never saw him. Whether he has had anything to do with the selling of the land to these people I am not in a position to say. If he had; if he is the author of "highly-coloured literature" of which Mr. Justice Cassels speaks, he certainly would be open to grave reprehension for his action in misrepresenting the property he was selling to these people. I do not say that he is deserving of that, because I do not know what his connection with the matter was.

The hon. gentleman has appealed to us to reconsider cases. I am not in a position to speak as to a particular case where a man made a settlement. It is, perhaps, possible that in some particular case a man took less than his property was worth because he preferred not to be expropriated. If there be room for consideration of cases of that kind I shall be glad to look into them. But the facts as established by the documents on the file, by the judgments of the court and by the result itself to Mr. Barr, all tend to negative the idea that anybody was deprived of his property without getting full value.

I hold in my hand a statement of how this thing petered out. The hon. member (Mr. Jacobs) spoke about our prostituting the powers of the Crown by lending them to Mr. Barr. What was done with regard to the lands that had to be expropriated was this: the Crown expropriated them and charged up against Mr. Barr whatever it paid for the expropriation .

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does my hon. friend read from the judgment of Judge Cassels?

Mr. DOHERTY: That would not bear upon the result to Mr. Barr, but this is what Mr. Justice Cassels says, speaking of the purchasers—he had a great number of cases before him:

> There are different classes of purchases of these Camp Borden lands. A considerable number of acres were laid off into twenty acre lots, and influenced no doubt by what might be mildly termed very highly coloured literature issued by Messrs. Wright and Barr and by Mr. Enoch Thompson, numerous people were induced to purchase these twenty-acre lots at prices averaging from $15 to $16 per acre. These purchasers, needless to say, were persons living at a distance from Camp Borden. As for Mr. Shook, a witness much relied on by the defendants, he states in answer to a question:—
> "Q.—Can you tell us what the value of these lands are, say as orchard lands? A. Well, I can scarcely give you the value of them; from their surroundings I would not like to because the people there are pessimistic about the value of that land and do not think it worth anything.
> As lands for a Camp they may be very suitable. As lands for agricultural or fruit-growing purposes or vegetable gardens I would agree (except as to a portion of lands in Essa Township and perhaps a small quantity of acres in Pine River flats) with the "people there."

He is speaking of the particular lots that he had before him, not of the entire land; and he makes his exceptions. Further on he refers to the prices they paid, and points out what in law and in common sense must be perfectly clear; that the value of a land is not necessarily what a man may have been deceived into paying for it.

I was going to refer to the result of the transaction. Hon. gentlemen have spoken about an $80 profit on every lot. As I say, the process was that Mr. Barr, being credited with $207,000, was charged up with what we paid for the lots as we expropriated them.

Being credited with $12 an acre, the price agreed upon with Barr, on 14,596·6 acres, or an amount of $175,159.20, the Crown charged up to Mr. Barr $138,977.04, being the amount that we paid in acquisition of the land. We also charged up to him advances made to him, amounting in all to $22,000. Those two amounts deducted from $175,159.20, leave a balance of $14,182.15 available for the acquisition of the land still remaining to be acquired, which is 490·6 acres, which at $12 an acre would amount to $5,887.20. To be deducted from that $14,182.16, is $2,818.52, being what was coming to us for the land abandoned. That is what we were entitled to charge up. Over and above dropping $12 an acre from the price for those lands, we were entitled to an additional $1.32 an acre because they were worth more than $12. There was also to be charged up an estimate on account of buildings disposed of by Barr, amounting to $1,400. That makes a total deduction of $4,218.52 to be made from $14,182.16, leaving a balance of $9,963.64 to cover the cost of the lots still to be acquired. It is to be pointed out that, in the acquisition of these lands, Mr. Barr had to incur considerable expense in connection with agents and one thing or another, so that those figures do not represent a profit going to Mr. Barr. He had to pay out of that all the expenses involved in the acquisition of such lots as he acquired or endeavoured to acquire, so that when one speaks of getting a profit of $80 a lot on those particular lots, it is quite manifest he did not. It all comes down to this, that Mr. Barr sold us a block of land at a block price, and that therefore, you cannot conclude anything from the fact that, by dividing that amount by the number of acres, you get a price of $12 an acre, and that was so stated. You cannot deduce from that that each acre was worth $12 an acre, nor that he got $12 an acre for each acre of that immense block of land. Not only was it shown at the time of the abandonment of the property, but the fact was notorious to all at that time that all of this land had not an equal value, and it is quite obvious that a tract of that size would not have an equal value throughout.

Mr. FIELDING: The strangest part of this transaction, a part which has been lightly touched upon by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), and which has not been touched upon by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) or the Minister of Justice, is this: It is quite conceivable, under the circumstances described by the minister and by the hon. member for South Simcoe that Mr. Barr may have made a loss and not a profit on his transaction. The hon. member for Maisonneuve has rather conveyed to us the impression that Mr. Barr must have made a great deal of money, and it has been contended on the other side that Mr. Barr may possibly have lost money by having to pay more than $12 an acre for some portions of the land. That is quite possible, but it is not at all probable that that took place at all.

Mr. BOYS: I did not wish for one moment to say I thought Mr. Barr lost money, but I did say that the figures given to me showed that the profit he made was not a profit that would induce any member of this House or any business man to interest himself in the transaction.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not question that for a moment, but I think it was intended that Mr. Barr as a business man should make a profit out of the transaction. I think it will be an equally fair assumption that the Acting Minister of Militia and Defence intended that Mr. Barr should have an opportunity of making a large profit, a profit he would have to make at the expense of either the owner of the land or the public treasury. But the question that strikes me as the most extraordinary part of the matter is—why did the Minister of Militia have anything to do with Mr. Barr in regard to anything that Mr. Barr did not own? Mr. Barr owned 8,000 acres. It would be right and proper for the Minister of Militia to bargain with Mr. Barr to buy his land; but why did the Minister of Militia bargain wth Mr. Barr for land belonging to other people? The Minister of Justice said they did not buy any particular acres; that they bought from Mr. Barr a tract of 16,000 acres of land. Mr. Barr did not own that quantity of land. They bought from Mr. Barr that which he had no right to sell. They gave Mr. Barr what was in effect a license to go around all those people representing himself as an agent of the Government, make bargains with them and, in some cases, acquire land at prices which they considered were too low. If the Government had actually paid $8 an acre, I do not suppose those people would have complained. What they seem to complain of is that the Government paid $12 an acre, and they got only $8, and it is not satisfactory to say that the Government paid an average price which was fair all around. Why did they have any "Barr" in this transaction? Why was Mr. Barr brought into the matter at all? My hon. friend says the experience of the members of the Government is that expropriation proceedings generally lead to considerable cost. I agree with him in that respect. Evidently he did not need to be alarmed in this case, because we have had the expropriation proceedings carried on under the peculiar circumstances described by the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) and the judge of the Exchequer Court has placed a low valuation on those lands. It seems that, if the case had from the beginning been taken into the Exchequer Court, a very high price could not have been allowed for those worthless sand lands or "blow sands," as my hon. friend describes them. There did not seem to have been any danger in expropriating; but, danger or no danger, this is a method of buying land for the Government which is open to the utmost possible abuse. Why should there have been any "Barr" middleman in this transaction? Why did the Government not buy from Barr that which Barr had to sell, and in some way, by an authorized, disinterested agent, paid for his services as an agent, meet those other people and buy their land on fair terms? This is the serious error on the part of the Government—buying from Barr something he had not to sell, giving him the equivalent of a license to beat down those people and compel them to sell their land for what seemed to them to be low prices. That part of the transaction, irrespective of gain or loss, is open to very grave censure.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I was not here last week when the Budget was under discussion, and as I am still anxious to occupy the time of the House for a few minutes in discussing some features of the Budget and some features of the war, I would ask you to call it six o'clock, and I shall endeavour to take up not more than half an hour of the time of the House on the resumption of business after dinner.

At six o'clock the House took recess

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill No. 75, respecting the Protective Association of Canada.—Mr. Demers.

THE FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA.

House in Committee on Bill No. 89, respecting the Fire Insurance Company of Canada.—Mr. Demers—Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

On section 1—Extension of time:

Mr. BUREAU: This Bill is not on the Order Paper.

The CHAIRMAN: I might perhaps explain that this Bill, and Bill No. 75, respecting the Protective Association of Canada, were reported from the Banking and Commerce Committee this morning, and under the motion made yesterday by the Prime Minister, were placed on the Order Paper for consideration in Committee of the Whole to-night.

Mr. BUREAU: They do not appear on the Order Paper.

The CHAIRMAN: It was impossible to print a new Order of the Day this afternoon, but the Bills were added to the official Order which is in the hands of the Clerk, the Deputy Clerk, the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker. The motion of the Prime Minister to which I have referred reads as follows:

> That owing to the advanced period of the Session the following Rules relating to Private Bills be suspended for the remainder of the Session, viz.:—Rules 28, 28A, and 103; and that Private Bills reported on Private Bills days by any Select Standing Committee be placed on the Orders of the Day of the same day for consideration in Committee of the Whole amongst Private Bills, or if reported on days other than Private Bill days then immediately after Routine Proceedings.

Mr. BUREAU: The leader of the Opposition, (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) when the motion was made, took the ground that the Bills should not be passed until we had had an opportunity of considering them. The Order Paper is the only guide we have to the business of the day, and we did not know that these Bills were coming up this evening. However, if the Bills have been reported by the Banking and Commerce Committee I have no objection, but I do not want this to constitute a precedent. I think it is only fair to the House that we should have some explanation of the Bill.

Sir HERBERT AMES: It is merely granting an extension of time to a fire insurance company. The company was granted a charter in 1916 and was expected to fulfil all the requirements within two years, but on account of war conditions, was unable to do so and is now asking for an extension of time.

Mr. BUREAU: Were any objections made in the Banking and Commerce Committee to this extension being granted?

Sir HERBERT AMES: None whatever.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

THE CHRISTIAN COMMUNITY OF UNIVERSAL BROTHERHOOD.

On the motion for the second reading of Bill No. 96, to incorporate the Christian Community of Universal Brotherhood.—Mr. J. F. Reid.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior): Ordinarily, a Bill respecting the incorporation of a company might be spoken to, so far as the attitude of the Government is concerned, by the Secretary of State, but as this Bill has to do with a community that has been more directly under the administration of the Interior Department, perhaps it is as well that I should say a word with regard to it. There is a measure of much importance; in some respects, it is an extraordinary measure as far as this House is concerned. There is in Western Canada a community holding, in which a large percentage of what are commonly called Doukhobors, are the owners; they hold community rights in it, and no particular individual has any special individual asset. As everybody knows, the property of the community stands mainly in the name of one of their leaders, Mr. Peter Verigin. I believe a share of that property stands in the name of a corporation which was incorporated under the Companies' Act, and which has a name practically the same as the name intended to be given to this community, save only that the word " Limited " is added. A portion of the assets have been conveyed to that corporation. The stock of that corporation, I understand, is held by certain trustees for the benefit of the community, or if not the whole community, for the benefit of certain members of it. The purpose of this Bill appears to be to enable the whole community to organize in a corporate capacity, and to provide facilities whereby the assets of the people will be held by the whole corporation, but also whereby the communistic right of any individual in the corporation may be withdrawn and become an individual asset. I did not think Parliament would likely favour the principle of the incorporation of a community in so far as commercial enterprises are concerned; but as regards this community, there have been urged certain claims and certain rights which the individuals of the community might seek to exercise and which they could not exercise if some such incorporation does not take place.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What rights are they?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The right to withdraw, inasmuch as the assets are now held by Mr. Peter Verigin in the name of the community. With respect to the rights of any individual member of the community, there is no way, unless the incorporation takes place, by which an individual member of the community can withdraw from the corporation and take his place as an ordinary citizen of Canada. This is not a matter of small concern. The community numbers about 7,000 souls. The assets run into the millions of dollars, and the position of these assets, it is very strongly urged, is not by any means on as secure a basis as it should be, having regard to the rights of individual members as against the rights of the community.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the community applied for the Bill?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, and the first incorporators are named in the petition and in the Bill. While I do not object to the passing of the second reading of this Bill, I want it to be understood that I do not favour the granting of extraordinary powers to a community of this kind. I do not oppose the second reading because I am not convinced that there will be any way by which an individual may withdraw his rights and become entitled to his individual assets unless some such protection as this is afforded him.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Do you object to the land tenure?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are certain clauses of the Bill that I commend most earnestly to the consideration of the Committee to which the Bill will go. I refer particularly to sections 3, 11 and 14, and I ask the Committee to consider carefully whether it is wise on the part of Parliament to extend the principle which we already have adopted to the incorporation of communities for other than commercial purposes, and if it is necessary, in this individual case, to consider whether or not it would be well to restrict the powers given to this community so that no more than the imperative necessities of the day will be met and the prevention of injustice secured.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the second time.

SUPPLY—CANADA AND THE WAR.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock, I said I purposed to avail myself of this motion to discuss two or three questions that are of extreme importance at this stage of our country's career and in connection with the war. The first thought to which I wish to draw the attention of the House is that expressed by the London Times of yesterday in an article discussing war and condition of affairs in Europe.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does my hon. friend (Mr. W. F. Maclean) intend to speak to my motion?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Well, the debate is not concluded. My hon. friend from Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) intended to say something.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is entirely a matter for the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean); he has the floor.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: My hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) had the floor. I waited for him all afternoon and I do not see any reason why the hon. gentleman should ask me to give way.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: A significant thing was stated by the London Times of yesterday in discussing the condition of the war, or the entry of the United States into the war. It was dealing with the declaration that that country, which had refused up to recent times to concern itself with European questions, had gone into the war because it believed the rights and liberties of civilization to be in jeopardy and is opposed to autocracy and to the military system of Germany. The London Times, in discussing that declaration yesterday said that it was the most significant political incident that has happened in the history of the world since the French revolution. We are now voting money in connection with the war and I take this opportunity to say that I also regard the entry of the United States into the war as a matter of supreme importance. We find ourselves today, a great democratic community on the American continent, joined up with the United States in asserting the rights of civilization as against autocracy and the German military system. Mr. Balfour, when he accepted that embassy to the United States, came to America, to Canada, to this House, and what he told us constituted an appeal from the progressive, constitutional governments, especially the British government, to the democracies of America to join with them in the great struggle. Mr. Balfour spoke here for his government, and for the British people, and he presented to us the view that a supreme issue had arrived in the history of the world and that the allied countries of Europe, through the missions which came from Great Britain and France appealed to the democracies of America to assist them in this great conflict. The glory of Canada is that the Canadian democracy, a Dominion under British constitutional rule, the day that it went into this war, assumed the leadership of America in asserting the rights of democracy and in showing that it was worth our while to take part in this struggle. We have been true to that. The United States have seen that we were right; they have joined up in this struggle, and the most significant thing flowing out of this important union between the two great democracies is that the old hatred that had been developed between the original Thirteen Colonies and the Mother Country, which had been nursed and had grown, in a way, for over a hundred years, suddenly ceased, and you find to-day Britain and her Dominions and the great American republic united in giving the whole of their resources to the defence of democracy and civilization. That is the great event of this war so far, which is making more and more impression on the people, and that is the reason why I say that I think we ought to readjust our views in regard to our position on this continent. Whereas formerly there was a disagreement between the United States and the Mother Country, and Washington was the champion of the republic as against the Mother Country, you see now that Washington is identified with the old democratic principle that was asserted by Cromwell: you see a union of the principles for which Cromwell and Washington stood, you see Lloyd George as the leader of the English democracy, and men like Mr. Balfour claiming a connection with Lincoln and Wilson in a way that surprises all the world. That is a great advance, and it shows a new unity and a new strength on the part of democracy: you see the United States asserting it and ourselves asserting it, and putting all our resources into this war.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Are we living true to it?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: We are trying to do our best, but perhaps we have not done as well as we might have done. Still, we are now putting all our resources into the war, and the reason we are going to win eventually, and the reason we are going to win the world to our view, is the existence of this new condition that has brought about so great a change. What is the one thing that the German Kaiser failed to allow for, and failed to make any calculation in regard to? He never believed that the democracies of Europe and America would be united; he never believed that the United States and Britain would go hand in hand, and he thought he could defy the United States and could defy Britain; and the one thing he is up against now is this new and powerful union.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In view of that union between Great Britain and the United States, would my hon. friend revise his views and ideas about the reciprocity treaty?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: That is always in the hon. gentleman's mind. I stood on the floor of this House and defended, and am prepared now to defend, my record in regard to reciprocity. I was the first man in this House, session after session, to demand, for public reasons, the free entrance of the wheat products of the Canadian West into the United States—

Mr. LEMIEUX: But not in 1911.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: —and Canada is to-day the leader of democracy in America, except that in that reciprocity issue we decided to keep our independence on this continent.

Mr. FIELDING: Will the hon. gentleman define in what way the reciprocity treaty interfered with our independence?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I will answer the hon. gentleman.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Speak, for the farmers are listening.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: It is very easy to answer.

An hon. MEMBER: Sidetracked.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I am not sidetracked, and I cannot be sidetracked on an issue of that kind.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Wait a minute. I hope the hon. gentleman will listen to me.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Certainly.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I am not in the habit of interrupting the hon. gentleman when he is making an argument. At any time that he presents arguments he is listened to by the House. Why are we going to win this war? Because we have united and consolidated our efforts and our resources, and this is the surprising thing that the Kaiser never counted upon. The great American Republic has put into this struggle the resources of the great Mississippi valley—all their vast industrial resources; and we in Canada have put in the resources of the great Saskatchewan plains, with all their food products, and now we find that Germany will not be able to maintain against the consolidated American democracy their insolent assertion that civilization must bow to them, that the rights of smaller peoples must yield to them, that German military power must govern the world. Now that we have reached the point where all the resources of the United States and of Canada are bound together a new view has come to the people of America to this extent: They know now—and this is what I want to impress upon the House—that the continent of America to-day is the home of democracy, it is the place where the battle of democracy has to be fought, the place from which the food and all the resources to uphold democracy must come. That is why the United States have gone into the struggle, that is why they are putting all their resources into the fight, and that is why we are going to win. And, as I say, we of Canada, and the people of the United States, must take a new view and make a new alignment in regard to these great world questions. A while ago we would have said that our whole case for democracy and for the rights of civilization was our connection with the Mother Country. That was true, but it is still more true now that the rights of democracy depend more and more on these new political forces that have come together and that are asserting themselves in this great war. We must realize that to-day America, the mid-continent, the continent that by its Atlantic aspect looks on Europe, and by its Pacific outlook, takes Asia in view; America, the centre of the world and the centre of democracy, with that outlook, and with its resources controls the situation, and if it believes—as it does believe—in democracy, then we shall win. We have a great cause to vindicate, because, as all now admit, this war is not a European war, it is a world-wide war against German autocracy, and German domination It is a struggle into which America has entered, and which America has got to win, and practically the appeal in France and in Britain to-day is to America, "Come over and help us." And America has responded. Now, that is a matter of the greatest moment to democracy, and Canadians must take it in that light. There has been preached in this country the doctrine of what was called "The Round Table." We have heard a good deal of that Round Table, and that organization in England which was trying to educate us, and to lead us into what they call an Imperial Federation, in which Canada—if the idea were carried out as they proposed it—might lose her identity, and become one in some kind of confederation in which this country would have a certain number of votes as against a great many others. I am rising here to-night to object to anything of that kind, and I say that Canada must maintain her autonomy, her system of having a free voice in all these matters. And inasmuch as America hereafter is to have the controlling voice as to democracy, we must be careful that we do not drift into a system by which we might have our liberties restricted if we connected ourselves too closely with the political organizations of Europe, and especially with a political organization, perhaps an Imperial Confederation, as has been proposed to us by the Round Table organization in Britain. Not only that, but if the resources of America are now all devoted to this war, and there is to be great new adjustment, and if peace is to be maintained after this war, it must be done from America. And if there is to be a peace police, which is the ambition now of the most progressive men who are discussing this war, if there is to be a peace patrol, a police organization to keep down organizations like that of the German Kaiser, it is going to be in America and we will be part of it, and we want a very free hand in very considerable degree in regard to what we are to commit ourselves to in the future construction of the British Empire. My contention is that, instead of committing ourselves to a system of Imperial federation, we had better keep our autonomy as it is, remain in the Empire as one of the Dominions of the Empire, but not to commit ourselves. And we are being invited to commit ourselves, and speeches of a certain trend that I do not quite agree with have been made in England in connection with this war. I want to discuss that matter or call public attention to it as I am doing now, and to see that Canada keeps her position and her autonomy on this continent free, to join with the other Dominions of the British Empire and with the British constitutional organization as it is, and with the great American Republic.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is dangerous.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Does my hon. friend, the late Minister of Militia, not think that we should have supreme control of the Canadian forces as the other Allies have?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I was merely saying that it was dangerous to hear the applause coming from the direction it is. I have had it myself, unfortunately.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I have to thank my hon. friend for being a beacon light for me. If that is the case, we must be very careful. We have ministers who propose to go to Europe, and we have had ministers over there before, but the great Canadian people, I believe, wish to maintain their autonomy on this continent and a political alliance for the liberty of the world, not only with the Mother Country, but with our cousins to the south of us. Thanks to good fortune it has come that way, and I do not want to see that position jeopardized any further. Inasmuch as we have had speeches made in the Old Country by statesmen from Canada, and we are to have others hereafter, I take this occasion to rise in my place and say that the view of the Canadian people is that they wish to maintain their autonomy, that they wish to be a factor, the equal of any among the nations, with all the powers and all the Dominions and all the states that are fighting for the rights of civilization as against German domination.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is good Liberal common sense.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Sometimes Liberals do not talk common sense. Since the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) has referred to this question, I would ask what is the one reason why there was a certain holding back in the province of Quebec in regard to the great war and the participation of Canada in it? It was probably the suspicion the people of Quebec had that they would be led into some kind of European alliance which perhaps later on would prove objectionable to them. I believe the new view of it to the province of Quebec—and I want to congratulate that province on the splendid wave of patriotism sweeping over it now, and on the way its young men are coming forward and enlisting; they are going over as much from this Dominion as from America to maintain the liberties and the civilization of Europe—

Mr. LEMIEUX: We will follow you as long as you talk that way.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: The ideas of what the Empire ought to be have been expressed, as I said before, by a kind of mediaeval Round Table, and they have a great propaganda out, and they are preparing a program for us of what the future Canada ought to be in regard to conditions in Europe and questions of that kind. I do not prefer that we should be led into these proposals or accept them in any sense until we discuss them fully in this country, know what they are, and whither they lead. I think I am fully justified by reason of what has taken place. A word of warning should be spoken in this House on this great issue, and the people of Canada and of America should say now that inasmuch as civilization and the liberties of the world and democracy are at stake, and that the Kaiser of Germany, if he had his will, would destroy not only the liberties of Britain and of France but the liberties of America as well, we ought to take that wider and greater view and keep our autonomy and our resources and our organizations here, ready to join with all the other British democracies and with the United States, and to recognize at last that with America—free America, that America which has made itself the dictator of the world, that America which to-day controls the situation by reason of the magnificent resources of the Mississipppi basin and plains of the Saskatchewan—we must use all our powers to maintain the liberties of the world, and are not to be inveigled into any arrangement, even if we call it an Imperial confederation, in which we do not have absolute liberty to decide what we are to do. When I say that, I am only re-echoing the statement of Sir John A. Macdonald constantly repeated in this House, that above all things, while Canada was associated with the Empire and with the Mother Country he, for one, wished that Canada should always retain her autonomy, and that when she spoke in any Imperial gathering she would go there free, not to be governed by a vote of them all, but go as a free Government to express her assent or dissent and to withdraw if she saw fit and to keep her autonomy and independence on every matter.

The dreams of the Kaiser have been suddenly dispelled. He finds that this great free, democratic America is organized against him. He sees the handwriting on the wall; he knows that he will not succeed. Millions of Americans are being sent to the front; all the resources of the United States are being brought to bear against the enemy. Who, having read the farewell speech of General Washington, would have imagined that the United States navy would go to Europe in defence of the liberties of Europe? But it has happened—and the Kaiser did not expect it. We have maintained our sea supremacy; Britain and France and the dominions of the Empire have held the Germans back, on the western front. I do not think Germany will succeed, and that is why I believe that this country ought to make use of all its resources to carry on the conflict. Our people ought to stand for conscription; our farmers ought to stand for it. We should put everything we have into this war, into the maintenance of the rights of democracy. I sympathize a great deal with the farmers' deputation which is in the city to-day, but I am strongly of the opinion that our farmers must do their share of the fighting as well as of the production, as I believe the Prime Minister told them to-day. The farmers having been told that production is almost equal to military service, the Government must expedite their enumeration of the man-power of the country not engaged in war, and if the farmers are unable to reap their harvests the Government must find a way to get them all the assistance they can from those now engaged in unnecessary occupations. With the enforcement of the Military Service Act, there must go registration, conscription and a direction of the man-power of the country, in order that persons engaged in unnecessary occupations shall assist the farmers and take up any war work that has to be done. We have made some headway; it has taken a long while, but we have got that far. I believe that the farmers will accept this decision of the Government and that they will allow their boys to go. I know that they are going from my part of the country. We are presenting a united front—Canada, the overseas dominions, the Mother Country, the United States—in upholding the liberties of the world against the dominion of Germany.

In making this fight against the common enemy we have to alter some of our economic laws. The United States is becoming not only the strongest factor in the war, but the nation of greatest financial resources. This financial strength of the United States is practically due to their national system of currency and of banking. I have advocated on the floor of this House—and I advocate now, with still more fervour—that we should not let this session pass; that we should not let this war pass, until we have established the strongest possible financial organization. Immediately on the outbreak of war we should have had a national currency instead of a bank currency; a national system of banking such as they have in the United States, a great system of re-discounting by national banks. The United States by the adoption of this system, has stood the great strain of the war, spent billions of money, and kept down the rate of interest. We have to go to the United States for assistance in the matter of credit and money, and it is time that we put ourselves in good standing with them by following their example in the matter of currency and banking system. I make no objection to the Canadian banks or to what they are doing for the building up of the country. They are doing all right, but they are working under an obselete system which ought to be modernized, especially in view of our position on the American continent. If we had taken steps in this direction we should have been able to do a great deal more than we have done. The proof of my contention is found in the fact that the moment Britain went into the war she adopted some of the methods which have been adopted in the United States. Leading bankers of England in recent meetings affirmed that before the war is over Great Britain will have to revolutionize further her system of banking and currency and follow that of the United States, and if it is necessary there, it is necessary here as well. If we had a national currency instead of a bank-note currency, the rate of exchange as between this country and the United States would not to-day be against us, and the discounting of our bank notes in the United States would not prevail. In some cases it is two per cent; in some cases our notes are not taken at all, although they are just as good as United States notes. For years we have accepted notes of the United States amounting to millions, constituting practically a loan from the Canadian people to them, and we have not had a corresponding advantage. I had hoped that the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), who is not now in this country, would have taken steps this session looking to the establishment of a national currency and a national system of banking such as they have in the United States.

I am not going to touch on the tariff, but I am going to touch on one thing in connection with the war. The war has clearly proved that a pastoral people, when its liberties are assailed, is quite able to take care of itself. Every nation, in order to maintain its liberties when they are threatened, must see to it that hereafter it is not only able to produce food, but is highly organized industrially. It must be just as strong a people as is the strongest nation in this war, that is, Great Britain. I am not asserting that as a reason for a tariff or for protection; but the new view that will sweep the North American continent is that any country that thinks it is its duty to uphold democracy and to fight for the liberties of the world must have universities with men highly qualified in the technicalities and sciences, and most of all, its education must be such that it will turn out not only soldiers, but scientists, professors, engineers and other skilled men who will be able to organize and utilize the resources of the country for the maintenance of its liberties. We must have factories, we must have engineers, we must have mechanics, we must have a high organization of our industries, we must have diversity of employment. The United States, which has all these things, is our neighbour, and while I am not, for one moment, advocating anything in the direction of protection, one of the great lessons of this war in which we are now engaged and in which we are putting our all is that we should have our industries organized to the fullest extent.

The people of Canada feel that in this great war the transportation of the country must and ought to be nationalized. The day that Great Britain went into the war she nationalized her railways. The day that the United States went into the war the railways of that country were practically nationalized. When we went into the war we should have nationalized our railways. We are now in process of doing it partially. If the war is to continue—and it is not over yet—it is not too late to begin, and I hope the Government will, in a day or two, be in a position to announce to this House that they are entering upon a policy of nationalizing all the railways. I have no sympathy with the legislation recently passed in this House that out of the profits of the Canadian Pacific we shall take a percentage which shall be devoted to war purposes. How much of that is contributed by the people of Canada in increased freight rates? I do not believe that is the right way to use the railways in order to help to win the war, and I regret that the Government advanced the freight rates, instead of boldly, at the beginning of the war, taking over the railways. By taking over the railways they could have affected consolidation and co-ordination, and, consequently, economies, which would have made possible a reduction in freight rates—and the greatest relief and encouragement that the farmers of the West can receive is to have the freight rates reduced to the lowest possible limit.

9 p.m.

It had been my hope that by this time we should have a national system of railways, a national telegraph system and a national telephone system; that the telegraphs and telephones would be centred in the national post office, and that the central life of every community, large or small, would be in the national railway station and the national post office. If you had that, you would have in every little village, in every big town and city this splendid institution which would be the centre of national life and service. I had hoped that we would have in the Union Government a Postmaster General with instructions from his colleagues that the telegraphs and the telephones were to be taken over and concentrated with the post office and the railway ticket office in each community; that a good salary would be paid to the man or woman in charge of the office, and that it would be kept open night and day if the business of the community warranted that being done. The war would have given us a pretext for entering upon a policy of nationalization. But the war has been going on now for four years, and we have not got very far yet in nationalizing our railways. But we are making some headway. I hope the Government will tell us that they are going to take such further steps as are necessary to the establishment of the conditions I have indicated. We have been delayed a long time in getting national railways. Those of us who years ago advocated the nationalization of our railways did not think it would ever arrive, but like other unexpected things, it is beginning to arrive. I appeal to the ministers from the West that we have right away in this country national railways, run absolutely free from politics, and with the main object to create a great central service in every community and to give service to the people. We should have started with taking over the Canadian Pacific. I do not believe the Canadian Pacific Railway Company will ever again have an opportunity of getting what they could get now, during war time, for that organization coming in as the foundation of a national system of railways. But they have seen fit to maintain their independence. If I interpret aright the speech delivered the other day by Lord Shaughnessy, it was an intimation to the people of Canada that if they wanted to take over the Canadian Pacific for war purposes or anything else, they would have to pay $200 for $100 worth of shares; or, what is the same thing, guarantee the shareholders ten per cent. I am not prepared to say that I would guarantee the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific ten per cent. I would be quite willing to see them guaranteed eight per cent, if the road was made the backbone of a great national system of railways. Sir Adam Beck in his proposal to electrify the railways of Canada, and especially of Ontario, should have included not only the Grand Trunk and any railways the Government may take over, but the Canadian Pacific as well. I am sure that if we had a great national system of railways we should be stronger for war purposes and stronger for the development of our own country.

While on this question I would point out that Lord Shaughnessy, and the management of the Grand Trunk Railway who have spoken about the amount they have invested in railways in Canada, have also invested largely in railways in the United States, and when they appealed to the Canadian people to do certain things in this war they forgot to tell us that only one-fifth of the mileage of the great Canadian Pacific Railway had been taken over and is controlled to-day by the government of the United States. One-fifth of the mileage of the Grand Trunk has also passed out of the hands of the road, and is now under the control of the United States government. Inasmuch as the American government have taken over the portions of these roads lying in the United States we should take over what is left in Canada, and then with portions of Canadian roads under the control of the United States government and the balance under the control of our government a great continental system of transportation would evolve. That is coming. I will never believe that the American government will give up the control of those roads. The whole tendency is in the direction of public ownership, and as we are taking over some of the railways in this country we ought to take over them all and nationalize them. We ought to urge on the people and government of the United States, and on our people and our Government, that private ownership of railways is not in the public interest.

There is one other thing I should like to touch on which concerns the war and is on the line of democracy, and that is the presence in Canada of an irresponsible Senate. The time has come—certainly now that we are engaged in war—when the Senate as constituted in this country must cease. The people of the United States, if they believe in anything, believe in electing representatives responsible to the people, and their Senate is responsible to the people through election by the State legislatures. There is no such thing in that country as an irresponsible Senate, nor has there ever been made in any other country, but this is a declaration such as I am told was made in another place in Ottawa not long ago, that the Senate of Canada was the custodian and protector of vested interests in this country. It is the people of Canada who has the right to say what are and what are not vested interests, and the people, as an outcome of the war, want a reorganized Senate which will be a responsible body, and then democratic principles will obtain throughout the whole organization of Government in this country.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the appointment of Senators should come under the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I did not say anything of the kind, and I hope the hon. gentleman has never said anything so foolish. I said the Senate of Canada should be responsible to the people of Canada. Does the hon. gentleman object to that?

