OFFICIAL REPORT

Monday, April 29, 1918.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

A return containing copies of letters and telegrams between the Dominion Government and the Provincial Executives concerning the Order in Council of December 22, 1917, respecting the sale of securities by provincial, colonial, or foreign governments, municipalities, or other bodies.—Hon. Mr. Burrell.

A return showing payment to certain newspapers since October 1, 1917.—Hon. Mr. Burrell.

A return giving the names of the officers employed on the staff in Military District No. 5, the salaries paid to them, services performed, etc.—Hon. Mr. Burrell.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr F. H. KEEFER (Port Arthur and Kenora) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 68, to amend the Dominion Elections Act.

He said: The object of the Bill is to enable labouring men on railways at the divisional points to have their votes registered on election day. In my own riding, where there are so many terminal railway points, a very large number of railway men are disfranchised because they have either to neglect their duty and lay off to vote, or proceed on duty without going to the polling place. The principle of the Bill is one, I am sure, that will commend itself to, and enlist the support of all the members of the House. I hope the Government will, if not during the present session, at any rate during next session, propose a measure and press it through Parliament, which will enable the most representative class of Canadians to have a voice in the election of members to this Parliament thoroughly workable. The Bill as I have framed it is more especially adapted to conditions in my own riding, and I am afraid it would not work in this part of the country, where a railway man starts out and before his run finishes gets into another riding. This Bill simply provides for conditions in my own riding where a man can cast his vote so that he will not be disfranchised.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 69, to amend the Criminal Code. He said:

The Bill proposes to amend certain sections of the Criminal Code. The first of these amending sections deals with offences against morals. It is proposed to amend section 211 of the Criminal Code as it now stands by making it a criminal offence to seduce or have illicit connection with any girl of previously chaste character, of or above the age of sixteen years and under the age of eighteen years. As the law at present stands this offence consists in having illicit intercourse with a girl over the age of fourteen years and under the age of sixteen. By the change the age of the girl against whom such an offence may be committed is raised.

The section further provides that proof that a girl has had on a previous occasion illicit connections with the accused shall not be deemed to be proof that she was not of previously chaste character; and by a subsection of the section it is provided that no male person under the age of 21 shall be prosecuted for an offence under its provisions. In view of the raising of the age of the young woman, it was considered that there should be some protection for the young man.

The second provision of the Bill proposes to amend that section which now makes it an offence for certain classes of employers, or persons in authority, to have connection with young women, so as to extend it to all persons occupying the relation of employer, or being in positions analogous to those presently dealt with.

Mr. BUREAU: What are the classes under the present section?

Mr. DOHERTY: There are different classes of employment specified, but the principal class are girls employed in factories, or workshops and business establishments of that kind. The proposed amendment extends the classification so as to cover any person occupying the position of employer of the girl whom he might be charged with having seduced or having had illicit connection with.

The third section makes it a criminal offence to have illicit connection with, or carnally know any girl under the age of ten, and above the age of fourteen, not being his wife and where he believes her to be above the age of sixteen years. This change, in effect, raising the age of consent from fourteen to sixteen, and making it an offence to carnally know any girl under fourteen years of age. To the several penalties that are provided for that offence it is proposed to add a subsection making it an offence to carnally know any girl between the age of fourteen and sixteen, but subjecting the offender to a penalty not so severe as in a case where the girl is under fourteen years of age.

The next provision is to introduce a section to be known as 221A, making it a criminal offence for persons not being married to register as man and wife at hotels, lodging houses, boarding houses, or places of public resort.

Another provision introduces into the Criminal Code, a section which has been enacted in the Juvenile Delinquency Act of the province of Ontario, and has been found to be exceedingly useful there.

The courts, however, have recently held that it was in substance legislation of the nature of criminal law, and the enactment as contained in the provincial legislation was, therefore, not effective. We have been asked to give effect to it by making it a section of the Criminal Code, thus making it an offence to contribute by indulgence in sexual immorality, in habitual drunkenness or in any other form of vice, to cause a child to be in danger of being or becoming immoral, dissolute or criminal, or to tend injuriously to affect the morals of a child or to render the home of a child an unfit place for such child to be in.

It provides a penalty not exceeding $500, or imprisonment not exceeding one year. It introduces bodily the provisions of the Ontario law into the Criminal Code. There are definitions of what shall be a child for the purpose of the section, that is a boy or girl under the age of sixteen years. There is a further provision that it shall not be a defence that the child is of too tender years to understand or appreciate the nature of the act complained of or immediately affected thereby.

The next proposal is to amend Section 226 of the Criminal Code so as to make come within the definition of a common gaming house any place where the whole or any portion of the stakes or bets or other proceeds at or from such games is either directly or indirectly paid to the person keeping such house, room or place. This is to meet an abuse which is said to exist, or, at least, we have heard more complaint about it from the province of British Columbia.

The next proposal is to increase the penalty presently imposed by section 285B of the Criminal Code for taking motor cars for the purpose simply of using them and then abandoning them for the purpose of what is generally called joy-riding. The present penalty is $50 or imprisonment not exceeding thirty days. It is represented that the offence is becoming exceedingly prevalent, and oftentimes considerable damage is done to the motor car, and it is suggested that the possibility of a heavier penalty would operate as a more effective deterrent.

The next two proposals are to amend sections 985 and 986 of the Criminal Code which provide what shall be prima facie evidence that a house is a gaming house. As the law stands at present it is provided that the presence in the house of instruments used in any unlawful game shall constitute prima facie evidence. It is proposed to substitute for the words "any unlawful game" the words "any game of chance or any mixed game of chance or skill." A similar amendment in section 986 substitutes for the words "unlawful gaming" in the eighth and ninth lines the words "playing any game of chance or any mixed game of chance and skill."

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

THE WAR.

FRENCH CANADIAN BRIGADE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: I wish to ask if it is the intention of the Government to organize a French Canadian Brigade under the new Military Service Regulations.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Minister of Militia and Defence will give a reply at some later date to my hon. friend. I do not think there is sufficient material available just at present to organize a brigade. A suggestion has, however, been made as to more units at the front of distinctively French Canadian personnel. That matter is under consideration.

CANADIAN WAR MEMORIAL FUND.

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I might make an announcement with regard to some very valuable paintings which have been secured for this country through the instrumentality of the Canadian War Memorial Fund. On March 20th, I gave an answer to a question which is to be found at pp. 52-53 of Hansard, in which the work of the Canadian War Records Office was briefly outlined. It was not then stated that in connection with the Canadian War Records there has been established a Canadian War Memorial Fund, which has acquired fairly large proportions through the services and exertions of Lord Beaverbrook, and also through the assistance of many prominent men in Great Britain, particularly Lord Rothermere, who took over the exclusive rights of reproducing as postal cards, or as cards of similar size, the Canadian official war photographs, under an arrangement by which the entire net proceeds are to be handed over to the Canadian War Memorial Fund. The service and the advertising performed by the press under the directionof Lord Rothermere were given absolutely without any charge whatever.

The purpose of the Canadian War Memorial Fund is by paintings, by photographs, and by the erection of memorials to aid in perpetuating the memory of what Canada has accomplished in this war. I am informed by the Advisory Arts Council of Canada, of which Sir Edmund Walker is Chairman, that recently, through the efforts of Lord Beaverbrook, co-operating with the Advisory Arts Council, the Canadian Government, or the Canadian people rather, have come into possession of three pictures which are said by competent judges to be the three greatest art treasures connected with the history of Canada. It appears that some time ago the Advisory Arts Council had endeavoured to obtain the portrait by Sir Thomas Lawrence of Sir Alexander Mackenzie, the discoverer and explorer of the Mackenzie river which was named for him. The Advisory Arts Council took up the matter recently with Lord Beaverbrook, and he was able, by the arrangements which he had made in connection with the Canadian War Memorial Fund, to secure this valuable painting, which is now the property of the people of Canada.

There is, however, another picture which, as I am informed, the Advisory Arts Council have been seeking to obtain for many years, and that is the great picture of Brant by Romney. The Advisory Arts Council have been in communication with Lord Beaverbrook with regard to that portrait, and they have recently been advised that this picture has also been secured by him and that it is now the property of the Canadian people.

The third picture is a very celebrated painting, West's "Death of Wolfe." The Chairman of the Advisory Arts Council has within the past few days received the following cablegram from Lord Beaverbrook, showing that this famous picture has been presented by the Duke of Westminster, through Lord Beaverbrook, to the Canadian War Memorial Fund. The telegram received by Sir Edmund Walker reads:

> Death of Wolfe received from Duke of Westminister and letter as follows: "I send you the picture of the Death of Wolfe which has hung at Eaton since my great, great, great grandfather purchased it from the painter. Very gladly give it to the Canadian War Memorials Fund in token of my great appreciation for the magnificent part Canada is playing in the great war."

The particulars of the picture are set forth in the telegram as follows:

> Painted by Sir Benjamin West, second president of the Royal Academy and purchased by Richard Lord Grosvenor 1775 and placed in panel at Eaton Hall. This is the first battle picture in which figures were represented in contemporary uniform. Sir Joshua Reynolds implored West to abandon that idea saying it was against all traditions and would thereby lose grace and elegance. West answered "What I lose in grace I shall gain in simplicity." Sir Joshua Reynolds expressed great admiration for picture.

I am also happy to inform the House that the Advisory Arts Council have, through Lord Beaverbrook, secured a portrait of Sir John Franklin. This is said to be a very fine portrait, and I believe it was secured at a very trifling cost. I am sure the members of the House will join in appreciation of the splendid gift which the Duke of Westminster has made to the Canadian people in the celebrated portrait of Wolfe, and I feel that I may assure him that the thanks of this House and of the people are accorded to him for his magnificent generosity. I have already expressed the appreciation of the Government, and I am now enabled to express, on behalf of the Parliament and people of Canada, their thanks for the splendid gift and their appreciation of the spirit which prompted the Duke of Westminster to present this great historic painting to the people of Canada.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

The House in Committee on Private Bills, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Bill No. 37, respecting the Toronto, Niagara and Western Railway Company. —Mr. Morphy—in committee.

On section 1—short title:

Mr. CURRIE: This Bill is one that caused some trouble in the Railway Committee, and the Minister of Railways was to make a statement in the House as to whether this was a Government Bill or not. I should like if he would present that statement now.

Mr. J. D. REID: This Bill is merely for the purpose of extending the charter of the Toronto, Niagara and Western Railway Company, a subsidiary company of the Canadian Northern Railway Company. This company is owned and controlled by the Dominion Government through the Canadian Northern Railway system. In the Railway Committee, representatives of the city of Toronto did raise some objections, until they understood that the clause in the extension of 1916 covered all their objections.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Any value that this has will accrue to the Government.

Mr. J. D. REID: About $1,200,000 has been expended on this road in purchasing right-of-way, making surveys and so on. Any benefits that will arise in so far as this railway is concerned, belong to the Dominion Government.

Mr. CURRIE: This railway company, I understand, owns the right-of-way from Toronto to Niagara?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. CURRIE: On that right-of-way, there are two power lines. Is that right?

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not know about that.

Mr. CURRIE: I want to know if they have bought any additional right-of-way during the last couple of years, because since the Electrical Development Company has put two power lines over this right-of-way, there is no room for a railway, and the railway company has leased to the Development Company the right to put power lines on that right-of-way.

Mr. J. D. REID: The stock of this subsidiary company is vested in the Canadian Northern Railway Company, and on October 1, 1917, five-sixths of $60,000,000 of the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway was vested in the Dominion Government. Prior to that we had $40,000,000 worth of the stock, so that practically the whole stock of the Canadian Northern is owned by the Dominion Government.

Mr. CURRIE: But what is the relationship between this railway company and the Electrical Development Company, which is not owned by the Canadian Northern, but which is owned by the Toronto Street Railway Company, and which has put two power lines over the right of way of this railway company, and is the Government in a position to state the rental paid for the use of the right of way?

Mr. J. D. REID: I never heard of that before. That question was never raised before. At all events, whatever may have been the rights of the Canadian Northern in this railway company at the time the Canadian Northern was taken over, they now belong to the Dominion Government.

Mr. CAHILL: In what position is the Government of Canada with regard to the Canadian Northern Railway Company? Have we anything to say in the management at the present time?

Mr. J. D. REID: The stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company has been vested in the Dominion Government in accordance with an Act of Parliament passed last session. The question as to the value of the stock taken over by the Dominion Government is now being determined by a Board of Arbitrators sitting at present in Toronto. The arbitrators, as I understand it, will complete their work some time soon, and after they have made their report the Dominion Government will take over the absolute control and operation of the railway.

Mr. CURRIE: Does the minister intend to make a general statement to the House in regard to the railway situation, and if so, when, so that we may know if it is going to be debated or not? It has been the custom to make such a statement.

Mr. J. D. REID: It has been the custom for the Minister of Railways every year to make a statement as to the general railway situation at the time he takes up his Estimates, and it is my intention to do so when the Estimates of the Railway Department are taken up.

Mr. CAHILL: If the Estimates are not taken up very soon, we shall have a lot of new railway legislation passed. As I understood the regulations passed last year, they did not provide that the Government should wait until the arbitration was settled before taking over the management. Is the position now that the country own the stock of the Canadian Northern railway, but that until the arbitration is decided, we have nothing to say as to the management?

Mr. J. D. REID: When the stock was taken over, it was understood and arranged with the present Board of Directors that they were not to undertake any new work or enter into any negotiation other than to continue the operation of the road until the new Board of Directors had been appointed. It was expected the arbitration would have been completed long before this. In the meantime, until their finding is made nothing is being done by the Canadian Northern directors except to operate the road.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Is the Government debarred by any understanding it has with the Canadian Northern from proceeding to take over the road and appointing a board of management such as Sir Henry Drayton and his associates suggested?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Government are not debarred in any way. It was expected that the arbitration would only take about five or six weeks. As soon as the award is made the Government will take charge of the road and it will be under our absolute control.

Mr. RICHARDSON: The minister must see that even when the award has been made it may not be accepted either by the Government or by the company, and the present status might continue for weeks and months, and, perhaps, for a year. I think, under the circumstances, it would be very dangerous to have it go out to the country that the Government is going to wait before taking any action regarding the operation of the road until the award has been finally settled.

Mr. J. D. REID: I said that as soon as the arbitrators have made their award, that is final so far as the Government is concerned. We will then take over the road.

Mr. EULER: Does this legislation contemplate the granting of additional powers, or merely the extension of powers formerly possessed by the company, but which have now lapsed?

Mr. J. D. REID: It does not add to the powers at all. The original charter of this company has not been changed at all.

Mr. EULER: This is not a road against which protests were entered by the hydro-radial people of Ontario?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Hydro-Electric Commission objected to the extension of this charter two years ago for the reason that the road, when built, would parallel a line the commission proposed to build from Toronto to Niagara Falls, but in the committee the other day the Hydro Commission did not object to the extension of this charter because this railway now belongs to the people of Canada and is subject to the control of this Parliament.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Administered by the people of Canada?

Mr. J. D. REID: It will be administered by the people of Canada from now on. Anything that is done in connection with this railway will be done by the Government, and we shall first have to ask Parliament to vote the money.

Mr. EULER: They have withdrawn their objection?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, because the Government has taken over the road. The same objection was taken two years ago by the city of Toronto; they felt their rights would not be as well protected by the Canadian Northern railway, which then had control over this road, as they would be when the road was under the control of this Parliament.

Mr. CURRIE: Will the minister be in a position to make a statement on the third reading of this Bill to-morrow as to whether the right-of-way is so fully occupied by the Electrical Development Company, that there is actually no room left on the right-of-way where a railway could be built? He might also inform us whether the company has purchased additional land along the right-of-way on which this proposed railway could be built.

Mr. J. D. REID: I shall certainly be glad to give the hon. member any information he desires in regard to this matter. We are simply taking over the rights of this company. A lot of money has been invested by the Canadian Northern in the purchase of a right-of-way through the city of Hamilton, for instance, and through all the territory from Toronto. As the Canadian Northern has been taken over by the Government this right-of-way will now belong to the people, and if this road is never built there will be a certain amount of money coming to the people of this country in return for that right-of-way.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The request that was made by the hon. member for Simcoe seems to me to be very reasonable. He wants to know if the right-of-way has been fully occupied by the Electrical Development Company, and the only answer he gets is that the right-of-way belongs to the Canadian Northern. That is all the more reason why we should have this information. The minister has not answered my hon. friend's question at all.

Mr. J. D. REID: I have not the information with me but I said I should be very glad to give him all the information he desired on the third reading.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Let the Bill stand until you get the information.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member did not ask that the Bill stand, but that I bring down the information on the third reading.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It seems to me that this is the proper time to have the information.

Mr. CURRIE: Apparently the minister has not the information available at present. As I understand it, on the right-of-way of this railway company whose charter we are proposing to extend, the Electrical Development Company originally built one pole line, with the intention of building a railway line along the right-of-way, but within the last two years, owing to the extension of electric power, another power line has been built along this right-of-way some distance from the first one, and the whole right-of-way is now occupied. I am informed, however, that the railway company had purchased additional right-of-way so that they could build a railway if necessary, and I wanted to know whether it was a fact that they would have a right-of-way not cluttered up with the poles of the Electrical Development Company. Otherwise, the Government would have to bring down a Bill later on to take over the Electrical Development Company, who would undoubtedly make a kick if the railway was built along their right-of-way. I think we should know the exact situation before this Bill passes the House as to the rights that have been granted to the Electrical Development Company, what was paid for them, and all that sort of thing. It might turn out that we were taking over a worthless charter here which would be capitalized, if at all possible, by the company when it appears before the arbitration board in Toronto, and without giving full information in respect to the right-of-way. I think this is a very important matter, but I have no objection to the Bill being proceeded with, if the minister will bring down the information on the third reading. If that is satisfactory to me, I think it will be satisfactory to the House.

Mr. BUREAU: I was not in the Railway Committee when the question was discussed on the last occasion. Is this the same question that came up last year, when the Hydro-Electric representatives objected to an extension of the charter, or is this another railway company?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes. The city of Toronto in regard to which we had the trouble about two years ago. I think the extension was for two years. The two years are up and the charter has to be renewed. Representatives of the Hydro-Electric Commission were before the committee a few days ago.

Mr. BUREAU: Is it the same question that was discussed on the last occasion?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes. The city of Toronto was represented and the objections were withdrawn when it was explained that this railway and all its rights and benefits belonged to the people of Canada through the Canadian Northern System. It was also explained that the clause protecting the city of Toronto was in the charter that was being extended, and that, before anything would be done in connection with the carrying out of the completing of this line, the people of Toronto would be consulted by the Dominion Government, if the Government decided to proceed.

Mr. HOCKEN: I think the information asked for by the hon. member for Simcoe ought to be furnished. I have information from Toronto that all the money that had been spent on the right of way by the Canadian Northern has been spent in Hamilton, that they had an arrangement with the Electrical Development Company by which they were to lease the right of way upon which the pole lines are now standing. The hon. member for Simcoe says—and I think he is quite right—that there is now not sufficient room upon that right of way for a railway. I discussed the matter with the Hydro-Electric officials in Toronto, and they gave me the information I have just given to the House, that the company does not own any right of way from Toronto to Hamilton, but that they have spent their money in Hamilton. If that is the case we ought to know it, or if they had a separate right of way contiguous to the pole line, we should know that. I am sure the minister will provide the information asked for by the hon. member for Simcoe.

Mr. J. D. REID: Before moving the third reading, I will give a detailed statement of the situation.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Was it in connection with this Bill that an article appeared in the Financial Post of Toronto attacking Sir Adam Beck—a most viallainous attack upon Sir Adam Beck—because, they said, he was a German? I could not help thinking that if Sir Adam Beck was a German, the King of England was a German. Sir Adam Beck was born in this country, and the work he has done for the people of Ontario in connection with the Hydro-Electric reflects great credit on him. I think it my duty to rise in this House and enter a protest.

Mr. PROULX: Does the hon. member happen to know if that article refers to this particular Bill?

Mr. HOCKEN: The Financial Post does not favour me with a copy, and I am not a subscriber, I therefore, have not read the article.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I am not a subscriber either.

Mr. MORPHY: The Minister of Railways having assured hon. members that he would give all necessary information, and the hon. member for Simcoe having stated he was willing to let the Bill be reported and to stand for third reading, I would be quite content to acquiesce. It seems to me that many objections are being urged to this measure, which would not be urged if Sir Adam Beck were here. He appeared before the Railway Committee representing the Hydro-Electric. The city of Hamilton delegation and representatives of the Union of Canadian Municipalities also appeared before the Railway Committee and they all said they were perfectly satisfied with this Bill. There is one feature of it which ought to be put before this House, if this Bill becomes operative, and the line of railway built. I understand the franchise has been valued by the Board of Arbitration sitting in Toronto, not as the road will be, but as it was when it came before the Board of Arbitration, and it was stated that $1,700,000 had been put into this charter. No doubt it was valued at that sum, if not more. This Government has taken over the road on behalf of the people of Canada. They will take over the operations of the road when the time comes. The object of the Bill is to form a connecting link between the Niagara frontier and the city of Toronto, so as to link up the lake ports of Ontario, and all that territory in the United States east of Buffalo, with the various United States roads that send freight through Canada, and have it sent through the Canadian Northern, connecting lines at Toronto, and thence to the Pacific Coast. It has been estimated, in the hearing before the Board of Arbitration, by experts who have studied the question closely, that this road is worth $5,000,000 a year as it stands to the Canadian Northern system, and as the Canadian Northern system will be expanded and extended no doubt the value of this road will be a great deal more. Whether there are conflicting interests or not, having read the evidence carefully of all the men who have spoken about it, I formed a pretty strong conclusion that if this Government ever operated the Canadian Northern Railway, the link provided by this Bill will be worth $5,000,000 a year to the people of Canada, I merely want to put that matter before the Committee, so that hon. gentlemen would not be under a misapprehension on account of what has been stated by the hon. member for Simcoe and the hon. member for Springfield. I do not want the House to get the impression that there is anything wrong about it, or that there is anything to hide. I make this statement merely because the Bill stands in my name.

Mr. CURRIE: As the hon. member from North Perth has made a statement as to the value of the road to the country, I would like the minister to bring down some information, which no doubt he can obtain, as to the amount of securities issued by the Company, the stock and bonds, the amount of money realized to the Company by the sale of these stocks and bonds, and how the money was disposed of. If the road is worth $5,000,000 a year to the Government, we want to know it. We do not want to take from Mackenzie & Mann property worth $100,000,000 and not give them something for it. We want to know how much money was obtained and spent by the company.

Mr. J. D. REID: I think all that information has been given to the Board of Arbitrators in Toronto. I will try and furnish all the information asked for.

THIRD READING.

Bill No. 21, to amend the Penitentiary Act.—Hon. Mr. Doherty.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Sir George Foster, Bill No. 62, to amend the Insurance Act, 1917, was read the second time and the House went into Committee thereon.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The other day there was confusion in names attached to Bills, one being on the Order Paper over the name of the Minister of Finance which should have been over the name of the Minister of Justice. I made the mistake of thinking that the present Bill was the Bill of the Minister of Justice, whereas it turns out that it is not. The present Bill is over the signature of the Minister of Finance and has to be put through by him. However he is not here, consequently I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Motion agreed to and progress reported.

INSPECTION AND SALE ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Sir George Foster, Bill No. 19, to amend the Inspection and Sale Act (vegetables, eggs, food containers, firewood and cement) was read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On Section 1—Vegetables may be sold by the pound.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: A careful inspection of the Inspection and Sale Act shows that there is nothing in that Act at the present time to prevent vegetables being sold by weight, so that this section is not necessary for enactment, and I move that it be dropped.

Section dropped.

On Section 2—Weight of dozen eggs.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It transpires that with reference to the sale of eggs and the regulations for their grades and size, in pursuance of an Act passed last year, I think, the Agriculture Department has made somewhat elaborate regulations for the grading and marking of eggs, which regulations have passed council within a very short time, and seem to cover the situation to the extent that it is not necessary to enact this clause. I am not going into an explanation of what has been arranged for under those regulations by the Department of Agriculture, but am simply stating the fact, and, on account of that, it is not necessary to pursue any further legislation with regard to the weight or grading of eggs. I therefore move that the amended section shall read:

2. Section three hundred and thirty-nine of the said Act is hereby repealed.

The whole business of regulating the size and grading of eggs under the Inspection and Sales Act has gone through these regulations I have spoken of into the hands of the Department of Agriculture.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: How does Section 339, which we are repealing, read?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Section 339 of the present Act reads:

When eggs are described as sold by the standard dozen, the dozen shall means one pound and a half.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is repealed?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. STACEY: Have these regulations been made from the standpoint of the producer or the dealer or the consumer?

Mr. BUREAU: Or the layer?

Mr. STACEY: Because it is of vital importance to a very large section of some portions of Canada, and it will tend to allay any fears that may exist in their mind if they were assured that the interests of these three parties, or at least two of them, the producers and the consumers, were taken into consideration?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have no doubt at all that the Department of Agriculture has taken a wide survey of the whole question and has acted in the best interests, I should say, of the producer and the consumer. The Minister of Agriculture is not in the House, but, as a matter of fact, at the present time these regulations are in force. They cover the grading, weight and soundness of eggs, in fact, everything about eggs that one can think of. They deal with the marking of the cases in which eggs are packed for export, how they shall be packed, the number of eggs they shall contain, their inspection before exportation, the sanitary condition of warehouses or rooms in which they are stored, and there is a caution to Collectors of Customs throughout Canada that they shall not allow any Canadian eggs to be shipped for export that are not marked in accordance with these regulations. The regulations come into force as soon as they are published in the Canada Gazette, and in so far as they affect shipments from one province to another, they shall come into force on June 1, 1918. That is all extra information that I am giving of what has been done by the Department of Agriculture, but it does not affect this legislation at all. If my hon. friend will apply to the Minister of Agriculture he will get full information.

Mr. SEXSMITH: May I ask when these regulations were made and under what authority?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Under an Act of Parliament passed last year which gave authority to the Minister of Agriculture to make regulations by Order in Council. They were published not more than three or four weeks ago.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: As I understand, these regulations only affect interprovincial trade?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Export trade, and after June 1 next the regulations also affect shipments from one province to another province.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Then the regulations are in force now so far as interprovincial shipments are concerned?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: They come into force on the 1st of June next. I am not able to say whether these regulations are in force in any sense, but I just find, in my explanations, that with reference to interprovincial trade they come into force on June 1, 1918.

Mr. STACEY: Can the minister say whether provision has been made for the selling of eggs by weight, irrespective of their size?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I gather from these regulations, a digest of which I have here, that eggs, as graded, must satisfy certain conditions of size, weight, cleanliness and soundness of shell. Those seem to be the different factors which enter into the grading.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Those regulations are, I understand, applicable only to eggs for export? They will not govern transactions as between local buyers and local shippers? I understand the Food Control Board has made regulations with the view of eliminating the waste in connection with the egg trade; that is, they have regulated the quality of eggs that can be offered for sale, limiting to one per cent the number of stale eggs which can be offered for sale by anyone. Is legislation included in this Bill covering that action of the Food Control Board, and do those regulations govern anything except the export trade?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend is asking me somewhat of a double question. He is asking me a question as regards the legislation and regulations which are carried out by the Department of Agriculture. I am not in a position to give him full information in respect to that, but I find here that class 1 includes fresh gathered eggs which have not been held under artificial refrigeration or subject to artificial preservation, and that all of this is preceded by this sentence:

> Eggs for domestic consumption or for export, but not including eggs intended for incubation, shall be classified and graded as follows:

That, I think, gives as full information as I can give in regard to the matter. If my hon. friend has any more questions with regard to that, he must fire them at the Minister of Agriculture and not at me.

Mr. CASSELMAN: I just made the suggestion because the Agricultural Department is apparently regulating the egg trade, and the Food Control Board is also passing regulations with regard to that trade. It would be well if the whole of the legislation in regard to this commodity were embodied in one Act. There is a good deal of confusion in the country over many of these new regulations, and the idea should be to simplify legislation as much as possible so that confusion need not arise. Here are two bodies regulating the same article. The one, I think, governs export, and the other governs transactions locally.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think they intermingle too, but my hon. friend may rest assured that the Department of Agriculture and the Food Board must be working very closely together. There is also one fact which makes it impossible for us to do by legislation what is done from time to time by the regulations of the Food Board. Your legislation is made, and it is fixed, and it cannot be changed again until another session comes round, but the circumstances of the war make it necessary for the Food Board to make, from day to day, and from week to week, regulation after regulation with regard to foods, so that it is impossible for them to go on exactly formal lines. I do not want the committee, on my Bill which does not have anything to do with eggs, to get into a discussion on the regulations of the Minister of Agriculture. Cannot we dismiss eggs and go on with the rest of my Bill?

Mr. SEXSMITH: The minister has stirred up some questions about which the House and the country have a right to have some knowledge. Do we understand that the House and the country are not to know anything further about those regulations until they are published in the Canada Gazette, and that it does not matter how radical they may be, the public have to abide by the regulations which the Department of Agriculture has seen fit to make law? I never was and I am not now in favour of leaving too much power in the hands of a department to make regulations.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear. Sound doctrine!

Mr. SEXSMITH: It is a great mistake to carry this principle to the extent to which it has been carried in the past. The Department of Agriculture, if they see fit, may say that a dozen eggs shall weigh one pound or two pounds or five pounds, and they may make one hundred different regulations in regard to marketing eggs. Perhaps they may have something to say even as to the eating of eggs. Those regulations become law the minute they are published in the Canada Gazette. Surely the committee has a right to know something about them.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I shall ask the Minister of Agriculture to give all the necessary information, and again I put in a plea not to be pestered in regard to this business about which I do not know anything from personal administrative knowledge.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: While nobody wants to interfere with the passage of this Bill, the point just brought forward by my hon. friend (Mr. Sexsmith) is worthy of attention. As I understood the Minister of Trade and Commerce, those regulations are now law. They have been published in the Canada Gazette. The Canada Gazette is a paper which is not generally read by the public. I doubt if there is one man in the House who knows the regulations. I doubt if the minister himself knows them. The minister may proceed with his Bill if he promises that, say to-morrow, the regulations will be laid upon the Table so that we may have a look at them.

Mr. SEXSMITH: My reasons for speaking and making objections are that we have so many regulations. We set a price on bran and shorts, and what was the result? My information is that the farmer cannot buy any bran or shorts at $40 a ton, but the big milling trusts of the country grind the bran a little finer and mix it, along with shorts, with a little barley or screenings, and sell that mixture under a different name at $64 or $65 a ton. That is an example of the results of the regulations made by our boards and commissions. Such regulations are very detrimental to the country and to the farmer. Men have been asked to produce more bacon. I hardly dare go home because, if I go near the farmers of my constituency, they are after me at once. They cannot now buy a pound of bran or shorts, whereas previous to the fixing of the price they could secure them. The setting of that price has been a detriment rather than a benefit. We should have some knowledge as to what the regulations are going to be.

The CHAIRMAN: This discussion is not in order. The clause under discussion is to repeal section 339 of the Inspection and Sale Act, and I would ask hon. members to confine themselves to this clause, particularly as the Minister of Trade and Commerce has promised that all information desired will be given when the estimates of the Department of Agriculture are before the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Minister of Trade and Commerce has told us he is withdrawing section 339 because certain regulations have been substituted for it. Nobody knows what those regulations are, and I think it is quite germane to the clause under discussion to inquire about them.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Any information that can be given by the Minister of Agriculture with reference to the regulations that have already been passed has really nothing to do with the legislation I am trying to put through. I am simply withdrawing section 339 of the Inspection and Sale Act because the matter it deals with has been disposed of by the Minister of Agriculture in another way.

[Sir Wilfrid Laurier.]

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Minister of Agriculture has done that by substituting regulations, and I think it would be quite in order and simplify matters very much if we could be acquainted with the causes that have led to the withdrawal of this section.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Is it because the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce found there was such antagonism to this section that they realized it could not possibly be put through the House and thought the matter had better be dealt with by way of regulations by the Minister of Agriculture?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is an awful insinuation, to suggest that the Minister of Agriculture and myself, two Christian gentlemen, have been conspiring to fool the House in that way. That has not been the case.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I hope not, but it looks very suspicious.

Mr. GLASS: The minister said that the object of this Bill was to benefit the producer as well as the consumer. Now the producer will not be benefitted unless similar standards are established in the export market. For instance, one man might send a dozen eggs to the export market weighing two pounds and another man a dozen weighing one and one-half pounds. There is that difference in the weight of eggs because the hon. member for Wentworth told me two days ago that in order to satisfy himself he went into a store and had several dozens of eggs picked at random from the different baskets lying around and weighed, and he found that on account of the difference in weight there was a variation in price from 44c. to 80c. a dozen. This is certainly an extraordinary variation in the price of eggs that are marketed in the ordinary commercial way through the country stores day by day. If the man whose fowl produces an egg that weighs two pounds to the dozen gets no better price in the export market than the man whose fowl produces an egg that weighs only one pound and four ounces to the dozen, there can be no possible advantage to the producer. Our standards should conform to the standards adopted in the export market.

Mr. ROBB: The minister is proceeding to duplicate his tactics of last week. Then he brought in a Bill to amend the Hay Act and immediately began to move amendments so that the Bill left this House practically useless. It looks to me as if the minister to-day after bringing down this Bill is proceeding to cut out clause after clause, and I think he ought to tell us at once how many clauses he intends to cut out.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am going to make two or three amendments with the consent of the committee. I know my hon. friend's regard for system and order, and I think we will get along better if we deal with each clause as we come to it.

Mr. BUREAU: Section 339 of the Inspection and Sale Act was enacted by this Parliament as a protection for the consumer. The Minister of Trade and Commerce now proposes to do away with that section and to give entire control to the Minister of Agriculture to make regulations by Order in Council as to the weight of a dozen eggs. This is not the first time I have risen to protest in this House against that sort of thing. Why should we repeal this clause which has been enacted by Parliament and give the Minister of Agriculture power to go ahead and make regulations without consulting this House? Certainly the minister is not taking this action without first having consulted with the Minister of Agriculture, and I should like to know what reasons have led the minister to withdraw this section, which I think was passed in the interest of the consumer. They must surely have deliberated over the matter and have arrived at this conclusion after mature consideration. I want to know why it is proposed to repeal legislation enacted by this Parliament and to put in the hands of one man power to regulate these matters by Order in Council.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My answer is this: Parliament last year passed certain legislation giving certain powers to the Minister of Agriculture, and the Minister of Agriculture and his department, after giving their best thought to the matter, have matured certain regulations with respect to the grading and weight of eggs. That being the case, we certainly should not have any conflicting legislation in the Inspection and Sale Act, and it would certainly be improper for me to follow those regulations with duplicate or correlative legislation.

Mr. BUREAU: That is no answer. We have given power to the Minister of Agriculture to pass regulations, but those regulations were to be subject to the laws on the Statute Book at that time. We never intended to give the Minister of Agriculture power to annul legislation which had been enacted by this Parliament.

My understanding of giving power to any minister to make regulations is that he may pass these regulations subject to any law enacted by Parliament and in force at the time that the power to make regulations was given. What do we see now? We see the Minister of Trade and Commerce asking us to repeal a statute because it might interfere with the Minister of Agriculture, and he says, "You have given this power to the Minister of Agriculture to make regulations." I say, certainly we have, but subject to all regulations and restrictions imposed by law at the time the power was given to make the regulations. I consider the answer of the Minister of Trade and Commerce is no answer to my objection. I am not satisfied with it, and I would like to know if there is anything besides what he has stated that influenced them, in their joint wisdom, to come to the conclusion that, in order to give a freer hand to the Minister of Agriculture, he has to repeal statutes already enacted by Parliament.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I will ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce—and I see the Minister of Agriculture is also present—if the new standards which they purpose to put in force are the standards adopted at the Third Annual Convention of the Canadian Produce Association held at Guelph, January 11th and 12th, 1915, where they adopted the following definitions of grades:

Specials:—Eggs of uniform size weighing over 24 ozs. to the dozen or over 45 lbs. net to the 30 dozen case; absolutely clean, strong and sound in shell; air cell small, not over 3/16 of an inch in depth; white of egg to be firm and clear and yolk dimly visible; free from blood clots.

Extras:—Eggs of good size, weighing at least 24 ozs. to the dozen or 45 lbs. net to the 30 dozen case; clean; sound in shell; air cell less than ⅛ inch in depth; white of egg to be firm and yolk slightly visible.

No. 1's:—Eggs weighing at least 23 ozs. to the dozen or 43 lbs. net to the 30 dozen case; clean; sound in shell; air cell less than ¼ inch in depth; white of egg to be reasonably firm; yolk may be quite visible but mobile, not stuck to the shell or seriously out of place; air cell not necessarily stationary.

No. 2's:—Eggs clean; sound in shell; may contain weak watery eggs and eggs with heavy yolks, and all other eggs sound in shell and fit for food.

Is that the regulation that is intended to be put in force if this section is repealed? This matter is under the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. CRERAR: The regulations the hon. gentleman has read were promulgated by the Department of Agriculture under power given by an Act passed, I think, at the last session of Parliament, entitled, The Live Stock and Produce Act.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: That is this standard that I have read.

Mr. CRERAR. Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What are the regulations now in force passed by the Department of Agriculture in regard to the sale of eggs?

Mr. CRERAR: I could read them to the House. There are three pages.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: It would be well to have them on Hansard.

Mr. CRERAR: Shall I read them?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: These regulations have been published in the Gazette, and nobody in the House seems to know what they are. Publications in the Gazette do not reach many people. If they were placed on Hansard, we would be able to read them.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Place them on the Table.

Mr. BUREAU: Do the regulations in any way come in conflict with the legislation which existed in the Inspection and Sale Act with reference to eggs as to the weight per dozen?

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed not.

Mr. BUREAU: Does the hon. minister deem it necessary that we should repeal the former section of the Act, in order to give him a freer hand in the making of his regulations, and if so, why?

Mr. CRERAR: I have not followed the discussion, but does my hon. friend's question refer to this Act under consideration for amendment? Because these regulations have been promulgated under another Act altogether.

Mr. BUREAU: I understand that, but to-day we have the Bill before the committee. This Bill amends Section 339 of the Inspection and Sales Act, and that has reference to the weight of eggs. This is amended to make twelve eggs weigh a pound and a half. Not only is the existing section repealed in this Bill, but they take advantage of the Bill to repeal the section in the Inspection and Sales Act, doing away with all control whatever by this Parliament, or taking away from this Parliament the regulation which is there established as to the weight of eggs. I want to know if the Minister of Agriculture suggested that, and if so, why?

Mr. CRERAR: The suggestion did not come from the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. BUREAU: Then why does the Minister of Trade and Commerce desire to repeal Section 339 of the Inspection and Sales Act?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend is in an asking mood to-day.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend is not in an informing mood.

Mr. BUREAU: We have to be in an asking mood if we want to obtain information.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I find in my notes that it is suggested by the department that Section 339 should be repealed, inasmuch as the regulation with reference to the grades, standard weights and colours of eggs, has been provided for in the legislation passed last year, under the Inspection and Sales Act, and the regulations have been promulgated since by the Department of Agriculture. On looking into the matter, I do not see any very great reason why Section 339 should be repealed, if the House wishes to retain it.

Mr. BUREAU: I think we should keep it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No Prussianism is being introduced into the House. An Act of Parliament is passed by the consent of the House, and the repeal of an Act can only be accomplished by the consent of the House. The committee can determine whether it should be repealed or not. I looked over these regulations as they came to me, and I saw that they were very explicit, and that they provided, as I have said, for the different grades, the weights of the eggs, and all these other particulars that I have already explained to the House.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: You have got to repeal that section.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It does not appear to me that we require two pieces of legislation in regard to the grading and packing of eggs.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: If the Government is going to adopt the regulations which have been already adopted by the Canadian Produce Association——

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The legislation I am proposing in this Bill does not adopt these. That matter is already settled by legislation on the statute-books.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: The minister will have to repeal the section in the former

Act, in order to enact the provision in the Bill before us.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister says he can only do this with the consent of the House. That statement is correct. But the House will not assent without sufficient information. Why not drop this section of the Bill, and let the former section stand?

Mr. JOSEPH READ: I will tell the hon. member why; because the new regulations call for a dozen eggs of a different weight than that provided in the section which is being repealed. The old Act gives the weight of a dozen eggs as a pound and a half. The Bill the Minister of Agriculture has introduced calls for different weights, according to the grades of eggs. Extras are eggs that weigh 24 ounces, and No. 1 weighs 23 ounces. So that, unless you repeal the clause the Minister of Trade and Commerce is proposing to repeal, you will have a contradiction in the law. One calls for a dozen eggs to weigh 24 ounces, and the other calls for a dozen eggs to weigh 23 ounces.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is that view and I have no doubt it was responsible for the recommendation that that section be repealed. We will take that matter into consideration. We will let this clause stand and go on with the other clauses. I shall look up the matter and see whether there is a clash or not, and on that will depend whether this will be pressed to repeal or not.

Section as amended, allowed to stand.

On section 3—Packages of food and containers to be marked:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I want to make some explanation and to suggest some amendments which have been rendered advisable after further consideration. The object of this section is to assure the consumer that when he makes a purchase of something, his purchase is based upon the standards of weights and measures. The old system by which an article was measured, or weighed out, from bulk has been modified of late years very largely by the practice of putting up in containers or cartons different articles of food. These are not marked at present with the weight contained, or with the measurement, if it be other than weight, within the carton itself. This opens a very large field for fraud against the consumer. When a purchaser goes in and buys a certain quantity of commodities of different kinds, he knows the price per pound and he knows what he is getting if it be measured or weighed out to him. If it be placed in a carton or a container, he is not buying, in fact, by standard weight or by measurement; he is buying by the package. It has been shown that buying food in this way is an expensive method. A number of apt illustrations have been given in different exhibitions and in different ways in Canada where they have been placed side by side with what you get as a pound, or the measure in weight or capacity, when the article is measured or weighed out to you from the bulk, and what you get in comparison in buying the same commodity when put up in the cartons, or containers. The disparity is very marked. It is therefore an extravagant method of buying food and it also facilitates fraud in not giving the proper amount as to weight or measurement in the carton. Nothing is promised, and therefore there is no contract. You buy a package and pay so much for it. This provision is simply to make it necessary that every container shall bear upon it legibly the net weight or measurement of the article that is contained therein. It is also made necessary by this legislation that the name of the packer or person who puts up the product, or of the person for whom it is put up, shall be marked on the container. There is an amendment I wish to make to the latter part of paragraph (b) which will make the meaning a little clearer. I beg to move:

That after the word "standard" in line 11, there be inserted these words "avoirdupois weight or the measure in Dominion standard".

The clause will then read:

"The name of the article or articles of food or other commodities in such container, and the net weight in Dominion standard avoirdupois weight, or the measure in Dominion standard capacity measure, or the numerical count of such food or other commodity."

Mr. MORPHY: Suppose the contents were half water, although the can contained the proper weight?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is whatever is contained within the carton if it is well and properly packed outside of the weight of the carton itself.

Mr. MORPHY: Suppose that in a can of tomato there was a large quantity of water, what protection has the public?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It would have the protection of having the name of the packer upon it and if a packer proposed to put in a little piece of tomato peel and the rest water, he would not do much business.

Mr. BUREAU: That is an extreme case.

Mr. FIELDING: That is all right as far as the name goes, but I intended to ask a question similar to that asked by my hon. friend (Mr. Morphy). Take a can of fish: only part of the can is solid fish, and part is water, brine, pickle, or whatever is used as a preservative. Will you know the amount of fish in the can, or merely the weight of the contents of the can?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It means the contents of the can.

Mr. FIELDING: These are difficult things to deal with, but it is just as well in the interests of all that these difficulties should be expressed. If it is the contents only, it does not mean the amount of food that is in the can, and it does not give an assurance to the public that they are getting value in the amount of fish contained in the can; they are not getting value because the contents are largely water.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not see any other way by which we can attempt to make an improvement. At the present time there is no check and the same objection exists in reference to cans or cartons unmarked. These are additional checks. The desire of the maker, to put up standard goods and to continue to do business, acts much more strongly under these safeguards than it does now.

Mr. ROBB: Will the minister define what is meant by human food? For instance, milk and cream are delivered to houses in small bottles, and other commodities such as maple syrup, butter, bread, come to the consumer's house in wrappers. Is it the intention that the farmer who furnishes that milk or cream should go to the expense of having printed labels put on the bottles, and is it also to be required on the wrappers of butter, cream, maple syrup, delivered to the consumer's house?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The definition in the clause is as conclusive as can be given. A succeeding clause defines what is excepted, and it is necessary to take that into account as well in appraising the full meaning of the enactment. Paragraph 358D mentions the exceptions:

The provisions of this Act shall not apply to,—

(a) any article manufactured or packed for export.

[Sir George Foster.]

As the section reads it also goes on to state:

or imported into Canada.

I propose to ask the committee to delete those words and make the section apply to imports into Canada as well—but the onus of proof such article is manufactured or packed for export from Canada shall rest upon the owner or holder of the container.

It does not apply to goods sold in bulk or broken packages, and it does not apply to fresh fruits or vegetables. It is proposed also to add certain other exceptions. The Bill is not to apply to any article held in stock by a wholesale or retail dealer prior to the coming into force of this Act. That is to enable him to get rid of the stock that he has in hand before the Act comes into force. Then there are the following other exemptions to which the Act will not apply:

(e) To packages containing two avoirdupois ounces, or less, which packages shall be exempt from marking in terms of weight;

(f) To packages containing the fluid ounce, or less, which packages shall be exempt from marking in terms of measure.

That refers to very small packages, which are however largely sold:

(g) to any article the sale of which as regards the weight of marking thereof is already provided for under other statutes.

In the Inspection and Sale Act there are a great many articles enumerated and this does not apply to such articles. Special provisions are made for those. That takes in, for instance, fish, flour, potatoes and vegetables of different kinds. To continue the exemptions:

(h) those food commodities which may at the time this Act comes into force, or which thereafter may be subject to any regulation or order of the Canada Food Control Board as respects the weight of such commodity or the weight or proportion of ingredients used in the manufacture of such commodity.

(i) those food commodities held in stock at the time that such regulations of the Canada Food Board referred to in paragraph (h) become inoperative.

These are the amendments which it is considered necessary to make under the present disturbed conditions. For instance, the Canada Food Board is making regulations from time to time and these have to vary; you cannot make them subject to a fixed law. So that while the present conditions hold, and the Food Board is making its regulations from time to time, those regulations will be operative and are excepted from the workings of the Act. It is a very difficult subject to legislate about, as my hon. friend quite understands, but the object is to make a commencement, along what is considered to be the right line, for the protection of the consumer, to go as far as we possibly can, and make way gradually.

Mr. MORPHY: I do not see that there is much protection for the consumer in the language used here unless the minister protests against the use of water or other preservatives. For instance, one may have fifty per cent tomato and fifty per cent water. It is not fair to the public that they should be forced to buy water, although it is expensive enough in this city. Now the ramifications of the law extend over the whole country, and it seems to me that the minister could insert in the Bill some such provision as this:

> That such container shall have within it at least ninety per cent of solid material, free from all other liquids except the natural juice of the fruit or vegetable.

Or require in the case of canned fish and all other commodities "the necessary ingredients." Give the purchaser, who all over the country goes looking from day to day for food products, no cause for complaint. I do not know whether anybody in this House puts up shrimps, but a can of shrimps has vastly more water in it than a can of lobster or a can of salmon, either of which is perfectly dry. It may be that the shrimps must be preserved in some way by an inordinate quantity of water, but unless the public knows that, the tendency would be to suspect fraud in the putting up of the commodity. The proportion of liquid in such a case is entirely out of proportion to the size of the can, and I think there should be in the Bill some safeguard for the protection of the consumer. A person who buys by retail a can of this, or a can of that, suffers, and while it does not seem to that individual worth complaining about, the practice has within it the element of fraud. The whole country is suffering from it in a moderate way, and the producer of the goods is practically robbing the whole country to the extent of his trade. It does seem to me that there should be some settled quantity fixed, not only for fish, but for tomatoes, corn, peas, etc., and the phrase "net weight," to my mind, rather tends towards encouraging fraud than preventing it.

Net weight might mean three-quarters of the article, or three-quarters of water. I ask the minister to consider carefully putting something drastic in there to protect the people when they are paying forty or fifty cents for a can of food, especially in these days when everything is so high. There is no reason why water within the container should take the value of the food article. I would like the minister to ask his officers if they cannot find some provision to insert there in fairness and equity to the consuming public.

Mr. BUREAU: Is it not already covered in the Bill by the term "net weight?"

Mr. MORPHY: I do not think it is. There is nothing to prevent the contents being half water. It is the weight of the contents of the container which is referred to. The minister has said that the only remedy, as I understand, if the public find there is three-quarters of water in any line of canned goods, is to quit buying those goods.

Mr. BUREAU: If water is not part of the food it should not be counted. But if the interpretation given to that section means that water is a part of the food, as in the case of the juice of the tomato, why not force the packer to put the exact contents of the package on the label, and if the exact contents are not as represented, then fine the packer?

Mr. FIELDING: It does provide for a fine, but it also specifies net weight of the contents.

Mr. BUREAU: Or of the food in the package?

Mr. FIELDING: That is debatable. It says "article or articles of food or other commodities in such container, and the net weight." Presumably that means net weight of the articles of food, but it leaves room for debate as to whether the liquid in the can is or is not part of the article of food. The object of this legislation is to protect the consumer, and we can sympathize with it. I think there is room for the criticism of my hon. friend from Perth (Mr. Morphy) respecting the term "net weight."

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: With reference to my hon. friend's suggestion that a system be adequately framed and put into universal practice which would be a scientific system, you would have to go back to a scientific analysis of the food packed. That is what my hon. friend suggests would rather be got at by regulation as to what were the proper ingredients to enter into a food as such, and a tabulation of those ingredients. I do not see, when we are trying to put through legislation to correct in part an evil which at present exists, how we can do that completely without going back, framing up the particular ingredients that go into each food, say canned fish or canned tomatoes and then having a thorough inspection system to see that these goods are packed accordingly. I quite agree with my hon. friend that we have not got at the bottom of this whole matter through this legislation. All that I am contending is that we do to a certain extent put an instrument into the hands of the consumer by which he is protected very much more than he is at the present time.

Mr. HENDERS: Is it the intention that this Bill shall apply to packages put up by farmers, say pound packages of butter, and cartons of a dozen eggs, and that they should be marked as provided in this Bill?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is not the intention at all. I do not think the Bill covers that.

Mr. NICKLE: Before we leave this question, I do not want to embarrass the Minister, as he has had considerable criticism to deal with but I believe there should be a provision excepting bottled milk. The section reads: "Every can, carton, bottle, and so on shall have the name of the person on whose behalf the container is filled, and also the weight of the article of food. Certainly you cannot put the weight of a bottle of milk on every bottle of milk, because the weight of milk will vary in proportion to its richness. Does this legislation apply to milk?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Milk comes under paragraph (b) under the term "the measure in Dominion standard capacity measure."

Mr. NICKLE: That clause does not contain the name of the article?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It divides them into classes by weight, measure or count.

Subsection as amended agreed to.

Mr. KAY: With reference to the remarks made by the hon. member for Kingston, we on this side were not favoured with the explanation which the minister gave to that hon. member. But I might point out that the farmers often bottle milk and sell it themselves, and it would be almost impossible for them to label the bottle explaining that it is milk or that it is cream, and to have the net weight stated. They would require to have different bottles for milk and cream, because these weigh a different amount per gallon or per quart. Would the minister tell us if he has any intention of exempting bottled milk from the provisions of this Act?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend did not catch the explanation that I made to the hon. member for Kingston.

Mr. BUREAU: It was made with the soft pedal, we could not hear it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is not proposed to apply the test of weight to milk. That is a measure of capacity, and the quantity contained, the net contents are given in the section in three ways, by the avoirdupois weight, or the liquid measure standard, or the count, whichever it may be. This Bill is not meant to cover packages of butter that are brought in by farmers and disposed of on the streets or in the market-place. It refers to what may be called standard goods, and methods of disposing of them in containers of different kinds without breaking the bulk. The farmer makes up a dozen pats of butter, brings them into the market and sells them a pound here and a pound there, that is, in the broken package; those are not cartons under the meaning of this section. The amendments which I am proposing here are quite numerous, and I did not propose to pass the Bill through committee at this time, but rather to go through the sections and propose the amendments. Such of them as we can carry, we will do so. Others may be allowed to remain till the committee has a chance to look them over. My object is to make progress with the Bill to get it to the stage where we can finish it up later on.

Mr. KAY: I think the minister should have the exemptions specified in the Bill.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That may be.

Mr. KAY: Line twenty-one of section 358A, reads: "containing human food or any other commodity manufactured, produced, sold or offered for sale in Canada." It appears to me that these words cover not only food but everything that is manufactured or sold in Canada. They give very wide powers.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend has to read this in connection with the exceptions that are made. He will be able to do that better when he sees them all in print.

Mr. NICKLE: The explanation of the minister covered the first point I was endeavouring to make; but he should have the attention of his officials drawn to the fact that, if this Bill goes through in its present form, it is, in my judgment, going to necessitate the destruction of tens of thousands of milk bottles throughout the country, because those milk bottles are not as a rule stamped with the name of the man who uses them. They are supplied in huge quantities. Some of them have just the quantity marked on them, such as quart, pint or half-pint, and they are used interchangeably for milk or cream. There are thousands of bottles that do not have on them the name of the man using them, and those bottles will all have to be destroyed. Some exception should, therefore, be made in regard to milk. I cannot speak in regard to other articles, because I do not know as to them. It can hardly be the intention of the department to require, from one end of the country to the other, the destruction of all the milk bottles in use, and there could not be a more unfortunate time than this for such a regulation, because as glass is scarce and the price is increasing, this would mean a substantial increase in the cost of milk to the consumer. The cost of milk is high enough now.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS: The hon. member will note that, with regard to milk, a little pasteboard cover, with the name of the dairy company and the quantity on it, is put into the top of the bottle.

Mr. BUREAU: That is not part of the container; you throw that away.

Mr. HALLADAY: That applies to larger cities and towns, not to the rural districts.

Mr. ROBB: The minister intimated that he had a number of amendments. He should read those amendments so that we may know what they are. That would facilitate the passage of the Bill.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have read them.

Mr. ROBB: The minister must, sometimes, become a little annoyed at the staff of his department, because every time he brings in a Bill, we have to proceed to mutilate it, and when it passes this House, it is scarcely recognizable as being related to the Bill introduced.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Does the heading "fresh food and vegetables" include potatoes? Potatoes are put up, in Canada, in eighty or ninety pound bags, and, in the United States, in 100 pound bags.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is included in the Act itself, and is one of the exceptions. It is not the intention that this legislation should apply to sales of milk as they are carried on in country places or in towns. A man comes in with a can and he goes around and supplies his customers with milk from that can. Another man supplies his customers with milk in bottles. It is not intended to apply this Act to transactions of that kind. An amendment may have to be made expressly to exempt certain lines of that kind. We can make that later. As regards the taking out of use of cartons and packages, the Act is not to come into force immediately. Time is given so that those changes can adapt themselves gradually without destroying either cartons that are in use or packages which have already come into the trade.

Mr. BOYCE: Is any change to be made in regard to milk bottles?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is not the intention of the Act to interfere with the customary system now prevailing.

Mr. BOYCE: If it did, it would create a great hardship.

Mr. KAY: Is it the intention that this legislation shall apply to milk dealers in cities?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In that respect there would be no difficulty in making an amendment which would effectually protect that business.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I can easily understand how the objection raised by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) can be got over. The dealer or seller can have his name and so forth put on the pasteboard cover that is put into the mouth of the bottle, and some already do that. All such matters, however, tend to increase the price of milk. This winter I was speaking to a milk dealer who supplies some 300 or 400 bottles of milk a day to a village. I asked him if the war affected his business. At that time he had on hand boxes containing one or two hundred bottles. He told me that the bottles themselves practically doubled in price, but he said: This is where the war has affected me; this little bit of pasteboard has gone up in price over 600 per cent. If the Government is going to make regulations so that that piece of pasteboard will have to pass through a printing press so as to have printed on it the name of the dealer and the quantity of milk contained in the bottle, that is going to increase the price still further. This man who has thirty or forty cows and who is by himself, as both of his sons have gone overseas, has a big enough job as it is to fill three or four hundred bottles of milk. If he has to separate out his covers in accordance with the size of his bottles, and if his name and the quantity of milk have to be on each of these covers, it is going to mean a great deal more work for him, and more expense, and he will accordingly have to charge more for the milk.

Mr. PELLETIER: How will this legislation operate in rural districts where a farmer is coming into a city or town or village with four or five or six dozen eggs, or ten or fifteen pounds of butter?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It does not affect such transactions at all.

Mr. PELLETIER: What about a dealer who receives butter from a number of different farmers through the mail, and who puts that into a large receptacle such as a tub? Has that to be marked? The dealer does not know where this butter comes from. It is made up from butter from fifteen or twenty farmers.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: All he has to do is to sell it out as required, by the pound or in packages, as he pleases. That is a broken package.

Mr. PELLETIER: Suppose he were to ship it, what is the result? He would take the responsibility of marking the container.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If he exports or sends it away in large lots in containers, then he comes under this legislation. If he, after buying butter from different places, puts it into containers or packages, he has to put his name and the weight on them.

Mr. KAY: The minister should, before this clause passes, let us know what exceptions he is going to make.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The exceptions are:

Any article manufactured or packed for export, all goods sold in bulk or broken packages, fresh fruit and vegetables, all articles which are provided for elsewhere in the Inspection and Sale Act, all articles held in stock by wholesaler or retailer prior to the coming into force of this Act, packages containing two ounces avoirdupois or less, which packages shall be exempt from marking in terms of weight, packages containing one fluid ounce or less, which packages shall be exempt from marking in terms of measure, any article the sale of which as regards the weight or marking is provided for under other statutes, food commodities which may at the time this Act comes into force or which thereafter may be subject to any regulations or order of the Canada Food Control Board as respects the weight of such commodity or the weight or proportion of the ingredients used in the manufacture of such commodity, and all food commodities held in stock at the time such regulations of the Canada Food Board referred to in paragraph (h) become inoperative.

Mr. ROBB: I want to emphasize what has been said by the hon. member (Mr. Sexsmith) that all these regulations have the effect of increasing the cost to the consumer. The regulations passed from time to time by the Canada Food Board ever since its organization have done nothing but help to increase the cost to the consumer. They have recognized themselves that some of their regulations are so foolish they have withdrawn them two or three weeks after they have been passed. Let me give an instance. The Food Board some time ago pointed out that the expense of putting up goods in cartons was excessive and passed regulations that no retailer should sell less than twenty pounds of oatmeal, rolled oats, or flour in a carton. It was ridiculous on the face of it, because in many families twenty pounds of oatmeal would spoil before it could be used, and many other families could not afford to buy so much at a time. The Food Board recognized that eventually and withdrew those regulations. The minister comes here to-day at the request of the Canada Food Board and attempts to pass regulations which one of his supporters points out is going to increase the cost to the consumer. I endorse that view, and I think the minister should carefully consider before imposing further restrictions which will have the effect of increasing the cost of living.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend will admit that food boards and all other people have to learn by experience and that we all make mistakes. I dare say my hon. friend, looking back over his own business career, can see where he has made mistakes. I deprecate wholesale criticism of the value of the work of the Food Board. It is almost impossible to protect the consumer without adding something to the expense, but you have to take into account the ultimate gain to the consumer, which is far and away above the small additional expense entailed. It is with that purpose that this legislation has been introduced. My hon. friend will admit that there has been great imposition upon the consumer in respect to carton and container sales, and it is impossible to rectify that without taking some measures of precaution, and though labels and the like of that add somewhat to the expense, the expense is trifling compared with the benefit that accrues to the consumers as a body because of these precautions.

Mr. ROBB: Take the case of milk. Are the bottles going to contain any more milk than they do at present. They are filled now; you cannot get any more into them, and if less be put into them the people will not buy. How is the label going to give the consumer any more milk?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It gives the consumer a guarantee as to the quantity he is getting. He knows he is getting what he pays for, whereas if there is no label he does not know.

Mr. ROBB: The minister loses sight of the fact that most housewives have a measure into which they dump these articles, and they can tell whether they are being fooled or not. If they are being fooled they quit dealing with that man.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There may be housewives shrewd enough to do that, but I think the majority of them do not take that trouble.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 358B—penalty for not marking:

Mr. ROBB: Who is going to prosecute in these cases?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Any one may prosecute.

Mr. ROBB: Not the department?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Inspectors have not been appointed for that purpose.

Mr. MORPHY: I understand the minister is going to except milk.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes, in some way protect it.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 358C—containers not marked, etc., to be seized:

Mr. ROBB: That brings out the point raised by the hon. member for Kingston that some of these containers may be seized and destroyed.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: To make the Act thoroughly effective we must have the power of seizing the illegal instrument. It does not say that it will be destroyed.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 358D—exceptions:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I desire to amend this clause so that it shall apply to imports. It does not seem to be just to our packers, dealers and consumers unless this is done. If we compel our own people who are putting up foods, for instance, in cartons to put on their names and the weight or the measure, whatever it may be, it would then be unfair to allow similar goods to be imported into this country, which might be done up in exactly the same kind of carton, but would not have the weight, the capacity marks or the name of the packer upon them. Sufficient time is given in the Act for these changes to be brought about by the importers of any such goods into this country. The Act will not go into force for a year, and these changes can be brought about by persons who are importing that class of goods into this country.

Mr. FIELDING: You retain the right to cheat the farmer, if you wish.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not understand my hon. friend.

Mr. FIELDING: It does not apply to export. Therefore, we can cheat the farmer if we are smart enough, and he is dull enough; I merely want to understand the Bill.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The man, for instance, who is exporting goods into Russia or Germany—if we ever get on peaceful trade conditions with Germany—or the man who is importing into any other foreign country, does not want the Canadian weight marked upon them. He wants them marked in his own way, with his own weights and measures. In fact, it would destroy the export business to foreign countries in the vast majority of the articles if we insisted upon marking them according to the terms of our own Act. We had to make an exception in regard to barbed wire and various other things.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 358E—Variations of weight, etc., allowed.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: After more thorough consideration and conference with the business men, it has been found advisable to change the clause. Discrepancies in weight or measure due exclusively to differences in atmospheric conditions and so on, will occur, and some provision must be made for them. The provision we had at first was calculated on a percentage of the original weight, but that works very unfairly. In some cases it is a great deal too much. In no case that we have examined is it any too small. I think the United States sections are preferable, and I propose to substitute them therefor. They read:

> The following tolerances and variations from the quantity of the contents marked on the container shall be allowed.
> (a) Discrepancies due exclusively to errors in weighing, measuring or counting, which occur in packing conducted in compliance with good commercial practice,
> (b) Discrepancies in weight or measure due exclusively to differences in atmospheric conditions in various places and which unavoidably result from the ordinary and customary exposure of the packages to evaporation, or to the absorption of water.

That is scientifically correct, and it allows the court, or whoever is giving the judgment, to decide whether these go beyond or fall within these limits of discrepancies. To make it an absolute percentage is a very awkward way of getting at results. In the case of bulky articles 5 per cent would be too much, and one-half per cent might be too much, and in other cases might be about right.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 359—to be sold by cord defined.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I propose to amend that by adding after the word "cord" the words "or fraction thereof."

Mr. CROWE: Most of the wood sold in my district is sold by the load. It is largely mill refuse or slabs. People bring in cordwood and resaw it in stove lengths of 16 inches, and sell it in competition with the mill refuse. Will the people who bring in the wood and sell it in competition with the mill refuse have to sell it by the cord?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The matter of firewood is difficult to legislate upon. A great many complaints have come to the department, and especially in the last few years, as to the impositions in regard to the sale of wood, and a very persistent demand has been made that there shall be some standard fixed by which wood shall be sold or bought, or may be sold or bought. It is proposed, therefore, to make the cord the standard of measurement. From that there is exempted mill-scrap, kindlings and other mill refuse, and from that there will also be the exemption which I propose to move later on, that notwithstanding anything in this Act, wood may be sold other than by the cord, unless the cord be stipulated at the time of purchase. This, therefore, practically fixes a standard by which wood may be sold with the exception of mill-scrap, kindling and other mill refuse; so that, if a person wishes to contract to deliver wood, and another person wishes to contract to purchase that wood to be delivered by the cord, the standard is set and the measurements have to be made, and the quantity delivered by the cord or fraction thereof.

But, if agreed between the purchaser and the seller that they will conduct their operations on the basis of the load or in any other way, then it becomes a case in which the standard does not apply. It is a matter of agreement between the purchaser and seller. For all those who wish to know that they are doing it upon a fixed basis, where measurements can be applied, the standard to be named a cord, is made the standard for such transactions. In that way it will not inflict any hardship on the trade and will protect in a good many cases the buyer where now there is absolutely no protection. Cases have been brought to the attention of the department where wood, purporting to be sold by the cord, has been very much below the cord. There is some remedy, I suppose, but unless you have a standard fixed it is difficult to apply the remedy.