Mr. BURNHAM : No.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I hope I have the support of the hon. gentleman when I say the Senate of Canada should be reorganized. They are reorganizing the House of Lords in Great Britain. England is the most progressive country in the world, so far as putting into practice democratic principles is concerned. A report has been made to the British House that the hereditary principle in the House of Lords must be abolished, and that the interests of the nation demand that the people should be represented not only in the House of Commons but in the House of Lords as well.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Can the hon. gentleman tell us something about that report?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: All I know is that Lord Bryce presented a report in the British Parliament the other day recommending the reconstitution of the House of Lords, and that the hereditary principle and the domination of the House by the aristocratic families should be wiped out.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: My hon. friend says "Hear, hear." He supported a party for many years that could have accomplished a similar reform in our Senate, but I am not blaming him so much.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I was young.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Youth is no cloak for wrong views. I say that, inasmuch as they are reorganizing parliamentary institutions in England and making them more progressive; inasmuch as the American republic has representative institutions and has no hereditary principle in their Senate —and life appointments are the next thing to hereditary appointments, and we have life appointments in this country—the people of Canada not only demand the reforms I have urged to-night, but they want Senate reform right away so as to give us a parliamentary organization that will be truly democratic.

I have asked the attention of hon. members for a short time, but I thought it was my duty on this occasion to say that inasmuch as we are engaged in a war we ought to take a new view of the war—the American and democratic view. We should have more national organization in this country; the nationalization of our railways and telegraphs; we should have Senate reform, and banking reform and a national currency. We cannot get all these things at once, but we ought to set our hearts on some of them and go after them. We have now a Union Government, and as we are in a position to deal with Civil Service reform and things of that kind, we ought to deal with these greater questions, and deal with them in the presence of this great war.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I had intended to say a few words on the motion of my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), but as I have just been trying to follow the meanderings and excursions of my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean), perhaps I had better say a word first on the very interesting discussion in which as usual the hon. member has indulged. Fortunately or otherwise, there are usually long intervals between the deliverances of the hon. member. His deliverances are always exactly the same.

But they are exactly the same. There is not the slightest conceivable difference between them, but by reason of the fact that they are not delivered very close together they are always more or less interesting. I think a man finds the Ten Commandments almost interesting when he reads them over, but they are ancient literature. I would rather think, without meaning the slightest offence, that the speeches of the hon. member smack somewhat of the Ten Commandments in so far as ancient literature is concerned.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: They are good Commandments, and the hon. gentleman might well observe them.

Mr. McKENZIE: There was one part of his speech that struck me as somewhat interesting, and that was the part of it in which he was so strongly in favour of reciprocity. He was a strong reciprocity man and emphatic in the assertion that intercourse should exist between ourselves and the United States. It just occurred to me that perhaps the hon. gentleman was getting out his flying topsails for the time when the reciprocity gale passes over. He rigs his little Tory craft and trims it to the breeze when it is necessary to carry him through the Tory storms and to bring him safely to the Tory harbour. But when that passes away and when we come to the blue skies of common sense and free breathing in regard to trade again, he pulls out these old sails that he has temporarily stowed away and plays around with them again. But, from time to time, when anything like a storm appears on the horizon, this, the most agile sailor who ever trimmed his sails to meet Tory conditions, is again on the yard-arm and his little Tory craft is fitted out and made ready to carry him to a safe haven.

The hon. member was talking to the farmers who are here to-night. I did not intend to say anything had he not invited me into that realm of discussion. It is exceedingly interesting to me as a farmer—not a farmer now, but a farmer's son brought up on the farm—to see the farmers around here. It reminds me of home and friends and the conditions of my early days. I have the greatest sympathy with and respect for the men who come here looking for their rights and a hearing of their case. The hon. member for South York told us the reason why they were here. I do not think he made the reason why they are here plain enough. I will tell him why they are here. I wish my hon. friend would turn his mind back to the third day of December last when there was something going on in this country in which he was interested. While he, no doubt, was practically secure in his county, I imagine that he still had an interest in his friends making a safe harbour, and I have no doubt he had a hand in passing this Order in Council. Here it is:

His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Rt. Hon. Sir Robert Laird Borden, the Prime Minister, and under and in virtue of the provisions of The Military Service Act, is pleased to order and it is hereby ordered that in any case where a person engaged in agriculture has applied for exemption and such exemption has been refused—the Minister of Militia and Defence, if he is of the opinion that the services of such person are essential for promoting agricultural production may, by order under his hand, discharge such person from military service.

That was the promise that was made to the farmers of Ontario.

Mr. BURNHAM: The hon. gentleman quotes there the simple fact that "if he is of the opinion," which implies "if he is not of opinion" as well.

Mr McKENZIE: This Order in Council speaks clearly and distinctly for itself. I have the greatest respect for the outbreaks of the hon member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) and I must say we are never sure as to where he is going to break out next. But, I have greater respect for the deliberations of Union Government. When, acting together and in the name of the Governor General, they reach a certain conclusion and put that in writing and publish it to the world, I prefer to take that as against the hon. member for West Peterborough. Because of the necessity of encouraging production to wipe aside the Military Service Act and make provision for the exemption of men engaged in agriculture, every Tory candidate in the province of Ontario from the third of December until election-day preached the doctrine: "Come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy laden and I will give you rest; my yoke is easy and my burden is light; nobody shall go to the war if he comes to me and supports the Tory candidate in the province of Ontario; this doctrine of conscription is intended for Quebec; it is a Quebec nostrum; it is not for you; you have done all you should do; this Order in Council is to let you out and to bring in the men from the province of Quebec and elsewhere; therefore, do not be afraid, come and vote for us and we will do you good." Well, the Government found themselves elected. They found that these farmers in Ontario voted for them and now they say to the farmers: "We are here and you are there; we have no further use for you as voters, we want your sons for the front and to the front they shall go." The farmers of Ontario are reasonable and sensible men and when a farmer in Ontario or elsewhere promises a thing it means that he is going to do it. This Union Government, or the Government of the day, promised that they were going to exempt the farmers' sons and the people of Ontario believed that that was true. Because they are insisting on that promise is why they are here to-day, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. W. F. Maclean) did not know it. And I hope they will be successful in impressing upon the Government the weight and force of a promise. When the name of the Governor General and the name of His Majesty are introduced into a promise and when that promise is published in the form of an Order in Council which has the force of a statute, the Government, I hope, will think seriously before they forsake their promise, or treat it as a "scrap of paper," or take the position before the country that they are not bound by it. That is about all I propose to say with respect to the speech of my hon. friend. There is no man in the House or in the country who can speak with greater ease upon general questions when we are at a safe distance from an election. But when he gets close up to the wind a chicken never ran under its mother's wing quicker than the hon. member gets under the wing of the old Tory hen.

SUPPLY—CAMP BORDEN.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: Now, my purpose in addressing you this evening, Mr. Speaker, was to offer a few observations in connection with this Camp Borden land purchase.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), who is not here this evening, amused me rather this afternoon in discussing this very innocent case of land purchase that he found at Camp Borden, which is situated somewhere in the vicinity of the town of Barrie in the county of Simcoe. It is marvellous, Mr. Speaker, the extremely innocent cases that the Minister of Justice will find. I was trying to think out for myself some other conceivable purchase of land that could by any possibility be as innocent as this purchase of the site of Camp Borden, and being somewhat of a Biblical scholar, my mind reverted to the fact that Adam had a piece of land in which he was cultivating trees. I have no doubt he bought that land from somebody, I do not know who it was, and as he bought it in the days of his innocence, before he took to dealing in apples, I have every reason to believe that it was a most innocent transaction, perhaps the most pure and stainless transaction that ever took place in the world up to this; but, nevertheless, as compared with the innocence, beauty and purity, the crystal-like brightness of this transaction at Camp Borden, it is dark and forbidding. Perhaps the Minister of Justice made himself believe that everything in connection with this transaction was innocent. Let us ask ourselves first the question, why was this man Barr bothering with the thing at all if it was the child-like transaction that it is sought to be made out? If there was no money to be made out of the deal, why were the great money-making barons of the city of Toronto bothering with it? We find in connection with this sale of land names which suggest transactions which are somewhat lucrative. We find that this agreement was likely made in the office of the National Trust Company, because one of the men connected with that company is a witness,—one name I find on the contract is that of Mr. Poucher, of the National Trust Company. The same man, Mr. Poucher, witnesses the signature of Sir Edward Kemp, evidently in the office of the National Trust Company. Apparently too, Mr. Barr is present in the office, because the same gentleman witnesses his signature also. Knowing who the directors of the National Trust Company are, I realize that they would not be playing with a matter of this kind unless there was some money in it. I am informed, Sir, by a gentleman from Toronto —I am not vouching for the statement which was sent to me in writing over the signature of a certain man who may be, and I have no doubt is, a respectable resident of that city—that $60,000 or $90,000 cold cash was made out of this transaction, and if the National Trust Company, and the other parties mentioned that appear in connection with this agreement had anything to do with it I can well believe they would not bother with any matter in which much less money was made.

If I correctly remember the statement of the Minister of Justice, he said there was nothing in the papers which would indicate that there was a guarantee of $12 an acre for Mr. Barr. If he did not say that, or if Hansard does not show that to be correct, my statement will have to be regarded as not having been uttered, because I am basing my assertion on my recollection of what the hon. gentleman said. The agreement, however, discloses that the statement of the Minister of Justice is not correct. That there was such a guarantee is disclosed by the agreement which I find on page 2 of a pamphlet which was sent to me. The agreement, which is signed by Hon. Mr. Kemp and by Mr. Barr, and is dated April, 1916, declares that Mr. Barr is to have $12 an acre for the land, whether he can buy it for that price or buy it for less, and he is not to pay for the cost of any expropriation proceedings. If it was found necessary to go to court a condition of the agreement is that Mr. Barr is not to pay any costs. He is sure of $12 an acre, and the Government undertakes to pay whatever it cost to expropriate the land. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that that is not a fair proposition. If Mr. Barr had land of his own that he wished to sell, as the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) said, it was perfectly right and proper for him to give the Government an option on it and to state how much he would take; but, as far as the rest of the agreement is concerned, I submit it is an absolutely new and novel procedure—at any rate it is absolutely new and novel to me. I never heard before of a man going to any Government and saying, "You want to buy a certain area of land, I have some land that I will sell you, and I know where some more land is to be got; I do not own a foot of it, but I will try to buy it, and if I do I will sell it to you at a profit. If I cannot buy the land you will expropriate it for me, and I will sell it to you at a profit." That, in brief, constitutes the agreement, and it is one of an extraordinary character. It is a transaction that should be fully sifted, and upon which the full light of day should be thrown.

Now what happened, and was this transaction fair to the poor men who owned the land? The hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) said that a man should not get for land all that he paid for it. Well, I have had a good deal of experience in connection with the expropriation of land and I have never heard, until this extraordinary case came before us, of any man who sold land getting less for it than he had paid. As a rule, you go up against the Government; you show them your titles and the price of your land. You say: "There is a piece of land; I paid $20 an acre for it; I do not want to sell it at all; you are taking it from me; is it not little enough for you to give me what I paid for it?" Most men representing the Government would say: "That seems to be a fair proposition, it does not look out of the way; so long as we are satisfied you paid that for it, we will give you that amount." That is what these poor men would have got for their land but for the interference of Barr. It was to his interest to beat down this price and get as much below $12 as he could, and he, no doubt, corralled into that court and brought to bear upon that judge all the sharpers he could gather round him to run down the price of that land, and they got it well below $12, and that enabled him to make a profit. I submit, Sir, that there is nothing of the square deal about that. It looks to me as if there was an understanding by which those representing the Government entered into an arrangement with Barr for the purpose of helping him out, and what was to be done with the money at the heel of the hunt I do not know. All the information and evidence we have is that Barr received all of this money, but we do know on accasions it does happen that in transactions of this kind more people benefit than those whose names appear upon the surface. And I do submit to the Government and to you, Sir, that transactions of this kind should not be permitted to pass without some notice; that when the Public Works and other departments of this country want land they should have the courage to go straight to the owners themselves and make their own bargains, and if they cannot make a straight bargain themselves, if they cannot get the land for the price they think is fair, then the Exchequer Court exists, and they can go there and fight the thing out openly before the people. If they do that the people will stand with them and have greater satisfaction than if they play a hide-and-seek game of some kind through a middleman. The people of this country are not anxious to do business in that way, they are anxious to do business in a straightforward, square manner in the open market. Although my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Boys) spoke very highly of the solicitor whose name appeared in this affair—and I have no doubt in the world but that he is as excellent a man as he is represented to be—nevertheless in a letter written by that gentleman on November 25, 1916, there are two inaccuracies. In the first place, he holds up this man Barr as the agent of the Government which he is not, and says he is the purchasing agent of the Government, which he is not. He says:

> I enclose you herewith the formal tender on behalf of the Crown for the lands expropriated as part of Camp Borden.

The tender which Mr. Barr made was not on behalf of the Crown but on behalf of himself. He was trying to get the land himself and sell it to the Crown, and any tender he made was not on behalf of the Crown. Another statement in this letter is misleading. He says later on:

> The Crown is only anxious that what is fair and just shall be done, but as the purchasing agent and you differ as to values, this is the only course we see that can be fairly taken to ascertain the value of the lands.

So far as I can gather there never was a purchasing agent of the Government who went to the owner of the land at all, except the man who went for the purpose of getting the land for himself. If any further proof were necessary to show that this land was to be $12 an acre to Mr. Barr, no matter whether he bought it for $1 or more from the owners, I quote from page 6 of the reasons for judgment given by the Judge of the Exchequer Court:

> It was strongly and repeatedly pressed during the course of the trial that the Crown having agreed to pay Barr $12 an acre for his lands and those to be acquired by him is estopped from disputing the fact that the market value of the lands is at least $12 an acre.

The judge found there was an agreement by which Barr was to get $12, and there is no question about that at all. He said so; it appears in the evidence, and the judge so finds. I repeat that statement because I understand that the Minister of Justice stated that it was improper for us to make the argument that this man had a fixed price of $12 an acre. I say, Sir, and I do not want to take any more of the time of the House, that this is a transaction which should not have taken place; that powers were placed in Barr that should never have been placed in him; that agents and men were used to get hold of this land and to make a big profit for the middleman, to the detriment and disadvantage of the owners of the land. I am glad that the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) brought this matter up, and that it has been aired in the House, and I believe that letting daylight in on these things will have a tendency to check departments from getting entangled in shady transactions of this kind in the future.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER (East York): I wish to express my sympathy with the large number of people whose property was virtually confiscated in this Camp Borden undertaking. I have had many letters and a great number of declarations from these people, and it was stated this afternoon by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) that the real estate men a short time before subdivided into ten or twenty acre farms a great deal of this property, and it was virtually exploited by these real estate men; and in that way these people were induced to purchase land at an exorbitant price. I do not agree with that statement. There were many acres of land there that were sold at a price that the people were satisfied to pay, which ran at $10, $15 and $20 an acre. But if these real estate men were accused of exploiting that territory, what about those who came after and exploited it from those people or confiscated the property they were satisfied with? I have been over many hundreds of acres of land that was so condemned. There are some parts of it, as has been stated, with drift sand on it; there are other parts with considerable forest, good land and splendid running streams. For those people who purchased that land with the intention to build bungalows or summer homes and who did not want to farm, it was perfectly satisfactory. I will admit that if a farmer had to occupy that land as farm land with the idea of making money out of it, he would perhaps have had difficulty with it. But for the purpose most of them purchased it, for it was worth all they paid for it. Then if these exploiters who came after and said the land was only worth $3, $7 and $8 an acre—and it has been suggested by the hon. member for South Simcoe that they paid in some cases more than $12 an acre; perhaps they did, but they had to make that up by squeezing the smaller men to get it down to an average—they did that with the men who had no other alternative, on a threat, than to give up their holdings at a great sacrifice. Why should they have been treated in that way when it is admitted that while many got very good prices, others did not get anything like what the property cost them? I believe that the Government had no desire that these people should receive that treatment.

Apparently somebody who was on the inside took advantage of the Government and exploited this land. I consider that these people who sacrificed the earnings of many years in order to purchase this property have a grievance. They feel that the matter ought to be gone into. If, according to the various declarations and communications sent to members of this House, it is evident that these people have been taken advantage of by agents of the Government, then the Government should make good. If, on the other hand, the Government was not responsible for these agents, who, perhaps, got an inside inkling that quantities of land would be required, then it is not for the Government to make good. It is said that some gentleman connected with this transaction had eight thousand acres of land. The question is, did he own that some years previous to this transaction, or did he become the possessor of it at this particular time? It looks as if he must have got some inside information which caused him to secure certain land. To make the transaction complete he had to get other lands and even had to do considerable squeezing. A statement has been made on the floor of the House that a considerable profit was realized out of these speculations by some person at the expense of the poor people who were not in a position to go to the courts and fight their cases. Some of those who were able to go to the courts and fight their cases got better prices than those who were not in a position to do so but had to give up, you might say, under threat.

I wish to read another case which has not been brought to the attention of the House and which will show the position in which some of the people were placed. Not merely one or two but quite a large number have the same grievance. This appears to be one of the extreme cases where advantage was taken of a person who was not in a position to fight his case. The following is the declaration of David McClelland, of Toronto:

I, David McClelland, of the city of Toronto, in the County of York, do solemnly declare:

1. That in August, 1915, I purchased 20 acres in Tosorontio for five hundred ($500):

I paid seventy dollars ($70) on account of purchase and undertook in wrtting to pay four hundred and thirty dollars ($430) the balance thereof.

2. That I expended the sum of $731.20 in cash on said lands for lumber and materials for a dwelling house which I erected thereon and outbuildings, and for clearing and fencing said lands.

3. That said lands with others were on the 11th day of May 1916, expropriated for the purpose of a military camp or training ground for soldiers and now called "Camp Borden," though I got no notice of such expropriation and knew nothing whatever of my having to give up the lands until I was called upon by Mr. Wright (of Messrs. Wright and Barr, real estate agents, Toronto) who told me that Mr. Barr had purchased my interests in said lands from a Mr. Smith who had sold the land to me and that the lands had been expropriated by the Government for the purpose of a military camp, and he offered me $200 for my title therein, saying if I did not take that sum I might get nothing at all, but later on he sent me word to meet him at Barrie where he, through Mr. Radenhurst, the Government solicitor, served me with a notice, offering me $300 for said lands.

4. That my family were living in said house on the lands and in the latter end of July, 1916, we were told to get out and away or we would be shot as we were in the firing line, and were compelled to leave, and after taking the furniture away I went back for the window hanging and floor rugs left behind but the house had in my absence been partly broken down and the rugs, etc., taken away and I was refused permission to take away anything further off said lands.

5. That in the expropriation proceedings before the Honourable Sir Walter Cassels I claimed $1,810 including my cash payments for my expenditure in material and labour in fencing and preparing said lands for crop, for loss of season's crops, and for compensation for trouble, inconvenience and expense in moving to and from said lands.

6. That the Honourable Sir Walter Cassels heard the evidence but though I testified to my expenditure of $731.20 and asked him to look at my receipts therefor, he refused to do so, saying he was appointed to try the value of the land on the 11th of May, 1916, and afterwards gave his award for the $300 offered me, and I was to pay my own costs, which amounted to $130 leaving me a balance of $170 in lieu of all the money I paid out for said lands, etc., although he expressed himself (page 283, lines 13 and 14 of the evidence) that in all fairness I should have my expenditure but whether he could allow it or not as a matter of law is another matter (and on lines 19, 20 and 21) "I will consider it as he is entitled to whatever I can give him legally" and in delivering judgment said "The case is a hard one and under all the circumstances I think each party should bear his own costs."

7. That after payment of the $731.20 above mentioned I am still liable for the sum of $430 being the balance price of said lands, and I submit that it is neither just, fair nor reasonable that I should be put out of my holding and not be allowed the money it cost me, and I feel it in a worse sense than Naboth's Vineyard as in that case the King offered the full value but the Crown has taken mine and robbed me of the price thereof.

124½

That is surely evidence that injustice was done, and that the matter should be looked into. Why should agents or anybody else take advantage of a few people in a district like that who have invested their life's earnings in these lands and do not wish to sell them? They could not be considered as real estate subdividers of ten or twenty acre lots, because the land was worth what they paid for it; in some cases it was worth more than they paid for it. My sympathy is, therefore, entirely with those people who have in that matter been treated under conditions that should be investigated.

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the chair.

Railways and Canals—chargeable to capital —Welland ship canal construction, $1,860,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: The work of construction on the Welland ship canal was closed down about a year ago. This amount is required to pay salaries of staff and miscellaneous expenses incident to the suspension of construction and the maintenance of work, and also to settle the claims of contractors. There were on this work four large contractors whose claims we had to pay. In settling their claims, we took over their plant. We are practically reselling that plant, and we shall get the money back for it. That is why we are asking for this appropriation. It is not for the purpose of proceeding with the work.

Mr. MURPHY: Has the minister settled with all the contractors?

Mr. J. D. REID: Of the four contractors there is one, the Dominion Dredging Company, with whom we have not yet settled. In settling with the different contractors we took over the plants, engines and cars and so on, that were purchased for this particular work. There is no dispute with the Dominion Dredging Company except that they have a dredging plant and tugs which we did not consider we should purchase because the company had them prior to this work. The amount involved is about $375,000, and there the matter stands. Otherwise, we could have settled with them at any time. Their claim is under consideration with the Government.

Mr. MURPHY: I understand that the minister said that the plant that was taken over was to be disposed of.

Mr. J. D. REID: A great deal of the plant which the other contractors had came in very useful in connection with the Government railway system and the Canadian Northern Railway system. There were, for instance, engines and cars used for ballasting. The other machinery used in connection with the work we are disposing of to contractors and others, and my assistant chief engineer tells me they are selling it at a profit over the prices paid by the Government.

Mr. MURPHY: Will this appropriation cover the claims that are settled as well as the claim that is not yet settled?

Mr. J. D. REID: This will pay the claims that have been disposed of together with the claim of the Dominion Dredging Company, if we come to a decision in regard to it. This will clean the whole thing up.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I wish to draw the attention of the committee to a matter that has been generally overlooked in connection with the little province down by the sea.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. gentleman is certainly out of order.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: No, I am not.

The CHAIRMAN: The Welland canal has nothing to do with the little province down by the sea.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I am talking about the Welland canal. I want to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that a few years ago the canal systems of Canada charged tolls on all vessels that went through them, and an agitation was set up by the people of Ontario and some of the western sections of the country that the canals should be made free. The canals were made free, with the result 10 p.m. that the Maritime Provinces, which had contributed to and assumed their proportion of the consolidated debt of Canada invested in the canal systems practically made a present to the western provinces of $100,000,000 worth of canals. The reason I mention this matter in this connection is so that, when the minister comes to look after our little province down by the sea, he will see that we get our fair share of the public funds, and that it is not all monopolized by that big octopus, the province of Ontario.

Canals—capital—Rideau canal, towards construction of bridge on Rideau canal at Pretoria Avenue, Ottawa, $8,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: This work has progressed to such a point that a payment of $3,200 has been made on account, and the balance will be paid over on completion of the work to the satisfaction of the chief engineer of the department.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who are the contractors?

Mr. J. D. REID: Our dealings are with the city authorities, who pay the contractors.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Very good. The city is well administered.

Railways and Canals—chargeable to capital—canals—Trent canal construction, $500,000.

Mr. BURNHAM: I should like to have the privilege of congratulating the Government on the approaching opening of this splendid work. It is true that only four-fifths of the canal is now completed, but it means the opening of the canal to all that vast arterial commerce of central Ontario upon lake Ontario. The upper part, which connects with Georgian bay is, of course, not yet finished. It is progressing according to war conditions. That is the best that can be said, and we do not expect anything more, but it will necessarily be completed in a very few years. It is a fine thing to think that this great work, which has been under construction for no less than seventy-eight years, is about to be opened. It must have been a great proposition, or it would have died a natural death or been slain by criticism many a long year ago. Of course, in recent years, the population of the country, and of central Ontario, has very considerably increased. The consequence is that, as in all countries where population accumulates, industries have arisen, and favourable opportunities such as exist along the line of the Trent canal are sure to be taken advantage of. Places like Trenton, Campbellford, Peterborough, Lakefield, Lindsay, Fenelon Falls, Orillia, Barrie—all of those places have become centres of industry. The Hydro-Electric has an opportunity of developing 150,000 horsepower. That opportunity has arisen in consequence of this canal.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is that the available horse-power?

Mr. BURNHAM: That will be the available horse-power. The consequence is that you will have a cheap waterway which will immediately serve the interest of no less than 2,000,000 people. More than forty-three constituencies are directly concerned. It is only necessary to quote an instance or two to show how important the opening of this canal is to the whole district to which I refer. The Quaker Oats Company have just completed the reconstruction of their factory in Peterborough. The manager of the firm, from Chicago, told me the other day that the work had cost them $2,250,000, and he assured me that the minute the other end of the canal was opened and they could bring in their grain from the West in their own barges, they would treble this expenditure, and factories totalling not less than six or seven million dollars would immediately arise. He said the people of Canada, especially in that district, had no idea of what was in contemplation and of the industrial development that must take place as soon as the canal was completed. There are at present 615,000 bushels of oats of the company at Port McNicoll awaiting transportation. The grain cannot be shipped because of the shortage of cars. Last year, the year before, and on several other occasions this immense factory had to be shut down because they could not get transportation facilities. This great industrial concern is capable of elevating 288,000 bushels of grain a day, and they turn out in one day a hundred cars of their finished product. It is an immense concern, backed by enormous American capital, and such enterprises as these have sprung up solely because of the Trent canal. At last we have a very respectable means of conveyance. Right up as far as Peterborough it is eight feet four inches on the sill, and in the course of time we shall have it all the way through. This will enable a long stretch of territory from Peterborough to Lake Ontario to be well served, and the people all the way up to Washago will be able to get by cheap water transportation from Lake Ontario and the waters tributary thereto the goods they need. Therefore, I say I cannot let this milestone in the progress of that district pass—and a milestone also in the progress of Canada for this is a great national undertaking—without directing attention to this great event. On or about 1st June the minister, accompanied by all the members who care to go, will take a boat here at Ottawa, will sail through the Rideau to Kingston, will leave Kingston for Trenton and on up to Peterborough and into the Georgian Bay—the loveliest as well as the most serviceable water route that I know of anywhere in Canada. I am well aware that in the East and, needless to say, in the Rockies, there is some beautiful scenery.

Mr. McKENZIE: Did my hon. friend ever sail around the Bras d'Or lakes?

Mr. BURNHAM: They are very fine. The hon. gentleman was not quite so appreciative of his own district the other day when he said, speaking on the Civil Service Bill, that composition in Cape Breton was considered decomposition in Ontario.

Mr. McKENZIE: I did not say that.

Mr. BURNHAM: The Bras d'Or lakes, the Annapolis valley and many other portions of the East are extremely beautiful.

Mr. McKENZIE: We do not require canals to beautify the country.

Mr. BURNHAM: The flowery eloquence of its representatives is enough. In calling attention with my humble voice to the completion, so far as I have outlined it, of this really splendid and important undertaking, let me thank the Government for what it has done. The work has been done under war conditions, which has meant that it has crawled rather than proceeded at the speed we otherwise should have liked to see. I should like further, in the name of that whole district, to invite all hon. gentlemen to accompany the minister on his trip through the canal. The House will then be closed, at any rate until August possibly—I have no authority for saying that, but I fancy it may happen—and I hope all who can will come and see for themselves what I have endeavoured to call attention to, and I can assure them they will be surprised at the importance and greatness of the undertaking to Canada.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Does this item include the works for storage dams?

Mr. J. D. REID: No, that is under items chargeable to income.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I heartily endorse the very charming address given by my hon. friend from Peterborough, and join in wishing a speedy opening of the canal.

Mr. JACOBS: I would gather from the remarks of the two hon. gentlemen who have preceded me that this canal passes through their constituencies. I understood that it was the policy of the Government not to construct any new work during the war. The hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) told us that the question of building the Trent canal has been mooted for the last seventy-eight years. That being the case, do not you think, Mr. Chairman, that the work could very well have stood over until the end of the war? Five hundred thousand dollars is quite an item to expend on a work which is not absolutely essential, and I understand this amount is only a small item compared with the entire expenditure on the canal. I do not know very much about this canal, or about the district through which it passes. All I know is that in our part of the country we only hear about the construction of the canal during an election campaign, when, I understand, the Government always sends out a corps of engineers to make reports and lead the people of the district directly to be benefitted to believe that some work is actually going to be done. Am I to understand that the inclusion of $500,000 in the estimates for this work is an indication that the Government contemplate an election in the very near future? With regard to the expenditure of large sums of money, I made inquiries the other day as to the cost of piling certain ground in the city of Montreal. Ground was being piled which was not to be used for any building the Government had in contemplation; it was merely piled because the Government were piling, at that time, other ground on which they were going to construct an extension to the examining warehouse in Montreal. What do you think, Mr. Chairman, the piling of this ground cost? You will be surprised to hear it cost close on to $500,000, to be exact, some $470,000, and that was for piling unused ground on which the Government did not know whether it was ever going to erect a building or not. That was a criminal waste of money, during war-time, when we are paying six to eight per cent interest. We have now before us an item for another $500,000 for a work which I believe could very well stand over until after the war, when we could get the money at a reasonable rate of interest.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does my hon. friend say that this work has been under construction for seventy-eight years?

Mr. JACOBS: I said the question of the building of the Trent canal had been mooted for the past seventy-eight years, according to the hon. member for West Peterborough.

Mr. EDWARDS: You could hardly call it a new work, then.

Sir SAM HUGHES: If the hon. gentleman will do himself the honour of going over to the Chamber of Commerce or the Board of Trade in his own city and will consult any clerk there, he will get all the data about this canal and will find out that both those bodies in the city of Montreal have again and again strongly endorsed the building of the canal.

[Mr. Jacobs.]

He shows how badly he is posted on the needs and wishes of his own city. I am not going to defend this work because it is ancient history now. The work was dropped for a number of years until 1893 when it was revived and continued until the defeat of the Liberal-Conservative party in 1896. From that time onward nothing was done until shortly before the general election of 1908. The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) can tell you about it. I had the honour of inducing that hon. gentleman to make his first speech in the province of Ontario long years ago, and he did it very nicely. I was also partly instrumental in inducing him to make a trip through the charming waters of the Trent system, visiting Peterborough and other towns. He came to the beautiful village of Kirkfield in the constituency which I have the honour to represent, and he made one of the most delightful addresses to a vast assemblage there. He told them how this work had been neglected by the great Liberal-Conservative party and how the great Liberal party had thrown all its energies into it. The people just laughed. That evening my hon. friend was very sad. He and I were sitting holding hands on the deck of the vessel and, in the absence of any one else I endeavoured to console him. He said: "Tell me frankly what happened to-day, that I fell so flat." I said: "The first thing is that you read a speech prepared for you by a couple of gentlemen whom I shall not name. In the second place you told them that the rocks had been thrown out by the Liberal party and that this work was being pushed forward by that party when there was not a man or a woman sitting on those rocks who was not familiar with every one that had been blown out long before the Liberal party came into power." I happened to have an old campaign sheet of the election of 1896 showing a photograph of the spot that he had been sitting on and talking and preaching about that day. He appreciated the situation and he realizes the nonsense of the stuff that has been talked by the hon. member sitting at his right to-night. We have a staunch advocate of the Trent canal here in the person of my hon. friend from Maisonneuve.

Chambly canal—renewing, in concrete, top of Wharf—St. Johns, $9,200.

Mr. J. D. REID: The upper part of this wharf is in very bad condition, so much so that it is not safe for barges to tie up there. The work has been delayed an account of building the bascule bridge between Iberville and St. John's which has just been completed.

Mr. McMASTER: Is an expenditure like this charged to capital or to income?

Mr. J. D. REID: It is charged to income.

Mr. McKENZIE: The income from the canal?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister did not hear me or he would not have answered me in that way. He said "yes." Does he stand by that "yes?" I did not think there was any income.

Mr. J. D. REID: The canals are free; it is paid out of consolidated revenue account.

Carillon and Grenville canal—protection walls —Lake St. Francis, $2,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: This is a yearly vote. The erosion is continuous and it would take some years to do all the protection work.

Carillon and Grenville canal—rebuilding lower entrance pier, $9,740.

Mr. J. D. REID: This pier which forms the north side of the lower entrance is completely decayed, and unless attended to at once will fall into the entrance and block navigation.

Lachine canal—dredging, $15,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: A number of vessel captains reported that their vessels had touched bottom in the upper part of the entrance, and for the safety of navigation it is necessary to have the boulders removed up to Cote St. Paul. There is a dangerous lump of soft rock below the locks which also should be removed.

Mr. MURPHY: Is this going to be done by the department or will it be let by tender?

Mr. J. D. REID: By our own dredging fleet.

Ontario St. Lawrence canal—improvements, $43,000.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What is meant by "Ontario St. Lawrence canal?"

Mr. J. D. REID: That would be the Galops, the Rapide Plat and the Cornwall canals.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It means the St. Lawrence canals in Ontario.

Mr. J. D. REID: In Ontario. This amount is required to do the following necessary work: Rebuilding lower entrance pier, lock 23, Rapide Plat canal, $26,000 and a similar work, lock 25, Galops canal $17,000. These old timber entrance piers, the tops of which are proposed to be rebuilt in concrete, were constructed at the time of the enlargement of the canals, and are so badly decayed above water line that it is impossible to keep them in repair and any expenditure for ordinary repairs would simply be wasted.

Mr. MURPHY: How is that work to be done?

Mr. J. D. REID: By contract.

St. Peter's canal—improvements, $4,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: Has the old contract been completed?

Mr. J. D. REID: The whole contract is completed and this item was supposed to pay for the final completion but I find that we shall need about $3,000 more and that will be put in the supplementary estimates.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is that on Lake St. Peter?

Mr. J D. REID: No, that is on St. Peter's canal in Nova Scotia. This is to pay the Weller contract.

Trent canal—improvements, $57,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: This is to do the following work:

Dredging Otonabee River..	$14,000
Dredging Bobcaygeon..	5,000
Lock gates, Burleigh & Fenelon.. ..	12,000
Concrete, Superstructures, upper entrance pier, Fenelon Falls..	3,500
Concrete entrance piers above and below Peterborough Lift lock.. ..	4,500
Dam keepers' house at Nassau.. ..	3,000
Canal shop at Peterborough..	1,100
Concrete dam at outlet of Redstone Lake..	9,000
Rebuilding repairs to Reservoir Lake dams..	5,000
	$57,100

Mr. MURPHY: Why are concrete piers required above the lift lock? Are they to replace others or is that new work?

Mr. J. D. REID: It is new work.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What work is to be done above Bobcaygeon, dredging or rebuilding the lock? I need not tell the minister that the lock needs to be rebuilt.

Mr. J. D. REID: The expenditure at Bobcaygeon is for dredging some stone that was blasted last year, and is still there.

Sir SAM HUGHES: His officers will report to the minister that there is absolute necessity for a new dam at Bobcaygeon. The current there is so strong that it is practically impossible to get a boat through the locks. Besides, it has completely ruined the property below. Perhaps the minister has some other item dealing with it.

Hon. J. D. REID: I am informed by the officials there is quite a current at the point mentioned, but that we cannot do anything but rebuild the whole lock, and that has been postponed.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Why not rebuild the whole lock? It is much more essential than some of the works being carried out on the Otonabee. It is absolutely necessary. Now that the canal is going to be opened out into Lake Ontario it practically prohibits any traffic above Bobcaygeon, from Lindsay, Fenelon Falls, Orillia or Barrie, unless the lock is completed this summer.

Hon. J. D. REID: I am informed they can get the lock in operation during the present year, and for that reason we have postponed the large expenditure for another year.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It is a very small expenditure. I see the minister is building a new dam at the outlet of Red Stone. That is well.

Hon. J. D. REID: A concrete dam at the outlet of Red Stone lake.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What about Drag lake dam? It is a very important work and I wrote the minister some time ago about it. There was a mistake made in the department in regarding this as two dams instead of one. There is just one dam required, which is divided by an island in the middle of the stream, which saved the construction of part of the dam. That is how the department got the idea that two dams were required. I may point out that it is essential because the people of Haliburton are putting in an electric light plant, and they wish to get the privilege, accorded all along the line, of utilizing the dam for their power works, otherwise it will put them to very great expense. I would like if the minister could see his way clear not only to build the Red Stone dam but the Drag Lake dam. The latter is on the Burnt River waters, and the former is on the Gull River waters. Both are very essential because the Red Stone dam is likely to give way. It is one of the largest reservoirs in Ontario, and it will cause a great deal of damage if it breaks. Drag Lake dam is also likely to give way, and it has not sufficient water now to allow the lumbermen who utilize the rivers going into it to bring out their timber. I wish the minister would look into the matter and see if he can adjust some of these things.

There is another matter that I wish to draw attention to. Some years ago one of the lumbermen in the district—the correspondence is before the department—carried out some work at his own expense on the guarantee of the superintendent of the canal that it would be put in the Estimates and voted. I think the expenditure amounted to $2,100. The minister will remember the instance because I brought it to his notice. That expenditure has never yet been made good, and the lumberman in question has been out of pocket for a number of years.

Mr. J. D. REID: What is the name of the company that has the $2,100 claim?

Sir SAM HUGHES: John Carew and Co.

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not find any items in the Estimates for the Drag Lake dam, or this other work. However, I will take the matter up to-morrow with the chief engineer and see if it is possible to put an amount in the Supplementary Estimates.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I will be greatly obliged to the minister if he will do that. The town of Haliburton is going to put in works and it means double the cost if they have to construct this special work in connection with their electric light and power plant. If the dam is built it will go a long way to provide facilities and save money in that way. It is a very necessary item, and if the minister carries this out he will greatly oblige the people of Haliburton.

Mr. J. D. REID: I will look into the matter to-morrow, and also the other matter which the hon. gentleman spoke of.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: An item of $500,000 has already been accepted by the House, and another of $57,000. If I remember well it was stated here a few days ago by the minister, when I asked him about going on with works on the St. Charles river in Quebec, that all permanent works would be postponed until after the war.

Mr. J. D. REID: These were contracts that were made a number of years ago, and were practically completed. To stop these works now would cost more than to complete them. Their completion means rendering available to navigation about one hundred and eighty miles through one of the best settled districts in Canada.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Yes, and you will save three hundred miles on the journey from Port Arthur to Montreal.

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, and the result is that a number of large towns and cities will have the benefit of water transportation, a thing that they have been looking forward to for many years. Had it not been that they are really nearing completion these works would have been closed down like the others. The result of their being open to navigation within the next thirty days means that vessels will be able to sail from Lake Ontario up to the Georgian bay, thus giving the benefit of transportation to a well settled country. It would hardly have been fair to have closed such works down when it did not involve a very large amount of expenditure.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: If I draw attention to these items, it is not in any spirit of opposition. The Government is perfectly justified in continuing works that were started some years ago. But they should adopt the same policy in regard to works that were begun some time ago on the St. Charles river, in Quebec, and for which a contract has been granted. Not only is that the case, but the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), in 1913, speaking in Quebec, made the declaration that the works on the St. Charles river were of great importance and would be proceeded with. I also think that work in connection with the Transcontinental terminus in Quebec should be continued. The Government have spent millions of dollars on those works, but they have not been touched for a couple of years. Workshops have been erected at a very large cost, but they have not been equipped as was promised in an agreement signed between the Government and the municipal authorities of Quebec. The Government also bought three miles of frontage on the River St. Lawrence at Quebec, for the purpose of the Transcontinental railway, on which they have spent millions. For a small additional outlay these works could be proceeded with and result in great benefit, not only to the city of Quebec but to the whole of Canada. I respectfully call the minister's attention to the fact that if there is money available to proceed with works on the Trent canal in Ontario it is equally proper that money should be forthcoming for the completion of important undertakings in the city of Quebec which are of national importance.

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not think I should get into a discussion on the Transcontinental railway on an item dealing with canals.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: I only wanted to draw the attention of the minister to the works on the St. Charles river.

Mr. J. D. REID: Mr. Chairman, if it is in order that I should discuss on a canal item the reason why we are not going ahead with work on the St. Charles river which has to do with a railway item, I will answer the hon. member. I do not want to go outside of the rules. Am I in order to discuss the River St. Charles matter?

The CHAIRMAN: I fear that the hon. gentleman would be out of order. I understood the hon. member for Quebec County (Mr. Lavigueur) merely to refer to the St. Charles river works by way of analogy, and for that reason I did not call him to order at that time. But any lengthy discussion of the St. Charles river works which pertain to the Public Works Department, or of the Transcontinental which comes under another item, would certainly be out of order.

Mr. BUREAU: The amount voted in 1917-18 was $25,000. The department could only have spent $15,000, as there is a revote of $10,000. This year the minister is asking for $57,000. May I ask if conditions have changed now? How does he expect to spend $57,000 this year when he could not spend the whole of his appropriation last year?

Mr. J. D. REID: Of course, another year has made these conditions referred to very bad, and we really must proceed with the work. There is some dredging along the river that must be done when navigation is proceeded with on and after the first of June.

Welland canal—Heavy repairs, $35,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: This appropriation is for: (1) renewing three old canal weir foot bridges in concrete, $1,500; (2) replacing four old canal lock gates with reinforced concrete gate bars, $5,000; (3) placing stone protection along certain portions of Summit Level between Thorold and Port Colborne, $15,000; (4) to clean out and deepen entrance to Port Dalhouse, $6,500; (5) unforeseen expenditures, $7,000. The bridges to be renewed in item (1) are in a very decayed and unsafe condition. This amount will complete Old Canal weir bridge renewals. Item (2) is a continuation of work commenced last year, authorized by letter from the chief engineer. With regard to item (3), continued high water and heavy traffic on the summit level between Thorold and Welland have caused the banks to become badly undermined and eroded. Portions of the towpath, which is the main travelled highway between Port Robinson and Welland, have slid into the canal, and immediate rip-rapping is essential to preserve the road. It is estimated that about 9,000 cubic yards of stone protection will be required. No stone protection has been placed on this part of the canal since 1914. Item (4) is to be done by contract. Owing to continued abnormally high water in lake Ontario during the past year, it was not found necessary to carry out the work.

Railways and canals—Collection of revenue —Canals—Staff and repairs—Statistical officers, $1,642,500.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does this vote apply only to canals?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes. This amount is required to pay the wages of the staff on all the canals throughout the Dominion. The hon. member will see that last year the vote for staff and repairs was $1,440,000; this year it is $1,600,000. The item for statistical officers, $42,500, remains the same as last year. We have to increase the salaries of the men on the canals staff, and there is an increase in the cost of materials required to keep the canals in repair.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the increase over last year?

Mr. J. D. REID: It is $160,000. It applies to our whole canal system.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the increase in wages?

Mr. J. D. REID: We have not any detailed statement of that increase. The employees are increased from time to time. We intend taking that matter up as soon as the session is over, and to see that an increase is given to the canal employees throughout the whole system.

Mr. TOBIN: Will the increase be uniform for all employees, or will it apply to just a few?

Mr. J. D. REID: You have to consider each individual class. No uniform system has been adopted.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister might as well give on this item, as on any other, his policy with respect to the patronage system on the canals of Canada. Last night he told us that he would announce his policy on this matter when he was on his estimates. When he comes to the railway estimates, we shall expect him to tell us his policy with respect to railway patronage. He is now dealing with the canals, where there must be large patronage because a large number of men are employed, and heavy purchases are made. I believe the Government is making an honest attempt to eliminate patronage, but as the railways and canals do not come—as I understand the minister—under the Civil Service Bill, the hand of the minister and of his officers will be upon these matters to a greater degree than in other works coming under the Civil Service Act. If the minister is prepared to tell the country what his policy is with respect to matters of that kind, perhaps he can do so on this item.

Mr. J. D. REID: I think I explained my policy last night. The hon. member understands that the Railways and Canals Department comes under the Civil Service Bill which is now going through the House; in fact they are now practically under it, as they have been under it since the Order in Council was passed a couple of months ago.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister will pardon me: Does he say that the railways and canals come under the Civil Service Act?

Mr. J. D. REID: No, I do not; I say that the Civil Service Act excepts railways. It does not except employees of the Railways and Canals Department. It does not say that it excepts the employees on the railways and canals. If the hon. member will read the Bill he will see that it excepts employees of the Government railways. So that the canals are under the Civil Service Commission. Since that Order in Council was passed, all appointments in connection with the canals and the other branches of the department, excepting the Government railways, have been made by the Civil Service Commission. For some years purchases in the Railways and Canals Department were made by the purchasing agent of the department, but they are now made by the War Purchasing Commission. It would be impossible to put the railways under the Civil Service Commission, for the reasons which I gave last night.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Under what department are the docks and approaches at Port Borden and Cape Tormentine?

Mr. J. D. REID: They are under the direction of the general manager of the Canadian Government Railways at Moncton.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Dredging is absolutely necessary there; probably the minister knows it.

Mr. TOBIN: Who makes recommendations to the minister for increases to employees on canals?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Chief Engineer and the Superintendents of Canals go into the matter and make recommendation to me. I have always approved these recommendations; I have no doubt that it will be satisfactory to proceed in that way.

Mr. TOBIN: Will the lower-salaried men get larger increases than the higher-salaried men?

Mr. J. D. REID: That would be taken up when the reports of these officers are made. The larger-salaried men would be statistical officers, and it will be observed that we have not put in any increases for them.

Mr. TOBIN: The increas d cost of living bears more heavily on the man whose salary is from $800 to $1,500 than it does on the higher-salaried man. I would ask the minister to consider this.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister has said that the Order in Council of 13th February applies to labourers and employees on the canals. Is that Order in Council being enforced?

Mr. J. D. REID: So far as I am aware, it is, in every way.

Mr. BUREAU: The Order in Council recites that a doubt existed in the mind of the Prime Minister whether, under the War Measures Act, such an Order in Council could be passed, and that, in the view of Parliamentary counsel and other legal officers of the Government, the Government had no power to pass such an Order. I was wondering whether the minister, who wants to stick to the rules so closely, would enforce an Order which was illegal or issued without authority.

Mr. J. D. REID: A doubt was expressed—

Mr. BUREAU: Not a doubt, a certainty.

Mr. J. D. REID: In the Department of Railways—indeed, in all the departments—we have lived up to that Order in Council. In every case the Chief Engineer takes the matter up with the Civil Service Commission. I am trying to live up to that Order in Council just as if it had been an Act of Parliament.

Mr. SIMPSON: I desire to corroborate the statement made by the minister with reference to patronage, at any rate, so far as the ship canal at Sault Ste. Marie is concerned. Two vacancies recently occurred in the staff there, and I know that instructions were sent out that applications for appointments to fill these vacancies should be made to the Civil Service Commission. I am glad to hear the minister say that after the work of the Session is over the question of increases to employees of canals will be given consideration. Many of the men employed on these canals are not receiving sufficient salary to maintain their families, particularly in these days of high cost of living.

Mr. BUREAU: This year we had before us a Bill to create a bureau of statistics under the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The Department of Agriculture has a statistical branch; so has the Department of Labour. Will the statistics taken in this case go to the Department of Trade and Commerce for compilation and publication, or is the work of these officers of a special or technical nature?

Mr. J. D. REID: This name, "statistical officers," applies to men, formerly designated as collectors of canal tolls, who issue passes to vessels going through the canals and obtain particulars as to the destination of the vessels, their cargo, and so on. In this way a record is kept in the department. The name of those officers was changed some years ago and they are now called "statistical officers." One copy of the passes is sent to the department at Ottawa, and in Ottawa are collected the statistics in regard to the vessels passing through the canals. A copy of the passes and the information obtained by those statistical officers will not be sent to the Department of Trade and Commerce, but the Department of Trade and Commerce will get from the Department of Railways and Canals a detailed statement showing the quantity of grain or any other article of commerce that the vessels take on board while going through the canals.

Mr. BUREAU: How many canals have we?

Mr. J. D. REID: Eighteen. That, of course, does not mean only one collector on each canal. For instance, for the Rideau canal there is a collector in Ottawa for this end, and there is another at Kingston for that end, so that on some of the canals there is more than one collector. There must also be a night man. Take for instance the St. Lawrence canals. Vessels are going up and down these canals day and night, so that there has to be a double staff.

Mr. TOBIN: What salaries are allowed to those men?

Mr. J. D. REID: From $750 to $1,200 a year.

Mr. BUREAU: There are eighteen canals which are open for about six months in the year. If we multiply eighteen by two, that would mean thirty-six men employed, say at an average salary of $1,000, or $36,000. As the canals were not numerous, I was wondering, when I saw the amount of the appropriation, whether there was a man at each lock instead of a man at each canal.

Railways and Canals—chargeable to collection of revenue—miscellaneous—Canadian Government railways—compassionate allowance to the widow of the late Harold E Robeson, who died from fatal injuries received in Mulgrave yard on November 4, 1916, $2,000.

Mr. COPP: I wish to draw the attention of the minister to some correspondence I have had with him in connection with the late Mr. Edmund Cole, who was killed on the Intercolonial railway in February or March last. He was a section foreman on the railway for a number of years—I forget exactly how long—and during the very severe storms of last winter, 11 p.m. when the roads were blocked, he was out assisting in getting trains through. During a very severe storm a train, while going around a curve, struck and killed him. I wrote a letter to the minister in connection with the case. Mr. Cole had a small farm. His son is overseas, and his widow is left entirely alone in poor circumstances and with very little support. While I am glad to see these items in the Estimates, I hope the minister will be able to put an item into the Supplementary Estimates to provide a compassionate allowance for Mrs. Cole.

Mr. J. D. REID: I am glad the hon. member has mentioned this matter this evening, because the Supplementary Estimates are being considered. I remember the names of at least two men on the Intercolonial in connection with whom compassionate allowances are to be voted. I shall take this matter up to-morrow, and if it has been overlooked I shall then be able to place it in the Supplementary Estimates or give a good reason for not doing so.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Mr. McKENZIE: I hope one of the cases for which the minister is asking compassionate allowances is a very touching case, in regard to which I was corresponding with the department, from River Dennis, in the county of Inverness. A young man was killed on the train there some time last summer. They were filling one of the big cuts at Macdonald Gulch between West Bay road and the Strait of Canso. They were hauling the material from some gravel pit at River Dennis, and they had a long train of gravel cars coming up a heavy grade, to the east of West Bay road.

Mr. J. D. REID: Was the man's name Campbell?

Mr. McKENZIE: No, it was McGinnis. A freight train was behind and it began to push the gravel train, and the trains were so long that, when the pressure came upon them, the cars piled up in some way or another and the boy who was working on the train was killed. I wrote the department about the matter. He was an only son, indeed, I think, the only child, a bright young boy of about seventeen years of age. This is a very deserving case, as the minister will see from the correspondence, and something should be done to compensate the father so far as the department can do by the payment of a fair sum of money.

Mr. J. D. REID: I am glad the hon. member has brought up this matter also to-night, because I shall take it up and see if the father of this young man should receive a compassionate allowance. It strikes me, from looking over the Supplementary Estimates to-day that the name River Dennis is familiar. I am under the impression that we have this man's name on the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. McKENZIE: I forget the young man's name, but his father's name is John McGinnis.

Mr. J. D. REID: I shall take the matter up. I was glad to bring in the Bill to provide compensation for Government employees, because the way in which we have been dealing with these matters in the past has not been satisfactory. It is much more satisfactory, in cases of this kind, to be able to deal with them immediately an accident occurs. Now that we have this Act, we shall be able to deal immediately with cases like this instead of having to put the amounts in the estimates.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister ought to be congratulated on the generous way in which he deals with such cases. In the old days, when other ministers were handling the department, when I had cases of this kind, I got some money, but I think $750 was the biggest allowance I ever got, and I am only sorry my people were not killed now instead of ten years ago.

Quebec Bridge, construction, $700,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: I thought we could take up this item and then perhaps go on to the item for construction on the Quebec and Saguenay railway.

Mr. McKENZIE: It was not understood that we were going into railway matters to-night.

Mr. J. D. REID: I understood that some hon. gentlemen wanted to discuss the railways when these items were called, so I will not press the matter to-night. We could, however, leave one item on which any railway matter could be discussed.

Mr. McMASTER: I should like to bring before the committee, if I am in order, the matter of the rate on soft coal from points in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to points in Quebec.

The CHAIRMAN: That could only be done with the unanimous consent of the committee. Discussion of that question would be entirely out of order on this item. Is it the unanimous wish of the committee that the hon. gentleman shall have the right to speak on the question of soft coal? The hon. gentleman may proceed.

Mr. McMASTER: I am informed that for many years the rate of $1.80 per ton prevailed on the Intercolonial for the transport of soft coal from points of origin in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to points of consumption in Quebec. In the year 1916 the Minister of Railways and Canals almost doubled this rate by raising it to $3.20 per ton. This works a very great hardship to the province of Quebec, because the rate is practically prohibitive. It is more than fifty per cent of the cost of the coal in the lower provinces. We have from the minister's own lips, in reply to questions in the House, information from which we can calculate how much it costs the Government railway to carry a ton of coal for the four or five hundred miles between points of origin in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to points in Quebec. On 18th April last the minister, in reply to a question, told the House that the cost of transporting a ton of coal for some four hundred miles was $1.65. If we add another hundred miles, which might easily occur between points farther distant from each other, that would add one-fourth to the cost, which would bring the rate to just over $2, to be exact, $2.06. By a curious coincidence if you add 15 per cent to the old rate of $1.80 per ton, you get $2.07, and $2.07 would appear to me to be a fair rate per ton for coal from New Brunswick and Nova Scotia points to points in the province of Quebec. I should like to know whether there is any sound railroad reason for charging $3.20 per ton to carry coal which must cost a little over $2 per ton? What is the reason that has led the minister to raise the rate that has prevailed for so many years from $1.80 to $3.20 per ton?

Mr. J. D. REID: Between what points?

Mr. McMASTER: I have no exact points, but was taking the minister's statement in reply to a question which appears on page 906 of Hansard this year, and which shows that the cost of transportation from St. Hyacinthe, Montreal, and St. Lambert down to Campbellton, a distance of 406 miles, was $1.65. Now to be perfectly fair in my argument I have assumed that there may be another 100 miles between the point of origin of the coal in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick and the point of consumption in the province of Quebec. Therefore, by taking one-fourth of $1.65, we get $2.06, which amounts to the old rate of $1.80 plus 15 per cent. I would take it that it was quite fair for the Minister of Railways to raise the old rate of $1.80 to something over $2 in conformity with the 15 per cent increase which was granted to the other railways, but what I want to be enlightened upon is why the rates should have been raised from $1.80 per ton to $3.20 per ton, because it is a practically prohibitive rate and shuts out the province of Quebec from the enjoyment of coal from Nova Scotia.

Mr. J. D. REID: Why does the hon. gentleman say that a rate of $3.20 from Nova Scotia to Montreal by rail would be prohibitive?

Mr. McMASTER: It would add more than fifty per cent to the average price of the coal at the Nova Scotia points where the coal originates. I have some figures here given in answer to questions asked by the Hon. Mr. Tanner in another place. A member of the Government gave these as the average prices for coal charged by the different coal companies in the Maritime provinces:

	Screened.	Run of mine.
Acadia Coal Co...	$6.60	$6.35
Nova Scotia Steel & Coal Co..	5.50	5,25
Inverness Railway & Coal Co...	5.75	5.50
Bras d'Or Coal Co... ..	5.75	5.50

I presume that is at the mine. I would say that a freight rate which represents more than half of the price in most of these instances is a very heavy rate, and extremely heavy when compared with the former rate of $1.80 per ton.

Mr. J. D. REID: It is hard for me to give the hon. gentleman an answer to the question which he raised without making inquiries as to the reason. The hon. gentleman states that the increase has been from $1.80 to $3.20. When the 15 per cent increase went into effect on the other roads the rates were increased on the Government railway. I shall make inquiries and be able to answer the hon. gentleman when we take up the estimates again. Three dollars is not a high rate for that haul; I claim it is a low rate. Vessel tonnage is supposed to be carried at a much cheaper rate from Nova Scotia to Montreal than the same tonnage carried by rail. If they were to charge the rates that they are charging now it would almost make the traffic prohibitive in normal times. The rate to-day from Nova Scotia to Montreal, if we could charter vessels, would amount to at least $3 per ton. Vessel rates have increased very considerably. You cannot get vessels to go from Nova Scotia to Quebec or Montreal.

Mr. McMASTER: I would hardly think it fair to compare the rates obtaining to-day by water with the railway rates, because we all know that the shipping situation is quite abnormal.

Mr. J. D. REID: I admit that, but we have had to increase the rates on the railways on account of the increased cost of operation. The water rates should not exceed those of the railways. Surely, to bring coal from Nova Scotia to Montreal by rail, the railways should get an amount equal to the vessel rate. The same thing applies to coal which is being transported from Lake Ontario and Lake Erie ports to Montreal. The rate in normal times was about 50 to 75 cents per ton. To-day the rate on coal is about $3.50 per ton from Lake Erie ports to Montreal. That shows the way in which freight rates have been advanced by the vessels. They have also been advanced from time to time by the railways. If the rates are not raised the railways are going to lose a large amount in the cost of operation. The hon. member might have read in the press within the last forty-eight hours that the American railways are going to raise their freight rates on account of the high cost of operation. When the 15 per cent increase was ordered by the Board of Railway Commissioners for the other railways the Government railways simply increased their rates 15 per cent the same as the others did. I am not familiar with the whole situation but this little discussion will give me an opportunity of becoming thoroughly posted, and when the item comes up again I will be in a better position to give my hon. friend the answer to which he is entitled.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I know a good deal about this question and perhaps I can throw a little light on it. In ante bellum times it did not cost the Dominion Coal Company more than 35 cents a ton to bring coal from the Cape Breton mines to Montreal. I am speaking of those large ships that carry 10,000 tons such as the Storstadt. No. railway can compete on a long distance haul with that rate. To-day, with the high cost of ships and the high freights you might send coal from North Sydney, where it originates, to Montreal for $3 or less. The trouble is that the ships are not available at any price.

Mr. J. D. REID: Nor are cars, for such a long haul.

Mr. J. READ: Under the present condition of things in regard to the high price of coal for use on the railway, and the high working expenses by reason of increased wages, $3 is not too much from the Cape Breton mines. That is the only place where there is any considerable quantity of coal available. There is some coal shipped from Springhill in Cumberland county, Nova Scotia, also mined by the Dominion Coal Company, and that is 300 miles nearer Montreal than the Cape Breton mines. No other coal company, except the Pictou Coal Mines, is producing coal there. They are charging about $6 a ton for coal at the mines to-day, which practically means that the Montreal people have to take coal from Pictou county laid down at about $9 as the first cost, regardless of profit, and from Springhill mines the charge would probably be $8.50. I do not know what is going to happen if we have to rely upon the Sydney coal mines.

Mr. J. D. REID: Until the war broke out about two million tons of coal per annum were brought from Nova Scotia to Quebec and Montreal by vessel. In fact that is the only way that coal can profitably be transported to Lévis and Montreal; in normal times it would not pay to bring that coal by rail—the railway could not possibly compete with the water rates. Since the outbreak of the war, I do not think there has been any coal brought into Montreal from the Maritime Provinces, the demands of that city for coal having been supplied from the United States. Last year the only coal that came from Nova Scotia to Quebec was brought by two small steamers that the Department of Railways and Canals purchased the year before, vessels of 2,500 or 3,000 tons, respectively, and they altogether carried less than 100,000 tons. This year I do not think we will take any coal from the Maritime Provinces to Quebec or Montreal —it must all come from the United States, for the reason that no vessels can be secured. The Dominion Coal Company have no vessels, their fleet having been taken by the British Admiralty. That company lost the Batisca the other day, and have also lost the Louisburg, and they cannot get any other vessels; they cannot even take coal to St. John. We are being asked to use the little vessels that we purchased in order to supply the cities of St. John and Halifax. The Intercolonial railway is really taxed beyond its capacity on account of the shortage of cars. The cars are being used to move lumber, pulpwood and other products. If we could only spare the cars it would pay us much better to carry pulpwood and lumber to the United States, which is profitable, and transport coal from Nova Scotia to Montreal in vessels if the necessary ships could be obtained.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is the Quebec bridge open for traffic, and has it been accepted by the Government?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Quebec bridge has been in operation for some months, and I had the opportunity of going over it, I think, in November last. Trains are operating backwards and forwards over the bridge, in fact, there is an express train that runs along the south shore. On the local trains there is a great deal of traffic going to and fro. The good old car ferry Leonard has been disposed of, and we now have the bridge to depend upon.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would urge upon the minister to have arrangements made with respect to the train from Montreal to the Maritime Provinces so that passengers travelling to Quebec might cross by the bridge instead of using the ferry.

Mr. J. D. REID: What the hon. gentleman suggests is that the train should run across the bridge at Quebec and out again?

Mr. LEMIEUX: No, I do not suggest that. A local train might meet the Maritime express somewhere near the bridge, and convey the Quebec passengers direct to that city.

Mr. J. D. REID: I purpose taking that matter up, but I had intended leaving all such questions until we came to consider the votes for the Government railway systems.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the bridge been delivered?

Mr. J. D. REID: No, it has not been taken off the contractor's hands, because there is some painting and other small things yet to be done. Mr. Montserrat, the chief engineer, tells me that probably the bridge will not be taken over officially until about September. We are responsible, however, for the bridge now.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: I am glad that the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) has raised this question, because it is a very important one for the city of Quebec. I hope the minister will give this matter his attention, so that passengers may be taken to Quebec across the bridge as suggested.

Mr. J. D. REID: I will take the matter up as promised. Of course, it means an eight or ten mile run from Quebec via the bridge to Levis to meet the train. However, when I am considering the whole railways situation I will take that matter up and see what can be done.

Mr. POWER: Have any arrangements been made with any of the other roads, except the Quebec lines, with a view to giving them running rights over the Quebec bridge?

Mr. J. D. REID: No other roads have asked for running rights over the bridge, and until they do so we cannot force them to use the bridge. If other lines want the privilege we will be only too glad to make the necessary arrangements with them.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There are other railway companies that will want to make such an arrangement after the war is over. I can speak for the Delaware and Hudson company, because I happen to be a director of the subsidiary companies in Canada. This company had built along the south shore as far as some point in Lotbinière county when the first collapse of the bridge took place, and then they stopped work. Then the war came on. I know the company intend to run via the Quebec bridge, but are not in a position to announce their plans until after the war.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Other railways would like to enter Quebec, but the proper facilities are lacking until the works that have been projected are carried out. That is the pity of it. All the other companies, like the Delaware and Hudson, and the Grand Trunk, would run into the city of Quebec if the required facilities were available.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Opportunity for the further discussion of this matter will be afforded when we again go into Supply on the Railway Estimates.

Progress reported.

On the motion of Hon. J. D. Reid the House adjourned at 11.37 p.m.

Wednesday, May 15, 1918.

The House met at Eleven o'clock.

BILL TO AMEND INSURANCE ACT WITHDRAWN.

Mr. M. Steele, for Sir Herbert Ames, presented the fourth report of the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce:

Your Committee have had under consideration Bill No. 62 to amend the Insurance Act, 1917, and have agreed to recommend that the said Bill be not proceeded further with this session, owing to the fact that it affects British and foreign insurance companies and that such companies have not had sufficient time to consider and express their views on the proposed measure.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Return showing food destroyed in Toronto between April the 4th and April 29th, 1918, and the action of the Food Controller in regard thereto.—Hon. Mr. Burrell.

Names of persons employed in preparing the Votes and Proceedings, Orders of the Day, and Journals of the House of Commons (English and French).—Hon. Mr. Burrell.

Names of persons employed in reporting and translating the Proceedings of the House, and cost of printing and binding Debates; also cost of reporting the translating, typing and printing of proceedings before Parliamentary Committees.—Hon. Mr. Burrell.

PAYMENTS TO SIR CHARLES FITZPATRICK.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Sir Charles Fitzpatrick has asked me to read to the House a statement with regard to some criticisms which have been made in the House. The memorandum is as follows:

SIR CHARLES FITZPATRICK AND PRIVY COUNCIL.

Fiscal Year, 1913-14.—Vote:—Travelling expenses of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick attending sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, $2,500.00. No claim for this amount and no payment made.

Fiscal Year, 1914-15.—Vote:—Travelling expenses of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick attending sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, $2,500.00. This amount was paid as Sir Charles Fitzpatrick attended sittings of the Privy Council in August or September, 1914.

Fiscal Year, 1915-16.—Vote:—Special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses in connection with Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, $2,500.00. Claim was made for this amount, in monthly instalments, by the department having charge of the vote and as attendance at the sittings of the Privy Council had been omitted as a necessary condition of payment, the claims were allowed as in other cases of special allowances.

Fiscal Year, 1916-17.—Vote:—Special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses in connection with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, $2,500.00. This amount was paid for the same reason as in 1915-16.

Fiscal Year, 1917-18.—Vote:—Special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses when attending the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, $2,500.00. No claim was made for payment of this amount as Sir Charles Fitzpatrick did not attend the sittings of the Privy Council.

PUBLISHER OF OFFICIAL NEWS.

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): I deem it my duty to make a statement to the House with respect to an item which has appeared in the press of the country touching a despatch received from the Secretary of State for the Colonies at the end of last week, which was given out to the press in the ordinary course.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Received from and by whom?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Received from the Secretary of State for the Colonies. About the middle of January last I suggested to the British Government, through the Secretary of State for the Colonies, that it would be desirable to have a weekly resumé, or summary, of the war situation, which should be issued under the authority of the War Cabinet, and which might be published. We had been receiving for some time secret reports, which, of course, could not be made public, and the information set forth in those weekly reports was communicated only to members of the Administration, and in some cases to the Prime Minister alone.

We received a reply intimating that the matter would be taken into consideration, and about the end of March we were informed that such a despatch for publication would be sent to us weekly in the early future. These despatches began to come in about the end of March, or a little after, and when received they were published as was intended. They were not sent in code, and they were marked as official news for publication. It is understood that one of the Dominions of the Empire made a suggestion about two or three weeks ago that these news summaries were not as valuable as they might be for the reason that they set forth for the most part matters that had already been published in the press of the country. On Saturday last, one of those official news despatches was received in the ordinary course through His Excellency the Governor General, signed, as all these despatches are signed, by the Secretary of State for the Colonies, the Right Hon. Walter Long. It was handed out to the press and published in the usual way. Yesterday a further despatch correcting it in one respect was received in the same manner from the same source, and signed in the same way. That also has been given to the press. In communicating to the British Government in January last, we asked that these despatches might be sent to us under the authority of the War Cabinet. I do not know, of course, whether or not this particular despatch was sent out under the authority of the War Cabinet. I am content to accept the statement of Lord Reading in that behalf; he doubtless has more information on the subject than I have. What I desire to make clear to the House and to the country is that the despatch in question was received in the ordinary course under the arrangement alluded to, and purported to be signed by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. It was received through His Excellency the Governor General, and the despatch which corrected it was received in the same manner through the same source and signed in the same way. My purpose in making this statement is to assure Parliament and this country that if there has been any mistake or misapprehension with regard to this official news despatch it has not occurred here at Ottawa; it has occurred somewhere else.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks).

Mr. W. P. McKAY.

Mr. PROULX:

1. Is W. P. McKay employed in the War Trade Board?
2. If so, what are his duties and salary?
3. What was the date of his employment and was he recommended by the Civil Service Commission under the provisions of the recent Order in Council?
4. Is this the same W. P. McKay who was associated with A. DeWitt Foster, formerly Member of Parliament for Kings, N.S., in the purchase of horses for military purposes, which transactions were investigated by Mr. Justice Davidson?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. Yes.