Mr. CROWE: You are protecting the man who buys by the cord, but you are not protecting the man who buys by the load. Most of our fuel is bought by the load. The mill refuse is cut up into sixteen-inch lengths and sold by the load. There is no protection for the buyer. If the person who is selling that wood were obliged to have a standard size for a load, or if he were required to inform the purchaser how many cubic feet there were in the load, there would be some protection. But, there is no protection here. I repeat that you are protecting the man who buys by the cord, but you are not protecting the man who buys by the load.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: You are protecting the man who buys the most expensive kind of wood but it would be almost impossible to fix a standard for kindling wood, mill scrap and the like of that.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Is it not a fact that wood has always been sold in Canada by the cord? If I ordered a cord of wood, and a man brought it to my place, would I not exact from him 128 cubic feet?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes. If you had made your contract in that way.

Mr. SEXSMITH: They said a great deal about this in the newspapers last winter, and what I saw astonished me. A man would go down to the market square in Peterborough and say: I will give you $10 for your load. When the load was delivered and it perhaps was not just a cord the purchaser commenced to kick. The law was not at fault, nor was the man who sold the wood? When I order a cord of wood I want to get 128 cubic feet and if I do not get it I should not be required to pay for it.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CROWE: I am in favour of this clause, but I think that when legislation is being framed to meet the case of people buying cordwood, something should also be done with respect to those who buy wood by the load. I would suggest that the minister frame an amendment to the effect that when wood is sold by the load, there be marked on the bill which is given to the purchaser the amount of the contents of that load in cubic feet, or that the quantity should be marked on the outside of the wagon when the wood is delivered. The purchaser would then know exactly how much wood he was receiving.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There would be some difficulty in doing that I am afraid. However, I shall be very glad to take the suggestion into consideration, and the next time we proceed with the Bill see if we can arrange a clause that will meet the hon. gentleman's wishes. I move an amendment to section 359A, to add, after the word "contents," the words "of a cord or the requisite fraction thereof." This will bring the section into unison with the cord standard.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Why exempt the millmen who sell mill scrap, kindling, and so on? In my opinion, if there is any reason at all for complaint in this matter of wood, it is more about the way the millmen sell their scrap than about the method of the ordinary wood dealers. The millmen run around little loads of wood on wagons in villages, cities and towns, and charge so much for it. In such cases there is no thought of the quantity sold, and they charge practically any price for it that they can get. I think that is one of the main reasons for the kicking that has been done throughout the community.

Mr. GLASS: I think there should be a distinction between mill scrap and slabs that are sawn off in a sawing mill. The ordinary mill scrap, or kindling, which is generally used for lighting fires, is not a matter of very material importance, because it is sold at a very low figure any way. But in many mills in small towns where large timber is sawn, slabs are taken off the sides that are cut into ten and eighteen-inch wood and delivered for fuel, and the same regulations should apply to wood of this character as to ordinary cordwood. One great difficulty in forming an idea as to what the contents of a load should be is that often the load is thrown in loosely and without piling. If the woodman were required to pile his wood on the wagon, it would be a very easy matter to estimate, and estimate very closely, the actual cubic contents of the load, but where the load is thrown in roughly, without piling, it is a cause of deception to the purchaser and a very serious loss to poor people who have to buy their wood in that way.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The difficulty in making any standard for that kind of scrap, or of fuel, is this: The millmen sell the wood out as they can, and it is generally picked up by all kinds of small dealers who take it into their yards, and it goes through the summer process of being dried out to some extent, and afterwards sold to the consumer. There is no exact measurement; it is delivered in all kinds of packages. The difficulty is to get a standard which will suit every place without being burdensome to any; you cannot do it. However, I am going to see whether or not we can frame an amendment which will reach to some extent the difficulty which has been spoken of.

Mr. GLASS: There would not be so much difficulty in dealing with slabs from large logs.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There would be less difficulty than in the case of mill scrap and small chunks of wood, but, as my hon. friend sees, it is very difficult to fix a standard that could be applied all through the country.

Mr. SEXSMITH: My reason for mentioning the matter is, that there are hundreds of small portable mills operating throughout the country which cut thousands and thousands of cords of slabwood into two-foot or four-foot lengths, which wood is hauled into the villages and sold at so much a load. If some provision is not made under this Bill to meet the case of such sales, the men selling that wood would be exempt; they could bring their wood in in any shape they please, and sell it, of course, to the best advantage.

Mr. McKENZIE: The punishment provided in this section seems rather severe. A person selling wood may have a very small quantity on his sled, perhaps not more than one-eighth or one-tenth of a cord, and may in good faith think he has more. Now if the quantity turns out by exact measurement to be less than that required by the law, and if the seller is not guilty of intentional deception, he ought not to be hastily dealt with. A man who wrongfully or fraudulently represents the quantity in a load of wood is properly liable to punishment. But this legislation does not say that the wood-seller's action must be wrongful or fraudulent; if the load turns out to be even a fraction less than he thinks it is he incurs a penalty of $25 or $50. I would suggest that the penalty be applied if there is fraud or intention to deceive. As the clause is now drafted, a magistrate before whom an offender was brought would have no discretion at all, and could not inquire whether or not he acted in good faith.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: What does my hon. friend suggest?

Mr. McKENZIE: There should be something to show that there has been a fraudulent intent in imposing upon the buyer something that is to the knowledge of the seller improper. The words "wrongfully tries to pass off as a larger quantity of wood a smaller quantity," express my idea. The minister might send the Bill back to whoever drafted it, and he will understand exactly what I mean when I say there should be something to show to the court that it is not the intention of the law to punish a man unless he wilfully misrepresents his goods. It should also be made clear that the magistrate shall have option as to the amount of the fine. The present Bill provides a penalty not exceeding $25 in the first instance and $50 in the second. The court should have discretionary power as to how much the fine should be.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is something in the point which my hon. friend raises. We do not want to go so far as to render the clause nugatory by allowing the real offender to get off. If there is a very small disparity in the measurement, done without wilful intent, it seems rather hard to put the full penalty upon the seller. I have made a note of that suggestion, and I will see if the clause can be modified.

Mr. FORTIER: I agree with my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) that there should not be a fixed penalty, so that the magistrate may fine, according to the circumstances, as low as one dollar if he sees fit. I think that this Bill is going too far, as it seems to have been the intention of the party who drafted it to make it compulsory to sell wood by the cord. I am of the opinion that the seller should be permitted to sell wood by the load. Moreover, I do not think there is any reason for passing any legislation upon this matter. I think the Government, in restricting the selling of wood to cord measurement to be consistent should impose a penalty for selling food or other commodities not up to similar definite standards.

It may be argued that the Bill aims to establish what should be the content of a cord of wood, but that has been done already by previous legislation. I submit that the clauses concerning firewood should be struck out.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I quite agree with the hon. member (Mr. Fortier) that this legislation is quite drastic. In the district I represent, and, I think, throughout the province of Ontario, a custom has grown up where wood 20 and 22 inches in length is accepted by the consumer, and in fact, requested by him. I was discussing this matter last winter, and one man in the wood business instanced to me where he sold 20-inch wood. If that wood had been 18 inches, he could have sold it without difficulty, because the people of the town had been in the habit of getting wood that length, which suited their particular stoves better. In fact, 20 and 22-inch wood has been asked for and accepted for quite a long time. Several dealers told me last winter that they would be satisfied to give 128 cubic feet, but they would have to charge a little extra, but that the demand to-day is for wood cut not longer than 18 to 22 inches. One would think from reading some of the newspapers of the country which have been discussing this matter that it was the man who sold the wood who was to blame for the shorter length. That is not so at all. There is a demand for 20-inch wood, and people are willing to take that wood in preference to a 24-inch length, as it is more convenient for their use. As wood has become very expensive, people are commencing to kick about the measurement, and that is one of the reasons, I suppose, why we have these provisions in this Bill. It has always been considered that 128 cubic feet constitutes a cord of wood, and if it is found on actual measurement that a cord of wood does not contain that cubic quantity the seller is liable. I think that law has been in force during all my lifetime. If a man sold me a cord of wood, and claimed to deliver a cord of wood, I would expect him to deliver me 128 cubic feet, unless I said to him that I would accept 22-inch wood as if it were 24-inch. It is the consumers, not the dealers, who have requested their wood cut a certain length. I have never had any experience myself as a dealer in wood, but I know that it is not the dealer who is to blame. It is what the consumer actually has been getting in the way of length that has probably been the cause of all this disturbance. To impose a penalty such as is provided in these clauses will put some people to great inconvenience, and perhaps get them into trouble, because through the newspapers publishing articles advising people to go out and cut wood for next year, thousands of cords have already been cut in the bush all over the country of 20 and 22 inches. I have no doubt that the dealers in that wood will be absolutely satisfied to sell 128 cubic feet, but they will ask a little more in price, so the consumer will get no advantage.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I wish to add the following section as 359 B.

Notwithstanding anything in this Act wood may be sold other than by the cord, unless the cord be stipulated at the time of purchase.

That is to say, agreements can be made to buy and sell wood in any quantity, by the load or in any way at all, provided such is the agreement between the buyer and the seller.

Section agreed to.

On sections 360, 360A and 360B—Portland cement:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We have had a good deal of correspondence with reference to these three questions in respect to Portland cement. Objections have been taken on several grounds and have been very carefully considered, and the opinions of experts, engineers and others, have been obtained by the department. As a result of all this, I purpose making certain amendments. Section 360 as it stands in the Bill reads:

Every bag of Portland cement sold or offered for sale in Canada shall contain ninety-four pounds net weight, and four such bags shall constitute a barrel.

I wish to substitute for that this section:

All Portland cement shall be sold by weight, and 94 pounds shall constitute a bag, and four such bags shall constitute a barrel.

That establishes that cement shall be sold by weight, and that the standard container shall contain 94 pounds. The bag, or something corresponding to the bag, is used as a container, and four of those bags constitute a barrel of 376 pounds. This principle has, with few exceptions, been practically agreed to. These changes have been canvassed by a committee of four of the Council of the Society of Civil Engineers—a cement manufacturer, a cement consumer and two engineers. As a result of their joint deliberations, I have the agreement of all the members of the committee, with the exception of one, and in accordance with that view, I have introduced this substitute clause. Objection is made that the present bag holds somewhere about 87½ pounds, and that if you now make a 94-pound standard weight, you cause a great deal of trouble and possibly a good deal of waste in connection with bags which are already ordered or which are on hand being used for putting up the cement at 87½ pounds to each bag. There is also a second objection, that other containers than bags are being used. Section 360A in the Bill reads:

Every bag in which Portland cement is filled and delivered shall be made of good strong fibrous material closely woven and in good repair when filled, and shall have plainly marked thereon the brand and name of the manufacturer and the net weight.

I think we can get over that difficulty, almost entirely, by substituting a section which I propose, as follows:

Every container in which Portland cement is offered for sale shall be made of suitable protective material, in good repair when filled, and shall have plainly marked thereon the brand and name of the manufacturer.

I understand that paper bags are being more and more used as a container for cement. It is also proposed that this Act shall not come into force until one year after it has received the signature of the Governor General. That will be sufficient time to make any adjustments that are necessary in the way of bags. The present bag, which is running at 87½ pounds to the bag, is, in most instances, sufficiently large to hold 94 pounds. Only about 6½ pounds would have to be added. That fact, coupled with the year's grace in the coming into operation of this legislation, will almost entirely avoid the waste of the bags.

Section 360B imposes a penalty. It is proposed to leave that penalty out for the present. Cement, I understand, is bagged by machinery, and it is very difficult, in bagging by machinery, to have the exact weight in each bag; there is sometimes more or sometimes less, so that what will be done by the Bill, if it passes as I propose, is to affirm the principle that cement shall be sold by weight; that the bag shall ultimately contain 94 pounds and that the barrel shall comprise four bags. This is in exact accordance with the conditions and the law in the United States. For a number of years the United States standard bag of cement has been 94 pounds, and the barrel, four bags or 376 pounds. Taken altogether, that is about the best solution we can find for legislation with regard to cement. I, therefore, beg to move the amendments I have stated.

Mr. MORPHY: My information is that the United States standard bag of cement holds 86½ pounds.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That statement, which was made to the department, was thoroughly investigated. I have the Act, and I have also the assurance, obtained by wire just the other day of the department at Washington, that that is the standard; that it is in force, and that there is no intention of putting it out of force.

Mr. MORPHY: Is section 4 to be dropped from the Bill?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. MORPHY: Then I understand it will be lawful for a man having eight or nine thousand sacks on hand to continue using them until they are worn out?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: As long as they are usable.

Mr. MORPHY: The question is one of sale by weight?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes. The manufacturer or dealer will find that, in a great many cases, he can easily get 94 pounds into the bag. If so, he comes up to the measure more quickly.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: I wish to represent to the minister on behalf of a number of manufacturers that this legislation will mean a very heavy loss on account of thousands of sacks which they have on hand at present. The minister says that, by packing down the cement, you may possibly get 94 pounds into the bag.

I understand that it is not possible to get the quantity of the new standard in the sacks. The old standard was 86½, and the new standard is 94; you are changing from the less to the greater quantity. I do not know that there have been any strong representations, except perhaps from architects and builders, that the standard should be changed. Previously four sacks constituted a barrel but now you have to change the standard of your barrel to meet the difference in the sacks, and that will cause some difficulty until the machinery is set up to turn out the standard-sized barrels. This means considerable to the man manufacturing barrels and to the man manufacturing sacks. The large manufacturers in the West spoke to me about it, and I advised them to have a conference with the minister. Whether they have made representations to him I do not know, but they certainly appeared to have a grievance. It is immaterial to the architect or the builder whether the standard is 87 or 94 pounds, but it is of consequence to the producer who is turning out hundreds of thousands of barrels. We are not so very much concerned about the standard on the other side of the line, because the great majority of the cement we use is our own product, and we should therefore not be guided by the size of the standard sacks or barrels on the American side. I should like to know whether representations have been made to the Government as to the very great loss the manufacturers may sustain.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Perhaps my hon. friend did not catch exactly what I said. These representations were all made on the original clauses of the Bill, and as the Bill then stood it might have been open to the objections my hon. friend has mentioned. But the Bill, after the amendments that I propose are made, meets every difficulty. They can go on using their 87½-pound sacks until their stock runs out. These sacks will wear out after a time, and then they can get the new 94-pound sacks. There is not the slightest tendency here to cause a loss either to the manufacturers or to the sellers on their present holding of sacks.

Mr. BOYCE: I have used a few barrels of cement for a number of years. My experience has been that there will be no trouble in getting 94 pounds of cement into the sacks we are now using; I think there is room for 10 pounds more.

Mr. CASSELMAN: I suppose that the object is to have a sack of uniform size as between Canada and the United States?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is well to have uniformity.

Mr. CASSELMAN: I can see that uniformity is desirable, as we are getting closer and closer to the United States in trade and other matters. I am told that a short time ago the United States endeavoured to have the weight of a sack of cement raised to 100 pounds, but the opposition was so strenuous that the idea was abandoned. I am also told that the tendency in the States now is to reduce rather than increase the size of a sack of cement and that there is an agitation on in the United States with that object. The larger the sack the greater the waste, on account of sifting; the cement comes through the pores of the sack. In the early part of the discussion the minister spoke of the necessity for marking packages with the name of the maker and the weight, but this amendment will make it unnecessary for those details to be placed on the container. The cement will be sold on the basis of a sack of 94 pounds or a barrel of 376 pounds. The old sacks, so long as they are used, will only hold 87½ pounds. The price will be based on a sack of 94 pounds, and the price to a buyer will be eighty-seven ninety-fourths of the price of a bag of cement. When it is remembered that there are fifty thousand retail merchants in the Dominion of Canada handling cement, it can at once be seen what annoyance and confusion would result if this became the law. I repeat, in the earlier clauses of the Bill the minister is providing that the weight shall be marked on every container, but in this particular instance the weight need not be specified. The uniform weight was 87½ pounds, but now it is proposed that a container can hold any amount and the weight need not be specified at all. That is inconsistent. I am told that the present sacks will not hold 94 pounds, and if that is the case the small sacks will have to be thrown into the discard ultimately. I understand that cement sacks in use at the present time are valued at $2,000,000 and at this time when everybody is being urged to do everything he can to save and conserve, it seems to me that by this change we would be foisting a tremendous loss upon the people of Canada, and the loss would ultimately fall upon the consumer and nobody else. I would suggest to the minister, in all humility, that he withdraw the whole Bill. If the Bill were reprinted as it now stands, with all the erasures and the amendments and the amendments to the amendments, I doubt very much if the minister would recognize it. The modern tendency is to simplify business: this Bill complicates business. I would further urge upon the minister that Bills of this kind—legislation compelling people to do things they do not like, or restraining them from doing things they want to do; legislation seeking to cure only minor evils—should be avoided. Almost every day a new order is issued by the Food Control Board. I am not criticising that board in its entirety, because I believe it has done a lot of good. I can point to an instance in which the Food Control Board has saved in one branch of Canadian trade and industry the whole amount paid in salaries to that board.

Mr. BURNHAM: Would the hon. gentleman apply the same freedom of treatment which he is now laying down to the merchandise we use, or to the Coinage Act?

Mr. CASSELMAN: I would have to consider that. I am not familiar with the Coinage Act, but I have a knowledge of the cement trade, and the produce trade of Canada, and I am speaking from that knowledge. When so much new legislation is necessary, I say that legislation only curing minor evils should be avoided; and I would, in all humility, suggest to the minister that he withdraw this Bill.

Mr. CURRIE: What line of business does the hon. gentleman refer to, when he speaks of that great saving?

Mr. CASSELMAN: The egg trade.

Mr. McKENZIE: I agree entirely with the hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Casselman), as he understands this business, and if he says we are going to throw away $2,000,000 worth of bags—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is not so.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would not undertake to say that is not so, but if the hon. minister makes the statement I suppose the hon. member for Dundas will accept it. I do not wish to join issue on the question of fact. The hon. gentleman has made a statement—and he appears to know something about it—that we are going to forfeit bags to the value of $2,000,000, and if the statement be true, it is a matter for the very serious consideration of the minister in war time. I received a little courage from what the minister did in regard to section 360B, which he is dropping out altogether. He says, in effect, that the millionaire who is selling carload upon carload of cement can do so with impunity and have short weight, but he is not to be punished. This is another case where the big influence has found its way to the power house somewhere. I would not suggest for a moment that the minister would be influenced in that way, but some parties who have the power of switching and turning and twisting this Act have been influenced, so that where the big interests are concerned they are not punished, but the poor man who comes along with an ox load and half a cord of wood has no protection and no back road to the power house; nobody cares whether he loses his ox or not. I can see the greatest possible chance of this poor man, who has half a cord of wood and an ox team, walking home.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: You are behind the times.

Mr. McKENZIE: And if it is a second offence, he will have to go home and get the other ox to pay the balance of the fine; the wood, sled and oxen will have disappeared, and the man will be left with nothing, simply because he happened to be half a stick short in a cord of wood. I am sure that in a moment the minister will see that he has let the millionaire out. He can come with half or three-quarters of a bag of cement and call it a bag, and there is no punishment. I feel confident that when the minister sees he is letting the millionaire out he will be only too happy to apply the same principle to the poor man with the ox team and half a cord of wood.

Mr. HENDERS: I am quite prepared to accept legislation that will give sixteen ounces to the pound to the millionaire and the poor man. As I understand the amendment to this Bill, provision is made that the law as to marking the number of pounds on a sack does not apply. I venture to say that about twenty-five per cent of the cement made use of through the country passes into the hands of men who have no opportunity of weighing it. They have to take the weight as it comes to them. It is a generally understood thing that the sack will contain so many pounds. They accept that as being a law and are governed by it. If there is no marking on the sack, they are simply at the mercy of the man at the other end. The fact that a certain quantity of sacks are now in use does not seem to me a justification for not marking. If they have decided only to put 87 pounds in these sacks, it is not a difficult matter for them to mark 87 pounds on the sack, and then no matter where they go each bag carries its character on its face, and everybody will get fair play. I therefore think it would be well to reconsider that amendment with regard to the weight. The same thing would obtain in regard to the cordwood. I am not in favour of doctoring up the law so that one man will be subject to one law and another subject to another law governing the handling of the same article. If 128 cubic feet is the right measurement for a cord of wood, then let it be so provided, and let it apply to mill woods and every other kind of wood. If I buy a half cord of mill wood I expect to get half of 128 cubic feet, and if I buy a quarter cord I expect to get a quarter cord. The same rule should obtain with regard to cement. Let it be enacted that 100 pounds, or that 94 pounds, shall constitute a sack, and let it be shown on the sack how much it contains.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. minister has dropped the words "net weight."

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The difficulty in putting in the net weight is that it is all done by mechanical packing, and it is impossible to have absolute uniformity in the weights. If you are packing the cement by hand in a bag and fill the bag to 94 pounds capacity, put the bag on a scale, and find that there is 94 pounds there, you can mark that weight on it, and you are sure of it. When cement is machine-bagged and bag after bag passes under the machine, sometimes a little less goes in and sometimes a little more; it is impossible to get a uniform weight. You might say: Go over every one of these bags, weigh each one, fill in the deficit of one, and take out the surplus of another so that each will contain 94 pounds, and then mark your net weight. That is mechanically and physically impossible; it cannot be done. But you have the name of the manufacturer on the bag, you have the standard of 94 pounds to a bag and, if it is not a 94-pound bag, you pay the fraction of the price, whatever it may be.

Mr. MORPHY: The Minister will realize the position in which he is going to put the public. Cement is sold by the bag.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is sold by the weight.

Mr. MORPHY: A farmer comes in to get a bag of cement, and there are two kinds of bags. He does not know about the law making a bag of cement 94 pounds. Such a bag is sold at a certain price. A merchant, with a little quirk, or trick,—and there are some of that kind—sells a bag of cement and the farmer thinks he is getting a 94-pound when he is only getting an 87½ pound bag. Is it not a fact that the weight has been stamped on cement bags in the United States at 87½ pounds, and have they not been found in this country? If that be so, where does the difficulty come in? If they have done it once, they can do it again. I think it greatly in the interest of the public that the weight should be put upon a bag of cement, the same as it is put upon a bag of flour. The sacks are stamped with the number of pounds they contain. It is quite true that it may put a little more work on the manufacturer, but supposing it does, the public are assured of proper weights. Will not the minister look into this and ascertain if the weight is not stamped on the bags in the United States?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not think they are marked, but I am not certain about that. I will make enquiry, and let my hon. friend know before we pass the Bill.

Mr. PEDLOW: I would like to call attention to one feature of the discussion that has been referred to by the minister, and that is measuring and weighing. I happen to have had considerable experience in both. When done mechanically, measuring or weighing is much more accurate than when done by hand. When the human element enters, the result depends largely on the temperament of the individual at the time the operation is performed.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: To a certain extent I think my hon. friend (Mr. Pedlow) is right, but against that is the actual fact, borne out by the testimony of manufacturers and dealers in cement, and architects, that under the mechanical system of bagging cement you cannot get a uniform weight in each bag. Whether it is mechanical temperament or human temperament, it varies.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the minister consulted the manufacturers of cement on this question?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Do they approve of this change?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Some of them do. The whole of the opposition offered by the manufacturers of cement has been based on the idea that they would be subjected to loss and particularly to loss in bags. I beg to assure my hon. friend that under this legislation the bags are not a loss in any way. The bags may hold 94 pounds, or they may not hold quite 94 pounds; or they may hold 100 pounds, yet the bags can be used until they are used up. I am told that a very large proportion of the bags in use will hold sufficient to reach the 94-pound standard.

Mr. ROBB: The minister has argued at considerable length in support of the view that cement, being bagged mechanically, the manufacturers were unable to insure a uniform weight, and that therefore it would not be fair to impose a fine, and I understand that the provision for a fine has been eliminated. Before six o'clock, in the very same Bill, the minister passed certain clauses providing that food products be stamped with the name of the packer and the net weight, and he provided for a fine if the weight was not as indicated on the package. I am sure the minister knows that most of these food products are packed in identically the same way as cement, by machinery, and if it is wrong to impose a fine on the manufacturers of cement, what justification has he for imposing a fine on those who put up foodstuffs, putting them up in the same way and with identically the same machinery? This automatic machinery is probably made in the same factory as that in which they make scales for weighing cement. The minister could not have been right this afternoon and also right now. He was either right then, and wrong now, or he is right now and he was wrong this afternoon.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not think that follows at all. I might be right this afternoon and right now. My hon. friend has had an experience of that kind, I am sure.

Mr. ROBB: What explanation has the minister for this discrimination between those who put up foodstuffs and those who put up cement?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The only explanation I have is the difference in the method of bagging and in the machinery. You have machinery arranged for mechanical work along certain lines which acts just as definitely and certainly as the human hand and even with less fallibility, but that is not characteristic of all mechanical bagging machines. I am told—and I take my facts from those who seem to know—that it is impossible in bagging cement to get a uniform filling.

With reference to the other articles with which we dealt to-day and in regard to which we have imposed a penalty, it must be remembered that there was an allowance made for discrepancies.

Mr. PEDLOW: Would the minister give us his authority for that? I have had a long experience in both measuring and weighing and I know whereof I speak. I have measured and weighed for forty years, and in the light of that experience I assert that mechanical weighing and measuring is much more accurate than any weighing or measuring done by the human hand. That being the case, I fail to understand why allowance should now be made for bagging flour or vegetables, or canned stuffs of any kind. The underlying principle is the same in every case, and it would apply in one case the same as in another. My hon. friend sitting beside me says that it is a matter of political efforts. I shall not illustrate or elucidate that statement.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is an unworthy assumption.

Mr. BUREAU: I understand that section 360 provides that cement shall be sold by the weight and that you are doing away with the bags. Is that right?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Oh, no, the bag remains, to put the cement in.

Mr. BUREAU: But cement is not bought by the bag, it is bought by weight.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Certainly.

Mr. BUREAU: What weight is going to be fixed? Will it be the weight when sent out by the manufacturer or the weight that the cement will scale when taken off the cars? I do not think the bag is going to cut any figure. Cement will be sold at so much a ton or so much a hundred pounds, just the same as coal.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is provided in the Bill that there shall be a proper bag to hold the cement.

Mr. BUREAU: You cannot control leakage from a bag. Why force a man to pay so much for a bag of cement when the weight, not the bag, is the measure of the transaction? I repeat my question: What weight is to be accepted? Is the purchaser to pay for the weight of the cement when it reaches its destination, or for its weight when it left the manufacturer? If there is any discrepancy where is the purchaser's remedy? I suppose it will be a matter of contract as to whether the purchaser buys the cement f.o.b. at the place of manufacture, or delivered at a siding; and if the cement is short in weight the manufacturer will have to make it good? But as regards the marking of the bags I cannot see any necessity for it when the cement is bought by weight.

Mr. TOLMIE: I understand there is something like $1,680,000 worth of cement sacks now held by the cement companies, and it is a very difficult matter indeed for them to get new sacks at the present time. Therefore, I want to know if it is made perfectly clear in the Bill that the sacks now on hand will be permitted to be used?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Absolutely clear.

Mr. MORPHY: I wish to bring to the attention of the minister in a specific and undoubted way certain statements contained in a letter written to me by a gentleman who thoroughly understands the cement business. The first statement is as follows:

> What is mystifying to those of us in the cement business is the underlying cause for what appears to us a perfectly foolish piece of legislation. Who stirred it up and what actuated it? Where was the demand that Sir George acceded to? It certainly did not come from the manufacturer. It surely could not have come from the consumer, because the 87½ lb. sack comes nearer filling in a rule of thumb way specifications for the use of cement than any other way could possibly do. Why is there to be a 94 lb. sack in Canada and an 87½ lb. sack all over the United States? Are contractors who take contracts here and in the United States to be faced with a different sack weight in making their mix?

The writer speaks of the matter in other respects. He is a gentleman who is in the cement business in a large way, and his statements are very specific. I would like to ask the minister where he gets his authority for the statement that the 87½-pound sack is not the standardized sack in the United States, but that the 94-pound sack is?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I got it from the circular of the Bureau of Standards, which, on inquiry, was sent to me. I got it also in answer to a telegram sent to the Bureau of Standards, Department of Commerce, in Washington. The answer to that telegram was this:

> Bureau of Standards, Department of Commerce, advise that the weight of bag and barrel of cement is indicated on page 10 of their circular No. 33, January 18th, 1917; re legal weights at present in United States.

With that was sent a copy of the Bureau of Standards and on page 10 there is the regulation No. 9:

The cement shall be delivered in suitable bags, or barrels, with the brand and name of the manufacturer plainly marked thereon, unless shipped in bulk. A bag shall contain 94 pounds net. A barrel shall contain 376 pounds net.

There is no doubt at all that that is the legal standard in the United States, and has been for years.

Mr. MORPHY: Will the minister say that it is not the practice throughout the whole of the United States to use 87½ pound bags?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not know how far that practice goes.

Mr. MORPHY: I will tell the hon. minister something more about the matter and have it put on Hansard for guidance.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If it is as stated by the hon. member it does not affect the principle of the standard being 94 pounds to the bag and 376 pounds to the barrel.

Mr. MORPHY: The minister will readily see the difficulty that will be created by a change in our law, if the cement manufacturers in the United States and in Canada are using an 87½ pound bag. As a matter of fact I understood the minister to say that one reason for the introduction of the present Bill was to assimilate the standards?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. MORPHY: But this legislation is going to change the practice apparently. If the Bill is merely for the purpose of fixing a standard which is not going to be used, I do not see very much necessity for such legislation. Now, to quote from another letter:

When you realize that the consumer has every mix regulated for an 87½ lb. sacp and he tells a gang of Dagoes how many sacks to put in a mix, you can see what it will mean to allow for 6½ lb. extra in each sack, particularly if you remember that the 87½ lb. balances the cubic footage upon which all formulas are based better than any other weight, and again remember that the mixers of cement are frequently labourers who come from the United States and, for that matter, go from Canada to the United States, and are used to the 87½-lb. sack all over the Continent.

Now, if that is so the minister is hinging the merits of the Bill upon a practice that does not exist, and taking an academic standard from some Bureau of Standards in the United States which has not been followed by the practical workers in dealing with cement, so his justification for the Bill absolutely falls to the ground. I think, therefore, the minister ought to consider the suggestion made here and hold the Bill until he finds a little further about the existing practice.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will inquire what the practice is.

Mr. MORPHY: Besides, I agree with the apparent general consensus of opinion that this is no time to disturb trade conditions. The minister has not shown to the House any reason for bringing in this Bill, except probably it might be founded upon the suggestion of a man who never dealt in cement or never mixed cement in his life but was in the minister's office here and got the minister to bring forward the Bill in order that he might get some kudos out of it. All the practical and technical knowledge of the House is against the Bill, and I think it should be held up and left over until some further reason is shown for its enactment.

Mr. CURRIE: Might I make one suggestion which might, perhaps, clear away the difficulty? I suggest to the minister that he put the word "standard" in his amendment, making it read a "standard bag," or a "standard barrel." The whole question is one of contract. I engage to purchase a thousand bags or barrels of cement from a manufacturer. By specifying standard bags he would be obliged to furnish that quantity of cement. If I did not, he could supply any lesser amount he might choose. The question of standardization has been acute in the United States and Great Britain. A great many articles of commerce were not standardized. For instance, the standards for sheet iron in these two countries were not the same. In Great Britain there was the Birmingham gauge and the London gauge, and all that sort of thing, and the same thing applied in the United States, where, for sheet iron, there were various gauges and thicknesses. The ultimate result was that the purchaser was always getting the worst of it. The United States have established a Bureau of Standards, and have fixed standards for sheet iron, wire, bar iron, boiler plate and everything of that kind. These standards are fixed in collaboration with all other countries; it is an international movement. I think the minister is absolutely right in trying to standardize cement, because anybody with common sense knows that if a manufacturer of cement wished to palm off 86-pound bags as 87½ pounds, which is the prevailing standard, there is nothing to prevent his doing so. For that reason I think it is well that this legislation should pass. But I would suggest that the word "standard" be inserted, because that is used in legislation in other countries. When you buy sheet iron, standard gauge, for instance, you know exactly the gauge thickness you are going to get, and when you buy 1-inch bar iron standard gauge, you know it will be a standard inch, and the same applies to boiler plate, sheet iron, tin and everything of that description, which are all standardized now. There is, therefore, no reason why cement, which is an article of common, every-day use, especially by farmers who have no means of weighing it, or who do not generally know what quantity a bag should contain, should not have a standard assigned to it. I agree with the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders) in that respect. The consumer should be protected; the manufacturer can take care of himself. It has been argued that the weighing machine cannot take care of the weight. The machine will weigh these bags, if it is anything like the automatic weighing machines that I have seen in operation. Without a standard, manufacturers may be tempted to put their hand in the bag and palm off a smaller quantity of cement, just as a hen will turn out a light-weight egg and ask the same money for it. Insert the word "standard," then if a man does not specify a standard bag or barrel of cement, and gets a light weight package, the manufacturer can say: "you did not ask for a standard bag or barrel." I hope the minister will see his way clear to accept my suggestion.

Mr. BUREAU: I understand that there is no complaint about the way things are being carried on with the present standard of 87½ pounds. The proposed change will be rather confusing. The minister says that cement shall be sold by weight, 94 pounds to the bag and four bags to the barrel. If we are going to wrangle over it, why not drop the clause. We are told that these are war times. We on this side do not want to be accused of bringing war into Parliament for the sake of a few pounds weight in a bag of cement. I would not object to dropping these clauses, or in fact of dropping the Bill. We have already dropped several sections under various pretexts and I would suggest that the law be left as it stands, as both consumers and manufacturers seem to be perfectly satisfied with it.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Before the clause passes, I wish to protest again that this is a retrograde move. It is making a complicated system in what is now a simple system of handling cement. I agree with the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) that there should be a standard weight for a bag of cement. There is a standard weight of 87½ pounds, which has been the weight of a bag of cement ever since cement was manufactured in Canada. If the minister can offer one single reason why that weight should be changed to 94 pounds, other than that our bag should weigh the same as that in the United States, I may change my mind. The minister gave such a reason for the Daylight Savings Bill. I can see a reason why our time should be the same as that of our neighbours across the line, and I agreed with him. But I do not know why we should change the weight of a bag of cement in Canada because our American cousins have a larger bag, particularly when the tendency there is to decrease rather than to increase the size of the bag. We have a standard now—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is a standard of custom.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Yes.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: But we have no legal standard.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Then make it 87½ pounds as it has always been, and stamp the bag. If you cannot have uniformity in the weight of each bag, this is what will happen: When a carload of cement is shipped to a dealer—and most of the cement goes through the hands of dealers—he will have to weigh that whole carload to see that he is getting his correct weight. Then he puts it in his warehouse, and as he sells it out to consumers he will again have to weigh it. The custom now is to load on twenty-five or thirty bags; you sell cement by count. The Bill makes a complicated affair out of what is a simple affair; and, further, there is not one single clause in it which will remedy any real evil. During this time we should not have legislation of this kind, and I would suggest to the minister that he withdraw the whole Bill, and we can consider it next year perhaps when we have more time.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the purpose of changing the weight from 87½ pounds to 94 pounds? I have not heard that explained.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The purpose is to have a standard by which cement can be sold.

Mr. CAHILL: Eighty-seven and a half pounds is the standard now?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is no legal standard now. A legal standard establishing the weight of 94 pounds fixes also the standard for a barrel as 376 pounds, equal to four bags. If what is delivered to you does not come up to that, then you do not pay that much. In all this legislation under the Inspection and Sale Act, we have standards. If we do not need any standards in the country at all, you might just as well abolish your weights and measures. I cannot see why there should be any objection to establishing a standard in cement, and as the standard in the United States is 94 pounds, it seems fair to us to establish the same standard here. If there could be some method devised by which in the bagging of it you could have a uniform amount in each bag, and then stamp that on each bag, there would be no great difficulty, but I am told that that is impossible, and that therefore you cannot stamp the correct weight on the bag unless you submit it to manual test after you have done the mechanical work.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Bags have been uniform before.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is no standard with which to compare it.

Mr. KNOX: Has the 87½ pound standard not been adopted because in mixing cement that is considered a cubic foot? I have always understood that quantity to be a cubic foot, and that is why it was put at 87½ pounds.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There must have been some good reason why the Bureau of Standards, which is an institution in the United States which fixes all their standards of weights and measures, has adopted this standard. I do not know much about the mixing of cement, but I am informed that, in proportioning concrete, a bag of cement of 94 pounds net can, for all intents and purposes, be looked upon as a cubic foot. The usual mixture ror concrete is one cubic foot of cement, two cubic feet of sand and four cubic feet of gravel.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister says: "For all intents and purposes," but my hon. friend (Mr. Knox) says that 87½ pounds is an actual cubic foot of cement.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: But it is not.

Mr. BUREAU: It is for all intents and purposes. It is not an actual cubic foot. It may answer the purpose of an actual cubic foot. My hon. friend (Mr. Knox) says that 87½ pounds is an actual cubic foot of cement. The minister says that he wants to standardize this measurement. Who is going to be benefited by this legislation?

Mr. CAHILL: The United States.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not think it will benefit them all. What does the Customs Department do now? Supposing a bag of cement goes across the border, does the Customs Department charge for 87½ pounds, or 94 pounds, to the bag, or is there any standard by the bag, or is the duty charged according to the actual weight?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Customs Department, I suppose, imposes a tax upon the cement which is imported according to its weight.

Mr. BUREAU: It will not make any difference whether our bag is 87½ or 94 pounds. If we are going to imitate the United States, we shall just continue a process that has been started. When our cement goes to the United States I suppose, it is weighed. I understand from hon. members who have spoken to-night that $2,000,000 has been invested in bags that are marked "87½ pounds."

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Not marked.

Mr. BUREAU: Well, which contain 87½ pounds. They certainly will not hold 94 pounds, or if they are made to hold 94 pounds, they will be packed so tightly that there will be a danger of explosion.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is a difference of opinion on that.

Mr. BUREAU: That is the fate which I would like this Bill to have to-night. Let it explode and let us be done with it. If this Bill was to serve any purpose of the consumer, or even if it were to aid the manufacturer himself, we could feel that at least it was going to be of service to somebody. The minister is asked: why make the weight 94 pounds? He replies: To make a standard. Why not make the standard 87½ pounds?

Mr. KAY: The United States.

Mr. BUREAU: If you jump at a chasm you do not have to go a mile beyond. Let us leave the United States alone for a while, and let us save money to our people by allowing them to use these sacks. Let us either drop this section or take a vote in regard to it. I move that the clause as amended be dropped.

Mr. CURRIE: I hope that the hon. member will not press his motion. He has given a long argument endeavouring to prove that no good purpose is served in having this standard weight. The Bureau of Standards have certainly given this matter great consideration. One reason for this standard is that in the United States there are a great many text-books used by engineers—

Mr. BUREAU: Are we legislating here under the President of the United States and to please the United States, or are we legislating for our people?

Mr. CURRIE: We are not legislating under the president of any cement company, as my hon. friend wants us to do; we are legislating for the people of Canada. The text-books that are published in England and the United States are used by cement companies and they are used by engineers in estimating the cement work they do. There are some engineers here who know that very well. There are certain specifications laid down for certain work. There are buildings erected of cement; even ships are being made of cement. The American text-book says that you must make a cement of a certain standard, and that when you use so many barrels of cement to so much weight of sand and so much weight of gravel, you get a certain specified product. When you put that in a wall or an arch, you put a certain strength there that will stand up to a certain weight; but if you have only 87½ pounds instead of 94 pounds to the bag, your work will not stand up. The inspector will come along and pick out a piece of concrete to see how much cement is in it, and he will say: You have not the correct quantity. The result is that your work is condemned and you lose a great deal of money.

Mr. MORPHY: I am told on very good authority that, notwithstanding anything in the text-books about standards, the common practice throughout the whole of the United States is to use a standard bag of 87½ pounds, not 94 pounds. Will the hon. member dispute that statement? The minister will not.

[Mr. Bureau.]

Mr. CURRIE: Nothing of the kind occurs. The standard text-book in the United States is Trautwine & Kent's text book, and Trautwine & Kent are the authorities used by every young engineer or old engineer, and the standard there is 94 pounds to the bag of cement.

Mr. MORPHY: I am not speaking about what is written in a text-book. I am asking the hon. gentleman if he will deny that the practice throughout the United States is to work to the standard of an 87½-pound bag, and not a 94-pound bag?

Mr. CURRIE: That may be the practice on sidewalks and other work in which it is not necessary to have standard cement, but throughout the whole of the United States the standard laid down in the text-books is the standard laid down by the Bureau of Standards, and that is the weight laid down in this Bill. The two parties who are going to suffer on account of short weight in cement are not the hon. gentlemen who want to have this section thrown out, they are the public and the dealer. If I ask a dealer to sell me five barrels of cement, I shall certainly insist on getting that weight, but the cement companies will short-weight the dealer five pounds to the sack. Is that fair to the dealer? I say, it is not. A man who does not know enough to weigh his cement will suffer, and not the dealer. The reason for standardization is apparent. We have standardized in almost everything now, and there is no reason why cement should not be standardized. Why should one company which plays the game honestly, which manufactures cement and puts it into bags to the proper weight, have to compete with a concern which is short-weighting everybody? Short-weighting in cement should be stopped so far as the farmers and the rest of the people are concerned. It means a great loss. The people do not get full value for ten per cent of the cement that is sold.

Mr. BUREAU: My hon. friend (Mr. Currie) asked me to withdraw my motion and to think it over. I asked him for whom we were legislating, and he said: The people. I agree with him that we are legislating for the people, but by this Bill we are legislating for the people of the United States. If you cause a loss of $2,000,000 on account of wastage in bags, who is going to pay that? The American manufacturers? It is the consumer who is going to pay it. My hon. friend is looking at this from only one angle. He may have behind him all the standard text-books, but that will not cheapen cement, if the manufacturers have to lose $2,000,000 just for bags. This legislation will also entail new machinery to bag the cement, because the present machinery will pack only 87½ pounds to the bag. So far as presidents of cement companies and manufacturers of cement are concerned, let me tell my hon. friend that I do not own any stock in any cement company, and that I am not interested as a solicitor in any cement company. I am speaking in the interests of the people. I am a free lance, not the agent of any text book, or here to boom any text book author. Whatever I think will be in the interests of the people, that I will stand by. I have a lot of respect for the United States; I think we ought to have followed them long ere this in many things. But just because we have delayed we should not now try to go too fast to make up for lost time. The present weight of a sack is 87½ pounds, and if no manufacturer or consumer objects to it why should we change the standard? The Americans are not asking for a change. If they were I might even go the length of saying we should consider it. But nobody is asking for a change. A week ago the minister introduced a Bill and left the famous egg section on the Table for a week, and now today after a week's consideration he drops the egg section. If the minister leaves the present Bill over for a week he may change his mind on this matter too. I have no doubt his intentions are good; standardizing the weight of sacks may be all right, but when I see a general clamour against it, when somebody is going to lose by the change—and if the manufacturer loses in the first instance, the consumer will have to bear the loss eventually—and when nobody is complaining about the present weight why should we change? I have heard my hon. friend go all over the land saying, "Let well enough alone." Let him let well enough alone in these times of stress. Let the Bill stand over until he has got more information upon it.

Mr. CROWE: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion. I have used a little cement in my day. The cement that came into Canada many years ago, and has been coming in ever since, is from Great Britain. There the standard is 350 pounds to the barrel. The standard weight of a sack is 87½ pounds. Great Britain is the first producer of cement and why should we change our standard to conform with the United States?

Mr. TOLMIE: The question was asked some time ago why it was necessary to have a standard of 87½ pounds. I have a letter here from the managing director of the Portland Cement Company of Victoria in which he states that the present weight of a sack of cement is 87½ pounds, and that 87½ pounds is as near a cubic foot as any weight that could be specified. As cement is all used by measurement, this writer says that there is a lot to be said in favour of retaining the 87½-pound sack.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is some other business that we want to do to-night. I have listened carefully to everything that has been said and have made notes of the various suggestions. I still am of the opinion that we ought to have a standard weight; I think that would be in the interest of the consuming public. I do not see any force at all in the argument of my hon. friend from Three Rivers and St. Maurice (Mr. Bureau), whom I respect very highly, when he takes as his two premises that there would be a loss of $2,000,000 if this legislation went through, and, secondly, that there would be no gain to the consuming public, who have made no request for this legislation. Two premises like those do not heighten my respect for the conclusion he has drawn, because neither premise is correct. There will be no loss on the bags, and there has been a widespread demand for this change. The idea of having a standard for our products in this country is an absolutely sound one. That was the reason why this clause was inserted in the Bill. I now beg to move that the committee rise and report progress. I shall take into consideration the suggestions that have been made, and in a day or two shall come to the committee with my conclusions.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY—THE FLAX INDUSTRY.

On motion of Sir George Foster (Minister of Trade and Commerce) for Committee of Supply:

Mr. S. F. GLASS (East Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I beg to move in amendment:

That all the words after the word "that" in the main motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"In the opinion of this House, in view of the universal world shortage of flax and other fibres used in industry, resultant from the devastation wrought in those countries which have hitherto been the world's largest producers, and in view of the peculiar adaptability of the soil and climatic conditions in many parts of Canada for successfully growing flax and hemp fibre of the best quality, as is evidenced by the success already attained by Canadian growers; and further, having in view the enormous possibilities in economic industry, not only in the fibre produced but in its many and varied by-products, it is desirable that the Government should give consideration of ways and means necessary to further increase the production of these fibres and to generally lend such co-operation as may be required to permanently establish the industry in this country on a stable basis, to the end that its full economic value in its many and varied uses, may as far as possible be conserved within the Dominion."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I do not feel, in view of the great national and international importance of increased production of flax fibre, owing to the conditions which prevail at the present time, that I owe this House an apology at this late hour for introducing a subject which, in my opinion, is entitled to the most serious consideration of this Government. The subject of flax fibre production has been more generally drawn to the attention of the nations of the world, in view of the increased use for it, and of the new methods of use, and by reason of the fact it has been found impossible to find any other material to adequately take its place. Sir, at the present time the governments of all the nations which are at war practically are striving to use every means possible within their power to increase the growth of flax fibre in their various districts. Russia, which in the past has been a large world-producer of flax fibre, not by any means of the best quality, but in volume the largest producer, is shut off from that trade. Her markets are absolutely closed at the present time to Canada or to any of the allied countries. France and Belgium, which have been the producers of the higher grade of flax fibre for many years back, are practically devastated and overrun, and production there is almost out of the question. Ireland, which has been for almost centuries a large producer of flax, was also a very large importer of the raw fibre. While Ireland to-day produces in domestic linen one-third of the production of the whole world—in other words while Ireland possesses about one-third of the spindles that are being used in the world—she does not by any means, and has not in the past, produced anything like the proportion of raw fibre that she spins into yarns and uses for other purposes. Ireland has been a big importer of fibre from Russia of the coarser grades, and a big importer from France, Belgium and other countries which produce high grade fibre for the spinning of yarn and the weaving of linen. In view of the extraordinary conditions that prevail in Belgium and France, and owing to the conditions which prevail in Russia at the present time, the world's productive markets of flax fibre are practically closed to Great Britain and her Allies. Already the Food Board of Britain have been so strongly impressed with the necessity of increasing the production of this commodity that they have under Government direction appropriated, it is stated, some £2,000,000, or $10,000,000, to encourage the larger production, and Great Britain has directly under her control two large areas, which are set aside, of 10,000 acres each, in which, to produce fibre for the purposes of the Government, which, generally speaking and strictly speaking, are for the purpose and manufacture of aeroplane wings. The use of flax fibre and flax linen in the construction of aeroplanes is an entirely new industry, and I understand it has been impossible to get any other material which will take the application of whatever formula may be necessary to cover the cloth to resist the atmospheric effects while being used in flying. Therefore, Great Britain, in view of the urgency and the emergency, has seen fit to practically commandeer the entire production of the fibre of Great Britain. She does not to-day allow a dollar's worth of fibre to be sent out of the country. In Canada, while we have weaving mills, and while we, ourselves, have been able to grow a fibre of excellent quality, and have been able to send the fibre to the United States and Ireland to be spun into yarn, we have not got any industry in this country which connects up that important part of the industry in Canada—that is the spinning of the yarn from the raw fibre, producing the yarn from which the weaving mills may weave their linen. We had a discussion on the subject of flax fibre in this House just exactly two years ago, and at that time the development of the industry was not as far advanced as it is at the present time, and I want to say to the House candidly that in my opinion, due to the efforts the Government put forth at that time, to the influence of the higher prices which have prevailed since that time, I repeat to the stimulus of increased prices, and to the stimulus of the fibre department of the Department of Agriculture, the development of fibre production has gone forward at a very reasonable pace; in other words, the productive value for the year 1917 represents more than six times the total productive value of the fibre in the year 1915. That is due to a certain extent to the higher price which prevails for the raw fibre. The flax industry has been a difficult one to handle. It has been difficult all down through the ages. It dates back many, many years, in fact two thousand years ago, when flax was produced by methods very much similar to those which prevail to-day. I have pointed out that the industry is one of very ancient origin, and if I may be permitted to draw the attention of the House to the historical side of the facts, I trust I may be pardoned, because I feel that the subject is one of very great interest and one of very great importance, especially to the district in which I live, and as I will be able to show to the members of this House, of very great interest to almost every district within the Dominion. The cultivation of flax and manufacture of its fibre is the most ancient of all textile industries dating back to the early period of the world's history, very distinct traces of its existence during the stone age have been preserved to the present day. The great value of the plant has been known and appreciated for thousands of years, but in matter of preparation generally it stands almost where it was 3,000 years ago. It is said that it was a well established industry in Egypt at the dawn of the Christian era. Three thousand years ago the Phoenicians devoted much attention to cultivation of the plant, and subsequently the Greeks and Romans made the working of flax fibre a part of the household duties. Hon. members who are familiar with the volume of Sacred-Writ, (I hope all are) will remember that one of the plagues sent to Pharaoh and his people and referred to in the book of Exodus was the plague of hail, and it is there recorded " that the flax and the barley was smitten, for the barley was in the ear and the flax was bolled " the wheat and the rye were not smitten; for they were not grown up.

I call the attention of the House to the fact that much the same methods of cultivating flax prevail to-day as those which were followed three thousand years ago. In the growing of this crop almost the same system of rotation is followed; that is a flax crop succeeds wheat or barley. In the book of Joshua it is recorded that Joshua sent out two spies to view the land, even Jericho, and the king sent his men to search for them. They came to the house of a woman named Rahab. She took the spies up to the roof of her house, and hid them in the stalks of flax which she had laid in order on the roof. The flax was spread out on the roof, exposed to the weather, and retted in the same way as it is now spread out on the lawn, or on the grass in the fields, exposed to the rain and in this way retted.

I have further references to the historical side of this question, but it is too late to elaborate on them. I wish to draw the attention of the House, however, to the fact that in bringing gifts in those olden days they always associated fine linen with gold, silver and precious metals. All through the Holy Book we find frequent mention of flax and linen.

It is apparent that the flax industry is of very ancient origin, and thousands of years ago people manufactured the finest and best grades of linen. This in itself is not so much a matter of amazement as is the fact that throughout the centuries there should be so little advance in the methods of preparing a commodity that was classed amongst the most valuable in merchandise. It practically stands to-day very much the same as it stood over three thousand years ago, in as much as the method of retting is generally substantially the same as it was when linen was first manufactured by the Egyptians, and this notwithstanding the fact that the preparation of flax for the market is a highly scientific and technical process.

The history of flax in Canada dates back about three hundred years. Records show that the earliest settlers on this continent brought with them the seed of the flax plant. In the year 1617 the first farmer who landed in the province of Quebec occupied and cleared that piece of land where now stands the court house of the city which bears that name, built himself a cabin and commenced farming. Some thirty or forty years later, about thirty-five miles below the city of Quebec on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, at a place called St. Joachim, was established a sort of experimental farm, and on this farm one of the principal crops, in an experimental way, was flax. Professor Grisdale, Director of our Dominion Experimental Farms, referring to this incident at the flax convention held in London, Ont., on the 28th of February, 1917, said that he had had the pleasure of visiting this old district in the autumn of 1916 and had come across some French farmers from whom he learned that they had been growing flax not merely for the grain but for the fibre ever since they could remember; further, that there was a history or legend in their family, that this was some old flax brought over by the family of Hebert some three hundred years ago. The habitants throughout these many years, and the settlers in many other parts, scutched out, heckled and spun as well as wove their yarns into linens, and some of the linen is to be found in the homes of these people to this day.

Flax, therefore, it is proven has been grown and manufactured in this country ever since the country was first settled. Before the invention of the cotton-gin cheapened the production of cotton fabric, flax spinning and weaving was a common household industry. The older generation of the present day can remember the spinning wheel and distaff wound with flax in the corner of the country kitchen.

The importance of the industry was early recognized and in the United States was carefully fostered by legislation. As early as the year 1640 the Massachusetts General Assembly passed an Act to encourage the production of flax, which was followed by similar action by other states, including Pennsylvania, Maryland and Virginia. In the year 1719 a large immigration of Scotch-Irish from Londonderry improved colonial knowledge of the cultivation and manufacture of flax. Encouragement was given to its manufacture in a household way, and in the year 1791 it is recorded that in the two states, Massachusetts and Rhode Island, 25,265 yards of linen were manufactured in the homes, and that in the year 1810 the production in families throughout the United States was 21,211,262 yards, the flax being mostly grown by the families who made the linen. Experience, however, later showed the invention of the cotton-gin and the consequent cheapening of cotton cloth, to a large extent destroyed this household industry in the United States as well as in the Dominion, but by no means killed the linen industry. For certain purposes linen is indispensable. In strength, beauty, and durability it so far surpasses cotton that it maintains its place in spite of all competition. It is significant that at the time of the civil war in the United States the production of flax was less than five million pounds. To be accurate, in the year 1860 records show the production of fibre to have been 4,720,145 pounds, and ten years later this had jumped to 27,133,034 pounds. By 1880, the production had shrunk to 1,565,546 pounds. In 1870 thirty-two states of the Union were producing flax fibre, so that it was shown the soil and climatic conditions were favourable in many parts, though the statistics also showed that 26,484,319 of the amount was produced in nine states—Illinois, Iowa, Kentucky, Michigan, New York, New Jersey, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Wisconsin. Of this amount Ohio produced 17,880,624 pounds. But the real reason why, on this continent, flax has not occupied that foremost position amongst the fibre and weaving industries that it formerly held is due primarily to the disadvantage under which we are in this country with regard to labour. We are in competition with the cheap labour of Russia, Belgium and other countries.

Flax, although grown in a rotation, and although grown like any other field crop, is rather complex and difficult to handle and the labour cost of production is very much greater than that of any other crop. Flax has to go through various processes in order to produce a marketable article in the shape of fibre. The people on this continent have not given serious consideration to the proper tilling and preparation of the soil necessary to produce the best results. Very frequently it has been considered that an old pasture which has to a certain extent played out is a suitable field on which to grow a crop of flax. Besides, where it has been grown that serious attention has not been paid to fertilization which is given to other crops, and consequently the yields have been dissappointing. It has been reported that in the West, where flax is largely grown for seed, the yield per acre runs from a ton to a ton and a half. On the other hand it is quite a common thing in Belgium, France and Germany to produce a crop of three and a half tons, and even as high as four tons per acre. I think, however, that a fair average crop in those countries where flax has been successfully grown is about three tons to the acre.

In this country the method of encouraging the culture of flax has been something along this line: Certain groups of men, who have established flax mills, say to the farmer, "We want you to grow so many acres of flax each year; we will give you the seed free, you plough the land, put the seed in and deliver the crop; we will provide all the necessary labour, after furnishing the seed to you." After the flax is grown the process has been to pull it by hand, but that is only possible profitably where you have cheap labour. In western Ontario we have used a great many Indians. Sometimes boys and young girls have been able to earn a little money in this calling; but whereas in days gone by a field of flax could be pulled at a cost of about $4 per acre the price has rapidly advanced and at the present time it costs about $15 per acre for hand pulling, which is a very great detriment to the development of the flax industry in this country, because if as high as $15 per acre has to be paid for pulling the flax it is not possible to compete with the countries where it costs only $4 per acre for pulling.

As the flax is pulled it has got to be cured. It has to be de-seeded and in the absence of a mechanical contrivance it practically means that all this work has got to be done by hand. When the de-seeder has removed the seed the flax is laid out on the ground again and exposed to the dews and the rains until, in a very short space of time, the outer woody substance which must be separated from the fibre itself before it can be used, has retted. Now after the retting is done the flax has to be dried again and then gathered up and taken to the mill. I am pointing out the disadvantages under which we have suffered from the standpoint of hiring labour. The flax is delivered by the farmer to the mill and the miller then takes charge if it, but nearly all the processes within the mill have been, to a more or less extent, of a primitive nature and have not enjoyed that development in mechanical devices which almost every other industry of a similar character has experienced. Therefore it has been a costly commodity to manufacture. The different processes which flax has had to undergo on the way to the spinner have been of the old-fashioned character, and as a result the cost has been so great that it has not been, up till recent years, so attractive a proposition for the farmer who is the producer, or for the miller who produces the fibre. It is an old-fashioned saying, however, that necessity is the mother of invention, and when we discussed this subject two years ago in the House we were in this position: There had been no machine discovered which could suitably pull that flax in the field. The old method of hand labour went on, and until last season old methods were still in vogue: The flax was pulled by hand and retted on the ground. Two years ago we had a man in the city of Ottawa who had been working for some years on a machine, and who devised one that in a way did—not altogether effectively by any means, for it was not mechanically perfect—in an imperfect way perform the work of pulling flax. In the year 1916 I visited the flax fields in western Ontario during the harvest season and the most astonishing thing to me was that there was a machine invented in 1837, and bronght into the country in the year 1857, and sixty years after its introduction into Canada was still working in the fields of western Ontario and in a way doing the work of pulling flax. Notwithstanding that the inventor of that machine knew the principle and the idea called for, human ingenuity and the skill of scientists had failed to evolve a perfect machine whereby flax could be economically pulled to meet the competition of cheap labour.

But, as I have said, necessity is the mother of invention, and I am glad to say that now—I have it on the authority of the flax producers of western Ontario—that a gentleman who formerly lived in Montreal, Mr. J. H. Tombyll, has perfected a machine which effectively, efficiently, and satisfactorily performs the work of pulling flax. If such is the case that machine will be of incalculable value to our flax growers and to our farmers, because it will solve once for all the problem of cheap labour in connection with the pulling of flax. The countries of France, Belgium and Russia will never in all likelihood hereafter have the same opportunities of cheap labour that they have enjoyed in the past, but even should this anticipation prove to be unfounded we have now in Canada a satisfactory method of meeting their competition. The best evidence that the machine in question is satisfactory is that it worked in the fields most successfully last year. One western Ontario grower has bought sixteen of the machines for operation next year, and another has purchased eighteen. I have it from men who are producers and growers in that part of Ontario that the machine is working satisfactorily. Therefore, I figure it is safe to assume that we have practically solved the difficulty of pulling flax economically. I am also told, strange as it may be, that almost concurrently with the development of this device in Canada they have perfected a machine of the same kind in Ireland, and that they have not only perfected a pulling machine but also a scutching machine. The very need which has been pressed home upon growers in Ireland, just as it has been pressed home upon our growers here, has driven them to a solution of the problem which has disturbed them and which they had not been able to solve for a period of hundreds of years back. Had we nothing else to encourage us at the present time in developing the growth of flax than the fact that we have solved the problem of cheap labour for the harvesting of it, it would still be a great incentive and encouragement for us to go on and develop the industry in this country, because the product of flax outrivals in value per acre at the present time any cereal that we grow.

I am at liberty, I presume, to make that statement here, because I visited the Experimental Farm the other day, and told Prof. Grisdale that one prominent grower in western Ontario, who is a very large producer, Mr. Howard Fraleigh, of Forest, told me that he had sold his flax fibre this year at the rate of $1,400 a ton, and his average production on the ground he cultivated was 400 pounds of fibre to the acre. The average production of seed was from eight to nine bushels to the acre. That seed of western Ontario to-day has established such a reputation in Great Britain and Ireland that it is practically the only seed being used for the fibre they are expecting to produce for their æroplanes next year. Now, Prof. Grisdale told me, when I thought that was an extraordinarily good price, that they have samples of fibre from Quebec, Nova Scotia, British Columbia, Ontario, New Brunswick, and practically from all parts of Canada sent from experimental farms and stations where they have been grown to be put through the appliances for scutching and heckling in the flax mill at the Experimental Farm, Ottawa, and to be put in shape for the market. Here is fibre, drawn from all the districts of Canada, making a conglomerate collection of various qualities no doubt, and grown under different conditions, yet the total product of all that fibre this year has been sold by the farm at the price of $1,400 per ton. I do not know how far that goes. I would suggest, however, that the product of this year gathered at the Central Experimental Farm would mean that the overhead cost of operation had been almost covered by the sale of fibre this year. I hope that is a condition which does prevail, because it would be a justification for what has already been done, as well as a substantial reason why the Department of Agriculture should even go further than they have gone.

I said that the seed grown in the province of Ontario to-day is practically the only seed that is being used in Ireland in the production of fibre with which the British Government next year propose to construct their æroplane wings. I understand it is also used in the body of the machines. Two years or so ago, at a large world fibre show held in Ireland, flax grown in Ireland from Canadian fibre seed won first prize against the competition of the whole world. In Ireland last year or the year before, it is stated—and I have it vouched for by those who have seen it—that if you go through the country in the districts where this commodity is grown, the reputation of Ontario flax seed has made such headway that along the farms on big signboards you will see in strong outstanding letters the words "Flax Fibre from Canadian Seed." In Ireland at the present time the value of Ontario seed for fibre is $10 a bushel. I submit that we have established a reputation that it is our duty to carefully guard and protect against the inroads of other countries and of other seeds which may be brought into competition with ours.

Just here I want to draw the attention of the minister to a certain matter, and I have no doubt he is fully apprised of it and may have taken action. The British Government have found difficulty in getting seed. Notwithstanding that in Ireland they produce a very good quality of fibre, I am told that they cannot allow the straw to mature sufficiently so that the seed will be sufficiently ripened to be used for another crop. For that reason, in the past, Ireland has largely depended for her seed on Holland. We in Ontario, or in Canada, have been using Dutch seed; we have grown it here, for the general practice has been to continue its growth in Ontario for a period of four years, and experience has shown that it gradually runs out, and must be replenished with new seed. Now, the seed we have sent to Ireland is a Holland seed we have grown for one year in this country, and then shipped to Ireland to meet the needs of this year. Were it not for the seed supplied by Canada, notwithstanding the need for fibre in the armies next year, there would not have been seed available in any part of the world to meet the need. To that extent we have helped the Mother Country and the Empire, and we can well congratulate ourselves and the department on our foresight in stimulating this industry, so that instead of growing the few thousand acres we did in 1916, our increase for last year was practically equal to almost double the product of two years ago.

Now, Great Britain was bringing over from Japan, or some one was bringing from Japan, a large amount of seed, which came across from Vancouver as far as Montreal. I am speaking of this as reported in the papers, and as the press shows it by advertisements, about which I am going to say something later. Of this seed, some 400 tons got as far as Montreal, where it was put into the British war stores. Owing to the fact that it could not come forward in time, and that when it did come forward Canadian seed had already preceded it to the old country, and as therefore the need of it was not so great in the old country, it was held in Canada, as well as for the reason that transportation for it could not be procured. Now, the British Government has sent out to Canada—I would like the House to pay careful attention to this, for I think it is a matter of vital importance that must be protected—Col. Wayland, of Winnipeg, who represents a Winnipeg firm, to arrange for the distribution of this seed amongst our farmers, not for fibre, because the straw and fibre goes to the farmer, but for the purpose of reproducing seed which they are going to grow in Ireland and Great Britain next year for fibre. I do not know what this seed is; I do not know whether the Government knows what it is; I do not know how good and substantial it may be for fibre. But these are the terms on which it is being peddled out to the farmer to grow this year in Canada. Col. Wayland comes here under the authority of the Home Government, and he has a department at work in Toronto under the direction of Col. Pratt, who has put double headline columns in the papers advertising the distribution of this flaxseed. If the farmers of Canada grow this flax this year, they get the seed free; the only condition is that from the crop grown they shall return bushel for bushel advanced them for seeding; any crop over this they are guaranteed a market for at a fair price of $4.50 a bushel. That seed is being grown in the province of Ontario and in western Canada. I do not know, but I think it is being grown practically wherever farmers will take it and grow it. I submit to the minister most respectfully, that wherever that seed goes it should be carefully earmarked. Now that we have established the reputation in Ireland for producing a seed from which a fibre of the highest quality can be produced, and which commands the price of $10 a bushel in the home market, there is an opening for an immense amount of injury to ourselves and to the grower at home if these seeds I have referred to become mixed with our own, which can quite easily be done unless they are carefully marked.