2. In charge of issuing licenses of exports from Canada under supervision of Director of Licenses. Salary $200 per month.

3. 13th March, 1918. Yes. Mr. McKay was recommended to the board by Mr. John McDougald, Commissioner of Customs, as an efficient customs officer.

4. Do not know and have not investigated as Mr. McKay's work is and has been satisfactory to the board.

WAR TRADE BOARD OFFICERS.

Mr. PROULX:

1. Are the following persons employed in the War Trade Board: Messrs. Trower, Wilkie, Forrest, Russell and Murphy?
2. If so, what duties are they performing, what salary is paid to each, and by whom were they recommended for employment?
3. Did the Civil Service Commission under the provisions of the Order in Council authorize their employment? If not, why not?
4. On what dates were the above named persons employed?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. Yes.

2. Mr. W. K. Trower, general secretary, $500 per month; Mr. J. H. Wilkie, assistant secretary, $250 per month; Mr. T. M. Forrest, in charge of Statistical and Information Departments, $208.33 per month; Mr. E. M. Russell, expert on metals, $175 per month; Mr. W. P. Murphy, in charge of Filing Department, $125 per month. These men were selected by the board as being competent for the duties they are now performing and the board were satisfied with their credentials and they are now performing the duties assigned to them in an efficient manner.

3. Yes.

4. Mr. W. K. Trower, February 25, 1918; Mr. J. H. Wilkie, March 1, 1918; Mr. T. Mr. Forrest, March 13, 1918; Mr. E. M. Russell, April 8, 1918; Mr. W. P. Murphy, February 14, 1918.

EMPLOYMENT AT VICTORIA, B.C.

Mr. BOURASSA:

1. Has the Government been informed that in the spring of 1912, men were hired to go to Victoria, British Columbia, and work there as lumbermen, carpenters, painters, etc., at the rate of $3, $4, and $5 per diem, travelling expenses prepaid and lodgings gratuitously provided for?

2. Has the Government been made aware of the fact that, when the said workmen and mechanics had reached Victoria, all travelling expenses were deducted from their wages; that they were paid only $2 and $2.50 per day, and that they had to pay for their lodgings?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to pay for these men's travelling expenses so as to enable them to return home?

Hon. Mr. CROTHERS: We have no information concerning this question. I intimated some days ago that if the hon. member would give further particulars we would look into the matter. I have not received any particulars. As the question now stands, the answer to the first question will have to be no, and the answer to the second and third questions: Answered by No. 1.

MILITARY SERVICE REGISTRARS, QUEBEC.

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Is Mr. Ant. Gobeil, lawyer, ex-deputy minister of the Public Works Department, still registrar, under the Justice Department, for the operation of the Military Service law? Has he put in an application to be relieved from such function?

2. Has he been asked to send in his resignation? In what way has he been required to resign?

3. What were the number of women or girls, and the number of men, under his employ, on the 15th March last?

4. What is the name of the new registrar?

5. What are the names of the assistant registrars?

6. Are the offices in the Chateau Frontenac temporarily leased, or are they leased for a fixed term?

7. What were the number of lady employees on the pay-list, on the 20th instant?

8. What were the number of men employees on the said pay-list on the 20th instant, or on the preceding week?

[Sir George Foster.]

9. What are the duties of Mr. Alleyn Taschereau, K.C., in the said office?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. No.

2. Relieved by Order in Council, 3rd April, 1918.

3. 56 men, 49 women.

4. Alleyn Taschereau, K.C.

5. First Assistant, J. F. Belanger.

6. Leased temporarily to the 1st June.

7. 107.

8. 32.

9. The duties of the registrars and deputy registrars are those of recording, indexing, and notifying the men affected by the Act so as to give effect to the conclusions arrived at by the tribunals and medical boards. They are also charged with the duty of obtaining the equal application of the principles governing the disposition of claims for exemption by causing appeals to be entered when it appears that any tribunal has come to a conclusion the validity of which is doubtful, whether such conclusion is in favour of or adverse to exemption being granted, and with the obtaining of such information as will assist tribunals to perform their functions intelligently and with despatch.

APPOINTMENTS TO PRINTING BUREAU.

Mr. BALL:

1. How many appointments have been made in the Printing Bureau since October 1, 1911, to the present date?

2. How many of them are English?

3. How many of them are French?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

Nos. 1, 2 and 3.

		French.	English.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT—QUEBEC APPEALS TO CENTRAL APPEAL JUDGE.

Mr. CURRIE:

1. How many cases for exemption under the Military Service Act were appealed to the Central Appeal Judge from the province of Quebec?

2. How many of these appeals from the province of Quebec were disposed of by the recent Order in Council refusing all exemptions to men 20 to 23?

3. How many appeals for exemption from the province of Quebec were disposed of by the Central Appeal Judge, of others than those called up by Order in Council, during the month of April, 1918?

4. How many appeals from Quebec under the Military Service Act are still pending?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Up to May 10th, 11,657 appeals to the Central Appeal Judge from the province of Quebec have been received.

2. 3,645.

3. Up to May 13th, 3,211 appeals for exemption from the province of Quebec have been disposed of by the Central Appeal Judge, other than those called up by Order in Council. The records are not kept by months.

4. 4,155.

NATIONAL WAR MUSEUM.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka):

1. Is it a fact that representatives of the National War Museum about to be established in London have taken possession of the war trophies captured from the enemy by the Canadian Army, and are retaining the most interesting specimens for the said War Museum of London?

2. If so, has it been done with the consent of this Government?

3. Does the Government contemplate making any representations to the Imperial Authorities with the object of having these returned to Canada?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. All trophies captured by the forces of the British Dominions are assembled under the control of the Imperial authorities. A register is kept of all these captures, specifying in each case the name of the claimant thereto. Many of the trophies captured are still effective and have been put into service. The final disposal of trophies remaining at the close of the war will then be decided. It is understood that the National War Museum intends to form a Canadian section in that museum, and that certain Canadian trophies will be requested for that purpose.

2. The Canadian army has a representative on the Committee of the National War Museum.

3. A considerable number of interesting trophies have already been sent to Canada and others will be sent shortly. The interests of Canada have not, and will not, be neglected.

CANADA REGISTRATION BOARD.

Mr. DUFF:

1. What Department of the Government is the Canada Registration Board responsible to?

2. What is the street address of said Board?

3. What is their telephone number?

4. What are the names of the officials of said Board and the amount of their respective salaries?

5. What are their duties?

6. Have Superintendents been appointed for the registration of man and woman-power for Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island?

7. If so, by whom were they recommended?

8. What are their names and addresses, and what remuneration will they receive?

9. What are their duties?

10. Have Registrars been appointed for the different constituencies in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island?

11. If so, what are their names and addresses?

12. By whom were they appointed?

13. Who recommended them?

14. What remuneration are they to receive?

15. Do they appoint the enumerators for the different polling sections?

16. What remuneration will said enumerators receive?

Mr. McCURDY:

1. The Canada Registration Board is a subcommittee of the War Committee of the Cabinet.

2. Regal Building, O'Connor street, Ottawa.

3. Queen 4026.

4. The members of the board are: Hon. G. D. Robertson, chairman; E. McG. Quirk, vice-chairman; Mrs. A. Plumptre, G. M. Murray, Philemon Cousineau, K.C., Thomas Moore, F. B. McCurdy, E. L. Newcombe, J. D. McGregor; secretary, Henry C. De Wolf. Only the secretary receives compensation; amount $300 per month.

5. To effect a registration of persons in Canada over 16 years of age.

6. Yes.

7. Selected by the board.

8. For Prince Edward Island, J. J. Trainor, Charlottetown, P.E.I.; for Nova Scotia, George E. Corbitt, Annapolis Royal, N.S.; for New Brunswick, Charles Comben, Woodstock, N.B.; $8 per diem for time actually given to the work.

9. To recommend suitable persons to act as registrars in each of the electoral districts, and generally supervise the detailed organization necessary for the successful carrying out of the registration.

10. Yes.

11. For Nova Scotia: Annapolis-Digby, Wm. E. VanBlarcom, Digby, N.S.; Antigonish-Guysboro, D. D. Chisholm, Antigonish, N.S.; Cape Breton North and Victoria, Malcolm A. McLeod, Baddeck, N.S.; Cape Bre-ton South and Richmond, Daniel R. Cameron, Glace Bay, N.S.; Colchester, W. B. Armstrong, Truro, N.S.; Cumberland, H. Wyckoff Rogers, Amherst, N.S.; Halifax, Chas. F. Tremain, Halifax, N.S.; Hants, John W. Blanchard, Windsor, N.S.; Inverness, J. D. Doucet, Port Hood, N.S.; Kings, Archibald A. McNeill, Millville, N. S.;Lunenburg, D. F. Matheson, Lunenburg, N.S.; Pictou, J. Ed. McDonald, New Glasgow, N.S.; Shelburne-Queens, Wm. A. Smith, Liverpool, N.S.; Yarmouth-Clare, Wm. A. Godfrey, Yarmouth, N.S.

For New Brunswick: Charlotte, Robt. A. Stuart, St. Andrew, N.B.; Gloucester, Arthur J. Meehan, Bathurst, N.B.; Kent, Camille Boudreau, Richibucto, N.B.; Northumberland, Wm. F. Cassidy, Chatham, N.B.; Restigouche-Madawaska, Timothy Robinson, Dalhousie, N.B.; Royal, Samuel A. McLeod, Sussex, N.B.; St. John-Albert, Amon A. Wilson, St. John, N.B.; Victoria-Carleton, Albion R. Foster, Woodstock, N.B.; York-Sunbury, J. B. Hawthorne, Fredericton, N.B.; Westmoreland, Newton Killam, Dorchester, N.B.

For Prince Edward Island: Kings, Wm. Cain, New Perth, P.E.I.; Prince, Fred. J. E. Wright, Summerside, P.E.I.; Queens, Henry Smith, Charlottetown, P.E.I.

12. By Governor in Council.

13. The respective superintendents for the districts.

14. $6 per diem for time actually engaged.

15. They appoint deputy registrars for the different polling subdivisions.

16. Deputy registrars will receive $4 per diem. All registrars and deputy registrars are being invited to give their services free, and many are responding.

UNION STATION AT QUEBEC CITY.

Mr. PARENT:

1. Is the so-called Union Station at the Palais, Quebec city, owned by the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Government or by one of the two?

2. If by the Canadian Pacific Railway, has the Government made any arrangement with this company regarding the rent for the accommodation of the Government railway trains in the said Union Station?

3. If so, when did such agreement take place, and how much has been paid the company per year since the agreement was entered into?

Mr. J. D. REID:

1. The new Union station building was erected and is owned by the Canadian Pacific Railway. Part of the lands comprising the terminal yard is owned by the Government and part by the Canadian Pacific Railway.

[Mr. McCurdy.]

2. An arrangement between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway has been made regarding the rent for the accommodation of the Government railway trains in the said station and terminals.

3. The agreement is dated January 1, 1915, $1,104.83 was paid the company in 1917, and $19,347.08 in 1918. Accounts to the amount of $203,056.88 are held pending adjustment of contra accounts.

APPOINTMENTS FROM Y.M.C.A. AND SALVATION ARMY.

*Mr. CASGRAIN.

1. How many persons formerly in the employ of the Y.M.C.A. are now in the employ of the Government? What are their names?

2. How many former officers or employees of the Salvation Army are now in the employ of the Government?

3. Were all these appointments made on the recommendation of the President of the Privy Council?

Mr. BURRELL: I would point out that it is absolutely impossible to answer a question of this kind, considering the thousands there are in these two organizations and the thousands of employees of all kinds in the Government. Unless the question is made more explicit, I may say that the Government has no information.

SUPREME COURT REPORTS.

*Mr. McKENZIE:

1. Did the ten-year contract under which the Canada Supreme Court reports were printed by the Canada Law Book Co., Ltd., expire in June, 1915?

2. If so, were tenders called for in connection with the printing of said reports or was the old contract continued with the Canada Law Book Co., Ltd.?

3. Did the Carswell Co., Ltd., write the Department of Justice on the 16th June, 1915, offering to pay $500 per volume for the privilege of printing the reports for the current ten-year period commencing from June, 1915?

4. Would $500 per volume net the department from $8,000 to $10,000 in ten years?

5. Did the Carswell Co. also offer, if awarded the contract, to supply free for the use of the Government from 300 to 400 copies of the reports?

6. Under what contract or arrangement are the reports now being printed by the Canada Law Book Co., Ltd.?

7. Is the department receiving any monetary consideration from said company for the privilege they are enjoying? If so, how much?

8. If nothing is paid by the Canada Law Book Co., why was the offer of the Carswell Co. not accepted?

9. Is it a fact that the Carswell Co. is capable of complying with all the conditions imposed by the department in connection with the printing of reports?

10. Did the Minister of Justice before the expiration of the contract with the Canada Law Book Co. which was due to terminate in June, 1915, promise to invite tenders from both the Carswell Co., Ltd., and the Canada Law Book Co., Ltd., before making a new contract? If so, why was that course not taken?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Yes.

2. No, except as stated in answer to No. 10.

3. Yes, for a period of ten years.

4. It would depend upon the number of volumes issued. For the past ten years sixteen volumes have been issued.

5. Yes.

6. Under a contract dated 10th February, 1917.

7. Yes. $500 per volume.

8. The Canada Law Book Company does pay $500 per volume as just stated. The offer of the Carswell Company was not accepted, because the service for the previous ten years had been conducted in a most satisfactory manner by the present contractors, the Canada Law Book Company, and it was not deemed advisable, in view of this consideration, to experiment with another publisher.

9. It is so represented, but the Government is not otherwise informed.

10. Yes, and offers were received from both companies accordingly.

MR. PHILIPPE FUROIS.

Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. Did Mr. Philippe Furois, of Quebec, offer the Department of Trade and Commerce a vessel for the purpose of performing the service between Quebec and the northern shore?

2. What is the name of this vessel?

3. Is Mr. Furois the owner of said vessel?

4. What subsidy did Mr. Furois ask for?

5. Was he awarded a contract?

6. Was Mr. Philippe Furois the Unionist candidate in Bonaventure County at the last general elections?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. Yes.

2. Schooner " St. Onloine ".

3. Mr. Furois did not state whether he owned the vessel or not.

4. $5,000 or $6,000.

5. No. No definite information was obtained from Mr. Furois as the department was negotiating for a better ship.

6. The hon. gentleman can satisfy himself by reference to the public records of the elections.

CONNAUGHT RIFLE RANGE.

Mr. BOYCE:

1. What are the names of the parties who have Connaught Rifle Range rented for pasturing cattle?

2. What is the amount paid for rent?

3. What is the duty of Mr. Holbrook, who lives on the Range?

4. What salary does he receive?

Major-General MEWBURN:

1. Robert Richardson.

2. $925 per annum.

3. Caretaker.

4. $90 per month, with free house and grounds.

COLONEL LABATT.

Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. Was a letter written by H. H. Stevens, Esq., M.P. for Vancouver Centre, to Hon. N. W. Rowell in the following terms:—

House of Commons,

Ottawa, April 23, 1918.

Hon. N. W. Rowell,
President of the Privy Council,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Mr. Rowell,—Referring to the attached questions and answers in the Hansard of March 20th, you will observe that Colonel Labatt is in receipt of a total disability pension and also is in receipt of a salary of $5,000 a year as a member of the Pensions Board.

I cannot conceive that such a condition should be allowed to exist with the knowledge of the Government and I feel that it is but necessary to bring it to your attention to have it remedied. I am writing you as Chairman of the Pensions Committee of the House of Commons, and I not only ask that that case be considered and rectified, but that the Pensions Committee should recommend such amendments to the regulations as would prevent the occurrence of any such cases as this. Briefly, I may state that in my view, either Colonel Labatt is in receipt of his pension by virtue of misrepresentations or undue favour through powerful influences, as it is clear that he is not suffering from Total Disability at all and if the Pensions Board is to be swayed by influences from the outside in the granting of pensions, I warn you as a prominent member of the Cabinet, that it will result in destroying your influence as a Government because such injustice will not be tolerated by the people.

I prefer to place this before you in this way rather than take it up on the floor of the House and cause undue embarrasment. I think, as a final word, I would point out that Colonel Labatt is reported to be both brother-in-law to the Minister of Railways and Canals and the Minister of Militia.

I am.

Yours very truly,

(Sgd.) H. H. Stevens,
Member for Vancouver Centre.

2. Was receipt of the said letter acknowledged by the minister's assistant private secretary in the terms following:—

Ottawa, April 26, 1918.

Dear Mr. Stevens,—Mr. Rowell is in receipt of your letter of the 23rd of April in regard to the question of Pensions.

As Mr. Rowell is working now every day on the Pensions Committee this matter is receiving careful consideration. He has had your letter with him in the Committee, and I am writing you merely to acknowledge it.

Yours very truly,

Assistant Private Secretary.

H. H. Stevens, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

3. Do the above quoted letters form part of the printed record of the proceedings now in progress before the Pensions Committee of the House of Commons?

4. Have the statements contained in Mr. Stevens' letter been inquired into, and will the Committee make an interim report thereon prior to the conclusion of its labours?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. Yes.

2. Yes, and also by letter of May 1st, as follows:

Dear Mr. Stevens:

Re Pensions Committee.

I duly received your letter and laid it before the Pensions Committee. The matter you mention had already come before the Committee, and it is their intention to deal with the questions raised in the course of their deliberations.

With reference to the personal matter mentioned in the letter, I understand from Dr. Reid that he was not consulted regarding the appointment of Colonel Labatt to the Board of Pension Commissioners and had nothing whatever to do with it. So far as General Mewburn is concerned, as you are aware, Colonel Labatt was appointed many months before General Mewburn became a minister.

There is, however, a question of principle involved, which is a very proper matter for consideration.

(Sgd.) N. W. Rowell.

3. The following is the extract from the printed records of proceedings of the committee on May 1st relating to this matter:

The Chairman read a communication received from Mr. H. H. Stevens, M.P., dated April 23, re the case of Colonel Labatt's disability pension; also a communication received from Mr. F. S. Scott, M.P., dated April 23, re the revision of pension regulations in respect to dependents of British Reservists—said communications were ordered filed for records and for further consideration.

4. The matters referred to in Mr. Stevens' letter are being enquired into and the committee will report in due course.

MR. J. A. DENIGER.

*Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

1. Is Mr. J. A. Deniger employed by the Post Office Department in Montreal?

2. If so, what are his duties?

3. What is his salary?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Yes.

2. Field officer in connection with rural mail delivery work.

3. $1,200 a year.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER:

1. What amount has been expended by the Government on Toronto Harbour since Confederation?

[Mr. Brouillard.]

2. What is the initial cost of such protection as has been placed on the south shore of the Island; also cost of repairs to same?

3. To what extent has the Island been reduced since Confederation due to erosion?

4. What part or parts of the harbour front are controlled by the Dominion Government?

Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. What was the total amount paid to the Journal Publishing Company of Ottawa, Limited, during the fiscal years 1912-13-14-15-16-17 inclusive, for (a) rentals; (b) printing?

2. Were the official cheques of the Government for said rentals and printing jobs issued directly in favour of the above company, or to P. D. Ross, Esq.?

THE IMPERIAL CONFERENCE.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchéres) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence between the Imperial Government and the Government of Canada in relation to the proposed visit of some members of the Canadian Government to London this spring.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The motion may be adopted with the proviso that it shall not cover such documents, if any, as may be confidential and which it is not in the public interest to bring down.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is understood. May we have this return at an early date?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I should think so.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—MR. EDWARDS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I desire to rise to a question of privilege. Yesterday's Ottawa Citizen contains the following article, headed "Absolutely Untrue; Chief Justice on Dr. Edwards' Charges in the Commons":

"I do not know that I have very much to say about the charge of Dr. Edwards, except that it is absolutely untrue," stated Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, chief justice of Canada yesterday.

"I do not receive any such salary," stated Sir Charles. "The amount voted by parliament now is for travelling expenses when I go to London as a member of the Judicial Committee. When I don't go I do not draw the allowance. There was one year when I drew it. At that time the amount was voted expressly without reference to expenses. It was a statutory allowance in connection with the position, the same as the amount allowed in my capacity as deputy of the Governor General. Afterwards the statute was changed to make the vote cover travelling expenses. When I don't go to London why, of course, I do not receive the money."

My statement, to which exception was taken, may be found in Hansard of May 13, and is as follows:

$2,500 a year was voted to a certain gentleman, whom I am not permitted to mention, for a specific purpose, which that gentleman did not carry out. The money was voted and taken. The next year the money was again voted and taken for that specific purpose, although that specific purpose was not carried out. The third year the money was voted for the same specific purpose, which purpose again was not carried out, but the money was taken.

That is the statement which the gentleman in question says is absolutely untrue. The Appropriation Act and the Auditor General's Report show that for the year 1915-16 a vote of $2,500 was put through in these words:

Travelling expenses of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick when attending the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

The Auditor General's Report, page U3, shows that that amount was drawn. The next year the vote was similarly worded, and the Auditor General's Report, page U3, shows that the amount was taken. The next year, 1917-18, the wording was slightly changed to read:

Special allowance to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to cover expenses when attending the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

That amount was not drawn. According to the Appropriation Acts and the Auditor General's Report, the amount was drawn in two of the three years. My statement cannot be characterized as absolutely untrue; at least it is two-thirds true, while the assertion in the press of the gentleman in question can only be taken as fifty per cent true. I am willing to place my veracity on that basis against that of the Chief Justice of Canada, at all events, so far as principle is concerned —and that is the point wherein my veracity is called to question. The amount was taken for services which were not performed, and that is what I stated in the House. That was the principle involved, and admission has been made to that effect. As a matter of principle, it does not matter whether the amount wrongfully taken was $5,000 or $7,500. It has been admitted that $5,000 has been taken for which—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. EDWARDS: —no services were rendered.

SHORTAGE OF SALT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): I have received a letter from the firm of Robin, Jones and Whitman, a large fishing firm in the Maritime Provinces operating on the coast of Gaspé, with regard to the shortage of salt. Perhaps I may read the letter, which I have received from the general manager of this firm, in order that I may induce the Government to do something towards bringing cargoes of salt to Canada; otherwise serious losses will result to the fisheries this year.

Mr. SPEAKER: I suggest that the hon. gentleman summarize the letter; otherwise, it would be in the nature of an argument.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If the hon. gentleman puts a question, I will answer it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce to help the fishermen to get the necessary supply of salt, which is absolutely lacking this year on the coast of Gaspé, on the north shore, and, I am told, in the Maritime Provinces generally. My correspondent urges on the Government the necessity of asking the Imperial authorities to send a vessel from the Mediterranean to Canada with a cargo of salt.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: A shipment of 5,500 tons of salt is on its way, which, I am informed, will carry the trade in Canada up to the 1st of July. I am in communication with the Admiralty as to a further shipment, and I am ascertaining how much will be required for the remainder of the season. My hon. friend will see, therefore, that the help has already been rendered.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I hope that I shall not have to take my hon. friend's answer with a grain of salt.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—MR. FOWLER.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West): With regard to the revelations made by the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) the other night, is it the intention of the Government to dismiss Mr. Fowler from the service?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That matter will be brought to the attention of the Prime Minister, and a further answer will be given to my hon. friend.

PAYMENTS TO SIR CHARLES FITZPATRICK.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. B. MORPHY (North Perth): In view of the reference made on Monday night and this morning by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) to Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, does the Government purpose allowing Sir Charles Fitzpatrick to retain the money which he admits he improperly received?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I shall have to answer that question in the same manner as I answered the question of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken).

Mr. SPEAKER: I would suggest to the House that such questions should more properly be put upon the Order Paper. They are not of such urgency as to require their being brought up on the Orders of the Day.

Mr. MORPHY: Some time ago I put a question on the Order Paper, and I received an evasive answer.

FARMERS' DELEGATION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Lotbinière): May I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if you have received a communication from the delegation of farmers now in session at Ottawa, and if so, if it is your intention to communicate it to the House?

Mr. SPEAKER: Since I entered the chamber I received a voluminous communication. I obviously have not had time to read it. I cannot communicate it to the House until I have read it. When I have read it I shall take what action I deem proper.

Mr. VIEN: Are we then likely to have this document communicated to us, while delegates are still in this city?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already stated to the hon. member that I shall, if I think proper, communicate it to the House the moment I have had an opportunity of reading it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is it a communication from the Ontario farmers?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have not yet had an opportunity of reading it.

RURAL MAIL CARRIERS' CONTRACTS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Is it the intention of the Government to afford an opportunity for a discussion of the resolution moved by the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) on March 21 last, relating to the difficulties experienced by rural mail carriers and the salaries received by them? The Prime Minister on that occasion asked that the resolution should be withdrawn in order that the Government might consider the matter, and he stated that an opportunity to discuss it would be given at a later date.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: When the Estimates of the Post Office Department are under consideration there will be full opportunity of discussing that matter.

HEREDITARY TITLES IN CANADA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: May I remind my right hon. friend that the motion of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) in regard to titles was to be further discussed?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I thought we had heard a good deal about titles.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We have not heard the last of them yet.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I shall draw the attention of the Prime Minister to the matter.

THE INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean (Acting Minister of Finance), Bill No. 82, to amend the Inland Revenue Act was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—duties of excise on manufactured tobacco:

Mr. BUREAU: Does this include the whole section?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: Will the minister give an explanation of the difference between clauses (a) and (b)? Clause (a) enumerates a number of tobaccos such as fine-cut, cavendish, plug or twist. Clause (b) says:

> (b) On common Canada twist, when made solely from tobacco grown in Canada, and on the farm or premises where grown, by the cultivator duly licensed therefor, or in a licensed tobacco manufactory, twenty cents per pound, actual weight.

If it is manufactured into chewing tobacco or otherwise the duty is 20 cents per pound. I do not quite understand the distinction that is drawn here.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This is tobacco twist made from the Canadian grown leaf. The duty has been raised from ten to twenty cents.

Mr. BUREAU: What is meant by the words "on common Canada twist when made solely from tobacco grown in Canada?"

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is a Canadian tobacco.

Mr. BUREAU: It goes on to say "when made on the farm or premises where grown." Surely, it would not be grown in a factory.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The twist may be made in a factory. It is also frequently made on the farm.

Mr. McCOIG: Is there any provision covering the point I raised the other day as to the duty being remitted on tobacco damaged by frost or otherwise?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is nothing in the Bill which specifically covers that point, but there is a regulation now in force which provides that the duty shall not be exacted where the leaf has been destroyed.

Mr. BUREAU: Does this section mean that a farmer who grows tobacco and makes it into twist for himself and his family is exempt from paying the duty?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Thirty pounds are allowed to the grower for every male adult of his family.

Mr. TOBIN: Does the minister think it is fair to charge a duty of six dollars a thousand on cigars regardless of quality? That duty would be all right on cigars costing seventy-five or a hundred dollars a thousand, but on the cheaper cigars costing from eighteen to forty dollars a thousand, does the minister not think the duty is too high?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The increased duty upon cigars amounts to two-thirds of a cent per cigar. In the case of the five cent cigar the profit of the retailer now is forty per cent. With the increased duty it will be twenty per cent, or a little over. There is some objection, possibly fair, from the trade in respect to the duty on the cheaper cigar. In the United States the duty is based on the selling price, but that has not been the practice in Canada; we have always charged on the quantity. If the tax is too onerous in the case of the cheaper cigar, we will reconsider the matter before the next session of Parliament.

Mr. TOBIN: I think the minister should increase the duty on the more expensive cigars selling at $150 per thousand, we will say. The margin between the wholesale and retail price on the five-cent cigar is so small that with the duty it will have to sell at six or seven cents; that is the cigar the workingman and the farmer smokes. I think the minister would get more duty if he increased the tax to ten dollars per thousand on the higher-priced cigar and decreased it to two or three dollars per thousand in the case of the cheaper cigar.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The purpose of the tax is to raise revenue, and if we impose too high a tax, consumption will cease and there will be no revenue.

Mr. TOBIN: I do not admit that. I am sure the minister when he goes into a store does not buy the five-cent cigar of the workingman, selling at six for a quarter, but a brand selling at three for fifty. If he chooses to smoke that quality of cigar, let him pay for the luxury. He is better able to pay the duty than the workingman. I again repeat, the minister should increase the duty on the higher-priced cigar, and reduce it on the lower-priced cigar.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I can promise my hon. friend that before the next session of Parliament we will reconsider the duty on the five-cent cigar.

Mr. TOBIN: The minister admits I have good grounds for my appeal to him. Why not reconsider the duty now? This is the proper time when we are passing the Bill. If the minister will not meet the farmers in the House, at least he should allow them to get a cigar at a reasonable price.

Mr. McMASTER: Would it not be well for the Acting Minister of Finance to consider the advisability of putting excise duties on an ad valorem instead of on a specific basis? I believe we are going to have very high taxation in this country in the future. In the past the excise and other duties have all been of a more or less trifling character, except the tax on liquors, but now we have to face the practical inevitability of heavy taxation all along the line. Reasoning by analogy, a duty of ten cents per pound on tea is equivalent to a duty of twenty-five per cent on the tea used by working people, selling at around thirty cents a pound, but it only works out to about twenty per cent in the case of the higher-priced tea. I am merely arguing by analogy, but it seems to me the principle is a correct one, and I would join with my hon. friend from Richmond and Wolfe in urging on the Acting Minister of Finance the advisability of starting out right in regard to these taxes, because, after all, it is new conditions we are called upon to meet. I think it was the Acting Minister of Finance himself who said the other day that it was a condition and not a theory that confronted us. Being confronted with new conditions, I would urge on the Government the advisability of meeting those conditions by starting the new regime of taxation on a just and reasonable basis. I believe the House is with me entirely when I say that the principle and the practice of ad valorem duties is more reasonable than specific duties. Specific duties usually work out so as to place the heavier burden on the poorer people of the country.

Mr. LALOR: Does my hon. friend advocate an ad valorem duty on tea?

Mr. McMASTER: I am not advocating any certain ad valorem duty. I am not attempting to advise the Acting Minister of Finance as to the amount of any duty that he should place upon any article. I am laying down a principle and it is a just and right one. That principle is that we should have our duties apportioned on an ad valorem basis and not on a specific basis.

Mr. McCOIG: Possibly the acting minister did not understand my point in reference to a damaged crop. A damaged crop very frequently sells for about one-quarter of what the crop would have sold for had it not been damaged. The argument of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) would apply to a very large extent to the point I was trying to make. If the producer had to depend upon selling his tobacco, a duty of five cents a pound would have a discouraging effect on the industry.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Under subsection 6 of section 2 of the Bill we are taking power to make regulations which will cover the point my hon. friend has mentioned, as well as other possible conditions which may arise to reduce the value of the home grown tobacco below the market price. We will keep this point in mind when the regulations are being framed.

Mr. McCOIG: If the minister assures the producers of tobacco that there will be regulations governing those cases, it will largely assist in increasing the acreage which may be put under tobacco in Ontario this year.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I can assure my hon. friend that due provision will be made to cover the case he points out, and I would be obliged if he would write a letter covering the point fully, to the Minister of Excise and Customs.

On section 2—license to grow tobacco; fee; excise duty; exemption if tobacco grown for personal or family use; limited quantity free of duty; regulations; penalty:

Mr. COPP: I would like to draw the attention of the minister to subsection 6. He stated that regulations would be made in regard to the point raised by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McCoig). I doubt if he has power under that subsection to make those regulations. The subsection says:

> The Minister charged with the collection of the tax imposed under this section shall have power to make such regulations as he deems necessary or advisable for carrying out the provisions of this section.

I do not think he has any general power to make regulations.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It says:

> The Minister charged with the collection of the tax imposed under this section shall have power to make such regulations as he deems necessary or advisable for carrying out the provisions of this section.

Mr. COPP: I do not think that is definite enough to give the minister power.

Mr. McMASTER: The point is that the tax of 20 cents a pound is imposed under section 279 of the Inland Revenue Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The tax of five cents per pound is under subsection 3, of section 2, of the Bill. I think it is clear enough.

Mr. McMASTER: Under section 279 of the Act, subsection b, on common twist tobacco, Canadian grown, there is an excise duty, or tax, of 20 cents a pound actual weight. The hon. member for Kent has drawn the attention of the Committee to the fact that often the tobacco which is grown is so much damaged that the crop will only realize five or ten cents a pound, which would be half the amount of the tax. The minister says that he can obviate that injustice by availing himself of the power under subsection 6 of section 328a; but subsection 6 of 328a only allows him, according to my reading of the provision, to make regulations regarding the collection of the taxes imposed under this section, 328a, while the tax of 20 cents a pound on common Canada twist is imposed under section 279.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, but that is manufactured tobacco, and that could not relate to tobacco that had been damaged. One refers to the tobacco leaf and the other to common twist tobacco that is manufactured. I read it so; I do not think there would be any damaged Canadian leaf in it.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not think there should be any doubt about this. It seems to me that the tax which is referred to in subsection 6 of section 328a is the tax imposed by subsection 3:

> There shall be levied, collected and paid an excise duty on all tobacco grown in Canada for consumption therein of five cents per pound, computed according to the standard of leaf tobacco as hereinbefore established.

That appears to be the tax that is referred to in subsection 6 of the same section, and not the tax that is referred to in subsection b of section 279.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is quite correct, but the hon. member for Kent was referring to Canadian leaf tobacco under subsection b of section 279.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not think he was.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCoig) referred to the Canadian grown leaf, which is subject to the excise tax of five cents a pound, and he inquired if, when the leaf was damaged or destroyed, there might be a remission or rebate of duty, and I answered him that the regulations would contain such power. The Inland Revenue Act, which, however, I have not before me, contains a stronger provision even than this, also enabling the department to make regulations which would cover the point.

Mr. DEMERS: Does subsection 6 of section 328A apply to section 279?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. DEMERS: So, there is no answer to the question asked by the member for Kent?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The tobacco to which the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McCoig) referred had reference to Canadian tobacco leaf, on which there is imposed a tax of five cents a pound. That is what is referred to in section 328A.

Mr. COPP: The point I wish to make is this: Paragraph 3 of section 328A provides:

> There shall be levied, collected and paid, an excise duty on all tobacco grown in Canada for consumption therein of five cents per pound, computed according to the standard of leaf tobacco as hereinbefore established.

Subsection 6 provides:

> The Minister charged with the collection of the tax imposed under this section shall have power to make such regulations as he deems necessary or advisable for carrying out the provisions of this section.

Now the section which I have quoted provides that five cents a pound must be collected on leaf tobacco, and the power given under subsection 6 to make regulations has to do with the collection of that tax. The minister has no power to make a regulation for granting a rebate on damaged tobacco. That is the point I make. I have no particular interest in the subject because my province does not grow tobacco, but I submit that the minister is not authorized by subsection 6 to make such a regulation as he suggests can be made.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am advised by the officials of the department that the Inland Revenue Act contains a section which, beyond doubt, gives power to the department to frame regulations covering that point.

Mr. COPP: If there is some other provision, all right.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: The tax of five cents a pound to be imposed under subsection 3 of section 328A is a general tax. Now I am raising tobacco, which I sell for fifteen or twenty cents a pound, and my neighbour raises a higher quality of tobacco for which he receives thirty-five cents a pound, it is not fair that I should be called upon to pay the same amount of tax as he does. There should be a distinction made, and in my opinion it would be more just to base the tax upon the value of the tobacco. The Quesnel tobaco raised in the county of Montcalm brings thirty-five or forty cents a pound, whereas Blue Briar, or Comstock fetches much less. There should be a difference in the scale of taxation based on the selling price. I drew the minister's attention to that fact.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am instructed that there is no country in the world where there is an ad valorem duty on tobacco. I do not quite see how you could impose taxation of that kind.

Mr. DEMERS: What about cigars?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The duty is specific. I do not see how you could fix a rate of duty upon the selling price.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In the Customs Department you have gaugers who test the wines and liquors. Could you not have experts to determine the quality of tobacco?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am afraid we would have to have tobacco tasters.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend knows there are tobacco experts all over the country.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I suppose the manufacturer has persons to determine values.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There are experts in the United States also.

Mr. RICHARDSON: The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Lafortune) raises an inferior quality of tobacco on which he pays so much a pound. Perhaps he raises more of that inferior quality than his neighbour.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: No.

Mr. RICHARDSON: If not, why does not the hon. gentleman take a leaf out of his neighbour's book and go in for growing tobacco of better quality, which will realize a higher price.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: The reason I am not raising tobacco of better quality than my neighbour is because the soil is not the same. His soil will produce Quesnel tobacco, mine will not.

Mr. RICHARDSON: That is a fair answer.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: Therefore I have to raise another quality of tobacco.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think that anybody can complain of this tax upon Canadian grown leaf tobacco. It is a very small excise tax indeed, and I think there will be no complaint. The producer of the Canadian leaf enjoys very high protection, and it is only fair that he should pay something in the nature of an excise tax.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: We do not complain of the tax of five cents. We have been fairly treated in this instance by the Government, and I tender them my best thanks on that account. But is it just that I should be required to pay the same tax as my immediate neighbour, who produces a much superior quality, and gets a higher price for it? It is generally recognized that there must be some sacrifice, and that the duty of five cents a pound is a fair one, but there should be a distinction made in the rate of duty paid as between the man who realizes thirty-five or forty cents a pound on his tobacco, and the man whose tobacco only brings him in from fifteen to twenty cents a pound.

Mr. McCOIG: Tobaccos are graded into classes 1, 2 and 3, so it can be easily determined by any one making an adjustment what amount of tax different sections of the country should be required to pay. As to one farmer having a better crop than another, to which my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Lafortune) referred, let me draw his attention to the trouble that is experienced on account of frost. Frost may be experienced in one particular section, and half a mile away there may be no frost. One man's crop of tobacco may be seriously affected by frost, whereas another man's crop may not receive any damage at all from that cause.

That is where the injustice would come in. It would not be the fault of the owner, but that his crop happened to be damaged on account of the peculiar situation of the land or the quality of the soil, which might attract frost more quickly than would other sections close to the water or to the lake in my district, and whose crops would not be damaged by frost, while those further inland would be. It is no reflection on the farmer who has his tobacco frosted so far as his ability as a farmer is concerned, but it is due to where he is situated. If the acting minister will give us some assurance that his regulation will cover such cases I feel satisfied that it will be some encouragement to producers to go into the tobacco industry.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: I drew the attention of the acting minister the other day to the effect of the tax on tobacco. I asked if the tax of 5 cents per pound was to be paid by the manufacturers of cigars, and I understood the minister to reply that it was. The manufacturers already pay an excise tax of 20 cents a pound, and if they have to pay the additional 5 cents they will be taxed 25 cents a pound.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is for cigars made purely from the Canadian leaf.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: I said the other day that this tax would be too heavy on the 5 cent cigars. I understood that many of these were made from Canadian leaf. I very strongly urge that this tax should not apply to 5 cent cigars made from Canadian leaf, so that the manufacturers and retailers can still sell to farmers and labourers, a cigar for 5 cents. As it works out, the only tax which will really be paid by the people at large will be on the 5 cent cigar. The man who smokes a 10 cent cigar will still pay 10 cents for his cigar, because there is a sufficient margin in the price of the 10 cent cigar to permit the retailer to sell it still for 10 cents, while the 5 cent cigar costs the retailer 4.6 cents. It is quite impossible then for the retailer to sell the 5 cent cigar at the old price under the new tax, and his customers, the common people, will have to pay 6 or 7 cents, while the rich people will still get their cigars for 10 cents. This is an important matter. Smoking is not a luxury but a necessity in this country. It is the custom of our people, so it must be treated as a business matter. We should encourage the production of good tobacco in our country. Some years ago measures were taken by the Liberal Government under the minister of the day, the Hon. Mr. Brodeur, if I mistake not, to encourage the tobacco industry. I maintain that the tax of 5 cents should not apply when it can be demonstrated to the excise inspectors that the cigars will be made from Canadian leaf. I think the minister was impressed the other day by the representations of some hon. gentlemen on this matter, and I hope this somewhat drastic measure will not apply to the cheap cigar.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: In answer to what the hon. gentleman has just said, I am in principle opposed to the tax of 5 cents upon farmers who grow tobacco. I remember when the tax of 28 cents per pound was imposed on foreign raw leaf tobacco that the eastern and western tobacco growers sent a very important delegation to the Capital asking for a further duty of 10 cents a pound on American leaf to protect the Canadian growers. We discussed the matter with the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), and the Minister of the Interior, and they were convinced at that time that an additional duty of 10 cents was necessary to protect the Canadian grower. We left the Capital fully satisfied that we had made our point, but on the following day the cigar manufacturers came to Ottawa and did their utmost to induce the Government not to impose the tax of 10 cents that we were asking. Our contention then, as to-day, was that the 28 cents per pound tax on American tobacco was not sufficient. But in the new tariff the Government has raised the excise on American tobacco from 28 cents up to 40 and to 60 cents per pound. That leaves a margin of 12 cents in our favour, and we are only called upon to pay a tax of 5 cents. The difference between 12 and 5 cents is 7 cents, therefore the tobacco growers have an advantage now in their favour of 7 cents. It being admitted that all must do their duty, I am satisfied that the 5 cent tax should be imposed upon Canadian tobacco growers, because there is now a very large difference in our favour. That is why I do not oppose the new tax of 5 cents, because really we now have 35 cents per pound protection against American tobacco, and our growers are able to compete with it. Of course, it would be better still if we had no tax to pay at all, but everybody must bear his share of taxation at this time.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the Bill?

Mr. McKENZIE: Before you report the Bill, Mr. Chairman, I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Customs to the fact that complaint has been made in various parts of the county from which I come that since the importation of liquor has been prohibited the Department of Customs has not taken much interest in the protection of the community generally with regard to the manufacture of liquors in illicit stills. It is said that officers of the department have been withdrawn, that these liquors are being illegally manufactured and sold in a great many places and that considerable damage and disturbance is resulting. I am sure that the minister will not be less vigilant in suppressing this illegal manufacture simply because its suppression will not bring any money into the coffers of the country. Active steps should be taken to suppress this evil. Complaints also come to me from my own county and from other parts of Eastern Canada about the indiscriminate granting of customs warehouse licenses to people who have liquors. No man who is engaged directly or indirectly in the sale of liquors should be given a license to store liquors on his premises. No matter how innocent he may be, the temptation thereby put in his way is extraordinary and should not exist. I have no personal knowledge of it, but I understand that a great many licenses have been granted within the last two months to persons in eastern Nova Scotia who are engaged in the sale of liquor. I have not closely followed the different Orders in Council which have been passed—

Mr. SIFTON: Does my hon. friend refer to persons engaged in the legal sale of liquor under license from the Provincial Government?

Mr. McKENZIE: No liquor is legally sold in the province except by a few vendors who are specially appointed in different places.

Mr. SIFTON: My hon. friend does not refer to these vendors?

Mr. McKENZIE: No. There is only one vendor in the Island of Cape Breton—I know him personally—and he has no warehouse. But a great many of these warehouses in eastern Nova Scotia have been stored largely with liquors within the last few weeks. A good deal of agitation prevails among the people of eastern Nova Scotia on this account. I have not the reputation of being much of a temperance man—

Mr. SIFTON: I am sorry to hear it.

Mr. McKENZIE: —although I may be a temperance man in a general way. But this Government should do everything in their power to co-operate with local governments in enforcing the law. When a local Legislature and the local Government has done everything possible to stop the sale of liquor, no assistance to the contrary should be given by any department of this Government.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I am afraid the minister has not given sufficient consideration to the objection made to subsection (c) of 279 regarding the tax on cigars. It is provided that the tax on cigars of all descriptions made from raw leaf tobacco or any substitute therefor shall be $6 per thousand. It is not reasonable that all cigars should be included in the same class. I have no expert knowledge of the matter, but I assume that all cigars are manufactured from raw leaf tobacco either imported or grown in the country. The price of cigars varies from 5 cents to $1 each. I never smoke the $1 cigars, but I have no doubt that some hon. gentlemen on the front benches opposite do so. The tax on these $1 cigars is just the same as the tax on the poor man's cigar, which sells at 5 cents or even less. Unless the minister amends this clause, I wish to enter my protest against its being past in its present form.

Mr. SIFTON: The matter mentioned by the member for North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) has already come to the attention of the Government through telegrams from the temperance associations and other organizations in Nova Scotia. Attention has been given to it, and a telegram recently received from the mayor of Sydney stated that the regulations now being carried out are entirely satisfactory. Instructions were immediately given that no liquor of any kind or description should be removed from an Inland Revenue bonded warehouse or a Customs warehouse in Nova Scotia except for export purposes under the supervision of an officer of the department; and it was pointed out that if these instructions were not observed, a change would be made of all the officials in Nova Scotia.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have already given consideration to representations similar to those which have just been made by the member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair).

In order to impose upon tobaccos an excise tax according to the selling price, it would be necessary to revise all our excise resolutions upon cigars and tobaccos. That principle has never been adopted in this country, and I do not deem it wise, at least at the present time, to introduce any such change. The tax upon cigars, as I have already stated this morning, amounts to two-thirds of a cent for each cigar.

Mr. SINCLAIR: My point is that it should be an ad valorem tax in place of a specific tax.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not see how you could have an ad valorem duty upon tobaccos. You might have a specific duty upon the selling price.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: In the United States there is a specific duty upon quality, not upon quantity.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think so. That is a specific duty upon the selling price. I promise my hon. friend (Mr. DuTremblay), and some of his friends who interviewed me the other day as a delegation on behalf of some of the tobacco manufacturers in the city of Montreal, that I shall discuss this matter with the Minister of Finance upon his return, and also with the Minister of Customs during the recess, and if we find that this particular tax operates unjustly upon the trade interested in the cheaper cigars, we shall at the next session of Parliament ask for a revision of this particular tariff.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: It might be done before by Order in Council.

The CHAIRMAN: Before the Bill is reported, I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that the motion to report a Bill is not debatable, and, therefore, the final debate which has just taken place has, as I understand it, taken place with the unanimous consent of the committee. I do not wish it to be taken as a precedent, because hon. members, on reading rule 17 (a), will see that while the preamble or the title of a Bill is debatable, a motion that the committee rise and report is not debatable.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

WAR REVENUE ACT, 1915, AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean, Bill No. 83, to amend the Special War Revenue Act, 1915, was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—tax on berths and parlour car seats increased:

Mr. MURPHY: How are these amounts collected by the Government?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: From the railways.

Mr. MURPHY: Monthly?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Quarterly.

Mr. MURPHY: What revenue was derived last year?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: $130,000.

Mr. McMASTER: I would direct the attention of the acting minister to a mistake which, I think, underlies all these specific taxes. There is, for instance, no attempt made by this tax of ten cents for a chair in a parlour car to differentiate between the man who travels twenty-five miles and the man who sits in the car all day and travels three hundred miles. They each pay ten cents. There should be some difference. The difference between five and ten cents seems trivial; but the principle is something, and it would be well to start right in regard to these taxes, because I do not contemplate the removal of any of these taxes for many years to come. This kind of taxation will have to exist for years, and it should be started on a just and fair basis. It is neither just nor fair to charge one man ten cents for travelling 25 miles in a parlour car and another man ten cents for travelling 300 miles in a parlour car.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—proprietary and patent medicines:

Mr. STEELE: I should like to bring to the attention of the minister a matter which has been the cause of a good deal of trouble and confusion amongst the manufacturers of a certain line of medicines and the medical profession of the country. I feel that those who drafted the original Act which was passed in 1915, were not very familiar with the drug business. There is a line of preparations which are very largely manufactured to-day and which do not strictly come under the definition of proprietary or patent medicines. They are not patent medicines; they are not strictly speaking, proprietary medicines, but they are termed pharmaceuticals—

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Are they mentioned in the pharmacopœias?

Mr. STEELE: They are preparations made by the manufacturers for the convenience of the physicians. The old style of preparing medicines in the doctor's office, using the crude drugs, and preparing them and the noxious mixtures that most of us received when we were younger, has largely passed away, and the preparation of medicines is now largely in the hands of those manufacturers who prepare them under the term "pharmaceutical preparations." They prepare them under scientific methods, and they have succeeded in presenting preparations which are fairly palatable, yet using just the drugs that would be used by the doctors if they were following the old method of preparation.

This is a development for the convenience of the medical profession. The medicine is put up in pound lots, half-gallon, gallon, or five-gallon lots, according to the requirements of the individual physician. It was generally understood for a time after the passing of the Act in 1915 that these did not come under that Act, and many manufacturers sold them under the impression that they were not included. I might add that on the labels of these preparations the dose and the purpose of the medicine is generally shown. It was held by the department that the fact of the dose and the purpose of the medicine being given brought the medicines under the Act. There is no quarrel on the part of the manufacturers or the physicians as to the payment of taxes. What they desire is a clear understanding on this point so that the confusion which has hitherto existed may be removed. An effort has been made in the Bill now before the House to correct that to some extent, but even now I do not think it is going to make it very clear. For instance, the new definition of consumer is, "Consumer means any person who uses or purchases." Now, this difficulty will arise. The physician purchases from the manufacturer and therefore, as I understand it, he will be a consumer and will have to pay the tax as he prescribes these medicines. He may fill an eight-ounce bottle from a half-gallon jar and give it to the patient; the patient then becomes the consumer and the user, and will also be liable to a tax on the same preparation. If my impression is not correct I should be glad to hear from the minister. Paragraph 2 does not make clear the point which has caused confusion in the past. It says:

> Any preparation manufactured for sale exclusively for the medical profession and on the labels of which no claim is made that the preparation has medicinal or curative powers or any directions with respect to the amount that constitutes a proper dose.

It is almost necessary for the manufacturer to put the dose on the label. It is also very convenient for the label to state whether the remedy is a diuretic or stomachic, telling what the preparation is useful for. If the words "intelligible to the public" were inserted after "claim" it might remove the difficulty which has arisen in the past and which I feel will arise under the Bill as now drafted. I only desire to clear up the confusion. The physicians of Ontario have been bothered a good deal by inspectors coming around and taking samples of medicines from their offices which the physicians considered exempt from the tax. This confusion exposed the physicians to the danger of being fined $50 and costs for violation of the law I merely draw these matters to the attention of the minister, hoping that some change may be made to clarify the whole matter and relieve the manufacturers and the physicians from the dangers to which they were exposed under the old law.

Mr. FOURNIER: I believe the whole tax on patent medicines is wrong. I happen to know something about the drug business, and I think it is a shame to make the consumer pay the tax. I should like to know how much revenue has been obtained from this source during the last year.

[Mr. Steele.]

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is impossible to tell, because ordinary postage stamps may be used.

Mr. FOURNIER: The manufacturer should pay the tax. At present he goes scot-free, and so does the wholesaler and the retailer. I think the tax should have been divided amongst them. We have an army of men going around the country now to see that stamps are put on patent medicines and drugs of different kinds, and these men cost the country $96,000 last year. I think the manufacturer should put the stamp on the bottle.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: He would have to break open every package in his warehouse to do that.

Mr. McMASTER: Put the stamps on in the first place before the packages are made up.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Due consideration was given to that point long ago. When this Bill was introduced in 1915 it originally provided that the tax be paid in the manner suggested by my hon. friend, but after consideration of the Bill in the House the Minister of Finance felt obliged to amend it, and adopted the procedure found in the present Bill.

Mr. FOURNIER: I think the present system is very unbusinesslike. The manufacturer should put the stamp on the bottle. Then we would have revenue from three different sources, from the manufacturer, from the wholesaler, and from the retailer.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That might be worked out so far as the manufacturer is concerned, but not in the case of the importer.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Did the stamp tax on patent medicines bring in more than $96,000 last year?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Very much more than that, but it is impossible to tell exactly.

Mr. FOURNIER: I speak for the druggists. They are bothered to death with men coming into their stores to see that the stamps are put on. What has been the revenue from the druggists under the old law? I think about $26 was collected in fines last year for violations of the law. How much was paid to the lawyer who prosecuted? It is a shame; it is unbusinesslike. When the law was put in force every bottle of patent medicine should have had a stamp put upon it. This would have done away with the army of men who are spending the country's money. An expenditure of $96,000 for this purpose is ridiculous. My hon. friend would have had three sources of revenue then and such a system would have been preferable. I call the minister's attention to the fact that the druggists are complaining. They are bothered with it. They would much prefer to buy the bottle already stamped. Naturally we know that the consumer would pay for it. The manufacturer could put the stamp on the bottle.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

At three o'clock the committee resumed.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at one o'clock we were considering Bill No. 83 to amend the Special War Revenue Act, 1915, and clause 1 had been adopted. Clause 2 had been read and was being discussed. Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. FOURNIER: When the committee rose I had not concluded my remarks. I have stated that this tax was unbusinesslike because the Government cannot state how much money it expects to derive from these sources. As hon. gentlemen are aware, it is the consumer who will ultimately pay this tax, and he is the one who has to pay always. I suggest that the Acting Minister of Finance reconsider the form in which this tax has been proposed before it goes into operation, that instead of four per cent the tax be made one per cent and that the manufacturer be required to pay it. It is the manufacturer we should endeavour to reach because he makes the largest profits. At present there is an army of men going round the country endeavouring to find out whether "pain-killer" and other preparations are properly stamped, and these men are entailing an expenditure to the public of about $96,000. Now that prohibition is in force I think we should endeavour to save this big amount. The Acting Minister of Finance, who used to be so straightforward and fair in his criticism of taxation when he sat on this side of the House, is, I am afraid, learning bad tricks and instead of getting after the manufacturer seems to want to protect the big interests. The manufacturer should be made to shell out a little money; should be made to pay his share of taxation and not let the burden fall upon the consumer. I make that suggestion to my hon. friend because I think it is a fair one.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: From the standpoint of administration my hon. friend (Mr. Fournier) is perfectly correct, and in the preparation of the amendments to the Special War Revenue Act I was personally very much impressed with the same view. I want to assure my hon. friend that I tried in every possible way to devise amendments to the Act along the lines which he suggests, but I was unable to do so. It would be infinitely cheaper to collect the tax from the importer and the manufacturer, but there were difficulties in the way, such as I pointed out this morning and I could not see any way of overcoming them. It is unfortunate that we are unable to determine exactly the amount of revenue which will be derived from this particular source. That is largely due to the fact that the Special War Revenue Act, when first introduced, was amended upon the suggestion of Parliament to permit the use of postage stamps as well as inland revenue stamps. It is quite possible to devise a particular stamp to be used in the sales of drugs, but it would be very inconvenient to the public at many points. It is not always easy to obtain inland revenue stamps, whereas in all sections of the country postage stamps are available to the public. It was in the interest of the public generally that the amendment was made at the time of the introduction of the Bill in 1915, and permission given to use postage stamps as well as inland revenue stamps, but I think that now it will be inconvenient to the public to restore the Bill to its original form in so far as this particular point is concerned.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—tax on matches and playing cards:

Mr. McMASTER: I rise again to draw the attention of the Acting Minister of Finance to the way in which this tax of eight cents on playing cards will work out to the prejudice of the poor. Now the people who are accustomed to buy inexpensive cards, and can afford none other, at from fifteen to twenty cents a package, will find they will be paying a tax of about fifty per cent, while those who buy more expensive playing cards will escape with a comparatively light tax. This is a matter as to which I may tire the ears of the minister, but he may hear me on account of my importunity, as in the case of the widow in the Scriptures. I do press very strongly upon the Government the advisability of placing these small taxes—these small direct taxes —on an equitable basis, in which the ad valorem principle will enter. The answer may be that these are only trifling taxes, that they amount to very little in each individual case. I grant it is a small tax, but if we are going to have a large number of these taxes, in the aggregate they will amount to something, and should be based on the principle of justice. I am sure the Government of this country would not wish those blessed with a very small portion of this world's goods to have a feeling of injustice against the Government, and I fear that feeling may be created if a large number of these small taxes are imposed which will operate to the disadvantage of the poor as compared with the rich. And where you have such a tax as is found in this section, of eight cents a pack on playing cards, that is a heavy tax on a cheap pack of cards and it is a light tax on an expensive pack.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: You can lose the same amount of money with a cheap pack as with an expensive one.

Mr. McMASTER: The Acting Finance Minister is wrong. The man earning fifteen dollars a week is unable to lose as much money on cards for which he has paid but a small amount, and which will be required to pay eight cents tax, as the man of large means.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McMASTER: Of course, the acting minister means that as a joke. We all understand that. But I am not joking; I am perfectly serious in bringing this matter before the House, that these specific taxes work out unjustly, and an attempt should be made by the Government to place these small taxes on an ad valorem basis, so that the people will be taxed in proportion to their means. That is the principle on which even these smaller taxes should be based.

THE RAILWAY SITUATION IN CANADA.

STATEMENT BY THE PRIME MINISTER AS TO THE CONTEMPLATED POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

On the Order:

House in committee on Bill No. 87, an Act supplementary to chapter twenty-four of the Statutes of 1917, respecting the Canadian Northern Railway system.—The Minister of Finance.—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): It seems desirable in connection with this Bill to make a statement of a more or less general nature with regard to the whole railway situation in Canada at the present time, and especially as it has developed during the past fifteen years.

I need not do more than refer to the proposals brought down by the Government of the day in 1903, and amended by a subsequent Act in 1904, under which the National Transcontinental railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific have been constructed. At that time the Canadian Northern railway had attained considerable development in the Prairie Provinces, and had begun to feel the necessity of some connection with the East, or some expansion in the East, in order that it might gather up eastern traffic for its western lines, and in order that its western traffic might be transferred to lines in the East which it owned or with which it had connections.

It seems beyond question—and I am not saying this by way of criticism—that if an arrangement at that time could have been consummated between the Grand Trunk railway in the East and the Canadian Northern lines in the West, if they could have been connected by a new railway passing north of lake Superior, the combined railway system thus created would have been in a splendid position to-day. During the past four or five years it would, if it were necessary, have been able to lend money to Canada instead of coming, both in the East and in the West, to Parliament year after year for the purpose of obtaining such aid as would prevent these roads from going into liquidation. However, that course was not adopted. Possibly on account of the conflicting views of those who were entrusted with the management of those two railway systems, it may have been impossible to adopt it. As to that I do not know.

The project of the National Transcontinental railway, including the Grand Trunk Pacific, proceeded after the legislation of 1903 and 1904, and shortly afterwards the Government of the day extended to the Canadian Northern railway such aid as was designed to enable it to have the desired connection in Eastern Canada. By chapter 11 of the Act of 1908, a guarantee of bonds by this country to the Canadian Northern railway was authorized at the rate of $13,000 per mile in respect of 609 miles of railway in the Prairie Provinces. By chapter 6 of the Acts of 1910, Parliament authorized the guarantee of bonds for 150 miles to be constructed by the Canadian Northern Alberta Company, 50 miles at $13,000 per mile, and the remainder at $25,000 per mile. By chapter 6 of the Acts of 1911, Parliament authorized a guarantee of bonds for the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company at the rate of $35,000 per mile for 1,050 miles, which were to connect the western lines of the Canadian Northern railway with the lines which it had acquired in the East.

There was a new Administration in 1911. Very shortly after that Administration had been formed, it became abundantly evident, not only to Parliament but to the people of this country, that neither one nor the other of these two undertakings could be carried to completion unless the country granted further aid.

The Government had then to decide whether these railways should be permitted to go into liquidation, with all the consequent confusion and apprehended detriment to the public interest, or whether the Government and Parliament should evidence strong confidence in the future ability of the country to sustain those railways when completed. After very careful and anxious consideration, it was determined to give such aid as would enable the two undertakings to be carried to a conclusion. In 1912 and 1913 certain aid was given to the Canadian Northern Railway company, and in 1913 and in 1914 certain aid was granted to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company. I shall, however, at a later date, go more in detail into the aid afforded to the latter railway.

By chapter 7 of the Acts of 1912 the Canadian Northern Railway company was granted a guarantee of bonds at $35,000 per mile for 115 miles. By chapter 10 of the Acts of 1913 a subsidy was granted on 250 miles from Toronto to Ottawa at $6,400 per mile, on 910 miles from Ottawa to Port Arthur at $12,000 per mile, and on 260 miles from Edmonton to the British Columbia boundary at $12,000 per mile. In consideration of the subsidies so granted the Canadian Northern Railway company was called upon by the terms of the statute to transfer $7,000,000 of its capital stock to the Government. By chapter 20 of the Acts of 1914, founded upon evidence presented to Parliament of the inability of the Canadian Northern Railway system to complete its undertaking without a further guarantee of bonds, it was provided that a guarantee of $45,000,000 should be made, in consideration of which $33,000,000 of the capital stock of the company was to be transferred to the people. The capital stock at that time was increased to $100,000,000, and the net result of the transaction, apart from the guarantee itself, was that for the future the former proprietors of the railway were to own $60,000,000 of the stock and the people of Canada $40,000,000.

I expressed the opinion at that time—and I think my colleagues concurred in it—that under ordinary conditions that guarantee of bonds would enable the Canadian Northern Railway company to complete its system, and that there would be no further application to Parliament for assistance. But the war broke out in the beginning of August, 1914, and it became apparent in the following two or three years that the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific would require further assistance if they were not to be forced in liquidation. We had before us the same consideration as that previously presented to us, and, taking into account all the elements entering into the situation at that time, we reached the conclusion that the road should be sustained; that there should not be liquidation. Ultimately, that view—which, if I remember correctly, was shared on both sides of the House—was confirmed by the report of the commission of inquiry, to which I shall call attention later. So by chapter 4 of the Acts of 1915 a loan of $10,000,000 was made to the Canadian Northern Railway Company and by the Appropriation Act No. 2, page 36 of the statutes of 1916, a further loan of $15,000,000 was made to the same company, a total of $25,000,000.

The conditions induced by the war; the very greatly increased cost of fuel, material, and labour; the consequent falling off of net earnings; the inability to market securities which had been guaranteed by the Parliament of Canada and by provincial Legislatures, made it impossible for the Canadian Northern Railway Company to complete its undertaking, and to meet its fixed charges, even with the assistance to which I have referred. Consequently, at the last session of Parliament, we were once more faced with the problem in respect to both systems, the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific. The Government of the day had said in 1916 that it could not possibly entertain any claim for further assistance to the Canadian Northern Railway so long as that road remained in the ownership of its then proprietors. So when the situation had to be considered by the Government in 1917, we reached the conclusion that the road should be sustained, that further aid should be given, but only upon condition of acquiring all the remaining capital stock, at a price to be determined by arbitration. By the arbitration agreement subsequently made it was provided that the price should not exceed $10,000,000. That legislation, after a somewhat prolonged discussion in Parliament, was passed, and proceedings have since been taken to carry it out by the arbitration therein provided for.

I have spoken of the aid afforded to the Canadian Northern Railway. As I intend a little later to refer to the Grand Trunk Pacific, perhaps I may with advantage set forth what has been done for that railway during the same period. The enactments of 1903 and 1904 did not make, as was subsequently shown, sufficient provision for the completion of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway; so that company, or the Grand Trunk company on its behalf, came to Parliament in 1909 and asked for assistance by way of a loan of $10,000,000. After considerable discussion the legislation authorizing that loan was enacted, and the loan was made. In 1913 the Grand Trunk Pacific again came to the Government and, after very carefully considering the situation we reached the conclusion that the undertaking could not be carried out without further aid; and so, by chapter 23 of the statutes of 1913, a loan of $15,000,000 was made to the Grand Trunk Pacific. In the same session, chapter 24 was passed for the purpose of enabling the Government to carry out a decision of the Privy Council with regard to implementing the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific so that the full amount of one hundred cents on the dollar should be realized by the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Government being called upon to pay the difference between the amount actually realized and the full value of one hundred cents on the dollar.

The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company again came to us in 1914. It was increasingly apparent that the road could not be completed without further aid, and, accordingly, by chapter 34 of the Acts of 1914, the Government was authorized to enter into a guarantee of bonds amounting to $16,000,000 for the assistance of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. In 1915, the Grand Trunk Pacific management came to the Government once more, and a loan of $6,000,000 was authorized by chapter 4 of the Acts of that year. In 1916, they came to us once more, and by the Appropriation Act, No. 2, chapter 29 of the Acts of that year, a loan of $8,000,000 was authorized to the Grand Trunk Pacific.

I should state for the information of hon. members that, for each of these loans, whether to the Grand Trunk Pacific or to the Canadian Northern, a mortgage was taken on all the property and undertakings of each company, so that a lien upon that property, for whatever it was worth, was secured to the people.

In 1917, the Grand Trunk Pacific once more came to the Government and demonstrated to us that they could not carry on their undertaking; that there would be default unless further aid was granted; so by Appropriation Act No. 4, chapter 41 of the Acts of 1917, a loan of $7,500,000 was authorized to the Grand Trunk Pacific.

It seems to me desirable that this full information as to the aid afforded to these two great systems, and this brief statement of the reasons on account of which that aid was so afforded, ought to be placed before this new Parliament, in order that hon. members may understand and take fully into consideration the present situation.

I omitted to mention that after the Canadian Northern railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific railway had come once more to this Government in 1916 for further aid, it seemed to the Government desirable—and their conclusion met with the approval of Parliament,—that there should be a practical inquiry by the best available experts in order that the whole railway situation in Canada might be reviewed, and in order that the Government might be guided by expert advice in dealing with it in the future. It was a matter of no small difficulty to secure the services of men to whom that duty might with reasonable confidence, be entrusted. In the month of June, 1916, I made a personal visit to the city of New York, where I got in touch with men associated with the management of a number of the largest railway systems in the United States. After a great many conferences and a good deal of negotiation, I asked Mr. A. H. Smith, President of the New York Central Railway, to become a member of the proposed commission of inquiry and to act as its chairman. We also selected, as two other members of the commission, Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. W. M. Acworth, a gentleman who had a good deal of association with and who, I believe, had studied to a considerable extent, the railway systems not only of the United Kingdom, but of the United States. The commission proceeded with their inquiry in the summer and autumn of 1916 and in the winter of 1917, and they made their report about a year ago. I do not intend to make an elaborate analysis of that report, but I should like to refer hon. gentlemen to a review of it which is to be found in the pages of Hansard of last session. Sir Thomas White, in his speech upon the introduction of the resolution respecting the Canadian Northern Railway, gave a somewhat elaborate and thoroughly exact analysis of the report, and his speech is to be found commencing at page 4011 of the Hansard of 1917.

I may, however, briefly allude to the leading features of the report. There were two reports; a majority report, which was signed by Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. W. M. Acworth, and a minority report, which was signed by Mr. A. H. Smith. At the commencement of the volume which embodies their report, there is a short report which is signed by all three commissioners and which contains this passage:

> We have taken the situation as it is and find ourselves in agreement as to the necessity for constructive aid to bring the railways through the present crisis. We differ, however, as to the extent and method of Government help desirable, and as to the increase and character of Government liability and interest now and for the future.