I do not pretend to suggest how the interests of Canada will be protected, but it might be in this way. If a farmer should grow seed from Canadian flax seed which has been demonstrated to be sound and good for fibre, and for which the British Government is prepared to pay ten dollars a bushel, that seed should be kept separate from any other seed that is grown, and used as seed for next year, because, if our production increases in the same ratio as during the past two years, we shall likely have a hundred thousand bushels of fibre seed for export instead of forty or fifty thousand. There is, however, the possibility of this other seed going to Ireland as Canadian fibre seed and, grown there, being found to be absolutely unfit for fibre. In that case, the reputation which we have built up over these years is going to be seriously damned. We must guard our interests in that respect. I do not think it is necessary to point out the difficulties that present themselves any further than to suggest to the minister and the department that this matter should be very carefully watched.

I want to tell my hon. friends from Quebec that, on my visit to the Experimental Farm the other day, while I had always been under the impression that the farmers of Ontario had the reputation of growing the best fibre on the continent of America, I was told by the fibre expert at the Experimental Farm and also by Professor Grisdale that the best fibre produced under experimental conditions in Canada last year was that grown in Gaspé, Quebec.

Mr. LEMIEUX: We are far ahead.

Mr. GLASS: I was also told that in Annapolis Valley, Nova Scotia, a quantity of flax not second to that grown in Quebec, was produced.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The old Acadians—the same thing.

Mr. GLASS: We grow a large quantity of fibre in Ontario. I do not know what success my hon. friends would have if they put in a large crop. I can appreciate how a few acres properly tilled and cultivated might produce much better results than a large area of several thousand acres. We, however, envy the people of Quebec the reputation they have made, and they can be close competitors with us in developing this industry which in the future, will have great bearing upon the economic conditions of our country.

In many of the provinces of Canada it has been demonstrated that we can produce fibre of excellent quality. That is true of the lower provinces, of Ontario, and of British Columbia. I am not prepared to say just how far the western provinces produce a high-grade fibre, but even in those provinces very great improvement could be made if an honest effort were made to produce straw for its fibre. But in the West they have largely been content to produce flax for seed purposes only, and that has proved a very profitable business. We make the fibre, and we are shipping nearly all the fibre we produce to the mills of New Jersey and Massachusetts. There it is spun into yarns, and with those yarns they make coarse cloths. They spin it into twines and yarns for shoemakers threads and harnessmakers threads, and into twine for fish nets and gill nets. We have shipped some fibre to Ireland where it is spun into yarns and manufactured into cloth. The Belfast linen mills, the largest spinning mills in the world to-day, have men engaged in controlling some thousands of acres of land in Ontario where they are growing this flax for the purpose of their spinning mills in Ireland, because they cannot get the quantity they want there. They are growing fibre here, retting it here, and shipping it to Ireland. If the Irish mills, which control one-third of all the spindles of the world, can send their men out here to produce in Canada fibre for the raw material for their mills, why can not we establish spinning mills in our country and connect up our weaving industry? We produce the raw material, the fibre from which the yarns are spun. That fibre has to go out of this country to be spun into yarn, and then the yarns spun from it are brought back here to be woven into linen cloth. In Guelph we have the only linen weaving industry on the continent of America. We can produce the fibre and we can weave the cloth. Why should we allow ourselves to remain in the ridiculous position of not being able to spin the essential material for our weaving mills, which is the yarn spun from our fibre? I merely suggest how this should be done. In the past we have seen fit to grant bounties for the development of zinc and iron, and for other purposes. If a small bounty spread over a period of two or three years would result in the establishment of spinning mills in this country, it would be a good business policy to give encouragement in that way. At the present time we produce in this country enough raw material to keep five substantial spinning mills running. If our production this year increases in the ratio that is already promised, we shall almost double our capacity during the present year.

[Mr. Glass.]

During the last discussion of this question in the House, the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), who spoke, drew attention to the objection farmers had that flax was injurious to the soil. In connection with this discussion, I desire to put on record the opinion of some men who are competent to upset any such opinion, and to deny any such charge as that. During the discussion of the subject of flax at a convention held in the city of London in the spring of 1916, amongst others who spoke there was a Mr. Leitch, a practical farmer, who had been growing flax for some years for the mills in that district. This is what Mr. Leitch says as to the effect of flax on soil:

> I have grown flax for a number of years. After flax I always sow wheat and taking the wheat crop into consideration, it will pretty nearly pay for both crops. I have threshed 42 bushels of wheat to the acre after flax with straw five or six feet long. After yields like that we do not worry about flax being hard on the land. That year I grew 3½ tons per acre.

Professor Zavitz of the Experimental Farm writing in the Farmer's Advocate a short time ago, said:

> The actual amount of fertilizing constituents taken from the soil by different crops is an important matter from the farmer's standpoint. To secure this information it is necessary to have a knowledge of both the yields and the chemical composition of the crops. Unfortunately, the statistics gleaned by both the Dominion and the Provincial Governments do not furnish sufficient data for these calculations. For instance, the Ontario Bureau of Industries has not collected information in regard to yields of seed and straw of flax or of straw of cereals. At the Agricultural College, however, accurate determinations are made from year to year of the yields of both grain and straw per acre of the different farm crops.
> Flax, winter wheat, oats and barley have been grown under similar conditions in the experimental grounds at Guelph in each of the past twelve years. The varieties used for these determinations of the comparative exhaustiveness of soil fertility were Common flax, Dawson's Golden Chaff winter wheat, Banner oats and Mandscheuri barley. In each case the chaff was included with the straw. The flax was grown in duplicate plots each year with an average of 77 pounds of seed per acre, and the average returns, therefore, represent twenty-four tests in the twelve-year period.
> For the chemical composition the figures used were obtained from the 1915 edition of "Feeds and Feeding" by Henry and Morrison with the exception of those of flax straw which are not given in that publication. For the chemical composition of the flax straw use has been made of the figures determined by Kennedy in his thesis prepared at the Ontario Agricultural College. The flax was obtained from the Field Husbandry Department, and it was analyzed in the Chemical Department of this institution. The following table gives the average annual yields for the twelve-year period and the amount of fertilizing constituents obtained through the sources previously indicated:

Varieties.		Yield per Acre.		Nitrogen N.		Phosphoric Acid P205.		Potash K20.
		Bushels and tons.	Pounds.	Per Cent.	Total in Crop (Lbs.)	Per Cent.	Total in Crop (Lbs.)	Per Cent.	Total in Crop (Lbs.)
Common Flax	Seed	18·3	1024	3·62	37·1	1·50	15·4	·95	9·7
	Straw	2·45	4900	·72	35·3	·31	15·2	1·02	50·00
Dawson's G. C. Winter Wheat	Seed	43·2	2590	1·87	48·4	·85	22·0	·52	13·5
	Straw	2·22	4440	·50	22·2	·13	5·8	·74	32·9
Banner oats	Seed	75·0	2550	1·98	50·5	·81	20·7	·56	14·3
	Straw	2·07	4140	·58	24·0	·21	8·7	1·50	62·1
Mandscheuri barley	Seed	63·4	3043	1·84	56·0	·85	25·9	·74	22·5
	Straw	1·98	3780	·56	21·2	·18	6·8	1·20	45·4

The yields of all four crops are considerably larger than the average yields of the province. It should be clearly understood, however, that the experiments have been conducted under uniform conditions. The crops were grown during the twelve years immediately previous to 1917. The land received a four years' rotation during which three crops were removed from the soil. Farmyard manure was applied every four years at the rate of twenty tons (about twelve good sized loads) per acre. No commercial fertilizers were used with any of these crops throughout the period. If the yields here given were divided by two they would more closely correspond with the average yields of the Province.

The following summary gives in a more concise form the average amounts per acre of fertilizing constituents taken annually by the four crops and in accordance with the yields and the compositions given in the previous table:

Varieties.	Pounds per Acre.
	Nitrogen N.	Phosphoric Acid P205.	Potash K20.
Common flax	72·4	30·6	59·7
Dawson's Golden Chaff winter wheat	70·6	27·8	46·4
Banner oats	74·5	29·4	76·4
Mandscheuri barley	77·2	32·7	67·9

Of our four individual crops, winter wheat took a less amount of each of the fertilizing constituents from the soil than of the others. Barley required the largest amount of nitrogen and phosphric acid and oats the largest amount of potash. The comparative exhaustion of these crops on the soil is largely a matter of the disposal of the crop after it is grown. Both the grain and straw of oats and barley are principally consumed on the farm and much of the fertility is returned to manure. In the case of wheat, the grain is sold and the straw is largely retained. In the growing of flax, however, both the seed and the straw are frequently sold outright. The market value of these crops per acre, however, are usually the lowest for oats and barley and decidedly the highest for flax. It is interesting to note that the number of acres of flax in Ontario was approximately 4,000 in 1915, 5,200 in 1916, and 8,000 in 1917; and that the value of fibre per ton and of seed per bushel for the same period was as follows: 1915, $400, $1.60; 1916, $600, $3.00; and 1917, $1,100. $5.50. As there is a strong demand for both the fibre and the seed the probabilities are that the acreage of flax for 1918 will be still greater than that of the past year.

The quotation I have read shows that the opinion that flax reduces the fertility of the soil is not justified. I have here the Farmer's Bulletin of the Department of Agriculture, Washington dated May 25, 1915, and edited by Frank C. Miles, Scientific Assistant, Fibre-plant Investigations. He says:

It has been found upon investigation that an average crop of flax removes less plant food from the soil than does a crop of corn or oats. Flax plants have delicate root systems which occupy only the upper few inches of the soil, while the plants of oats and corn have more vigorous root systems which may penetrate the sub-soil. Hence, oats and corn may obtain from the sub-soil a portion of the food materials essential for plant development, but flax plants necessarily must obtain practically their entire nourishment from the upper few inches of surface soil which the roots occupy. Undoubtedly then, more of the available plant food in the upper 5 or 6 inches of soil is removed by flax than by the deeper rooted crops. Therefore, in preparing flax stubble for the succeeding crop care should be taken to plow deep enough to bring up some of the sub-soil in order to replenish the surface soil with available plant food.

Professor Saunders, who made investigations at the Experimental Farm in 1896, says:

Doubtless there are many prejudices in connection with the growth of flax. The farmers have the idea that its growth exhausts the soil, but the experiments carried on by the Department of Agriculture during the years 1906-1908, the results of which appear in Bulletin No. 59, show that this view is unwarranted. The Bulletin asks the question, does flax exhaust the soil? This question is usually answered in the affirmative, but this opinion does not appear to be warranted by the chemical analyses which have been made of this crop, showing the principal elements of fertility taken from the soil during the period of its growth. The results which have been obtained by chemical examination have furnished the following figures, which represent approximately the plant food removed from the soil by flax, wheat and oats.

The figures mentioned to this (to quote Professor Saunders):

It will be seen that the grain in the case of wheat crop, takes up a little more nitrogen, nearly one-third less of phosphoric acid, and about one-eighth less of potash. The difference, however, in exhaustive effect of these several crops on a rich soil would scarcely be perceptible, and would not justify the opinion that flax is a very exhausting crop.

Another eminent authority, Dr. A. W. Thornton, of Bellingham, state of Washington, who edited a new book, entitled, "The American System of Flax and Other Fibre Culture" only last year which gives considerable information on this subject, says:

SOIL AND SOIL EXHAUSTION.

Right here it may not be out of place to refer to a very generally held, though erroneous notion, that flax is very exhaustive on the soil. In this connection I cannot do better than quote from C. R. Dodge, report No. 10, on Flax Culture, in the United States, published by the U. S. Department of Agriculture, in which Mr. Eugene Boss, a leading authority on the subejct, states as follows: "There is a strong prejudice among some people against the culture of flax, they say flax is hard on the land. I am painfully impressed in regard to the wisdom of those who advocate such an untrue thing, because of their ignorance of the composition of the plant, its habits and needs. Yes, the flax is hard on the land, when the farmer plows his land shallow, sows it thinly, and allows the weeds too much room to fill the space, then it is not the flax that ruins the land, but that very rapacious enemy, the weeds. Plow the land shallow, and you do not let the plant follow its natural course. You force its roots to feed on the surface, and there lies one of the reasons why flax, as commonly cultivated, remains short and dries up instead of ripening naturally. The moisture it so much requires is too quickly absorbed. It is true I have seen fields of pretty long flax that have been sown on very shallow land, but that land was very rich or very open, with a propitious season. I deny that flax is harder on land than wheat, rye, oats, or barley, when similarly cultivated, it wants a deep soil, 10 or 12 inches at least, thoroughly pulverized in order to allow its main root to go straight down into the earth and find there most of the elements essential to healthy growth.

[Mr. Glass.]

He goes on in this way, and his comments on the article show that he is entirely opposed to the theories generally prevailing among the farming community as to the exhaustion of the soil. So much for the flax which we have been growing in Ontario and several other provinces. There is another side of the flax question which is of very great interest to the people of western Canada, and I desire to draw the attention of the House to the developments and the investigations that have been going along in that direction. It is generally understood that farmers of the West have not produced a class of fibre which can be spun into yarn and from yarn woven into high grade linen. The invention and perfecting of a flax puller by the Flax Harvesting Company, Limited, of Brantford, Ont., which is the same machine known as the Tombyll already referred to—has provided a simple, effective and proven puller, promises to be an immense stimulant to farmers throughout the country, and if used by the farmers of the West will add many thousands of dollars of value to the straw product. Indoor retting under the Feuillette system has been in operation for some years, and in France six years ago a substantial grant was made by the French Government to the inventor. A machine for deseeding flax straw has been perfected, the work being done without breaking or tangling the straw, and is now on the market. Bulletin No. 669, published by the Department of Agriculture, Washington, also shows the quantity of linen fibre produced.

The company known as the Flax Fibre Development Association, under the management of Mr. F. L. Van Allen, of Regina, Sask., encouraged by the provincial government, have made, they claim, substantial progress in methods of utilization of western flax straw. They claim to have produced on a commercial basis, yarns binder-twine, heavy commercial twines and fine commercial twines, all from fibre of western flax straw. The seed is threshed, but must not pass through the blower. The fibre is extracted from the straw by mechanical process, treated by their own methods, which can be carried out under cover without regard to climatic conditions, the fibre then being drawn, spun, and twisted on standard soft fibre machinery. As the problems affecting western straw are vastly different from those in the East, they have had to be solved by scientific research. The objects of the company have been defined as follows: To separate and extract fibre from flax straw by purely mechanical means, and without having to resort to what is commonly known as retting, and to manufacture the product into various articles of merchandise. It is estimated that throughout the Canadian West some 2,000,000 tons of flax straw are burnt annually. The flax plant there being grown solely for its seed (linseed).

Mr. MORPHY: I have been told that the western flax for fibre is not a success and that there is no long fibre in it.

Mr. GLASS: That is correct; that is my information, and that is confirmed by those who are in a position to know. In the West flax is grown entirely different from the way it is grown here. It is not grown for the fibre, but for the seed, and the methods of growing flax and feeding the soil are quite different from the methods used in Ontario. They grow a short plant that develops a large amount of seed, but a very short straw, and the process of pulling is not in vogue there. The straw is cut by the ordinary harvesting machine, so as to get the seed. Very little value is attached to the straw for fibre purposes. It has been wasted, but research and investigation have shown that this straw can be devoted to a very useful purpose in industry. In the past, however, from the standpoint of purely fibre production, it has not been a success. Notwithstanding the enormous amount of seed grown with which to make linseed oil, and any one who has had occasion to use that commodity under present conditions will realize that its advance from 50 cents a gallon to about $2.50 a gallon, shows the enormous world increase in the demand for that commodity of linseed oil.

Mr. MORPHY: What is the reason the flax industry has ceased to be successful in Canada?

Mr. GLASS: I think that question is answered by my observation a few minutes ago. Our experience here was the same as that of the United States. The old fossilized methods of pulling and handling flax and of treating it from the time it was pulled in the harvest field to the time it was manufactured into fibre were so crude and expensive that it could not compete with the cheap labour of Ireland, Belgium, France, Germany, Russian or, in fact, any of those European countries, where fibre was grown. Our labour was too expensive to compete with them. Having solved the problem of pulling flax, we have in a large measure put ourselves on a par with those countries, so far as the future development of the industry in this country is concerned. It is costing $15 an acre to pull this flax by hand. By the use of this machine, and under most improved methods of pulling by the machine, I understand that, at the present time, it can now be done for $2.50 an acre, and this may, in course of time be further reduced. In separating the seed from the plant by ordinary means of the thresher, the fibre in the straw of the West is sacrificed, and when recovered shows a length of from one to three inches only. The fibre has nevertheless a commercial value as a raw material for paper, pulp, felting, insulating, quilt, etc. Where the flax straw is threshed without its being broken the fibre when separated shows a length of about ten inches. This is a very valuable fibre and can be used in the manufacture of oakum and for cordage purposes. World wide shortage of fibres, especially line fibre, and all other fibres in sympathy, have necessarily forced substitution. The linen fields of the world have been the Baltic provinces of Russia, Northern France, Germany, Italy, Belgium, Great Britain, Ireland, Holland, Sweden, Austria, Denmark, Portugal and North and South America.

Of these countries, Belgium and Russia supplied the greater proportion of the world's supplies prior to the war, but these fields are completely under German control. With decreased production there has been increased demand, and at the present time the contingencies of war practically demand the total supplies in view, or in the near future possible of production. The first order of the American government for airplanes required a supply of over three and three-quarter million yards of line. Besides linen, the coarser fibres are short in supply. It is said that Canada alone can consume annually ten million pounds of twines. Increased shipbuilding will make an increased demand on cordage, and the movement for greater production is bound to have its influence in increasing the demand for binder twine. With this condition ahead, new sources of supply must be found for the standard fibres, or else suitable substitutes must be found in quantities sufficient for the needs. Will the vast fields of the West solve this problem? Can this substitute be found in the waste flax straw of the western prairies? Some think it can, and that the world's needs may be found and can be recovered from this waste in so far as the coarser commodities are concerned, just in such proportion as organized effort capital and research will solve the problem of converting into needed articles of manufacture these waste piles of flax straw. Efforts in this direction have been made over a period of many years with varying success and with many disappointments. We need not concern ourselves with the discouragements of the past, but hold fast to discoveries which under scientific investigation have lent hope, and so soon as these industrial problems seem to justify development, might not the nation join with capital in bringing to full fruition the possibilities that lie within them? In Saskatchewan the provincial government have shown a determination to join with private enterprise, and have already given aid and encouragement to the solution of the problem of the utilization of western flax straw, with the result that fibre taken from this straw, grown on the farm lands of that province for seed purposes only, after proper treatment, has been spun into yarns and woven or manufactured into more than fifty different articles of every-day need. This company claim that from this waste fibre they have demonstrated that they can and are making:

1. Yarns giving 4,500 feet to the pound sufficiently fine for webbing for coarse towelling.

2. Commercial twines with even waxed surface, equal in quality to that used for heavy saddlery work, valued at 83 cents a pound.

3. Heavy commercial twines of all ranges valued at 50 cents a pound.

4. Binder twine of soft even surface, 3-ply spun, giving 750 to 900 feet to the pound with even breaking strain.

The treating and care of the fibre takes but a few hours and can be carried on under cover at all seasons. The cost of producing manufactured articles is less than with any other known raw material of equal quality.

The amount of waste flax straw is variously estimated for the western part of Canada to be from one to two million tons. Presuming the more conservative estimate be taken, and assuming that about one million tons is a safe calculation, then we have a straw from which it would seem possible to extract on the basis of the lowest estimate of extraction, namely, 25 per cent—notwithstanding that the Fibre Development Association claim that 35 per cent is possible—but even on the more conservative basis we would seem to have sufficient straw to produce 250,000 tons of good fibre, or a total of 500,000,000 pounds of the finest manufacturing product in its class, including all articles which can be made from hard fibres and the articles made from soft fibres, embracing a range from ship cable to coarse towelling. It is understood that there is in process of incorporation now in the West a new organization to be known as the Co-operative Cordage, Limited, who will take up manufacture in that branch of industry. The Flax Fibre Development company, it is claimed, can treat ten tons of fibre per day with the facilities now at their command, but this would have to be very largely increased if full advantage is to be taken of the straw available.

Every pound of binder twine for the 1919 harvest in Canada can be grown and manufactured in Canada cheaper than imported, on condition that capital and effort join hands and organize to that end. It is said Canada alone will require 60,000,000 pounds of binder twine for one crop. These investigations are in no sense new. They have been carried on and spread over a period of years. Final tests during recent years have shown that the matter is no longer in the region of theory, but practical results have been achieved. It is quite possible now to recover a large amount of money from what in the past has been an entirely waste product.

What are the claims that are pressing most strongly upon us at the present time? I have pointed out the need for increased production. I have pointed out the need, as expressed in the earnest solicitations of the Home Government and the American Government, for the production of every pound of flax fibre that can be produced in the Dominion during the present year. It may be that the last five hundred, or the last one hundred, aeroplanes constructed will be the deciding factor in this great war. We do not know. Those who know tell us that there is no other fibre, no other commodity, which can supply cloth suitable for the manufacture of areoplane wings or bodies. The food controller in England, the food controller in the United States and the food control board in Canada, have strongly impressed upon us the need for linen twine for the making of gill nets for fishing. Hon. members who are interested in that industry in the lower provinces must have been brought to a serious realization of what it may mean when we are told that unless we supply the fibre used in the manufacture of twines from which gill nets must be made, there is no other product that can be provided to take its place. We are told by the allied Governments that it is vitally essential that flax fibre shall be produced for the making of linen threads necessary for the sewing of army boots, harness, etc. That in itself should be a sufficient inspiration for us to speed up in our production to the very limit of our power. I take it Sir, that after all, there is possibly no greater stimulus that the grower can have than the return he receives on the labour employed and the money expended in producing this crop. As conditions are at present there is no crop grown that can compare in its value to the grower with flax. The British Government, in order to encourage the production of flax next year for government purposes, have made this arrangement with growers in Great Britain: they have said: we will give you the seed free if you grow the flax. We will guarantee to take every pound of straw and seed that you produce and we will give you $42.50 per ton for the straw with seed on. We will guarantee that the minimum return to you from the Government shall be not less than £14 per acre. That looks to me to be a splendid arrangement for the farmer in Great Britain because in that country it is quite possible to grow three and a half tons to the acre and if they can grow three and a half tons to the acre at $42.50 per ton it would seem to yield a liberal return. To get the maximum value out of it in this country farmers will have to adopt co-operative methods and establish a series of mills where the straw can be treated and turned into fibre the same as they now deliver their milk to the cheese factory and get their profit from the finished product in the form of cheese.

The British Government have likewise, in order to stimulate production of fibre, guaranteed that the minimum prices shall not be less than the following: No. 1 grade—and I may point out that in Ireland they have six different grades of fibre—forty shillings per stone for fourteen pounds, which is equal to 71½ cents per pound. That means a guarantee in Ireland of a price which is slightly above the maximum price that our growers have obtained in Canada. No. 2 grade, thirty-eight shillings per stone, or 68 cents per pound. No. 3 grade, thirty-six shillings per stone, or 64 cents per pound. No. 4 grade, thirty-four shillings per stone, or 60⅝ cents per pound. No. 5 grade, thirty-two shillings per stone, or 57 cents per pound. No. 6 grade, the lowest grade of all, I believe, 54 cents per pound, which is $1,080 a short ton.

Our flax growers sometimes say: These prices are good to-day but we do not know what they may be in future. One man informed me that he wished to put in two thousand acres of flax. That gentleman represented a company, whose name I need not mention, but he pointed out that in order to do as he would like would take $30,000 for seed at the present time. He said: I have to secure banking accommodation to the amount of $90,000 to carry me through until I could get any result from my investment. Even with the high cost of labour, if I have a good year and if war conditions continue and the present high prices are maintained, even approximately, I shall be safe, but if there should be a collapse and prices were to go down I should be in a very different position. That gentleman takes the position that the Government ought to guarantee a minimum price on the production of fibre. If the Government needs this commodity, and is of opinion that encouragement should be given towards its production, possibly it will grant a reasonable consideration for the purpose as it has done in the case of wheat and other commodities.

I have tried to suggest that the Government might give some encouragement to this industry. I suggest furthermore that the Government should consider the cost of producing the crop and of guaranteeing a minimum price to the producer in order to protect him from loss. In view of the great need of flax fibre the Government should start a propaganda through the press in order to assure the farmers in districts where flax can be grown, that it is just as patriotic a duty for them to produce flax fibre as it is for them to produce wheat and other commodities. I think that this matter is one of very great importance. I believe the farmer to-day has had it so impressed upon him the importance of producing wheat that he does not realize it is an equally national and patriotic duty on his part to produce every ton of flax fibre that he can. I believe that an advertisement in the agricultural press drawing the attention of the farmers of this country to the great need in this connection would be a big stimulus to the production of flax fibre in the districts where it should be grown for fibre purposes. We can grow wheat all through the western provinces, in fact all over the country, but the areas where fibre has been successfully grown, and where they have the mills to treat it when it is grown are very limited. Therefore, I submit that if the minister would, under the direction of the Department of Agriculture, point out to the farmers the essential need of flax fibre, the national need for the production of that fibre, and point out to them that in growing this commodity in districts where it can be successfully produced they are just as effectively and patriotically performing their duty to the state as if they were growing wheat, it would have an immense influence for good. I do not think I am mistaken in saying that in England a very urgent call has gone forth from the British Government for the production by us of flax to the limit of our ability.

I want also to say a word in connection with the production of hemp fibre. We have already shown that we can grow a superior hemp in this country. In the year 1916 Howard Fraleigh, of Forest, imported from Kentucky hemp seed for the purpose of experimenting on a tract of five acres. I was in his field in August of that year and saw the splendid stand of hemp there, some of it rising to a height of fifteen feet and the average height for the whole field being ten feet. This was his first experiment and his first crop. Mr. Fraleigh was so thoroughly satisfied with the results of his experiment that year that the following year he put in forty acres of hemp seed. Furthermore, stimulated by the success which he had obtained, other farmers in this district round him put in several acres, with an equal degree of success, for the year 1917. In February last, Howard Fraleigh said to me: I have had success with my experiments. I have demonstrated that I can grow in this country hemp of superior quality, and I am prepared as a result of the experiments I have made, after two years' practice, to put three hundred acres into seed this year for hemp. But he pointed out that hemp seed, while it came originally from China, was brought from that country to the United States and planted in Kentucky to acclimatize it, from which state it is imported into this country for seeding purposes. I presented the situation to the Minister of Agriculture and to the Minister of Customs in the early part of the year. Mr. Fraleigh pointed out, and I rather took sides with him, that inasmuch as he imported that hemp for seeding purposes, he was entitled to bring it in free of duty, as is permitted to be done in the case of other seeds. Now hemp seed costs $22.75 a bushel, and there has also to be paid on it customs duty and a war tax. No man is going to conduct experiments—it is really not an experiment because Mr. Fraleigh has proved it to be a commercial success—when there is such a large outlay involved, and I rather gathered from Mr. Fraleigh's latest statetment to me that to seed down three hundred acres to hemp was a responsibility rather more than he cared to assume under the circumstances. I desire to point out that Mr. Fraleigh is doing pioneer experimental work that might very well be undertaken by the Experimental Farm, and the Government would, in my opinion, not be going too far if it imported the seed itself and gave it to Mr. Fraleigh to enable him to continue his experiments. I would say more: if the Government distributed hemp seed throughout the country in order to demonstrate that hemp fibre, as well as flax fibre, can be successfully grown, it would be adopting a very beneficial policy in the interest of the country as a whole. Because hemp fibre is important from this standpoint: scientists tell us that it takes less from the soil than anything else that can be possibly grown. It grows like a large sugar cane and completely shades the soil, and weeds have no chance of living where it is grown. I went over his field and could not see a weed in any direction; it was absolutely clean. Mr. Fraleigh says that hemp seed is the best crop he can put in to help clean out the weeds.

Mr. MORPHY: I understood the hon. gentleman to say that hemp seed did not come in free of duty.

Mr. GLASS: I did not say that it did not come in; but that I thought it should come in free of duty. I was in hopes that the Department of Customs, or whatever department has charge of this matter, where a man was importing hemp seed for the purpose of seeding, would remit the duty. This man is importing it for experimental purposes, not for ordinary commercial purposes, and is doing the work that the Department of Agriculture might well do on its own farms at its own expense. This seed was imported by him direct from the shipper in Kentucky. Is it not reasonable that under those circumstances a man should have the same right to free entry as one who might be importing seed for growing? Now, hemp seed in the ordinary sense as we have known it, is a commercial seed used for bird seed, and as such it comes in subject to a duty, but it is an entirely different product from this seed which is brought in for fibre purposes. A man who is willing to take the chance to grow it and experiment with it should, in my opinion, be entitled to consideration. Mr. Fraleigh has been three years at this, and each recurring year has been presenting his case to the department, and I think the Customs Department might be liberal enough to decide that, under the ordinary tariff for seeds, this commodity brought in for that specific purpose should come in free. I may say that Mr. Fraleigh tells me further that the hemp fibre he has produced from this seed has been sent to the Smith and Dove Manufacturing Company of Andover, Mass., and they have said that the fibre is of as high a quality as has been produced anywhere on this continent. His fibre is a fibre of the very highest quality, and is being used at the present time in combination with linen, and a union linen is being made in these mills by the use of this hemp fibre and the flax fibre in conjunction.

Mr. Fraleigh also pointed this out to me a few weeks ago when I was there, that a hand scutcher is an experienced mechanic who cannot be trained in a day or two or in two or three years, and several of his men have already gone overseas. He says that he cannot get men for that purpose, and that each of these scutchers who has left could each week scutch enough fibre to make a complete aeroplane. I point this out to show that in view of the increase in our acreage of flax this year it is highly undesirable that any further depletion of our scutchers should be permitted.

I understand that a department of scientific research for flax or flax fibre has been established. I do not know just who comprise the special committee, who are devoting their attention to flax. I understand that Professor W. C. Murray, of the University of Saskatchewan, is chairman, and that Dr. Ruttan of McGill University, Dr. F. T. Shutt of the Experimental Farm, Dr. Ferd. Van Bruyssell and Professor Grisdale comprise the committee who have under advisement these matters regarding flax. I believe that the Government would make no mistake if they added to this committee a man like Howard Fraleigh. The Minister of Agriculture told us two years ago when he went over to Washington and skimmed the whole territory of the United States to get information concerning this subject, that when he got to the man who was supposed to be the chief authority there, he gave him the name of two men, one Mr. Summers of Port Huron, Mich., and then he added: "You have in Canada one of the best posted men on this subject on this continent in Howard Fraleigh." That was his tribute to this man. Mr. Fraleigh is a man who lives and dreams this subject all the time; his whole soul, heart and interest are in making the best success of the cultivation of flax. I would suggest to the minister that, in forming advisory committees, or in taking the advice of men who are capable to give advice in connection with flax development, I believe Howard Fraleigh would make a valuable addition to any council that may be appointed.

There is much, Mr. Speaker, to be said on this subject, so much, in fact, that I regret it got started at such a late hour. I do sincerely urge on the minister this one thing: so far as the industrial end is concerned some encouragement is necessary to establish the spinning of flax fibre in Canada, and so to connect up the producing industry to the weaving industry in this country. So long as we remain in our present position, we will be "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for the other fellow. We do all the hard labour in connection with production and with the delivery of the fibre, and when we get that done we send the fibre out of our country to be spun into yarns, then our weavers have to bring the yarn back into this country to be made into linen. The mill in Guelph, which represents an investment of three-quarters of a million, ships its linens to the United States, showing that it has the best market in the world at its disposal. This proves that their product is worthy of Canadian industry, and is a tribute to the equipment they have for manufacturing linen. I do submit that it is a matter of vital importance to have this industry developed here, that we may retain within the bounds of Canada the full economic value of the fibre produced. It is necessary, by whatever means can best accomplish the purpose, that the spinning industry should be connected up, and, in my opinion we can do that by giving encouragement to the spinning industry to connect up the manufacture of the raw fibre with the weaving of the cloth.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Agriculture): I will trespass on the patience of the House for just a short time to make a few observations on the subject which the hon. member for East Middlesex (Mr. Glass) has introduced to the House this evening, and which he has covered so fully in his discussion. The matter doubtless is one of very great importance, and of particular importance to Canada at the present time. In normal times, I understand, the flax fibre which enters into the manufacture of all cords and linens which have largely been the product of Ireland and other European countries, has come largely from that portion of Russia which is now under the control of Germany, also from Belgium, and largely from Ireland. Naturally, the dislocations in this industry caused by the war have been very great, with the result that the fibre which has, in the past, been essential to the industry, is largely lacking, and consequently Ireland and Great Britain, in which the factories and industries have, in the past, been thriving, must look to new fields for their raw material. The question of the development of this industry in Canada has been very fully sketched by my hon. friend. The difficulty that has existed in the development of this industry in Canada has been referred to by him—the lack of cheap labour. Russia, which nominally produces from seventy-five to eighty per cent of the fibre supply of the world, had, of course, an abundance of cheap labour, and as this material for the purpose of being utilized for fibre, up to very recently, has had to be pulled by hand, it was very evident that in this product the country with a supply of cheap labour had the advantage over countries in which labour was more expensive.

I am of the opinion that the successful development of the industry in Canada will depend, in a very considerable degree, on the discovery, shall I say, of suitable machines for handling the flax; in other words, on substituting the work of the machine for the old method of hand labour. It is rather encouraging to find that, within the last few years, machines have been and are being employed that promise excellent success, particularly in that portion of the work that deals with the pulling of the plant from the ground and the preparing of it for the other processes that follow. If we can reach success in that respect in Canada there is an excellent prospect that the industry can develop to considerable proportions.

There is no doubt whatever that our soil and climate are admirably adapted to the growing of flax for fibre purposes. That has been proved by years of successful growing in certain localities in which in the earlier days of the country's development the settlers found it necessary to grow flax in order to supply themselves with a good deal of the clothing they required. Impressed with the importance of the industry in Canada, the Department of Agriculture several years ago undertook certain experimental work in respect to it. That experimental work covered practically the whole development of the industry from the growing of the flax to the manufacture of it into twines. In carrying on this work the department have grown experimental plots of flax in practically all of the experimental farms and stations in eastern Canada. They have found, as the hon. member has mentioned, that it can be grown very successfully, and I believe that the records show that the Gaspé peninsula produces perhaps the best quality of fibre grown in Canada. Flax has also been grown in western Canada. It cannot, however, be grown so successfully there for fibre purposes; the climate appears somewhat against it. The experimental farms have carried the work further. They have, on a small scale, quite an up-to-date set of machinery for carrying on the various operations that the hon. member for East Middlesex has outlined. In that way we are endeavouring to ascertain, first, the districts from which the best fibre can be secured, and second, the relative cost of turning it into the finished article in each district. That work will be of great advantage to the farmers of Canada who will be growing this flax later on. That the minds of our farmers have been turned to the growth of this plant for fibre purposes is evidenced by the fact that the acreage planted for fibre purposes is steadily increasing. In western Canada we have grown flax in quite a large way for seed. The flax crop of western Canada has run in yield from fifteen to eighteen and twenty million bushels per annum, and the results have been very satisfactory.

The hon. member referred to another matter that, in my judgment, is of the greatest importance, particularly to the farmers of western Canada. Experiments have for several years been carried on with the ripened straw that results after threshing out the seed. This straw is ripened, and it has never been considered of any practical value for fibre purposes. Experiments, however, have proven beyond any question of doubt that it can be converted into twines. I have in my office in this building several samples of twine that have been manufactured in the city of Regina from fibre taken from flax straw. The product varies from fine hard twine, quite suitable for harness-making and similar work, to coarser twine suitable for replacing ordinary binder-twine. Last year the crop of flax straw in western Canada amounted to about 1,500,000 tons. Experiments have shown that each ton of flax straw will produce about 270 pounds of twine in its various forms. If all that flax straw were converted into twine, it would produce something over 300,000,000 pounds of twine. Canada annually uses something like 60,000,000 pounds of binder-twine. Our source of supply is from two countries, the Philippine Islands and the province of Yucatan, in Mexico, and if those sources of supply for the raw material, the manila and the sisal, were cut off, it would leave the farmers of Canada, particularly those of western Canada where they are engaged in grain growing on such a large scale, in a bad position. Consequently it is a matter of the very greatest importance—and in this the hon. member for East Middlesex (Mr. Glass) who discussed it here this evening has brought up a very important subject—to consider how this at present wasted material can be utilized to ensure an adequate supply of twine to bind our crops. And, of course—and this particularly applies to Canada at the present time—if we can convert waste material into useful product, we are simply getting that much further ahead in an economic way. That phase of the question, in my judgment, is one of very great importance. I think if we survey the whole field again we shall find that probably the successful growing of flax for fibre purposes in Canada depends upon the cheapness of the labour we can secure. If we can replace manual labour by mechanical power, by the discovery and development of machines that will pull the flax, we certainly have all the natural facilities for a splendid development of this industry. I see no reason why that should not be achieved. The memory of living man easily goes back to the time when practically all our grain, for instance, was bound by hand. It would be impossible to follow that method now in harvesting our immense grain crops. In that case the ingenuity of man was equal to the production of a machine to meet the increased need, and I feel, particularly in this age of invention, that a way will be found to develop machines of the various types that are necessary to replace hand labour in the carrying on of this industry.

I may add that the officers at the Experimental Farm who are carrying on these investigations are paying particular attention to that phase of the question, and I can assure the hon. member for East Middlesex that the whole question is receiving the close attention of the Government. It is only within the last few years that the department has seriously taken up the question with a view to studying it carefully in all its phases, and already good results are coming. The question is one of vast importance, and I again assure my hon. friend that it is receiving and will continue to receive the careful consideration of the Government. I shall be very glad indeed to take into careful consideration all the suggestions he has made here to-night, and I trust in view of that he will see his way clear to withdraw his amendment.

THE WAR.

PROCEDURE UNDER MILITARY SERVICE ACT. — ANNOUNCEMENT BY MAJOR-GENERAL MEWBURN, MINISTER OF MILITIA.

On the Orders of the Day.

Major-General MEWBURN (Minister of Militia and Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have been requested to make a statement in the House regarding the procedure that has been adopted by the Department of Militia and Defence regarding the obtaining of men for military service, in pursuance of Order in Council (P.C. 919), of the 20th April, 1918, and also, of Order in Council (P.C. 962), of the 20th April, 1918.

By paragraph five of the Order in Council first mentioned,—

> The Governor in Council may direct orders to report for duty to issue to men in any class under the Act of any named age or ages or who were born in named years or any named year or part of a year and any exemption theretofore granted to any man of any such named age or year of birth shall cease from and after noon of the day upon which he is ordered so to report, and no claim for exemption by or in respect of any man shall be entertained or considered after the issue to him of such order provided, however, that the minister may grant leave of absence without pay to any man by reason of the death, disablement or service of other members of the same family while on active service in any theatre of actual war.

After the most careful consideration, and having regard to the national interest, which must be the dominating factor today, it was considered that in pursuance of Order in Council (P.C. 919), those between the ages of 20 and 22 years both inclusive, should first be called out and an Order in Council was passed accordingly.

The age of every man by or on whose behalf exemption was claimed had to be given in the claim, hence the age given on the original registration is to be taken as conclusive evidence against the man of his age and year of birth.

Under the last-mentioned Order in Council the Military Service Registrars were instructed to notify all those registered within these ages to report for service, but to notify first the men coming from urban centres, so that men of these ages (20 to 22), who are on farms should not be called sooner than is absolutely necessary, and might thus have an opportunity of completing their seeding operations. Although no exemptions are given in this class it seemed reasonable that this opportunity should be given while the men from urban centres were being brought in.

The responsibility for securing men between the ages of 20 to 22 thus called out has been placed upon the Militia Department which has to assume the duty of apprehending any such men failing to report.

In regard to the men in class one, other than those between the ages of 20 and 22, the operation and administration of the Military Service Act is still controlled by the Military Service Council and all appeals still pending are being prosecuted to a completion.

The return shows the total number reporting under the Military Service Act, up to the 29th April, 1918, as 39,208 to be deducted from this are 2,063, who have gone to Imperial Units, such as Royal Air Force, leaving 37,145 recruits for the Canadian Expeditionary Force. This, of course, includes men of class one who have voluntarily reported.

Desertions.

According to the reports there were, on the 29th of April, 1918, some 7,096 men of Class 1 who had, so far, failed to report and who had not yet been apprehended. Every effort is being made to apprehend these men. The attention of the House should be called to the fact that these men are deserters and, therefore, lawbreakers, and as my Department is charged with their apprehension, I wish to inform the House that it is the intention of the Department of Militia and Defence to carry out that duty, and for that purpose to use whatever measures may be found necessary.

Under the Order in Council (P.C. 919) the House will notice that there is only one ground for exemption, viz., "The Minister may grant leave of absence without pay to any man by reason of the death, disablement or service of other members of the same family while on active service in any theatre of actual war," and by the same Order in Council, the words "in any theatre of actual war," are defined as "not including the high seas or Great Britain, or Ireland."

It, therefore, became necessary for me to give definite instructions to district officers commanding for the purpose of defining the persons who should be granted leave of absence under this proviso. These instructions were promulgated in Routine Order No. 466 of the 20th April, 1918, wherein it is stated that the exemption extends to the only remaining son of military age. In any such case the man so affected will, on reporting for duty, claim leave of absence on this ground to the officer commanding the unit to which he reported, whereupon the latter will give provisional leave of absence and the case will be forwarded to Militia Headquarters, by the officer commanding the district to be confirmed. It must be clearly understood that every man within the class so called out must report, and his claim for leave of absence will then be considered.

At this point I might explain, to clear up confusion which possibly exists, that all men in a class called out are, by the Military Service Act, deemed to be soldiers for the period of the war and demobilization thereafter, and that, if they do not come within the specially excepted classes under the Act, and have not been granted exemption by the tribunals the only method by which they can be relieved of military duty is to give them leave of absence without pay.

Every application for leave of absence on the ground of death, disablement or service of other members of the same family will be dealt with on its merits, the principle to be applied is as follows: If there are several sons, some of whom are serving in France—or in England, with the early prospect of being sent to France—and only one son of military age remains at home, such last-mentioned son is to be granted leave of absence. Cases may arise where there are two sons left at home, one of whom is of military age, and the other of whom will become of military age, say within six months. In such a case there will, at the expiration of six months, be two sons of military age remaining home, and in that event one of them will then be called upon to serve.

In calling out the classes above mentioned, it is realized that we chiefly require men of category "A." We are, therefore, only notifying men who, having already had a medical examination, are found to be in this category or who have not yet been medically examined. Every man, however, upon reporting for duty will immediately be medically examined, whether he has been examined previously or not, and those who fall within the categories lower than "A," will be given leave of absence until further orders."

It should be explained that men of category "B" in Class 1 under the Military Service Act are being generally warned to report for duty, but, as the number of such men presently required is not large, it is intended, for the present, to retain and utilize only those who did not claim exemption or whose exemptions were refused, and not to make use of men in category "B" between the ages of 20 and 22, unless and until their services become necessary.

Temporary Leave of Absence to Farmers and Farm Labourers, in Categories lower than "A."

Realizing the serious need of food production, we have endeavoured to meet this situation as far as possible, and it has been provided that any member of the C.E.F. in Canada, in category lower than "A" who can be spared from his military duties, may be granted leave of absence without pay. This can be done by the authority of the officer commanding the district on presentation of a certificate from the agricultural representative of the district that the man in question is an efficient farm labourer.

The so-called "Regulations" that were printed and distributed to the members of the House, are really extracts from our routine orders that are issued daily from headquarters, for the guidance of district officers commanding. It was considered that extracts from these orders would be useful to the members of the House.

No doubt members would like to know how many men will probably be obtained under these Orders in Council. As there is no complete registration in Canada, actual figures cannot be given, but as far as can be gathered from the lists of men who reported for service or claimed exemption under the Military Service Act, it would appear that there are in Canada between the ages of 20 and 22 inclusive, a total of about 70,000 men. From this number, however, two important deductions must be made,—

(1) A very considerable number who have not yet been medically examined, and
(2) A further considerable number who will, on re-examination, prove to be in categories lower than "A."

Previous experience shows that this latter class will represent a substantial proportion of the whole. Therefore, a conservative estimate, under all the circumstances, would appear to be about 35,000.

As the Order in Council of the 20th April, 1918, (P.C. 919), brings into Class 1 boys of nineteen and those who became twenty since the 13th October, 1917, a proclamation will issue calling on them to register. No date for calling up these men has yet been decided upon. It will, of course, depend on the exigencies of the military situation.

As already stated, the order in which exemptions affecting men of any named age or ages are to be cancelled, rests with the Governor in Council and, of course, before any additional years are selected the matter will be exhaustively considered from all points of view.

The broad principle upon which the Government has acted is that having in mind the urgency of the national peril, very few men, (a) unmarried or widowers without children, (b) between the ages of 20 and 22 and (c) in medical category "A" can really be regarded as indispensable to any business.

Some representations have been made with regard to the only son of a widow who is her sole support. This subject must be approached from two points of view:—(1) the national interest; (2) personal hardship. In the first place, it is conceded that the calling up of the only son of a widow necessarily brings sorrow to the mother, but it must be recognized that this sorrow comes to every mother who parts with her son. There are cases where the only son on the farm is between the ages of 20 and 22, and the widowed mother will suffer hardship if he is taken. The same considerations would apply to the only son of a widow who is living in the city and who, for example, is engaged in business and is supporting a mother, possibly sisters as well. There is also, the case of an only son supporting an invalid father, where equal hardship exists. From the standpoint of financial difficulties, it must not be overlooked that the widowed mother in such cases will be in receipt of,—

(a) Separation Allowance,
(b) Assigned Pay,
(c) Patriotic Fund Allowance.

Take for example, the case of a widow on a small farm. It may be that the farm cannot be operated to its fullest capacity without the son's assistance, but it can be operated to a sufficient extent to provide the living of those people residing on it, and against the loss of income from increased production, etc., must be set off the allowances above referred to.

Further, from the standpoint of the national interest, the diminution of production upon such small properties must be considered, under present circumstances as negligible.

The Government fully realize and most deeply regret that hardship and sorrow are entailed by every new application of the Military Service Act, but they hope the people will realize that those upon whom this stern duty falls have no alternative. Our forces at the front are likely to be attacked by overwhelming numbers at any time until the tremendous struggle which began on 21st March last shall have reached a conclusion. Our failure to support them with adequate reinforcements might lead to their decimation or destruction. It would be of little avail to increase production if that increase should be accompanied by such disaster at the front, that our products could not reach Great Britain or the Allied Nations beyond the seas. In that case we should have sown so that Germany might reap.

Moreover, the Government hopes that during the coming summer a more effective mobilization of the human energy of Canada may be effected, with the result that the crops sown during the spring may receive necessary attention during the summer and may be successfully harvested in the autumn.

Quebec Situation.

I have constantly stated, in the past, that I believed Quebec would do its duty, and I am happy to be able to report to the House many evidences of a marked change of feeling in that province. It is gratifying to note by the papers that Saint Mary's College and Laval University have granted leave of absence to all their students who come under the military law of this country, and have encouraged them to do their duty and it is hoped that this good example will considerably help matters.

Further, I have a report that the quotas from both the McGill and Laval Universities, for the new Tank Battalion, have been completed and more men are offering than can be accepted, for this unit.

There is very good evidence to show that many young men in the province of Quebec who have been exempted are now ready to come forward and serve, and it is realized where these men have had no former military experience, there is a certain amount of dread in the minds of their families as to their associations. Therefore, special efforts will be made to keep friends and associates together.

In view of the splendid spirit displayed by the universities and colleges, arrangements are being made to organize new units in connection with these institutions.

Of course, it must be realized that we are not sending any complete infantry battalions overseas, but representations have been made to the overseas authorities with a view to ensuring that the young men who come from certain localities shall go to the same reserve unit in England to complete their training and finally to the same linked battalion at the Front; the object being, so far as possible, to ensure that these young men will serve under as congenial conditions as possible.

As far as I am personally concerned, every effort will be made to avoid all misunderstandings with a sincere desire to promote a better feeling between provinces in the Dominion of Canada. It seems to me that where the national interests are at stake, all provincial feelings should be eliminated, so that Canada may present a common front to the common enemy.

In conclusion, permit me to read the following extract from a speech made by Mr. Rudyard Kipling, at Folkestone, and published in the London Morning Post. The paragraph is headed—

If the Hun Wins.

If for any reason whatever we fall short of victory—and there is no half-way house between victory and defeat—what happens to us? This. Every relation, every understanding, every decency upon which civilization has been so anxiously built up will go—will be washed out, because it will have been proved unable to endure. The whole idea of democracy—which at bottom is what the Hun fights against—will be dismissed from men's minds, because it will have been shown incapable of maintaining itself against the Hun. It will die; and it will die discredited, together with every belief and practice that is based on it. The Hun ideal, the Hun's root-notions of life will take its place throughout the world. Under that dispensation man will become once more the natural prey, body and goods, of his better-armed neighbour. Women will be the mere instrument for continuing the breed; the vassal of man's lust and man's cruelty; and labour will become a thing to be knocked on the head if it dares to give trouble, and worked to death if it does not. And from this order of life there will be no appeal, no possibility of any escape. This is what the Hun means when he says he intends to impose German kultur—which is the German religion—upon the world. This is precisely what the world has banded itself together to resist. (Cheers.) It will take every ounce in us; it will try us out to the naked soul. Our trial will not be made less by the earnest advice and suggestions that we should accept some sort of compromise, which means defeat, put forward by Hun agents and confederates among us. (Hear, hear.) They are busy in that direction already. But be sure of this: Nothing—nothing we may have to endure now will weigh one featherweight compared with what we shall most certainly have to suffer if for any cause we fail of victory.

Mr. W. F. McLEAN (South York): Will members of the House be able to get this afternoon copies of the official statement which the minister has just read, so that they can forward those copies to their constituents as answers to questions they have received? Many hon. members would very much appreciate it if that could be done.

Major-General MEWBURN: I shall endeavour to have the statement printed at once.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, by your leave, may I make another suggestion to the minister? In the regulations it is provided that any member of the Canadian Expeditionary Force in Canada in categories lower than A, who can be temporarily spared from his military duty, may be granted leave of absence without pay on the authority of the commanding officer of the district, on production of a certificate from the agricultural representative. If the minister would supplement the statement which he has made to-day with a list of both the commanding officers and the agricultural representatives in every district, the matter of giving information in reply to questions could be greatly facilitated. I am satisfied that all the members of the House are in receipt of letters asking for information as to how men should apply for leave of absence. If an hon. member can say: Apply to Mr. So and So in your district, and if he can give the name of both the commanding officer and the agricultural representative, he would be able to get the information much more quickly.

Major-General MEWBURN: In reference to the Order in Council, I have practically completed arrangements in every military district throughout Canada as to those men (20 to 22 inclusive) who are to report. I realize that it will mean more or less of a hardship for a man to come from the country into the city to report, but we must have some evidence that a man is within a category lower than "A." All the man has to do is to appear at the Depot Battalion to which he has been ordered to report, when he will be medically examined, and if his medical examination places him in a category lower than "A," he will at once be given leave of absence. We thought the simplest way to do, so as not to put men to undue trouble was to have a representative of the Department of Agriculture in each district to verify applications of men who claim to be farmers or efficient farm labourers. These agricultural representatives will certify that such and such a man is an efficient farm labourer and on his certificate the man will, at once, be given leave of absence. It might facilitate matters if fuller information were given to the public.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): I wish to thank the Minister of Militia and Defence for the kind words he has spoken in regard to the young men of Quebec, especially the Laval College men and St. Mary's College men. As I informed the minister yesterday, I met several of the young men who joined the Tank Unit in Ottawa and I think I can safely say that if the minister would follow up the idea of having units in which young men could keep their associations as much as possible, he could easily raise at once in the city of Quebec alone a complete Tank Unit. I have this from several of the young men who have joined that unit.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is exceeding his privilege.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): While I was at my home over the week end, I met two farmers whose sons had been exempted, but their exemptions are now cancelled as a result of the new regulations. At the same time they are receiving notices to appear before the Central Appeal Judge; the judgments granting them exemption having been appealed from. As late as Friday last, some of these men have received notices to appear before the Central Appeal Judge on the first of May. Is that a mistake, and have these young men anything to gain or lose by appearing or failing to appear before the Central Appeal Judge?

Major-General MEWBURN: Were those men other than the ages of twenty to twenty-two?

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Major-General MEWBURN: The exemptions have been cancelled only of the men between the ages of twenty and twenty-two both inclusive. All men of the ages other than those mentioned can still continue to prosecute their appeals under the regulations of the Military Service Act.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: But these are men of twenty-one and twenty-two years of age.

Major-General MEWBURN: I cannot understand why any such notices should have been sent out, because the registrars had from the Military Service Council a distinct notification to inform all men between the ages of twenty and twenty-two, both inclusive, that their exemptions were cancelled, and I requested that the men in the urban centres should be called first. Some mistake must have been made. I shall have the matter looked into at once.

[Major-General Mewburn.]

Mr. J. A. C. ETHIER (Laval-Two Mountains): In the statement which has just been made by the minister, I do not find any mention of farmers who were proprietors of farms before the proclamation was issued in October last, and who are now twenty-one or twenty-two years of age. Supposing a young man of twenty-two years of age is a proprietor of a farm and a farmer himself; supposing he has 150 acres and a large stock and he is alone on the farm, is he bound, as coming under the regulations now in force? He is a bona fide farmer. What action should he take?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is going to an inordinate length to ask a question.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (North Simcoe): We all know that there are some 60,000 exemptions claimed in the province of Quebec. We know that the exemptions of men between the ages of twenty and twenty-two are all wiped out. That settles that question. Did the minister state how many of those exemptions have now come before the tribunals and how they were disposed of? How many cases have come before the Central Appeal Judge and how many exemptions are there now?

Major-General MEWBURN: The figures I gave which I obtained from the Military Service Council were an estimate of the number of men of the ages of twenty, twenty-one and twenty-two to whom exemptions had been granted on account of the result of the medical examinations or their position, and it was estimated in that way there were about 70,000 men available. Many of those men have not been medically examined and the figures are only an estimate. I have not the other figures.

Mr. CURRIE: The matter is very important. Cannot the minister bring the information down to-morrow?

Major-General MEWBURN: In reply to the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Ethier). Many cases of hardship have already been brought to my notice. In the meantime, the only thing to be done is for the young man to report to the Officer Commanding the Depot Battalion, and state his case there. There should be no difficulty in his getting a sufficient leave of absence to enable him to wind up his business.

Mr. W. C. KENNEDY: Would the Minister say how soon Class "A" men in the rural districts will be called?

Major-General MEWBURN: I cannot give a definite reply as that matter is left largely to the registrars. We have simply requested that the men in rural districts should not be called until the corresponding classes in the cities have been exhausted.

Mr. H. A. FORTIER (Labelle): In the case of a boy of twenty or twenty-two with a widowed mother to support, is there any possible chance of his being exempted?

Mr. SPEAKER: That case has already been dealt with in the statement of the Minister of Militia and Defence. I must remind the House we are not in committee and hon. gentlemen are going far beyond the latitude allowed on the Orders of the Day.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If the hon. gentleman will look at the minister's statement to-morrow he will see a full reply to the question he has just asked.

Mr. FORTIER: I had not finished my question.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think we can with profit adjourn the discussion to another day.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Do you rule, Sir, that the hon. gentleman cannot put his question?

Mr. SPEAKER: The right hon. gentleman will see that if every hon. member were to exercise the right of asking a question upon the Orders of the Day we should be here until six o'clock without advancing the business of the House. That would be carrying the privilege beyond reasonable bounds.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Has not every hon. member of this House exactly the same rights as the Minister of Militia has?

Mr. SPEAKER: It has long been the custom for a minister when desiring to do so to make a pronouncement upon an important public matter on the Orders of the Day being called, just as has been done by the Minister of Militia and Defence to-day. It is quite proper for hon. members to address questions to the Government on matters of policy but it is not proper that they should enter into what is in effect a discussion when there is no subject before the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I think the hon. member is entitled to put his question.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member not to be unduly long in putting his question.

Mr. FORTIER: Is there any possibility of having exemption granted in the case of a young man of twenty or twenty-two who is the sole support of a widowed mother with a family of young children? If there is no provision for his exemption have the Government considered taking over the farm in such a case rather than allowing it to lie idle?

Major-General MEWBURN: There is no power vested in me to do that.

Mr. T. H. THOMPSON (East Hastings): The minister has said that the men in the rural districts will not be called out until after the men in the cities have been ordered to report but I understand that many young men in rural districts have been ordered to report on the 1st of May.

Major-General MEWBURN: I did not say that we were not going to call out the men in the rural districts I said a request had been made to the registrars under the Military Service Act that the notices ordering men between twenty and twenty-two years of age inclusive to report be first sent to men in the urban districts. I might say that many men living on farms gave their city address to the registrar when registering. A man living ninety miles from Montreal came in to see me to-day and said his boy had received notice to report, but that it was his own mistake because in registering he had given his residence as Montreal; the mistake is being rectified by the registrar. We are not granting exemption to the men in the rural districts but we are simply doing what I think is fair and reasonable, namely, calling out the men in the urban centres first. It will take some time to deal with those classes, before the men in the rural districts are called.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): May I ask to what the Minister of Militia attributes the better feeling in the province of Quebec?

Mr. BUREAU: Always true to the Orange Sentinel!

Mr. SPEAKER: That is not such a question as can properly be put on the Orders of the Day.

THE BUDGET.

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT BY THE ACTING MINISTER OF FINANCE.—WAR TAXATION; CHANGES IN TARIFF.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Acting Minister of Finance) moved:

That the Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in presenting to-day the annual statement of the financial affairs of the country I deem it but fitting and proper that at the outset I should give expression to what I believe is the profound and sincere regret of Parliament, that Sir Thomas White, the Minister of Finance, was unable to deliver the annual budget by reason of an enforced and lengthy absence from official duties. Regardless of party distinctions, and the inevitable differences of opinion that must prevail regarding the administration of the financial affairs of the country, I am sure that honourable gentlemen will heartily concur in the observation, that the highly important duties attaching to the Department of Finance, so abnormal in their magnitude and exacting in their detail during the war period, have been discharged by Sir Thomas White with distinction and with conspicuous ability. To his task he has applied great energy and industry, and in his labours he has been solely animated by the high motive of rendering faithful and unselfish service to the State. I am confident the House will join with me in expressing gratification upon the fact that he has so far recovered his health that he proposes an early return to Canada to resume his official duties, after disposing of some public business now engaging his attention in the United States.

REVENUE.

The revenue for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1918, will, when the accounts are finally closed, reach $258,000,000, exceeding the revenue of the preceding year by $26,000,000, and that of the first year of the war by $125,000,000. Of the total amount of $258,000,000, Customs will yield $146,000,000 and Excise $27,000,000. From the various taxations apart from Customs and Excise, we shall have received nearly $25,000,000. The several sources from which this revenue was derived, and the amounts, might be of interest to the House. For the past fiscal year they are as follows: Business profits war tax, $21,271,283; banks, $836,724.28; insurance companies, $385,127.68; trust and loan companies, $267,917.68; Inland Revenue from railways, steamships, telegraph and cable companies, stamps, etc., $2,229,922.81; a total of $24,990,975.45.

EXPENDITURE.

Coming to our ordinary expenditure and taking cognizance only of expenditures for civil government, and disregarding all outlays on account of war, the expenditure for the fiscal year 1917-18 is estimated at $173,000,000. The total expenditure of $173,000,000 includes payment of interest, estimated at $45,000,000, and pensions of some $7,000,000, or $52,000,000 altogether; whereas prior to the war the outlay on interest was but $12,000,000, and of course the expenditure for pensions on account of the war had not yet begun. It is also inclusive of the sums of $25,000,000 and $7,500,000 voted and advanced on account of the Canadian Northern railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific railway respectively. For the capital outlays beyond the ordinary current expenditure of $173,000,000 an expenditure of $30,000,000 is estimated. These two items of expenditure amount to $203,000,000, and represent the outlay of Canada for all purposes apart from war during the past year.

With a total revenue of $258,000,000, and an ordinary and capital expenditure of $203,000,000, it will be seen that during the fiscal year 1917-18 the Government was able to meet all ordinary and capital outlays, including an increased amount for interest account and pensions over the previous year of nearly $15,000,000, and have a favourable balance of about $55,000,000 to be applied to war expenditures.

FISCAL YEAR 1918-19.

The main estimates for 1918-19 have been submitted to the House, and supplementary Estimates will be presented later. Apart from the increased interest caused by our war borrowing, and the amount required for pensions, also arising out of the war, substantial reductions have been made in the estimates of practically all the services, and I anticipate that actual expenditure will be well below the amounts voted. These reductions, however, are more than offset by the additional sums needed for interest and pensions for the current year over the past year, and which excess I estimate at $25,000,000, so that ordinary expenditure for 1918-19 will increase materially over that of the previous year. Outside of interest and pension account, ordinary expenditures should not exceed those of last year. Substantial disbursements this year will be necessary in connection with the soldiers' land settlement programme, and a substantial liability has been assumed for the year in connection with the Halifax disaster. The capital expenditure vote has been materially cut. It is estimated that for the fiscal year 1918-19 we shall be able to pay our ordinary and capital expenditure out of our revenue and have, as in the past two years, an appreciable sum over, which we can apply to war purposes. The unexpended balance of the Victory Loan will finance our war expenditures and advances to the Imperial Government until July next, when Treasury bills will be temporarily negotiated, until the proceeds of the next public loan are available.

WAR EXPENDITURES.

Canada is now in the fourth year of the war. Our expenditure on war account for the year 1917-18 will approximate $345,000,000, of which amount $167,000,000 was expended in Canada, the balance, $178,000,000, represents our war expenditure overseas. Up to March 31, 1917, we had expended for war purposes $533,437,036.11, so that on March 31, 1918, our total outlay for war will be approximately $878,000,000. This amount includes all expenditures in Canada, Great Britain and France, and is also inclusive of the upkeep of our troops overseas. The amount does not, however, include any pay due but not yet paid to the troops overseas. During the past two fiscal years we have applied to war expenditure surpluses of revenue over ordinary and capital outlays the sum of $113,000,000, and our interest and pension payments attributable to war and covering the entire war period would approximate about $75,000,000.

NET DEBT.

The net debt of Canada, which before the war stood at about $336,000,000 has now passed the billion-dollar mark, and it is estimated that when the accounts for the year 1917-18 are closed it will reach, approximately, $1,200,000,000. The increase is almost entirely attributable to war expenditures. To provide funds for our war necessities, apart from the amounts we were able to spare from the ordinary revenues of the country, we have had recourse to public loans, and from time to time to temporary loans from our banks, which were subsequently liquidated from the proceeds of loans.

TRADE.

The statistics of our trade indicate that our exports, year by year as the war progresses, are showing a greater and greater increase over our imports. The year before the war the imports exceeded the exports by nearly $300,000,000. In 1917-18 this condition had been so completely reversed that the exports exceeded the imports by almost $625,000,000, and our total trade, which passed the billion mark in 1913, exceeded the two and a half billion mark in 1918.

It must be borne in mind, however, that this increase in our total trade is very largely attributable to war conditions, and as well the very favourable trade balance. It might be informing to the House to briefly state that in 1917-18 our exports to Great Britain were about $860,000,000, while our imports amounted to $81,000,000. Our exports to the United States reached the sum of $440,000,000, while our imports were $790,000,000.

IMMIGRATION.

The general impression I fear prevails that we have had practically no immigration into Canada since the beginning of the war. While of course it is proportionately much less than in years just prior to the war, still it is not a negligible quantity. In 1915-16 our immigration was 48,537; in 1916-17 it was 75,374, and in 1917-18, 79,074; a total of 202,985 in the past three fiscal years. Of this total number 169,640 came from the United States and 20,124 from the British Isles. An important fact in connection with this immigration is that it comprised a large proportion of agriculturalists. The Minister of Immigration and Colonization informs me that everything clearly indicates a very large immigration into Canada, commencing shortly after the conclusion of the war and so soon as transportation facilities are available. A factor to be kept prominently in mind is that the employment of women and girls in occupations heretofore filled by men will continue in all the belligerent countries for many years at least, thus limiting the avenues of employment ordinarily open to men, and leaving a surplus for emigration, notwithstanding the heavy toll upon life exacted by the war.

EXCHANGE.

Owing to the inability of Great Britain to settle in the usual way her trade balances, and to which I propose referring later, we are experiencing an acute exchange problem in Canada. During the past few months a very high rate has prevailed on remittances of funds to the United States, which has imposed a severe tax upon importers and the public, and, if it continues, must diminish imports or add to their cost. This high rate is due to the fact that we have to remit more to, than we receive from, the United States, and consequently the demand for United States funds is greater than the supply. Were we able to sell securities in the United States the rates of exchange might easily have been adjusted or normalized, but Canadians were not permitted to do so. The Government did not require during the present year to borrow in the United States, even if we had been permitted, and consequently by such an operation it was not convenient or practical to correct the exchange.