The commissioners were unanimous in their view that the great railway systems to which I have alluded should not be passed into liquidation. I quote from the report of Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth as follows:

> If the two companies went into the hands of receivers, we cannot doubt that investors outside Canada would believe, however erroneously, that the Dominion Government had treated them badly and that the result would be serious injury to the credit of the Canadian Government and indeed of all Canadian enterprises. And this result is one that, putting it on pecuniary grounds alone, the Canadian people should in their own interest spend a good deal of money to avoid. We, therefore, consider that Canada should assume the responsibility of seeing that the interest on these securities is met. This responsibility is in our opinion unavoidable. But we recognize that it is serious. It will involve considerable financial aid for some years. How much we will not estimate, as it depends in the main on the rate at which Canada develops.

A somewhat similar passage is to be found in the minority report of Mr. A. H. Smith, who has this to say on the situation:

> I see no safe alternative but the Government shall continue, with discrimination, and resort to all available safeguards, and under a policy of proper regulation and co-operation of effort, to aid the necessitous railroads of the Dominion until such time, which I hope and believe will not be far distant, when these will become self-supporting and the problem will be solved.

As to the main features of the report—the Drayton-Acworth report recommended the acquisition of the Canadian Northern, Grand Trunk, and Grand Trunk Pacific railways, and set forth the methods by which they should be acquired, as well as the methods by which they should be operated. That report favoured the acquisition of the entire stock of the Canadian Northern railway and recommended that compensation should be made therefor by an allotment to the proprietors of a certain proportion of the stock, which proportion was to be determined by arbitration. The report also contained recommendations as to allotting a certain portion of the dividends of a company to be called the Dominion Railway Company, the creation of which was proposed by the Drayton-Acworth report, so that the stock to be retained by the proprietors of the Canadian Northern Railway should receive dividends in the future whenever the earnings should justify it.

As to the Grand Trunk railway, Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth recommended the acquisition of the guaranteed stock, the first, second and third preference stock and the common stock of that railway, upon payment to the shareholders of a moderate but substantial percentage of $3,600,000 per annum, that sum representing the average annual dividends paid upon such stocks during a period of ten years before the report was made. They recommended that, apart from such an arrangement, the liability of the Grand Trunk railway in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific ought not to be released.

Coming back to the Canadian Northern Railway company the proposals embodied in the Act of 1917 have been carried out under the terms of an arbitration agreement made under the authority of that Act. My hon. friend for Russell (Mr. Murphy) the other day expressed a strong opinion with regard to the manner in which that arbitration is being carried on so far as the Government is concerned. It is proper that I should at once assure the hon. member that he is absolutely mistaken in the conclusions which he has reached in that regard. I have conferred with those who have been present at the arbitration; I know what has been communicated to us by counsel in charge of the case on behalf of the Government, and I desire to assure not only the hon. member for Russell but every hon. member of this House that there has been the fullest and most absolute freedom to the Government of this country to have all information of every kind respecting that road, its properties, its assets, its earnings and its liabilities, that could have been afforded under any circumstances whatever. As a matter of fact I am told that the information prepared by those who were the proprietors of the Canadian Northern railway until the stock was vested in the Government has been submitted to counsel for the Government even before it was presented to the arbitrators.

Mr. MURPHY: I do not like to interrupt, but I hold in my hand a newspaper item giving effect to a complaint from Mr. Tilley that he had not received information.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am informed by an officer who was present at the arbitration that that particular complaint was made by reason of the fact that the information which had been asked for required considerable time to prepare; it was on its way to Mr. Tilley at the time he made the complaint, and it has been received by him in due course.

The time for making the award was originally limited to the first day of March last. It has since been extended, I think, on two occasions, and it is now extended to the first day of June. It is believed that the argument will be completed and the award made before that date shall have expired.

In the meantime the management of the Canadian Northern Railway has been left undisturbed to this extent. Three men nominated by the Government have been appointed to the board of the Canadian Northern Railway. They have been elected as directors of the road and have the fullest possible access to the proceedings of the directors and take part in their proceedings, and without their knowledge nothing can be done by the board of management of the railway. The reason for leaving the management undisturbed in this way until after the award has been made is that the Government has in the meantime absolutely full and complete access to all the documents and records of the company, and every opportunity for necessary information has been available to the officers and counsel of the Government. That being so, it was not considered desirable that during the progress of the arbitration the Government should make itself responsible for the management of the railway; the reasons for this will, I think, occur to any hon. gentleman in this House upon reflection. Until the arbitration had reached a conclusion it would be desirable that the management of the company, as heretofore existing, should be held responsible for the condition and operation of the road during the period of investigation. There was no advantage in changing the management in the meantime, as all the books, documents and records of the company were fully available. Moreover, it was considered, and this conclusion was reached after very careful consideration, that any change made in the meantime might demoralize the staff, and that a permanent change ought not to be made until the Government would be in a position to make a permanent arrangement with the staff. On many occasions during the past six or eight months we have had deputations from the railway organizations of this country, representing the employees not only of the Canadian Northern, but of all the railways of this country. Representations have been made by these delegations to the Government as to the conditions under which that road ought to be carried on and operated by the Government, as to the continuity of certain arrangements made between the Canadian Northern Railway and its employees in the past, as to provision for pensions and the continuance of the arrangements already made in that regard. Various matters of this kind have been taken up and on the whole it was thought desirable that the Government should not make itself directly responsible for the management and operation of the road by appointing an absolutely new board of directors until after the award had been made and the proposals in that regard carried out. I cannot better express the view of the Government as entertained at the last session of Parliament than by quoting the words of the Minister of Finance on the first day of August, 1917, as follows:

> As to the Board we shall have to get in the stock first and complete the transaction, and then it will be open to the Board to determine what is the best course, having regard to the public interest, to pursue with regard to the board of Directors and the general administration of the Canadian Northern Railway Company.

It is proper, however, to observe, as this question seems to have excited some interest in the minds of hon. members on both sides of the House, that it is not intended that Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann shall be members of the board as reconstituted. As a matter of fact, Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann have expressed their desire to be relieved from further responsibility with respect to this railway after it passes into the hands of the Government, and after the amount of the award, whatever it may be, shall have been determined. They have also said, Sir William Mackenzie in particular has said, that he is very intimately acquainted with the development of the road, with its operation and everything connected with it from the very first, and if at any time he can be of any service to the board of directors without remuneration or compensation by giving advice or otherwise, he will be very happy to make his services available to them in any way that they may determine.

Now with regard to the operating of the road. Hon. gentlemen of this House will understand that this is a very large question indeed. On more than one occasion in the past I have spoken of the difficulties which confront a Government after the capital stock of a great railway enterprise such as this has passed into the ownership of the people of Canada. I think hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, and I know we all have a common purpose in this, will agree that a great railway system such as that which is now being acquired ought not to be administered directly by any department of the Government.
I think we may start with that.

Another proposition which undoubtedly will be accepted by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House is this. While a road under the ownership of the people of Canada must be subject to the direction and control of the people in the highest sense, in the larger political sense; nevertheless, it is absolutely essential and vital that political influence in the lower sense—party political influence—shall be completely absent from the administration and operation of the road. These are two perfectly sound propositions. It is easy to lay down such propositions, accepted on both sides of this House, but it is a somewhat different problem to devise a scheme by which those two desiderata can be absolutely secured in the future operation of the State railways of Canada. That is the problem with which this Government has been confronted and with which it is now confronted. That is the problem which this Government and this Parliament must solve at the earliest possible moment. The problem is not concerned with the Canadian Northern railway alone. It is concerned also with the Intercolonial Railway, with the Transcontinental Railway, and, more than that, it is extremely likely that, in the not distant future, it will be concerned with the Grand Trunk Pacific and with the Grand Trunk Railway itself. Thus, it is a very comprehensive problem in its scope and it is exceedingly difficult for the Government and Parliament to find an adequate solution.

As to the immediate future, I have already said that we do not intend to operate the Canadian Northern Railway system directly under a department of the Government; it is our intention to operate it for the present through the corporate machinery by which it has been operated in the past. There will be a reconstituted board of directors. We shall endeavour to get the best men we can and we shall not interfere with them. We shall leave the administration and operation of that road to be carried on absolutely under that board of directors and we shall use every means available to the Government (and if necessary, we shall come to Parliament for that purpose) in order that anything like political influence, political patronage, or political interference—I am using the word political in its narrower sense—shall be absolutely eliminated from the administration of that road.

But, more than that, we have under consideration the question as to whether it may not be possible in the immediate future to bring the Transcontinental Railway, which is the property of the people of Canada, and the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways, which are also the property of the people of Canada, under corporate management. I do not desire to commit the Government to what I am mentioning just now, because we have had no opportunity in the very great stress and hurry of this session to give the proposition mature consideration. It may be possible, and, more than that, it may be desirable, to bring the Transcontinental and the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways under the ownership of the corporation which will control the Canadian Northern. The people of Canada will own absolutely the entire stock of the Canadian Northern Railway system. If the Transcontinental railway, the Intercolonial railway and the Prince Edward Island railway were amalgamated into one system with the Canadian Northern railway and were operated with it as one system and under one corporate management, it might, and doubtless would be, very greatly in the interest of efficient administration and operation. That suggestion is before the Government. It is a suggestion upon which I invite an expression of opinion from hon. gentlemen in this House. As far as I have been able to give it consideration, it commends itself very much to my judgment.

Now, I come to speak of some matters upon which my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) desired information in connection with the Canadian Northern railway. I shall go into that first, and afterwards I shall have to say something about the financial position of the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific. But just one word before I deal with that.

It is only right to explain that conditions in regard to railway operation, expenditure and income which have prevailed in Canada since this war and which have necessitated frequent applications for aid by the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific are to-day finding their parallel in some portions of the United States. The Pennsylvania Railway system in the United States is one of the greatest railway systems in the world. Under ordinary conditions it has a net revenue over operating expenses of from $50,000,000 to $64,000,000. I have learned from authoritative sources that during the month of January last the Pennsylvania Railway system failed to meet its operating expenses by $2,816,909.76, and that in the month of February last it failed to meet its operating expenses by $3,354,258.56.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What percentage would that be?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I really could not tell but I am pointing out that this road, which ordinarily has a revenue over operating expenses of about $60,000,000 a year failed, in January and February last to meet its operating expenses by the amounts mentioned. In the month of March it recovered somewhat and had a surplus of $1,428,526.28. The conditions with which the Pennsylvannia system has been confronted during the winter months have been pretty general among the railways of the United States east of the Mississippi, as I am informed. There has been a difference between the East and the West because of the very great congestion which has prevailed in the Eastern States, partly by reason of priority orders as to freight, which have led to great delays. The United States Government has stated, through a circular sent out on the first of May, 1918, that up to the 30th April, 1918, it has been obliged to assist the railways of the United States—I think practically all of them are eastern railways, to the amount of $90,614,000, and that all these advances were in the shape of loans excepting $13,000,000 advanced, on account of rentals for the first quarter of the current calendar year, to the New York Central lines, including the New York Central, the Michigan Central, the C. C. and St. Louis, and the Pittsburgh and Lake Erie, and $1,300,000 similarly advanced to the Wabash railway.

Now, I am coming to some item of information respecting which inquiry was made yesterday when this Bill was under consideration. Information was asked as to the use that had been made of $25,000,000 provided by Parliament at its last session for the purpose of sustaining the financial affairs of the Canadian Northern. An Order in Council was passed on the 15th of November, 1917, upon a report of the Minister of Finance, and it is as follows:

> The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 15th November, 1917, from the Minister of Finance, representing that, pursuant to the provisions of Chapter 24 of the Statutes of Canada for the year 1917, an agreement has been entered into between His Majesty the King, represented by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Railways and Canals, and the Owners and Pledgees, of not less than five-sixths of the 600,000 shares of the Capital Stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, as referred to in the said Act.
> The minister further represents that an application has been made by the Canadian Northern Railway Company for the assistance authorized in Section Three of the said Act, for the purpose of settling indebtedness incurred or to be incurred in the Canadian Northern Railway System, or for postponing the payment thereof.
>
> The minister recommends that for the purpose of giving the assistance provided in the said Act, he be authorized on and after the transfer of the shares above mentioned, to make advances out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, up to and not exceeding the sum of Twenty-five Million Dollars ($25,000,000.00), such advances to be for such amounts and to be made from time to time to such company or companies included in the said system and for such purposes as may be certified by the Financial Comptroller of the Department of Railways and Canals as correct and approved by the Minister of Finance.
> Further, such advances are to be for the purpose of paying and settling any indebtedness of any company comprised in the system, including principal of outstanding loans, interest on securities, instalments of principal of equipment securities, also, including betterments and new equipment and construction; the whole of said advances to be secured by a mortgage or charge upon the undertaking and properties of the Canadian Northern Railway Company; and so much of said advances as may be applied for the benefit of any other company included in the system to be additionally secured by a mortgage or charge upon the undertaking and properties of such company; all such mortgages and charges to be respectively in such form and to contain such terms and conditions respectively as the Minister of Finance may approve.

The minister further recommends that he be authorized to approve from time to time on behalf of the Government of any additional arrangement made or desired to be made by the directors of the Canadian Northern Railway Company for the purpose of obtaining renewals of existing loans to any company included in the Canadian Northern Railway System, whether such loans have heretofore been or hereafter are obtained by or in connection with the issue of collateral trust notes of the said Railway System, or otherwise.

The Committee concur in the foregoing and submit the same for approval.

So authority was taken by the Minister of Finance upon the report and recommendation of the Financial Controller of the Department of Railways and Canals to make advances from time to time out of the sum of $25,000,000, authorized by Parliament, and the amounts have been paid out under three heads, as follows:

First head, on account of construction loans—loans that were effected by the Canadian Northern railway for construction purposes, which had to be repaid or reduced,—there was paid:

To the Central Trust Company of New York, in full repayment of loan, $1,750,000.

To the Guarantee Trust Company of New York, in reduction of loan, $300,000.

To the Columbia Trust Company of New York, in reduction of loan, $1,500,000.

Then, coming to the rolling stock securities, there was paid in the first instance:

On account of principal of equipment bonds, $4,976,500, and for interest on equipment bonds, $1,075,002.50.

Then there were, of course, the fixed charges to be met—interest upon the funded debt of the company and upon loans secured by the deposit of the company's securities. In that respect there were paid for interest and sinking fund on mortgage securities, ranking prior to Canadian Northern railway four per cent debenture stock guaranteed by the Dominion Government the following amounts:

Canadian Northern Railway....	$9,136,083 18
Canadian Northern Pacific Railway	2,117,301 76
Canadian Northern Alberta Railway	165,374 91
Canadian Northern Western Railway	622,619 83
Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railway	202,056 00
Duluth, Winnipeg and Pacific Railway	570,552 87
Canadian Northern Ontario Railway	1,028,063 80
Central Ontario Railway.....	57,012 99
Bay of Quinte Railway	90,500 00
Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal Co., Ltd.	582,741 58
Canadian Northern Quebec Railway	420,359 76
Quebec and Lake St. John Railway	172,363 32
Halifax and South-Western Railway	233,467 50

These amounts, making in all $25,000,000, were paid out upon reports of the Financial Controller of the Government Railways of Canada as follows:

November 19, 1917.....	$12,500,000 00
November 28, 1917.....	2,540,421 97
December 10, 1917.....	54,750 00
December 27, 1917.....	1,983,503 47
January 9, 1918.....	1,250,000 00
January 18, 1918.....	2,000,000 00
January 24, 1918.....	2,000,000 00
January 30, 1918.....	2,017,460 77
February 4, 1918.....	653,863 79
Total	$25,000,000 00

I should observe that in respect of every one of these payments the financial comptroller of the Department of Railways and Canals visited Toronto, investigated the purposes for which the proposed payment was to be made, and thoroughly satisfied himself by the clearest possible evidence that the purpose to which the money was to be applied was within the terms of the statute. More than that, he saw also that the money, when paid over, was applied to that purpose.

Now, I come to the need of making a clear statement of just what the Canadian Northern Railway system does owe at the present time. I am bound to confess—and doubtless I share this feeling with a great many hon. members in this House—that balance sheets made up according to the methods of expert accountants are not always absolutely clear to me. Therefore, I desired to obtain a statement with regard to the liabilities of the Canadian Northern Railway system in such form as I could myself understand, and I felt thoroughly confident if it were so made that every hon. member in this House would be able to grasp its meaning without the slightest difficulty. So I have had such a statement of the liabilities made up, and it may be regarded as supplementary to, or ancillary to, the information given by my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance, which contains a great many details not given in the statement, I now present to this House.

Liabilities of Canadian Northern Railway System.

Funded Debt	$285,795,420 61
Equipment, Trust obligations	13,526,000 00
Demand and short term loans secured by collateral	58,056,961 11
Due to other companies on construction account, secured	30,502,392 04
Current liabilities	19,408,495 79
Accrued interest, etc.	4,730,069 93
Reserves for taxes and insurance	1,245,038 19
Total	$413,264,377 67

I add to that total the amount of the 5 per cent income charge convertible debenture stock, $25,000,000, making a total of $438,264,367.67. The income charge convertible debenture stock does not carry interest unless and until the surplus earnings, after payment of fixed charges, are sufficient to meet it.

There is one item in the list which needs a little explanation. It is the item of $30,502,392.04 due to other companies on construction account. I am informed by the Financial Comptroller of the Department of Railways that this amount represents securities which were handed over in payment for construction, and which are still held in that way.

It should be further explained that the statement I have just read is made up to the latest date available for this purpose, 30th September, 1917, and it corresponds, approximately speaking, with the date at which the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway was acquired under the Act of 1917.

Then comes a question, and a very proper question, as to what the assets of the Canadian Northern Railway may be. We are undertaking a liability of over $438,000,000, of which $25,000,000 is composed of the 5 per cent income charge convertible debenture stock to which I have alluded. What is the country to receive for this liability, seeing that there may be added to it a sum not exceeding $10,000,000, for the $60,000,000 of capital stock still outstanding in the Canadian Northern Railway system? It seemed desirable that I should procure a correspondingly intelligible statement as to the assets, and it has been prepared for me by the Financial Comptroller of the Department of Railways and Canals. It is of the same date, 30th September, 1917, as the statement of liabilities which I have just given, and it has been reduced to seven items.

Deferred charges	860,113 95
Estimated cost of reproduction of property at pre-war prices, per Prof. Swain's report	398,627,272 00
Equipment valuation by Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Chadbourn.	56,590,418 00
Capital expenditures January 1, 1917 to September 30, 1918	11,732,568 59
Total	$528,437,885 74

Explanation should be made respecting the items which I have just read, and in making this explanation I shall deal with both liabilities and assets. In stating the liabilities I have taken the funded debt at its par value, but it must be borne in mind that owing to the low rate of interest at which the securities covering this item were issued, the Government, if it were thought desirable to do so, could go out in the open market and purchase those bonds at a very large discount. It should be further borne in mind that the interest on the $25,000,000 of income convertible debenture stock is only a charge against surplus income and is non-cumulative. It is, therefore, apparent that this stock could be purchased at very much less than its face value, if it were thought desirable to acquire it; in fact, it is quoted on the market to-day at less than 70 per cent.

In the statement of capital value of the property of the Canadian Northern railway the estimated cost of reproduction is given without depreciation. It should be borne in mind, however, that the cost of reproducing it to-day would be very much greater than the amount which I have mentioned. The same reasoning applies to the equipment. I am told by those who have had actual experience that the cost of railway equipment to-day is about double what it was four years ago. Box cars, which at pre-war prices were worth from $1,200 to $1,400, to-day cost from $2,600 to $3,000; rails, which cost from $28 to $32 before the war, are to-day unobtainable at $60; and the cost of locomotives to-day is more than double what it was four years ago. The difference between the two statements which I have just read is, in round figures, $90,000,000, in favour of the property; but one must bear in mind that this does not determine the value of the capital stock, which depends upon a great many other factors than the cost of replacement. A road, however valuable, is controlled, in respect of the value of its capital stock, not only by the factor to which I have alluded, but by the earning power; and no doubt the earning power, the strategic position of the road with regard to acquiring business in the future, the possibilities of development and other considerations, control the situation very considerably, though in what proportion I should not care to say.

A further explanation should be made with respect to the item of $398,627,272, the estimated cost of reproduction. That is given in the Drayton-Acworth report, in the estimate prepared by Professor Swain, at $397,441,563. Taking into account the fact that the Canadian Northern railway did not own the entire capital stock in all the subsidiary companies, Professor Swain places the cost of reproduction without depreciation at $385,533,473. I am informed by the financial comptroller of the Department of Railways and Canals that after the report had been made Professor Swain sent letters to the department in which he pointed out that certain omissions had been made; so that the amount which I have mentioned, taking into account all allowances for stock not fully owned by and vested in the Canadian Northern Railway system, does to-day amount, without depreciation, to the sum included in the statement which I have read, namely, $398,627,272.

I have pointed out the total indebtedness of the Canadian Northern Railway system. Let me remind hon. gentlemen that the system comprises nearly 10,000 miles of railway. Nearly 9,700 miles are in actual operation. If one could speak of that in round numbers as 10,000 miles, the indebtedness to which I have alluded, $438,264,377, would represent a capitalization of between $43,000 and $44,000 per mile. Many hon. gentlemen know much better than I do the location of the road and its opportunities for gathering up traffic in Western Canada. It has been represented to me—and my own observation accords with that representation—that no railway in the west of Canada is so favourably situated for gathering up traffic or has so efficient a system of branches for the accomplishment of that purpose in the three Prairie Provinces as the Canadian Northern Railway system.

In this connection I submit a statement of capitalization of other railways that have passed into the ownership of the Government and of one or two that may do so in the future. The Intercolonial railway, 1,518.39 miles; the Prince Edward Island railway, 275.20 miles; the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island railway, 36.05 miles, and the International Railway of New Brunswick, 111.30 miles, comprise a total of 1,940.94 miles, which have been hitherto spoken of as the Government system of railways. That system represents a capitalization, not including interest upon the investment made by the country in the railway, of $137,184,199.62. But even without interest, hon. gentlemen will see that the Canadian Northern railway will be acquired at little more than half the capitalization per mile which is represented by the construction and acquisition of the Intercolonial and the other railways which I have mentioned.

Mr. RICHARDSON: What is the amount per mile?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have not figured that out; but the financial comptroller informs me that it works out, without interest, at about $65,000 per mile. With added interest it would, of course, run to at least $100,000 per mile. The Grand Trunk Pacific railway consists of the Mountain Section from Prince Rupert to Wolf Creek, 833 miles, and the Prairie Section from Wolf Creek to Winnipeg, 915 miles, a total of 1,748 miles. I have under my hand a statement of the expenditure upon the road itself and for rolling stock. The last available, that of Sir Collingwood Schreiber, is $135,698,615.64, but that does not include equipment and rolling stock. If you add what has been expended for equipment and rolling stock, you will find that it brings the expenditure for construction and for equipment and rolling stock (which I have included in the liabilities of the Canadian Northern) up to about $180,000,000, a capitalization for the Grand Trunk Pacific of $100,000 per mile, instead of $44,000 or $45,000 per mile, the capitalization for the Canadian Northern railway.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Would that include the hotels and all the terminals?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It includes the hotels and terminals, and so does the capitalization for the Canadian Northern.

The capital expenditure on the Transcontinental railway should next be considered. That line has a mileage of 1,811.28 miles from Moncton to Winnipeg. The actual cash paid out, without including one dollar for interest, is $163,797,783.66, and if you add interest, it will bring the amount considerably over $200,000,000 for 1,811.28 miles.

Mr. RICHARDSON: What is that per mile without interest?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Without interest, it works out to $92,000 per mile, and with interest it would work out, the financial comptroller tells me, at about $110,000 per mile. I thought it desirable to give these comparisons to the House and to the country in order that they might realize that we are not buying a pig in a poke in acquiring the Canadian Northern railway, and that, so far as property owned by the State is concerned, the future holds out greater prospects for the Canadian Northern Railway system than for any other railway that is to-day within the control and disposition of the Government of Canada.

I come now to the Grand Trunk Pacific. I regard it as inevitable that, for many reasons, that road should be taken over by the Federal Government. It is a national enterprise to which the credit of the Canadian people has been committed, and, in my judgment, it is expedient to sustain it and not permit it to go into liquidation. It is intimately connected with the Grand Trunk Railway system in the East. The Canadian Northern branch lines in the West can, in many instances, as I am informed, be made available as feeders for the Grand Trunk Pacific without great expenditure. The road, as it is at present, is not self-sustaining. It pays a little more than operating expenses, although I am bound to say that, during the past eight or twelve months, it has rather exceeded anticipations in the return which it has made. The House and the country will be glad to know that the prospects of its traffic seem to be improving, and I very sincerely hope that they will improve still more in the early future. That railway cannot be successfully operated without suitable arrangements with the Canadian Northern Railway and with the Grand Trunk Railway in the East. It cannot pay its interest charges, and it is utterly impossible for the Grand Trunk to meet the obligations which it has undertaken in respect of the Grand Trunk Pacific. That has been publicly stated. It is stated in the Drayton-Acworth report. Therefore, as the Grand Trunk Pacific is not self-sustaining, as it pays little more than operating expenses, and as it cannot be expected, for many years to come, to pay its fixed charges, especially if it is divorced from co-operation and association with other railways in the West, it is manifest that only one of two courses is open. The Government must either year after year ask Parliament to vote seven or eight or ten million dollars in order that the fixed charges of the road may be paid, or it must take over the road, connect it up as effectively as possible with the Canadian Northern and with the rest of the Government railway system, and endeavour to make it part of a profitable system of Government railways in the early future. I think, therefore, it is absolutely inevitable that the Grand Trunk Pacific must be acquired. As to the terms of its acquisition, I can only say that the Grand Trunk would no doubt be willing to hand it over to us to-day if we would relieve the Grand Trunk of all its obligations in respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific; it would hand over to us the capital stock and be glad to get out of its own obligations in respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific. But there are several conditions to be taken into account before any such proposal can be entertained, and so we are at the present time discussing the whole situation with the Grand Trunk management. As an additional reason, which I did not previously mention, if we permitted the Grand Trunk Pacific to go into liquidation, we should have to take care of all those obligations which are prior to our own, and that would in the end mean that we would simply have to take care of all the obligations of that railway. Thus, there is no object whatever in permitting it to go into liquidation. It would merely mean additional expense, dislocation of traffic and the exciting of public alarm, without any good result that I can anticipate.

Now it seems if we take over the Grand Trunk Pacific, that practically involves the taking over of the Grand Trunk Railway as well. I am of that opinion for this chief reason, that the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern, both in the West, if acquired by the Government would otherwise lack eastern connections, and the Canadian Pacific Railway would dominate the whole situation. In the second place, the Grand Trunk might have a great deal of difficulty in carrying on unless it should be released from its obligations to the Grand Trunk Pacific. Further than that, while the present condition of the Grand Trunk is not prosperous for many reasons, some of which doubtless it could not control, I believe that it would have reasonable prospects for the future if amalgamated into one system with the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific. I would further emphasize the consideration that, while the Grand Trunk cannot carry out the obligations necessary for its retention of the Grand Trunk Pacific, on the other hand it has no bright future prospects without that connection. Hon. members of this House who recollect the report of Mr. Hays, upon which the National Transcontinental enterprise was largely founded, will remember that he pointed out the anomalous situation in which the Grand Trunk found itself. It gathered up traffic all over Eastern Canada and handed it over to the Canadian Pacific Railway, which earned very large carrying charges for transporting that traffic to the West. The same condition would confront the Grand Trunk to-day unless it had that western connection to which Mr. Hays, then general manager of the Grand Trunk Railway, looked forward with so much anticipation of good results.

It is very easy to say that this country ought to acquire the Grand Trunk Railway, but when one comes down to the practical proposal of how it is to be acquired the problem is not quite so simple. Of course we might take advantage of a situation which to some extent has developed out of the disturbed conditions of the world, and say to the management of the Grand Trunk Railway, "We have you in our power in certain respects, and you must do precisely what we insist upon." But on the other hand, we must remember not only in this connection but in many other connections, that Canada is a country which for many years to come will require to borrow large amounts of capital from other countries. If the Federal Government or any provincial government in Canada lays itself open to the reasonable charge of acting unfairly or unjustly towards those who in good faith have invested their capital in business enterprises of this character in Canada, the country in the end will pay much more than it will gain by any such injustice; there is absolutely no doubt about that in my mind. So we must act reasonably with the Grand Trunk railway, and we have endeavoured to act reasonably with them. But more than that, if we undertake to force the situation against the Grand Trunk railway, we must also remember that a considerable portion of that system lies in the United States, with two great terminals in the West, I believe, and one great terminal in the East. The ownership of these lines is vested in United States companies, of which the Grand Trunk controls the stock, and that makes their acquisition even with the consent of the Grand Trunk railway, a matter of no little difficulty and complexity. So I think the acquisition of the Grand Trunk railway must depend upon negotiation. We could, of course, cut these lines off at the border and expropriate them, dislocating the system; but we would do ourselves no good and the Grand Trunk railway irreparable harm by attempting such a course.

I may say that we have negotiations outstanding with the Grand Trunk railway. For the present they are confidential. We have made what we regard as a reasonable offer, somewhat along the lines suggested in the Drayton-Acworth report, but somewhat more favourable to the Grand Trunk than the proposal made in that report. They have replied to us by making a counter offer, which was of such a nature that we did not consider we could ask Parliament to accept it. For that reason we had to decline it, and we then made the suggestion to the management that, failing any agreement between the Government and the company, we would be prepared to submit the amount of the annual payment to arbitration, and we would do that without fixing any limit as we did in the case of the Canadian Northern railway. It seemed to us that the two cases were distinguishable in that respect, and that we ought not to insist upon a maximum as we did in the case of the Canadian Northern. We proposed to follow the Drayton-Acworth report in this respect, that whatever sum should be paid by the Government of this country for, let us say, a lease of the Grand Trunk Railway lines, should be distributed among the holders of the various stocks of the Grand Trunk Pacific by the directors of the Grand Trunk themselves, and that we should not attempt to interfere with or control that matter. It is anticipated that some members of the Government will have the duty of proceeding to Great Britain during this summer. A sub-committee of Council has been appointed, and during the past six months has been dealing with general railway problems in this country, assisting in that regard the Minister of Railways and Canals, who is primarily responsible, and who had asked me to have such a sub-committee appointed in order that he might, without a formal meeting of Council, have the advice of some of his colleagues in respect of matters of importance. Two members of that sub-committee of Council will be in England during the summer. They have given attentive study to the questions which are involved, and I have some reasonable hope that when Parliament is again summoned, the Government may be in a position to place before it proposals which will involve the constitution into one State-owned system, the chief railways of Canada, except the Canadian Pacific. It may be possible, indeed I think it is probable, that at some later date, but not in the immediate future, all the land transportation facilities of Canada in the shape of railways may, so far as operation is concerned, be amalgamated into one system carried on under one management. The enormous waste and duplication, which have proved to be such a burden upon this country in the past, would be eliminated, for the future at least, in that way; and they have been eliminated to some extent during the past six or eight months as I shall demonstrate by a report which I propose to read before I sit down.

I should also say to the members of the House, before I leave that branch of the subject, that the Government have not been unmindful of their duty to see that adequate rolling stock and motive power should be provided for all the railways of Canada as far as possible during the past twelve or fifteen months. The Department of Railways and Canals, during that time, assisted the Grand Trunk in the matter of motive power to a very considerable extent. They provided for them 47 Mikado engines. The department has at the present time under order for the Grand Trunk railway 75 Mikado engines, 20 switching engines and 15 Pacific type passenger engines. The total outlay for these engines is as follows:

No. Type.	Cost Per Engine.	Total.
47 Mikado	$48,750	$2,281,250
75 Mikado	62,000	4,650,000
20 Switching	41,000	820,000
15 Pacific type passenger	60,000	1,000,000
Total		$8,751,000

Hon. gentlemen will observe the remarkable jump in the price of these engines. The 47 Mikado engines which we secured at $48,750 each were ordered about six months before the 75 Mikado engines which are to cost us $62,000 each. It is necessary to have these engines to keep the railway systems of the country up to their full power for transportation purposes, and while providing very amply for the railways under the direct control and administration of the department, we have also found it necessary to come to the assistance of some other railways in such matters. The Grand Trunk pays a reasonable charge for the use of these engines.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

I spoke a moment ago of the necessity of avoiding waste and duplication. We have made, I think, a reasonable and, certainly, a bona fide effort, to bring that about during the past year. The report which I am about to read is lengthy; but I think it worth while to read it so that hon. members and the people generally may know that something substantial has been accomplished under the direction of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid) in avoiding waste and duplication during the past year. One report is dated the 26th day of March. I asked my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals early in that month to get for me a statement from the Canadian Railway Association for National Defence of what they had accomplished during the eight or nine months in which they had been in operation. From reports which had reached me I came to the conclusion that they had accomplished a good deal but I was equally of the opinion that not only the people of the country but the members of this House were largely ignorant of what had been done. Mr. W. M. Neal, by whom this report has been prepared, is the secretary of this association. The association itself is composed of representatives of the Canadian Pacific railway, the Grand Trunk railway, the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, the Canadian Northern railway, the Government System of railways and the New York Central. It has organized its work under six heads. There is a special committee on war and national defence, an administrative committee, a commission on car service, a committee on passenger transportation, a committee on tariffs and statistics and a committee on materials and supplies. The report is as follows:

In addition to the information embodied in our communication of the 21st inst., relative to the work of the Canadian Railway Association for National Defence, it will no doubt be of interest to you to learn of the details of the organization of the Association itself.

In accordance with arrangements which were made at preliminary meetings of representatives of the Dominion Government and the railways, an invitation was issued to railways operating in Canada to attend a conference at Montreal on October 23rd, 1917, for the purpose of formulating a Central Railway Organization and outlining its working policies. This conference was held on the date mentioned in the offices of the Canadian Pacific Railway, Windsor Street Station, Montreal, all of the principal and a number of the smaller lines being represented.

After explaining what was desired in the way of co-ordinating the facilities and efforts of the various lines so as to permit of the efficient handling of the extremely heavy volume of traffic which it was expected the railways would be called upon to move during the winter and conservation of fuel, motive power and man power, it was decided to appoint a Committee composed of the executives of some of the larger lines who would direct the policy of the new organization, which was to be known as "The Canadian Railway Association for National Defence."

A Special Committee on War and National Defence was formed, with the following personnel:—

The Right Honourable Lord Shaughnessy, K.C.V.O., President, Canadian Pacific Railway; Sir William MacKenzie, President, Canadian Northern Railway; Mr. Howard G. Kelley, President, Grand Trunk Railway; Mr. A. H. Smith, President, New York Central Lines.

Under the Executive Committee was appointed an Administrative Committee, whose duties include general supervision of the operations of all railways in Canada embracing such matters as Distribution of cars and engines amongst the various lines, Diversion of Traffic from one line to another. The railways elected the following as an Administrative Committee:—

Mr. U. E. Gillen, Vice-President, Grand Trunk Railway; Mr F. F. Backus, General Manager, Toronto, Hamilton & Buffalo Railway; Mr. J. H. Walsh, General Manager, Quebec Central Railway; Mr. D. B. Hanna, Third Vice-President, Canadian Northern Railway; Mr. C. A. Hayes, General Manager, Canadian Government Railways; Sir George Bury, Vice-President, Canadian Pacific Railway; Mr. E. D. Bronner, Vice-President and General Manager, Michigan Central Railway.

Mr. A. E. Warren, Chief Operating Officer, Department of Railways and Canals, was later added to the Administrative Committee to represent the Minister of Railways and Canals, having authority to speak for the Canadian Government Railways and the Canadian Northern Railway in the absence of Mr. Hanna or Mr. Hayes.

The Administrative Committee was authorized to appoint Sub-Committees to handle the details of the work of the Association, analyse local conditions, deal with complaints or suggestions of the public and make recommendations to the Administrative Committee. The following Sub-Committees were appointed:—

Commission on Car Service, composed of:—Mr. A. Hatton, General Superintendent Car Service, Canadian Pacific Railway; Mr. J. E. Duval, General Superintendent Transportation, Grand Trunk Railway; Mr. W. N. Rippey, Superintendent Car Service, Canadian Government Railways; Mr. A. E. Lock, Superintendent Car Service. Toronto, Hamiliton & Buffalo Railway; Mr. W. S. Moy, Car Accountant, Quebec Central Railway; Mr. E. Crawford, Superintendent Car Service, Canadian Northern Railway; Mr. W. A. Griffin, Superintendent of Traffic, Temiskaming & Northern Ontario Railway.

The duties of the Commission on Car Service are to supervise in detail the handling of freight traffic, car movements and car supply; to see that all lines and districts receive a fair proportion of the available equipment; to watch the interchange of freight cars as between Canada and the United States with a view to establishing and maintaining equalization. It was also allotted to this Committee to increase freight car efficiency by bringing about heavier loading of cars and more expeditious movement, elimination of practices such as the avoidable light running of freight trains, which has a tendency to increase the consumption of coal.

Committee on Passenger Transportation, whose personnel is:—Mr. C. S. Sims, Resident Vice-President, Delaware & Hudson Railway; Mr. G. T. Bell, Passenger Traffic Manager, Grand Trunk Railway; Mr. J. E. Duval, General Superintendent Transportation, Grand Trunk Railway; Mr. H. T. Malcolmson, Superintendent, Toronto, Hamiliton & Buffalo Railway; Mr. G. C. Martin, General Freight and Passenger Agent, Toronto, Hamilton & Buffalo Railway; Mr. H. H. Melanson, Passenger Traffic Manager, Canadian Government Railways; Mr. A. C. Barker, Assistant to General Superintendent, Canadian Government Railways; Mr. A. Price, Assistant General Manager, Canadian Pacific Railway; Mr. C. B. Foster, Assistant Passenger Traffic Manager, Canadian Pacific Railway; Mr. J. Balkwill, Superintendent, Michigan Central Railroad; Mr. L. W. Landman, General Passenger Agent, Michigan Central Railway; Mr. W. A. Kingsland, General Superintendent, Canadian Northern Railway; Mr. R. L. Fairbairn, General Passenger Agent, Canadian Northern Railway; Mr. J. T. Reid, Superintendent, Quebec Central Railway; Mr. G. D. Wadsworth, General Freight and Passenger Agent, Quebec Central Railway.

This Committee was directed to analyse passenger services on all railways in Canada with a view to cutting off duplicate or other unnecessary services so that coal might be saved and more motive power made available for handling of freight.

Committee of Tariffs and Statistics, composed of following:—Mr. Guy Tombs, Assistant Freight Traffic Manager, Canadian Northern Railway; Mr. R. J. Foreman, Assistant to Vice-President, Grand Trunk Railway; Mr. H. E. Macdonell, Assistant Freight Traffic Manager, Canadian Pacific Railway; Mr. D. A. Storey, Freight Traffic Manager, Canadian Government Railways; Mr. G. C. Martin, General Freight and Passenger Agent, Toronto, Hamilton & Buffalo Railway; Mr. George H. Clark, General Freight Agent, Ottawa & New York Railway; Mr. N. J. Ferguson, General Freight and Passenger Agent, Quebec, Montreal & Southern Railway.

This Committee supervises questions of rates arising from diversions of traffic from one line to another, re-adjusting system of advices to the public as to the movement of freight, elimination of delay to cars at junction points, where it had been the practice to hold shipments for rebilling, and similar matters.

It was the original intention to appoint a Committee on Materials and Supplies, but subsequent developments showed it to be unnecessary to appoint a permanent committee to look after this branch of the work, conferences of the Officers of the lines interested being held for the discussion of matters such as the supplying of fuel, rails, ties and labour, about some of which the Association has corresponded with you.

The Organization in Eastern Canada was practically duplicated in the West, where an Administrative Sub-Committee was appointed reporting to the Administrative Committee at Montreal. The duties of the Sub-Committees in the West conform to those of the Eastern Committees, as outlined above. The personnel of the Western Sub-Committees is as follows:—

Administrative Sub-Committee:—Mr. Grant Hall, Vice-President and General Manager,

Canadian Pacific Railway; Mr. F. P. Brady, General Manager, Canadian Government Railways; Mr. W. P. Hinton, Vice-President and General Manager, Grand Trunk Pacific; Mr. M. H. MacLeod, General Manager, Canadian Northern Railway; Mr. C. E. Dafoe, General Superintendent, Midland Railway; Mr. J. M. Gruber, Vice-President, Great Northern Railway; Mr. Geo. T. Slade, Vice-President, N. P. Railway; Mr. J. W. Mulhern, General Superintendent, Kettle Valley Railway; Mr. W. R. Smith, General Manager, Edmonton, Dunvegan & British Columbia Railway.

Sub-Committee on Freight Traffic:—Mr. W. B. Lanigan, Assistant Freight Traffic Manager, Canadian Pacific Railway; Mr. Geo. Stephen, Freight Traffic Manager, Canadian Northern Railway; Mr. A. E. Rosevear, General Freight Agent, Grand Trunk Pacific; Mr. P. H. Burnham, General Freight Agent, Great Northern Railway; Mr. W. C. Hartnett, General Agent, N. P. Railway; Mr. O. E. Fisher, Traffic Manager, Kettle Valley Railway; Mr. C. Dowling, Traffic Manager, Edmonton, Dunvegan & British Columbia Railway.

Sub-Committee on Car Service:—Mr. J. P. Driscoll, Superintendent Car Service, Canadian Northern Railway; Mr. T. P. White, Superintendent Car Service, Grand Trunk Pacific Railway; Mr. E. D. Cotterell, Superintendent Car Service, Canadian Pacific Railway; Mr. P. B. Robb, Car Service Agent, Canadian Government Railways; Mr. C. E. Dafoe, General Superintendent, Midland Railway; Mr. A. G. Sutherland, Superintendent Car Service, E. D. & B. C. Railway.

Sub-Committee on Passenger Transportation:—Mr. H. H. Brewer, General Superintendent, Grand Trunk Pacific; Mr. D. C. Coleman, Assistant General Manager, Canadian Pacific Railway; Mr. Geo. A. Walton, General Passenger Agent, Canadian Pacific Railway; Mr. W. E. Duperow, General Passenger Agent, Grand Trunk Pacific; Mr. R. Creelman, General Passenger Agent, Canadian Northern Railway; Mr. C. E. Dafoe, General Superintendent, Midland Railway; Mr. C. Dowling, Traffic Manager, Edmonton, Dunvegan & British Columbia Railway.

Offices were opened by the Association in the Eastern Townships Bank Building, Montreal, and a general secretary and staff appointed to look after the routine work of the Association.

Very full and complete information as to what has been accomplished is contained in the report of March 21, 1918, to which I shall now give attention. It is addressed to the Minister of Railways and is as follows:

As requested in your letter of 18th inst., following is statement of the operations of the Canadian Railway Association for National Defence:—

Summary of work done by Canadian Railways working under the direction of the Canadian Railway Association for National Defence.

October 23rd, 1917, to March 20th, 1918.

I invite the attention of hon. gentlemen to what has been accomplished, because it strikes me that the result really does indicate that this association, and the methods which it has followed, have been of great advantage to us during the past autumn and winter.

Fuel conservation.—Saving through reduced passenger services and heavy loading of cars and trains during ensuing year under practices now in vogue (estimated), 500,000 tons.

Increased movement of freight by diversions during congestions arising from unusually severe winter weather, 516,565 tons.

Increase in delivery of empty box cars from United States to Canada under arrangements made by association, 14,260.

Estimated increase in car efficiency during current year through improved handling and heavier loading of cars equivalent to 300,000 car trips.

Freedom from serious congestion in both eastern and western Canada such as was experienced in the winter of 1916-1917 and in the United States during the winter now coming to a close.

Prompt filling of requirements of overseas transports at ports served by Canadian Railways.

Increase in coal deliveries to Canada from United States, 285,000 tons.

Increases in freight traffic by diversion of cars from over-burdened routes.

On orders issued by the Canadian Railway Association for National Defence and arrangements made with the railways interested, a total of fourteen thousand seven hundred and fifty-nine loaded cars have been diverted from congested routes to others which were comparatively free. These cars, many of which were loaded with grain and coal contained approximately five hundred and sixteen thousand five hundred and sixty-five tons of freight.

Included in the diversions were twenty-one hundred and eighty cars which were billed eastbound via the Canadian Pacific Railway through Fort William for points in Ontario and Quebec and diverted via the Soo Line from Emerson to Sault Ste. Marie, being returned to the Canadian Pacific Railway at the latter point, thus relieving the heavily taxed line east from Fort William.

Diversions of freight routed via Canadian Pacific Railway from Fort William for Eastern Canada points and overseas were made to the Canadian Northern Railway at Port Arthur, the cars being returned to the Canadian Pacific Railway at Sudbury and Ottawa. These diversions via Port Arthur total up to date four hundred and three cars and the arrangement calls for continued diversion as necessary up to forty cars per day.

One result of these two switches in the movement of eastbound freight is an increase in the movement of grain by rail from the head of the lakes of approximately three and one half million bushels, in addition to avoiding congestion at the terminals in that territory, and expediting the general movement of cars through that gateway.

The handling of traffic from the Niagara Frontier to Ontario points during the winter months, when the entire burden is thrown upon the railways operating between Buffalo and Toronto owing to the suspension of ferry service across Lake Erie, up to this year caused a great deal of delay to freight and cars and interfered with the requisite coal deliveries for consumption in Ontario to such an extent as to have been partly responsible for the fuel shortage in that province during the winter of 1916-1917.

This year, at the first hint of trouble, the Administrative Committee of the Canadian Railway Association for National Defence, after going over the situation in detail, delegated one of their members, Mr. F. F. Backus, General Manager of the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway, as the representative of the Association to take full charge of operation of lines between the Frontier and Toronto, with authority to switch traffic and engines from one line to another as the conditions day by day might demand.

Under Mr. Backus' direction, cars were diverted from the overburdened Grand Trunk railway route to the joint line furnished by the M.C.R.R., T.H. & B., and Canadian Pacific railway, to the number of five thousand and eighty-one, which means that the total movement of freight from the United States to Canada via the Niagara gateway was increased to that extent. These diversions extended over the period from January 6th to March 6th when conditions became practically normal and the necessity for further transfer of cars from the routing prescribed on the billing disappeared.

About sixty per cent of the five thousand and eighty-one cars by which the movement from the Frontier was increased as described above contained coal so that the coal receipts in Ontario during the two months mentioned were increased by approximately one hundred and fifty thousand tons.

Arrangements were made with the United States railway authorities at Washington whereby empty box cars ordered to Canada to assist in making up the number of cars due us on the interchange with United States lines were diverted to the Delaware and Hudson railway where they are loaded with coal, principally for points in the province of Quebec, thus increasing the coal receipts in this province, as well as providing box cars for the movement of exports to the United States. Under this arrangement five thousand eight hundred empty box cars were turned over to the Delaware and Hudson railway, and up to date three thousand eight hundred and thirty-five have been loaded with coal as above, containing approximately one hundred and thirty-five thousand tons of coal. It is the intention to continue this arrangement as long as empty cars are being sent to Canada as at present.

During the past few weeks the movement of shipments from points in Ontario to Quebec and the Maritime Provinces has been increased by the diversion of 1,641 carloads from the Canadian Pacific railway and Grand Trunk railway to the Canadian Northern railway at Toronto, in order to relieve the lines of the former between Toronto and Montreal and hasten recovery from conditions arising from the series of severe storms from which the railways suffered in Ontario during January and early February.

Another object sought by the Association was the avoidance of a repetition of the shortage of foodstuffs which existed in the Maritime Provinces during the winter of 1916-1917 owing to the heavy movement of overseas supplies which had to be given preference over the lines east of Montreal and tended at times to crowd out domestic shipments. With this end in view cars were transferred from the heavily burdened Canadian Pacific railway route from Montreal to St. John to the Canadian Government railways at Quebec and Ste. Rosalie, the movement of freight to the Maritime Provinces being increased in this way by 1,565 carloads or approximately 45,000 tons of freight.

Diversions of cars from one line to another similar to those given in detail above were made at Sudbury, Ottawa, North Bay, Winnipeg and Saskatoon.

Handling of Grain, Flour and Coal, Western Canada.

In Western Canada the activities of the Canadian Railway Association for National Defence, or the "Railways War Board" as it has come to be popularly known amongst the shipping public, were directed chiefly to keeping up the deliveries of grain and flour to the East, both for domestic consumption and shipment overseas and maintaining the requisite movement of cars from the mines in Alberta. It is admitted that, in the face of a winter of operating conditions of almost unprecedented severity, when engines froze up on the road, water supplies disappeared overnight and at times the men remained on duty only at greatest hardship, the demands of the transports and Eastern millers were met and coal was delivered to the prairie cities and towns with a regularity and promptness that could hardly have been expected by the uninitiated had they been able to foresee the obstacles which had to be overcome. Preparations which are being made in the west now for improvements during the coming summer it is anticipated will permit of a still better service being provided next winter.

The views of the western public on the accomplishments of the railways in Western Canada, are, perhaps, voiced in the following extract from an editorial appearing in the Moosejaw Evening Times of March 11th, in referring to one of the bulletins issued by the Railways War Board:

> This winter we (The Canadian Railway Association) are determined to keep Canada's traffic rolling smoothly and with speed even though last year's conditions repeat themselves. (extract from bulletin).
> Well, last year's conditions did repeat themselves with a vengeance and Canada's traffic has been handled more smoothly and efficiently in spite of even a greater scarcity of labour.

The arrangements made by the Western Committee of the Association included the distribution of grain and coal cars between lines as they were required regardless of ownership and the same action was taken in the case of water cars when water supplies failed on account of the severe weather and water for locomotives had to be hauled long distances.

Car Supply.

When the Canadian Railway Association for National Defence was formed on October 23rd, 1917, one of the first tasks with which it was confronted was the recovery from the United States railways of some 20,679 Canadian owned freight cars located in the United States in excess of the number of cars of United States ownership in this country, that is, the Canadian lines had less than ninety per cent of the number of cars owned by them and required to handle traffic currently. The railways individually had been pressing their American connections to return their cars but had been unable to make satisfactory progress.

After numerous communications had taken place between the Canadian Railway Association for National Defence and the headquarters of the United States railroads at Washington without the desired result, a committee representing this association proceeded to New York and Washington in an endeavour to establish a working arrangement which would provide for a constant return movement of empty cars from the United States to Canada of sufficient magnitude to offset the Canadian losses which had taken place during the previous spring and summer and balance the southbound movement of loaded cars. A result of this conference was an immediate increase in the movement of cars to this country which continued until the United States lines became involved in the aggravated traffic congestions resulting from the unusually severe winter difficulties. The movement was resumed for a time with the advent of more favorable weather and continued until the pressure from Western States, which had millions of bushels of potatoes, corn and grain awaiting cars, became so great that the United States Railroad Administration felt it necessary to issue a preference order for movement of empty cars to the lines west of Chicago, which again had the effect of curtailing the deliveries to Canada. Some progress continued to be made however as congestions at United States terminals were worked off and delayed cars with freight for Canada reached us.

We are now advised by the Car Service Section of the United States Railroad Administration that they anticipate a general resumption of the movement of empty cars to Canada within the next two weeks.

Following is a table giving particulars of the adverse car balance against Canadian railways on interchange with the United States at various dates since October last:

	Box Cars.	Other Cars.	Total Cars.
October 1, 1917....	19,000	1,679	20,679
December 15, 1917..	19,872	2,247	22,119
January 15, 1918..	19,898	774	20,672
February 15, 1918..	16,681	108	16,789
March 1, 1918.....	14,907	3,118*	11,789

*Balance in favour of United States lines.

The balance of 3,118 "other cars" in favour of United States railways is accounted for by the heavy receipts of coal cars, principally via the Niagara frontier, many of which cars had accumulated on United States lines during the severe weather and were moved in abnormal numbers when weather conditions improved. These cars have not yet had time to be made empty and return to the United States in sufficient numbers to offset the heavy receipts.

As a result of the negotiations between the association and the United States railway authorities at Washington, 14,500 empty box cars have been ordered to Canada to date, in addition to empty cars received in the ordinary course of interchange and distributed principally in Eastern Canada where the demand for equipment for loading to United States is heaviest. It is expected that cars remaining due on these orders, namely, 4,075, will be received within the next two or three weeks in view of the requirements in the Western States having been fairly well filled for the present.

In addition to empty cars ordered and received as described in the preceding paragraph, 5,800 empties were ordered to the Delaware and Hudson Railway to be loaded with coal for Canadian points, making the total number of extra cars ordered to Canada, 20,300. Of the 5,800 cars, 3,835 have been received to date, the total number of the specially ordered cars received therefore, being 14,260.

Aside from the orders which have been issued by Washington to the United States railways covering the movement of empties to Canada as above, we have requests placed at Washington for 11,770 cars which have not yet been confirmed to the United States railways by the Director General's staff, but which they expect to begin to place in about two weeks' time.

The heavy demand placed upon our railways during the past winter for transportation of foodstuffs and other supplies for overseas has made it extremely difficult to furnish shippers of hay, pulp, pulpwood, newsprint, lumber and other commodities for export to the United States with all the cars for which they have asked. The imperative demand for providing an adequate number of cars for war materials and the continued holding of Canadian cars in the United States made it necessary last fall to prohibit the use of Canadian owned box cars for loading to points beyond the Canadian lines and for our American shipments we are dependent upon what United States owned cars are obtainable. The situation as regards equipment for shipments going to the United States was further aggravated with the close of navigation on the St. Lawrence river and the Great Lakes on account of the larger number of cars required to handle war supplies the greater distance around Lake Superior and between Montreal and the Atlantic seaboard, which meant that a certain number of American owned cars had to be placed in this traffic which prior to this time had been available for loading to the United States.

The opening of navigation this spring will permit of the withdrawal of these cars from overseas business and they will be available for loading to points south of the boundary.

Increased Car Efficiency.

The car shortage with which shippers and railways alike were confronted last fall, and up to the present time, inability to obtain sufficient additional cars, longer haul of freight during the winter season, increasing traffic, shortage of locomotives and men and necessity for saving coal called for economy in the use of cars to the greatest possible extent. The Canadian Railway Association for National Defence therefore immediately inaugurated a campaign amongst both shipping public and railways to ship goods in larger units and thereby reduce the number of cars, engines, men and amount of coal required to move a given amount of traffic.

What has been accomplished in this department of the Association's activities is outlined in the following figures:

Average weight of contents per loaded car handled on Canadian railways.

Year 1916	20.91 tons.
October, 1917	20.76 tons.
January, 1918.....	23.71 tons.

Taking the Dominion Government Statistics of Railways for the year 1916 as a basis, the increase of approximately three tons per car means that if the record is maintained during the year 1918, as we have every reason to expect it will, if not improved upon, 260,663 less car trips will be required this year to handle the number of tons of freight loaded on Canadian railways equivalent to that loaded in 1916 than were required in the latter year. The haulage of that number of cars less to handle the same amount of freight means a saving of approximately 79,000 tons of coal, 13,271 less trains, the use of 122 locomotives and the time of 360 enginemen and trainmen during the year.

Further effects of reduction in the number of cars to be handled will be seen in more expeditious handling of traffic in terminals and a general improvement in transportation conditions in this country, which even now are admitted to be better than in any other country of size engaged in war work.

The campaign for increased loading of cars embraces not only carload traffic which is controlled to a very great extent by shippers, but to less than carload shipments as well, the handling of which is performed by railway employees.

A few months ago a revised plan of handling of this class of traffic was inaugurated with a view to not only reducing the number of cars required but eliminating rehandling at intermediate points which took place under the old methods, and at the same time delivering the goods at destination in less time. Under this system it is anticipated that the average weight of contents of L.C.L. cars will be increased from about eleven thousand pounds as it was formerly, to at least 14,000 pounds. For the month of January, when the new system was but partially adopted the record was 12,459 pounds. This improvement in car service will mean a saving of approximately ten thousand cars per month.

The general use of interline billing of cars received attention. Under this system a car moving over two or more lines may travel through from shipping point to destination on the original billing instead of having to be held at junction points for the preparation of new papers. The adoption of the new system, while meaning radical changes in the accounting methods of some of the railways, is being placed in operation. It is estimated that the delay to cars at junction points which will be avoided is about five hundred thousand car days per annum and the elimination of this delay represents the service of 44,754 cars.

Fuel Conservation.

The efforts of the individual lines to economize in the use of coal were co-ordinated at the formation of the Association and advantageous methods which had existed on one line were circulated amongst others so that the saving in consumption might be increased.

The greatest room for fuel conservation, however, was to be found in connection with passenger services which, during a period of years, had grown through competition, and to that phase of transportation special attention was directed.

Frequent conferences of the Association's Committee on Passenger Transportation have been held, and this Committee has painstakingly analysed the services throughout the Dominion so that unnecessary or duplicate services might be dispensed with and trains on the various lines re-arranged so that reductions made would cause the minimum inconvenience to the travelling public.

Further savings in coal were made through the reduction of speed of both passenger and freight trains, discontinuance of the operation of special passenger trains, discouraging of extra passenger travel by elimination of reduced rates and excursions, fully loading freight trains and cars.

As a result of arrangements made up to this time, on a per annum basis, the reductions in passenger trains are equivalent to eight million passenger train miles, representing about four hundred thousand tons of coal, in addition to one hundred thousand tons additional through increased efficiency in the handling of freight.

Yours truly,

The Canadian Railway Association, for National Defence,
General Secretary.

In conclusion, let me say that I have taken the committee into the confidence of the Government to the fullest extent compatible with the confidential considerations which, of course, attend communications such as those with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. I have done so in the hope that the proposals which the Government has under consideration may commend themselves to the judgment of the members of this House, and not less in the hope that hon. gentlemen who may have something to suggest from their experience, from their knowledge of conditions throughout the country, and from their observation, will be good enough, either during the consideration of this Bill, or through private communications, to place those suggestions before us. We are most anxious to review the situation with all the information available at our disposal, and from every possible standpoint that may suggest itself to any hon. member.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Chairman, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, in his exposition of the railway situation of the country as it is at the present time, went back to the initiation of the policy of the Transcontinental railway in the year 1903. To be exact he should have gone much further, because the situation that we have to face to-day is very serious, not on account of the policy which was adopted in 1903 for the creation of a second transcontinental railway, nor the policy that was adopted of having a third transcontinental railway, but, as the right hon. gentleman from his very remarks showed, the situation is serious on account of one of the oldest—in fact, the oldest railway—that we have, the Grand Trunk railway itself. The Prime Minister, in his review of the situation, should have gone as far back as the year 1850, when the Grand Trunk railway was introduced in Canada. At that time railway construction in the world was still comparatively new, in fact, it had only been in existence for something like twenty years. Railway construction commenced in the world about the year 1830, in England. From that country it rapidly passed to the Continent, where it was chiefly adopted in France and the neighbouring countries, and from England and the continent of Europe it passed over to the United States. The conditions, however, between the two continents were very different, and that was shown at once in the results. In Great Britain, as well as on the continent of Europe, the distances are short and the population compact, and from the first the railways were a profitable investment, always paying more than their expenses, and yielding a large profit to the promoters. In the United States the distances were long and the population very scarce at that time, the occupied country being confined between the Atlantic ocean and the Mississippi river, and even in that territory, which now would be regarded as comparatively restricted, the population was small, over a very large area.

It is a matter of history that while construction went on very rapidly, it was always at a loss to those who ventured on these enterprises, and it is a fact borne out by history that practically the whole of the capital invested in railway construction between the Atlantic and the Mississippi river was lost over and over again. It is easy to understand that, because the population of the United States at that time was still sparse it could not furnish the traffic for the enormous mileage that it was necessary to construct. Yet the advantage of the railways to the country was always such that, though company after company went into the hands of receivers, the construction of new railways was never postponed until the new centres had been connected with the older settlements. And so it went on.

The same conditions which existed in the United States existed in Canada in an accentuated degree. We had as large a territory, and a still sparser population. In 1850, under the Hinks Administration, the Grand Trunk railway was conceived. At that time Canada consisted of Upper and Lower Canada, and extended practically between two centres of population, Quebec and Toronto. It was felt at that time that the new union of these two provinces could not be kept together unless there was railway communication, so the Grand Trunk railway was conceived and carried out. At once a condition of things came about which never existed in the United States until that country began to construct its transcontinental railways. Up to that period all railways had been constructed by private capital, without any government assistance. But it was felt in Canada that the Grand Trunk enterprise could not be carried out unless there was government assistance. The Government of the country, that is to say the people, had to put their hands in their pockets to help to construct the railway. That was the first initiation on this continent of government assistance towards railway construction. Looking back at those early events, nobody would find fault with the government of that day for having initiated the system of government assistance, because everybody realizes that unless that assistance had been given the Grand Trunk railway could not have been constructed. And not only would the country not have advanced, but it is questionable whether the country itself would have endured as a political entity or whether our population would not have drifted away to the United States. The political effect of the construction of the Grand Trunk railway was immediate. It is a matter of history that for some years before that, there had been great discontent in the provinces of United Canada. There was an annexation movement in swing, and this movement was checked largely by this first initiation of Canadian development. Shortly after that, Confederation was brought about, and one of the conditions upon which the Maritime Provinces came into Confederation was that there should be a railway connecting them with the centre of Canada. That was the initiation of the Intercolonial railway. My right hon. friend has given figures to this House of the cost of the Intercolonial railway. There is one fact which he did not state, but which is a matter of notoriety: that as a commercial enterprise it is doubtful even to-day if the Intercolonial is a financial success; and it is a matter of history also that for the first years of its existence it never paid its running expenses. Nevertheless I maintain, and nobody will dispute it, that nobody regrets the money spent on that railway, because we look at it not only from a commercial but from a national point of view, and we know that unless the Intercolonial railway had been constructed Confederation could not have been established. That was the second stage of our railway development.

Then we come to the third stage which was the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway. It was also one of the conditions of British Columbia's entry into Confederation that she should be connected with the East by a highway, and the people of British Columbia did not ask more at that time. When they came into Confederation in 1871 they requested that they should be connected with the East by a highway. But the Canadian people were not satisfied that we should have only communication by highways over the mountains, they demanded a transcontinental railway, connecting the waters of the Pacific with the tidal waters of the Atlantic. The Canadian Pacific railway was therefore undertaken and built. Though built by a company it was, in fact, built altogether at the expense of the Canadian people. The terms granted to the Canadian Pacific railway by the Government of that day have been deemed extravagant. Yet it is a fact which cannot be doubted that but for the very large aid given, the Canadian Pacific railway could not have been constructed. And, indeed, although it is claimed that the terms given to the Canadian Pacific railway were extravagant, upon more than one occasion the enterprise was near collapse, and for many years after its completion it had a very precarious existence. It has developed since largely through its good management and owing to the development of the country.

The question arose afterwards as to whether or not the country would be satisfied with only one transcontinental railway. The country was developing very fast, especially on the prairies. Settlements were opening in all directions right and left, north and south, east and west. There were settlements on the boundary and there were settlements on the northern branch of the Saskatchewan river. There were settlements in all parts of British Columbia. The Government of that day, of which I was Prime Minister, came to the conclusion that one Canadian transcontinental line would not be sufficient for the development of the country. I heard a statement made in the House some few years ago that there was no necessity for two transcontinental railways, still less for three. I beg to dissent altogether from that proposition, and my view is to compare the American situation at the present time with our situation. The United States from the Rio Grande to the Canadian boundary, extends, roughly speaking, from the 30th degree of latitude to the 49th degree of latitude. The territory of Canada extends from the 49th degree of latitude to the mouth of the Mackenzie river, in the 70th degree of latitude. That is to say, both Canada and the United States extend practically the same distance from north to south. There are in the United States to-day how many transcontinental systems? There are no fewer than seven transcontinental systems; there is the Union Pacific, which was the first to be constructed; the Northern Pacific; the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe; the Southern Pacific, and three others whose names I have not before me. At all events, I am satisfied that there are seven transcontinental systems.

Mr. CAHILL: The Great Northern is another United States transcontinental line.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The hon. gentleman is probably right, but I have not that road in my list.

If the United States has seven transcontinental systems, can it be said that three are too many for Canada? I submit that we require these transcontinental systems, but I shall refer to that more particularly in a few minutes. We may be told that the climatic conditions are not the same in the two countries. That is true, but which country suffers the more from adverse climatic conditions? To those hon. gentlemen on the other side who are dubious as to the necessity of three transcontinental railways in Canada, I would point out that between the Mississippi river and the Pacific ocean there is the great American desert, constituting a disadvantage at least equal to that which we are subjected to in Canada by reason of our climatic conditions. Moreover, we have not yet a proper conception of the vast nature of Canada's resources. We are surprised when we find trade good and resources existing where we had not expected to find them.

I direct attention to the statement made a few moments ago by the Prime Minister regarding the condition of traffic on the Transcontinental railway. It was supposed that the Transcontinental railway from Moncton to Winnipeg would be absolutely unproductive—and we are surprised that it has yielded so much. In fact, the results have been a revelation. We were under the impression that north of the Laurentian mountains, between the St. Lawrence and the Hudson bay, there was nothing but an unproductive and a barren country. It has now been established beyond doubt that this district is one of the most productive sections of the American continent, and that we have north of these mountains a new Ontario and a new Quebec. I am glad to say that settlement is going in these very rapidly; indications are that the traffic in that district will become more and more extensive.

The Transcontinental railway has not been as great a success as it might have been, and one of the reasons why the traffic on that road has not expanded more rapidly than it has is found in the death of Mr. Hays, the late general manager of the Grand Trunk railway, to whom is due the credit of the initiation of the enterprise. He was a man of great energy, resource and ability, and had he lived the railway would be more prosperous than it is at present. Indeed, his death was a national calamity.

The construction of the Canadian Northern railway was not entered upon as a national enterprise; it grew from a local undertaking until it matured into a transcontinental system. The Prime Minister said a moment ago that that railway had as great a future as any railway in Canada. I say that it has as great a future as any railway on the continent of America. That may be a broad assertion, but it is to be remembered that there is no better land on the whole continent than that between the cities of Edmonton and Winnipeg; every foot of the Canadian Northern line between those cities is revenue-producing. From Winnipeg to the head of the lakes, the railway, after leaving the city of Winnipeg, passes through a marshy land which may not be productive now, but which will be productive later on. Then it enters the valley of the Rainy river, one of the best sections of country on the continent. Leaving the head of lake Superior the line does not follow the lake, because of the district being barren and rocky, but enters the clay belt, which will probably be productive. From Sudbury to Ottawa, from Ottawa to Montreal and from Montreal to Quebec the line passes through a good country. Undoubtedly, therefore, the Canadian Northern railway system has a great future. I am not disposed to criticise the promoters of this enterprise, Mackenzie and Mann. They displayed great energy and great enterprise, and I firmly believe that but for the war they would have brought the road to satisfactory completion. When the Government proposed to acquire the road I did not object, because I thought that the property was a good one; the only question was as to the terms under which it should be acquired. That is the view which I take of the whole situation.

[Sir Wilfrid Laurier.]