To redress the adverse rate of exchange with the United States, we must lessen our imports from that country, or the United States must buy more from us, or we must sell securities in the United States to the extent of a very substantial proportion of our adverse trade balance. Other considerations, however, are involved in this matter, to which I shall refer later, but I might be permitted to say that the Government has been diligent in its endeavours to bring about such financial arrangements with the Governments of Great Britain and the United States as would materially relieve our people of the burden of the present high rates of exchange. I hope that very shortly we shall be in a position to announce the successful conclusion of negotiations which have in view this end. In connection with the exchange problem it might be of interest to state that for the first three months of this calendar year our imports from the United States have decreased below that of the corresponding period of last year by over $36,000,000, while our exports have increased in the same comparative period by about $20,000,000.

THE VICTORY LOAN.

The unqualified success attending the Victory Loan of last year, as well of previous domestic loans, is of such notable importance and significance that it calls for more than a passing reference. The large investment made by our citizens in the securities issued by the Government from time to time since the beginning of the war is a matter of natural pride to all Canadians. Since December 1, 1915, domestic war loan issues aggregating $746,000,000 have been made, and of which over $700,000,000 was subscribed for by Canadians, a very tangible evidence of the productive powers of our people, their determination to sustain our army and our commerce by loans to the State, and their faith in the ability of Canada to honour in the future the financial obligations now so honourably incurred. That Canada possessed such a purchasing power it is needless for me to say was hardly entertained by any person, even the most optimistic.

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

Last November the fourth war loan was placed upon the market in Canada. In the case of the three previous loans, for their successful flotation, the Government of the time relied upon newspaper advertising methods alone to secure the required subscriptions, and no extensively organized campaign was deemed necessary. In the case of the last loan, however, it was felt that more vigorous methods should be adopted in order that a wider response to the appeal should be received from all classes of our population, so that the absorption of the loan would be rapid and that by spreading the holdings over as many people as possible, the subscribers would be more strongly protected so far as the market price was concerned.

The Minister of Finance, with the co-operation of some of the most active of the business men of the Dominion, organized a central committee called the Dominion Executive of the Victory Loan Campaign, which in turn organized associated committees in every province. These again created committees in various counties, cities and towns. By addresses, advertisement and canvass, by the united efforts of all these countrywide organizations, the results far exceeded the expectations even of those best qualified to anticipate the result of an appeal of this character. The bonds were of five, ten and twenty year maturities. The prospectus called for an amount of $150,000,000, but the loan was an open one and the right was reserved to exceed subscriptions above this amount. In response to the appeal, subscriptions to the amount of $408,000,000 from approximately 600,000 subscribers, a subscription from about one in every nine of our population, a subscription of over $58 per capita, was received. This was slightly better than the results of the Liberty Loan of 1917 in the United States, where some 9,400,000 subscriptions were received, or about one in more than eleven. The subscriptions in the four western provinces were particularly gratifying, and indicate in these new provinces remarkable accumulation of wealth, which fact is pleasing to the older sections of the Dominion. The Victory Loan Committee state the subscriptions of Alberta amounted to $16,515,150; British Columbia, $18,814,700; Saskatchewan, $21,777,050; and Manitoba, $32,326,600. Opportunity was given to the overseas forces to subscribe, and we received over $1,500,000 from soldiers who cashed in their faith in their fight and country.

The total subscription was cut down to an allotment of $398,000,000 of new money, not counting holdings of previous war loans which were convertible and were converted into Victory Loan Bonds to the amount of over $150,000,000. When all the charges are computed and paid, the cost of the loan will approximate 1¼ per cent, which is comparatively small in such a large operation and extending over so wide an area. The banks received ½ of 1 per cent as remuneration for their services and to compensate them for the labour entailed in all their branches in taking the subscriptions; issuing temporary receipts; delivery of the scrip; receiving the five instalments from January to May; transmitting the cash to the Department of Finance; in delivering the bonds to subscribers in exchange for scrip; in paying at par all over Canada the coupons and interest cheques during the whole period covered by the loan.

The probable subscribers of the larger amounts were solicited by the agency of a special committee and upon these subscriptions no commission was paid. The local canvassers received ½ of one per cent on all subscriptions received by them to compensate them for their time and labour; and finally, the bond dealers and brokers who co-operated most heartily and energetically in the work and who placed the services of themselves and their several staffs at the disposal of the committee were to be allowed such remuneration as was deemed reasonable by the Minister of Finance. It is estimated that the total charges will amount approximately to $5,000,000, or about 1¼ per cent. When the issuing charges for all our other previous loans are considered, it will be found that this may be regarded as exceedingly reasonable.

I wish to acknowledge on behalf of the Minister of Finance and the Government his and their thanks and appreciation of the splendid and patriotic services of all the committees and workers whose efforts in a noble cause proved so successful; to the press, also, and to the public spirited citizens who, in an honorary capacity, gave valuable assistance in this great campaign, I desire to publicly and gratefully acknowledge their valuable services. Preparations for the next Victory Loan have already commenced, and the Government have also under advisement the matter of the sale of War Savings Stamps, a borrowing scheme very successfully employed in the United States.

FINANCING WAR AND TRADE.

There is a very direct connection not only between our domestic loans and the financing of our war operations, but also with our productions and our overseas export trade, and I think the matter well worthy of some consideration. Fundamentally trade is the exchange of products, and payment of the purchases of goods abroad must be made by the sale of goods or securities abroad. With us, gold is not a factor in international trade. All are acquainted with the fact that the war has disturbed the natural currents of trade rendering impossible the settlement of international trading accounts in the usual manner. Prior to the war, Canada had a favourable trade balance with Great Britain through the sale of her products and securities in that country, while we have always had an unfavourable trade balance in the United States. We settled the latter in London out of our available credits there, which was of course convenient to the United States because that country always had payments to meet there.

The later stages of the war, however, have materially altered Great Britain's position, and circumstances have compelled her to purchase heavily of war supplies and foodstuffs on this side of the Atlantic, while her exports have been diminishing. She has thus become chiefly a purchasing nation, and is no longer a loaning but a borrowing country. In 1917-18 we had as a matter of fact a favourable merchandise trade balance with Great Britain of about $790,000,000 while with the United States it was unfavourable to the extent of $350,000,000. Normally, we would settle our unfavourable American trade balance with the moneys receivable from Great Britain for her liberal purchases of our high priced commodities. However, owing to the enormous purchases Great Britain was obliged to make for herself and some of her allies, and so great had been the drain upon her liquid resources in the first three years of the war, that in July, 1917, she was obliged to secure loans or dollar credits for her Canadian purchases, otherwise, she would be obliged to practically cease purchasing here. In that event, commercial disaster would have overtaken us and we would have had difficulty in financing our war expenditures. It was therefore important that immediate action be taken to meet this new condition of affairs. In order that our industries and our artisans might be employed, that our agriculturists be afforded an export market and encouraged to produce, and that all our people might be paid for their exportable productions, which was of course of vital importance to all classes of our people, arrangements were consummated in midsummer last year whereby the Government of Canada agreed to make advances to Great Britain at the rate of $25,000,000 per month in order that she might purchase in Canada such of our products as she needed and which we had to sell. In fact, advances for cheese and meat products in excess of the agreement were made last year. In addition, and for the same purpose, the Canadian banks agreed to make advances to the British Government, and altogether up to this date have advanced $200,000,000 on the security of Imperial Treasury Bills. Further, the Government of the United States last year agreed to establish credits for British purchases in Canada. These arrangements are still effective and are likely to continue throughout the year. In a word, the Government of Canada and the Canadian banks have been granting credits for Great Britain's purchases in Canada in substantial amounts since midsummer of 1917, otherwise, our overseas trade would have been seriously handicapped. I must point out, however, that while the Government has thus been making advances to assist in the payment of British purchases in Canada, Great Britain has been paying for Canada the upkeep of her troops in Great Britain and France, and sundry Government accounts. These payments by the Imperial Government for Canada have been to date $100,000,000 less than the payments made for Great Britain by the Canadian Government, and there is that amount to our credit in this open account to-day.

That is strictly the Government's financial position in respect to war and trade for this year. It might be interesting to consider the economic position of the people outside of the Government. The exact position of the people of the country, apart from the Government, is surrounded with additional difficulties. They must meet an adverse balance of merchandise trade with the United States and also the principal and interest of maturities there. They must as well pay for imports from Great Britain, which last year amounted to $81,000,000, notwithstanding we are the creditor country, and they must pay the interest owed by our people to people in Great Britain, and which amounts to about $135,000,000 annually. The combined commitments of the Government and the people are, therefore, abnormal and substantial by reason of the conditions I have outlined.

Relatively, our position during the whole of the last fiscal year was less onerous than it is at present. In the early part of 1917 Great Britain was able to pay for some of her purchases, and, in addition, Canada was permitted to borrow money from the United States to the extent of $185,000,000, which assisted in reducing our adverse balance with that country. In 1918, as far as one knows at present, we are prohibited from selling securities of any kind in the United States, and to that extent we are at a disadvantage this year in the settlement of our American purchases, and, of course, Great Britain is unable to pay directly for any portion of her Canadian purchases.

The experience of all nations during the war teaches us that all problems change as we approach them. We may yet, during the present year, be permitted to sell in a restricted way securities in the United States. The United States may buy more from us during this year on account of war and other purposes than she did last year. I believe she will. We may, during the year, and should, as a people, buy less of the United States of non-essential articles. Great Britain may arrange with us to pay in pounds sterling for what merchandise our people buy from her, and what Canadians owe her people for interest, the Government collecting here under suitable arrangements the interest and merchandise accounts due the people of Great Britain by our people, and with it buying additional Canadian products and shipping them overseas. At any rate, there, in rough outline, is the problem of the Canadian people to-day in carrying on our part of the war, and in part our trade and commerce, and making possible the productions and activities of the manufacturer, farmer, fisherman and lumberman, and such in part is the method employed in bringing about that end.

With these facts before the House, it might be interesting to consider what directly and indirectly are the commitments of the Government for this year. Approximately we must provide:

For Civil Budget	$230,000,000
For War Expenditure	425,000,000
For advances to the Imperial Government for financing in part our export trade with Great Britain	325,000,000
In all	$980,000,000	$980,000,000

To discharge this there will be:

Revenue..	$270,000,000
Advances by Great Britain to pay for maintenance of Canadian troops overseas, about.. ..	300,000,000
Unexpended balance of Victory Loan, as of March 31, 1918.	130,000,000
leaving a probable balance for 1918-19 of..		$280,000,000 to be provided from loans in Canada or elsewhere if possible. This is not inclusive of our commitments for expenditure on account of the purchase of railway equipment and Canadian Northern Railway maturities. The latter we hope to extend upon small payments of principal under powers which we are asking of Parliament this year, and the railway equipment, it is expected, will be financed largely by the issue and sale of equipment securities. The figures which I have given are probably not exhaustive of either income or outgo; I merely wished to show by a few figures, approximately only, the dimensions of the Budget of this country.

I have detained the House perhaps at too great a length in a statement as to ho our war and in part our trade is financed. I wanted to make clear that if we are to continue our part in the war, and maintain our overseas trade at its present dimensions, the people of Canada must loan to the Government the money to accomplish that end. That is, they must, year after year, purchase Victory Bonds. There is no other way of accomplishing it. It cannot be obtained elsewhere. We must rely on our own capital and labour, so far as one can see, to carry on our present war and trade programme. I cannot too strongly state the imperative necessity of the Government borrowing from our own people, and the imperative duty of our people to loan to the Government. No person can too strongly impress this view upon our country. This obligation rests upon all classes and upon every citizen. To enable our people to do this, it is necessary that they continue to produce wealth. The production of wealth means an excess of production above our own wants. We must continue to produce, and if possible in greater quantities, by a more effective mobilization and utilization of our man and woman power, notwithstanding the fresh requirements of our army for man-power, and the many other difficulties confronting us. And we must economize in every way. Primarily, saving is not a question of money. It is rather a question of saving the things that money will buy. The less we consume of that which we produce the greater the surplus we shall have to sell abroad. The more we save of our productions and of our services the better able shall we be to meet our increasing taxation, and the greater the power of our people to purchase Government bonds. Of our imports from the United States, there is a great volume of non-essential commodities, and luxuries. If we all ceased to buy of these, our adverse trade balance with the United States would be partially redressed, the cost of remittances for our essential imports from the United States would be less, the cost of these essentials would be that much less to our importers and consumers, and a greater surplus would be available for payment of taxation and loans to the Government. We must learn to dispense with luxuries, and possibly with some of the things which we have hitherto regarded as necessities. In order to reduce this class of imports, it may become necessary to control the same by the licensing system. I am merely pointing out that which should be the aim and the purpose of the state and its citizens and which becomes more clear as the war is prolonged. I do not think it can be justly said that the Canadian people have altogether failed in this respect, notwithstanding the many temptations which a war prosperity has brought to us. An investment of over $700,000,000 in Canadian Government securities by Canadians is indisputable evidence of production and thrift, but better still, a token of stability, law and order in the days to come. The increase in our bank deposits is likewise an evidence of economy on the part of our people. I feel I am not subjecting myself to sound criticism when I say we can do better, and in very fact we must. In other respects are our people to be commended. In our expanding trade and commerce one might well have looked for a period of speculation that would have later spelled disaster, but there has been no speculation in lands or stocks, municipalities have curtailed expenditures as they all should do, building operations have been restricted to our wants, our financial institutions occupy a strong position, our currency is upon a sound basis, and the expansion of our industries can hardly be said to be unsound.

TAXATION.

I now approach a consideration of the matter of taxation. It is the function of Government to secure from the people, from time to time, such revenue as will meet ordinary expenditure and as much more as necessity and wisdom dictate. It will always, I presume, be a debatable question what portion of war expenditures should be paid from current taxation, but any principle is subject to variation according to the period over which the war is prolonged, the volume of expenditure, and the population and resources of a country. Again, inevitably there must be wide differences of opinion as to the form and degree of taxation that shall prevail. One might safely say that no system of taxation should be in force which has a repressive effect on production and trade, or as some one has said, no tax should paralyse industry of any kind, hamper enterprise, or breed discontent among our people, but that none should be avoided which are essential to provide the revenue required and that will distribute the incidence of taxation as equitably as conditions and experience dictate. Again, it is claimed and with considerable force that excessive taxation will deplete the source for investment in Government War Bonds which we must possess. It is comparatively easy to enunciate such principles as applicable to taxation, but in the trying circumstances and conditions which confront us it is a difficult task to provide any general scheme of taxation which shall completely fall within the rules I have just outlined. We are confronted by conditions, not theories. Many accepted economic principles of trade and taxation are by force of conditions impossible of application to-day. It is further to be observed about taxation that whether you increase or decrease any taxation it is becoming exceedingly difficult to determine whether the purposes of revenue shall be accomplished or not. With the limitations and restrictions in export and import trade, and even upon production, throughout the entire world; with embargoes, licenses and fixation of prices; with the transportation agencies of most countries largely under governmental control, and subject to traffic priorities; with increasing production costs, increasing wages, and contracting labour markets; with the tremendous demand for raw materials for war purposes, and with problems of exchange, one would be bold indeed to prophesy the course of the currents of our trade and commerce from day to day, or the net results and effects of any taxation proposals.

For the reasons which I have just stated, and others, I should not be surprised to find at the end of the fiscal year a considerable reduction in revenue from Customs and Excise as compared with the last year and upon the present rates. The prohibition of the importation of spirits and beer during the war will alone entail an annual loss to revenue of over $15,000,000. With increasing interest and pension charges, due to war, we must, of necessity, from time to time impose fresh taxation to supplement our revenues.

Since Parliament last met and during the recess two taxation measures were enacted by Order in Council. These relate to the Canadian Pacific railway and to the meat-packing and cold-storage industry. Copies of these Orders in Council have been laid upon the table of the House, but I might be permitted, in fact it is perhaps my duty, to state to the House the effect of these taxation measures.

By an Order in Council, which is effective during the war from January 1, 1918, we shall receive from the Canadian Pacific Railway one-half of the net earnings of that company from its railway operations after payment of fixed charges and dividends, and as well the income tax on the company's special income received from sources outside of railway earnings. It is further provided that the total amount to be paid each year shall not be less than the amount which the net earnings exceed the earnings for the year ending December 31, 1917, due to the increase in freight and passenger rates granted by the Order in Council of December 26, 1917, and further, it shall not be less than the company's net earnings in any year from railway operations, in excess of ten per cent on its common stock up to $7,000,000. We estimate a revenue of $7,000,000 and possibly more from this source this year. In respect of the Order in Council relating to the packing industry, it is provided that the packers shall retain in addition to 7 per cent per annum upon the invested capital one-half of any excess up to fifteen per cent, the balance being payable to the Receiver General. The revenue to be derived from this source, is of course dependable on the volume of business carried on during the year by the industry and the profit, which is hardly capable of estimate at the moment.

Mr. MURPHY: That Order in Council was not retroactive?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think that Order in Council was retroactive.

The Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, is not applicable to this calendar year unless clause three of the Act is revived, which we propose doing. From this tax we received of revenue $12,506,516 the first year, and $21,271,283 the second year. For the third accounting period of 1917, the returns are only receivable on or before the first of July, 1918. A safe estimate of revenue for that period is $25,000,000, which if realized will make a total of $58,771,799 received from the Business Profits War Tax for the three accounting periods. It is proposed to amend clause five of the Act, which limits the business to be taxed to those employing capital to the amount of $50,000 and over. The amendment will provide that businesses employing capital of $25,000 and up to $50,000 shall be subject to taxation, but at a lower rate. The rate of taxation shall be twenty-five per cent of the amount by which the profits exceed ten per cent, the rate being applicable alike to incorporated companies and any other business employing the stated amounts of capital.

Important amendments to the Income Tax Act are proposed. The exemption in the case of unmarried persons is to be reduced from $1,500 to $1,000 and for married persons from $3,000 to $2,000, the rate to be two per cent from $1,000 and up to $1,500 in the case of unmarried persons and widows, or widowers without dependent children, and two per cent from $2,000 and up to $3,000 in the case of all other persons.

The present super tax is to be continued as at present up to incomes of $50,000, at which point a new classification and rate is proposed, and which is as follows: From $50,000 and up to $75,000, fifteen per cent; from $75,000 and up to $100,000, twenty per cent; from $100,000 and up to $200,000, twenty-five per cent; from $200,000 and up to $400,000, thirty per cent; from $400,000 and up to $600,000, thirty-five per cent; from $600,000 and up to $800,000, forty per cent; from $800,000 and up to $1,000,000, forty-five per cent; and all over $1,000,000, fifty per cent.

In addition to the normal tax and supertax, it is proposed during the war to enact a war surtax assessable up to and inclusive of the calendar year in which the war ends, upon the tax payable, as follows: On incomes from $6,000 to $10,000, five per cent; on incomes in excess of $10,000 and not exceeding $100,000, ten per cent; on incomes in excess of $100,000 and not exceeding $200,000, fifteen per cent, and upon all incomes in excess of $200,000, thirty-five per cent.

At the last session of Parliament the Minister of Finance was strongly urged to provide an exemption for each child in the family of a married person liable under the Income Tax Act. During the recess and before he left Ottawa in January last, he had given careful consideration to these representations, and he concluded that some exemption in such cases should be made. Accordingly, an amendment to the Act is to be submitted providing for an exemption of $200 for each child under the age of sixteen years. This amendment is not retroactive, and is not applicable to the Income tax payable for the year 1917.

The Corporation Income Tax, now four per cent, is to be increased to six per cent. Other minor amendments are proposed, but I need not detain the House with them at this time.

The computation of the Income tax is difficult, and in order that the House may clearly understand the effect of the proposed amendments, I shall illustrate the same by a statement showing the present and proposed tax payable in the case of a married person. The first figure I shall read shall be the income, next the present taxation, and lastly the proposed taxation.

We propose to increase the excise duties payable on manufactured tobacco from 10 cents to 20 cents per pound; on cigars from $3 to $6 per thousand; on cigarettes from $3 to $6 per thousand; on foreign raw leaf tobacco from 28 cents to 40 cents per pound; on foreign raw leaf tobacco, stemmed, from 42 cents to 60 cents per pound. We also propose to establish an excise duty of 5 cents per pound on raw leaf tobacco grown in Canada, allowing the Canadian grower a sufficient quantity for his own use without payment of duty thereon.

We also deem it expedient to place a Customs tax of ten cents per pound upon tea. The importations of tea for consumption in Canada amount to about thirty million pounds per year, a per capita consumption of a little more than four pounds per annum. An excise duty of 10 cents per pound shall also be imposed on all tea held by importers and dealers, on the 30th day of April, instant, and on that day unsold, in excess of one thousand pounds. The importations of tea during the past three months have been equal to half the importations for the year 1917.

The imposition of a specific duty of 10 cents per pound on tea, necessitates changes in the Customs duties upon coffee and chicory, in order to place the taxation upon these articles on a parity with the taxation upon tea. The principal change in the taxation upon coffee relates to green coffee. The Customs tariff upon green coffee is, British Preferential Tariff, 2½ cents per pound, and General Tariff, 3 cents per pound. It is proposed that the British Preferential Tariff be 5 cents and the General Tariff 7 cents, per pound. The coffee tariff items are covered by the West Indies Agreement and the Preferential rate for coffee from the West India Islands, which were parties to the agreement, must be at least 20 per cent below the General Tariff rate. This has been provided for in the several tariff changes in respect of coffee. Changes in the Customs rate of duty payable on tobacco, cigars and cigarettes compensating for the increases in the excise tax upon these articles will be submitted.

It is also proposed to increase the duties payable on beverages which require malt, rice or corn in their manufacture and when containing not more than 2½ per cent of proof spirit. The present rate of duty upon this commodity is 17½ per cent, plus the War Tariff Rate of 7½ per cent, or about 25 per cent ad valorem, and it is proposed to raise the rate of duty to 40 per cent ad valorem.

The resolutions which I shall submit at the close of my remarks will provide for the repeal of the special war tax rates on sleeping car berths, and shall substitute the rate of 10 per cent of the price paid for each berth, with a minimum rate of 25 cents; and for the increase from 5 cents to 10 cents of the tax on parlour car seats; they shall provide for an excise tax of 1 cent per hundred on matches, or fractional parts thereof; an excise tax of 8 cents on each pack of playing cards; and a specific rate of Customs duty of 5 cents per lineal foot upon moving picture films.

The resolutions shall also provide for a special war excise tax of 10 per cent upon the selling value of automobiles, jewellery, gramaphones, graphaphones, phonographs, talking machines, mechanical piano and organ players and records, when imported into or manufactured in Canada. The tax upon automobiles is applicable to all imported into or manufactured in Canada and unsold this day. Such are the taxation proposals, and other than I have stated no tariff changes are proposed.

In conclusion, let me say that we may safely look to the future with courage and fortitude. Happy are our conditions in comparison with those of the belligerent countries of Europe. Armies do not contend for mastery upon our soil. Our undeveloped resources are tremendous. Immigration has been temporarily arrested, but shortly after the war we shall resume our growth of pre-war days and our financial burdens shall not then appear so onerous. We have assumed enormous responsibilities and we shall discharge them in the manner befitting our country, our cause and our race. The future of our country as well as the fate of civilization and democratic institutions will depend upon the result of this war, and no price is too high to pay for victory. We have already played a distinguished and noble part in the titanic struggle of the warring nations, and it shall not diminish for the lack of resources to be furnished by our people. We shall face coming events not without anxiety, not without a clear realization of our task, but with a strong resolve to use our strength to the utmost, confident that our Canadian people will patriotically and cheerfully provide for our expenditures, and the ways and means to support and sustain our gallant army in its stand for the political institutions which we cherish and which we pray shall not perish from the earth.

that corporations and joint stock companies, no matter how created or organized, shall pay six per centum upon income exceeding three thousand dollars, but shall not be liable to pay the supertax; that the minister may permit any corporation or joint stock company the fiscal year of which is not the calendar year, to make a return and to have the tax payable by it computed upon its income for the twelve months ending with its last fiscal year preceding the date of assessment; that section five be amended by exempting the incomes or such portion of the incomes of judges and retired judges as come within the provisions of subsection three of section twenty-seven of the Judges Act and the incomes of incorporated companies whose business and assets are carried on and situate entirely outside Canada.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, my first word must be one of thanks to the Acting Minister of Finance, who so kindly handed me, a few days ago, some of the figures on which he based his statement, and which enables me to deal less inadequately with the financial situation which confronts this country than would otherwise have been the case.

I apprehend that at all times, and more especially at a time like the present, the duty of an Opposition is to submit everything proposed by the Government to the closest and most careful scrutiny, and then to make the observations and the criticisms which occur to them with an eye only to the best interests of the country. In that spirit I shall deal with the statement of the Acting Minister of Finance.

First of all, we were very glad to hear that the health of the Minister of Finance has improved—not the health of the Acting Minister, for he needs no remarks to be made upon his good health; as we say in the province of Quebec, ça saute aux yeux, it leaps to the eye. We hear through the public press that the Minister of Finance has got as far as Washington, and we hope that while he is there no rude newspaper man will poke in front of him any reports of the speeches he made at the time of the Reciprocity proposals six years ago, because it might give him a relapse.

The Acting Minister of Finance has dealt with the question of the unfavourable balance in exchange of trade between us and the United States, and while he was speaking the thought occurred to me that if the Government of this country had not thought it best to limit the profits which the paper makers could have made in Canada at this time we might have had a greater development of paper-making here and more news print might have been sold to the United States. After all, the attitude of this Government towards the paper makers of Canada was not altogether fair. This Administration wished to treat the newspapers right, they wished to be kind to the newspapers, and they thought it would be a nice thing to exhibit their kindly feelings at the expense of the newsprint manufacturers. So they offered to the newspapers a continual treat, but instead of paying for the treat themselves they had it paid for by the newspaper manufacturers, who had to supply the newspaper proprietors with newsprint at a certain fixed price, a price which the manufacturers say is below what it costs them to produce the paper.

As to the loss of revenue because of prohibition I do not believe that the Acting Minister of Finance need be very much disturbed because, speaking for myself, I think that any loss which occurs through prohibiting the importation of wines and spirits into this country, or their manufacture herein, will be more than made up by the increased health and strength and wealth of the Canadian people.

The super-taxes announced were not very alarming, nor the taxes on income, and I say this, speaking for our friends on this side: that if the Acting Minister of Finance is attacked by any person for having too heavily taxed those who can best bear taxation, he can look to us for support and encouragement. The money must be found somewhere, and it should be taken from the pockets of those who have the most of it. We should not tax the poor unless we are compelled to, we should see that the rich pay and pay in large measure. And to the honour of the rich men of this country let me say, that I do not believe there will be any serious objection to income taxes as long as they are applied honestly and fearlessly, and as long as no one who should rightly be taxed is allowed to escape.

As regards the excise duties on tobacco, I suppose it is a proper way of raising revenue, but I trust it will not work out that the tobacco for the poor man's pipe will cost him too much. As far as cigarettes are concerned I suppose the President of the Council will agree with me that the use of cigarettes is a pernicious habit, and therefore that it is quite proper to tax them.

As regards the 10 cents a pound duty on tea, I am sorry to see that a Government which has made such an appeal to the ladies has, in return for their support and admiration, taxed their favourite beverage. Perhaps there is an explanation for it, but I would point out that on tea imported direct from the country of growth and production, and on tea purchased in bond in the United Kingdom, the following tax is imposed: British preferential tariff, 10 cents per pound, intermediate tariff 10 cents; general tariff, 10 cents. Some explanation is needed for the departure from that sound principle—which the Acting Minister of Finance should have learned years ago at the feet of that other great Nova Scotian, the member for Queens and Shelburne (Mr. Fielding)—that there is such a thing as the British preference in this country. It seems too bad that tea coming from China, for instance, shall pay no more to get into Canada, or no more after coming in, than tea from Ceylon raised by a fellow British subject under the far eastern skies.

Then, with reference to the duty of 10 per cent on autos: let me express the hope, Mr. Speaker, that this 10 per cent does not apply to farm tractors.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER: Of course, a farm tractor is an automobile just the same, I presume, as a truck is an automobile. I believe it might have been well to have differentiated between pleasure cars and business cars or utility cars. Surely, when the provinces are, and have been, spending vast sums of money to improve the roads of this country, it is a mistake to tax a truck which is, perhaps bringing in from the country thousands of gallons of milk to our town populations. I think there should have been a differentiation effected there. I have this also to say: as far as I can see this 10 per cent, which applies as well to automobiles coming into the country as to automobiles manufactured in the country, will practically give the whole market over entirely to the manufacturer of Canadian automobiles, because I believe I am right when I say that the present customs tariff on automobiles coming in from the United States amounts to 42½ per cent, and if another 10 per cent is added it will make the duty 52½ per cent, which I should say, is an absolutely prohibitive duty. I consider that the 10 per cent which the manufacturer in Canada will be taxed will be very little for him to pay in view of the market being practically given over to him. On these grounds, Mr. Speaker, I question the advisability of the tax as it is presently submitted. There is room, I presume, for the taxation of luxuries; but the taxation of luxuries should be so effected that no increase of protection should be given to the native manufacturer, at any rate not at a time like this.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If the hon. member will permit me, I would like to correct a statement he made a moment ago, so that the country will not be misled. The duty on automobiles does not apply, and is not intended to apply, to motor trucks of any kind.

Mr. McMASTER: Will it apply to delivery trucks?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. McMASTER: If that be so then I have to say that this legislation is very loosely drafted, because the idea I took from it was that "automobile" is a term of wide application, covering pleasure cars, express delivery vans, and such automobiles as the large trucks used by the Militia Department on the streets of this city.

Now, my hon. friend made some remarks which he thought were more or less hopeful about our having a favourable balance of trade. He told us that we were selling more to Great Britain than we were buying from her, and that we were buying more from the United States than we were selling to the United States. In the case of Great Britain the balance was favourable to us; in the case of the United States the balance was not favourable to us. I think that before going further, I should remind the House of the very essential fallacy wrapped up in the phrase "favourable balance of trade." Suppose a vessel laden with commodities grown in Canada leaves the port of Montreal for Great Britain, the goods on board being worth $100,000, and that it returns with a cargo of commodities useful to the Canadian people worth $120,000. On the unfavourable balance of trade theory our exports would be represented as $100,000; our imports as $120,000; and our unfavourable balance of trade, $20,000. But, suppose my hypothetical ship is lost on the voyage from Liverpool to Montreal, then the exports from Canada are set down at $100,000, imports into Canada, nil; favourable balance of trade for Canada $100,000. It is not a wise thing to base any public policy on absurdities of that sort.

What is the situation in regard to our trade? The situation is that we are maintaining an army across the seas, and helping to maintain other armies across the seas, and in consequence our imports have been enormously swollen and our exports still more enormously swollen. To illustrate my argument, I have merely to refer to a table dealing with war trade, prepared by the Department of Statistics, containing the exports of certain Canadian commodities having a direct bearing on the war for the last normal year, which ended on the 31st March, 1914, compared with the exports of the same commodities for the fiscal year ended March 31st, 1917. These are the latest figures I have been able to obtain along these lines. The war has swollen both our exports and imports, first, by greatly enhanced prices, and, secondly, by greatly increased quantities of certain commodities imported and exported for the equipment and provisioning of our army and for the use of our allies. I do not ask the House to follow me in a long list of figures, but there are some rather striking examples of my contention which I think may be of interest to hon. members. In the fiscal year ended March 31, 1914, we exported from Canada $446,000 worth of clothing. I leave the odd hundreds out. For the fiscal year ended March 31, 1917, this item had increased to six and one-third millions of dollars. Eggs jumped from just over $37,000 to just over $1,800,000. Explosives leaped from over $241,000 to over $281,000,000. Gutta percha, which we exported in the year 1914 to the value of $686,000, jumped to over $2,500,000 in 1917. In the year 1914 we exported 15 gasoline launches, worth a little over $9,000; in 1917, we exported 463 launches, worth over $15,000,000. The export of bacon has caused a good deal of interest in this country, and I note that from $3,750,000 in 1914 our exports have jumped to $43,000,000 in 1917, which latter figure, of course, includes the price of the brine which was pumped into the bacon according to a well known process which occasioned a certain amount of interest throughout the country some months ago.

Exports of beef jumped from over $1,000,000 in 1914 to $5,750,000 in 1917, and canned meats from $95,000 to $1,750,000. Pork, showing the family characteristic, almost kept pace with bacon by increasing in export from over $200,000 to over $2,500,000. Among the metals a vast increase of exports was shown. Exports of aluminium jumped from under $2,000,000 in 1914 to under $6,000,000 in 1917 and brass from one-third of a million dollars to less than $7,000,000. Copper jumped from about $10,000,000 to almost $25,000,000. Exports of iron and steel increased fourfold, and of printing paper more than twice, in spite of the threat given by the Government to the newspapers at the expense of manufacturers of print. Textiles, manufactured and unmanufactured, increased in export almost fourfold, tobacco sixfold, vegetables from $1,500,000 to $12,000,000, vehicles from $4,000,000 to $14,000,000, wood pulp from $6,000,000 to $20,000,000. The same condition prevailed from March 31, 1917, to March 31, 1918. I am sure that the Acting Minister of Finance, who has not yet had time to dissipate the sound economic views which he held on this side of the Chamber, will agree that no national policy could possibly be founded on the absolutely artificial financial condition which confronts the country at this time.

Now let me deal with the national debt. When ten days or two weeks ago the Acting Minister of Finance instructed his deputy to hand me the figures in this respect, the net debt of the country was said to be $1,100,000,000. To-day it amounts to $1,200,000,000—though I do not say that $100,000,000 has meanwhile been added. What does this mean? A poor, but, I trust, honest professional man finds it very hard to imagine what a billion dollars is like. But if we assume that our population is 8,000,000, the per capita debt of the country amounts to $140; that is to say, every man, woman and child in the country has to-day an obligation in respect to the Federal Government of $140, as against $40 in 1913. Receipts on account of consolidated revenue, or what in business parlance we would call receipts on account of current account, amounted last year to $258,000,000. The expenditure last year on consolidated fund account amounted to $173,000,000 and on capital account $30,000,000, making an expenditure—quite apart from the war, except as regards a certain proportion of the interest paid and pensions—of over $200,000,000. Of this expenditure of $173,000,000, $7,120,000 was spent on pensions—and I am sure that not a member of this House grudges one cent of that expenditure. Our only desire is that the money shall be spent in such a manner as to give a value of one hundred cents for every dollar expended.

Payments of interest on account of our debt amounted to $45,750,000. We paid last year on account of interest on the debt more than three times as much as was paid for all purposes by the Dominion in 1868.

It is interesting to note just what proportion of our total current expenditure of $173,000,000 is due to the war. Payments on account of pensions are, of course, nearly all due to the war; there was a civil pension list, but the amount involved would be less than $500,000. We can put the war pensions down at $6,650,000. The interest paid on the debt was not all due to the war. Making proper allowances for interest paid on our pre-war debt and deducting this amount from the $45,750,000, we find that about $33,000,000 is the amount representing interest on the war debt. So that out of the $173,000,000 of current expenditure last year, not more than $40,000,000 was spent as a result of the war, leaving a balance of $133,000,000 spent on consolidated or current account.

We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that a very serious financial situation confronts this country. The amount spent for pensions last year, over $7,000,000, will amount to not much less than $15,000,000 next year, even if the war be not protracted beyond this year. Of course, we can make no prophecy, even the most vague or indefinite, as to when the war will end. A year from now the interest on our debt will, we may safely estimate, amount to $60,000,000. If we are to conduct the affairs of the country properly and in businesslike fashion, we must establish a sinking fund, and I suggest, though possibly there are men in the House who can strike the figure better than I can, that it would not be too much to set aside $15,000,000 a year for the purpose of extinguishing the immense debt which this war is necessarily imposing upon the country. We of this generation do wish that the country shall not be burdened for all eternity by heavy war charges; we should as far as possible, remove the burden of the debt from the country for the sake of our children and their children who will come after them.

Then, there is a matter which, with admirable Scottish caution, the Acting Minister of Finance avoided this afternoon. What about the Canadian Northern railway? What additional obligations will the acquisition of that road impose upon the Canadian people. Our public accounts for 1917 disclose that the Government railways were not great revenue producers for the Canadian people. The Intercolonial railway, under the able management of the Minister of Railways and Canals, last year came out $4,000 on the right side of the ledger, with not a single cent allowed for the many millions of capital invested in that enterprise, while the cost of operating the National Transcontinental was $1,870,000 more than the revenue obtained from it.

The Quebec and Lake St. John railway, at the end of the year, was just $27,540.82 in the hole. If I say that we should, year after year, estimate a deficit on our railways of $10,000,000, would I be estimating the deficit at too much? I do not think so, in view of the fact that we do not know how much interest we shall have to pay on the $400,000,000 of debts which, according to the Drayton report, the Canadian Northern railway system owes. We have assumed this liability, and very strange to say, those gentlemen who are responsible for the assumption by the Canadian people of this Canadian Northern liability, are unable to tell us the exact amount of that liability. We may find that we shall have to make great capital expenditures in regard to that road, but before I come to capital expenditures, I had better conclude my remarks in regard to current expenditures.

For the fiscal year ended March 31, 1918, it cost the people of this country $133,000,000 to run the country outside of war expenditure. We should in this country be able to get along with an expenditure on current account of $100,000,000. Impossible, I hear hon. members say; it cannot be done. Why can it not be done? In the year 1911, when my honoured leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) directed the affairs of this country, when the commercial sky was blue and smiling, when Canada was full of hope, when our population was almost as great, if not as great as it is now, we were able, under the direction of our Finance Minister, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) to conduct the affairs of this country on a current expenditure of $98,000,000. What has been done before, will and must be done again. I think it was Lord Bacon who said that the practice of economy was in itself a great revenue. We, in Canada, have, to a certain extent forgotten what economy means in matters connected with the administration of the affairs of the country. Just to give a little example, the other night the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Kay) and myself were endeavouring to cut down in the Estimates a small item of $5,000. What do you, Sir, imagine this $5,000 was for? It was to encourage the eating of fish in Toronto and the rest of the province of Ontario by bonusing a system of fish dinners at the Toronto exhibition. The minister pointed out, with all the grace in the world, that it was a good thing for the people of Ontario, for certain physiological reasons, to eat more fish. We were almost alone that night. The minister was over on that side of the House; a few of us, mostly from the province of Quebec, were on this side, and in the end the House approved the estimate and allowed the item to pass. It is $5,000 here and $5,000 there, but in the end, economy is lost, and the great revenue which comes from the practice of economy is also lost.

While the war is being waged, and after the war is over, we ought to be able to get along with an expenditure on current account of $200,000,000. That would be made up somewhat in this fashion:

Expenditure on revenue account, less pensions and interest on public debt	$100,000,000
Pensions	15,000,000
Interest on public debt	60,000,000
Sinking fund on debt	15,000,000
Deficit on Government railways.	10,000,000
Total	$200,000,000

That will mean, on an estimated population of 8,000,000, an annual charge of $25 per head for every man, woman and child in the country. People from other provinces than Quebec, whose olive branches number one or two, may look with equanimity on an annual capital charge of $50, or even of $100, but in the province of Quebec, from which I come, and in which the quiver is a great deal fuller than in some other parts of the country, a capital charge of $25 per head is a very severe menace to face.

I have not attempted to estimate our future expenditure on capital account. It is almost impossible to do so. The Canadian Northern railway represents a problem sufficient to daunt the bravest heart. According to the report of Sir Henry Drayton and his associates, it will cost about $70,000,000 in the next five years for betterments of that system to bring it up to proper operating condition. The road, according to the same report, owes at least $400,000,000, and the strange thing is that no one seems to know exactly what it does owe. Hardly a week passes when that commission, sitting in the city of Toronto, is not in receipt of further claims against the Canadian Northern railway. What is that commission sitting for? It is sitting in Toronto to see what sum less than $10,000,000 the people of Canada shall pay to the owners or the pledgees of the stock of the Canadian Northern railway for taking that stock away from them. There was room for a commission, but the commission should have sat for this purpose—to see what sum the owners and the pledgees and other people interested in the Canadian Northern railway should give to the Canadian people for taking their obligations off their hands. I greatly fear that for many years to come we shall find ourselves face to face with grave capital commitments.

I am glad that the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) has brought forward to-day proposals for the application of allowances, in regard to a man's payments on income tax, in respect to the children which he has. That is only fair and right. It is following sound British precedent. I noticed in Mr. Bonar Law's Budget speech that the British Government had carried to a higher figure than formerly the exemptions for children.

The next criticism which I have to offer to my hon. friend's speech is that it discloses no proper nor adequate measures of economy.

It has been my lot recently to read a certain number of budget speeches which have from year to year been delivered in the House, and a certain number of financial criticisms, and with all respect in the world for those members of this House who have made speeches and those criticisms, there is a certain sameness about them. When the Liberals were in power their expenditure was denounced in words eloquent and bitter by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). To-day no longer does he denounce, at any rate in bitter tones, the Government's extravagance; the eloquence has remained, but the bitterness has gone. Here are his words, uttered when he was financial critic of the Opposition in 1908:

> The rapid pace which has been set and the recklessness of the expenditures that have been undertaken have obliterated all the old rules, the old lines in reference to expenditure. Whither are we rushing?

The expenditure which was animadverted to in such eloquent tones amounted in that year to $76,000,000. In 1911 the present Prime Minister, then the leader of the Opposition, issued a manifesto to the Canadian people, who were then called upon to decide which of the two great parties in this country should direct the country's destinies for the next parliamentary term, and he wrote these most severe words:

> The increase in what is known as ordinary controllable expenditures of from $36,000,000 in 1896 to $79,000,000 in 1910 is proof of extravagance beyond any possible defence and establishes a prima facie case of corruption.

It is a sad commentary upon the value of election promises and upon the frailty of mankind to know that the Administration of my right hon. friend the present Prime Minister increased the consolidated fund expenditure or what we may call the expenditure on current account from $98,000,000 for the year ended March 31, 1912, to $112,000,000 the succeeding year; the next year it had increased to $127,000,000, the next year to $135,000,000, back again to $130,000,000 the next year, leaping up again to $148,000,000 the next year, and the expenditure stands at $173,000,000 for the year just closed, exclusive of all war expenditure except pensions and interest on the war debt.

To compare the first four years of the Conservative Administration with the last four years of the Liberal Administration—of course, in regard to this part of my remarks the Acting Minister of Finance is no more responsible than a babe unborn—we find that the expenditure of the Conservative Administration exceeded by about 45 per cent that of their predecessors, though the country was certainly prosperous in the last four years of Liberal Administration, and although part of the first four years of the Conservative Administration was passed in war time, when extravagance ceases to be a fault and becomes a crime. To those who find it difficult to believe anything disadvantageous concerning the Conservative party—and although the name Conservative has disappeared from political history we cannot think that all Conservatives have lost their identity in the sea of Unionism—and to those who may object that my remarks deal only with consolidated revenue account, I need only say that the capital expenditure accounts of certain spending departments of the Government show the same high, and in my view unjustifiable, increases. In all governments there are forces working for economy and forces working for extravagance, and the history of this country shows in the most plain and unmistakable manner that the forces of economy have been relatively stronger under the administration of Liberal leaders than under the administration of my right hon. friend the present Prime Minister, or those who have preceded him in guiding the affairs of the Conservative party.

But now, face to face with the sternest situation that has ever confronted the Canadian people, let us admit frankly that whatever virtues of thrift and economy our people possess as individuals, these qualities have not been adequately reflected in the management of the nation's business. Having signalized the fault, let us see what conditions have led to it.

In a democracy the people get the Government they deserve, and I ask the question: Why have the Canadian people had extravagant governments? The first cause has been a lack in the Canadian people of a feeling of responsibility for the good government of their country. Many there have been who have frankly stated that they took no interest in politics; that they were too busy to do so; and what is still more astonishing, some such seemed to take a considerable degree of pride in this shameless sort of selfishness. Perhaps, a feeling of colonialism felt by certain classes in our country, especially in years gone by, has been responsible in part for this condition. The second cause has been the fact that we were collecting our federal taxes almost altogether through a customs tariff and excise, and no one knew what he was paying to the State.

These two causes, in some measure, will be removed by the war. The people of this country are now feeling as they have not felt for years how nearly and closely politics—the science and art of Government—touches every individual member of the State, and many persons are now learning, as direct taxpayers to the federal authorities, that they have a direct interest in the economical administration of the country's affairs.

But there is a third cause, and I believe a most potent one, consisting in a widespread misapprehension about the surpluses which the governments of this country have declared on current account, or consolidated fund account, for a number of years past.

For the fiscal year 1899-1900, we had a surplus on account of consolidated fund of just a little over $8,000,000; the next year, the surplus was a little over $5,500,000; the next year, a little over $7,250,000; the next year that of 1902-3, the surplus had increased to over $14,250,000; the next year it went to $15,000,000; the next year it was almost $8,000,000; the next almost $13,000,000; for nine months of the next year it was almost $16,500,000; the next year it amounted to almost $19,500,000; but in the year 1908-9, which followed the commercial crisis of the fall of 1907, the surplus was reduced to a little more than $1,000,000; the next year, however, 1909-10, it increased to over $22,000,000; the next to almost exactly $30,000,000; the next year, 1911-12, to almost $38,000,000; the next year to $56,500,000; the next year, 1913-14, it was almost $36,000,000; the next fiscal year saw the outbreak of the war, and for that year, 1914-15, instead of the usual surplus a deficit of almost $2,500,000 occurred. This was changed, however, the succeeding year, to a surplus of almost $42,000,000, and in the year 1916-17, the surplus amounted to $84,000,000, while for the year just closed it amounted to $85,000,000.

On the face of things, these surpluses demonstrate a truly marvellous condition of national prosperity, but I ask the question: Can we regard these surpluses as an indication of the excess of money furnished for taxation by the people of Canada out of their earnings over and above the necessities of the Government? In other words, during these years is it a fact that after having earned large sums of money the Canadian people have contributed, indirectly it is true, either through Customs duties or excise, such large sums by way of taxes to the Government that the Government has had these surpluses? My answer is: Far from it, because the revenue in these years in which these wonderful surpluses have occurred—in the history of the country the surplus never reached 10 millions until the year 1902,—largely represents taxation on our own borrowings. Perhaps I could better explain what I mean by an illustration. Let us suppose a man in business has for many years been conducting his affairs at a profit, and in order to provide for his declining years he has been placing in a fund a part of his profits, which he calls his surplus fund. And let us suppose further that experience has taught him that the easiest way of doing so is to put aside each month, in a special account, 5 per cent of his gross receipts. Let us further suppose that it becomes necessary for him to enlarge his establishment. For that purpose he borrows $10,000. Will he, if he be a prudent business man, regard this sum as a gross receipt and put $500 of it in his special account? Assuredly not, because he knows that no part of it can be treated as revenue. It is capital which he has borrowed, and to put it, or any part of it, in his surplus fund would be to invite disappointment, as it all has to be repaid.

Let me now apply the illustration for the period from the year 1902 to the year 1914. Our Dominion statistician has estimated that the Canadian people, acting through their Federal Government, or their provincial governments or municipalities, or corporations, or as individuals, borrowed from Great Britain and other countries, but almost exclusively from Great Britain, $2,713,300,000. A computation which it is interesting to note is largely borne out by the figures of Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor, manager of the Bank of Montreal, who estimated that in 1914 Canadians owed Great Britain £545,546,849, which in our currency approximates very closely the figures arrived at by Mr. Coats, the Dominion statistician, who, in arriving at his conclusion, it is interesting to note, proceeded along entirely different lines.

Now, these sums so borrowed came into Canada not in the form of gold or bank notes, or any other sort of money; they entered in the form of goods, largely from the United States, and on these goods were levied taxes at the rate, let us say, of at least 17 per cent. Seventeen per cent on the total of our borrowings comes to $461,251,000, a sum very largely in excess of our total surpluses from the year 1902-3 to the year 1913-4, both inclusive, and a sum within $20,000,000 of the total surpluses on account of consolidated fund since the year 1902-3 to date.

We may continue, if we like, to call these moneys surpluses, but as far as they represent taxation on goods which came into this country as a result of our borrowings abroad they are surpluses which will have to be returned to our creditors in time to come. What is my conclusion on this point? I presume that in the form of bookkeeping obtaining the entries had to be made as they were, but I think that if the true nature of these surpluses had been pointed out to the Canadian people, if it had been shown to them that these surpluses in large part represented taxation on our own borrowings, there would have been less pressure on the Finance Minister to swell his estimates and more power in the Finance Minister to resist requests of that kind.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (resuming): It would be an occasion for deep regret to those who closely follow and understand the needs of our own soldiers, those of our Allies and of the civil populations overseas, to know that there has been one very serious omission in the able speech delivered this afternoon by the Acting Minister of Finance, and the omission is this: He has announced no policy of taking off the duty on agricultural implements and machinery to increase food production. I take it that it should not be necessary for me to speak at any length on the need of food at this time, but if proof is required it is at hand. In the Canadian Food Bulletin, published by the Canada Food Board, on 28th March of this year, I find a call for greater production from the Prime Minister himself. He wrote:

> The campaign for increased production of foodstuffs now launched by the Canada Food Board is of the most vital importance to the victory of the Allied cause. Because of our geographical position the United Kingdom, the Allied nations are depending on Canada for food as never before. Specific suggestions will be issued from time to time by the Canada Food Board for the guidance of the people; and it is the earnest hope of the Government that every citizen will realize his or her personal individual duty to adopt and carry out these suggestions. Mere perfunctory observance will not be enough; the crisis is grave and urgent beyond possibility of exaggeration; and it will only be through an earnest sense of individual responsibility that Canadians will be able in this matter to honour their obligations to their heroic soldiers overseas, who are defending our liberties at a cost besides which any personal inconvenience or discomfort on our part is insignificant.

Was the relative importance of food production altered by the great German offensive which began on the 22nd day of last month? Not, at any rate, in the opinion of Lord Rhondda, the British food controller, who from London, on the 10th of April, cabled the Canada Food Board as follows:

> In these stern days it is inspiring to learn that Canada is tackling the food problem with redoubled energy. The terrific pressure on our military front makes it all the more imperative that those behind the lines should strain every nerve to defeat the enemy's avowed object of destroying the British Empire. Germany hoped first to starve the Old Country by the submarine campaign and then to smash her land forces. She has failed to starve us and she will fail to smash us but we cannot achieve victory without food. There never was a time when it was more needed. The Canadian farmer and the Canadian farm hand now have the opportunity to make an effective reply to the enemy's present onslaughts by bending their undivided energies to the increased production of those food supplies for which we depend to such vital extent on your great Dominion.

Our own Dr. Robertson has assured us that the world faces a food situation which is nothing short of appalling. The increased dependence of our Allies, France, Italy and Belgium, upon us for food production is shown by the following facts: In France the average yearly production of wheat for the five years preceding the war was 317,000,000 bushels. In 1916, the production had fallen to no less than 214,000,000 bushels, and in 1917 the crop was estimated at 161,000,000 bushels. Likewise, in Italy, the average pre-war production for five years amounted to 183,000,000 bushels. In 1916 this had dropped to 176,000,000 bushels, and in 1917 the estimate was 147,000,000 bushels. In Belgium the average pre-war production was almost 15,000,000 bushels. It fell in 1916 to almost 12,000,000 bushels. The estimate for 1917 only amounted to 9,000,000 bushels. The total reduction in those three countries amounted to over 198,000,000 bushels, representing a reduction from pre-war production of nearly thirty-eight per cent. In view of these facts Canada finds itself one of the most important factors, if not the most important factor, in the food situation. Supplies from Eastern Europe no longer exist. Supplies from Australia and Africa are too far away to be moved. As Lord Rhondda has said: What we ask from the United States and Canada we cannot procure elsewhere. As between ourselves and the United States we have a far larger exportable surplus of wheat than she has. In the past year our exportable wheat surplus amounted to 154,000,000 bushels, while the United States had only one-third of that amount. Canada is called upon to be a factor in saving a world which is face to face with starvation. She has illimitable quantities of the choicest wheat lands awaiting the plough; she can add enormously to her exports of foodstuffs, especially of grain, in a single year if—and, Mr. Speaker, there is so often an "if"—she can command sufficient man power to do the necessary farm work. Face to face with this situation the Government has conscripted for the army men from the farm. The decision has been made, and I have no desire to re-open the question—the responsibility is upon the Government. But I have merely to say this—and I will not use my own words lest it be thought that party spirit, or something of that sort, had affected my judgment, but I quote the words of Lord Rhondda—"Unless the Allies in Europe are able to import the necessary supplies for the feeding of their armies and their civil population, victory may slip from our united grasp." God forbid! But if disaster should overtake our armies in the field, and if that disaster should be due to a failure of food, I am glad that the responsibility is not upon my shoulders. The Food Board has been created in Canada at vast expense. It has issued some rules and regulations, and has distributed some useful information. Whether the board has justified, is justifying, or will justify the immense amount of money spent upon it, is a matter to which it is now too early to dogmatise; we will leave that question for decision to the future. But there is one means of encouraging food production in this country which the Government has refused to adopt, although it is simple and easy. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, the old story of Naaman, the Syrian, and how he came to the Hebrew prophet seeking to be healed of the disease of leprosy, and the prophet said to him: "Go and bathe in the River Jordan and your skin will be again like the skin of a little child." He disdained at first to follow the direction, and why? Because it was too easy, too simple. I ask the Government of the day not to refuse my suggestion on the same ground, that it is too easy and too simple. What is my suggestion? It is this: That all agricultural tools, implements and machinery of all sorts and kinds, from the rake and hoe to the great tractor and thresher, be placed upon the free list, and that either by drawback or otherwise, the manufacturer of such be placed in as good position in respect to his raw material.

I cannot imagine what adequate reason the Government can offer for withholding its consent to this proposal. It cannot be that the Government fears the lack of revenue, because with two such Ministers of Finance, one acting in Canada and the other in the United States, we can face the future with a certain degree of confidence, and the Government cannot be anxious about the loss of revenue which might be incurred by placing these useful articles on the free list. A Government which is borrowing by the hundred million, and which has presented to us a budget for war purposes alone of $500,000,000, cannot baulk at a mere two million dollar loss of revenue, for that is all the duty realized at the Canadian Customs houses from the entry of agricultural implements during the past year. If there is any reason for refusing my request, it must be based on some other consideration than the loss of revenue. Can the manufacturers of such implements complain of the proposal? If they complain, should their complaint be heard? Men and food are necessary to win the war; food must be produced in Canada in greater abundance; free tools to work with will help the farm to produce in greater abundance. These are statements of fact which no one out of bedlam can contradict. If the manufacturers of agricultural implements object to this cheapening of a means of production, do they not place themselves in a very ignoble posture before the Canadian people, who are in a war where food may be the deciding factor? Were I disposed to follow the methods of certain of my political opponents—not of all, I am glad to say,—who, for the past year have made it a constant practice to accuse of lack of patriotism, of disloyalty, even of traitorous conduct, those who did not see eye to eye with them in the way they thought it best to conduct the military operations of this country,—what hot shot I could pour into the flanks of those persons who object to free agricultural implements! I could ask them, did they not realize that while Canadian boys were fighting for liberty in France, they were fighting for their tariff privileges in Canada. I could ask them whether the blood of their boys spilled on the battlefield was dearer to them than the dividends on their stock. I might venture upon the field of emotional oratory, of which the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) is such a master, and with uplifted arm and flushed face, ask whether they would be responsible for holding back food from our soldiers at the front and our starving allies across the seas. Aye, I might boom across the floor of the House at hon. gentlemen opposite that question which in itself at this time is the very quintescence of insult: Do you not know that there is a war on? But I do not propose to follow any such line of political or economic debate. I believe that the interests of this country are best served by an open, frank, courteous discussion upon those points of public policy on which we differ as well as on those on which we agree. In this spirit, let us consider the situation in regard to free agricultural implements.

First, this Government has admitted the principle of the advisability of free agricultural implements by taking off the duty on farm tractors costing not more than $1,400 f.o.b. factory. I have a very close friend who is a large farmer in Saskatchewan, and as he is not only a man of some means but also a citizen of patriotic inclinations. He laid his plans this summer for putting in an extra large crop.

He found that the tractor that he wished and that was best for his purposes, was of a large size which would cost a good deal more than $1,400. What he finds is this somewhat interesting, because remarkable, situation: The Canadian Government will encourage his neighbour, who needs a small tractor, to buy it by allowing it to come in free, but as my friend requires a large tractor he will have to pay $600 duty upon it. He is a man of judicial mind and high education; he has thought for some time about this problem, and he has given it up in despair; he is absolutely unable to understand why the Government should differentiate between a large tractor and a small tractor, and allow his friend, whose purpose can be served by a small tractor, to have his tractor come in free while he whose purpose is just as worthy of commendation as that of his neighbour will have to pay $600 duty for a large tractor. And the action of the Government in picking out one sort of farm implement to enter free of duty is very unfair to many an eastern farmer who cannot use even a small tractor on his hilly farm and smallish fields, but who would be considerably benefited by getting his mower, binder and potato digger in free. The farmer in the Eastern Townships—for I speak of that part of the agricultural Dominion with which I am most familiar—has had a hard condition to face for many years past. By reason of emigration to the West, by reason of the building of railways, and by reason of the great growth of our eastern cities, even before the war, he found himself in a very difficult position so far as farm labour was concerned, and when the war came there were many voluntary enlistments of young farmers and young farm hands. To-day he finds that perhaps the last boy on the farm has been taken by the latest Act of the Government. Most of these farms are dairy farms, with constant work seven days a week, year after year. What I fear is that there may be—I trust there will not be—a disposition to lose heart on the part of our farmers, to sell off their stock, and to raise only sufficient for their own need.

It has not been altogether easy for the agriculturists in this Dominion to follow the changes of policy of this Administration and of the Administration which preceded it in regard to the taking of men for the army from the soil. In the Military Service Act the necessity for sustaining the productivity of the Dominion was at least inferentially set forth, the terms of the Act being:

And whereas by reason of the large number of men who have already left agricultural and industrial pursuits in Canada to join such Expeditionary Force volunteers, and of the necessity of sustaining under such conditions the productivity of the Dominion, it is expedient to secure the men still required, not by ballot as provided in the Militia Act, but by selective draft.

Certainly the speakers who addressed audiences in Canada prior to the election did not allow this feature of selection in the Military Service Act to pass unnoticed. As the campaign waxed warmer in certain sections, where the judges had either been too severe or the military representative too energetic, representatives from the Department of Agriculture were injected into the matter. So, we had this somewhat curious spectacle. We had tribunals appointed by the Government—not directly by the Government; the Government formed a committee, and then the committee picked certain men who served on the tribunals, and certain others were picked by the judges.

Before this tribunal, created in roundabout fashion by the Government, appeared a representative of the Department of Militia endeavouring to cause the tribunal to look at the matter in a certain way, and a representative of another department of the Government, endeavouring to have the tribunal take another view of the situation. It was a case of "pull tailor, pull devil," the poor conscript being pulled between the two. Strange to say, these representatives were both accredited agents of the Government— and as the Prime Minister himself said the other day, during the course of a short lecture on constitutional law directed to the member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) and myself, the different ministers are jointly and severally responsible for each other's acts. I do not wonder that the farming community were somewhat bewildered, because, unlike the member for George Etienne Cartier and myself, they had not had the privilege of sitting as students, not at the feet of Gamaliel, but at the feet of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) as our law professor. But if the Administration knew how to bewilder, they knew also how to reassure. On December 3, 1917, they passed reassuring ordinance in the shape of an Order in Council—which is an abomination in the sight of every true lover of the constitution, but which to this Administration is a very present help in time of trouble. By the terms of this Order in Council it was decreed that bona fide farmers who had been conscripted might obtain leave of absence without pay on the fiat of the Minister of Militia and Defence. The election over, and a large majority in favour of the Administration having been secured, loud and eloquent appeals went forth to the farmers to increase production. The farmer heeded these appeals; all over the country men made their preparations for putting in a larger crop. Then comes the latest action of the Government, conscripting men from the farms as well as from all other walks of life. The Government must have considered that the occasion demanded this step, or they would not have taken it. I do not wish to discuss whether their policy was wise or not, but I say that they must do something to show the farmers that they were in earnest, that they were really serious, when they were talking about increased production. The criticism is now made by those who put the Military Service Act upon the statute-book that the Act provided for too much selection; so the Government rush to the other extreme by eliminating selection altogether in respect of men aged twenty, twenty-one and twenty-two. A widow, the proprietor of a farm, whose only son is the only hired man she can get, will see her boy join the army—not unwillingly, because quite probably he is twenty and wanted to go two years ago with his high school chums in the neighbouring town, but she restrained him in order that he might work on the farm. She will see him go, while her sister, another widow who has a boy of twenty-five running, say, a gents' furnishings emporium in the neighbouring town, sees her son stay.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the pool rooms?

Mr. McMASTER: I do not believe there are such vast reserves of pool room loafers as the Government seems to be thinking about. Under these circumstances, the Government must endeavour to keep their name good with the agriculturists; if they do not, they run the risk of losing whatever reputation they may have for being serious. You will remember how, some thirty odd years ago, Gilbert and Sullivan poured good-natured ridicule on the British Admiralty in their immortal opera "H.M.S. Pinafore." If a modern Swift or a modern Butler no longer exists to satirize this Government, I warn them that if at some no distant future date they go into a house of public entertainment they may have their ears greeted with this tuneful jingle:

The clock we have pushed forward
For gardening after tea;
But as for farming implements—
We can't admit THEM free.

What opposes this needed reform? What are the forces impeding the freest possible access to tools which are necessary aids to greater production? They are two: first, the attitude of the agricultural implement men; second, the attitude of certain of the big interests of this country.

Let us deal with the first; the objection of the agricultural implement manufacturers. The question of free agricultural implements is not a new one. It was discussed very fully in the debates of the session of 1912-13. On that occasion the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) spoke as follows:

Speaking for myself and for my own interests I would be prepared to say that if we got all our raw materials at any equally reduced duty, either no duty or a duty commensurate with the amounts knocked off implements, we could afford—there is no question about that—to reduce the duty on agricultural implements, but it would be at the cost of displacing probably 100,000 men in the Dominion of Canada in all these implement works and their tributary industries that supply them with raw materials.

These avowals made by the hon. member for Brantford go far along the line advocated by me, though they do not go the whole way; and he has very prudently and properly attempted to speak for no other than himself and his own interests. In this connection I have two points to submit to the House: first, that the agricultural implement business has reached the stage when, given raw materials, duty free, it can stand and should be made to stand upon its own feet; second, that the fear of displacing 100,000 men in tributary industries is grossly exaggerated, if not altogether unfounded.

As to the first point. The number of employees who were engaged on salary or on wages in the agricultural implement business in 1915, according to the postal census of that year, was 7,609. The value of the raw materials used in that year was almost $6,000,000; the value of the products was over $13,372,506, and the exports amounted to over $3,500,000. The war must have greatly affected the export business of this trade, because during 1914 almost $8,000,000 worth of agricultural implements had been exported. Even in 1915, a year of war, the exported product was about one-fifth of the whole, which indicates that the industry is native to the soil, is soundly organized, properly managed, and needs nothing more than a fair field and no favour for success.

As to the second point raised by the member for Brantford, the probable displacing of 100,000 men, can it be said that 100,000 men are employed in those industries which make the raw material which enters into the machinery made by the manufacturers of agricultural implements? I do not think so.

I do not think so because, according to the Government census of 1915, there were only 59,361 persons engaged in that year in the steel and iron industry, and they certainly could not all be displaced by reason of the loss of some custom of the agricultural implement manufacturers. Secondly, although the implement manufacturers are good customers of the iron and steel manufacturers, they are not their only customers—far from that. As stated before, the raw materials which in 1915 went into agricultural implements amounted to almost $6,000,000. Would I be wrong in assuming that 80 per cent of this, or say, about $5,000,000, consisted of iron and steel products in some form or another? I am not an expert on this matter, but as a representative of an agricultural community I am able to look a plough in the face and tell it from a harrow, and it would appear to me that most of these agricultural implements were made of metal, and that the wooden parts represented a very small proportion of the value of the whole. Perhaps I may take 80 per cent as a fair working basis as to the proportion of iron and steel products which go into the making of agricultural implements. From the investigations I have made, I do not believe that more than one-fifth of the iron and steel manufactured in this country goes into making agricultural implements. In other words, I do not believe the agricultural implement manufacturers are customers for more than one-fifth of the iron and steel produced in this country.

Before we leave this question, there is this third consideration: The duties on the raw materials entering into agricultural implements are very low. Most of this raw material will be found in one or another of the following schedules. I might just say, en passant, that it would be interesting to know what principles, if any, underlaid the tariff. It seems to be the strangest sort of hodgepodge of all kinds and conditions of things that one can imagine.

Item 379 reads:

Rolled iron or steel angle beams, channels, angles and other rolled shapes or sections of iron or steel, not punched, drilled or further manufactured than rolled, weighing not less than 35 pounds per lineal yard, not being flat, oval, or round shapes, and not being railway bars or rails, per ton, British preferential, $2; intermediate, $2.75; general, $3.

That is a specific duty. There is to be added to that, under duties which were added a year or so ago for alleged war purposes, British preferential, 5 per cent, intermediate and general, 7½ per cent.

Item 386 reads:

Rolled iron or steel in bars, bands, hoops, scrolls, strips, sheet or plate, of any size, thickness or width, galvanised or coated with any material or not, and steel blanks for the manufacture of milling cutters, when of greater value than 3½ cents per pound, British preferential, free, intermediate, 5 per cent.; general, 5 per cent.

To that would have to be added British preferential, 5 per cent; intermediate and general, 7½ per cent.

Item 396 reads:

Seamless steel tubing valued at not less than 3½ cents per pound, adapted for use in the manufacture of agricultural implements, British preferential, free; intermediate, 5 per cent.; general, 5 per cent.

The duty is now British preferential, 5 per cent; intermediate and general, 12½ per cent.

Item 412 reads:

Iron or steel nuts, washers, rivets and bolts, with or without threads, nut, bolt and hinge blanks, and tee and strip hinges of all sorts, n.o.p., per hundred pounds, British preferential, 75 cents; intermediate, 75 cents; general, 75 cents.

There is to be added to that British preferential, 10 per cent; intermediate, 20 per cent, and general 25 per cent. Now, of course, you will have to add an additional 5 per cent duty on these articles if they come from the British Isles and an additional 7½ per cent if they come from elsewhere.

Item 444 reads:

Mould boards or shares or plough plates, land sides and other plates for agricultural implements when cut to shape from rolled plates of steel and not moulded, punched, polished, or otherwise manufactured, British preferential free, intermediate, free, general, free.

The duty will now be British preferential, 5 per cent; intermediate, 7½, and general, 7½. It would seem to me reasonable to argue that the removal of these duties cannot have that injurious effect dreaded by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) when he was dealing with this matter a year or two ago. It would appear to me that the economic case for free agricultural implements with which to help win the war, is absolute, complete and sound.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Will the hon. member kindly state the date of the Hansard from which he is quoting?

Mr. McMASTER: For some weeks past I have been carrying a copy of the hon. gentleman's remarks around with me in my pocket. The hon. member for Brantford addressed the words which I have quoted to the House and which are reported in volume 6 of Hansard of 1912 at page 10,512. I have also carried around with me some other words of the hon. member which are to be found at page 10,517, and I think that the House will be interested in hearing them. The hon. member said:

The quality of the manufactured goods turned out by Canadian manufacturers is of the best, and the fact that they have competed in the markets of the world against all competitors shows that they are able to compete with the world in quality and in price.

If that is the fact, I would think it well that the farmers of this country should have the benefit of free agricultural implements in order that they may grow more food and, in that way, help to win the war.

I now propose to deal with the attitude which I believe has been assumed by the big interests of this country to the proposal for the introduction of free agricultural implements. I do not think I am breaking any confidences or saying anything that is not known to the world pretty generally when I say that the presence of stalwart radicals in the Borden Administration of to-day is viewed by the large interests of this country with a certain degree of perturbation, if not of fear; and of course, the attitude of the large interests is not at all due to the character of the representatives in the Borden Administration. That, of course, would cause them only joy and confidence. It is the economic views—

Sir SAM HUGHES: Might I correct the hon. member? I understood this was the Borden-Rowell administration.

Mr. McMASTER: I shall not be deflected from an economic discussion by any pleasing, agreeable and humorous pleasantry of the honourable and gallant member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes).

The attitude of the big interests in this country in regard to free agricultural implements is not unlike the attitude they assumed over reciprocity. Though the interests of the protected manufacturers of this country were safeguarded in the most ample manner through the care of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr.

Fielding) and others of the Administration of that day, the financial and industrial interests of this country thought they saw in reciprocity the entering of the thin edge of the wedge into what they regarded as their tariff privileges, and therefore they opposed reciprocity and opposed it in a most interesting manner. It can best be illustrated by a reference to a story in Holy Writ. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that when Paul and his companion Silas were travelling around the country preaching the gospel, they came to a place called Ephesus, where there was a great temple of Diana of the Ephesians, and they were so successful in their preaching that the business of the people there who made little images of Diana fell off, and a man Demetrius called together the association of craftsmen of that city and said: This man Paul and this man Silas are hurting our business. Let us put a stop to it. Did they go out into the market place and lay complaints against these two men for hurting their business? Not for a moment. They raised the loyalty cry. They went out into the market place and for the space of two hours they cried, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians," and they raised a riot so that Paul and Silas got into trouble. That was one way to stop competition. In the same way the large interests of this country, in the summer of 1911, did not go out into the market places of Canada and say: These Liberals are going to hurt our business. They could not say that, because it was not true to begin with. So they raised the loyalty cry so as to hurt the Liberals who were pressing for reciprocity, a measure which, I believe, would have been of great benefit to the Canadian people, and I know that some hon. gentlemen opposite share in that view. The whirl-a-gig of time brings round its revenges. Those who supported the Conservative opposition of that day, and whose life blood was opposition to the very name of reciprocity, saw that same party when it came into office take the duty off wheat, wheat flour and semolina—the very keystone of the anti-reciprocity arch. The attitude of the big interests which opposed free agricultural implements is not unlike the attitude assumed by some manufacturers in this country in the days of 1896 when certain reforms in a downward direction were effected by those in charge of the tariff affairs of that day. You will remember how that stalwart old war-horse of the Conservative party, Sir Charles Tupper, said that the sorrowful wail of the manufacturers was heard abroad in the land, and we know that after a reduction had been made in certain duties and after the party which made those reductions was able to go on with its work, there was a great era not only of general prosperity but of manufacturing prosperity in Canada; our manufacturers never made greater strides than they did between 1896 and 1911.

Mr RICHARDSON: Will the hon. gentleman tell us what the total reductions in the tariff by the Liberal party, after 1896, averaged?

Mr. McMASTER: I am always willing to oblige, and I happen to have carried those figures around in my pocket also. I am not prepared, perhaps, to give my hon. friend his answer just as he would like it, but I am sure he will be glad to let me give the answer as I like it. In order to help the farmers of this country, cream separators, which had been protected before 1896, were placed on the free list, and what makes me believe in sound economics for this country is that cream separator factories grew up in Canada even though cream separators were put on the free list. Then there was Indian corn. Before 1896 that was dutiable at the rate of 7½ cents per bushel except when used for distillation purposes. The staunch temperance element in the present Administration was not present in the Conservative Administration prior to 1896, and consequently you could get Indian corn in free if you wanted to make whisky out of it, but if you wanted it for feeding hogs or cattle you had to pay a duty of 7½ cents a bushel. That duty was taken off, and Indian corn allowed to come in free. Pig iron, which was one of the basic raw materials for a great number of manufactured articles, had been taxed under the old tariff at four dollars per ton. Under the new general tariff it was taxed at $2.50 per ton; under the preferential tariff, which was in force up to the 30th of June, 1898, it was taxed at $2.18¾ per ton, and after the 1st of July of that year at $1.87½ per ton. There was also a reduction in other matters, not as much as I would like—I am very much of the kidney of the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson), and should have liked to see my friends go a little further. But I say this: If I wish to go to Toronto do I join a number of men who are going in the direction of Montreal or do I attach myself to a number of men who are going in the direction of Toronto, even though they are not going as fast as I would like to have them go?

Mr. RICHARDSON: I should like to say that a study of the politics of this country for the past twenty-five or thirty years convinces me that more reductions were actually secured from the high-priest Tories than from the low-tariff Liberals.

Mr. McMASTER: I would imagine that the applause to that sentiment was somewhat local. I would doubt very much if it came from those representing manufacturing interests in the splendid old province of Ontario. But there were a great many reductions made; duties running up as high as fifty and sixty and seventy per cent were reduced to ad valorem duties not running over thirty-five per cent. It must not be forgotten that there was also the British preference, and without being unduly antagonistic to the hon. member for Springfield, whose views on many questions do not differ very largely from my own, I would remind him that this British preference was fought in the most strenuous way by those high priests of Toryism from whom he states he received so many tariff favours, and they fought it because they said: You are interfering with the market which should be reserved for the Canadian manufacturer.

I would also like to ask my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson) and other staunch free traders on the other side of the House, whether the reciprocity agreement was not a great step in the right direction, and whether the Liberal Administration of 1911, who adopted that policy and went down fighting for it, were not entitled to the sympathy of those who, we will say, hold sound economic views on tariff questions? The fears of the manufacturers of 1896 proved groundless. I would think, and hope, that the fears of the large interests in this country would prove groundless in regard to the introduction of free agricultural implements.

But let me note the very pleasant situation in which we find ourselves to-day in discussing economic matters, especially when these economic matters deal with the United States. You will remember that a few years ago if you discussed economic matters in connection with the United States with some sections of our people you frequently placed your loyalty as a British subject in jeopardy. But, now, how different it is! We find the Prime Minister himself coming before the House and in gracious fashion thanking the United States for having sold so many steel plates to us at a price no higher than they were charging their own people.

Mr. MURPHY: And they are going to New York to consult the Finance Minister.

Mr. McMASTER: They have always gone to New York when it suited their purposes. It is only the other day that the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) told us that the United States and ourselves must fight this war as one economic unit. Six years ago, the friends of these hon. gentlemen were saying that if we adopted a certain trade proposition we would become an economic unit with the United States and then away with the Constitution, the Throne would tumble, and the Stars and Stripes would be substituted for the British flag. Really it is now very pleasant to be able to discuss economic questions without placing one's reputation for loyalty in jeopardy.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is it not very pleasant to see Old Glory flying side by side with the British flag and the French flag? They were not flying together then.

Mr. McMASTER: It is splendid, and I do say for the political party with which I have always been associated, and with which I am associated yet, that we have never attempted to make political capital in the past by endeavouring to raise anti-American sentiment on the North American continent.

I respectfully suggest that it may very well happen that the fears of those who believe that their own best interests, and, indeed, who perhaps sincerely believe that the best interests of the country are served by the maintenance of artificial security through the operation of a protective tariff, are groundless. I know what the reply of these gentlemen will be, and it will be this: "We know our own business much better than any professional man who happens to be a member of Parliament, and we and not he must be the judge of what is best for us." In reply to this, may I make this observation? The federal reserve banks, created by President Wilson, have been a great success and have enormously benefited the United States banking system, but the bankers, before the law creating these federal reserve banks was actually placed upon the statute-book, almost unanimously condemned the proposal. They thought they knew banking much better than President Wilson, but President Wilson and his advisers knew what was best for the country, and therefore best for the banking interests, even better than the bankers themselves. But whatever has been the wisdom or unwisdom of a policy of restriction on Canadian trade in the past, the present condition makes the continuation of such a system impossible for the future.

I have in the earlier part of my remarks pointed out that by the year 1914 the Canadian people, whether acting through their federal, provincial or municipal governments, or associated as corporations or as individuals, had borrowed about two and a half billions of dollars, mostly from Great Britain. Since then, largely due to the war, our borrowings outside this country have increased by no less than another five hundred millions, and should the war last much longer I believe that the debt due by the Canadian people to the outside world will not be far from three and a half billions of dollars. The debt of the Federal Government will not reach this figure, but the total obligations of all Canadians to creditors outside Canada may do so.

What does this mean? It means that the interest on this amount will have to be paid yearly by Canada. It will not be paid in money; it will be paid in goods. And in what goods will it be paid? Taking the year 1914 as our last normal year, we find that the total exports of Canada amounted to $455,437,224, and of this amount only $67,602,238 worth was of manufactured goods. Can we look, under our present fiscal system, to any great increase in the export of manufactured goods? I answer "no," because the Canadian manufacturer operating under our present system is at once the victim as well as the beneficiary of that system. The Government, in attempting to reserve the home market for the native manufacturer necessarily by so doing increases the costs of production of the native manufacturer. One man's unfinished product is another man's raw material, and as the Government tries to encourage all manufacturers, it must inevitably, and does, increase the price to many manufacturers of the materials which enter into their finished products.

The only way we can meet our immense interest payments will be to increase the export of the great natural and extractive industries of this country. These are far and away greater, even under present conditions, than the export of manufactured goods. Thus, in 1914, we exported almost $207,000,000 of agricultural produce; just about $54,500,000 of animal and other produce; about $20,750,000 of fish; just over $43,300,000 of forest produce; considerably over $59,000,000 of mineral produce; just a little over $3,000,000 of miscellaneous produce—as against a little over $67,500,000 of manufactured goods.

How can we increase the produce of the farm, the mine, the sea, and the forest? By taking off the economic disabilities under which these producers at present suffer; by giving them their machinery of production at lower rates of duty, and by reducing all round their cost of operation.

In order that this country may face its debts in manful fashion and pay them we must enormously increase the rural population of Canada. What is the situation? In 1871 only fourteen out of every one hundred of the Canadian people lived in urban areas; in 1881, the proportion had not increased; by 1891, however, it had more than doubled, and thirty-one out of every hundred lived in urban areas. In 1901 the condition had become more intensive, and thirty-seven out of every hundred lived in a city or town, while in 1911 45½ persons out of every one hundred lived in an urban area, and to-day the best authorities tell me that fully one-half of the Canadian people live in urban areas. We have developed our towns and cities altogether beyond the power of the rural population to support them. We are in the position of an hotel proprietor who has built an hotel and equipped it for a thousand guests, and finds that only four hundred frequent his hostelry. His overhead charges are those involved in preparation for a thousand guests, but the receipts are those that come from only four hundred. The hotel may go bankrupt unless the number of guests can be substantially increased. We have got to increase the population of rural Canada. We cannot expect to attract or to hold the number of settlers which we otherwise would do unless we make living conditions, as far as we can, as easy, if not easier, than in the United States. We cannot ask the grain grower or stock raiser of the western prairie to compete with men in the same lines of business from the United States, from Australia, from the Argentine, unless we can get all the articles in his business and all the articles for his personal needs and those of his family at prices as low as those at which his competitor can satisfy his needs.

The economic effect of what I have just laid down will not be felt in its intensity so long as there is cheap land, but once the supply of cheap land comes to an end, then the full economic effect to which I have alluded will come into operation.

The burdens which the Canadian people will have to carry when this war is over will make it imperative that every ounce of the national energy, and every dollar of the national capital, be directed into those channels which will give the greatest economic return.

Again, we shall most of us agree that the fiscal policy of Canada must be in the future, as it has been in the past, greatly influenced by the fiscal policy of the United States. Now, what is their fiscal policy for the future likely to be? The war has made of the United States of America a great creditor nation instead of a great debtor nation. When this war is over, instead of the United States owing Europe for money borrowed in years gone by, Europe will owe the United States for money borrowed during the course of the war. Prior to the Civil War between the North and South of the United States, that country carried fifty per cent of its own exports and its own imports in its own ships; immediately prior to this war, it only carried ten per cent. The depredations of the Alabama, but in a greater degree the influence of a policy tending to reduce imports, was largely responsible for the diminution. But after this war, matters will have assumed a different aspect, and the United States will have become again a great shipbuilding power. Both of these facts will tend to accentuate the direction of the economic and fiscal thought of the American in the direction of a lower tariff. If the United States, now the greatest absolute free trading area in the world, shakes off the shackles of restriction and adopts the principle of liberty in regard to its commerce, it will be inevitable that Canada will be forced to follow suit.

And there is another reason why I would urge upon the House and upon the country the need for sound economic thought in regard to the tariff, and it is this: No one who has read anything of the diplomatic history of Europe for the last ten or fifteen years can have failed to be impressed with the fact that the scrambling among the European nations, either for new territory or spheres of influence in the uncivilized or less highly developed parts of the world, has been responsible for the generation of a great deal of international friction. What induced European nations to this policy? Some of them, to a certain extent, because they wished to enlarge the territorial limits within which their manufacturers would have a favoured market. Those among us who believe in the goodness of God and the sanity of mankind, look forward after this war to a world in which right and reason will reign, and we wish to eliminate from the world's economy those causes which intensify international jealousies and international rivalries; and many of us believe that in a world where trade was free in all parts, the occasions for international jealousies, international misunderstandings and international conflicts would largely diminish, if not entirely disappear. And it is our sincere wish that this country should not be the last in the movement towards a sound and reasonable internationalism.

In laying these proposals for a sound economic policy for Canada before this House, I maintain that no manufacturing industry, whose existence is justifiable in this country, will be in any way hurt. My desire is that all my Canadian fellow-citizens, in whatever employment they be engaged, should be both happy and prosperous. But I say this, that manufacturing cannot prosper unless Canada, as a whole, prospers; and that Canada cannot prosper under a policy of restriction. As to changes in our fiscal system, what I have to propose is "Reform not Revolution." I am reminded, Mr. Speaker, of a speech I once delivered in Calgary, in the hearing of the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders) and I remember expressing some tariff views at that time which did not receive altogether the approbation of that hon. gentleman. He thought that I was far too moderate in the reforms which I suggested. I hope that to-night when I have finished speaking, the same moderate reforms which I propose now, and which were unacceptable to him then, will be supported by him and that he will at least go as far as I am going to-night. We need a lower tariff in Canada, not only to remove the economic burdens which now rest on the national producers, but also that we can obtain more revenue for the state, because there are certain lines which are so highly protected to-day that importations in those lines are practically negligible and we get little or no revenue from them.

But I am willing to adopt the dictum of Woodrow Wilson who said: "The direction in which a party or individual is moving is a matter of principle; the speed with which the movement takes place is a matter of expediency." I am willing that we should go slow; I am willing to give every possible chance, to have every interest in this country adjust itself to what is before us. But I believe that in urging the reconstruction of the tariff policy I am doing what is absolutely right.

I have endeavoured in my remarks to place before this House the serious financial situation with which this country is confronted. I have pleaded for economy, and I have advocated with all the force I possess the removal of the duties on agricultural implements, not only as a measure of justice to the agricultural interests in this country, but as a war measure. I have endeavoured to show that without a return to sound economic principles a most menacing future is before us. I have not painted the future in too dark colours. I have unbounded confidence in the ability, strength, industry and intelligence of the Canadian people. The future is not bright; the hill of difficulty is before us, but I believe that we can win through if we are a united people.

We on this side of the House have felt a great deal of pleasure this session. Why, Mr. Speaker? Because we have found some things which we had anticipated would occur have not happened. We had heard of a celebrated white horse. We had heard that this white horse was given to kicking, to rearing and biting. The horse was brought out, though not with the consent of the whole House. It required the united efforts of twenty-one men to bring that horse out of the stable. When the horse came out, we were pleased to find that it was a much maligned animal, that its behaviour was a great deal better than we had been led to suppose. Instead of rearing and kicking at us, the only kicks it gave were side kicks directed at the Minister of Justice; and it breathed kindly words about the gallant 22nd battalion. We found that this horse was not nearly such a vicious animal as we had thought he was.

There is something else that has delighted us in this House. That is the spirit of union which has been shown by members on the other side. We reciprocate those feelings. We believe that this nation will fall if divided; but we do not believe it will fall, because we believe that it will not be divided. We have a difficult future in front of us; we have a long hill to climb, but we believe that that hill can be climbed; we believe that, with unity, with the spirit of courage and perseverance, the difficulties which confront the Canadian people can be overcome.

[Mr. McMaster.]

Sir HERBERT AMES (St. Antoine): Mr. Speaker, we have, for the past hour, been listening to an address which reminds the older members of the House of ante-bellum days, when the good old discussions on the relative merits of tariff and free trade were frequent every session, and when a large part of the time of members of the House was taken up in considering which system was the more beneficial for the people of Canada.

I think we were all pleased this afternoon when the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) announced that there would be no tariff changes, not that the Acting Minister of Finance has not been asked to make tariff changes, because requests have come to him to make alterations in the tariff, but the Acting Minister of Finance, as the mouthiece of the Government, believes that this is not the time when non-essential questions that are likely to divide us should be thrown into the arena of this House.

I have been waiting for an amendment to be moved by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster)inasmuch as I have presumed that, after spending an hour in elaborating an idea, he would test the will of the House in respect to his proposals. He has not, however, seen fit to do so, although possibly an amendment along the lines he suggests may yet come from the other side. I trust it may not. I feel that it would be very much like what Hindenburg at present is trying to do, namely, to drive in a wedge between the point of contact of the allied armies.

An hon. MEMBER: It cannot be done.

Sir HERBERT AMES: The line has bent, but has not broken, overseas, and I think I can assure the member for Brome that if he endeavours to make an attack upon the point of contact where he thinks the two forces can be forced asunder, he will make a mistake so far as this side is concerned.

Now, I am going to ask hon. members to come back to the subject matter that was presented so earnestly and so ably this afternoon by the Acting Minister of Finance. I think we need, upon many of the matters that he has laid before us, the very best counsel, the very deepest thought, the very closest consideration; and I trust that we may not be diverted from the great issues which he has laid before us to-day. I was in this House when the Budget speech in the early part of 1914 was delivered, and I could not refrain from contrasting that occasion when I heard the Budget speech being delivered to-day. The Finance Minister in the early part of 1914 in delivering his Budget speech, spoke of the prosperity of Canada. He had delivered a budget which had brought him congratulation, and which contained in it no cause for alarm. He had shown the House, I remember, that the total expenses of the year, on revenue and capital account combined, had been $163,000,000, and that entire sum had been met by the collections of that year, and that we had not added one dollar to our debt, may more, we had decreased our debt between 1911 and 1914. Canada was in a thoroughly sound and healthy condition, financially speaking. It was well that it was so, for we were destined shortly to be submitted to a trial greater than this nation had ever before been called upon to endure. It was well that we were financially sound in the early part of 1914, because the great war came upon us that summer, and found us in that respect as in many others, ready. When Parliament met in August, 1914, we had a short session, but a very momentous one. We were under the cloud of a great menace, possibly a disaster. Parliament wasted no time in debate, I can assure you, in that session. We passed the necessary appropriation, $50,000,000, the amount we thought sufficient at that time to enable us to raise our first fighting force. We passed other legislation to enable the Government to be carried on and to cope successfully with the situation, and we adjourned within two weeks. Parliament at that time gave its pledge, and gave it unanimously, that in so far as Canada was concerned, we were in the war for all we were worth, and that we would put into it all the men, money, munitions and food that was necessary to the extent of our ability, and we have kept that pledge. Our forces have grown from 50,000 to 100,000, from 100,000 to 250,000, from 250,000 to 500,000, each increase with the consent of Parliament, one step after another. To raise, equip, train, transport and maintain an army such as we have had and still have in the field; to care for the dependents of the soldiers and to look after those in need of pensions; to carry on all the other activities of the war, and at the same time to keep the regular functions of Government in operation, is an immense task. In our war record stupendous figures may be found. In the first year of the war we spent $60,000,000 for war purposes; in the second year, $166,000,000; in the third year, $306,000,000; in the fourth year $348,000,000—a constantly mounting expenditure; a total to the end of March, 1918, of no less than $880,000,000. If any one had predicted in the war session of 1914 that within three and a half years this war would cost us $880,000,000, that man would have been told by every financier in the country that Canada would be bankrupt long before any such sum could be raised. Yet as war needs came we have sanctioned one appropriation Bill after the other, each year meeting larger requirements — $50,000,000, $100,000,000, $250,000,000, $500,000,000; four successive war Bills aggregating $900,000,000, and we have had before the House this session another war Bill for $500,000,000, making a total of $1,400,000,000 voted by Parliament for war purposes since the outbreak of hostilities in 1914.

At the risk of laying before the House figures which are easily accessible to all and of repeating facts that all have heard, I purpose briefly to run over the financial history of the war to date so far as Canada is concerned. I do this because I feel that, as a preliminary step to the consideration of the measures which the Finance Minister will base on his Budget of to-day, it is desirable that we should be reminded of the various milestones which we have passed during the last four years; that we should realize what obstacles we have met and surmounted; that we should be able intelligently to pass in review those things which we have accomplished. To do that will make it possible for us more wisely to deal with legislation and more courageously to look into the future.

When Parliament assembled six months after the outbreak of the war the outlook was far from encouraging. There had been throughout the country a dislocation of business, a great uncertainty as to what might happen. All our borrowing was suddenly cut off, and Canada, which had been a debtor country ever since Confederation, found herself no longer the happy possessor of moneys pouring in at the rate of a million dollars a day. Our customs revenues greatly declined. We found ourselves face to face with a diminishing income and an increasing expenditure. A demand was made that public works should cease; I remember that I myself supported that demand. We now recognize that the Government did wisely in not suddenly putting to an end the public enterprises being prosecuted on capital account. These were continued in order that men might be able to find employment, that contractors might be kept solvent, that the business credit of the country should be maintained. So it was that notwithstanding the war we completed the National Transcontinental railway, finished the Quebec bridge, and spent considerable moneys in continuing the Hudson Bay railway project and the Welland canal.

When the Finance Minister faced this House in February, 1915, it was to announce that he expected the war expenditure of the coming year to amount to $100,000,000; that his income was largely curtailed; that at the best he could not be expected to do any more than meet current account and capital expenditure; and that the entire war expenditure of that year would have to be made with borrowed money.

Other great wars have occurred in the world's history. Some of the older nations are more or less familiar with war, and a science of war finance seems to have grown up, which is useful to us in showing us what not to do—what we should avoid. In February, 1915, the Finance Minister, I have no doubt, read and pondered long. He was familiar with the history of the United States between 1860 and 1865, during the great American Civil War. He remembered the disasters that had come through war financing along wrong lines, and, profiting from that experience, he laid down and announced the policy which has been maintained and followed ever since, and to which we in large measure are indebted for our ability to stand the strain at the present time. I wish to touch on a few of the principles involved in this policy, to show how in the last four years they have been adhered to, enabling us to meet the emergency. I hope that we may be able to continue so to do.

Notwithstanding what the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) said this afternoon, I affirm that current expenditure has been stationary ever since the war began. That is to say, if you compare, year by year, the figures of the regular cost of running the Government, you will find that there has been no increase. If you take the total expenditure and deduct therefrom interest, pensions, and what has been neccessarily expended on the Grand Trunk and Canadian Northern railway systems, you will find that even to-day we are spending no more in the ordinary administration of Government—notwithstanding the fact that wages have increased and the cost of materials has advanced—than we were spending in the year prior to the war. The first sound principle, then, is that the regular current expenditure of the Government should be kept down to the lowest limit that can be adopted without sacrifice of efficiency.

The second principle laid down, doubtless based upon the American experience, was that our borrowings, as far as possible, should be long-dated. You will remember how the American Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Chase, in 1861 borrowed $250,000,000 at 7½ per cent and had to pay the Treasury notes within three years. He expected that the Civil War would last only six months, but long before that war ended he had to meet that $250,000,000 and he found it difficult indeed to pay. You will remember how he started, first in comparatively small amounts, to issue legal tender notes without gold support, and once having begun, he had to keep on going the wrong way. You remember how the banks, within a year after the opening of the war, discontinued specie payments, and how it took the United States fifteen years to bring up to par the $433,000,000 of paper money that had been issued during that time, the value of which during the dark days of the war went down as low as forty cents on the dollar. When you compare the experience of the United States during that period with our own financing, you will agree that we have every reason for congratulation. So our Government laid down the second principle that the money that had to be borrowed should be obtained on long terms. Out of the $900,000,000 that has been authorized for borrowing since the war began, only $100,000,000 is payable in the near future. That is the loan to be paid, I understand, in New York this summer, for which ample provision has already been made. The Victory Loan, which to-day represents sixty per cent of our whole war borrowings, is payable as follows: forty-three per cent in five years, that is in 1922; fourteen per cent in ten years, that is in 1927; and forty-three per cent in twenty years, that is in 1937. The other loans are payable in 1925, 1931 and 1937. Therefore, when the war is over—and we hope it will end at no distant date—as the moneys that have been borrowed to enable us to carry it on are distributed in their payments over a term of nearly twenty years, it will be possible for subsequent Ministers of Finance to pick up those loans, one by one as they mature, and consolidate our war indebtedness and, in that way, escape the disaster which our American friends in the Civil War found it so difficult to avoid.

The third principle that has been carried out in our war financing so far has been this, that at least a considerable portion of the war cost has been paid each year out of revenue. It is sound to affirm that it is the part of posterity to carry a portion of the load, inasmuch as we are to-day fighting to preserve the inheritance of those who may come after us; but it is equally true that those of us who are alive to-day, especially those of us who are here in Canada, should, as the war goes on, carry as much of the burden as we are able, so that we at home may be making a sacrifice to some extent commensurate with the sacrifices that our brave lads are making overseas. That we are doing this is shown by a very simple calculation. When the war started, our net debt was $336,000,000. On the 31st of March, 1918, it stood at $1,106,000,000. Obviously, then, our funded debt had been increased since the outbreak of the war by $770,000,000. We have already seen that our war cost to date has been $880,000,000. Consequently if we have only increased the debt by $770,000,000 and have spent up to date on the war $880,000,000, we must have paid at least $110,000,000 out of revenue. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) was this afternoon arguing in favour of a sinking fund. It is true that our loans, with the exception of the £5,000,000 loan, borrowed in London early in the war, have no sinking fund. But what better sinking fund can you possibly have than our action during the last few years? We can hardly be expected to extinguish the already incurred debt as we go along, but if we can each year prevent its increase by $35,000,000 surely that is a sinking fund of the very best character. If we can go on paying $35,000,000 of our war cost each year during the war (and if we can do it during the war, we surely can do it when the war is over) we could, in twenty-eight years, pay off an indebtedness of $1,500,000,000 with interest computed at 4 per cent. Consequently, a sinking fund does not seem to us necessary or desirable, for I am certain if we can continue to bear the same share of the load as we have thus far carried, we shall be doing our fair share as we go along.

It is very difficult to ascertain for a country what part of war expenditure should be borrowed and what part should be taken out of revenue. The character of finance differs in every country. It depends upon the conditions that prevail in the country. It is impossible to say that because other countries do thus and so, we should follow along identical lines. For example, France and Italy are not able to pay out of revenue one dollar of their war expenditure. Great Britain, in 1916-1917, paid out of revenue 17 per cent of her total war expenditure after covering all other expenditures. The United States, in the first year of the war, when they voted $20,000,000,000, arranged that 14 per cent of that amount should be paid out of taxation. Circumstances differ in different countries, but it seems to me that as long as we in Canada are paying one-ninth, or 11 per cent, of our war debt as we go along, we are bearing all that can be reasonably expected.

Of course, most of the money that is used by Canada in prosecuting this war is borrowed. That would have to be the case, but the history of our borrowing, since the war began, makes a story of which we have no reason to be ashamed, a story which, in fact, it would do us good to repeat frequently, because it reflects credit upon Canadian patriotism, resourcefulness and courage. I am going for a few minutes to go over that record. I know it is familiar to most of the members of the House, but it can do no harm to put it clearly before us at the beginning of this debate, so that subsequently it will not be necessary to repeat figures that will by that time be familiar to all. For half a century prior to the war practically all our borrowings, both for public and private ends, for Governments, federal and provincial, municipalities and corporations, came from Great Britain. We always turned to London when we wanted to borrow money. Naturally, when the war broke out, we looked to the Mother Land. At first she gave us temporary help. Within a few months of the outbreak of war we had borrowed from her $60,000,000. By March, 1915, our unfunded indebtedness had reached the sum of $100,000,000, but the Government and especially the Minister of Finance of the day had no intention that the system of temporary borrowing should be allowed to continue any longer than could be helped. Consequently as soon as conditions became better, and the money markets of the world were beginning to settle again, he went out to secure long term loans. Of course, he turned to Great Britain for the first loan. In March, 1915, he got £5,000,000 at 4½ per cent in London. Then, as hon. members know, intimation came from across the sea that Great Britain had all she could do to finance her own war expenditure, and Canada, if she could do so, was requested to find elsewhere the moneys she needed. We then turned to the United States, but the United States at that time was not at war, and it would have been an unfriendly act had the United States lent to Canada money to be expended in arms and ammunition to fight a nation with whom the United States was not then at war. While, however, the letter of the law could not be broken, there was a way in which the spirit of the law might be evaded. We were able to borrow from the United States on the understanding that the money thus secured would not be spent for war purposes. We, of course, used that money for purposes of peaceful development, but we were enabled to that extent to set free other moneys for purposes of war. We borrowed $45,000,000 in New York and paid it back within two years, and then, by the Public Service Loan of 1916, we borrowed $75,000,000 more. It was not long before the United States decided that they could lend us no more money. They too went into the war and we, shut off from Great Britain and from America, found it necessary to fall back upon our own resources. Canada appealed in confidence to her own people, and she did not appeal in vain. Then began that wonderful career of Canadian domestic borrowing, a performance we have every reason to be proud of.

Our first Canadian loan was floated in November of 1915. We called for $50,000,000 and were very timorous as to whether that sum would be raised; that was shown by the fact that we got the banks to underwrite it. But when the subscriptions came to be opened we found they totalled $100,000,000, eighty millions of which came from the Canadian people and only twenty millions from the banks.

Eleven months later it was necessary to float another loan, and it was again to the Canadian people we turned in October of 1916. The second Canadian war loan called for $100,000,000 and you all remember that $201,000,000 was subscribed.

Seven months went by and again we appealed to our people to help us finance the war, and in March of 1917 the third Canadian war loan of $150,000,000 was issued and $265,000,000 was subscribed by our people; nothing whatever was taken or asked from the banks. When certain conversions had been made it was found as a result of that loan that 70 per cent of that $265,000,000 was new money which the Canadian people had loaned to us for carrying on the war.

Needless to say, the Finance Minister and the Government were encouraged at the splendid manner in which the Canadian people on three successive occasions, had responded to the appeal that had been made to them to put their savings in the hands of the Government for war purposes. Then the fourth, the great Victory Loan, was launched. We have heard this afternoon from the Acting Minister of Finance of the preparations that were made, of how widespread and extensive and intelligent they were, of how it became possible to bring the necessities of the Government and the advantages of the loan under the notice of practically every man, woman and child in Canada. Nominally the loan was for $150,000,000; that was the sum that was asked of the Canadian people. It was known, however, and generally admitted that the Government would take whatever sum was subscribed; there was no limit to the amount they were prepared to receive. The Victory Loan brought in $398,000,000 of new money besides about $150,000,000 of conversions which, of course, do not count as new money.

Let me recapitulate for a moment the history of those loans because I think when we see them in their magnitude and in their completeness we shall realize that they give us cause for congratulation and ground for hope. We put confidence in our own people, and that confidence we found to be well placed. Of our entire outstanding securities, $75,000,000 of the war debt is in the hands of Canadians, or 85 per cent of the whole. Just think what that will mean after the war. We may have hard times and it may be difficult for the Government to finance in years to come after the war is over, but our war debt is not held by a stranger nation that can take us by the throat and make us pay whether we will or not. Our war loans will be held by our own Canadian people with whom we can treat and from whom we can always be sure of sympathetic consideration.

Now I want to call the attention of the House to a remarkable feature of these loans—a feature which I think gives us the greatest of hope for the future, and that is the ever-widening distribution among the people of Canada of our securities. To the first loan one person out of every three hundred of our population subscribed; that is, about one-fortieth of the families of Canada may be said to have bought a bond. To the second loan one person in two hundred and thirty of our population subscribed, and to the third loan one in one hundred and ninety. To the last loan one in ten of our population subscribed; in other words, computing five persons to a family, it would mean that in every other home throughout Canada there has lodged a bond of the Victory Loan. The average subscription for the second and third loans was $6,000; that means there must have been a great many large subscribers and that the earlier loans must have been mainly taken up by the capitalists. But the average subscription to the victory loan was $500, showing that there must have been tens of thousands of small subscribers in order to bring the average down to that figure. If we compare this record with that of the American loans I think we have cause for congratulation. The second great American Liberty Loan—we cannot speak of the third because it will not be completed until the end of this week—was for three billion dollars—twenty times our loan of $150,000,000. One to twenty does not adequately represent the difference between the wealth of the United States and that of Canada. It should be far easier for the United States to raise three billions than it is for us to raise one hundred and fifty millions, and yet we find that while their loan was over-subscribed only 54 per cent, our loan was over-subscribed 180 per cent. One in eleven of their population subscribed to their loan, and one in ten to our loan. But lest we might be unduly conceited comparing ourselves with others on this same continent, we have only to cast our eyes across the seas and note what is being done in the Motherland when they appeal to their people to take up their borrowings. The British loan of 1917 had eight million buyers, a little better than one in six of the entire population, which means pretty nearly a bond for every home in England. The next time we float a loan in Canada we shall have the British standard to endeavour to measure up to.

Just here and now may I put in a word with respect to the next loan that Canada must float. She will need every ounce of strength she has to raise the money required. She will need the hearty co-operation of every member of this House in his own constituency to explain to his people the financial condition of Canada, to arrange for the widest possible publication of the needs of the case, and every man here should feel that this summer his duty lies in his own constituency to help in every conceivable way in making the next great loan that will be financed in Canada a great success.

We have been listening this afternoon to some new taxation proposals. Each successive budget since the war commenced has brought in new methods of taxation. In the new budget some of the present taxes have been increased and new ones have been added. The taxation that we have had in the last four years has in the main been just, based upon the principle of not reducing the productivity of Canadian enterprise, but it is not entirely without criticism, as I shall venture to suggest before I take my seat. We are now called upon to consent to greater taxation, and exercising the time honoured privilege ever since Magna Charta of a member of an assembly such as this, we shall one and all criticise these taxation proposals if we see fit. Our criticism of them and our counsel regarding them will, I think, be wiser if we briefly go over together the previous steps that have led up to these proposals, because knowing what has already been done we shall perhaps be more ready and willing to do what is necessary in the future.

War taxation is always heavier than other taxation and that for two reasons. Usually in war time there is greater prosperity, there is more money going from hand to hand, and also in war time there is a greater willingness on the part of the people to give, and give liberally, of their means when required for the defence of the State. Therefore, taxes which in peace time would be resented by our people are accepted willingly at this time, especially if they are satisfied that the burden is being distributed impartially.

When our first war Parliament met very little additional taxation was proposed. The war had only commenced and the Minister of Finance had had very little time to prepare for the raising of additional revenue. All that was done to bring in increased revenue was to make a few changes in the excise.

In the next war Parliament we found that the Minister of Finance had had time to carefully study the situation and he came into the House with thoroughly considered proposals designed to increase the public revenue. The War Appropriation Bill, brought down in February, 1915, called for $100,000,000. The minister's estimate of the total requirements for the year, current and war, was $285,000,000. The revenue in sight was $135,000,000. So that in the second year of the war, the Minister of Finance looked forward to a deficit that had to be overcome of $150,000,000. The measures that were resorted to to increase the revenue were mainly increases in the Customs. There was a general increase in the rate of duties as you will remember, of seven and a half per cent and five per cent. For the benefit of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), who has been labouring here this evening to create the impression that agricultural implements were always unfavourably treated, I would like to have him read in the statutes of that year the express provision by which there was made exempt from the additional tariff the following items: wheat, flour, tea, anthracite coal, fish from Newfoundland, salt for curing fish, lines, twines, nets and hooks for the fisheries, reapers, mowers, binders, harvesters, binder twine, traction ditching machines, sugar, tobacco, newsprint paper, and a few other articles. It was recognized by the Government of the day, and at a time when there was no infusion of Liberal members in its ranks, that while additional tariff rates were to be placed upon all other articles, the articles which helped the fishermen to catch more fish and the farmer to grow more crops were not to have their rates advanced. The measure advancing the rate of customs taxation introduced in February, 1915, yielded considerable revenue. I would like to have my friends realize that this was not a measure of protection; at least it was not enacted with that intention in view. It was a measure intended to increase the revenue, and it did increase the revenue as was expected and desired. That special taxation which took the form of an advance in customs rates gave us an increased revenue in 1915-16 of $25,000,000; in 1916-17 of $37,800,000; and in 1917-18 of $45,000,000. The alterations that were made in the tariff at that time have since yielded us about $108,000,000, and are still going strong, yielding $40,000,000 and upwards each year.

Up to that time the Federal Government had indulged in indirect taxation only. A few measures were now introduced directly taxing certain corporations. The banks were taxed upon their note circulation, which tax has been yielding about $1,000,000 a year. The incomes of trust and loan companies and the premiums of insurance companies were brought under taxation that year, and that tax has been yielding $1,500,000 a year. Railway and other tickets were taxed, and that tax has been bringing us about $1,000,000 a year. Stamp duties on bottles and packages have brought in $1,000,000 a year; and the advance in the postage rate from two to three cents has provided us with from $5,000,000 to $6,000,000 a year. So that when the Minister of Finance found himself faced with requirements amounting to $150,000,000, he brought in new measures and managed to pull up his revenues from $135,000,000 to $172,000,000, and, of course, the balance had to be borrowed. But that year we borrowed only the cost of the war.

The third War Parliament met and found the war still continuing. We found the expenditure going up, the demands increasing. The War Appropriations Bill called for $250,000,000. That, added to the other expenditures, capital and current, made the total expenditure that had to be provided for in 1916-17, $415,000,000. Still further taxation had to be imposed. By the spring of 1916, conditions in Canada had changed for the better. Business was improving. The crops in 1915 had been extremely good and prices were high. The munition factories had accommodated themselves to the new order of things and were able to manufacture at a profit. The trade balance, which had been adverse, gradually swung around to the other side, and became favourable. Canada was in a ripe condition for taxation, and the Government took a strong forward step and brought in the first real measure of direct taxation that we have ever known. That was the business profits war tax. That was presented and defended on the principle that those who during the war were making extra profits, either directly or indirectly because the State was at war, should be called upon to yield in whole or in part those profits for the defence of the State. The principle being sound, Parliament passed that measure. The result is that the Government takes one dollar out of four on earnings above seven per cent by every corporation and above ten per cent by every individual. This measure exempted businesses under $50,000, but to-day we learn from the Acting Finance Minister that the Government has decided to make that exemption $25,000, a provision which, I think we all agree, is much more satisfactory. That business war profits tax has yielded large revenue, as it was expected to do. It produced in the first year $12,500,000, and in the second year, $21,271,000. The revenue for the third year is not yet reported, but it will probably be about $25,000,000, because the rate has been increased. In 1916-17, with a total expenditure of $485,000,000, $233,000,000 was met out of revenue. The minister had pulled the revenue up from $172,000,000 in the previous year to $233,000,000, and after paying all our running expenses and all charges upon capital account, we were able to contribute $60,000,000 out of the taxation of that year towards the cost of the war.

Those of us who were here have reason to remember the fourth War Parliament, the Long Parliament, that lasted from February until September, a Parliament in which the issues were to some extent obscured because of the contention of parties. The Government in respect to taxation enunciated a policy in the spring, another policy in the summer and still another policy as fall drew near. The outlook was for an enlarged expenditure; all the former taxes were continued and the business tax was increased. Now the business tax had been twenty-five per cent, or one dollar out of four on all profits above seven per cent, but it was suddenly increased at this session. It was made to yield far more than before, and on that I shall later say a few words.

I think I can affirm, without any fear of contradiction, that it was not the original intention of the Government last year to introduce an income tax—in fact, the Finance Minister early in the parliamentary session distinctly stated that he would not —but he was more or less stampeded, I believe, in the matter. However, the income tax was introduced, it came to stay, none of us to-day are asking for it to be abolished; in fact, we expect that it is to the income tax we shall have to look henceforth for the main portion of our war revenue.

The financial statement for 1917-18, the year which ended a few weeks ago, was presented by the Acting Finance Minister this afternoon. It is practically on a par with the preceding statements. It shows that the total expenditure last year was $525,000,000, and that the revenue had again showed a material increase. It had been pulled up from $233,000,000 to $258,000,000; and once again we paid all our current expenses, all our capital expenditure out of revenue, and had $55,000,000 to pay on war account.

If you add these figures together it will give us a four years' survey, and make it possible for us to see just what Canada has done since the war began. It is partly due, I admit, to business prosperity, and largely due to the willingness on the part of our people to accept the taxation measures which were voted by successive Parliaments, but we have during those four years increased the annual revenue by $100,000,000. To-day we are receiving from the people sixty-five per cent more than we were taking from them when the war began. We have met all our current expenditure during the last four years out of revenue; we have paid $130,000,000 of capital expenditure which it is presumed for the most part has gone into productive enterprises; we have cancelled $100,000,000 of our war debt; and we have done that out of the money the people have given us as we have gone along year by year during those four years. I think that is a record of which we have every reason to be proud, a record that even at this time —after four years of war, when everybody is girding up his loins for a renewed effort —gives us confidence in the stability of our Canadian financial institutions, confidence in the willingness of our people, and confidence that even if this terrible war continues we shall be able, for some years at least, to carry on as before; and we shall need all our courage and all our devotion for the task that is ahead.

The Acting Finance Minister to-day gave us the figures for the coming year—staggering figures, tremendous figures. The war estimate for the coming year $425,000,000; consolidated fund estimates $225,000,000; capital expenditure $30,000,000; in all $680,000,000, four times the entire revenue of Canada at the time the war broke out. That is the sum that we have got to meet. The taxes that have been to-day outlined, together with those that are being continued, are expected to bring in $270,000,000, and $410,000,000 remain. We have left on hand of moneys that came from the Victory Loan $130,000,000, so we have to provide for $280,000,000 more. That will only carry us from August to the end of March. The next loan necessary to be floated will probably be a loan for a year's needs, and in all likelihood we shall require to ask the people of Canada for from $400,000,000 to $500,000,000 in the next great loan campaign that will come, I presume, early next fall. It is on that account that I was pleading a moment ago that every member of this House should realize the enormity of the task, and also the part which he, individually, is called upon to play in enabling the Government to secure the needed money.

Before sitting down I want to make a few observations with regard to some of the taxation proposals. I listened very attentively this afternoon to the Acting Minister of Finance, I think I heard most of the things that he said, but some of the declarations that I had been hoping to hear were not uttered. It will be a disappointment to some of our people if the business tax is allowed to remain another year as it is. I think it is excessive as amended last session, and I cannot but feel that the Government were stampeded then when they increased the rates of that tax. I am making no plea for individuals, I am not asking that the money which reaches an individual should be in any way exempted from the full taxation that it to-day bears. The plea that I am making is in the national interest, not in the interest of the individual; tax him as heavily as you like. But the members of this Government and the members of the House must look forward; they must remember that the day is coming when this war will end; they must remember that the day is coming when they will need that every industrial enterprise in this country shall be solvent, be able to pay its debts, be able to continue to employ its workmen, and be able to find places for the thousands of returned soldiers that are coming back to us. There will necessarily be after this war a tremendous readjustment; there will necessarily be a considerable deflation. Where are the industries of Canada to obtain the additional capital that they will require after the war to enable them to readjust themselves to post-war conditions? They cannot get it in Great Britain; there will be no more capital coming from Great Britain for some years to come. They will not get it from the United States because the United States will also probably have absorbed nearly all its liquid capital in the enormous loans that they are now placing with their people. They will not get it from our banks in Canada, because our banks after the war will be making arrangements for deflation, and they are not going to allow any money to be put into bricks and mortar—that we may be sure of. Where are our business firms going to get money that is necessary to make the readjustments that must be made after the war? There is only one place they can get it: they must save it now as they go along; consequently if the business profits tax is so excessive that it does not permit a corporation to retain a reasonable amount of undistributed capital so as to be strong after the war, and to make the necessary adjustments, that corporation will then be at a tremendous disadvantage. My contention is that the sliding scale of the business profits tax is too abrupt; it is far more onerous than the American business profits tax.

[Sir H. Ames.]

If, for example, you had two firms on opposite sides of the Detroit river, one at Windsor and one at Detroit, and each had a capital of $300,000, and those two firms each made 25 per cent profit on a year's business, the firm on the Canadian side would pay $24,750 in taxes, or one-third of its total profits, and the firm on the American side would pay $12,150, or one-sixth of what it had made.

What is going to happen after the war? American and Canadian firms will be called upon to compete in the markets of the world. American firms have already had two years' start. They had two years before they were taxed at all during which they made enormous war profits and laid aside great sums of money. Hereafter they can put aside each year twice as much as we can. Of these two firms, the American company would have $400,000 capital at the end of three years, and the Canadian $360,000. If we are going to compete in the markets of the world with our friends to the south of us we must permit our industries to have the same chance to live that they have. What I point out is this: In Canada the state takes one-quarter of all the profits between 7 and 15 per cent. In the United States, if a corporation can show that they have been making seven, eight, or nine per cent in pre-war times they are allowed exemption to that amount. On profits between 9 and 15 per cent they would only have to pay 20 per cent, against Canada's 25 per cent; between 15 and 20 per cent, the American rate of taxation is 25 per cent, or one-half that in Canada for the same percentage. The rate in Canada for profits of 20 per cent and over is 75 per cent, in the United States 35 per cent for profits of 20 to 25 per cent. Consequently it will be seen that we take away from our Canadian firms under certain conditions twice as much as would be taken in the United States under similar conditions. Only the other day I saw the statement of a business firm in which this significant clause occurred: "We have during the last year declared dividends on our preferred and common stock, but the tax we have paid the Government is a larger sum than those dividends combined."

Now, my contention is this: Earnings should pay taxes at their destination, not at their source. If you take these dividends and tax them before they are distributed while they are still in the hands of the corporation, they can be used to increase its productivity and the productivity of the country at large. That it is not the place to tax them excessively. When these dividends have been distributed, when they come to you and to me and reach their final destination, tax them then as heavily as you like, because so long as these dividends are undistributed in the coffers of the corporation they are used for the public good in increasing the production of the country. But when they come to me, I can do anything I like with them, I can spend them in any frivolous way I want to. It is proper for the Government to say: we are going to take such a large amount of your dividends, which are your own exclusive personal property, that you will not be able to indulge in these frivolities, but that money will have to go for war purposes. That is fair to my mind. But, in my judgment, it is unwise to tax too heavily undistributed earnings of industrial enterprises of the country.

I have even another proposal to make to the Government, a proposal that I wish other ministers were present to listen to. It is this: If you cannot see your way clear to reduce in any way the severity of that schedule where it takes 50 and 75 per cent, then permit a company to take part of the money which it would pay you in taxation, half of it, let us say, and invest it in Government bonds. You get the money immediately just the same for war purposes. Let these bonds be registered bonds if you like; let them be non-interest bearing bonds for the time. Make it impossible for these bonds to be disposed of unless the minister's permission is given. Now, what do I mean by that? I mean just this: that these business firms, who will have to make industrial readjustments after the war will feel that if they go to the minister and show him that that money will be used in necessary alterations to their plants, the minister will release these bonds and allow them to be sold for the credit of the company. In that way, a company will feel that it has something to fall back upon, and that it will be able, after the war, to find that capital which it cannot find in England or the United States, or secure from the banks of Canada. It would thus be able to get a certain portion of the capital required for its development.

As regards income tax, I have only a few observations to make. Until the war came, the Federal Government always relied upon indirect taxation for its revenue. The business war profits tax and the income tax were the first real measures we have had of direct taxation. We used to leave direct taxation to the provinces. I believe British Columbia is the only province which has really imposed that tax to an extent that the people feel. The war has forced upon us the direct tax, and we are likely hereafter to secure a very large portion of our revenues from such taxation. Last year, when we met here, we passed the income tax. At that time the United States was considering amendments to their Act. Since Parliament adjourned a year ago, the United States have passed an amended income tax, and I was glad to-day to see that the Acting Minister of Finance was proposing to modify our income tax very much along the same lines as the American income tax of October, 1917. I wonder if he realizes what it is going to mean to reduce his exemption from $3,000 to $2,000, in the case of married men, and from $1,500 to $1,000 in the case of single men? I think our exemption has been too high. I have many a time said from the public platform that unless a man was earning $10 a day every working day of the year, the income tax would not touch him. That is quite true. A single man has had to make $5 a day in order to pay income tax. Now, we are going to tax incomes from $2,000 upwards. In addition to that, there is to be an exemption for each child under the ages where they cannot work. What did the United States find when they reduced their exemption from $4,000 to $2,000 in the case of married men, and from $3,000 to $1,000 in the case of single men? They found that it multiplied the number of contributors eight times. Our income tax at the present time will touch only about one per cent of our whole population. I very much doubt whether there will be one hundred thousand people paying such a tax this year under the legislation passed last year. You will have eight times as many under the new proposals, if our experience is the same as the United States. And that is right, because the experience of every one who has touched the great heart of the Canadian people at this time since the war began is that the people as a whole are sympathetic. I have had experience with the Patriotic Fund for four years, and I know that we get thousands of subscriptions from people making less than $10 a day, and I know that the people are ready and willing to bear their fair share of the war taxation, and the widening of the base of taxation suggested this afternoon will meet, I think, and should meet, with universal approval. I understand that in Great Britain an exemption of only $750 of income is allowed, the normal tax being six shillings to the pound, or 30 per cent. On an income of £2,500, or $12,500, 52 per cent would have to be given to the British Government. Our taxation is a long way from being so heavy as that.

I wish to say just a word about the Patriotic Fund. As honorary secretary of this great national benefaction, it has fallen upon me to see that the revenue is provided for carrying on its work. We have to pay out nearly $1,000,000 every month for the assistance of over 50,000 families. The burden is distributed throughout Canada probably better than any taxation measure the Government has brought in. Practically every one has been contributing directly or indirectly to the Patriotic Fund, and if the Fund continues on its present basis until the end of the fiscal year we shall probably have received upwards of $50,000,000—an accomplishment in patriotic giving of which the people of Canada have every reason to be proud. But it is needless to deny that we look forward with alarm to the effect that all these taxes are going to have upon our income. The imposition of heavy business and income taxes considerably lessens not the willingness, but the actual power of companies and individuals to give. We have found that people, particularly of the industrial classes, who buy bonds and pay for them by instalments cannot at the same time contribute to the Patriotic Fund. The Government, therefore is encroaching largely on our sources of revenue, and moreover is in their various loan campaigns utilizing our workers and causing them to be so fatigued that they are unable to take up Patriotic Fund campaigns as well. Our problem is this: shall we try to continue to get the moneys as we have done, or shall we ask the Federal Government, which has so impaired our revenues, to make good the difference? The difficulty is that the taxes which have been placed upon the country by the Government do not reach alike all sections of the Dominion. They do heavily affect the city centres; they do affect men who are contributing out of salary or wages. But we get fully half of our revenue today by taxation, voluntarily levied by provinces, municipalities, county councils, township councils, on the realty within the area that makes the contribution. What are we going to do about that? Here is a source of revenue which the Federal Government has not yet exploited.

[Sir H. Ames.]

If the Government say to us: "We will not expect you to raise any more money in the way you have done throughout the country," might they not resort to the same method of taxation that has been employed on our behalf in rural districts? I made the suggestion the other night to one of the ministers—I make it again, more tentatively than seriously—that if the Patriotic Fund at the end of the present fiscal year pulls out of the field, so to speak, and tells all the provinces, municipalities, county councils and township councils that they need not tax themselves any more for its support, will the Government take over that source of revenue, levy a tax of, say, one or two mills on the realty of the country from one end to the other, and give us our share of the sum so collected? In any event, while it will not be necessary during the present fiscal year to ask the Finance Minister to put into the Budget any sum for the Patriotic Fund, in all probability when Parliament assembles again in 1919 we shall have to confess that we cannot raise the necessary sums in the old way and we shall have to ask the Government, which has encroached upon all our sources of revenue save one, to come to our aid after April 1, 1919, and take care of it thereafter.

I have a few more suggestions to make, and possibly the Acting Minister of Finance and such other members of the Government as are here will make note of them. I was talking the other day with one of the largest exporters of pulp and paper from this country. He drew my attention to the fact that we were losing a large amount of revenue through clause 3C of the Business Profits War Tax Act. He has to pay a very large portion of his business profits tax to the United States, and we, on the submission of proof that that has been done, do not collect that amount from him. But there is no reciprocal arrangement with the United States in that regard. I suggest to the Acting Finance Minister that an arrangement be made under which, in cases where taxation now paid to the United States Government really belongs to us, we may either in like manner secure taxation belonging to them or be allowed to collect taxes on profits which are really earned in this country and let them do the same.

I point out also to the acting minister—with all due deference, and with no intention of raising a hornet's nest about my ears—that those engaged in the business of farming and stock raising are wholly exempt from the terms of the Business Profits Tax Act. I happen to know of a farmer in Southern Alberta whose revenue last year was an amount running into six figures. He is in the grain growing business, and is not touched by the Business Profits War Tax Act. I know also of a rancher not far from Calgary who made several hundred thousand dollars last year through raising horses as a business—and he pays no business profits tax, because his business is exempted under the statute. Those who are engaged in raising grain and cattle and horses would not object if they were included among those who are liable to the business profits tax and given the same opportunity which the rest of us have to contribute toward the expenses of the war. It is true that they pay income tax, but that amounts to probably only one-third as much as would be paid under the business profits tax.

It will be necessary for us in every way to stimulate the sale of our bonds. The manager of a trust company with whom I was in conversation the other day pointed out to me how difficult it often was to pay the succession duties in connection with an estate out of its liquid assets. Particularly in war time, a large number of securities are far below their normal value, and, in order that the succession tax should be paid, it is often necessary to sell securities at a figure which causes considerable pain to the trustee. Would it not be possible for the Federal Government to persuade the treasurers of the provinces to accept Government bonds in payment of succession taxes? In that way a man who was making his will and felt that the time was coming when his estate should be liquidated, would buy a certain amount of Government bonds, knowing that they were as good as cash for the payment of succession taxes, and that the shinkage would not be the same as it might otherwise be.

I would also ask the acting minister to consider the matter of the limitation of exemption from taxation of future Government bonds. A very large share of the wealth of the country is passing into Government bonds; we may have several billions of them before we are through. Every time that an investment that is taxable passes into a Government bond, it ceases to be revenue producing so far as we are concerned. While it may be subject to a provincial tax, it cannot be taxed by the Federal Government unless the Federal Government breaks its plighted word. We should consider that what may be perfectly justifiable with $500,000,000 Government bonds outstanding, may be dangerous if we have $1,500,000,000 or $2,000,000,000, because the time may come when a very large portion of the wealth of this country may be in Government bonds and may be held in such large sums that some people whom we feel we ought to tax will be entirely exempt.

I apologize for having taken up so much of the time of the House. I have, I know, laid before the House figures which are accessible to all and facts with which every one of us is probably already acquainted, but I have done that because I thought it was desirable at this time that we should get back to the real question at issue—how are we going to bear the financial burden entailed by this war? We are about to assume new burdens. If an election was in sight, I would say that we feel very much like the gladiators who exclaimed, "We, about to die, salute you." We shall no doubt, receive objections from our electors to this taxation. We must be prepared to defend the action of the Government in this regard, and as I said some time ago, we must, one and all, endeavour to help the Government in the flotation of its loans. The review of what Canada has accomplished during the last four years in financing this war will not only enable us more intelligently to deal with the problems of to-day, but should give us courage and inspiration for the future.

Mr. O. TURGEON (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make the remarks which I believe it is my duty to make on the present occasion, I wish to say that at this hour I intend to be as brief as possible. I wish to express a few sentiments which it has been my pleasant duty to express in four Parliaments in succession before this one which it has been my privilege to attend as a member of the House of Commons. In facing the House to-night I find myself in circumstances quite different from those in which I have been during the last eighteen years I have sat in this House. In former years, sitting on the same side as the acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean), I was always ready to stand by him and to applaud his remarks which were in favour of free trade or tariff reform for Canada. To-day I find that he has taken another position; that he is in the new Government called the "Union Government." I have no doubt that, impelled by conscientious motives, the Acting Minister of Finance and some others of our friends have left our revered leader and the Liberal party on this side in order in their judgment better to give their support in carrying on the affairs of the country. My hon. friend will perhaps allow me to say that similar conscientious motives have not permitted me to follow him, and I have remained true to my conscience and persuasions, faithful to the leader of the Liberal party. I came into this House eighteen or nineteen years ago, an ardent admirer of the true principles of British Liberalism, of which our leader was a successful exponent in this country until, in perhaps his greatest effort in that direction which was to make Canada still happier than it had been during the fifteen years of his administration, which was to make Canada the happiest country in the world, he was defeated in 1911 on account, as I have already said in this Parliament, of the false judgment of the people of Canada at that time. Peoples, like individuals, at times make mistakes. At that time the present Acting Minister of Finance considered that the majority of the people of Canada had made a mistake in not accepting the policy proposed by the leader of the Government of that day, and that if they had accepted it, Canada would have been more prosperous than it was when war broke out.

About four years ago when war was declared, I came to this Parliament with the intention of being heart and soul in the war and also with the intention of putting forth every effort in my power in the constituency from which I come. I am still of the same opinion, willing and determined to render every possible assistance to the carrying on of the war. It has never entered my mind, nor the minds of the people whom I have the honour to represent, that Canada should for one day cease to participate in this war with all its resources in men and money. In 1914, I was in favour of Canada's participation in the war under the voluntary system. I appealed to my people to support the noble cause for which our aid was asked. The people of my constituency, people of French extraction, if we take into consideration the conditions under which they are living, responded as nobly, gloriously and generously as the people of any other constituency in the Maritime Provinces or any other provinces. My people still hold the same views. During the last campaign I and others of the Liberal party were represented as being disloyal to the Crown, as not being in sympathy with the aims of the war nor with the maintenance of the British flag. I need not repeat that I, for one, believe that we in Canada are to-day fighting, not only for the relief of Belgium, for the cause of France and of the British Empire, but for the freedom of worship and language which we enjoy under the British Crown and which we could not enjoy under any other flag.

I must congratulate the Acting Minister of Finance on his Budget, and he will always hear from me when congratulations are in order. He has determined to raise the income tax. This tax which was introduced last session has been welcomed by the country. If the acting Minister of Finance will allow me to say so, an income tax has been urged from this side of the House for many years particularly since the war began and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) who has urged the Government with all his eloquence to impose this tax ever since the war began has always found in me a very humble and very sincere follower in this matter. It was my pleasure last session to suggest that the income tax should be made as high as it is in the United States, and I am proud to see that the acting minister has taken a step in that direction, and is placing the burden of war on the shoulders of those best able to bear it. I am sure that every true Canadian, millionaire and semi-millionaire, will generously pay the tax in order to maintain Canada's part in the war.

But there is one feature of the Budget that has been a disappointment to me. I am sure the people of Canada will be disappointed to-night. They expected that agricultural implements, at all events, would have been put on the free list. The failure to do so will be a great disappointment not only to the farmers of the West, upon whom the Allied armies and the civilian population of those countries as well as of Canada depend, but it will be a disappointment to the farmers of the East as well. The farmers of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have been preparing all winter for a crop which should be double the largest they have ever had in the past if they were given the chance they expected. They were depending on free agricultural implements, more especially now that their farm help has been taken away from them. Hired help will be impossible to get in many districts this year, and agricultural implements and labour-saving machinery are all the more necessary. The Unionist press is continually telling us that tariff questions must be put aside until after the war. I say that it is simply because we are at war and because greater production is so imperative in Canada to save the Allied countries from starvation that the tariff should be dealt with now and farm implements admitted free. There will be no fear of a famine after the war, but there is now, and Lord Rhondda and other eminent authorities have told us they look to Canada more particularly to save the situation. After giving serious thought to the situation on the other side, it is my firm belief that the 1918 crop of Canada alone will save the war for the Allies. The food stocks of our Allies are being depleted, while the Germans in a very short time will be getting food from those countries which they have conquered. Greater production in Canada is absolutely imperative. It is not merely injudicious to postpone consideration of the tariff until after the war; it is criminal. Farm implements should be admitted free now. Twenty-two million men have been withdrawn from production and have been fighting for the last four years, and it is up to Canada to feed them. I had the pleasure a few days ago of hearing the President of the Privy Council eulogize the women of France, who have been looking after the crops ever since their husbands, sons and fathers went to the front. No one has a deeper appreciation of the virtues of the women of France than I. I knew of their virtues and admired them long before the President of the Privy Council told us of what these brave women were doing. While the men of France were fighting at the front the women of France, with an energy that seems almost incredible in the weaker sex, have been tilling the soil and keeping the life in the population of that country. As it is, France has been able to sustain her population in time of war. But we must not forget that the crop of last year, with all the skill and devotion of the women of France, was not equal to the demand. The result is that to-day France is being rationed, she is living from hand to mouth, and the people have not more than sufficient food from one day to another. This is largely due to the lack of transport chiefly from Canada. We have the food, but we have not the ships to carry it across the Atlantic. We are called upon to-day to build ships, and to build more ships.