The Government now proposes to launch into a new enterprise, that of acquiring the Grand Trunk railway itself. The history of the Grand Trunk railway is not a satisfactory one. The Grand Trunk has been in existence about sixty years. It passes through one of the best parts of the American continent, undoubtedly through the best part of Ontario; it ought to be and it is productive. If it is not as profitable or prosperous an enterprise as it should have been, that is due to two things. First, the management has always been in London, England. In my judgment, no greater mistake could have been made. It is inconceivable that the management of a great railway system, covering almost the whole of this continent, could be satisfactorily carried on from the city of London. Second, the system has been overloaded with bad securities. That the Grand Trunk railway system can be made a profitable enterprise I have no doubt. I do not pretend to be an expert in these matters, but, applying the ordinary principles of common sense; looking on the advantages enjoyed by this railway, its splendid location, its line from the great centre of Chicago to the fine harbour of Portland, I think that the Grand Trunk railway system should be productive of good results and profitable returns. For the present I do not condemn the idea of taking this railway over; everything depends on the terms. But I warn the members of the Government that if they acquire that property they will find it loaded with absolutely unproductive and utterly worthless securities. In this condition may be found the great danger of such negotiations as my right hon. friend has suggested. But since the Government contemplate taking this step, I shall not condemn it at this time. The idea is one which deserves consideration, and I, therefore, would not go further than that.

The only thing as to which I am disappointed in the statement made by my right hon. friend is that the has been very vague in regard to the organization under which he is going to place the present Canadian Northern railway. We heard yesterday that the Government, before re-organizing the Canadian Northern railway, were waiting for the receipt of the report of the arbitrators as to the price to be paid for the stock of that enterprise. Why wait for that? What more information than the Government has to-day will it have when it receives the award of the arbitrators? Today, under the terms of the Act which was passed last year, the Government is the absolute owner of the Canadian Northern railway. We purchased the stock. The purchase price was not paid because the amount had not been fixed. The question as to the amount of the purchase price was referred to arbitration by the two parties, to the contract. But the contract was made by the two parties, and, therefore, to-day we are the absolute owners of the Canadian Northern, and the question whether the amount that we have to pay for the stock be large or small, is of no concern whatever. As the owners of the Canadian Northern railway, if we are to make full use of it, we ought immediately to re-organize and operate it. I cannot see that it is good or sound policy to wait until we know how we stand as to the price we have to pay. We should go on with the reorganization at once. The Prime Minister, in speaking of the re-organization, spoke upon a subject which everybody has in mind, that is to say, that we should keep that enterprise free from political patronage. Political patronage has been the bane of railway administration in Canada. I do not blame one party more than the other for that. The former Liberal Government did their best to eliminate political patronage, and while I do not say that we succeeded completely in eliminating it, we made a good deal of reform. If political patronage is to be eliminated from railway administration in Canada—and my right hon. friend has particularly insisted upon that point,—the plan which he has suggested does not seem to be conducive of that result. If you have any board of directors which is appointed by the Government, you will not eliminate political patronage.

May I make a suggestion to my right hon. friend, and to the other members of the Government, as to a method of eliminating patronage? The city of Washington, district of Columbia, is federal property; it is not a state. It does not form part of the Union; it is independent territory. It is, I understand, extremely well administered. I have never heard of graft of any kind, nor have I heard of political patronage, in the administration of the city of Washington. In years past I frequently had to visit that city, and my right hon. friend has in recent years had to go there very often, but I have not heard, and I do not think he has ever heard anything but commendation of the administration of the city of Washington, D.C. How is it administered? It is administered by a commission composed of three commissioners, one appointed by the party in office, the second by the party in opposition, and the third is an officer of the army. The Uunited States army was never a very numerous body, but it is well known that its staff of officers is a very highly cultured and fine body of men with a high sense of honour and absolutely honest. I do not know by whom the third commissioner, an officer of the army, is appointed. I think he is appointed by the President. Be this as it may, this is a body which is absolutely non-political. As to the elimination of patronage from railway administration in Canada, if patronage is to be eliminated—and every hon. member in this House either wants or, because the opinion of the people behind him is so strong, at least pretends that he wants to eliminate patronage,—I do not know of any system which would come nearer to the elimination of patronage than such a system which I have just suggested.

I have this observation to make in regard to the financial part of the information which has been given by my right hon. friend. He stated that he wanted to have a balance sheet which he could understand. Balance sheets of every kind are always somewhat difficult to understand by those who are not initiated into the business, but I do not believe the balance sheet that my right hon. friend has laid before us gives us much more enlightenment than the balance sheets we have had before. They may be understood by the initiated, but I do not understand them. The figures which have to-day been given by my right hon. friend may perhaps agree with the figures which have been given before, but I see some discrepancies which I cannot reconcile, and which, I hope, will, in the course of this debate, be reconciled. The other day the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) gave a statement as to the necessity of the Bill, which we now have before us for our immediate consideration, to provide for the payment of passing liabilities which are maturing during the present year. The Acting Minister of Finance makes this statement which is to be found at page 1772 of Hansard:

> I have already given a list of the short term maturities for this year, but in order that it may be before the House in a complete and consecutive form, I shall read the list of securities of the railway maturing this year:

Canadian Northern Railway System,
Statement of Short Term Loans,
March 1st, 1918.

No.	Maturity.	Loan made by or through.	Amount.
1.	Demand.	Dominion Government, Canada	$10,000,000
2.	Demand.	Can. Bank of Commerce, Canada	5,889,066
3.	Demand.	Can. Bank of Commerce, London	10,074,408
4.	Demand.	Can. Bank of Commerce, Canada	1,250,000

15.	Jan. 10, 1919.	Wm. A. Read & Co., New York	1,250,000
			$55,437,274

These are short term loans, I understand, coming due this year. I have not studied very closely the blue book that was laid on the Table last year entitled "Financial Statements respecting the Canadian Northern Railway System and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway" but in a cursory examination of it I have not been able to find any amount owing to Lazard Brothers, Read & Company, and so on. Are these new loans or old loans, and when do they fall due? Have they been contracted within the last year or before that?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They are old loans. Some of them have been renewed. The indebtedness is the same.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I repeat, I am unable to find in the statement of liabilities of the Canadian Northern any amount due to Lazard Brothers or to Read & Company. If I am mistaken, I should like to be corrected. Yesterday I complained that the information we had was very insufficient. It has been supplemented to a certain extent, but we require more yet. In the Bill that passed this House last year the same authority was given to the Government that is now sought, of > Paying and settling any indebtedness of such company or postponing the payment thereof on such terms as may be agreed upon, and for such purposes may make advances out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund; Provided, however, that until authorized by Parliament, the total of such advances shall not exceed the sum of twenty-five million dollars.

But no limit is set in the Bill before us this year. We are told that $55,000,000 is to be provided in the way of renewals or payment of loans, but there is no hint of this in the Bill. Let me read the clause:

> The five-sixths of the shares mentioned in section three of chapter twenty-four of the statutes of Canada for the year 1917, having been transferred as required by said Act, the Governor in Council may from time to time assist the Canadian Northern Railway Company or any Company included in the Canadian Northern Railway System in renewing or postponing the payment of any indebtedness of any such company, on such terms as may be agreed on, by guaranteeing in whole or part the payment thereof with interest on the notes or obligations given for such renewal or postponement: Provided that the amount of principal to be so guaranteed from time to time shall not exceed the amount of the indebtedness the payment of which is from time to time renewed or postponed.

That sets no limit on the amount the Government is authorized to pay.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It does not authorize us to pay anything.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It authorizes the renewal of notes or the postponement of the payment of indebtedness. What are the liabilities which are to be renewed or postponed? Are there others beyond what are mentioned in the statement I have here?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Liabilities which come due between now and the next session of Parliament.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What are they?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They are given on page 1772 of Hansard of this year.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is all?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is nothing more, I understand. The liabilities amount to $67,000,000 altogether.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Bill then simply provides authority for renewals on terms that may be agreed upon?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Upon the best terms that we can make.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understand that all these items are contained in the statement given by the Minister of Finance, and that the total amount of the short-term loans to be renewed is $55,437,274.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My right hon. friend will find that some further maturities are mentioned just after that statement, bringing the total up to $67,360,607.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is not quite clear. What is it that we are committing ourselves to? The first item on the list is a loan made by the Dominion Government of $10,000,000. There will be no renewal of that, I suppose. I want to take exception to a statement my right hon. friend made in the course of his observations, when he said that we had limited the award to be made by the Board of Arbitration inquiring into the value of the Canadian Northern Railway stock to a maximum of $10,000,000. I would observe that that statement was not accurate. There is nothing to that effect in the statute, which simply provides that we shall pay the amount determined by the arbitrators.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: But not more than $10,000,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is not in the statute. My right hon. friend has since had an Order in Council passed limiting the amount to $10,000,000, but no such provision appears in the statute and my right hon. friend had no authority to pass such an Order in Council.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That provision is in the arbitration agreement.

Sir WILFID LAURIER: That may be, but I was going on to say that we had not been informed of that. I have seen the Order in Council limiting the maximum to $10,000,000, but by what authority did the Government arrive at that figure? What right had the Government to say that the award shall be for $10,000,000 or less than that? The stock may be worth $20,000,000 or only $5,000,000. I repeat, the Government had no authority whatever to pass that Order in Council or to make such an agreement as that. It was a violation of the statute by which the Government was bound to accept the award of the board of arbitration. If the Government thought the award should be limited to $10,000,000, they should have received authority to set that limit, and I submit very respectfully that under the statute they had no authority whatever to fix any limit at all.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think it was a very wise thing to fix a maximum beyond which the country should not be called upon to pay. I might observe to my right hon. friend that we fixed it at just one-third the amount he proposed four years ago.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Nothing of the kind. That is an old story.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: An old story, but a true one.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What about the Drayton report which said the stock was valueless?

Mr. CAHILL: In the statement of liabilities of the Canadian Northern given by the Prime Minister he quoted among other items $25,000,000 of debenture stock. I understood him to say that the country was not liable for that amount if the railway company was not earning interest on it. Am I correct in that assumption?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is correct. When there are surplus earnings they have to be paid.

Mr. CAHILL: That is, not a direct liability of the company?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is not cumulative.

Mr. CAHILL: What would be the meaning of this: In addition to the maturities just mentioned there are securities maturing in August and January amounting in all to $12,000,000 debenture stock. The debenture stock, included in this item is as I understand to be paid out of earnings unless there is some provision about which we do not know.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is a different stock.

Mr. CAHILL: Where does this different stock appear in the balance sheet?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In the funded debt.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the difference between the stocks? Why is one put in the funded debt and the other not in the funded debt?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: One is a liability and the other is only a liability in the sense that I mention.

Mr. CAHILL: Of course, it is a liability in every sense. If it is not cumulative as to the interest obligation it comes in prior to the common stock and, therefore, if the Dominion Government own the common stock of the Canadian Northern railway, they naturally are liable for this $25,000,000.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If they earn it.

Mr. CAHILL: If they do not earn the interest on that $25,000,000 the holders of that stock, unless there is some special arrangement, which I doubt very much, would become the proprietors of the road if they so desired. They have a first lien ahead of the common stock of the company and in that case they would become owners of the road. Am I correct in that?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I thought I made the matter pretty plain. Of course, that stock is ahead of the common stock; it is perpetual stock. The interest on it is payable if there are earnings sufficient for the purpose. If there are not earnings sufficient for the purpose then it is not cumulative.

Mr. CAHILL: Is there provision made to pay the interest on this stock now? Has the interest been paid? If it has not been paid, of course it is understood that the holders of this $25,000,000 worth of stock would control the road if they so desired. They either demand payment from the common shareholders, or they take control of the road unless the stock has some special contract attached to it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am informed that up to two years ago the interest was paid, because the earnings of the road were sufficient.

Mr. CAHILL: So that the Government, as owners of this road, will have to take care of the interest on this $25,000,000, or pay off the debt; otherwise these people will come back on the owners of the road and say: "If you do not pay the interest we will take the road."

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not understand what my hon. friend means by saying that they will become the owners of the road. If the Government fulfils the conditions upon which this stock was issued, the persons who hold it have no complaint. If the earnings are enough to pay the interest, the interest must be paid. If the earnings are not enough, then the interest is not paid. The persons who own the stock have no remedy. Further than that the interest is not cumulative, as I have explained more than once.

Mr. CAHILL: If the interest is not paid, as prior stockholders, they must come in as owners of the road.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CAHILL: We were discussing the relative value of debenture stock when the House rose at six o'clock. I have here a statement of the annual meeting of the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, in which the president, Lord Shaughnessy, says:

> In order to avoid this undesirable situation the Company decided, with the consent of Parliament, to utilize consolidated debenture stock for the purchase or conversion of existing bonds, and to provide funds for building or acquiring such additional mileage as might appear to be required from time to time for the advantage of the country and the company. This consolidated debenture stock is perpetual and irredeemable, differing from a mortgage bond in that it gives no right of foreclosure in the event of default. The holders have a first claim on the revenues of the company for their semi-annual dividends after the working expenses and taxes or fines have been paid, and the contract demands of existing bondholders have been satisfied. If by any chance the company failed to pay, within a fixed period, the dividend accrued on the consolidated debenture stock the holders of that stock would become the Shareholders of the company and would control its affairs until the default was made good, when the property would automatically pass back to the preference and ordinary shareholders.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it may be in this case that there is an agreement between the makers of this debenture stock and the holders on some special basis, or some special arrangement may have been made, but there is no question but that the debenture stock is a liability of the company, and such being the case the total liabilities of the Canadian Northern Railway Company would stand at $438,000,000. The Prime Minister this afternoon, if I heard him aright, made the statement that the road was valued by the Drayton-Acworth Commission at $497,000,000. I have here the report of that commission and it is strange that we can find so many conflicting figures in the same report. The Prime Minister explained this afternoon that he is not familiar with figures, and had a statement prepared which is practically the same as the one I gave to the House yesterday as to the liabilities of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, but he did not quite agree with me as to the cost of the road. The Drayton-Acworth report states:

The property investment of the Canadian Northern Railway System is stated in the balance sheet of June 30, 1916, at $494,112,489.34. This figure admittedly has been written up to include $100,000,000 of capital stock. And this stock, as we have already said, was issued without any cash consideration. We have endeavoured to ascertain the actual cost of the system. From the company's official reports and special statements supplied to us we have ascertained that the actual cash investment that can have been made in the property is $383,302,451.33.

From this total maximum of $383,302,451 we deduct the following items, which the company has included in cost of road and equipment, but which do not represent investment in property:

1. Advance to controlled companies to pay indebtedness for interest subsequent to construction and operating deficits which were capitalized when the system was put together, not less than ..	$10,000,000
2. Interest during 1916 overcharged to construction, not less than.	3,000,000
	$13,000,000

I would like to point out to the committee this particular item:

Leaving for investment in road and equipment and in securities of constituent and subsidiary companies, $370,302,451.

The Prime Minister pointed out this afternoon that the cost of reproduction was found to be $479,000,000, but we are told there was a depreciation of $40,000,000. The Prime Minister did not use the same figures as quoted, but adopted the item of $397,000,000, and added to that the cost of equipment. According to the Drayton-Acworth report, the total investment in the undertaking was $370,000,000. I will read a little further from the Drayton-Acworth report:

Physical basis.

But money cost is not all. We decided also to ascertain the approximate value, on the basis of reproduction cost, of the property as it exists to-day. And we rely on Professor Swain's valuation for this purpose. This valuation is, in his opinion, a liberal estimate of the fair cost of reproducing new, at pre-war prices of labour and material, the system at present existing.

It includes property belonging to the system at its estimated cost, if it had to be acquired or constructed to-day.

That is, allowing the unearned increment or the increase in the probable cost of the land as if purchased at this date.

And therefore it not only gives the company credit for lands which it in fact owns, even though it obtained them as a grant; but it also credits the company with the increment of land values since the date of the original acquisition. And these two items are quite large.

Prof. Swain's method of arriving at his results are fully explained in his report, which is printed as an appendix hereto. He makes the total cost of reproduction new, $397,441,567. From this he deducts for depreciation $40,031,889, making the cost of reproduction of the property in its present condition $357,409,678. This, however, does not include equipment. The equipment was inspected by Mr. Buchanan, and, on the basis of his report as to quantities and condition, a valuation has been made by Mr. W. H. Chadbourn, C.E., chief engineer of our valuation staff. He finds the cost of reproduction new at pre-war prices to be $56,590,418, and the depreciation to be $11,250,433, making the present value $45,339,985. Putting the two valuations together, we have $402,749,663 as the fair cost of reproducing the entire physical Canadian Northern system in its present condition. Now the outstanding liabilities (bonds, debentures, notes, and bank and other loans) of the company exceed $400,000,000.

Reckoning on this basis, it appears that the liabilities are practically equal to the reproduction cost of the physical property.

In the statement which I furnished to the House yesterday, I said the liabilities represented $437,000,000. The Prime Minister this afternoon said they were $438,000,000. The maximum possible cost according to the Drayton-Acworth report is $370,000,000. Now the Dominion of Canada gave to the Canadian Northern subsidies of land and cash of about $75,000,000, of which $38,800,000 was in cash. Deducting the amount of subsidies from the $370,000,000, we find that the total investment has been $295,000,000. Setting this off against the liabilities, there would be left a promoters' profit of $142,000,000. The Prime Minister states the mileage at 10,000 miles, which, divided into $437,000,000, would be about $44,000 a mile. But the mileage is not actually as great as 10,000 miles, and the actual cost is about $46,000 per mile. In giving his statement of the cost of other railroads, the Prime Minister did not see fit to give the valuation of the Canadian Pacific railway, which I think would be a better criterion. The Intercolonial railway, as hon. gentlemen know, was built as a political proposition, the purpose being to join up the several provinces. The total capitalization of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's transportation system, comprising 13,400 miles of railway in Canada operated directly by the company, with the rolling stock equipment and steamboat craft on inland waters, its splendid terminal stations and facilities, and other accessories, is $623,000,000, or $46,000 per mile.

I think it is quite apparent, at least to all the western members, that the Canadian Northern in no way compares with the Canadian Pacific railway as a going concern or as a railroad proposition. The Canadian Pacific railway from the head of the Lakes westward has a thousand miles of double track. It has magnificent hotels, excellent terminal facilities, ample yard room at Quebec, Ottawa, Montreal and other cities; there is no comparison between this railway and the others in the matter of terminals, roadbeds or rails. Yet we are asked to assume a liability equal to the capitalization of the Canadian Pacific; we are asked to assume $46,000 per mile.

I do not believe members of this committee wish to go back into the political history of the railroad situation in this country. We have a situation here to face. The previous Parliament assumed obligations of $437,000,000, and there is a farce being carried on in Toronto to-day, called an arbitration board, to arrive at the value of a worthless stock, a stock that is not only worthless, but which carries with it a liability of something like $147,000,000 of unguaranteed securities. We have been asking for the names of the people who are getting this money. It would appear from the statement that there is a profit of $140,000,000 to the promoters. There is also over $140,000,000 of unguaranteed securities. We are furnished with a statement of the $25,000,000 which was paid last year to the Canadian Northern. That furnishes no information whatever to this Committee. We paid out of one pocket into the other. But we want to know where this money finally landed, who got it, who are the people holding the unguaranteed securities; what relation do they stand in to the promoters of this road, to the Mackenzie and Mann people. It is not furnishing information to the Committee to say that we paid to the Canadian Northern $25,000,000, and paid it out in amounts of $2,000,000, $12,000,000 or $15,000,000. That is simply playing the same old game. The Canadian Northern paid to Mackenzie and Mann, and Mackenzie and Mann to the Northern Construction Company, and the Northern Construction Company back to Mackenzie and Mann. We do not want that condition to continue. If we have assumed the liabilities of the Canadian Northern Railway system, let us put the cards on the table, take our loss, and proceed to have this railroad organized in a business way, so that we can run the road to the best possible advantage to the country and to the railroad itself. Mackenzie and Mann cannot possibly have any interest in the proper operation of this road; they have no interest whatever in making dividends on this road now. I cannot conceive how the Government are taking away from a certain syndicate a railroad system, and at the same time leaving the same people in charge of its management. We are told we have acquired the stock and the ownership. The question of the details of settlement of what we are to pay, not exceeding $10,000,000 for 600,000 shares of stock, has nothing whatever to do with the management of the road. If the Government are sincere in the matter, the first thing they should consider is the management. The question of arbitration has nothing whatever to do with Mackenzie and Mann. As soon as the decision to take it over was arrived at, there should have been put in control of the road independent people, who would take it and develop it for the benefit of the country. I do not know what the directors of this road get, but I can easily understand that the Mackenzie and Mann ring would be willing to pay not less than $1,000,000 a year to be left in charge of it, for the side issues, the subsidiary companies. Where do they buy coal? Who is doing the construction? We were told there was $11,000,000 expended last year in extensions. There was no mention made of that until to-day.

We were told by the Minister of Railways that there were no extensions and no new undertakings. The cost of the road to the country has increased from $13,000,000 to $15,000,000 within the last year. It would have been better if we had paid the Mackenzie and Mann outfit $10,000,000 last year and got rid of them and put some person in charge of the road to manage it as a going concern. If the Prime Minister thinks that the people are willing to maintain Mackenzie and Mann in control of that road he is very much mistaken. There is great value in the road; it runs through good territory and can be made a paying concern, but if we leave it in charge of men who exploit it for their own personal gain the country will have to stand the loss. I cannot understand why we should wait for an arbitration board to determine whether we are to pay $9,000,000 or $10,000,000 for this road, and still leave the same people in charge of it. Before any member of this committee would make an investment in any undertaking he would want to know who the management were and what their policy was. In this case we are paying out money and taking no interest whatever in the management of the undertaking. As a matter of fact, I do not know what we are voting this money for; no explanation has been given. The first item is for a payment to the Dominion Government, and there is another item for payment of debenture stock. I always understood that debenture stock was not redeemable; that it was perpetual. If there is an understanding with the owners of the stock that $12,000,000 of it is to be redeemed this year we should know who these owners are, what their relation is to the Mackenzie and Mann outfit, and on what terms this money is being paid. I do not believe that a cent has ever been paid for this debenture stock; most likely it has been given as a bonus to some bondholders, who should be willing to wait for the interest on their investment. Let us work this proposal out to the best possible advantage on behalf of the people. Let us quit trying to fool ourselves or any person else with regard to our obligation in the matter. It is useless for us to say that this is not a direct obligation; of course, it is an obligation on the country, which will add just so much to our debt. We should have a full detailed report with regard to the company and its liabilities and with regard to the subsidiary companies and their liabilities, so that we shall know what we are doing.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: I believe that I voice the feelings of the men from the West when I say that we received with a great deal of satisfaction the declaration of the Prime Minister this evening. We regret, however, that he was not more pronounced in certain respects. We should have been better pleased had he stated outright that it was the policy of the Government to adopt the principle of public ownership, not only of railways but of all other great means of transportation. We regret that we must wait until a time which is not defined for the Government to take control and operation of the road in question. I do not doubt that these matters have received serious consideration and that the ministers must be worried about them, but the people are also worried; they are wondering what the end of it all will be. Instead of waiting for any commission to declare that the stock of these gentlemen is worth $10,000,000 or less, I would declare that they are entitled to a ten-year penitentiary sentence. I do not know why they should be retained in the service of the country for any great length of time, unless it be for the benefit of succeeding ages; that is, to allow these gentlemen sufficient time for their financial morality to become so corrupt that it will cease to be contagious. We have heard a number of statements about the calamitous circumstances which have brought about the present railway situation, but nothing has been said in a definite way as to why we should adopt the principle of the public ownership of railways and of the great means of transportation in Canada. We find the railway situation to be deplorable, indeed, and we propose that the Government shall do certain things, not because any principle has been enunciated because a set of circumstances makes it impossible to do otherwise. I wish to deal this evening with the principle of public ownership. I shall endeavour to show that it is the right principle to adopt for western conditions, and I will defy contradiction so far as the principle is concerned. I shall, at the same time, endeavour to show that this is the method which ought to be adopted in order to bring the East and the West closer together.

First, it is necessary thoroughly to understand the reason there is for the adoption of the public ownership of railways. We are convinced, having regard to the whole economic condition of Canada and the enormous freight and passenger rates which prevail, that the proportion of wealth which passes into the hands of private corporations is altogether too great. That fundamentally underlies the adoption of the principle of public ownership of railways, and it is our duty to examine that principle and see whether it will accomplish the object in view.

It is evident that there are two ways of reducing the cost of living, especially to the western people. These two methods differ essentially. The first I call patriotic, and the second I call unpatriotic. The one which I have designated as unpatriotic is the one which was advocated by the Opposition when they were in power, but which they did not dare to carry out during their whole period of administration. I refer to the abolition of protective tariff, upon which the industries of the East exist, and without which they cannot exist. A protective tariff which operates to the advantage of the eastern manufacturers operates equally to the disadvantage of the western farmers. But there is a compensating advantage to the western farmer. It creates for him a national, a Canadian, market, for his western produce. The removal of the protective tariff system which has been so successful in building up the eastern provinces, would be a betrayal of the confidence of those who have invested their capital in protected industries. Whatever modification may in the future take place in the tariff, it must be based upon the consideration of existing industries and be fair to the interests of both the producer and the consumer. That, however, would be one method of reducing the cost of living to the western farmer; of increasing the reward paid to the man on the plains who forms the basis and foundation of the growth and progress of the West. That is the method which I have designated as unpatriotic, because it involves the placing of East and West in opposition, and creating economic factors of the people east and west of the lakes.

The other method of decreasing the cost of living is by cheapening transportation facilities, and it is here that I believe the declaration of the Premier lacks strength. He told us there would be public ownership of certain railways now. He indicated that, at a time not far distant, the Grand Trunk Pacific would become part of the Government Railway system. He also stated that the Grand Trunk would also, at some future time, become part of that system, and he gave us the idea that in the very distant future the Canadian Pacific must also necessarily be one of the railways included in that system of public ownership. The principle of public ownership is the cheapening rates in transportation, both passenger and freight, and I cannot see how, unless we declare for public ownership of all means of transportation in this country, we shall arrive at the object of public ownership of railways. The second method, therefore, of reducing the cost of living, and particularly to the western man, is Government ownership, and Government ownership of the great vehicles of transportation is one which has for its end a more patriotic and beneficial object than the abolition of the tariff. I want to deal with the principles underlying Government ownership and operation of railways, and to show how a Government is far better situated than a private corporation to supply the transportation needs of a people. Those who have evinced disbelief in public ownership usually speak as though the present operation and control of railways were the most perfect conceivable, and they imply that the utter corruptness and dishonesty of politicians make the control of a vast number of men and the working of a great department out of the question. All such arguments are against the dishonesty of our politicians and not against the principle of public ownership of railways. Let us first consider this issue. Are our politicians at Ottawa more corrupt and dishonest than the heads of our great corporations? I deny utterly that they are, and this afternoon the Prime Minister stated that, in order that political patronage might be removed, an independent board would be constituted, and he emphasized the fact that it would be absolutely separate and that there would be no interference with it whatever. I deny that our politicians at Ottawa are more corrupt than the heads of private corporations. We apply to our men in public life tests far more searching than those which we apply to our great so-called captains of industry. If we turned upon the heads of corporations the same light that we turn upon politicians, the result would be something astounding. To digress, I may say that all I have to do is to point to what has happened in the United States in recent months, or in the last year and a half, and you have the answer there—private corporations and scandals. As for the patrons of industries who are supposed to be so honest, their contribution to the advancement of this country has mainly consisted in gazing sleepily through the windows of a private car at the laying out of stations and town-sites by the actual railroad pioneers, and in abstracting profits which rightfully belonged to the people of Canada. In addition to this consideration of their usefulness, there has been a tremendous amount of land subsidies and money subsidies, and other assistance of one sort or another, and that is what has brought about the condition which exists to-day and which compelled the Premier to make the declaration which he did this afternoon. Consequently the proposition before us is this—had we not better build and operate our own lines of transportation than furnish the financial strength and backing to others to do it, and permit them to rob us unduly and deny us any say as to what the rates shall be?

No one really believes that the operation of railways by private corporations is a perfect policy. Between cheap freight and passenger rates and large dividends there is a wide divergence, and the creation of a railway commission is sufficient proof that the Government is aware that private corporations cannot serve their own interest and that of the people at one and the same time. The creation of the Railway Commission was a virtual declaration in favour of state control of railways.

I wish to give the House a few facts as to why we should stop pursuing the policy which has been adopted by both parties in Canada, and why it is time that we should now adopt a policy of public ownership of railways. Up to June, 1916, assuming that the money represented by bonds and consolidated debenture stock was actually invested in railways in Canada, the total would be $1,045,608,331. This information is to be found at page X11 of the Blue Book for 1916. The figures for 1917 have been prepared, but not printed, and the information which I received from Mr. J. L. Payne, the comptroller, was that the figures for 1917 would not be materially altered, except to increase the bonded indebtedness of railways by about $50,000,000, which is a mere trifle in these days. The amount of common stock outstanding in 1916 was $848,269,448. This information is also to be found at page X11 of the Blue Book of 1916. The total is $1,893,877,819. This is without taking into consideration the $50,000,000 of which I spoke a moment ago. In addition to these sums, the Dominion Government, provincial governments, municipalities and other sources have given cash aid as follows:

The Dominion	$184,719,627 88
The Provinces	37,437,895 68
The Municipalities	17,914,836 40
Total	$240,072,359 96

These figures do not take into consideration the purchase of the Grand Trunk Pacific bonds, aggregating $33,116,000, by the Government, nor do they take into consideration that the Dominion has constructed and now operates the eastern division of the Transcontinental railway, upon which, up to March 31, 1916, there had been an expenditure of $156,701,210. It would be interesting to know the difference between these billions of capital and the actual cost of the roads, with a fair profit for promotion and construction. Hearsay evidence establishes that about twenty-five per cent goes to promotion; that is to say, that Canadians are paying, in the shape of freight and passenger rates, interest on a tremendous amount of money which never went into the actual building of railways.

It has been the claim of the Liberal party that competition in transportation facilities is the cure for all evils of rates which appear to be too exorbitant. To this I desire to take exception. Competition only aggravates the existing evils of western transportation. Let me explain. Canada possesses more mileage in proportion to its population than any other country in the world.

One mile of steel exists to every twenty-seven inhabitants of this land, and when we consider that this includes the more densely peopled provinces of the East one naturally wonders what the country consisting of the four provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia possesses in the way of miles of steel per head of the population. The figures of these provinces is given in this volume of statistics, pages 25 and 26, as follows:—

	Miles.
Manitoba	4,309.59
Saskatchewan	5,378.33
Alberta	3,894.18
British Columbia	3,604.00

Despite these astounding figures, however, the West has less railway mileage to its area than any other part of the country. And it is right here that the waste of competition is apparent. Great tracks of country lie untapped by railway service while our uneconomic friends, the Liberal party, preach the policy of constructing duplicate tracks paralleling one another for miles. Where the entire country might be served by one line, we have three, and a difficulty with regard to reasonable freight rates is created by the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific which will not be overcome for generations. The fault of railway companies in this country has not been alone that they overcharged for their service, it is a fault far more subtle than that, it is the fault that railroads are not constructed with a view to supplying the country's needs, but are largely constructed on guaranteed loans or money subsidies with an insane idea as to competition.

Let us consider further this question of competition. Mill, the great English economist in his famous and monumental work Principles of Political Economy, in what is considered the best chapters of that work, The Cost of Production, lays down the proposition that there is a limit, sternly and rigidly defined by economic law, to the extent to which competition can cheapen the commodity. That limit, he declares, is the cost to produce the commodity, paying a living wage to the labourers involved, a rate of interest to the capital invested equal to what the average of the money market will afford, and the cost of the maintenance of the capital involved. Below that economic line it is impossible to go, for should it be exceeded, capital is at once withdrawn from the production of the commodity, and the condition rights itself by the scarcity of the commodity due to that withdrawal.

Now this applies to the transportation cost in the West. The price of freight cannot sink below the cost of the maintenance of the roads, plus the wages of the labourers employed, plus a fair rate of interest on the invested capital. It stands to reason, therefore, that railway competition, which means the striving of two railroads for traffic which one of them can easily accommodate, is no cure for the railway question in the West.

Right here I wish to take exception to the attempt made by the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) this afternoon to justify three transcontinental lines in this country by calling attention to what has taken place in the United States. First of all, we have no evidence as to what conditions were in the United States when those roads were constructed, as compared with the conditions in Canada when our transcontinental lines were constructed. But what we do know is that so far as Canada is concerned the principle enunciated by Mill has not been followed in the construction of our railways but the same principle applied then as applies now. We have three roads to carry the traffic which one road could very well carry. Furthermore, if my information is correct, only two roads in the United States received financial assistance from the State, all the other roads having been built by private enterprise. In this country, financial assistance has been given to all the roads.

What the West wants is control of rates, and an abundance of freight and passenger traffic going over one line, for the greater the freight to the mile of railway, the easier it will be to meet all the necessary costs, and reduce freight rates. Control of freight rates, the reasonable construction of railways, with a view to tapping the widest exent of country, can only be effectively accomplished by Government ownership.

I come now to the great and supreme reason for the Government ownership of railways. First, I desire to say, as I have in a more or less indefinite way already said, that private ownership has not given us the railways which traverses our widely stretched territory to-day. All we have in the nature of railway accommodation to-day we have in virtue of the collective credit of the people, by the will of their appointed representatives. The Canadian Pacific, by far the most creditable railway undertaking in the country, was an impossibility but for the money loan of $29,880,912; the land grant alone was 31,762,054 acres.