In 1911, one of the chief policies of the great leader of the Liberal party was the creation of a naval service. It would have been of the greatest possible advantage to Canada and the British Empire if we had had the cruisers that we proposed to build at the time of the commencement of the war, and if the mercantile marine, which would have been a result of the establishment of a naval shipbuilding industry, had been created. If that policy had been carried out, we would have been in a position not only to help ourselves but to help the Empire. During the last six years those who before the election of 1911 opposed the navy in order to please the Nationalists of Quebec, have never attempted to build a navy in Canada. From year to year the hon. Acting Minister of Finance, had been asking the Government of the day to undertake the building of ships. From year to year the members from the Maritime Provinces had been asking the Government to commence, without further delay, the construction of a mercantile marine. I had also exerted my energies in that direction. For years we had been asking the late Government to build ships. The result to-day of the inaction of the late Government is that while we have grain to send across we have no ships to carry it. We have known for the last few years that North America was the only country which could possibly help the Allies with food products. Australia is so far away that a ship sailing from that country could only make one trip while a ship sailing from the Atlantic ports of Canada to the ports of Great Britain and France could make four trips. That is one of the reasons why Australia and New Zealand has set such a fine example in supplying man-power to the Allies. If Canada had been in the same position as New Zealand and New Zealand, she could have furnished not only the force that she has sent across, but half a million more men. While I admire the patriotism and devotion of the people of Australia as evidenced by the contribution of man-power which they have made to the cause of the Empire and the Allies, and while I admire more particularly their determination to build the navy which has been created since the beginning of the war, I repeat that they are not in the position in which we find ourselves. They are not in a position to produce more than their own food requirements, because they cannot export their surplus products. They are not in a position to manufacture munitions for the Allies on account of their great distance from the scene of the conflict. They have no ships to carry munitions any more than they have ships to carry provisions. If we were to produce in Canada only what we consumed ourselves, if we were to produce no munitions for the Allies, we could send another half million men to strengthen the man-power of the Allies. These are conditions which we must bear in mind when we seek to throw a wet blanket on the patriotism of the people of Canada, and more particularly on that of one nationality.

Like my revered leader, I am for the prosecution of the war. If in his vision of the future he had been listened to by the majority of the electors, Canada would perhaps be in a better position now than she is to assist the Allies, even with man-power. To-day, with all my desire to see every young man go who possibly can go to the assistance of our Canadian soldiers, to reinforce them, and to reinforce the armies of the Allies, we are in a position now where we cannot possibly do that which our patriotism inspired us to do at the outbreak of the war. In the beginning of the war it was only manhood that was required. There was food in every country at war. France was provided with food for the year to come, and England had provided for her necessities. They were in such a position that there was no immediate danger of food scarcity or lack of production. We have sent our men, or we might say that they have gone in spite of us, impelled by their patriotism. There was no want in the first period of the war. We thought, as the people of England thought, that the war would last six months or a year, and we did not make the necessary provision at once for food production. But the war has lasted for four years, and it threatens to last another year or two. God only knows if by that time we shall have succeeded in driving the Hun out of Belgium and France. Unfortunately, everything points to the conclusion that we have a long and arduous task before us.

The latest regulations to be issued summoning every young man from 20 to 22 years of age will, especially at this time of the year, prove a serious impediment to the production of food for the Allies. I am not worrying so much about Canada, although we shall suffer as a result of the want of help for the farmers. It will not be the Canadian people who will suffer the most, it will be the allied armies and the civilian population of the allied countries that will suffer if there is a shortage of food.

That position will affect, more or less, certain portions of the country. In Canada there is not only production of food from the farm, but there is also production of food from the sea. In the Maritime Provinces, as the Acting Minister of Finance knows, we produce food not only from the soil, but from the sea, and that sea food is just as much needed to-day, for the sustenance of our Canadian soldiers and of the British and French armies, as is the wheat and the barley which is grown in the West.

Let me describe the situation which will be created in my constituency by the fact that all the young men of from 20 to 22 years will be taken away by conscription in the course of a few days. We have in that county what is known as the Gloucester Fishing Fleet, composed of some two hundred and fifty-six vessels of an average of twenty or thirty tons each. This fleet is manned by from eleven to twelve hundred men from the county of Gloucester, and the tribunals sitting in the county have heretofore exempted every young man so engaged during the fishing season, in order to maintain that fleet complete, and so that the production of fish might go on unimpaired, and those exemptions have been sustained. The idea was to continue the obtaining by this fleet of from four hundred to five hundred thousand quintals of cod and other fish for the use of the Canadian and British soldiers, that being the quantity secured last year and the year previous. Very often the crews of those vessels in the fishing fleet consist of four or five men, two or three young men of a family with the father, and perhaps some of their neighbours. There are hundreds of these young men, who, after having been exempted in the past because their aid was necessary in the production of food, will be called upon in a day or two to join up. The greater part of the crews of the fishing fleet will then have to remain ashore, and the Allies will be deprived of an immense quantity of food from this part of the Maritime Provinces which would serve to sustain our Canadian soldiers for a month.

I waited upon the Minister of Militia (Major-General Mewburn) in connection with the matter, and I must say that I was received with great sympathy. However, I obtained no promise from him, and there is not in the statement made by him to the House to-day any indication that the conscripting of these young men will be delayed in order to facilitate food production during the coming season. The Minister of Militia has in his possession a petition from the fishermen and the people engaged in the fishing industry in Gloucester county, which I only received yesterday, urging the Government to exempt, for the period of the fishing season, the young men to whom I have alluded. In presenting the petition of those fishermen I am not pleading the cause of slackers. Eleven hundred of these young Acadians, members of the same families as those for whom I am now pleading, have already gone voluntarily to the war. Every one of the young men in the fishing fleet has a brother or a cousin at the front; those who have remained at home have done so in order to carry on the necessary industries of the country, and to keep up the production of food, which is just as vital for the Empire as it is for Canada to-day. I am not now opposing the law which is now in force. It has gone into effect, and the young men for whom I am asking consideration are willing to submit to it; all they wish is to be exempted until the fishing season is over. The Minister of Militia, when he made his statement on conscription to-day, said that the calling of men from the farm would be deferred as late as possible until the seeding was over. But how is he going to arrange for the necessary labour when the harvest time comes and the young men who in ordinary times have helped in that harvest are not available by reason of having gone to the front? In the case of the fishing industry we would like, as I already said, to have the services of the young men, who form such an important part of the fishing fleet, retained during the continuance of the present season. The season usually lasts until about the 15th of September, but if their calling up was deferred until the 1st of September these young men would then be willing to go as quickly as they could be sent to the assistance of their brothers and cousins. In addition to the petition which I yesterday presented to the minister from the people of Caraquet, I received the following telegram on the same subject from Shippigan:

> Strict enforcement of Conscription here ties up fishing fleet with heavy expenses already involved; if no compromise by judicious selection locality and trade will suffer severely.

In dealing with the tariff question we should not only bear in mind the present needs of the country, but also pay due regard to future requirements when the war is over. We must be prepared for the future and put ourselves in a position to meet the conditions that will arise after peace is concluded. We should so place ourselves that when the munition factories are no longer operating we may direct the efforts of the working people employed in them into other industrial channels, and so be to stand the transition period between the close of the munition factories and the opening of other industries. We must be prepared. For that very reason, we should also be prepared to secure the good will of other nations. Free trade, or low tariff, has been the basic principle of the prosperity of the British Empire. Her prosperity and happiness have been sustained by the freedom of her institutions which in turn have been sustained by the principle of free trade. Free trade creates mutual interest, and mutual interest creates good understanding between nations. Even nations on the Allied side have made a mistake during this war in seeking to effect an economic combination against the enemy countries after the war. While we are fighting for liberty and justice in the world, we are bound to win. We have done this from the beginning, we have done it voluntarily, as was so eloquently said a few days ago in this House by one of the greatest orators of the United States, Mr. Samuel Gompers. He said that Canada was not bound to enter this war, that Australia was not compelled to enter this war, and that South Africa did not have to go into this war. We have all gone into it voluntarily because the British Empire was exposed to danger. Canada, South Africa, Australia and New Zealand have gone voluntarily into this war because of sentiment and interest in behalf of the British Empire, and not because the British Empire imposed compulsion upon its daughter nations.

That sentiment of generosity towards our Crown was not created by blood and iron, it was not even by conscription; it was merely by the breadth of their love for the Empire that millions of subjects blended into one common soul, under the smile of Providence, to fight for the maintenance of British institutions, liberty and justice all over the world. It is in recognition of this sentiment that Canada to a man has gone freely and voluntarily to the help of the Empire, and that same principle of freedom and justice must be maintained during the war and after the war. Let us not make the mistake of desiring to establish again after the war protection against the nations which we are now fighting. That mistake may perhaps have been made at the Paris Economic Conference held two years ago, when, owing to the influence of the men favouring protection on the British as well as on the French side, it was decided to wage economic war against the Central Empires after the war. That decision has given the Kaiser and Prussian plutocracy the chance to make their people feel that after the war they will have to fight the allied nations to maintain their economic existence. Let us not repeat that mistake to-day. Every nation will be welcome to the principles of justice and equality all over the world through democracy. We are talking and writing of democracy these days, yet we have been on many occasions introducing Prussian methods into this country. While the exigencies of war compel a certain centralization of authority, and an apparent lessening of democracy, we must at the same time be on guard against this tendency holding sway after the war is over.

There is another tendency which exists in the present Cabinet, and which existed, I may say, in the late Government. As my right hon. leader said, this is the same old Government; there has been some new blood introduced into it, but it is the same Government. To-day we see our friends who have left our side and gone over to the other side proclaiming the very doctrine that they fought against until the last day of the last session of Parliament. On the other side of the House every hon. member who rises to speak on behalf of the future success of our armies seems to take pleasure in saying that they have no consideration for the constitution of Canada. The other day my dearest friend on the other side, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) whom I regret not to see in his seat to-night—a friend with whom I have co-operated ever since we have been in Parliament together, who has had no more sincere and devoted follower than his humble servant the member for Gloucester—said that if it was necessary to win the war to puncture the Constitution he was prepared to do it. My hon. friend was not prepared to do it during last session or previous sessions. I am sure that the Acting Minister of Finance was never in a mood to transgress the Constitution. Yet the Constitution was transgressed when the Order in Council was passed taking from the provinces the right of issuing securities and putting control in this matter into the hands of the Federal Government. My hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance and all the members of the old Government know that when I criticize this action of the Government it is not a new inspiration with me. They know that for the last ten years I have always been advocating the maintenance of every clause of our Constitution.

I find it almost incredible that certain gentlemen from the western provinces who have deserted the Liberal party have deserted also their belief in the principle that provincial rights should be maintained—a principle which they advocated so eloquently and so forcibly when they were at the head of affairs in their respective provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. No condition created by the war could possibly justify the course taken by the Government in this respect. Conferences of representatives from the provinces have been held in the interest of production, and good results have been obtained from them. Why was not a conference held in this case? I do not say that the Federal Government should not be able to control, as far as possible, the borrowing facilities of the different provinces, but I do submit that the matter should have been discussed at a conference with the premiers of the different provinces. The Confederation which was brought about by the efforts of such great men as Sir John A. Macdonald, Brown, Howe, and others, will last as long as the British Empire lasts, but only by providing that every principle embodied in our constitution is respected can we have absolute harmony and absolute agreement between different races and creeds within our country.

Reference was made during the last election campaign to the province of Quebec. I do not represent a Quebec constituency, but I am a native of that province. When I left college I went to another French section of the community, and have devoted my lifetime to extending the principles which brought about Confederation. The French Acadian people in our part of the country have lived in harmony and happiness ever since Confederation. When I hear it said that the people of Quebec have not been loyal to the Empire in this war, I feel sometimes that I cannot but resent the suggestion as much as if I were still living in that province. I feel on the subject as a Canadian, if not as a Quebecer, and also as a citizen of the Maritime Provinces, where the French minority receives, I must say, generous treatment at the hands of the majority. If any nationality in the Maritime Provinces has declared special devotion to British institutions, it is the French-Acadian population. I affirm that my admiration for British institutions is not surpassed by that of any British-born in this country. I am here as a Canadian, as a Frenchman, as a Catholic, protected by the British flag, and I resent the attitude taken during the last election by certain gentlemen with regard to the province of Quebec.

It has been suggested that the people of Quebec are not loyal because they have not enlisted as numerously as the people of the other provinces. There is only one reason for that state of things. Every Canadian knows that that condition is due to the fact that the Nationalist school was established in 1909 and 1910—and the doctrines of that school were made the chief topic in the province of Quebec during the elections of 1911 by the Conservative party in order that they might win. They sowed the seeds of discord, of disloyalty, using their own money and their own friends for that purpose. In twenty-two or twenty-three constituencies Nationalists were returned in the elections of 1911, having been inspired by disloyal sentiments; having been educated to the theory that we owed nothing to England and that we should not send one man across the seas for the defence of the Empire at any time or under any conditions. I lay it at the door of the leaders of the Conservative party that they favoured and encouraged that school of disloyalty in Canada. I admit that it was a school of many attractions and many allurements. Its chief exponent was one of the ablest men Canada ever produced, one of the greatest orators the French Canadian people ever heard, a man with a most versatile pen. They took advantage of his talent; they even paid him to disseminate his doctrine in the province of Quebec. Doubtless these false doctrines appealed to many when a young speaker went through the back settlements of Quebec—Drummond and Arthabaska for instance—and told the people that Laurier wanted to take their children and send them off to fight in the army and navy of England. Even the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) sent a famous telegram to Drummond and Arthabaska—and he has since had time to repent and to be haunted by remorse for having encouraged such a doctrine.

I lay upon the Government all the blame for all the results that that school may have brought about in Canada, because the morning after the election, when they were able to secure the reins of power in Canada with the assistance of those twenty-two or twenty-three Nationalists who were elected because of their doctrine that Canada should not participate in the wars of the Empire, my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden), as a reward for the doctrine which they had propagated in the province of Quebec, rushed those men, one after another, as vacancies occurred, into the Cabinet or upon the bench or upon various commissions. To-day, my hon. friends opposite say that the people of Quebec have not been as loyal as they should be. Separate the Nationalist element from the people of the province of Quebec, and the other half of the people of Quebec were as faithful and generous in their response to voluntary enlistment in the beginning of the war as the people of any other province of Canada.

It has been stated on many occasions, and I have seen it stated in the press of the western provinces, that the French Canadian people of the Maritime Provinces have enlisted more freely than the French Canadian people of Quebec. There is a good reason for that. It is that the Nationalist doctrine did not take root amongst the French Canadian people of the Maritime Provinces. They resisted it. I appeal to-day to my colleagues from New Brunswick, the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp) and the others who may be here. I regret that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) is not in the House. I say that amongst all those men who have worked to stem the tide of Nationalism in New Brunswick the member for Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon) has been one of the chief instruments. I have been assisted by my younger colleague, the hon. member for Restigouche and Madawaska (Mr. Michaud). The people of New Brunswick have paid no heed to the doctrine of Bourassa, because we Liberals, knowing the danger of that school, stemmed the tide at once. For that reason the French Canadian people of the Maritime Provinces have enlisted as freely as the English-speaking people of those and the other provinces. The reason why the French Canadian people of Quebec have not enlisted so freely is because they have been corrupted by that school which has been the mainstay of the Government. It was stated only a few days ago by the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) that, had it not been for Mr. Lavergne and Mr. Bourassa, his friends would not have been in power in 1911.

The Conscription Bill which we opposed is now the law of the land. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition stated that the moment it became the law of the land it would be respected by himself and by the people of Quebec, and whatever incidents may have taken place since then it is easy now to see that the people of Quebec at large are accepting the conscription law as patriotically as the people of any other race in Canada. We can see now that my honoured leader, owing to his energy, owing to his vision of the future, owing to his ambition to create harmony in this country, was right when he took that stand against the Nationalists of 1911, and to-day, owing to his constant efforts, he has stamped out from the province of Quebec that Nationalist inspiration, and not a single Nationalist was returned at the last election. There have come into this House sixty-two members from the province of Quebec, every one a straight Liberal, at all times opposed to the doctrine of Bourassa and the Nationalist party. The right hon. leader of the Opposition has been able to redeem the province of Quebec from the state into which it had been misled by the Nationalists with the assistance of the Conservative party; he has been able to bring Quebec back to the condition in which it was in time past. And for that reason alone, if for no other consideration, our hon. friends who, from conscientious motives have left this side of the House to follow the leader of the Government, should cross over to this side of the House and support the leader of the Opposition.

Canada will live as long as the British Empire lives, and I hope that will be as long as the world exists. We have a great future before use. Peoples of different races and creeds have been placed here to live together in harmony, in happiness. It is only lately that that harmony and that happiness have been destroyed. Let us hope that that harmony will be renewed and that it will continue for all time to come. I have, with great regret, read on many occasions in many newspapers the statement that we should have one flag, one school and but one language. Confederation has made Canada a country of two languages, and that is bound to be the case as long as the British Empire exists. What are those languages? We have the English language, the language of Shakespeare and Milton who have given it lofty aims; the language of Edmund Burke, of Daniel O'Connell, of Gladstone who have given it eloquence to stir up the masses, to impel the Governments and Parliaments of the British Empire in the establishment of justice, equality and democracy throughout the world; the language of Adam Smith in regard to trade and commerce which has reached every shore of every ocean, which has penetrated throughout every part of every country where there is a store or a bank, or a shop, the language which always leaves in its train the impression of moral character and fraternity. That is the beauty of the English language. The other is the French language, the language of love and affection, the language of the arts, the international language to-day, the language of international treaties, the language in which is written the treaty ceding Canada to England with all the privileges of the French people as to language and religion, the language in which will be written the treaty of peace when peace is declared, I hope, for all time to come.

If the British nation has been able to expand its trade and commerce to such an extent that it has become the greatest industrial and commercial nation of the world, and if the French nation, with a language expressing more sentiment than words can tell, has been able to become the most artistic nation of the world—if these two nations have been able to become the two greatest nations of the world, what a great nation might not Canada become if there was harmony between those speaking different languages? Canada has immense natural resources, of the mine, of the forest, and of the soil, and great water powers. The future of Canada ought to appeal to every Canadian here. It will surpass in prosperity that of any other country in the world. I think of her future as that great British-Canadian, Joseph Howe, thought of Canada at the time of Confederation, when he predicted that in the West our resources would bring a population and lead to such a development that perhaps the seat of the Empire might be centred in Canada. But even if that never comes, we shall be able to help maintain here the principles of liberty and of democracy with the assistance of the United States. It is said by some that after the war Canada should join with the United States and that these two countries should remain apart from the rest of the world, far removed from all its dangers. Canada, I repeat, has a future, and in my judgment it will better serve the purposes of humanity by remaining a part of the British Empire than by joining in with the United States with its one hundred millions of people. A magnificent destiny awaits Canada if we will but take advantage of our opportunities. Immigration will pour into this country after the war, and we shall have a population which will be imbued with sentiments of justice and liberty—liberty and justice for your neighbour and for your neighbour-nation too. We shall have here a nation ready to put an end, if necessary, to troubles that may arise in the different countries of Europe. Do not let us think that our country will be a nation of idleness or indifference after the war. It has a mission in connection with the future development of all other nations. I have always stood firm in my belief in the right hon. leader of the Liberal party, stood firm when we have been under the lash, if I may say so, during the last six months, and it is because I realize that he is possessed of the very sentiments that the greatest statesmen of the Empire have expressed on different occasions since the war began. General Jan C. Smuts is a great British statesman, not of Great Britain, not of Canada, not of Australia, but of South Africa, and he was so much admired at the War Conference in London last year that he was made a member of the War Council. Speaking at the banquet of the House of Lords and Commons in London recently, he said:

I pray that you may have the clearness of vision and purpose, and the strength of soul in the coming days which will be even more necessary than strength of arms. It will depend largely upon us whether in the present struggle the prize is achieved or whether the world shall once more be plunged into disaster. The prize is within our grasp, if we have the strength of soul to see the thing through until victory crowns the efforts of our brave men in the field.

Further on in the same speech he expressed sentiments in harmony with the sentiment which ought to prevail in Canada. He said:

Even nations which have fought against the British Empire like my own, must feel that their interests, their language and their religion are as safe and secure under the British flag as are those of the children of your own blood. It is only in proportion as this is realized that you will fulfil the true mission which is yours. Therefore, it seems to me that there is only one solution, and that is the solution supplied by our past traditions of freedom, self-government and fullest development.

Those words attracted not only the attention of his audience, but the next morning the Daily Telegraph, of London, in an encomium upon the eloquent words of this great statesman, had this to say of another great statesman whom we all know and admire:

There is one other great Imperial statesman who will certainly applaud and endorse that statement—Sir Wilfrid Laurier. It is exactly the point upon which he has always laid stress when Imperial Federationalists have seemed to press forward at too rapid a pace.

If the views of this statesman, so eloquently expressed, as to the future greatness of the Empire, have been acclaimed by the British Empire, and if the sentiments of that other great imperial statesman, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, so nobly expressed on different occasions, have evoked the admiration and applause of the people of the British Empire, I say, Mr. Speaker, that I am willing to stand as proudly by Sir Wilfrid Laurier to-day as a good Canadian and British subject as a citizen of South Africa is proud to stand by General Jan Christian Smuts. I recognize in Sir Wilfrid Laurier the firm upholder of freedom, justice and equality in Canada. Sir Wilfrid Laurier has always been in Canada, in his vision of the future, in his conception of the high destiny of this country, in his aspirations for the welfare of Canada, and in his ambition to see British principles and British institutions established more firmly all over the world, what Jan Christian Smuts has been in South Africa.

In conclusion, permit me to ask pardon for having kept you so long. I had not expected to detain the House at such great length when I rose to speak. This is an occasion when sentiments have to be expressed, and I thought I should take advantage of the indulgence granted me to express the views which I hold on some of the questions which are engaging our attention to-day. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the House most cordially and I hope that it will not be necessary for me to again trespass at such length upon your time.

On the motion of Mr. A. K. Maclean the House adjourned at 12 o'clock midnight.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY: When this question came up on a previous occasion I explained the reasons why it seemed to me that the Order should not pass. I understood from the right hon. leader of the Opposition that he would call the attention of the mover to what I said then on the subject. It would appear to me that the reasons I gave are sufficient.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Stand.

Motion stands.

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS.

GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (Peterborough West): May I inquire whether the Government has adopted the policy that a constituency has no right to be consulted concerning any governmental appointment to be made in or for that constituency?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not quite know what my hon. friend means by consulting the constituency. With regard to appointments, the policy of the Government is to get the best information available—

Sir SAM HUGHES: Therefore they do not consult the members.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: —with regard to the qualifications of any person who is appointed to public office, there is no reason why the member for the constituency should not be consulted. There is no reason why other sources of information should not be sought. The purpose is to appoint the persons best qualified for the position.

CANADIAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE.—ARMY CORPS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir SAM HUGHES: Has the Government any information concerning the proposed breaking up of the Canadian corps at the front? I shall put my question in another form. Is it true that one or more divisions of the Canadian Army Corps at the front have been dropped from the Canadian corps and are now serving with the British Army Corps, in other words, making two army corps instead of one, as should have been done long ago?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: According to any information in possession of the Government, the Canadian Army Corps has not been broken up. It may be true that, for a certain temporary purpose, one of the divisions was sent to reinforce the British troops who were defending a particular place. There is nothing more in the suggestion than that.

MEDICAL SERVICE AND FORESTRY CORPS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish again to call the attention of the Minister of Militia to a cable despatch which appears in this morning's Montreal Gazette in regard to the Medical Service Corps and the Forestry Corps in England. It is a very severe condemnation of the system, and the minister is asked on behalf of our fellowmen on the other side to act, not to inquire.

Major-General MEWBURN: That question was raised the other day. Some little time ago there was received from the Overseas Minister a letter enclosing a letter from the Officer Commanding, Brigadier-General Alexander MacDougall, stating that everything in the Forestry Corps was in splendid shape. The Overseas Minister remarked that he had inspected the Forestry Corps in England and had found the discipline of the men of a very high character. He also reported he had organized a culling out system throughout the whole of England with a view to seeing if there were in England any men who were not fit for overseas service in France, the purpose being that men unfit for service in France, who could be spared, should be sent back to Canada. All the men in the Forestry Corps who are fit for service at the front are being sent to France. I have already sent word to the Overseas Minister in regard to this report which evidently emanated from England. We had no previous knowledge of it here. I asked him to have the matter investigated immediately. As regards the Medical Service Corps, we have no knowledge, whatever, of any such charge as is stated in that article. I have also asked the Overseas Minister for an immediate explanation in regard to it, so that we may have the information.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I beg to make a correction, not that the Minister of Militia is making a mistake, but the words are placed in his mouth that somebody instituted this movement to cull out these men. That movement was started long before the present Overseas Minister of Militia went to England.

QUEBEC PILOTS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. A. GAUVREAU (Témiscouata): Has the Minister of Marine and Fisheries made any decision in regard to the five Quebec pilots who, after being examined by Dr. Fritz, of Halifax, have been declared unfit for service on account of their eyesight? I spoke to the minister before in regard to the matter.

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE: I took the matter up immediately, but I have not as yet received word from Quebec. As soon as I do, I shall be glad to inform the hon. member.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT—MEDICAL BOARDS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. F. KAY (Missisquoi): I should like to know from the Minister of Militia if there are in existence, and, if not, if there will be established immediately in the country districts, medical boards at which the men between the ages of twenty and twenty-two may be examined without delay?

Major-General MEWBURN: The men betweeen the ages of twenty and twenty-two who have been ordered to report are receiving notices to report at certain specified places. The Registrars in each district, in sending out those notices, are giving the men the actual places at which they are to report. Medical Boards have been or are being established at those points, so that the men will have their medical examination with as little delay as possible. I do not think it will be possible to have those medical boards established in all parts of the country. The great difficulty in carrying out the Military Service Act is to get sufficient medical officers to conduct the examinations. The men, however, will be ordered to report at the headquarters of the various depot battalions, and in the notice ordering each man to report, the name of the place at which he is to report will be given.

COMMANDING OFFICERS FIFTH DIVISION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I should like to ask the Minister of Militia with regard to the correctness of the following Canadian Associated Press cable despatch, and as to whether he has any information to give the House on the matter:

> London, April 29.—The following are gazetted as ceasing to command battalions: Lieut.-Cols. A. E. Wings, M. Barre, B. M. Green, T. P. Rowland, H. E. Cutcliffe, D. M. Sutherland.

Major-General MEWBURN: I have no direct information from overseas, but it is quite fair to conclude that those officers were officers commanding battalions in the Fifth Division, which was subsequently broken up. As they gave up the command of the various battalions in the Fifth Division on the units being transferred to the reserve battalions, the battalions as battalions would thus cease to exist.

THE BUDGET.

The House resumed the debate on the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean (Acting Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means (resumed from April 30).

Mr. HUME CRONYN (London): Mr. Speaker, complaint has been made both inside and outside of this House that its members occasionally occupy too much time in discussing matters not pertaining to the very pressing questions before the nation at this time. I venture, however, to think that this session will stand out in comparison with those of former days as, in the main, innocent of any such charge. In any event, if I may be allowed to say a word as representing the new members, they will, I think, be proved to be innocent of any such breach, no matter into what evil habits they may fall in later years. The subject before the House is one of vital importance, and for that reason I venture to offer some comment and criticism on the Budget. It deals with one of the five indispensible requisites without which we are unable to carry on the war. Those requisites, as commonly stated, are men, money, munitions, ships and food. First one and then another is forced to the front as perhaps of more immediate need; but, if we hope to succeed, none of them can be discarded.

From the first day of the war until the dawn of the day of peace—yes, and even far beyond that whitest stone in all the calendar—the need of money and of sound financing will be urgent. Thus far in the debate I have not noticed any criticism of the main scheme of this country's financing of the war, nor does it seem to me that any such criticism could fairly be made. The measures presented so lucidly and with such admirable brevity by the Acting Minister of Finance deserve, in my humble opinion, nothing but praise, and I believe that the firm and resolute lines upon which for more than three and one-half of courage testing years the Minister of Finance has advanced have been in the main the correct lines. There are in truth but three methods whereby a country such as Canada can hope to finance her war needs. First, by taxation; second, by borrowings, and, third—a method which I hope is wholly unthinkable for Canada—by the issue of fiat or paper money. To meet the entire cost of the war out of taxation is impossible even for the wealthiest nation. Great Britain, the wealthiest of all the great belligerents, has managed to pay out of her current income 17 per cent of her war expenditure. The United States hopes to raise in the present year by taxation about 14 per cent of the nineteen billions of dollars which she will require for herself and her Allies in waging the war. When, therefore, we find that Canada has up to date paid 11 per cent of her total war expenditure out of current income we have reason to feel that we have at least started on the right road. In contrast with these examples, France has found herself unable to pay even her ordinary expenditure out of taxation, and has been forced to raise all the money she requires for the war by domestic loans or by borrowings from her Allies. Germany has paid but a small fraction out of her taxes, and by cultivating not only huge loans, but increasingly large issues of paper she will reap a whirlwind of panic and disaster.

As the success of the eighth German war loan has been announced to-day, it is worth while considering the methods adopted in that country whereby such a result is obtainable. At the outbreak of the war Germany formed Darlehnskassen, or loaning bureaus, for the special purpose of advancing moneys to the Government and private investors on the security of treasury bills and war loans issued by the Government. To supply the funds necessary for these purposes this new type of bank was authorized to issue bank notes or paper money altogether unsecured by gold, and in the last report which I have seen the outstanding issue was placed at the sum of one and one-half billions of dollars. This amount is wholly independent of the very great increase in paper money issued by the Imperial Bank of Germany, the Reichsbank, which has brought down the ratio of gold held by the bank from something over seventy per cent at the outbreak of the war to about twenty per cent at the present time. It is therefore not hard to understand how the investor in the first German war loan, we will say, after putting all his savings in that loan, being encouraged to borrow ninety per cent of the face value of his bond from these loaning institutions, has been able to subscribe to a second, and by repeating the process to a third, fourth, fifth and sixth loan. It is, of course, simply a pyramiding of debt and credit which, if the war ends without the hughest kind of indemnities to Germany, must bring her people down in ruin.

We have reason therefore to be satisfied that Canadian financing has been built on a firm foundation, and having in mind the increased taxation now in force we believe the country will endeavour, so far as can be done without undue pressure on her people, more and more to pay the cost of the war out of current income. We shall thus keep in check as far as practicable the formidable growth of our national debt. That debt is without doubt formidable. We are told that it now or will in the near future amount to $1,200,000,000 an average of over $150 for every person in Canada. Lest the parent of the many olive branches referred to by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) should take fresh alarm at this restatement of our position I might encourage him by repeating what the Acting Minister of Finance brought out yesterday, that in the autumn of last year there was subscribed to the Victory Loan a sum equivalent to $58 for every man, woman and child in Canada. Therefore our sorrowing father may console himself with the thought that his numerous progeny will be able by their industry and thrift to relieve themselves very rapidly of the crushing burden of debt which my hon. friend has placed upon them. At all events I think the argument I have adduced by way of relief is quite as sound as the argument used by the financial critic of the Opposition. There are others who will find a source of comfort in the fact that the per capita debt of the United States has jumped in one short year from $14 to $70, while that of both France and England is now in excess of $500.

Before leaving this question of our borrowings I venture to support the suggestion made by the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames), if my memory serves me correctly, that future loans should not be exempt from taxation. Hitherto,—I speak subject to correction,—all our domestic loans have been exempt from federal taxation. Last year, when the present hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) brought up this point to the Minister of Finance, he was told that to issue a loan subject to taxation and to make it a success, the yield rate must be made more attractive and that therefore the matter was as broad as it was long. With very great deference to a man for whose opinion I have the highest respect, and whose experience and judgment in these matters is in quite a different class from my own, I venture to differ from him on that point. I think that if you will take a concrete statement—an absurd statement if you like, but simply for the purpose of illustration,—it will show wherein the difference lies. Let us suppose an investor with an income of $200,000 free to change his investments. If he holds no war loan, under the new scale, he will be liable to the payment of a tax of nearly $50,000; that is, that about one-quarter of his entire income will go in taxation. If, however, he be free to invest in the war loan, he escapes any taxation. I do not say that this is a possible case, because no man has his investments in such shape that he could realize on them without loss and invest in war loans, but for the purpose of an illustration it will answer. Take a hundred married men with incomes of $2,000 and let these incomes be derived purely from the war loan. They would pay no tax because their incomes are not over $2,000. If, then, we issue a taxable loan at a higher rate, the man of small means will receive the higher rate, and either pay no tax, because his income is under the limit, or pay a very light tax; whereas, the wealthy man, while he also does receive the higher rate, is subject to a tax that far more than offsets the additional amount the country must pay by way of increased interest. I would therefore strongly support the suggestion of the former speaker that the Minister of Finance and those advising him should carefully consider this phase of the question.

I quite understand that last year, when we had to issue not one but two loans, and when our financial position both with Great Britain and the United States of America was not clearly defined, it might have been a risk to attempt to take such a step. But I am inclined to think that with the work done on the Victory Loan, and with the stimulus throughout the country caused by that work, a loan, subject to taxation could be successfully floated.

I would add to that suggestion a second one, and it is that the convertible feature of these loans should be now dropped. We all hope, just as we hope for peace, that this may be the last of these loans, but if there are others to follow, and others at a still higher rate of interest, it greatly increases the burden of the country if the holders of the former issues can convert them into those paying a higher rate. The effect of that action will perhaps not be great this year. It would only affect, if at all, the wealthy investor, but its full effect would come into operation so soon as a further loan was floated.

I now enter upon what we may fairly term debatable ground and that is the question as to the method by which our taxes are raised. As one of the former speakers has remarked, the criticism directed against the Budget was somewhat in line with the old-time debates which have for so long been heard in this House. In examining the revenue which the country secures from one source or another, we see that indirect taxes still contribute the major portion of our income. I want to say to the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), who invited us on this side of the House to partake of his simple and magic process of healing, that I was born, and have lived beside the true Jordan all my life and neither the Abana or Pharphar nor any of the rivers of Damascus hold superior attractions for me. The ideals which one carries, more or less dormant, perhaps, throughout life, have pictured a people deep-rooted in the soil, and a yeomanry, satisfied, hardy and intelligent, who would carry on the great career of our race. Whether from prejudice or other insufficient reason, my imagination has never been greatly stirred by the appeal of huge industries and the ceaseless whirr of the wheels of commerce.

Perhaps, too, closely associated with these are the slums of the big cities, the penury and hardship of the poor, and the sharp contrasts which there exist between wealth and poverty. I make this explanation so that I may feel myself free to say, starting from such a standpoint, I would not urge during the present war any great change in tariff conditions. We have seen growing up of late years in the United States those huge combinations of capital and industry very often termed trusts. We have read much of their ruthless powers, and their sometimes wholly indefensible methods of competition. I do not think this is the day to do anything which would deprive the Parliament of Canada of the control it should have over those who manufacture or sell goods within her borders.

Another point, which is of still later discovery, and I think is now admitted by most military writers: No nation can undertake any part in modern warfare unless she is wholly organized in industry. That is an admission we dare not hope this war will be the last war. Whether that be so or not, it would be well to wait and do nothing to affect the standing of our industries during the present crisis. Even with more diffidence than in the case of the former suggestion, I would like to ask the Acting Minister of Finance and his colleagues to consider the advisability of the appointment of a permanent tariff and financial commission. The whole world of finance has so altered in the last few years that most of us feel we should be again at school in considering questions such as these. The first thing that is necessary in formulating a tariff, or making a financial decision, is to know the facts, and so far as I am aware we are in woeful ignorance of many of the facts governing the industries which we presume either to aid, or as they claim injure, by the imposition or reduction of customs duties.

There is one other point which I would like to also mention, and that is in connection with the Excess Profits Tax. I have no interest in any institution making a profit out of the war. Nay, rather, every institution with which I am connected has been injured rather than helped, and the struggle has been rather to maintain prewar earnings than to reap benefits from war conditions. But, endeavouring to look at this question from an impartial standpoint, it does seem to me that the very sharp rise from a tax of one-fourth when profits amount to fifteen per cent to one-half of those profits when they amount to twenty per cent, and a further increase to a seventy-five per cent tax on additional profits will act as a check on the expansion of many of the fundamental industries of the country, and will, moreover, deter the entry of fresh capital into Canada. We must not forget that we can obtain a high return from the best form of investments which do not call for any personal energy, and where there is an almost absolute absence of risk. When, therefore, sums are put into industries where risk is always a predominant feature, where a series of lean years may occur, it is wise, I think, both from the point of view of the industry and of the country, that that industry be allowed to accumulate a very substantial reserve to meet the possible hard times ahead of it. Then, too, we must not forget the effect of our increased Income Tax and of our Excess Profits Tax on future Government loans. There can be no doubt, as one writer has put it, "the ultimate source of a national loan is the unspent income of the nation's producers." Hitherto it is possible we have been able to find investors whose money has been lying by awaiting some suitable security, but that reservoir will soon be emptied and we must then depend upon the thrift and productiveness of the nation to yield each year a sufficient sum which can be turned over to the Government to aid in the war. As one American financial writer has put it:

> When a nation declares war it is turning its face towards commercial bankruptcy, and the task of the financier at that time is to so control both the machinery of credit and the machinery of taxation that the productive power of the country may be used to make headway against unproductive consumption, and at the same time to hold under control those forces that tend to wreck the industrial organization by which that power is maintained.

Canada, to my mind, is in one sense the most marvelous factory of the world, a plant ready and waiting for the workers. It is true that we may have, for the moment, too heavy an overhead cost; we may have a multiplicity of legislative machinery, more than sufficient for our population. But, looking to the future, and believing, as I think we all do, in the progress this country will make once times become normal, every care should be taken not to place barriers against that progress.

In concluding these remarks, Mr. Speaker, I feel sure that the country is prepared to accept any burden imposed by this budget cheerfully and in the best spirit. It has been said that some section or other of the country does not realize that we are at war. I think, sir, we do realize that we are at war; but, perhaps a majority of us do not realize the personal obligation cast upon every one to do his or her share. The habits of a lifetime, the love of ease, the conventions which surround us, prevent us from giving full effect to the force which we could exercise in aid of the nation. We do not forget the claim of those who have given up their all, and who say to us in the words of the poet:

> O you that still have rain and sun,
> Kisses of children and of wife,
> And the good earth to tread upon,
> And the mere sweetness that is life,
> Forget not us, who gave all these
> For something dearer, and for you!
> Think in what cause we crossed the seas!
> Remember, he who fails to challenge
> Fails us too.

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that this country will fail the challenge; it will rise to the heights; it will gird its loins, and bend its back to meet whatever burden may be put upon it for the one end we have in view.

Mr. A. B. McCOIG (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a few words in this debate, I wish, in the first place, to congratulate most heartily the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Maclean) for the able way in which he presented his case yesterday to this House and to the country. I also wish to pay my respects to my colleague the hon. member for the city of London (Mr. Cronyn) upon the excellent matter of his maiden speech in this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCOIG: I wish also to add that, so far as I am personally concerned, and I believe I am speaking for all the members on this side of the House, I am not here to oppose the financial arrangements put forward by the acting Minister of Finance yesterday for raising funds to prosecute the war; I am here to give the Government every possible assistance in raising the money required, so long as it is honestly spent for the carrying on of the war. I would even go further and place myself on record as being in favour of even more drastic legislation to secure funds for the prosecution of the war. I would support legislation that would be retroactive, and which would further tax the profits already made by the food profiteers and place more of their takings in the treasury for the carrying on of the war, and for the protection of the widows and orphans of this young Canadian nation. Further, I believe it would be more commendable to do as I have suggested than to place a tax of 5 cents per pound upon tobacco that is grown in this country, which will discourage the growing of tobacco and enhance its cost to the consumer. Indeed, tobacco should not be considered as a luxury, but as a necessity for all those who have formed the habit of using it. Besides, it is a reflection to a certain extent upon the men who are defending this country, who must have tobacco in the trenches, to compel them to pay more for it in the future than they have done in the past. This tax will also affect those great patriotic institutions of our country known as the Daughters of the Empire and the Red Cross Society, which are raising funds to purchase tobacco to send to the men overseas. If the Acting Minister of Finance will give this matter his serious consideration, he will see that the small amount that will be raised by this particular taxation will cause great inconvenience both to men in humble circumstances and to those who are doing our fighting. I believe that the people of this country, particularly those in humble circumstances, and particularly the women who are large users of tea, will find that this tax bears very heavily upon them. I believe, Sir, that the small amount that will be realized from the tea tax could be far more easily secured from other sources which would not bear so hard on people in humble circumstances. The minister might, after considering this matter, decide not to exact this burdensome tax on tea.

I regret also that the Acting Minister of Finance did not see fit to continue to keep on the free list tractor ditchers, which were placed on the free list a few years ago. For what purpose were they made free of duty? In order that the farmers of this country could drain their land and raise larger crops, which are so essential. But, as the price of tractor ditchers has increased to over $300, which was the limit specified for free entry, farmers will now be unable to bring them in, and they will be deprived of the use of these machines in the future. This will be a detriment to the engineering organizations established by our Provincial Governments, whereby the farmers secure engineers to lay out their farms so that they will be properly drained. These engineers have been working for some months past in my section of the country, and to-day the men who have placed their orders for these ditchers will be unable to get them, because they cannot come in as formerly free of duty.

May I add my congratulations for allowing the importation of farm tractors free of duty. The Government has decided to do that, but the Acting Minister did not say yesterday whether this concession would continue or not. In purchasing one hundred tractors and turning them over to the producers of this country without the middleman's profit, the Government has done a commendable thing; which will have a good effect.

But, Sir, it is a matter of regret that the Food Board, which has been established by the Government at a cost of millions of dollars, has ordered that farmers' boards and organizations throughout the country which have purchased carloads of sugar, flour, potatoes and other foodstuffs, must return them to the place whence they came, permitting the middleman still to retain the profit which he obtained through the sale of the goods so disposed of. The farmers' clubs which have been formed for the purpose of obtaining goods at first cost and thus avoiding the middleman will resent this action on the part of the Food Board. In my city last winter the labour organization brought their goods in by the carload and distributed them among the labouring men of Chatham with great credit to themselves and with large saving to consumers. Under the present order of the Food Board, however, this organization will be unable to carry on their work in that regard.

Is it not a fact that the arguments in favour of free farm tractors apply also to the free admission of agricultural implements? If it is a benefit to the farmers to enable them to obtain tractors at first cost, then I take exception to the assertion of the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) the other night that this Government was put in office not to interfere with the tariff, but to pass legislation connected with the prosecution of the war. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) represents the city of St. Thomas in this House. If the member for Brantford will look up his price list for 1918 and obtain quotations from the concern manufacturing similar implements in St. Thomas, he will find that the Cockshutt Plow Company is charging twenty-five per cent more for plows, harrows and land rollers than the concern in St. Thomas. Is it surprising, then, that the member for Brantford hesitates to say that the tariff on agricultural implements should be interfered with at this particular time? I have in my possession the wholesale price list of the Cockshutt Plow Company, and I have invoices of similar goods—harrows, ploughs, rollers—of the same size and of equal quality, sold by the company in St. Thomas at twenty-five per cent less than the price of the product of the Cockshutt Plow Company. I challenge contradiction of my assertion with regard to these prices. Other large concerns—the International Harvester Company, the Massey Harris Company—are charging the same prices as those charged by the Cockshutt Plow Company. Is it not reasonable to suggest that at a time when we need greater production, at a time when we particularly require such agricultural implements as I have referred to, an investigation should be made by a committee of this House or by the Minister of Labour with regard to this matter? The people and the Government should know exactly what is going on; steps should be taken to see that unfair prices are not extracted from agricultural producers. The Government should ascertain whether these exorbitant prices are being distributed among the men who are engaged in the workshops of those factories; whether the labouring men are getting their share of the huge profits that are being made to-day on the sale of other agricultural implements, the prices of which are practically double what they were when war broke out in 1914. I suggest that the Minister of Trade and Commerce give this matter attention. He has been energetic in doing everything that is detrimental to production, and this applies to every Bill that he has introduced during this session—daylight saving, the marketing of hay, the weighing of eggs, and so on. In order to put himself right with the producers regarding these measures which he has introduced, I suggest that he assist in the investigation of the matter which I have put before the House.

Last night the member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) told the House in mournful tones that we all have to make great sacrifices. I was reminded of the statement made by a gentleman who was so widely advertised during the last campaign, and who said on one occasion, "We have to make sacrifices; to hell with profits." Only a few months ago the Minister of Labour heard that in my city three or four cobblers had agreed to raise the price of patches five cents and half soles ten cents, whereupon the minister notified them that they would be liable to prosecution under the Combines Act if they proceeded with their intention. His letter reads as follows:

Ottawa, December 13, 1916.

Dear Sir:

I am advised that a few days ago yourself and several others entered into an agreement to raise the price of shoe repairing in the city of Chatham from the 8th instant.

I am enclosing you a copy of an Order in Council recently passed, whereby you will see that if any such agreement was made you have laid yourself liable to prosecution under that Order. It prohibits the entry into any such agreement.

Yours truly,
(Sgd) T. W. Crothers, Minister of Labour.

The member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames), who was telling us so much about the way our finances should be conducted, knows that the burning question among the labouring classes is the high cost of shoes. As a matter of fact, I believe that the hon. gentleman knows more about the manufacture of shoes than he does about finances. The other day a man with only one arm came into my office and said to me: "McCoig, the shoes for the child that I am sending to school to-morrow cost me $3, while the shoes that I bought for his brother five years ago cost me only 98 cents." A cattle merchant who was standing by said: "I can assure you, Mr. McCoig, that the price of hides is practically the same as it was five years ago." Is it not time that this matter was taken up by Parliament and an investigation held? Many children were kept home last winter because their parents could not buy shoes for them. If it is true that millions of dollars worth of hides are stored throughout the country, should not the Government see that these hides are manufactured and that our boys, the great asset of this country, are supplied with shoes in order that they may be enabled to get an education?

I say this because I believe these are matters that have very little to do with the prosecution of the war, but they have a great deal to do with the peace and harmony which we hope will prevail in this country. At this particular time we lack a Postmaster General. Demands are coming from all parts of the country that the postal service be improved. We have requests for better pay from postmasters whose labours are greater than they ever were before. The mail carriers in the cities are also asking for better pay, and above all, the mail carriers on the rural routes of this country, who accepted contracts at a time when the cost of living was not as high, as it is now, have been compelled by the Government to fulfil the duties required of them. I do not mean to cast any reflections upon the Acting Postmaster General (Mr. Doherty), but I believe the duties of the Post Office Department are such that we should have in this House a man who would give his whole attention to the department so as to ensure that the proud position that Canada has in the past occupied, as far as our mail service is concerned, will be continued in the future.

The other night when the proposition was before Parliament to exempt the men who were producing on the farms of this country, I supported that amendment. My reason for doing so was that we had received letters and pamphlets up to as late a date as the 28th of March, signed by the Prime Minister, asking for greater production. I have here a resolution, passed in the provincial legislature, moved by Sir William Hearst, and seconded by Mr. Proudfoot. I believe it to be perfectly in order to read a portion of it:

Resolved, That we the members of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario recognising as we do the grave and anxious crisis which confronts Great Britain and France owing to the acute shortage of food in these countries, and the momentous issues that are thus placed in jeopardy, hereby affirm our resolve and determination to do everything that lies in our power to sustain Great Britain and her Allies in the bitter struggle that lies ahead. We realise that the world shortage of food, together with the fact that the destruction of shipping prevents Great Britain drawing supplies from Australia and South America, compels that country and France to depend almost entirely on Canada and the United States for the necessary food to maintain her armies and her civilian population. We desire to express our willingness to assume to the full our responsibility in this perilous emergency. Ontario has with a true spirit of patriotism and unselfishness risen to every demand hitherto made upon her by the war, whether for men, money, munitions or food, and must not fail now in doing her part in meeting this new and grave crisis. At a time when the whole civilian population of Great Britain is on meagre rations, when even the soldiers' rations have been reduced, and when France is threatened with famine, it behooves all the inhabitants of this favoured province to examine closely their individual responsibility and privileges, and resolve upon making unprecedented efforts to increase food production.

The resolution goes on further, but that is the important part of it. This is the report of a statement that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) made to the live-stock men from the West. It is copied from the Globe of November 8, 1917:

Mr. Crerar assured his hearers that it was not the intention of the Government or the Militia Department to conscript men whose experience rendered their services more valuable on the farm than at the front.

On account of these requests to produce, from the Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada, from the Prime Minister of the Ontario and the leader of the Opposition in that legislature, and with this assurance given by the Minister of Agriculture, many of the farmers have made arrangements to produce greater crops than they have ever had before. I hold no brief for the farmers, because they have the same right to defend their country as the labouring men or any other class in the land; but this demand for men has come at seeding time, just when such a demand is most inopportune, if we want to produce the results which every hon. member is anxious to have produced. In my constituency there are a number of exceptional cases, for instance, where the son is the only man on the farm who can be depended upon to render effective service, or where the boy is the only son of a widowed mother, and the success of the farm depends upon him, or where a boy is the only one available for work on the farm, his parents being in poor health. I regret very much that there was not some exemption made in the regulations so that such men might be exempted. I hope from time to time, the Government, as these matters appear before them, will feel justified in making such exemptions as will meet the demand. I have perhaps spoken longer than I intended to do, but I wish to say this in conclusion. We may differ in this House as far as the Budget and other legislation are concerned, as to how it will bear on the weak or the strong, the rich or the poor. I was, however, extremely gratified the other day to meet an old friend of mine who had just returned from the front, having been honourably discharged. That gentleman said to me: "There is one thing, Mr. McCoig, you can depend upon, and that is that a man who is a private will receive in old England the same treatment and kind attention at the hands of the officials of the hospitals that a man of high standing will receive." He said: "I received a wound in the jaw, and I was compelled to go into a hospital in England. I was taken into the Duchess of Connaught's hospital on the Astor Estate. I had to have about half an inch removed from my lower jaw. That operation was prepared for, and I am glad to tell you that eminent physician, Col. Mewburn, was in charge of the hospital and took charge of my case, and he is a brother of Major-General Mewburn, the Minister of Militia. He gave me the same attention that I would have received had I been a colonel or a general. I am glad to tell you also that the Red Cross nurses extended their kind and sympathetic assistance." He said to me that, after he had been discharged, he went to the city of Detroit in which his brother was a practising physician, and there a number of American physicians examined his wound and pronounced the operation one of the greatest they had ever examined, and they commended and congratulated the officials of the British hospitals on the noble work they were doing. I am glad to be able to refer to this case, because I believe it is the desire of every member of this House to give every encouragement possible to that noble organization of Red Cross nurses who have rendered such great service from the beginning of the war up to the present time.

Mr. M. R. BLAKE (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, we are at war, and with the proverbial tenacity of the British bulldog, we are quite prepared to hang on until we have brought it to a successful termination. The big thing that confronts this Parliament, and which it was elected to deal with, is the prosecution of the war; how best that can be done is what should concern us to-day. We can well recall for a moment the old song:

We don't want to fight but by Jingo, if we do,
We've got the ships, we've got the men,
We've got the money too.

The determination of our boys to fight has been impressed upon the Hun more than once. There is probably no part of the line the Huns hate to attack more than the sector that is held by the Canadians. We have got the ships. The British navy is keeping the foe from our shores. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries in this House has told us that every shipyard in the land is occupied with a ship, and he promises to keep them all full; we are going to keep on building more and more ships. The hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) is somewhat afraid lest the United States will attain mercantile supremacy, but I say it is not within the bounds of possibility that this country should be possessed in the not far distant future of sufficient ships to carry her own lake and ocean tonnage. I believe we can do that, and probably just as well, if not better, with the present minister at the helm of the Marine and Fisheries Department than any one else we can find. As to men, we have a lot and are getting more. Our men are producing food, making munitions, and fighting the Huns. They are rushing to the colours so fast that the Minister of Militia and Defence is beginning to look somewhat grave from his increasing efforts day by day. It will not be very long before we shall have our five hundred thousand, and I am satisfied we shall have more than that.

I do not wish to drive any wedge between any of the parties in this House, but I do hope to be able to cement and bind together the two great parties probably a little better than they have been united heretofore. After all, Parliament unanimously consented to the prosecution of the war; there was a time when we were all united, and there is no reason why we should not be united now. We should not make other people's sins an excuse for our shortcomings, and that old saying applies equally well to provinces as to individuals. We have heard from the Minister of Militia and Defence the number of exemptions applied for in each province, and if the hon. members who in the early weeks of this session indulged in such fiery utterances, so much so that on one occasion the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) was inclined to regard it as throwing of mud. If they had exerted as much energy trying to remedy the conditions in their own provinces, they would have done more good than was accomplished by those exhibitions. First cast the mote out of your own eye before pointing out the mote in your neighbour's eye. Let me refer for a moment to last year's Hansard, page 5564, when Mr. McCraney, then the member for Saskatoon, was speaking of the very small concern the West had in the troubles of the East. He said:

> We were very much stirred up in Ontario and Quebec over the Manitoba School Question and on election day Manitoba was the only province that gave a majority for the Conservative Government . . . In 1905 I was in the West when the Northwest School Question was up under the terms of the Automony Act. We were not very much disturbed about it out there . . . . Most of the troubles that we get into in Western Canada are fomented in Ontario and Quebec; I am glad that we live 1,500 miles away from both of those provinces. Ontario and Quebec have fattened on their religious differences and racial strifes.

It reminds me of a report on the Irish trouble many years ago, and which I think is reported in D'Arcy McGee's history of Ireland. A commission was sent to Ireland to inquire into the cause of all the trouble, and after much consideration they came to this conclusion and reported, "We found them fighting like devils for conciliation's sake, and hating one another for the love of God." I think that is about the state of affairs we are coming to. What we want in Canada is a united people, and I am sure we are approaching that ideal in this Parliament. The fiery utterances are falling off and we are getting down to business. If we are ever going to make Canada the greatest country in the world, which I verily believe we have possibilities of doing, we shall not do it by fighting, but by a united effort. I verily believe that within the next ten years Manitoba will be the greatest gold and copper producing country in the world. The hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Mackie) claims that for Alberta. We shall have to wait and see. Winnipeg to-day is the greatest wheat market in the world. When I went to Manitoba ten years ago, before the boundaries were extended, if I remember rightly, only five per cent of the province was under cultivation. About five years after that the amount under cultivation in Saskatchewan was only equal to the road allowances; the fields were all untouched. When the West is producing twenty and probably thirty times as much as it is to-day, and with its minerals galore the Minister of Finance will have no trouble with trade balances; his only trouble will be how to get all the money in, and he will have to sit up at nights considering what is the highest rate of exchange he can conscientiously extract to settle these old scores of to-day when the rate of exchange is against us.

I had the pleasure of visiting Three Rivers last Sunday with the hon. member for that constituency (Mr. Bureau) and he told me his constituency runs back to James Bay, and that it was settled for about fifty-five miles back. In the last ten years, by his efforts, forty-two corporations have been brought into the constituency, five large pulp mills and two shipbuilding plants. The place is really going ahead at a great rate. In all fairness to the hon. member for Three Rivers, we must say that he has not been more pugilistically inclined this session than the average member, and if he continues to develop his constituency at the rate he has been keeping up for the last ten years, he will have a wonderful city and a wonderful constituency, and no time for fighting except for the rights of his constituents. I will not say that his city will rival Montreal, but with its great water powers and other great natural resources, it will develop into a city that will be of no mean proportions, and one that Canada may well be proud of. Every member will find sufficient to do working for the benefit of his constituency and for the good of his country at large without fighting on the floor of this House. The whole talk around this building for the last few days has been how rapidly the men are coming to the colours in the province of Quebec. I have not heard of any men in any of the other provinces lately falling over one another or breaking any legs in their rush to the colours. I think that every member of this House—I do not say of the Opposition, but every member of the House—who has declared himself, has expressed himself as being entirely in favour of the prosecution of this war and will be only too glad when it is terminated. I am satisfied that when every member goes out from this House, with probably a bigger and better determination than he has ever had before to encourage recruiting, the response to the call will surpass our expectations. The people of Quebec, I am satisfied, have too much pride to take any second place to any other province when it comes to doing their duty. I am sure that Colonel Lavergne would be only too pleased to lead a battalion, and I would urge the Minister of Militia to show his good faith towards Quebec by making such an offer at once and to-day. I feel convinced, from what I have heard, that it will be accepted. I spoke a few days ago regarding France and Britain waking up, and I prophesied that soon Canada would waken up. It looks to me as if Quebec ever alert had first heard the morning tap upon the door, was already quite awake, and was going on with the business of the war with a determination unequalled by that of any other province at the present time. I want now to make another prediction. It is that before this House of Parliament meets next year the province of Quebec will lead the way in recruiting and show forth more men than any other province of the Dominion will in the same time. They have not had more exemptions in Quebec than in some of the other provinces.

Then, I want to say one other word regarding the process of securing men. With reference to the call which the Government has made, and which takes in the agricultural class, I think the Minister of Militia and the Government will be well advised to call no more men from the farm where only one son is left. I know of one case in Manitoba, I think near Brandon, where there were four sons on the farm, all of military age, and from the Exemption Board all got exemption. I would call three of them, certainly, but I would say that one at least should be left on the farm. If a man owns his own farm and has no help, he should be left on the farm too. Production in that way could still be kept up, and by closing down non-essential industries, which were spoken of in a debate in this House a few days ago, the extra men could be secured to maintain the forces at the front. Not in a thousand years would these industries ever do anything in the slightest to help to win the war while the men on the farm can do much. I think the Government ought to give very serious and careful consideration to the question of handling these non-essential industries.

When we get the men we must have money to maintain them. The problem of money, like that of the poor, is always with us. That almighty dollar. How to procure sufficient money to prosecute the war is a question that has been considered by the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean). I consider that he did very well in his budget, but he did not go far enough. He is a very timid gentleman. I believe that every hon. member of this House is prepared to go farther, and would have gone farther, and I think the people were prepared for greater taxation, and would have readily submitted to it. Last year three-quarters of one per cent of the people were reached, and now the minister hopes to hit eight per cent of the people. But the minister is only getting started. The people are in favour of prosecuting the war and they are willing to help to pay for it. That is the essential point. Some very considerable number of the people need to be wakened up to the fact that we are at war by having their pockets touched by this taxation. If there are any who are not prepared to do their part, and to pay their money for the protection they are getting from our boys at the front, they are unworthy of this free country and they should be made to pay.

We have heard a great deal about war profiteering, and the Minister of Finance has turned his attention in that direction. But let us take the farmer. He is making a lot of money nowadays—wheat, $2.21 a bushel; pork, $20 to $21 a hundredweight; butter, 50 cents a pound, eggs, accordingly. How many of these men keep books and how many of them have an income of $3,000, which would be the limit for a married man, or even $2,000? Very few of them. Yet they are making money a great deal faster than they have ever made it before, and they are not being touched by this tax. I am satisfied they are able and willing to pay, I have not spoken to one who was not prepared to do his bit in helping the financing of this country. That must apply to every man who owns property. That perhaps does not apply to our western cities where real estate has had a great swing and where every man is holding ten, twenty, or thirty times as much land as he has any need for or can ever hope to utilize. There will be some hardship done under those circumstances if there is a direct tax imposed, but I would strongly urge the Minister of Finance to levy, through the municipalities a rate of say, five mills on the dollar, and in that way secure about $25,000,000 from this country. It is a debatable question whether it should be put on the land alone or put upon the land and buildings. A fact to be remembered in connection with the imposition of direct taxation of this kind is that the machinery is all intact to collect it. You can require the municipalities, when they are levying their own taxes, to levy five mills more, and turn it into the federal treasury. It is true that many of the cities are heavily taxed, but we cannot help that. That does not help the federal treasury, and that is what we are here to consider. Apparently the assessments in this country are so lacking in uniformity that it is impossible to get any very accurate knowledge concerning them. It is true that assessments in certain municipalities are very low while others are high, many being up to the full value of the land and three-quarters of the value of the buildings. Some represent half the real value of the property. It would be unequal taxation, but even an imposition of two mills this year would yield half that amount which I have named and that would be no small item. People who cannot go and fight should not hesitate to pay. If the people who stay at home gave up every dollar they make over and above what they need for a bare living and to pay interest, taxation and insurance, they would not be giving up too much. That is what the people may have to do yet—give up every dollar over and above a bare living, which would include interest, insurance and taxes. If the people had been asked to do that, they might, with some show of reason, make complaint; but as what they have really been asked to do is such a small thing it is up to the people of Canada to do their bit in this way. If they did this they would still retain their lives, their health and their property when the war is over; and yet all these are being risked by the boys who are at the front defending them to-day. The people who are staying at home are not risking their lives, and even if they did what is proposed, the discrepancy would still be very great and very much in their favour. Is there any hon. member of this House who would shirk his duty if he were called upon to stake so much? Not one, Sir. Then if the members of the House would agree to make that great sacrifice, and if the winning of the war depended upon it, surely the people of Canada also would—and I think I am safe in saying they would—be prepared to meet that sacrifice, terrible though it might be. Would even that be too high a price to pay for victory, for liberty and for freedom? I claim it would not. The soldier is working for a bare living for himself and his family and undergoing great hardships and privations. He is doing more than that, he is risking his life—and many of them have already laid down their lives. What they are putting into this war is the risk of their lives and a bare living. Under such circumstances should any one of our people who are staying at home in comfort offer one word of criticism of the war taxes which this Government is asking, except it be this: To some of them the taxation of war profits and large incomes may not seem sufficient. If some men have made five or six million dollars out of the manufacture of shells and munitions since the war began, they should be more heavily taxed, and the tax should be made retroactive so as to take a share of their profits from the beginning of the war. A man who had made five or six million dollars in this manner might reasonably give up one-half of those profits to the Government and still have enough to make him happy; in fact, he should be happier because he would not have so much money to look after. I think the taxation of large incomes should also receive more careful consideration from the Finance Minister and from the Government. When a man's private income reaches the limit of $50,000, in my opinion we would be perfectly justified in taxing him to a far greater extent than is here proposed. And he would not suffer any hardship thereby, because $50,000 is a fair sum to live upon.

If the people of this country are honest with themselves, honest to their God, and honest to their country and to the great cause for which we are fighting, they will acquit themselves like men, and nobly and smilingly carry out their duty. At the battle of Trafalgar Nelson hoisted the signal "England expects every man to do his duty." To-day Canada is displaying the same signal and calling upon every Canadian to do his duty. There was only one response when Nelson issued his order to his fleet, and there will be only one answer, I am convinced, to the call which Canada is making to-day. Canadians by coming smilingly forward and "dropping their nickel in the hat," as Kipling said, will be doing their duty and helping to maintain their freedom unimpaired. If all the profits were given up, which are subjected to taxation, in my opinion it would be a small thing in order to achieve victory. But if we fail to achieve victory, and if, in consequence, we should come under German domination, what would happen? Every man would pack his trunk and get across the line out of Canada, and every interest that he held here would be lost. It has been truly said by a distinguished member of this House that nothing matters but the winning of the war. That is how we should look at this question, and at any further levies of taxation which may be necessary before this struggle is finally ended. Canada is only now beginning to realize what was meant at the outset of the war when a declaration was made that we were going into this fight with every man and with every dollar. We have not yet yielded up the profits that are being made from day to day out of the war, let alone the last dollar. The pledge made was a serious one, but I think the people of this country are thoroughly determined to stand by it.

I feel, Sir, that we should to a greater extent pay our way as we go. Many a man in the wild and woolly West bought more property than he should have done. He did not pay for it at the time, which was bad business, and he is having his difficulties now. Our people should pay their way from year to year and not leave a legacy of debt to posterity, to their descendants in this country for years to come.

The Minister of Finance might have extended the scope of taxation in the matter of musical instruments so as to include pianos. The piano, like the talking machine, is pretty much of a luxury and might very well have been brought under taxation.

We have a tax on patent medicines, and the druggist who does a fair amount of business is kept busy licking stamps and applying them to bottles of Castoria for infants and to bottles of cough mixture for adults. I am not defending patent medicines, but there are some which a medical practitioner finds it necessary to recommend. For example, there is Castoria, which is just as useful and as much of a necessity as milk for the infant. I feel that there should be a tax on all business dealings. The dealer, when a man buys a suit of clothes, he might well be compelled to collect a tax of one per cent. In that way all commercial dealings would be reached. If it is a fair thing to get after the druggist—and the tax on patent medicines has proved to be a hardship in many cases because when a man is taken sick he should have recourse to good remedies, notably essence of pepsin—why not tax other dealers, why not tax the boot sales and the clothing sales? A tax of one per cent, or even one-half of one per cent, would yield an enormous revenue and would materially aid us in the policy of paying as we go.

The war profits tax should, I think, have been developed to a greater extent. In the case of a man who is conducting an ordinary business, who has no war contracts and is only making a reasonable profit, the income tax should be sufficient for him. But the man who is making money hand over fist out of munitions and war orders, the man who is making money out of the calamities of the nation, should be taxed to the extent of ninety or one hundred per cent. Undoubtedly in some cases his plant will only be scrapped when the war is over, but to meet that he can establish a sinking fund as he goes along, because he knows what will be the duration of his war contracts.

Now, as to the duty on farm implements. If a heavier tax were levied upon war profits the Government could, without difficulty, cut down the duty on agricultural implements by one-half and still leave the manufacturer a fair degree of protection. If I remember the figures, the sum of $987,000 was collected last year in duties on farming implements. If I am not right in that statement, the Acting Minister of Finance will correct me.

The amount realized was less than a million dollars. Half that amount could have been easily sacrificed with a slight increase in the tax on war profits. The reduction would have pleased the farmer; it would have increased production, and it would still have left the manufacturer on this side very well protected, even with the duty he has to pay on his imported raw material.

The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) in his speech last night urged the Minister of Finance to meet the trade balance by a greater increase in our exports of raw material. I think if that hon. member would have a talk with the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) the latter would tell him whether or not natural products should be sent out of this country unmanufactured. I am certain that the only way we can build up this country, despite our trade balance, is by sending out our goods manufactured; and when we have developed our natural resources, and are utilizing them to the fullest extent, then we will be in a position to talk free trade. I am a free trader, but I am not willing to commence to build up free trade until the country is in a position, as I see it, to adopt it. Iron is the big commodity that concerns the manufacturer most, and the Government would be well advised to pay very great attention to developing our natural resources required for the manufacture of iron. And when we manufacture sufficient iron to meet our own wants, and possibly some to export, and are able to compete with our friends across the line, then the manufacturer here will get his raw material at as good a price, if not a little better, than he can get it by purchasing it across the line. We will be in a position to talk free trade only after we have fully developed our natural resources. I do not say that the tariff might not be trimmed down somewhat. It might be an advantage if some lines were adjusted. But we did not come here to adjust the tariff; we came here to prosecute the war. I think this Budget as presented will be of much assistance; it would have been of even more assistance if we had made it just a little bit larger.

The member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) made a great plea that part of their profits should be left with the manufacturing corporations, so that these might extend their business after the war. How many of these corporations extend their business out of profits? When they make extensions, it is generally by means of offering bonds or selling more stock and getting in more capital; it is not done to any great extent by saving up their profits. I do not think that that matter is one to which the Minister of Finance should give very much consideration next year, because, as I said, if all profits were paid to the Government, and only a bare living allowed to everybody in this country, we would then be getting down to business, and even then we would not be paying as great a price as are the men at the front.

[Mr. Blake.]

Mr. ARTHUR TRAHAN (Nicolet): Mr. Speaker, I read some time ago a very interesting statement made in the British House of Commons by Mr. Andrew Bonar Law on November 23, 1914. He said:

> I wish at all events to make this clear protest, that it is the right not only of every member of this House but of every newspaper in this country, and of every speaker on any platform, if he honestly believes a member of the Government to be incompentent, or that he is not properly doing his work, to try to get rid of that member, even though his doing so does cause a weakening of confidence in the Government that is carrying on the war.

With that statement the Right Hon. Mr. McKenna agreed absolutely. This proposition laid down by Mr. Bonar Law is a perfectly sound one, and I give it my adhesion, because when in similar circumstances some members of the two great parties in this country individually coalesce to form a so-called Union Government there is more or less danger of abuses and corruption creeping in; and therefore it is more than necessary in the interests of the country to have a strong opposition party to watch them, to scrutinize their acts, and to exercise a general surveillance over them.

But, Sir, to scrutinize, verify and control the administration of the country does not involve the making of captious and useless criticism. It involves rather co-operation, and I sincerely believe this co-operation to be necessary. Ministers, although they may be able and perspicacious, do not verify everything themselves. This verification is generally done by their officers who are not infallible. And when these officers have made mistakes, do you not think, Sir, that, instead of trying to make amends for their faults, they will rather try to excuse their own errors. Consequently, the control of the administration by the representatives of the people must be added to the purely administrative control of the Government. Even if the ministers were able to see to everything for themselves, yet, as Mr. Bonar Law said in the speech referred to, they are human, and he continued:

5 p.m.

> If they find they are not criticised and that they can exercise powers of all kinds without being called to question, the powers grow and they become more and more inclined to be dictatorial.

They, as does the present Government, rule the country by ukases and Orders in Council, without consulting Parliament even when it is in session.

It is with the intention of faithfully serving my country, and of fulfilling my duties as a representative of the people, and of preventing, if possible, abuses of power, that I shall make some observations on the Budget now under consideration. Hon. gentlemen opposite may argue that the great outstanding issue is the winning of the war, that all other matters must be subordinated to that supreme task, and that therefore, criticism, verification, suggestions and scrutiny should be postponed until after the war. I respectfully submit, Sir, that there are occasions when we must prevent evils, which once perpetrated are incurable. Contracts badly or tardily concluded, errors in providing for clothing, ammunition, provisions; mistakes in the sanitary service, are evidenced by deaths which the most elaborate reports are unable to change into resurrections, and are the causes of disasters that the most eloquent speeches cannot transform into victories. We must prevent what is irreparable. The right hon. leader of the Opposition was, therefore, acting very patriotically when in the last Parliament, with the able aid of his followers—some of whom are now occupying the Treasury benches and will not, I am convinced, be bold enough to reproach us for our criticism—he vigorously denounced the war scandals and the nefarious financial policy of the Government.

Sir, the objection that all criticism should be postponed is unfounded. During time of war, as in time of peace, Parliament has a paramount duty as a legislative or controlling body. In England it has never been thought for a moment that Parliament should stand back during a tremendous crisis. On the contrary, it has always been held that a war should be conducted with the assistance of Parliament and of the nation; that every member of Parliament and every citizen has an absolute right to legitimate criticism, and that an arbitrary limitation of such criticism, to use the words of Mr. Bonar Law, "might be found to be detrimental to the real interests of the country and to the successful carrying on of the war."

I had opportunity as a member of the Quebec legislative assembly to express officially my views on the war in moving the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne on January 8, 1915. After giving in detail the generous subscriptions of the provincial government for the war, which at that time amounted to nearly $700,000, I said:

> Let the Government continue this policy which is completely in accordance with the aspirations of our people towards nobleness and justice, and this House will do right to vote all legitimate measures in order to help those whom we cherish and who fight for the triumph of liberty, right and humanity.

Having been since twice re-elected by acclamation in the county of Nicolet, I can truly say that this policy concerning the war has been heartily approved by my constituents.

I am desirous that the Allies shall be victorious and triumphant and that Canada shall do her part in this war, but I submit that our participation in the war must be proportionate to our resources, and be kept within just bounds. We all desire, Sir, to win the war; we differ only as to the method of participating in it. Why? I will try to explain that in a very few words, and to demonstrate that our viewpoint is based on the purest economic patriotism.

The striking feature of the Unionists, or Imperialists, is that they have a great regard for the British Empire generally. But one part of the British Empire they seem always to forget, and that is the Dominion of Canada, consisting of 8,000,000 people. Perhaps this is due to the fact that being new-comers in this country, although they admit no divided allegiance to Canada and her interests, they cannot deny that they have at least a divided affection as between the Old Country and the new. Such an affection, kept within reasonable limits is, I concede, right and creditable. On the other hand, we, who are by birth British Canadians, and have no divided affections, speaking of Canada, we are always proud to say: "This is my own, my native land."

Allow me to quote part of a speech delivered by Colonel Rankin during the Confederation debates, in which he describes well the nature of our feelings. Colonel Rankin then represented the county of Essex; he was in favour of confederation; and he said, on March 10, 1865:

> Even those who are adverse to the scheme have not been behind its greatest advocates in their declarations of attachment to British institutions and British rule on this continent. And I am not disposed to insinuate that there is a solitary member of this House who entertains sentiments of disloyalty to Great Britain. We all have a right to express our views, and in fact it is our duty to do so, since we are sent here to consider what is best for the interests of Canada first; for though we owe allegiance to England, Canada is our country, and has the strongest and best claims to our devotion. I, Sir, am not one of those Canadians who place the interests of England first, and hold those of Canada in secondary estimation.

These are the fundamental differences of mentality between the Imperialists and those who, though favouring the participation of Canada in the war, earnestly believe that we must not forget Canada's interests and Canada's future. The first are heartened by, perhaps, an exclusive military patriotism which is expressed by the policy of bankrupting Canada, spending her last dollar and sending the last man for the salvation of the Empire, thus putting British interests first and holding Canadian interests in secondary estimation. Against this policy I have protested and I now again protest against it strongly. If you have no men to cultivate the farms, what is the use of having farms to cultivate? If you have no men to finance industries what is the use of having industries? I repeat: We want victory for the Allies, but let us remember this: The war will come to an end, but Canada cannot die. We have, therefore, the paramount duty of looking after the interests of both with a great degree of concern. If we are not strictly obliged to unite them, we surely shall not divide them.

We have also the paramount duty to ensure, at all times, and especially during the war, the maintenance of the economic life of Canada. If we do not perform these duties, one of the consequences will be that the people of Canada, being neglected, sacrificed, will, sooner or later, energetically and strenuously insist on some regard being paid to their interests. Have the Government succeeded in maintaining the economic life of Canada? I regret to say that they have absolutely failed in this matter. This question raises many important problems, all of them closely connected. Some of these problems are preservation of credit, maintenance of labour and increase of production. Let us first consider the two last mentioned problems, which are of vital importance, not only for Canada but as aids in the winning of the war. It is useless to recall the innumerable utterances of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture in regard to increase of production. On April 6, 1918, the Montreal Daily Star, published a message from Lord Rhondda from which I quote the last sentence:

> The Canadian farmer and Canadian farmhand now have the opportunity to make an effective reply to the enemy's present onslaught, by bending their undivided energies to the increased production of those food supplies, for which we depend to such vital extent upon your great Dominion.

On April 12, 1918, there appeared in the Ottawa Journal-Press a significant cartoon. At the top we have this heading: "No wheat, no win." The cartoon is of a soldier speaking to a profusely perspiring farmer, and under the cartoon is to be read this sentence: "Mr. Farmer, thou art the man to win the war!" On April 29, there appeared in La Patrie the following message sent by Lord Rhondda: I translate:

> The British Food Minister cabled to the Food Bureau of Canada that the importations of wheat do not reach England in sufficient quantity to answer the weekly needs.
> Lord Rhondda adds: all effort that can be made in Canada to increase the expedition of wheat and meat shall be of an inestimable value.

What was the response of the Government to this appeal? How have they faced this situation? Their answer is contained in an Order in Council strengthening and making more drastic the Military Service Act, 1917. It is contained in the votes in this House by which they have refused exemption even to farmers.

The policy of compulsory military service, to which I was and am still unalterably opposed, is against the most elementary principles of economics, and it is, moreover, contrary, not only to Canadian welfare, but to the sacred cause of the Allies. Can one sincerely believe that the development of national wealth, the growth of population, and the cause of the Allies, will be greatly assisted by enforcing this law and by taking from workshops and farms the physical pick and intellectual flower of the nation? No, Sir, the result of such a policy will be a decrease of agricultural and industrial production, an increase in the cost of living, and above all, we shall, perhaps, have to face famine, and that will be the hardest blow given, not only to Canada, but to the Allies. We have an indication of that tendency to decrease production in the fact that, according to the Toronto Globe, Ontario farmers are, to an alarming extent, selling by auction their farms, agricultural implements and livestock. We cannot depend upon female labour to maintain our agricultural production. The example of France shows that this experiment has practically been a failure. Why then try such an experiment in Canada? Exclusive military patriotism constitutes, to my mind a dangerous fallacy. It must at all times, and especially under present conditions, be subordinated to and guided by economic patriotism, which alone can prevent famine in this and the Allied countries. It is imperative that we should adopt immediately a constructive policy for increased production in order that we may help the cause of the Allies and work for the development and progress of our beloved Canada. How long the war will last we do not know. What we do know is that we are faced with most serious difficulties as to the high cost of living, increased production, and the maintenance of the labour supply. These are vital problems which we have to solve, not after the war, but now. They must be solved immediately if we are sincere in our desire to protect the consumer and do our utmost to avoid famine and help to win the war. I always listen with deep interest to the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) and I heartily approved his sentiments when the other day he said:

> The longer the war is going to last, the more the problem must be grasped of raising all the magnificent amounts that can be raised from those boundless tracts of arable land that we have in Western Canada.

And I shall add, in all parts of Canada.

That is sound, economic patriotism and if we practise it boldly and fearlessly, we shall serve our country best by preventing production from falling off and the cost of living from increasing. It will be too late to postpone these questions until after the war. Famine might then have done its work in the ranks of our Allied armies; even to-day they may be in danger of losing the battle because of our indifference and fear in these matters.

I blame the Government for not having the courage to apply remedies at once to this disastrous situation as regards agriculture and the consumers of this country. I regret that instead of continuing to be the slaves of a military patriotism, which after all is unproductive, they have not become the warm and ardent protagonists of a sound and economic patriotism. I regret they have not adopted the wise suggestion of the hon. member for Red Deer for free food and free agricultural implements. I am in favour of free food and free agricultural implements, and I shall support any measure introduced on either side of the House which I believe to be for the financial, agricultural and consumers' interests of this country. Unfortunately the Government are precluded by their militaristic ideas from proposing and enforcing a great national reform, and in this matter I wholly and essentially dissent from their policy.

Has the Government been successful in preserving our credit? It seems to me that question must be answered in the negative. Our trade, it is true has increased considerably, but it has increased in value rather than in volume. It was merely derived from the very high prices of certain articles, and we must not forget that the payments made by the Government for supplies for the soldiers, transport, munitions and war expenditure generally, came out of money advanced by the banks largely contributed to maintain a fictitious affluence of available capital. To support my argument I invoke the authority of the acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean), who in his criticism of the Budget last year made this interesting statement:

> While, in a general way, these trade and revenue figures indicate a pleasing activity in the trade and economic affairs of our country, we must remember that they are largely artificial and do not represent a normal or healthy condition, a condition that will endure for long in this country. The high prices which prevail to-day alone account very largely for the increased total money value of our export and import trade.

This doctrine was also advocated, if I remember well, by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) who continually preached national and private economy as a palliative to that abnormal and irregular financing. But the best evidence that our financial credit is not so good as the value of our trade seems to indicate is furnished by the current rate of exchange, for when we have to pay $1,000 in New York we are obliged to send $1,020, and that condition is constantly growing worse. One of the reasons for this is our adverse trade balance with the United States, which was emphasized yesterday by the Acting Minister of Finance in his Budget speech, and the other reason is the fact that we cannot export gold. In fact, since the beginning of the war, we have exported no specie. Why? Because the Government have inconsistently increased our fiduciary circulation of Dominion notes without proportionately increasing our reserve of gold or specie. The following figures were given in answer to a question I put early in the session. At the outbreak of the war in 1914 our gold reserve in the hands of the Receiver General amounted to $97,136,426.88 and on March 1, 1918 to $120,005,662.45, an increase of $22,869,235.57. I would call the attention of the House to the following statement regarding the circulation of Dominion notes.

Circulation on February 28th, 1918	255,316,552 92
Increase	$142,522,819 64

If you compare these figures you will see that in August, 1914, for each dollar of Dominion notes we had a gold guarantee of 86 cents, and that in March, 1918, this gold guarantee was only 47 cents, thus showing a decrease of 39 per cent. We must not be surprised, then, if the current rate of exchange is so badly against us. The Government should cease to finance this country on paper. I warn them against the evils of such a policy. It will create further depreciation and economic tension. If they continue to increase this fiduciary circulation without adopting proper means to redeem it, they will make the trouble worse instead of better. I do not consider as sufficient the approved securities deposited to guarantee Dominion notes. We cannot sell them in the United States. We cannot even borrow there and pledge these securities as a guarantee. This shows that in financial matters there is no sentiment, passion or emotion. Interest alone guides the movement of money. This is the lesson of every past war, and this war is no exception to the rule.

We have also the fact that, according to the acting Minister of Finance himself, "We are borrowing too much and paying too little," and sometimes we borrow at rates which are certainly too high. I have endeavoured to study the public accounts. They are, I must confess, very complicated. I have found that the complexity of our public finance suggests anarchy and casts an impervious shadow on nearly all operations of the public service. Nevertheless, I venture to say that, up to March 31st, 1917, we have financed our war expenditures by loans only and not by taxation. This is a wrong policy. As was said by the acting Minister of Finance last year, "there should be more taxation and less borrowing." That is the English, or British, method. During the Boer war and the China expedition, from April 1st, 1899, to March 31st, 1902, the total war expenditure was £153,317,000, of which £108,046,000 was the product of loans and £45,271,000 the product of taxation, giving a percentage of nearly thirty per cent of the war expenditures paid out of taxation. For the year ended March 31st, 1918, if my calculations are correct, we have paid out of taxation hardly seven per cent of our war expenditure. Surely this is not sufficient. Whether the new proposed taxation will improve this condition time will tell.

May I be permitted to set forth briefly a resume showing the British war expenditures from April 1st, 1899, to March 31st, 1902, during the Boer War and the China Expedition, and indicating how the money was paid out:

Total war expenditure		£153,317,000
Paid by revenues derived from taxation:
Surplus, 1899-1900	£ 9,350,000
Suspension of sinking fund, 1900-01,1901-02	9,187,000
New taxes imposed in 1900-01, 1901-02 ..	26,749,000	45,271,000
By the proceeds of loans:
Treasury bonds ..	£13,000,000
War loan	29,519,000
Exchequer bonds	23,423,000
Consols on (60 millions)	42,104,000	108,046,000

When dealing with this matter, I must remark that the Government's answer that "under the Audit Act all public moneys and revenues form one consolidated revenue fund and expenditures are not earmarked against any source of revenue," is not satisfactory. If we want to know exactly our financial standing, this Government should be able, as in other countries, to state plainly and distinctly what amount has been paid in connection with war expenditure by means of (a) war taxes; (b) treasury bonds or treasury bills; (c) short term loans, (d) long term loans, and also if they have used, towards the expenses of war, funds from postal savings banks, insurance deposits, or other sums deposited with them for any purpose. I believe that our public book-keeping could be improved and that the Government should adopt proper means to attain that purpose.

Notwithstanding the fact that since the war began we have borrowed $950,000,000, and that our war expenditure was only $878,000,000, the Minister of Finance announces his intention to borrow again and again. He intends to borrow a further $280,000,000, not including such sums as are necessary in connection with our railways. Does he not think we are approaching the limit of our borrowing power? He should stand and say, as did Sir Michael Hicks Beach, in the British House of Commons, on April 18, 1901:

I never will be responsible for the fatal policy of paying the whole cost of the war out of loans without charging a reasonable amount to the taxpayers of the day.

Although I do not approve this policy of always borrowing, I hope the Government will realize in the transaction the following essential conditions: First, that they will undertake but the cheapest and most profitable loan; secondly, that they will adopt the most popular type of loan; and, thirdly, that they will realize the most important condition, and that is success. I also suggest that a clause concerning conversion be included in the bonds, and I express regret that such bonds have been exempted from taxation. The Budget should also fix annually the maximum amount of treasury bills to be issued by the Minister of Finance during the fiscal year. That is done everywhere else, and why should it not be done here?

As regards reduction in ordinary expenditure, the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) has to my mind fully demonstrated that as compared with the years for which the Liberal Administration is responsible, no substantial reductions have been made, but that, on the contrary, in various departments the ordinary expenditure is higher than it was when the Laurier Government was in power. I will not, therefore, deal with this branch of the question, but will simply, if you will allow me, Sir, make a humble suggestion:

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ARTHUR TRAHAN (Resuming): Mr. Speaker, in answer to a question put by me, the Government has said that it was not necessary at present to suspend during the continuance of the war the discretion it exercises in respect to the sinking fund on loans obtained prior to the commencement of hostilities. Yet the policy of temporarily suspending during war the discretionary sinking funds on previous loans is traditional in England. At the very beginning of the Boer War such a course was followed, and by that means nearly $70,000,000 was secured. This would be a very simple manner of reducing expenditure and of lessening the burden of taxation. It would also be advantageous to the country, because it is evidently inconsistent, on the one hand, to redeem debts bearing interest of 3 to 4 per cent, and, on the other hand, to create new debts at rates of interest from 5½ to 7 per cent, as has been done by this Government. In my humble opinion the Government should follow the example of England in the matter.

I have not much to say concerning the proposed new indirect taxation. I believe that the Budget proposals do not regard the best interests of national economy; they are contrary to the elementary principles of fiscal justice, and enlarge the doctrine, fashionable at the present time, that all indirect taxation should be taken off the rich and put upon the poor. To qualify its effects, I will quote the very words of the acting Minister of Finance in his speech in the Budget debate last year. Speaking of the supertax of 7½ per cent, he said:

> It adds to the cost of articles essential to life to-day; now oppressive in prices, thereby involving a great hardship to the masses of the people. And these are without any compensating advantage at all.

As to the income tax, I am pleased that it is increased. We must face the war expenditure, provide pensions for our soldiers, and provide also for their disembodiment and re-establishment in civil life. We shall be obliged to make an economic reorganization of the country, and to recuperate our finances. All these necessitate enormous sums of money, which gives to the rich the opportunity to invest their wealth. As was said by an old economist, "War is harvest time for capitalists." They benefit by it, they must pay for it; it is only justice. If the minister had made the rate of taxation higher still for the rich, I would have been more satisfied.

On the whole, Sir, this Budget looks peculiarly like the war menus prepared by the late food controller; it is too costly for the means of the people. Let me quote an extract which describes very well, I believe, our present situation. After giving some explanation of the Civil War, Mr. D'Arcy McGee, during the debates on confederation, proceeded to say:

> But it is not the revolution wrought in the minds of men of great intelligence that is most to be deplored, for the powerful will of such men may compel their thoughts back again to a philosophy of peace; no, it is the mercenary and military interests created under Mr. Lincoln which are represented, the former by an estimated governmental outlay of about $100,000,000, this year and the other by the 800,000 men whose blood is thus to be bought and paid for; by the armies out of uniform who prey upon the army; by the army of contractors who are to feed and clothe and arm the million; by that other army, the army of tax-collectors, who cover the land, seeing that no industry escapes unburthened, no possession unentered, no affection even, untaxed. Tax! tax! tax! is the cry from the rear! Blood! blood! blood!

is the cry from the front! Gold! gold! gold! is the chuckling undertone which comes up from the mushroom millionaires, well named a shoddy aristocracy. Nor do I think the army interest, the contracting interest, and the tax-gathering interest, the worst results that have grown out of this war. There is another and equally serious interest—the change that has come over the spirit, mind and principles of the people, that terrible change which has made war familiar and even attractive to them.

Well, Sir, we now have in our country all these cries, and the Government has answered each of them. By their military service law they try to satisfy those who cry "blood! blood! blood!" and as a consequence of this they are obliged themselves to cry "tax! tax! tax!" By their war scandals, their iniquitous railway transactions they have been very, very kind—to the detriment of the country—to the shoddy aristocracy who always want gold! gold! gold! Let us hope that soon that calamitous situation will end; let us hope that the people of this country will realize the unfathomable precipice to which the Government carries them.

We understand and share the sufferings of the people and desire with all our souls their early termination. We pray the Almighty to give to the world the benefits of a solid, profound and lasting peace which will be a permanent guarantee of safety, confidence, concord, harmony and progress for all civilized nations. Our earnest desire is that in every part of this our dear country will prevail the very noble sentiments expressed by the great Sir John A. Macdonald:

> We all feel the advantages we derive from our connection with England. So long as that alliance is maintained, we enjoy, under her protection, the privileges of constitutional liberty acording to the British system. We will enjoy here that which is the great test of constitutional freedom—we will have the rights of the minority respected. In all countries the rights of the majority take care of themselves, but it is only in countries like England, enjoying constitutional liberty, and safe from the tyranny of a single despot or of an unbridled democracy, that the rights of minorities are regarded.

If these ideals are realized; if the rights of minorities are regarded, protected, and safeguarded in every province of the Dominion, all racial and religious prejudices and appeals will disappear; we will have a real national unity; every race, every creed, every citizen will be faithful to Canada and her fortune, and will happily and enthusiastically endeavour to expand that faith in Canada which we should entertain, not only in the home, in each province and in the Dominion as a whole, but also throughout the entire world.

Mr. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, as a new-comer in this Parliament I should like to congratulate very heartily the acting Minister of Finance (Hon. A. K. Maclean) on his extraordinarily fine effort in his Budget speech of yesterday. Probably he has made mistakes in that speech, but the statement may be made without fear of contradiction that a Finance Minister who never makes mistakes never makes anything.

To pay taxes, Sir, is always abhorrent. I have no doubt that if you could find in this world a human being who pays taxes with pleasure, you would find at the same time a curiosity worthy of being put in the British museum. For example, I have no doubt that pork-packing baronets would rather literally live up to the dictum "to hell with profits" than pay those profits over in taxes to this financially hard-pressed Government. Hon. gentlemen preceding me who expressed the opinion that these taxes on food profiteers should be retroactive have touched a chord which will find a responsive ring in the hearts of most of the Canadian people. Sir, it is easier to criticise Budgets than to make better ones. I have no intention of engaging to-night in any criticism of this Budget; I leave that to hon. gentlemen who are better political economists than I am. I purpose dealing with a branch of the subject which has not yet been touched upon during the course of this discussion of the manner of raising revenues to meet Canada's great obligations. The subject with which I am going to deal has only a general application to the question of revenues, but if the matter is given proper attention by the Government the prosperity of the country will be increased and additional revenues will be indirectly produced. The subject of which I am going to speak is the greater development of the mineral resources of this country.

The principle of free trade is held by some hon. members on both sides of the House. I know, Sir, of one on each side of the House who holds that principle—the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) on your left and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) on your right. The principle of protection is held by many hon. members on both sides of the House, but there is one principle which I believe, is held by all the members of this House, and that is the principle of developing the prosperity of this country of ours. After this war is over raw materials will rule the world of commerce. Canada possesses those raw materials in great abundance, and to my mind, all that Canada needs is a national awakening to make her realize her great future, and to make her help to develop those great natural resources. There are hundreds of millions of tons of iron ore scattered from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from Nova Scotia and the other Maritime Provinces on the East to British Columbia on the West. In the Canada Year-book, of 1916-17, the author says:

So far no great beds of high grade ores have been found in Canada, but it must be noted that the supplies of high grade iron ores within the convenient reach of the blast furnaces of the great iron and steel making countries are now almost exhausted, and the low grade ores of Canada will not have to compete with them very long. In a paper read before the American Institute of Mining Engineers, Mr. James Galley says: There are vast deposits of magnetic iron ores in the United States and Canada that are too low in iron for use at the present time, but which can be mechanically concentrated into very rich material. The reclamation of these ore beds will add tremendously to the ore supplies of Canada and the United States.

At the Easter recess I went down to New York city, and in my hotel I offered, in payment of my hotel account, a Canadian $100 bank bill. I was charged $2 exchange on it. Before I had left this city I had visited my bankers here and asked for some American bills. They had none, and they told me that if they had had any, they would have to charge me one and a half to one and three-quarters per cent premium on those bills. I may say in passing that when I returned to Ottawa I had fifty or sixty dollars in American bills, and I offered them to the same bank, but the bank refused to buy them. In other words the banks will sell American bills at a premium to their depositors, but they refuse to buy them from their depositors. That is one of the methods by which the banks are able to pay large dividends. But the fact remains that the exchange between Canada and the United States is against us at the rate of 1½ to 1¾ per cent at the present time. The reason for that is because we import so heavily from the United States. The acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) quoted figures yesterday to show that we import nearly two dollar's worth of goods to one dollar's worth of goods that we export to the United States, and one of the heaviest imports is iron ore for use in our blast furnaces and steel plants. Last year we imported iron ore to the extent of 2,084,231 short tons, whereas of the Canadian ores we used only 92,065 tons, or about 4 per cent; that is four per cent of the iron ores used in the blast furnaces and steel plants of this country were of Canadian production. In 1916, the year previous, we imported 1,964,598 short tons and of Canadian ore we used only 221,773 short tons, or about 11 per cent. The percentage of Canadian ores used is getting less all the time. In 1896, it was 67 per cent of all the ore used in this country; in 1897 it was 49 per cent; in 1898 it was 42 per cent and it has kept decreasing until in 1909 it was 17 per cent; in 1916 it was 11 per cent and in 1917, only 4 per cent. In 1896, we imported from the United States 1,270 tons of iron ore and last year, twenty-two years later, we imported 2,084.231 tons, about 60 per cent of which came from United States and 40 per cent from Wabana, Newfoundland, or altogether nearly 2,000 times the amount we used in our steel plants and blast furnaces in 1896. Are we going to admit that the Almighty, in making this continent, put all the good iron ores on the southern side of the International boundary and all the poor iron ores on the northern side of the international boundary? I do not believe we should admit any such contention. I know the mining branch of the Government is not altogether optimistic as to the mineral deposits of this country, but I shall take the opportunity of quoting a few lines from some of the reports in which the writers are optimistic. On page 4 of volume "Iron Ore Occurrences in Canada," put out by the Mines Branch of Canada, the authors state:

In consideration of Canada's iron ore resources, a point that should not be lost sight of is that the total area comprised in the Dominion is very large and that much of it is practically unexplored so far as its iron ore possibilities are concerned. By reference to the general map at the end of the volume it will be seen that with very few exceptions all the known occurences are situated in the older and more or less settled and known districts. In the comparatively unexplored regions of the north large areas of iron bearing rocks occur at a number of points, but on account of their inaccessible location there is at the present time little to induce a thorough exploration of them in search for ore beds.

The authors also speak of the British Columbia deposits. By the way, a large deputation from British Columbia is in the city at the present time, asking for some assistance to the ore industry of that province. The authors, speaking of the British Columbia deposits, say:

There is little doubt also that active exploration would disclose many beds of iron ore at present unknown.

A little later on, speaking of northwestern Ontario, north of Lake Superior, they say:

> The most promising of the more accessible portions of the province have been pretty well gone over by the iron ore prospector, and the discovery of any large new ore beds in them is more likely to be made by the underground exploration and diamond drilling of known occurrences, rather than by ordinary surface prospecting.

This emphasizes the fact that the development of our ores would be very likely to bring forward heavy deposits of good iron ore.

In a report on examination of some iron ore deposits in the districts of Thunder Bay and Rainy river, Ontario, by F. Hille, mining engineer, also gotten out by the Department of Mines in 1908, Mr. Hille, after discussing the likelihood of the exhaustion of the immense iron ore deposits of the United States in the near future, says:

> Africa so far is an uncertain quantity and by the time that continent would be able to furnish any iron ore, this mineral will already be classed among the rare ones. Whence then can the deficiency be made up? The only possible source that I can see is Canada. The Province of Ontario alone contains immense deposits of ore scattered over a very large area, sufficient to furnish supply to the smelters both on this side and the other side of the International boundary for many years to come; although these ores to some extent consist of low grade magnetites it will not be long before the iron masters will be glad to get them at whatever price they are put upon the market.

A little later he says:

> These deposits are all situated in the Province of Ontario, but if an estimate were made of what is already known of the iron ore reserves throughout the whole Dominion, there can be little doubt that Canada would stand very high, if not first, among the nations of the world as a prospective iron producing country.

To any one who is interested in this subject, Mr. Hille's report would make interesting reading.

Sir, I believe that there are hundreds of millions of tons of iron ore scattered from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Along the north shore of lake Superior, along the Canadian Northern railway line east and west of Port Arthur and Fort William are immense iron deposits.

In reality we shall not know much of the real quantities of ore in Canada until further developmental work is done, as development will inevitably lead to a more thorough examination of deposits already known and the prospecting for others. This is what has happened in other iron-producing countries of the world.

[Mr. Manion.]

The rich ores of the American ranges on the south shore of lake Superior come into this country free. I am not arguing that we should put an embargo upon these American ores, but I do believe sincerely that by having a bounty on all Canadian ore used in the blast furnaces of Canada we could aid in the building up of a vast new industry in this country. I am told by capable mining engineers that ore with 33 per cent of iron is workable on a paying basis, and there have been hundreds of assays made from various properties with much higher percentages. Ores from the north shore of lake Superior run much heavier in iron than this percentage with very little foreign substance, some running as high as 60 per cent.

In this year's estimates, which we have been discussing in this House for some time, I note the following amounts allowed for different departments of this Government:

The Department of Mines.	$ 427,900.00
Immigration.	1,135,000.00
Mounted Police Department. . .	1,127,777.00
Dominion Lands and Parks. . .	2,531,645.00
Fisheries.	875,000.00
Penitentiaries.	991,600.00
Scientific institutions.	405,000.00

Every one of these departments, with the exception of the last, and I have chosen only the least important departments of the Government, is allowed two or more times the amount allowed for the Department of Mines; even the caring for our criminals costs over twice as much. Our country's expenditures are running four and five million dollars annually. With all this spending surely we can allow a couple of million dollars a year for the purpose of developing the mineral resources of the country.

Immigration at the present time is practically at a standstill compared with immigration into this country in the past, and yet the Department of Immigration is spending nearly three times the amount spent by the Department of Mines. I do not wish to be misconstrued as criticising the administration of the Department of Immigration or any other department. I simply wish to insist that as they are getting these generous allowances the Government should bring forward a constructive policy to develop the mineral resources of this country. The war is costing us four to five hundred million dollars annually. We voted five hundred million dollars for the war in this House only the other day, and I feel that we ought to spend two or three million dollars for the peaceful and prosperous development of the mineral resources of our country.

The other evening the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in discussing the fuel situation, dealt at some length with the process of briquetting which is going to be fostered by this Government in conjunction with the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. In almost the same breath he said he did not believe it was the duty of this Government to aid financially in the development of our mineral resources. I agree that we should help in the briquetting of lignites in the western provinces; it is a development of our natural resources. I also maintain that the Government should assist in the development of the mineral resources of this country. Canada's mineral production in 1915 was $137,109,171, in 1916 $176,357,454, and for 1917 the estimated amount is $192,982,837. The value of the fisheries product amounted, in 1915, to $31,264,631, and in 1916 to $35,860,708. In other words, you will find, on comparing those figures, that the fisheries brought in one-fifth the value of the minerals, and yet the cost of the fisheries was twice the amount spent on mineral development. The taxes of this country are increasing, and they are bound to continue to increase. There is only one method by which we can cut down the taxes per capita in this country, and that is by increasing our population. If we double our population we cut the per capita tax in two. Europe, excluding Russia, has an area only one-half the area of Canada; that includes England, Ireland, Scotland, France, Italy, Switzerland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Germany, Austria-Hungary, and every other country with the exception of Russia. Though that area is only half the area of Canada they have about three hundred millions of people. It seems to me, therefore, we have plenty of room for an increase in population, and I maintain that mineral development will increase our population. A hundred years ago the population of Canada and that of the United States were not very far apart in numbers, and yet to-day we have between seven and a half and eight million people while they have one hundred and ten millions, and it is partly due to the fact that we have been assisting them to develop their natural resources and build up their commerce instead of developing our own natural resources.

As soon as the war is over our soldiers will be returning to this country to the number of perhaps four hundred thousand. Those men have given up everything they possessed in life to fight for democracy as opposed to German autocracy. I used to believe two or three years ago that much that was said in the British Press and on the street and in this House in praise of our Canadian soldiers was to a certain extent flattery. But one day a little over a year ago I stood on the crest of Vimy Ridge and all around me as far as the eye could see lay a shell-devastated area which three or four hours before had been entirely in the hands of the Germans, but which at that moment was entirely in the hands of the Canadians. I realized then, and I am positive of it now, that Canadian soldiers are the equal of, if not superior to, any other soldiers on the western front. The reason I mention that is that those boys who have shown so nobly the qualities of which they are made, deserve the best of care when they return to this country. It is going to be a very great problem for this Government or whatever other Government may be in power at that time to look after those boys when they return, and I pity any Government which neglects that duty. Why should not this Government kill two birds with one stone by developing so far as it is able the mineral resources of this country? Build up a new industry, and at the same time provide employment for many of these boys when they return. I have heard it said by many hon. gentlemen and have seen it stated in the newspapers that many of these boys when they return will go on the farm. I venture to say that not more than one-fifth of them will go on the farm. I think that probably three hundred thousand or more of them will have to be given employment of some kind. It is very easy for us sitting here in this comfortable house, for in spite of all the complaints we hear, it is very much more comfortable than the trenches—to ask those boys to go and take up a farm twenty-five miles away from a railway, and to pioneer. I repeat, I do not think that more than one-fifth of the boys will go on the farm, and it is therefore our duty to provide employment for them on their return.

I might go on at great length and take up the question of the railways and point out that we have 1,300 miles of railway on three different lines between Ottawa and Winnipeg, and there are many people in this country, and I am one of them, who think there is at least one line too many through that territory; but we have these three lines of railway running through that unproductive territory. We have in this country altogether 40,000 miles of railway, or roughly speaking, one mile to every 190 or 200 people. The United States has one mile to every 400 people, Great Britain one mile to every 2,000 and Russia one mile to every 4,000 people. Our mileage exceeds the mileage of Great Britain with her 45,000,000 people, exceeds that of France with her 40,000,000 people, and equals the mileage of Germany with her 65,000,000 people. In other words, we have not the population to develop the traffic for these roads. The development of our minerals along the north shore of lake Superior, in British Columbia, in the Maritime Provinces and other parts of Canada, would develop a great amount of traffic for these railways. The people of this country are tired of paying out bounties to railways, tired of taking over defunct railways whose promoters have let them fall down after failing to make for themselves millions. We should develop some method of producing traffic for these roads, and to save this country from taking over these defunct railways whose promoters have decided they cannot carry them on any longer. In the United States 47 per cent of the traffic of their railways comes from the mines. One of the greatest assets any people can have is faith in themselves. Let us have faith in ourselves and help develop our mineral resources.

A number of different methods have been proposed. I am now speaking particularly of iron. The first method is by putting a duty on iron ore coming from the United States. I am not advocating protection, because I do not think at the present, or at any time probably, it would be a wise thing to put up a barrier against the iron and steel industry and block trade coming through its natural channels. The second proposal is that the Government might build a large steel plant in this country, but I do not think the Government is in a financial position to do that. The third proposal is that the Government might guarantee the bonds of a private corporation, but this Government and many of the provincial governments, have had a good deal of experience in guaranteeing bonds, so I do not think the people of this country would be enamoured of that idea. The fourth proposal is that they might guarantee the dividends of the bonds of a private company, but that is in the same category as the last. The fifth proposal is that the Government might pay a bounty of so much per ton on all iron ore produced from Canadian mines and smelted in Canada. That proposition appears to be the most reasonable and the least dangerous to any government. Until the ore was mined there would be no bounty to pay. At the present time we are only mining a couple of hundred thousand tons a year or less, so it would amount to very little on the present output of the mines. We should not have to pay at all events until the iron ore was forthcoming, and if it was not forthcoming no bounty would have to be paid.

I believe, Sir, that a deputation from British Columbia is advocating the paying of a bounty upon steel produced from Canadian iron ore. I believe that the true way of nourishing this industry is to pay a bounty on the iron ores themselves, that is nourish the root of the commercial tree.

Canada has paid bounties in the past. Away back in 1895 or 1896 she paid bounties on iron and steel and she was able to build up vast industries in that way, but, unfortunately, in building up those industries, she used the iron resources of the United States. We do not build up the commercial prosperity of our own country in that way. Then we have paid bounties on fisheries and on oil production. My hon. friend from Shelbourne and Queens (Mr. Fielding), speaking to me the other day, mentioned that the fisheries bounties were paid out of moneys which we received from the award in the fisheries arbitration between United States and Canada. We have paid fairly heavy silver lead bounties on the silver lead ores of British Columbia. By these bounties we have developed a wonderful silver lead industry in British Columbia. The other evening, when discussing the question of fuel, it was pointed out that there was paid about 50 cents per ton on all coal imported into this country with the exception of anthracite. That amounts to some millions of dollars per annum. That 50 cents per ton paid by the people, mostly of central Canada, upon the coal that they bring in from Pennsylvania is virtually a bounty paid to the coal producers in the East and the West. I am not objecting to it at all; if we can afford to pay bounties in that way, we can also afford to pay bounties on iron ore produced from our own iron mines. Any duty paid in this country on materials which are produced in the country is practically a bounty to the producers of that article. To-day no bounty is being paid by the Dominion Government for the development of the iron ores of this country. I believe that British Columbia pays some bounties upon ore produced in that province but the Dominion Government does not pay any bounty of that kind. We have in Canada twenty blast furnaces, but only fourteen of them were in use in 1916 and 1917. By the payment of a bounty, or possibly by some other method of encouragement, it appears to me that we might encourage the working of all these furnaces and the construction of others. In 1900 the production of pig iron in Canada was 96,575 tons; in 1916 the production had grown to 1,169,257 tons; an increase of twelve times, but most of this was made from imported ores. A bounty on Canadians ores would develop our iron resources, and in any case the money is paid only as the iron is produced.

The other evening my hon. friend, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in a very able manner, outlined to the House the shipbuilding programme of this Government and he and the Government deserve the most cordial congratulations of the House and the country on the development of this vast industry. Shipbuilding we should have in this country but it should be accompanied by the development of our own iron resources to supply the steel necessary for those ships. There is a shortage of steel in every plant using steel in this country. I happened to have an interview the other day with the War Trades Board and I was informed that it was almost impossible to get steel from the United States. To establish the shipbuilding industry in this country it is necessary to have a constant and adequate supply of steel and the way to develop our own steel industries is to develop our own iron mines. Canada is the world's second largest silver producer and produces copper in great quantities, as well as gold, lead, zinc, nickle and iron. By increasing our iron production we will build up our own commerce, railways, steamship lines and general prosperity instead of those of the United States.

The objection might be made that we require coal for smelting purposes and that Canada does not possess this coal. It is true that coal for the central portion of Canada comes over very cheaply by water frieght from Pennsylvania, but at any rate we have in this country the possibility of electric smelting. There are two great sources of energy in any country—coal and water power. Coal is exhaustible but water power is one of the few things that you can go on using for all time without exhausting the supply. Last year there were in Canada 54 electric smelters with a capacity of 173,000 tons of iron and steel. The British Forgings plant at Toronto has 10 electric smelters with a total capacity of 72,000 tons per annum, making it the largest electric process steel plant in the world. Canada has 18,000,000 h.p. of electricity in its water-powers. Of this only one-tenth has been developed, so that our water powers may probably solve the question of fuel shortage for the smelters that we will have if we take advantage of our possibilities.

There is in medicine what we sometimes call a vicious circle. One bad symptom reacts upon another bad symptom, and, reacting one upon the other, a vicious circle is formed. By developing our mineral resources we would aid in developing our water-powers, and that in turn would aid in developing our mineral resources, so forming what I might term a virtuous circle.

The United States Steel Corporation controls the price of iron ore in this country, as they have immense iron deposits, their own railway lines, steamship lines and all subsidiary plants. They have been talking for 10 years about establishing an immense plant at Ojibway, near Windsor, but they have never built that plant. Every time that any one in Canada proposes to develop our own iron resources the United States Steel company threatens to build a plant in order to scare our own Canadian people from going ahead. By proper assistance the Government of Canada can develop these resources and attract capital to them. These Ontario steel plants have been getting their ore from the United States and you cannot get capital to invest in the development of our own iron mines when ore of such good quality can be got so cheaply from the United States. If you will look, Sir, over the commercial development of any of the great commercial countries of the world—England, the United States, Germany, or France—you will find that their commercial development was directly in proportion to their production of pig iron and steel. Germany, in 1870, took Alsace-Lorraine from France for the purpose of obtaining the iron fields of that territory, and I venture to say she will never willingly give up Alsace-Lorraine, as she obtains three-quarters of her iron ore from that territory. She increased her steel production twelve times in the quarter of a century immediately preceding this war. The United States increased her steel production thirteen times in the same period and England's output increased only two and a half times, and all the members of this House know that the United States and Germany were rapidly forging in advance among the commercial nations of the world. The United States, Great Britain, Germany and France are the great iron producers of the world and are also the leaders in commercial progress. Iron and steel are necessary basic elements of commercial progress. If we do not develop our resources we are lacking in progressive and aggressive commercial qualities. Boards of trade, legislatures of different provinces, and mining conventions have passed resolutions, and the press has presented arguments in favour of the Government of Canada taking a hand in the development of our iron ore resources. Just the other day I cut out from a western trade journal, the Grain and Trade News, the following editorial:

> At the present time there is no diminution of consumption of iron and steel in sight, and in face of the fact that we have the raw material in undoubted quantities we are amply justified in seeking public assistance to establish this country in the one business aside from agriculture that will enable us to meet the demands for interest and principal caused by expenditures made on account of the war.

I respectfully lay this suggestion before this Government for its serious consideration. As to my mind it is one of the possible methods by which we may increase our prosperity, produce a market for our agricultural products, give employment to our returned soldiers, develop freight revenue for our over-developed railway systems, and generally help to give this great Dominion the propulsive power to place it, after the war, among the advancing commercial countries of the world.

Mr. PAMPHILE REAL DuTREMBLAY (Laurier-Outremont): Mr. Speaker, we listened with great pleasure yesterday to the able speech delivered by the Acting Minister of Finance, and I must congratulate him upon the manner in which he discharged his duty, because he had a hard and ungrateful task to perform, to submit in some presentable form the difficult financial statement of Canada. The financial position of this country is not flourishing, nor does it give any cause for rejoicing, I therefore expected to hear from the Acting Finance Minister some proposition that would tend to alleviate in some degree the conditions of the masses in this country. I am sorry to say, however, that the only measure proposed in the Budget Speech was the imposition of still heavier taxes and still heavier burdens on the people.

The Acting Finance Minister estimated that for the fiscal year 1918-1919 we should be able to meet our ordinary and capital expenditure out of revenue, and have, as in the past two years, an appreciable sum over, which we could apply to war purposes. I cannot agree, Mr. Speaker, with that anticipation, because I do not think there will be any surplus left out of revenue when all the expenses for the current year are paid. The estimates submitted to the House call for a vote of $252,000,000. In addition the Minister of Railways a short time ago asked for a vote of $50,000,000 with which to purchase rolling stock for the Government railway system, and in doing so asked for authority to expend an equivalent sum annually until a year or two after the war had terminated. We also know that the Government has purchased, or acquired, certain railways in Canada, the revenues from which will not be sufficient to meet the outlays, and the deficit from which the Government will have to make good. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) figured this amount at $10,000,000 per annum, and probably at the end of the present year we shall have to face a still larger deficit. No doubt, the Minister of Railways will say that the $50,000,000 should be charged to capital account, but I cannot concur in that contention because the annual depreciation of rolling stock which has to be made good every year is so large that in all probability for many years to come the $50,000,000 in question will be required to be expended by the Government. Now if we total the three items which I have enumerated it will yield the huge sum of $317,000,000. In order to meet this immense sum what revenue is there available? The Acting Minister of Finance has told us that he hopes this year to realize a revenue of $270,000,000, which will leave a deficit of about $47,000,000, to meet which we must have recourse to borrowing. Therefore, of what avail have been all the sacrifices of the people of Canada? For some years past, especially since the outbreak of the war, heavy taxes, including direct taxes, have been levied upon the people. We are now paying duties on cheques, stamp duties and various other forms of taxes, and the Government still comes forward with fresh impositions. The people have heretofore cheerfully paid them in the belief that the revenue thus derived would be expended for war purposes, but they will be sorry to learn, after all their sacrifices, that the large sums of money taken from them in the form of fresh taxation are devoted to meeting the internal expenses of the country, and that not a cent from all these taxes is going directly towards war purposes.

And what is the financial situation of Canada to-day? We have voted at the request of the Prime Minister the very large sum of $500,000,000. We did so after stating our objections, but the responsibility for the expenditure of this money rests upon the Government. Canada will be called upon at some time or other to finance the purchases of England in this country, which will, in all probability, approximate $350,000,000, of supplies of food and munitions of war. Taking all these facts into consideration, if my figures are correct, and I think they are, we shall have to provide this year sums reaching the enormous total of $1,167,000,000, and not as the Acting Finance Minister states, $980,000,000.

I am sorry to differ with the figures of the hon. minister. Therefore, Sir, the deficit of this country including current expenses and war purposes will amount to about $467,000,000, which sum will have to be found by the Minister of Finance.

Why are we in such a poor financial position to-day? I do not hesitate to say that it is on account of the extravagance practiced by this and the previous Government since 1911. It was conclusively proved last night by my hon. friend (Mr. McMaster) that we could have saved each year since 1911 about thirty million dollars. If the business of the country had been properly carried on, therefore, we would have had a few hundred million dollars to our credit for the pressing needs of to-day. What will the Government be compelled to do now? As has been pointed out, they cannot borrow in the United States or in England. They will have to go again to the Canadian people probably this fall to borrow half a billion dollars. I was somewhat astounded yesterday and this afternoon to hear the Acting Minister of Finance and other hon. gentlemen opposite glorify the success of these loans. These loans have been many times over-subscribed by the people, as stated by hon. gentlemen. That is a proof that there was a lot of money in this country, I admit. It is also a proof of the patriotism of our people. But it is not a proof of the business acumen of the Government. Why? Because the fact that these loans have been oversubscribed prove that it was easy to obtain the money, and that the Government could have obtained these loans at smaller rates of interest than they are paying. The Government has been making rapprochements with the United States. But the people of the United States are receiving only three and one-half per cent interest on the money they have loaned to their Government, while this Government is paying five per cent and over on the Victory Loan, and it also paid a large sum for commission, and spent a lot of money for advertising. Consequently the floating of the loan has cost the country a great deal. These loans are for periods of ten, fifteen and twenty years. If you make up the difference of one and a half per cent between the interest paid by the United States and the interest paid by the Canadian Government, say for fifteen years on $700,000,000, it represents the sum of $157,500,000 that will be paid by the Canadian people to the subscribers to these loans. If I have any suggestion to make to the Minister of Finance it is that, instead of proposing in the future, possibly, to impose a tax on these loans, he should offer the coming loan at three and a half per cent, as was done in the United States.

As I said at the commencement of my remarks, I had hoped that the Government would offer some proposal to relieve the high cost of living. Some time ago, the Government appointed a commission to diminish the consumption of foodstuffs in Canada. That is not sufficient. In countries like Australia and New Zealand, not to mention England, the boards appointed have authority to fix the price of foodstuffs. In Australia, especially, the Board of Food Control has had such success that in certain necessaries of life, such as flour, the price paid to-day is less than before the war. Requests to fix prices of foodstuffs were made some time ago by the representatives of organized labour, when they assembled in the city of Ottawa, and the Women's Conference, if I am not mistaken, made a similar request to the Minister of Labour. The people generally are asking the Government to do something along that line. To-day, I received the last issue of the Labour Gazette, which shows how the cost of living is increasing. Details are given showing the amount necessary to maintain a small family, and it appears that in the month of March, 1914, $7.68 a week was required for the maintenance of a small family budget, which increased in February last to $12.54, and in March to $12.65, representing an increase of nearly one hundred per cent since 1914. I submit that the income of the labouring man has not by any means increased one hundred per cent. Under the Act passed a short time ago the Government have power to appoint one or two ministers. I suggest that a Minister of Food Control be appointed, with power to investigate this matter, to examine witnesses, to confer with wholesalers, to fix the price of foodstuffs and thus help the people.

What else could be done to diminish the high cost of living? This Government could help the farmers, could help agriculture, in many ways. Hon. gentlemen who have spoken in this debate have suggested that foods coming from the United States should be allowed into Canada free of duty, thus not only enabling consumers to obtain these foods at lower prices, but preventing the packers of Canada from controlling the market as they do at present. I realize that it is a difficult problem to increase farm production. If the Government send all available men to the other side; if they continue to refuse to listen to the good advice of the British Food Controller; if they do not grasp thoroughly the position of the country, the increase in the price of foodstuffs will continue.

During the last election I told my electors that I was against conscription. I represent a constituency which bears the name of Laurier-Outremont, in the city of Montreal. This riding consists half English-speaking and half French-speaking people, and I am glad to say that I received the support of the majority of the English-speaking men voters in my constituency and of the French-speaking people. I am still against the principle of conscription because I think we could by other means help the Allies and this country more than we are doing to-day. Therefore I hope the the Government will appoint a commission whose duty it will be to investigate and report what steps should be taken to decrease the cost of living.

As to the taxes imposed by this new legislation, the revenue to be obtained is fair enough, though there is certain injustice; the new provisions will not fall upon all with equal fairness. The taxes upon tea and tobacco should not have been increased. But, as I said at the beginning, all these taxes would be received, I would not say with pleasure, but at least without any murmurings, if the people were confident that the moneys received through the imposition of these taxes would be devoted to the carrying on of the war. But the more money this Government have, the more they spend for carrying on the business of the country, and that condition is not satisfactory to the people of Canada.

The member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) told us that during the war the Government did not intend to change the tariff; or at least that before doing so they would consider the matter carefully. I quite understand that those who like high tariffs and those who are profiteers do not approve any proposed change of tariffs which protect the manufacturers to the detriment of the people. But I submit that the Government should now prepare for the conditions which will prevail after the war. What steps is the Government taking to look after our people when the war is over? I understood that a commission was to be appointed to go to Europe with a view to finding out what we could sell to Europe after the war. As you know, Sir, those countries which have been devastated by the war will need many things that Canada can supply. This market will belong to the country that is the first to go out after it. We can supply wood, steel and many other materials. Nothing, however, has been done. We know that after the war, there will probably be stagnation in many industries in this country, and that probably thousands upon thousands of our labouring men will not have employment. We on this side of the House some weeks ago suggested that the Government should appoint a commission to look into this matter and should seek to encourage technical education in this country so as to give our workmen the necessary skill, thereby relieving us of the necessity of looking to other countries for skilled labour. We have technical schools at the present time in certain provinces. We have in the city of Montreal a technical school which gives great assistance to the labouring people of the province of Quebec. Why should the Federal Government not grant subsidies to those technical schools? All these are measures that we would like to have seen provided for in the budget, but I am sorry to say that we did not see any hope held out in that direction. There was nothing to help the people, but only more taxes and still more taxes, the money received from which will be spent not only in the prosecution of the war but in carrying on the ordinary affairs of the country. We on this side of the House are anxious to help the Government in carrying on the war, but we want the Government to act in accordance with the resources of the country. I trust it will not be forgotten, as it was well said this afternoon, that we are first of all Canadians, and that we shall always, above all things, be Canadians.

Mr. JOHN FLAWS REID (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, as a new member, I crave the indulgence of the House. The first and greatest need is the recruiting and training of men to send overseas to back up our brave soldiers at the front. I am prepared to support this Government in every measure that will forward the prosecution of the war, and my address to-night will be along the lines of greater production.

The great need of Canada is farm production. The great need of the Empire and her Allies is foodstuffs. Canada cannot render better service to the Empire or make a better contribution towards winning the war than by increasing farm production. The Empire needs food for her men on all the battlefronts and a larger supply of foodstuffs to maintain her armies of industrials. The armies and citizens of her Allies are also calling for more food. The Empire and her Allies are willing to pay us enhanced prices—a double incentive—patriotism and profit. Canada needs an increase of farm production to meet financial obligations already incurred as well as to maintain her armies now fighting side by side with the Empire's soldiers. No commodity enters so much into the commercial life of the nation as does the product of the farm, and no other commodity contributes so much towards the maintenance of its transportation companies, financial institutions, commercial and industrial undertakings. Hence we see the importance of encouraging farm operations. This self-evident proposition has been recognized by all interests as manifested by the amount of exhortation given to farmers by all classes of the community. The press, the pulpit, the professions, commercial and financial institutions have indulged in a display of their patriotism by imploring farmers to increase production. No matter how anxious the farmers may be to help the Empire, no matter how keen they are to raise crops while high prices obtain, unless they are provided with the means of production their operations will be limited. It is encouraging to note that our Governments are alive to this fact. If we are to meet our obligation in the matter of farm production, something more than exhortation has to be undertaken.

Deprived largely of man-power, the best substitute farmers can secure is an ample supply of modern machinery. The Federal Government recognized this fact, and to help meet the case removed customs duties off tractor engines for a year, thus placing this help within the reach of many farmers. They also entered into arrangements to supply a large number of farmers with tractor engines at cost. Of course, there is no misunderstanding the Government's intentions in this regard. They want to supply tractor engines at a price a larger number of farmers can afford to pay and operate at a profit. If it is a good thing to remove the duty from tractor engines as a war measure to encourage production which only affects a comparatively few farmers, how much better service could we render to the Empire and Canada if the Government would remove the duty from all farm implements, as a war measure? Of the two hundred thousand farmers in the prairie provinces, probably not more than fifty thousand can purchase and operate tractor engines, all the rest of them require the latest improved farm implements so as to increase their efficiency and productive power, and nearly the whole of them are prepared to buy improved machinery, could it be purchased at reasonable prices. I know many farmers in western Canada who, early in the season and before prices for farm machinery were fixed, gave orders for new and larger implements, such as seed drills, but who cancelled their orders when they learned what the price was to be. Farmers who were using a 16 shoe drill wanted to purchase a 20 or 22 shoe drill, thus increasing the working power of a man 25 per cent in seeding. The same thing applies to harrows, ploughs, etc. Many farmers who have an extra colt or two ready to put to work would use a 6 or 8 horse team in place of a 4 horse team, and the 2 horse farmers would use 4 horses, but they are prevented from thus increasing their effective power by the excessive cost of machinery. Increased factory cost and war tax have increased the duty more than double. For instance, in 1914, the duty on a 20 shoe seed drill was $12.90, this year it is $32. Add to that the profit of the dealer, and the cost on account of customs duty would be $40. Eight dollars and thirty-six cents duty was imposed on a 12-inch two bottom gang plough in 1914, this year it is $19.60. A triple gang plough carried a duty of $13.50 in 1914, and to-day it is $32.65, and so on all along the line.

Those who know the needs of agriculture and the limit that will be placed on production by the lack of farm labour are convinced that the expansion of production can be brought about more by placing modern farm implements at the disposal of farmers at a reasonable rate, and that it will contribute more to increase production than any other one thing the Government can do.

While there are many farmers in the prairie provinces who realized very satisfactory results from the operations of the farm during the last three years, there are many whose operations have not yielded more than a bare living. For instance. the provincial government reports indicate that in all centre and southern Manitoba the average yield of wheat for the last crop was around nine bushels an acre. A great many did not get the cost of production. This also applied to large areas in Saskatchewan.

The annual conventions of the three provincial grain growers' associations strongly urged the placing of farming implements at once on the free list, as a war measure. The business interests of the country towns and villages are joining with the farmers in this demand. Their knowledge of farm needs acquired by close proximity has convinced them that farmers must be supplied with the latest machinery, that the loss to them of man power due to the war can in a large measure be offset by the use of modern and improved farm implements. As business men acquainted with the situation they recognize that the loss of revenue to the Government through removal of custom duties from farm implements would be small compared to the advantage the country would secure by the efficiency and increasing capacity on the farm due to ample machinery of the right class and type. Many farmers are now supplied with all the implements of production needed for efficiency. The bulk of farmers, however, are not so situated.

It is easy to conceive that supplying farmers with farm machinery at the price that would rule were the duty immediately removed might easily increase the capacity for production, and the improvement of cultivation that would follow would result in an increased production of at least 5 per cent for 1918 and a larger increase for 1919.

We are all urged to make sacrifices for the sake of the Empire and to win the war. We are all urged to do "our bit." Cannot the Government submit to a small loss of revenue, and the few others who might be affected adversely by the removing of duties from farm implements submit to a reduction in profits in an effort to increase the farm production of Canada which all agree is so greatly needed by five to ten per cent?

Again, Sir, many of our returned soldiers are anxious to go back on to the land to make homes for themselves and their families. Is it right that our Canadian manufacturers should be allowed to tax our brave heroes who have risked their lives at the front for the protection of our Empire and for the cause of liberty, civilization, and democracy, and who now return to us suffering from shell-shock, and nervous wrecks? It is up to the manufacturers of agricultural implements to go "over the top" like men, with organized agriculture, and to ask our Government to remove the tariff on implements as a war measure, and thereby help in the great drive for greater production. Then thousands of souls now almost starving for the lack of bread would bless the generous action of our Canadian manufacturers whose chances of entering the realms of eternal bliss would thereby be greatly enhanced, if not assured. Let us remember, "even a cup of cold water, etc."

While there was nothing in the Budget speech about a reduction in the tariff, I have here the customs tariff of 1907, revised up to 1914, and find in it a provision whereby the Government can by Order in Council remove the duty on implements as a war measure, and I am sure if such a measure came before the House it would receive the unanimous support of hon. members.

The hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn) suggested the appointment of a tariff commission. On behalf of the western organized farmers, I welcome the suggestion, provided the organized farmers have a representative on the commission—something we have not had in the past.

One thing more, Mr. Speaker. I wish to draw to the attention of our Government the loyalty of our western farmers in subscribing to the Victory bonds last fall. Many of them put every surplus dollar they could gather up into Government bonds, with the understanding that our chartered banks would loan them money to finance their business until the crop of 1918 came in, and to-day hundreds of our farmers are paying our chartered banks eight and ten per cent for moneys to finance their business until the fall, the banks deducting the interest from the principal. That is, when a farmer asks for a loan of one hundred dollars, he is handed out not one hundred dollars but ninety-two dollars, and in many cases only ninety dollars, for which he signs a note in full for one hundred dollars. The small borrower is nearly always hardest hit.

This, I understand, Mr. Speaker, is for the purpose of evading the law and compelling the borrower to become a party to the agreement. I feel that it is the duty of our Government to bring in legislation to effectively stop this pernicious system prevailing in banking practice.

Mr. JOSEPH READ (Prince, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure you and the House that if the hon. gentleman who has just sat down will move an amendment to the Budget resolutions for free agricultural implements he will have the unanimous suport of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. Before entering on the principal question I intend to discuss, which is more or less a concrete one, I want to congratulate the Acting Minister of Finance on his concise and splendid presentation of the Budget. The only mistake in it, apart from taxing the poor man's tea and tobacco, is that he did not go far enough. At least two hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have said that this was not an opportune time to discuss tariff questions. Mr. Speaker, if ever there was an opportune time for a Government to tackle the tariff it is now, when both classes are incorporated in the Government, the high-tariff and the low-tariff men. Surely there is enough judgment among them to get together and arrive at a compromise that will commend itself to both sides of the House so that this question of tariff reform can be put out of politics. Now is their opportunity.

Mr. McKENZIE: There was a marriage settlement.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Some of them deny that, but if there was such a marriage settlement, it is time to go to the divorce court. There is one other point which I wish to discuss. While I know that the Government is composed of different shades of politics in regard to the tariff question, it appears to me that there are members in it who are afflicted with what I would call cerebral embolism; that is some trouble in the brain that gives them the power to hypnotize the whole cabinet. The other evening the Government showed that it is a Government of hysteria. The last Order in Council doing away with the principle of selective conscription showed to the whole country and to the hon. gentlemen themselves that they were acting under the impulse of hysteria when they passed it without making any qualification whatever with reference to young men between twenty and twenty-three who are the owners, occupiers and tillers of farms all over Canada. I have had letters and telegrams by the dozen from men in that position and their friends. I just received a letter this afternoon from a gentleman who occupied in the local legislature the honourable position that you, Mr. Speaker, occupy here as the first commoner, the Hon. John Agnew. This gentleman has a son at the front, he has a son on the farm twenty-two years of age and he has another son near nineteen years of age who is willing to take his brother's place at the front. I went to the Militia Department about this—I did not go to the minister himself because I did not want to ask the minister to go against the law laid down by this peculiar Order in Council.

The writer of this letter says:

> I wrote you a few days ago in reference to the exemption of Sandy—

I might say that the Hon. John Agnew, late Speaker of Prince Edward Island, is an old country Scotchman whose loyalty nobody can impugn.

Mr. LEMIEUX: A good Scotchman.

Mr. READ: A good Scotchman, a good Britisher and a good Canadian, and not all old countrymen are that when they come out here.

> I enclose a clipping of General Mewburn's speech at Toronto in which he said that only Simon-pure farmers would be exempted.

In the name of common sense why should they pass an Order in Council contradicting the speech of the Minister of Militia and Defence at Toronto delivered only a few days before, in which he said that Simon-pure farmers would not be taken off the land. In the little island of Prince Edward alone there will be 150 of the best farms in Canada untilled this year unless the Government take some method of putting a stop to the enforcement of this iniquitous measure.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to have to call the hon. genleman to order but it is not in order for him to discuss a measure which has already been passed by this House during the present session.

Mr. READ: What would that measure be?

Mr. SPEAKER: The Order in Council was agreed to by this House and it is not in order for the hon. gentleman to call a measure "iniquitous" after it has been passed.

Mr. READ: It was only the action that I was speaking about, not the measure.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is equally out of order in that statement. He is not in order in discussing that measure at this stage.

Mr. READ: We will leave that out. I suppose I may read the letter?

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the letter is calling in question the action of this House with respect to Military Service?

Mr. READ: No, it is not.

Mr. SPEAKER: If that were its effect, it would not be in order for the hon. gentleman to pursue the reading of the letter.

Mr. READ: It is not protesting against the Act. You may read it and see what it says.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman had better continue his speech.

Mr. READ: The gentleman who sent me the letter is complaining that the last Order in Council is going to work a very great hardship to the farming community to the province of Prince Edward Island, and I state further that it is going to create a great deal of hardship all over Canada. The gentleman who writes that letter asks me to advise the Government that conditions are such that if they continue in the course which they have been pursuing it will produce a rebellion in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. gentleman will not attempt to pursue that subject further. I have already ruled that it is not in order to discuss the question of the Order in Council.

Mr. READ: All right, Sir. Referring again to the question of the tariff, an hon. gentleman last evening made the statement that the Liberal Government had not made reductions in the same proportion as the Conservatives had made during their regime. That may be true, because there was not so much room. Speaking for myself, I want to give my position to the House so that it will understand what I mean. I am a Canadian free trader to start with, not an old country free trader. I believe in the principle of free trade as applied to Canada, and it should be applied to Canada in the just sense—in the commonsense way if you like. English free trade has been the proper policy for Great Britain, but we must not forget that Great Britain was the most highly protected country in the world prior to its adoption of free trade. English free trade is not applicable to this country. The free trade that is applicable to this country should be based upon the principle laid down by the Liberal party in its platform of 1893. We will come to that again. I want to read over the tariff reductions that were made by the Liberals in 1896. They are as follows:

Article.	Conservative Tariff.	Liberal Tariff.
Indian Corn Meal.....	70½%	Free.
Rape Seed, sowing....	10 %	Free.
Seed Beans (Great Britain).	15c. bush.	Free.
Binder Twine.....	12½%	Free.

I want to make a little digression with regard to binder twine. Our friends of the Conservative party went throughout the length and breadth of Canada in 1896 and after declaring that the removal of the twelve and a half per cent ad valorem duty on binder twine had caused the price of binder twine to advance. That was the kind of chestnut they repeated all over Canada. It was an election dodge pure and simple. They tried to persuade the people that because the Laurier Government took the duty off binder twine they had put certain factories out of business and consequently sent up the price of binder twine. The price did go up that time but the removal of the duty was not responsible for the advance. Let me illustrate to you how the advance in the price of binder twine occurred. In the month of March I was master of a ship in the port of Mobile, Alabama. I bought a coil of manilla rope there and paid eleven and a quarter cents a pound for it. From Mobile I went to Buenos Ayres and entered that harbour on the very day that Admiral Dewey smashed the Spanish fleet in Manilla, that is making allowance for the six or seven hours' difference in time between the two places. I discharged my cargo and on returning to Mobile, about a month and a half later, went ashore to buy another coil of rope, and found the price had advanced to twenty-two and a half cents; it had gone up one hundred per cent in the meantime. What had the Canadian Government to do with the price of manilla rope going up in Mobile, Alabama? The price of binder twine had advanced, and why? Because the United States had gone to war with Spain, and the Manilla islands, in which practically all the manilla fibre was produced that went at that time into the making of binder twine, belonged to Spain. When the war was over the representatives of the two belligerent nations went to Paris to negotiate a treaty, and if you remember—any of you who are as old as I am will remember—Uncle Sam, having conquered Spain, paid the Spanish government $20,000,000 for the Phillipine Islands. Now Uncle Sam does not pay any such sum as that for nothing: The United States put an embargo on the export of manilla fibre to any other country than their own, and accordingly the price of binder twine went up. It was not because the Laurier Government had taken the duty off binder twine but by reason of conditions that were altogether extraneous and outside of Canada. Yet Conservatives went all through Canada presenting to our poor innocent farmers the chestnut that the taking of the duty off the article had made the price go higher.

To continue my enumeration:

ARTICLE	Conservative	Liberal Tariff
		British Preferential Tariff.	Intermediate Tariff.	General Tariff.
Books on the application of Science to Industries of all kinds	6c. per lb.	Free	Free	Free
Books for the use of Mechanics' Institutes, Libraries of Universities, Colleges or Schools	6c. per lb.	Free	Free	Free
Cream Separators	27½%	Free	Free	Free
Barbed Fencing Wire of iron or steel	2½c. per lb.	Free	Free	Free
Galvanized Wire, iron or steel, 9, 12 and 13 guage	25%	Free	Free	Free
Wire fencing, woven wire fencing of iron or steel	27½%	10%	12½%	15%
Wire of all kinds, n.o.p.	25%	15%	17½%	20%
Ferment Cultures for Butter-making	Rates varying from 20% upwards	Free	Free	Free Agricultural Implements.
Farm, Road or Field Rollers	35%	15%	22½%	25%
Forks, pronged	35%	15%	20%	22½%
Hay Tedders	35%	15%	22½%	25%
Hay Loaders	35%	15%	22½%	25%
Potato Diggers	35%	15%	22½%	25%
Hoes	35%	15%	20%	22½%

Now in order not to tire the House by going over all these items, I would suggest that they be placed on Hansard for the information of the public. I will read over the other articles without enumerating the figures, because there is nothing that grates so much upon people's minds as a lot of figures that are not taken into consideration in a concrete way.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not in order to put anything on Hansard which is not read in the House.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: Very well, Mr. Speaker, I will continue the enumeration: Pumps, locks, nails (wire, of all kinds), butts and hinges, sleighs, coal (bituminous), coal oil, lubricating oil (composed wholly or in part of petroleum), candles, common and colourless window glass, cotton duck—all a large reduction. Grey cotton fabrics, a large reduction. Cotton shirts, costing more than $3 per dozen, a large reduction. On cotton sewing thread, cotton fabrics (undyed), socks and stockings, blankets, woollen socks and stockings, undershirts and drawers, woollen cloth, flannels (plain), wheat flour, rice (cleaned), oranges, wall paper, head ropes for fishermen, refined cotton seed oil for canning fish, and a considerable number of other items, a very considerable reduction under the Liberals. But there were a great many Liberals, especially in our section of the country, who, through ignorance on trade matters, went so far as to talk of Free Trade as it is in England. As I stated on a former occasion, Free Trade as it is in England is not applicable to Canada, but there are certain things along tariff lines that the Government should take hold of and correct. There is no better time for them to do it and to do it correctly and in such a way that it should please at any rate the greatest number of people in Canada. Surely the Government can take the duties off foodstuffs, for example, seeing that they have already made wheat free. There are other articles in respect of which they should take action, because we do not want to see this Government defeated.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: At the present juncture I do not want to see them defeated; I want to see them punished, and punished well.

I believe that crime and punishment grow out of the same stem, that they are inseparable, and I believe that at any rate some hon. gentlemen on the other side will suffer remorse, regret and shame to an extent that I am satisfied—and I believe I speak for most of the members on this side of the House—they would rather not have to suffer. You know what Robert Burns said with regard to remorse:

Of all the numerous ills that hurt our peace,
That press the soul, and wring the mind with anguish
Beyond comparison the worst are those Which to our folly and our guilt we owe.
In every other circumstance the mind has this to say,
"It was no fault of mine."
But when to all the evil of misfortune
This sting is added,
Blame thy foolish self.

Let me paraphrase:

Or worser far the pangs of keen remorse
The torturing, gnawing consciousness of guilt,
Of guilt, perhaps, where we have involved others
The old, the noble, who have loved us
Nay, more that very love the cause of ruin,
Oh, burning hell, in all thy store of torments
There is not a keener lash.

And so some of my hon. friends opposite will have to suffer that remorse, because I am satisfied that they are entitled to suffer it according to the laws of nature.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make myself a little more plain upon this tariff question. There are certain things in Canada on which it is perfectly proper to impose a duty, not necessarily in the way of protection as such, but sometimes as protection, when it is justified, or when it is a matter of reprisal. I will give a case in point. I have here a letter, written by my son, a young gentleman who lives in British Columbia. And I want to say, in justification for speaking upon subjects outside of my own province and connected with British Columbia, that I am nearly as much interested in that province as I am in Prince Edward Island, for there are nearly as many Prince Edward Islanders in British Columbia as there are at home, and the same is true of the other western provinces. Their schools are filled with them; their colleges and universities are jammed with them; their public officers, doctors, lawyers, even some of their representatives in this House are from Prince Edward Island. So that we in Prince Edward Island are interested in the province of British Columbia directly as well as from the standpoint of Canadians. Every man in this House represents more than his own constituency; he represents the interest of Canada as a whole, his own constituency first, perhaps; his province, in the exercise of that virtue which we call civism; his country in that virtue which we call patriotism; and the Empire in that virtue which we call Laurier Imperialism. The letter referred to reads:

Dear Father,

Mr. Caldwell is going to Ottawa to see if he can get some kind of justice for the mine operations in British Columbia.

He was down here the other day.

We have a monopoly here in the shape of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, subsidiary of the C.P.R., which has the Standard Oil backed off the map—

He seems to be a chip off the old block, doesn't he?

—and their monopoly is made possible by the existing Canadian laws. There is a 5 per cent duty on lead and zinc ores going into the United States, while there is no duty on this side. Again at the present time the Canadian price for lead is $35 a ton higher than the New York market. The result is that the Consolidated, the only smelter here, brings ore in cheap from the States and sells it $35 a ton higher than the United States market price, besides getting their rake-off from smelting. Then they tell us they do not want our ore, and as a result the whole mining business in B.C. is on the bum. What we want is reciprocity in the future, and at the present a duty put on American ore equivalent to their duty on our ore.

That is proper protection; that is proper Canadian free trade—fair trade.

There has been talk about a committee being named to investigate smelter charges. Well, whatever one is named, the Consolidated will put it all over them, because there are very few mining operators in British Columbia who are not in their employ, or who dare find any fault with them. The only plan that would be any good would be a Royal Commission where any one could go before them and volunteer evidence, like what happened to Sir Joseph Flavelle. Any other solution of the difficulty would be a delusion and a snare and worse than nothing. At the present time the smelter can put any mine in the Kootenay district out of business just by refusing to take their ore, any mine management that doesn't suit them, and they do it whenever it suits them, that is what they do, and then the management have to come crawling on their knees to the smelter, for they can't produce here and pay the long haul and the American duty on top of their smelting charges. Besides, we are sure, although it cannot be proven, that the smelters on both sides of the line stand together.

Another combine.

The smelter can refuse a mine's ore, cause it to close down, and then buy it up at sherriff's sale for a song, for no one else would dare bid against them, and if they did they would have a white elephant on their hands. Unless something is done to curb this monopoly, we may as well pack up and get out of British Columbia.

Now, that is a serious condition of things, all for the sake of putting 5 per cent duty on American lead ore when they put 5 per cent against ours. So you see that it is not necessary to impose duties on everything coming into this country or to impose all kinds of protection in order to be a genuine Canadian free trader, which I claim to be.

The principal subject with which I wish to deal to-night is one of which I gave notice on the Order Paper in the form of a resolution in favour of the removal of the duties on potatoes and vegetables to the end that we should have a reciprocal market with the United States. The reciprocity agreement of 1911 still stands on the United States statute book. When we take the duty off certain articles imported into Canada from the United States, as the Government did by Order in Council with respect to wheat, we get free access to the markets of the United States for that product, and the time is now opportune for the removal of the duty on potatoes and other vegetables, especially potatoes.

The potato is quite a modern field product. Germany's fighting force to-day is based upon potatoes. During several years before this war broke out the Germans were producing nearly as many potatoes as all the rest of the world put together; some years as many as 2,000,000,000 bushels, while big Canada—not little Canada,—was producing from 60,000,000 to 80,000,000 bushels. Now, 2,000,000,000 bushels is an inconceivable quantity, Mr. Speaker, unless you get down to concrete figuring and estimate how many cars they would fill or how many ships they would load. Potatoes have been food to the Germans; potatoes have enabled them to increase and multiply and replenish the earth. A few evenings ago I pointed out the natural law—this is very serious,—that the generative forces of mankind will always go on until they reach the limit of subsistence. We have evidence of that in the tribes which inhabited North America before it was discovered by Cabot and Columbus. Why did this great continent not become peopled by three or four hundred million Indians? Simply because they were continually pressing up against the limit of subsistence; because they knew nothing of pastoral life or of agriculture; and their limit of subsistence was the extent of their supply of wild animals and fish. When the Micmacs increased until they reached the limits of their preserves, they fought the Mohawks; the Mohawks fought the Iroquois, the Iroquois the Blackfeet, the Blackfeet the Crees, the Crees the Algonquins, and so on—internecine warfare, always fighting to widen the limit of their subsistence. When the white man came here he brought not only smallpox and other pox, but tuberculosis as well, from which the Indian tribes were not immune. People who are not exposed to diseases are susceptible to new diseases. Physicians in the House—and there are a number of them—know that an antitoxin is created in the human system when one is exposed to disease, and that antitoxin in the course of time causes the man to be immune from infection. You have an illustration of that in the case of tuberculosis. All members of this House have lived among tuberculosis patients at one time or another; yet they did not get it, for judging by their looks I should say that few hon. gentlemen here to-night are troubled with tuberculosis. I mention this matter only to show why the Indian population decrease since the whites came.

The introduction of the potato into Ireland by the friends of Sir Walter Raleigh a few hundred years ago had a marked effect on the population of that country. In 1846 the population of Ireland had increased to 9,000,000; to-day it is a paltry 4,000,000 or thereabouts. What happened in 1846? Potato blight. What happened then? Famine. What happened then? Emigration—and the population of Ireland has been decreasing ever since. Late in the century before last, when a famine was threatened in Scotland, the people of that country went to Ireland for potatoes, and relieved the famine. To-day the potato is recognized as the surest, the most certain and the most efficacious relief from the famine conditions which are, without doubt, facing the world. What follows famine? Pestilence, invariably, and pestilence and famine are ten thousand times worse than war. When a man is fighting he is thrilled by the glory of it; he is alive and happy; but famine—the child tugging at the dry breasts of his mother—think of it! This is a condition that the Government should take cognizance of as imminent.

It is possible for us to increase our potato production almost indefinitely—especially in Prince Edward Island, if we are given transportation facilities and a market. When I say, give us a market, I say give us a market to the south of us. I said to the Food Controller the other day: What is the basis upon which you gentlemen are working with regard to the markets of the United States? He said: We are working on the basis of a common bread basket. I said: What about a common potato basket? He said: Well, it ought to be that, too. I told him that I would see the Government and ask them to make a common potato basket. In the press the other day I saw a letter from one of the boys at the front, who referred to Prince Edward Island as "Spud Island." They call it "Spud Island" sometimes. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that the sobriquet "bluenose," as applied to the Nova Scotian, the New Brunswicker, and the Prince Edward Islander, originated in Prince Edward Island, and comes from the potato? In the latter part of the seventeenth century schooners were running from the little port which is now called Summerside down to Boston with our blue potatoes—Chenangoes, as they were called in the United States, McIntyres, as we call them, Calicoes, as they call them in Nova Scotia. These potatoes were taken to Boston every fall and were used largely in the hotels. Their flavour is excellent; the Prince Edward Island McIntyre is the best potato in the world. One day a hotel keeper saw an Island captain coming up the street towards the hotel and he exclaimed "Here comes Captain Bluenose." A newspaper man was present and fixed the sobriquet on all colonials—such is the power of the press.

I understand the people of Ontario are not accustomed to them, to the Prince Edward Island McIntyre. They do not understand them because they do not know how to cook them. It takes one-third more time to cook a McIntyre potato than to cook those white and red potatoes that are served at our hotel tables. But the McIntyre potato has a flavour. It has a pungent odour. Most people have to acquire a taste for a tomato, and the same thing is true in regard to the Prince Edward Island McIntyre potato. But once you learn its virtues, once you get that flavour, once you acquire that taste, you will not give a white or a red potato stomach room. So in the city of Halifax, which has been one of our great markets, in the city of Sydney, in the city of St. John's, Newfoundland, from the first of November, when telegrams come in ordering potatoes, and up to July, every telegram says: "Mind, nothing but Blues," or "Nothing but Calicoes," or "Nothing but McIntyre's." The people of those cities would not give the white or the red potato stomach room. They use the white and the red potatoes for their early potatoes. The white and red potatoes come in early, and they are used by our own people up to about November 1, but after that our pigs will scarcely eat white and red potatoes.

[Mr. Read.]

The question before the House is this: Is the Government justified in taking the duty off potatoes and vegetables? The only potatoes that are imported into Canada from the United States, which is now our only outside source of supply, come into Canada when we have none of our own. You have been fooling the farmers for the last forty years, or since whatever time it was that the so-called protective tariff came into force, by persuading them that you were protecting them against what? Was a duty on potatoes coming into Canada a protection? It is like putting a mill-dam above the source of the mill-stream. Our farmers do not want that kind of protection. We are protected by nature. Canada can produce 200 bushels of potatoes to the acre, while the average production per acre in the United States is only eighty bushels. What follows from mathematical necessity? It follows that because we can produce more than twice as much on an acre of land as can be produced on an acre of land in the United States, the people of the United States have to take our potatoes whether they will or not. We do not want protection because nature is on our side, and if you drive our nature with a fork, she will come running back. You have been fooling the farmer by pretending you were putting a duty on potatoes to protect them. You have not protected them at all; you have been doing just the reverse. More than that have you been protecting your manufacturers by putting a duty on potatoes? Just the reverse. You have been increasing the price of potatoes to the consumer, and thereby increasing the living wage, and increasing the living wage means that your manufacturers have to pay more wages, and consequently they cannot compete in the markets of the world. I think that is absolutely clear. You are, therefore, not only not protecting the farmers but not protecting the manufacturers. You are doing the very opposite; you are defrauding both. You are doing ten thousand times worse than that. That abominable barrier between us and the United States in the matter of potatoes has often absorbed twice the cost of production in waste, in smoke going up from those engines to feed the god of mammon in burnt offerings. In my capacity as manager of the firm of which I am a member I have shipped to British Columbia potatoes in 5,000 bushel lots, and we were paying 63 cents a bushel freight. The people of British Columbia could have got potatoes in Washington and thereby saved the bulk of that freight. If the duty had been removed, I could have shipped my potatoes to Boston and saved fifty cents on every bushel of potatoes, and that is more than twice the cost of production. From Prince Edward Island I have shipped potatoes into Fernie, Nelson, Tabor, Edmonton, in fact, into all the large and small cities and towns of the great West, and even to the Yukon, when those people could have secured their potatoes from the state of Washington, had there not been an abominable duty that prevented any such trade and any calls for trade. By simply making a reciprocal agreement in the matter of customs, we could save more than twice the cost of production on potatoes. In the name of common sense why should this Government stand for a tariff that wastes in unnecessary transportation costs the whole cost of production of a supreme article of food? The freight rate from Ogdensburg, N.Y., to Ottawa is only 10½ cents per hundred pounds; the freight rate from Summerside to Ottawa is 38 cents, and the freight rate from Summerside to Boston is only 21 cents. You could save the whole difference between the 10½ cents and the 38 cents on a carload of potatoes shipped to the city of Ottawa. I sold five carloads of Prince Edward Island potatoes to-day in Toronto.

I am speaking upon a subject about which I know absolutely everything. I was brought up on a farm. I have planted potatoes; I have dug potatoes; I have eaten potatoes, and I have carried potatoes into all parts of the world. For the last eighteen years I have been one of the largest dealers of potatoes in Canada. I did not come here simply to feather my own nest, because it is only a question of a very few years until I shall be out of business. I am looking after the interest of my own province, the interest of the Maritime Provinces and the interest of Canada as a whole. I want to appeal to the intelligence of hon. members from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Agriculture has been destroyed in the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia on account of their juxtaposition to Prince Edward Island. The potato growers of Prince Edward Island, up to last year and this year when the price of potatoes rose on account of war conditions, were because of the high tariff in the United States—the United States was charging us 25 cents a bushel duty on potatoes going into that country thrown entirely upon Halifax, Sydney, St. John, Amherst and other local markets. In Prince Edward Island we can raise potatoes 50 per cent cheaper than in any other part of Canada; I make that statement on my reputation as a business man and as a member of the House of Commons. We have a light friable soil; you cannot get a stone to throw at a dog for a mile; it is the red soil, too, the best soil for growing potatoes. Then we are surrounded with seaweed, which is rich in potash, and potash is pre-eminently the manurial element necessary for a large production of potatoes. All you have to do is to tickle the soil and it will grow potatoes. The potatoes in our province are dug by women and children with their fingers; that will give you an idea of how easy it is to raise potatoes down there, and how it was that Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were put out of the business. In the counties of Pictou, Halifax, Antigonish and Cape Breton you can see splendid vacant farms by the hundreds; the farmers dare not raise anything, for the first thing that would happen would be that Prince Edward Island potatoes would be coming in and selling for twenty-five cents a bushel, and they could not produce them for that. Think it over, hon. gentlemen from New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and see if I am not correct. You never knew what was the matter with you, but I am telling you now. What I say is an actual fact. I know it from living and moving around in those three provinces and taking note of what I saw.

There is no reason why, up to now, Prince Edward Island has not been able to find a market for its potatoes. In 1912 our people insanely turned down the reciprocity agreement. They had better sense, I know, but they were stampeded for political purposes. Unfortunately, there is too much of this ambition on the part of our public men to get into office by playing politics. Ambition! The sin by which the angels fell! Cut it out. We have now got the connecting link between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. Mr. Underwood, who took part of the duty off potatoes—I speak of him in a collective sense; I do not mean to say he was the whole United States, but he was the leader of the great Democratic party—Mr. Underwood made one mistake. He should have taken the whole duty off, and then I would not be standing here to-night imploring hon. gentlemen from the West and from Ontario for justice to my little province. You have free wheat, and why in the name of common sense don't you give us free potatoes? When the Kingston Board of Trade wrote to the Summerside Board of Trade a few years ago and asked us to assist them in getting the canals made free, I was a member of the Summerside Board of Trade and was appointed a committee of one to answer that letter. I sent them a letter in reply, which they afterwards brought up in this House and had published with a red border round it, pointing out the national benefit it would be to Canada to have the canals free, and urging the members from the Maritime Provinces to support the proposal notwithstanding it was against our local interests in a certain sense. We were making free to the western provinces one hundred million dollars' worth of canals without a whimper. Heavens! If we can do that, cannot you western men allow this Government to take the duty off potatoes, which only amounts to $80,000 a year? Give us a free market in the United States for potatoes and vegetables, and in six years' time instead of producing seven million bushels of potatoes we will produce twenty millions, and instead of one car ferry we shall need three to convey our products across the Straits of Northumberland. We have the brightest little province and the most fertile piece of land in the Dominon of Canada, but we have been bled white for forty years by the octopus of Canada. Sir Robert Borden came down there during one election and promised us a car ferry. He aimed at an end that was quite aside from the public good, but the act has rearranged itself by an irresistible magnetism in a line with the poles of righteousness. We have our car ferry, and it is an absolute success, but what we want is some work for it to do. Let the Government start immediately to standardize our railroad, because the necessity exists. Famine is staring the people in the face. Justice is crying out to be done Nemesis the god of retribution, will be after you if you do not do your duties right.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Springfield): It is not my intention to discuss the Budget as delivered so gracefully and so ably by my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean). I could have wished the taxes upon incomes had been a little larger, very considerably larger, if not double, in fact, in the case of large incomes, but perhaps that will come later.

As a westerner, I should also have liked to see the duty entirely removed from agricultural implements. However, I am not complaining of that at all. I have been contending for the last twenty-five or thirty years for free agricultural implements, but up to the present time we have been disappointed. I recognize, however, that there was a compact and an understanding between the two parties when they joined together last year to form a Union Government that the war was the paramount issue and that the tariff should remain in abeyance until after the war.

I loyally acquiesce in and accept that situation, and offer no criticism or complaint because of the Budget as announced. I take it that the Liberal and Conservative statesmen who constitute this Government have done the best they could under the circumstances. But I quite recognize that the people of Canada are very critical with regard to the Government, that they are watching them from day to day with the greatest care, and probably expecting from them much more than they will be able to concede. My hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance announced that the Government would be obliged to rely upon the Canadian people in future for the money required to carry on the war. He said that all the money that would be necessary must be obtained from the people. I want to point out that inasmuch as that is entirely the case, the people have come forward and are contributing very magnanimously, almost nobly, of their money for the purpose of carrying on the war. They are, however, very critical, and they will expect this Government to exercise the very greatest economy. They might under the circumstances go so far as to expect even parsimony on the part of the Government. The figures of expenditure for carrying on the war are undoubtedly appalling, and, no doubt, will appal the country. But these expenditures seem to be necessary. The people, as evidenced by their almost unanimous vote in favour of the late union of the Liberal and Conservative parties for the purpose of carrying on the war, are behind this war, and they expect the Government to practise the strictest economy in carrying it on.

I believe that a man who supports the Government, who frankly states the facts as they exist, and who gives them warning, is after all their best friend. One hears complaints from time to time with regard to the floating of our loans. The last loan of $300,000,000, I am told, cost the country $5,000,000 in commissions. I heard the Acting Minister of Finance admit that the other evening. If that is so, and there is no doubt that it is so, I do not believe that the people of Canada will approve of any such commission being paid. In the United States you will find that those vast loans, running up to billions of dollars, have been raised without the payment of any commission to any one. It might be that the Government of Canada were unable to float this loan in any other way, I am not in a position to speak as to that; but I believe that the payment of a commission of $5,000,000 for the floating of that loan was not warranted and that the amount was much too large. I have to warn the Government against a repetition of the payment of a commission of that nature.

One hears from time to time statements about pensions being paid that are not warranted. I am not in a position to offer any specific criticism but the people will demand that the Government exercise the very greatest caution in the granting of all pensions. Canada has an immense debt and is faced with remarkable conditions. It possesses splendid natural resources and we have no doubt that ultimately it will come through triumphantly but the people will not respond with their millions, and hundreds of millions, of dollars unless they feel absolutely satisfied that the Government sets an example of the very greatest possible economy and that not a dollar is expended that should not be expended. My judgment as a public man has long been that we are squandering millions of dollars in connection with the Civil Service in Ottawa. It has always been my complaint that we have hundreds, if not thousands, of useless officials and a very great economy might be practised with regard to the Civil Service. It is a matter for congratulation that the Government has abolished the patronage system. We find the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) setting a splendid example with regard to paring down public expenditures. If other ministers will follow that example I believe that it will have an excellent effect throughout Canada. The people expect that and it will be a great pity if they should be disappointed in any way.

That by way of introduction. I now wish to refer to one or two matters arising out of the speech delivered by my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster). I intend to discuss some other questions, particularly the railway question, but I shall come to them later on. The railway question is, next to the war, the greatest issue before the people at the present time. I believe that very few of the citizens of Canada have thoroughly grasped the railway situation, thoroughly understand what the facts are, or are in a position to pass an intelligent judgment upon the facts.

The hon. member for Brome referred to the danger of lessening production and intimated that the Government was not acting fairly or properly towards the producers of newsprint paper and pulpwood. He intimated that the Government's action was influenced by a desire to please the newspapers. I take it that no member of the Government would care to reply to that charge on behalf of the Government. I thought it a very unworthy and improper charge, although I do not think my hon. friend meant to be particularly severe, because it was an intimation that the Government was coddling the newspapers with the idea of obtaining support. I hope by the presentation of the facts to satisfy the members of this House that this statement was a very improper and unworthy one and was not warranted by the facts. The price of newsprint, within the last twelve or eighteen months, has increased to the newspapers by nearly fifty per cent. The newspaper publishers, in order to guard their interests, represented to the Government that a criminal combine among the manufacturers and producers of newsprint existed and asked for protection. The Government extended that protection. The newspaper publishers, time and time again, made the statement to the members of the Government and to the commissioner, Mr. Pringle, who was appointed to act on behalf of the Government, that they did not ask that newsprint should be furnished to them at one farthing less than cost plus a good interest on the capital investment. We are able to establish to the satisfaction of the Government that an illegal combine existed. I never like to read extracts but I shall read to the House an extract from the New York World of April 13, 1917:

Seven Heads of News Print Paper Trust Indicted.

They are accused by a Federal Grand Jury of Control of the Industry and Illegal restraint of competition.

Organized to evade the Sherman Law, is charged.

Kept Down Output, Increased Prices, Discouraged New Mills, Refused to Deal with Each Other's Customers.

Indictments were handed up yesterday to Judge Cushman of the United States District Court against seven men charged with exercising actual control over the news print paper industry of the United States. The Grand Jury that returned the indictments has been in session since February 15 under Bainbridge Colby, a special assistant to the Attorney General, and Assistant Attorney General Mark Hyman.

The men indicted, and for whom bench warrants were issued by Judge Cushman, are the following:

George H. Mead, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the News Print Paper Manufacturers' Association, and President of the Spanish River Pulp and Paper Mills, the Lake Superior Paper Company, and the G. H. Mead Company of Dayton, O.

He was a Canadian and the big toad in the puddle:

Philip T. Dodge, President of the International Paper Company and a member of the Executive Committee.

Edward W. Backus, President of the Minnesota and Ontario Power Company, and the Fort Frances Pulp and Paper Company;

A Canadian organization I may say:

a member of the Executive Committee.

George Cahoon, Jr., President of the Laurentide Company, and manager of the Canada Export Paper Company; a member of the Executive Committee.

Gordias H. P. Gould, President of the Gould Paper Company, the Donnaconna Paper Company and formerly of the St. Regis Paper Company; a member of the Executive Committee.

Alexander Smith, a banker of Chicago, who is described as having specialized in the underwriting of paper mills.

Frank J. Sensenbrenner, Vice President of the Kimberly Clark Company of Neenah, Wis., who is described as having actively participated in the development of the News Print Association.

Now five of these men, including one or two Canadians, were convicted of carrying on this criminal combination and were fined $2,500. The illegal combine was clearly established, and the accused parties practically pleaded guilty and were fined.

Mr. McCREA: Were these men convicted, or did they make admissions by way of a compromise?

Mr. RICHARDSON: The hon. gentleman must recognize the absurdity of his question, because if they were not convicted, and my information is that they were convicted—

Mr. McCREA: No, they were not.

Mr. RICHARDSON: They pleaded guilty and were fined. If that is not equal to guilt, I would like the hon. member to point out how he would define guilt. Now, further with regard to these people:

The concerns in the association are declared in the indictment to manufacture 5,600 tons of the daily output of 6,300 in the United States and Canada. The companies represented by the members of the Executive Committee manufacture 3,500 tons a day. Of the operations of the association Mr. Colby said in a statement issued last night:

"The association was unincorporated. It had no articles of association, no by-laws. It kept no minutes of its meetings, nor was any record kept of the proceedings of its executive committee, which held meetings nearly every month. The informality of its procedure marks the latest phase in the progressive effort to invent some means of evading the Sherman Anti Trust Law. It was clearly the effort of the association to secure all the benefits of illegal combination without exposure to the risk of prosecution.

"To-day's indictment," Mr. Colby's statement added, "is in one respect different from those in numerous other prosecutions under the Sherman law. The Grand Jury has not sought to include in its arraignment the corporations and individuals constituting the entire membership of the industry, but has charged specifically the individuals regarded as the originators and directors of the alleged illegal combination and conspiracy.

"The men indicted control 55 per cent of the present output of news print paper. Five of them constitute the entire membership of the Executive Committee of the Manufacturers' Association, and the two others are practically members of the committee by virtue of their authority and constant participation in the direction of the association's affairs.

"The combination is a somewhat loosely articulated one, but, in my opinion clearly and obviously designed to circumvent the prohibitions against combinations in restraint of trade. The association gathered from its members not only data as to their capacity and output, but copies of outstanding contracts between publishers and every member of the association. The association thus had information as to how every newspaper in the country stood as to its supply of news print paper, and the date of expiration of every contract.

"Members of the association frequently refused to give quotations on newsprint paper to any publisher who had a contract with any other member. As the dates of expiration of contracts approached the newspapers were obliged to renew contracts for their current supply, but on asking quotations as to price were met by the refusal of manufacturers to deal with each other's customers. The publisher was committed to the concern with which his expiring contract was made, and was left helpless before the exactions as to price and other conditions of the manufacturer.

"Prices charged by members of the association are 40 to 50 per cent in excess of prices which independent producers even under war conditions are content to receive.

Now, I want to repeat that statement, because I want it to sink into the mind of every hon. member as it throws some light on the charge which has been made against the Government and the publishers:

Prices charged by members of this illegal association are forty or fifty per cent in excess of prices which independent producers even under war conditions, are content to receive. There has been a relatively slight advance in the cost of materials entering into the manufacture of news print paper, but nothing comparable to the advance in prices which has been made through the concerted action of the members of this combination, and under restricted competitive conditions brought about by the association whose purposes and methods are now directly challenged by the action of the Grand Jury."

It is set forth in the indictment that the association "required all concerns in carrying on their trade to refrain from competing with each other or with the Great Northern Paper Company in the matter of securing new customers; as to the quality of paper to be sold; as to the delivery and storage of paper; as to the terms of credit and rate of interest upon accounts or as to dates of contracts and methods of sale."

It is also charged that all concerns were required "to manufacture insufficient quantities of paper, to allege increased cost of manufacture, to allege shortage, and to co-operate in discouraging the erection of new mills."

As to prices charged by the association, it is understood that the Grand Jury heard testimony that while paper is still supplied to some customers at 2¼ cents a pound, other large consumers are paying 3½ or 3 30/100 cents. Small newspapers are compelled to pay 6, 7 and 8 cents a pound. The inquiry recently made by the Federal Trade Commission showed 2½ cents to be a fair price for the manufacturer.

I want to read another exceedingly significant statement, and I would like to secure the attention of the House while I do so:

George Cahoon, Jr., President of the Laurentide Company, and a member of the Executive Commitee of the paper manufacturers, strongly advised at the recent meeting of the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association, that all manufacturers this year keep the profits they are making confidential so that publishers and others would not know how much profit they were making. It has been the custom in the past for many paper companies, whose stocks are listed on the exchanges, or sold generally to the public, to announce the earnings at each annual meeting. This has been found by the manufacturers to be bad policy in view of the very large earnings which they have been and are now making. At the recent meeting of the Abitibi Company the exact earnings were not announced. The necessity, however, of keeping the stock at the proper quotation obliges them to make some statement to hold the market value of their security, or to increase same that they may unload watered stock in this time of prosperity. The publishers will then note that for the past few weeks and for the future such profit statements will not appear. This coincidence is interesting in view of the claims of manufacturers that their cost advanced so rapidly that their margin of profit is still reasonable under present prices.

Now, with regard to the profits made by the Abitibi mill. I regret, Mr. Speaker, to take up the time of the House in giving these figures, but it is necessary to make out this case and I propose to go through with it. I will not promise to supply as much amusement as my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Joseph Read), but perhaps later on we will get into something of lighter vein:

Abitibi Profits.

The annual meeting of the Abitibi Power & Paper Company was held on March 12th in Montreal, where an amazingly good report was presented to the shareholders.

This company is the newest and one of the largest and best known stock paper mill flotations in Canada, within recent years. It started as a promotion of two men in Montreal of very limited resources: F. H. Anson and Shirley Ogilvie. These two men bought in the timber limit around the Abitibi Lakes in Northern Ontario from the Ontario Government at a price of $16,000. This paltry sum gave them the exclusive right to cut on Ontario Government timber land to the extent of over one thousand square miles of the choicest pulpwood country, so that their investment in timber land is trifling. The Government even handles the fire patrol system.

These two men, after organizing the company, started to build a 100-ton groundwood pulp mill, with the idea of selling the pulp in the United States. To raise the money to build this mill and pay all expenses, they had a public issue of $1,500,000 six per cent first mortgage bonds, of which $1,000,000 were issued. They had $1,500,000 seven per cent cumulative convertible Preferred stock, of which $1,000,000 was issued. They had $3,500,000 of Common stock, of which $3,000,000 was issued. This Preferred stock was sold at $95.00 a share and carried a bonus of fifty per cent Common stock with it. The original issue Bonds were sold to insiders, that is directors and their friends, at 85, with seventy-five per cent bonus of Common stock and to be kept public at 95 with 50 per cent bonus of Common stock. All the rest of the Common stock went to the promoters, so that the entire Common stock, it will be seen, was water, either in the form of promotion stock or bonus stock. Not one dollar was ever paid in cash for a share of it.

This company has been built up by very large dividends.

A few statements from a prospectus dated November, 1916, issued by Peabody, Houghteling & Co., in connection with the sale of their convertible notes, are especially enlightening, in view of the statements absolutely contradictory to those made by Mr. Alexander Smith at the Chicago conference of Publishers and Manufacturers. In this he says: "The present earnings of the Company are eight times interest on the old 1915 prices." He further says that the mills at that time were making under those prices a profit of $15.83 per ton. With the additions now being built, the larger part of the cost of which is being paid for from earnings and only a very small proportion, which these convertible notes represent, being paid for by new financing, the earnings on the sale prices of 1915 would amount to seventeen times the interest charges, and that in November, 1916, the sale price of newsprint paper as of 1915 would have netted the company under the costs of November, 1916, a profit of not less than $15 per ton. Analyzing this, we find that the average delivery price of paper as mentioned was $41 per ton. The average price obtained by Abitibi Company for 1917 is $65 per ton at the mill, which with the freight added, makes a net advance in the price of paper of $30 a ton. Allowing for an advance in cost for this year, which the Federal Trade Commission found with this mill, of $4 a ton, this gives a net increased earning per ton of $26, which, in addition to the price which the prospectus of the Abitibi Company showed, would make the net profit for 1917, or at least for the present part of it, $41 per ton,—some profit.

The statement given out in Montreal at the annual meeting of the company was to the effect that after paying all interest charges, the company had earned under the old prices of 1916 over ten per cent on the Common stock, which Common stock was handed out or given out and taken out in the various and several methods above described.

It was announced that the stock was actually presented to the stockholders, and never cost them a dollar. Yet a ten per cent dividend was paid on that stock. And yet the publishers are charged with improper motives in asking the Government for simple protection from people of this kind.

Now, with regard to the Laurentide Paper Company:

The company without doubt, for the year ending June 30, 1917, showed earnings of not far less than $2,000,000; on January 1st, the company declared a dividend of 10 per cent on its capital stock. The dividends earned and paid on this capital stock since 1912 are shown as follows:

1912	$540,000
1914	576,000
1915	768,000
1916	768,000

The dividend now received is equal to 20 per cent of the original stock holding, and has a market valuation on that stock basis of $400 per share. In 1909 the company gave valuable rights in the new stock issue at par, and in 1911 the shareholders were given what practically amounted to 100 per cent stock bonus. When this latter was effected, the common stock was receiving 8 per cent dividends, the increase from 7 to 8 per cent being declared in the last quarter of 1910.

The earnings of this company are, therefore, phenomenal and show the value of newsprint investment.

Now, with regard to the Brompton Pulp and Paper Company:

The following report has just been issued: Surplus revenue, after administration and legal expenses, salaries, etc., amounted to $617,263.19. From this has been deducted $45,989.16 for accrued interest on bonds; $70,000 accrued dividends on preferred stock; and $175,000 for two dividends on common stock, leaving a profit and loss surplus of $326,274.03. The profit and loss surplus is after deducting $150,000 for contingencies and war taxes.

The surplus revenue for the six months period works out at the rate of about 14½ per cent on the common stock for a full year period, which must be highly gratifying to shareholders. Though the balance sheet has not been published The Financial Times is informed that the current assets exceed current liability by about $1,500,000.

We are told by the member for Brome that the Government is interfering with enterprise, and is compelling the producers of newsprint to supply it to the publishers at less than cost, and that in face of the facts which I have just read. One other extract and I have done:

A brilliant year is reported by Price Bros. & Co., Limited, for the period to February 28. This concern earned a net surplus, after all charges of $805,218—more than double the surplus earned in the fifteen-month period covered by the previous statement and three and a half times the surplus in the twelve months prior to that.

Earnings were equal to 16.1 per cent on the share capital, so after providing for the 6 per cent dividend paid during the year, a substantial balance of $505,218 remained to be added to the profit and loss account. That account now stands at $1,908,787 and is equal to $38 a share on the capital stock.

"Some" profits, Mr. Speaker. I have other extracts which I could read, but that would be unnecessary, because I think I have fairly established the case that the Government was justified in intervening in the interest of common decency, and for the protection of the publishers of Canada, to see that the papers were not victimized in the manner that was attempted. The word has gone forth that the proceedings must be secret, the public must not know what the earnings of these companies are, because if the public did find out, the newspapers would be in a better position and would not be victimized to the extent desired.

Let me pause for a moment to refer to one other point which my hon. friend from Brome made. I must say that the speech of my hon. friend was most interesting, although it reads like a speech that might have been delivered ten or twelve years ago, or that might fairly be delivered five or six years from now; a speech of that nature under the circumstances impressed me as rather peculiar, although I understand and appreciate the enthusiasm of my hon. friend. I intended, before concluding my argument on the newsprint situation, to enquire from my hon. friend if he is a director of any one of these pulp and paper companies, or in any way connected with them, because otherwise I can hardly understand so philanthropic a gentleman taking the position he did. I pause for a reply.

Mr. McMASTER: I am not connected, directly or indirectly, as a director or otherwise, with any manufacturer of paper. I trust that the hon. gentleman is also as completely dissociated with the newspaper business.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I suppose the hon. gentleman thinks that rejoinder rather clever, yet it is not. There is really nothing in it when you analyse it. He knows that I am a newspaper man; I have been one practically from childhood. But I have not sought to make any argument to bolster up my own position; I have presented the facts as fairly and succinctly as I can do to the House, and I leave it to the judgment of the House as to the justice of the position which the newspapers and the Government take.

The member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) conscientiously believes that he is a real

Simon-pure Liberal, and he thinks that a great disaster has happened to this country. He honestly believes that had the so-called Liberal party—so-called, because the Liberal party is really identified with the other party over here—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. RICHARDSON: He honestly believes that had they come into office at the last election the millennium would have practically arrived. I do not know how old the hon. gentleman is—he cannot be much younger than I am—but it passes my comprehension how a man of his intelligence and education, who has read and studied the political history of Canada and the actions of the two parties on fiscal questions during the last thirty or forty years, can pat himself on the back and look as happy as he does in his belief that if the Liberal party still existed it would do better than the party here with regard to the tariff. I sat at the feet of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, whose personality I have always enjoyed—he possesses so many splendid social qualities which everybody admires. But I was taught as a boy that if the Liberal party got into office we would have free trade as they have it in England. As a young lad I stumped a constituency away back in Lisgar in the early days, practically on a coal oil can. We were to have free coal oil, free agricultural implements—in fact, we were to have so much free that I could not understand why the Lord had kept the Liberal party out of power so long. It took me all my time keeping out of jail for denouncing the Tory high priests of protection; in fact, I was constantly mixed up in libel suits. I served my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) with a devotion that was pathetic in its simplicity. I believed that once we got that party in office the millennium would really have arrived. I knew that Alexander Mackenzie, Prime Minister of this country from 1873 to 1878, made an honest attempt to revise the tariff, and that when Sir John A. Macdonald came into office the average tariff was thirty-five per cent. I suppose I was very innocent—I am willing to admit it now, for years have passed, a great deal of water has flowed under the bridge, since then. But, assuming that if the Liberal party were returned to power we would have free trade as they had it in England, I assured the unsuspecting farmers that if they voted for this party everything, fiscal policy included, would be corrected. Imagine my surprise and my regret —I could add a number of expressive adjectives, but I shall refrain—when after the tariff was revised I heard Mr., now Sir George Foster, who was then the financial critic of the Opposition, declare that the total reduction made by the Liberals while in office in their revision of the tariff was 71-100 of 1 per cent. I never heard that statement challenged. I am prepared to say that with the British preference there were considerable reductions; I know about cream separators and two or three other things. But I learned my Liberalism at the feet of George Brown and Alexander Mackenzie and acquired my ideas on fiscal policy from Richard Cobden and John Bright. Incidentally, I am a member of the Cobden Club—I think my right hon. friend is also. I hope the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) will not laugh too much, because I am not speaking with the idea of bolstering up high tariff; I propose to tell the truth about that later. And I do not want my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who has grown old in harness and whom we all like as a man, to think that I wish to be offensive to him, although I do not know that I should care what he thinks, though I do not want to offend his susceptibilities. All I want to do is to state frankly the case as I see it.

If a reduction of 71-100 of 1 per cent took all the protection out of the tariff, then my innocence passes comprehension. A year or two after the tariff was revised in 1897, Mr., now Sir Clifford Sifton, who was then a prominent member of the Government of my right hon. friend, made a speech in Perth in which he declared that the tariff had been removed from the issues as between the parties; that the tariff was a settled issue. We all recall the position that the late Hon. J. Israel Tarte took with regard to the cotton manufacturers. My point is that the reductions made by the Liberal party when in office—I want the member for Brome to let this sink into his heart—were so infinitesmal that they did not really represent any substantial revision of the tariff looking in the direction of free trade. Seventy-one one hundredths of one per cent was a mere bagatelle, and we had an authoritative statement that that was to be the end of the reductions.

With regard to agricultural implements, the member for Brome broke into poetry. I think it was after Gilbert and Sullivan's famous libretto that he modelled the following lines:

'The clock we have pushed forward
For gardening after tea;
But as for farming implements—
We can't admit THEM free.

After reading that, the poet laureate on this side of the House sent me the following:

In his celebrated platform
Of eighteen ninety-three,
Upon which he was returned to power,
Farm implements were free.

But when, later on, the tariff
Was brought down by Lauri-ee,
The combine was on top again
And the farmer up a tree!

I do not know whether that is an improvement on the poetry of my hon. friend, but it is about as bad.

Mr. McMASTER: It is worse.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Well, I am glad it is, although it would be hard to make it very much worse. Between 1890 and 1894 the average tariff on agricultural implements was thirty-five per cent, which was cut down by the Tory high priest protection Government to an average of twenty per cent. So that the West really got as much from the Conservative party as it did from any of the others. In fact, we got more. We got practically nothing from the others, although we did get one or two per cent a little later on; but when I arrived in Ottawa the average tariff was twenty per cent. I hope I am not giving away any secrets when I say that the question, so far as I could gather, was not whether the tariff should be removed from agricultural implements, but whether it should be increased. I remember when the Hon. Sir Lyman Melvin Jones spent almost an entire Sabbath with me endeavouring to persuade me as to the advisability of increasing the tariff on agricultural implements. I, of course, repelled that suggestion, because I always held that, so far as I was concerned, the newspaper which I controlled would advocate free agricultural implements and tariff for revenue only, with a view to free trade as it exists in England. On that principle I had stood and contended very strongly during the years I was in Parliament and also as a newspaper editor. I admit that I did not offer any strenuous objection in the House at that time. Probably I considered that was an instalment. I was very young, and I thought perhaps we would get more. But as the years went on we did not receive any further reductions. I am speaking now as an Independent, because at that time I made up my mind that there was not much use in following any party, and so I became an Independent. We, as Independents, have been looking to whichever party would go furthest in the reduction we desired. In my judgment we have had as many reductions in tariff from the Conservative party as we have ever had from the Liberal party. I want to pay this compliment to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). He did, to his honour, be it said, take up the question of reciprocity. I endorsed that policy. I became a candidate in favour of that policy, and I did all I could to carry my right hon. friend and his party to victory on that policy. It was with great regret that I saw it defeated, and I believe it was not fairly defeated because the "loyalty cry" was improperly raised—I say it frankly—and that was the only time, in my judgment, when my right hon. friend really deserved success, and yet he was struck down. I think it would have been a better thing for Canada if the reciprocity policy had carried. The Conservative party has adopted free wheat and some other items in the reciprocity pact, and speaking as an Independent, I am hoping that by this union of the two parties, and now that the Radicals are co-operating with the older Conservatives, they will have an important influence on the Government in the direction of a reduction in the tariff. But we are in honour bound to wait until after the war is over. This radical element may ultimately leaven the whole lump, because there were Tories in the Liberal party and there were Liberals and tariff reformers in the Tory party. By the combination of the two parties there is opportunity of the real reformers getting together and securing something that will redound to the interest of the people.

My hon. friend (Mr. McMaster) spoke of the rare advance and prosperity coincident with the advent of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to office. This Labour Gazette, which is a Government publication, was placed in my hand to-day, by a colleague in this House, and I am going to read just one brief extract, and to refer to a table later on. I had better state that the cost of living had been jumping up steadily so that the Government of my right hon. friend, the present leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), appointed a commission to inquire into the cost, and that commission reported. Referring to the current interest in the cost of living question the report states as follows:

> For some time past and especially since the beginning of the century one of the most important features of the general economic situation in Canada has been a rapid and continuous advance in prices and the cost of living. The upward tendency seemed to have reached its highest point in 1907, when prices attained a level unprecedented in many years previous. The financial panic of the autumn of that year operated in arresting this tendency, and in many departments set in motion a recession which extended over 1908. The check, however, proved but temporary; the comparative slightness of its effect and the early recovery of the upward trend constituted in fact an especially noteworthy feature of the stringency in Canada.

And then appears in the same issue a table showing how the cost had been reduced and how it had risen. In 1890, that is before the advent of my right hon. friend to office, the cost of living was 110 per cent. In 1897 it dropped to 92 per cent. From 1897 it made a rapid rise, until, in 1907, it was 126 per cent, so that the argument which a colleague of mine wished me to make was that, instead of the policy of the Government led by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition leading to an amelioration of conditions, it lead really to a very rapid increase in the cost of living.

I wish to refer to the railway situation. I suppose it might be stated that I could very well bring up the railway question when the railway Estimates are brought down, but the question is such a large one that I might perhaps make some rather extended reference to it to-night, and then later on, when the railway estimates are brought down, I shall be able to make further reference to it. As I said in my opening remarks, I am convinced that the Canadian people have no conception of the seriousness of the railway situation. I do not believe that two per cent of the Canadian people have followed the developments in this matter or have any conception of its meaning and its bearing upon the interests of the Canadian people. The Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) estimated that the Government would derive from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, through the tax they have levied by Order in Council, an amount equal to $7,000,000. The Government, upon the recommendation of the Board of Railway Commissioners, recently granted an increase in rates of fifteen per cent to the railway companies. That increase will result in an additional revenue to the railways of something like $40,000,000. Of that sum, the Canadian Pacific will receive approximately $25,000,000. The Canadian Pacific Railway is a corporation bonused by the Canadian people to the extent of practically its entire cost. The Canadian people gave to the Canadian Pacific Railway $35,000,000 worth of completed road. They gave them twenty-five million acres of land on which they have raised or will raise over two hundred million dollars. They gave the company exemption from taxation till the crack of doom on every dollar's worth it owns, and that exemption is worth, based on returns from the United States, $500,000,000 every thirty years. So the Canadian people have practically built and made the Canadian Pacific railway. It was in the early history of the country; the Northwest was not opened up, and there might be some excuse for that contract. But surely the Canadian people never should have made another colossal mistake, and yet we have made two or three blunders infinitely greater. The Canadian people have paid dollar for dollar for every inch of railyay that exists in the Dominion of Canada at the present time, and yet the people of this Dominion do not own these roads. My hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance said that the country would probably derive $7,000,000 from the taxes levied on the Canadian Pacific railway. Suppose we do. We have got to give them twenty to twenty-five million dollars in order to get back that seven million, so we are really presenting the Canadian Pacific railway with $18,000,000, and that corporation does not need one single dollar because it has vast surpluses, tens of millions of dollars, stored up from what it has earned in past years. Yet the Canadian people are to be obliged to pay in additional freight rates $25,000,000 in order to collect $7,000,000. The mistake in my judgment—and I am not charging that it was anything worse than a mistake— the tragedy of the increase in freight rates, is not that it will cost the consumers or the handlers of freight in this country $40,000,000 more, but the moment the increase went into effect all along the line throughout this country additions were made to the cost of sugar, of tea and other commodities that are transported, and it is my judgment that that increase in freight rates will cost the people of Canada directly or indirectly an amount not less than $100,000,000. The Government owns, as we are told, the Canadian Northern railway and the Transcontinental; the Government will also be obliged to take over the Grand Trunk Pacific; and the commitments of the old Grand Trunk itself to the Government are so great that the Government will be compelled to take over that road. So as we shall own the railroads, would it not have been better for the Government to have taken over these concerns and refused to advance the rates, refused to give the Canadian Pacific railway this additional $25,000,000? If there had been a deficit in the operating of these other roads it would probably not have exceeded ten or fifteen million dollars, and it would have been infinitely better that the Government should pay that than that the rates should be increased and this vast loss thrust upon the people of Canada.

The interpretation of the overwhelming verdict at the polls last December was that the people desired to rule; that they did not want the interests any longer to dominate. It was the first time in the history of the country that the people had a real opportunity to make a pronouncement regardless of partisan and party considerations. In the past, no matter how the people voted, it always seemed as if the interests were paramount.

A new idea seems to have taken hold of the people last December, to elect a free Parliament, a legislature freed from party considerations and party shibboleths. At present Parliament is a great gathering of representative men elected by an overwhelming vote of the people to carry on the war. While this is the all-important issue, it must not be forgotten that Parliament should be, and is expected by the country to be, perfectly free to advocate all policies which, while making for the best service to the Dominion, will help the war.

The Government need have no fear that it will not be heartily and enthusiastically supported by the great following from both parties which has been sent to the House to back up all measures which made for the interest of the country, and consequently for the more effective carrying on of the war. The leader of the Government and his colleagues, no doubt, expect the members of this House to speak their minds freely, to present the views of their constituents, in order that the committee which Parliament has appointed to carry on the Government, namely, the Cabinet, will become thoroughly informed of the sentiments of the country and be in a position to carry out the policies which the nation demands.

Meantime the railway situation as a whole is more unsatisfactory than ever before. We are told on the one hand that the Canadian Northern now virtually belongs to the Government, and that it is its intention to nationalize the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific. But no definite action seems to be taken with a view to consolidating the properties and to operating them economically and scientifically as a unit. On the contrary, the companies are given rate increases, are having their obligations met by the Government as before, and are being furnished with new equipment by the Government, whilst still retaining their corporate identities. The Canadian Northern is applying for a charter for a new line. The whole situation is bewildering and discouraging, and seems to suggest the necessity for vigorous organized action by the people themselves if they wish the Government to understand that they, the people, henceforth are going to be the big interest in railway affairs, and are going to insist on the fact being recognized.

It is to be remembered that half or more than half of all the proceeds of the increased rates will go into the treasury of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific companies are all in default, not because the present rates on their actually required lines of railway are too low. They are in default because they are operating vast stretches of line in the wilderness where nobody lives, or desires to live at present, which produce no traffic, and where they are carrying on the ludicrous farce of "competition" for a business that does not exist. These stretches cannot be operated except at a heavy loss. The responsibility for the existence of those non-economic lines, and for, in many cases, the senseless duplication of lines really required rests primarily upon the financial managers of the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk companies, whose badly thought out ambitions, whose stupidity or whose cupidity, suggested their construction. The statesmen of Canada, however, have had a heavy contributory responsibility. Not only did they commit the folly of permitting the building of these white elephant railways, which was in itself an economic blunder of criminal magnitude, but they committed the people of Canada to the responsibility of financing them.

As a result of this double blunder of the statesmen, the people of Canada have now to pay the cost. And let it be understood clearly that there is no way in which payment can be avoided. Heavy loss has been made, some of which is irrecoverable. But by drastic, clear-headed, and courageous action on the part of the Government now, by the assumption of all these delinquent railways, their consolidation with the existing Government railways, and the operation of the whole as a public service, and not merely as a basis for the issue of stock-exchange "securities," as heretofore, a system could be created which would soon be able, with present rates, not only to pay all operating expenses, but to pay all the capital charges for which it would be properly chargeable. It is even conceivable, and in fact here are reasons in the experience of other communities which make it almost certain, not only that in a remarkably short time this would be done, but that whilst doing it a reduction of present rates, and not an increase, would be indicated by the results. The Canadian Pacific Railway authorities are thoroughly alive to this contingency. They see that it is just here that the reason is why the country need not worry as to whether the Canadian Pacific Railway is embraced in the scheme of public ownership or not. The Government hold the trump cards. The Canadian Pacific Railway people know it. They are therefore opposed to public ownership, not only of their own, but of the other two large systems.

Of course, in order to achieve this result, it would be necessary to apply energy, organization capacity, common sense and common honesty in the administration of the system. No superhuman or even unusual qualities or experience are required. There is probably no business to-day in which moderate industry and ability are so certain to meet with success as in that of administering a railway which operates in a country in which people live and work and produce.

The Government has furnished no reason which would justify its failure to carry out the policy recommended by the Royal Commission, and which as a matter of fact is also its own policy. If it does so fail, it will be because of the existence of facts or considerations of which the public has no knowledge. If it does so fail, the failure will justify the public in believing that it is influenced by interests, or influences, or persons whose interests are not those of the public and who should have no influence with any Canadian Government. The public will also begin to believe, and they will be justified in believing, that the "invisible government," although invisible, is not altogether a ghostly or mythical body, but is in fact a very unpleasant reality.

All indirect taxes are borne most largely by the mass of the people, those least able to pay, and in Canada, fall with a special onerousness on the people of the West. But a tax collected under the guise of, or as an addition to, the cost, of the railway service, is probably more discriminatory against the western population than any other could be. For obvious geographical reasons, transportation charges are a much larger factor in the cost of everything that they consume and produce than they are in Eastern Canada, not only because of the greater length of the haulage, but because a much larger proportion of everything that is consumed and produced in the West is transported by railway. The customs tariff bears more heavily on the West than on the East and the substantial increase in customs duties, made by the Borden Government as a war measure, further emphasized this discrimination in the incidence of the tariff. The West, however, agreed, not expressedly but tacitly, to postpone the discussion of tariff questions till after the war, and more whole heartedly than any other section of Canada, went into the business of electing a Union Government which should vigorously prosecute the war.

The railway rate increase will more heavily discriminate against the West than did the advance in the tariff rate, and the total sum taken from the western taxpayers by its operation will be very much greater. This, from a western viewpoint, is a very serious and an obviously legitimate ground of objection to the increased railway rates. But there are still more serious objections. The Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern Railway Companies have defaulted in their contractual obligations. The Government of Canada has already paid many millions of dollars on behalf of these companies, and will have to pay many millions more. Their default has given the Government of Canada has already paid many millions of dolarls on behalf of these companies, and will have to pay many millions conditions produced by the blunders of the managers of these corporations, make it imperative that the Government should, in the high political and economic interest of the whole country, if necessary, exercise its inherent power of eminent domain and assume these lines without delay and without disputation.

The Government itself is quite alive not only to its powers, but to the urgency of the situation. It has expressed, through its organized press mouthpieces, its intention of nationalizing the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern systems, of consolidating them with the present Government railways, of operating them as a unit and of stopping the present futile waste, duplication, and overlapping. But the Government does not act on these express intentions. It would seem as if either the Government does not possess the required conviction and force to follow the plain course of duty and public interest, or some invisible paralyzing force is at work which renders its intentions nugatory.

The Canadian Northern promoters have loaded upon the country a huge white elephant, which the country has been obliged to house and feed, but which cannot earn nearly the value of its feed. As a sort of commission or remuneration to themselves for this great patriotic service, the promoters of the white elephant enterprise, issued to themselves common shares in the Canadian Northern Railway Company to the modest sum of one hundred millions of dollars, for which they gave nothing, but their services in furnishing the white elephant aforesaid. As, under all the circumstances, the presentation of such a claim was merely another example of the steel-plated effrontery, which only a modern "Empire-building" Canadian financier could possess, the people or Government of Canada was under no obligation, moral or legal, to take any cognizance of it. Yet an arbitration is now being gravely staged, whose ostensible object is to determine just how many millions (but not more than ten), the people of Canada should pay for sixty millions of these aqueous "securities"!

In my judgment the arbitration should be to ascertain how much the Canadian Northern railway should pay back to the Canadian people, instead of sitting to determine what the Canadian people should pay to the Canadian Northern railway.

The Grand Trunk Railway Company entered into a contract with the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, which was probably the most amazing bargain ever made between a Government and a corporation. On the strength of that agreement, the Government constructed that preposterous, but thoroughly appropriate, "monument to the statesmanship of Sir Wilfrid Laurier," at a cost to the people of Canada of not less than two hundred millions of dollars, up to this date. Long before this transportation monstrosity was completed, the uselessness and unprofitableness of operating it, and the general folly of its conception, had been pretty fully realized. The Grand Trunk company simply declined to carry out its contract to operate the railway, and it was thrown on the hands of the people, by whom it is now held at a continuous heavy cost both in interest on capital and in operating expense deficits. By the same contract, the Grand Trunk company undertook to build a railway from Winnipeg, the western terminus of the National Transcontinental, to the Pacific coast, the Government guaranteeing the bonds covering a very large percentage of the cost. The railway was also built, and as was expected and predicted by all persons who had studied the enterprise, and whose intelligence had been developed beyond the kindergarten stage,—and these are much fewer than might be supposed,—it was also a commercial failure. The Government again had to get under the load. The Grand Trunk company is now operating this railway, but the people of Canada are paying the deficits, which are heavy.

As the Grand Trunk Railway Company has defaulted heavily in its contract with the Government and owes it an enormous amount of money, its own original lines, practically all in Eastern Canada, are now virtually forfeit to the Government. But the Grand Trunk financiers have no desire to lose their hold on the property, its manipulation being apparently a source of much profit to them. The comfortable old game of "heads I win, tails you lose," which the financiers have always been able to persuade Canadian Governments to play with them, is much too succulent a tid-bit to abandon without a strenuous resistance. Having left the Government with the heavy but unhealthy and unpromising National Transcontinental baby to hold, the Grand Trunk managers, with an effrontery that certainly could not be surpassed by even that of a Canadian Northern magnate, request that the Government take over the Grand Trunk Pacific, cancel the contract and cancel also the debt of many millions which the Grand Trunk owes the Government, on account of moneys advanced to pay interest on which the company defaulted. Not only this, but the Grand Trunk directors had the adamantine impudence to request that the Government repay the company some money which it had, in accordance with the contract, raised on its own credit and invested in the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Mr. Smithers, Chairman of the Grand Trunk Board of Directors, came out from London and made a sort of stumping tour of this country, with a stereotyped statement which was a mixture of a whine and a "bluff" and was based on the most insidious sort of misrepresentation. He posed the Grand Trunk as a sort of benevolent altruist which had made the welfare and comfort of Canada and Canadians the sole thought of its waking hours, and whose philanthropic efforts some people in Canada would requite with scurvy ingratitude. It is to be feared that Mr. Smithers is culpably unfamiliar with the history of his own company and of Canada. It is also to be feared that many of our own statesmen are equally unfamiliar with that history, at least in so far as it relates to the Grand Trunk Railway. As a matter of fact, a true and unvarnished recital of the histories of all our great railway corporations is much needed just now. For there has developed in recent times a tendency on the part of the magnates of these concerns to wander into the fields of romance, using the early history of their own enterprise as the subject matter on which they build elaborate superstructures of weird and erratic fantasy. The transformation of the grub into the butterfly is a no more wonderful phenomenon than is the ethical evolution of the Canadian Pacific or the Canadian Northern as described by the magnates. The flaw in this analogy, however, is that in the magnates' romances these corporations were ethical butterflies to start with. Their evolution has not been from the sordid to the glorious, but from one glory to another infinitely greater.

The people of Canada were under no legal obligation to arbitrate the value of the Canadian Northern Railway stock, which is worth exactly nothing, nor to negotiate with the shareholders of the Grand Trunk. These concerns are now endeavouring to evade their responsibilities, to throw the entire loss on the country, and in one of the cases to actually obtain a remuneration from the country for their agency in causing its loss. To permit such treatment is not to maintain "the credit of Canada". It is simply to proclaim the folly and the discredit of Canada. We are told that the "credit of Canada" requires that we shall negotiate for things that have no value, and shall arbitrate the question as to whether we shall pay to a person to whom we owe nothing, but who, on the other hand, has caused us enormous loss, ten or twenty or sixty millions of dollars! We are told that we must maintain, in the eyes of the financial world, a reputation for scrupulous honesty. This "credit of Canada" bogey has always so effectively freightened our statesmen that their vision has been distorted and their sense of perspective hopelessly impaired.

Now I want to inquire if the recommendations of the Royal Commission in regard to these railways have been adopted by the Government. I dislike to keep the House but it is important that the country, as well as the House itself, should know the facts. I would recommend every hon. gentleman to study the report of the Royal Commission which was appointed to inquire into the transportation systems of Canada. It is known as the Drayton-Acworth report. This is the authorized governmental body, appointed by the Government, and constituted for the purpose of directing the country in the matter of its railway policy. That Commission made a very exhaustive report. I had intended reading something as to the cost of the Canadian Northern and the Canadian Pacific and the aid which the country has given them from time to time, but perhaps I had better defer that until the railway estimates are brought down. I might, however, say a word or two with regard to the plan which the Commission suggested. Now, you know, Mr. Speaker, because you come from Nova Scotia, the cry has been raised in the Maritime Provinces all these years against public ownership, and how everybody throughout Canada has pointed as an argument against public ownership to the results of the operation of the Intercolonial Railway. I myself have met this argument on every occasion: "For Heaven's sake, do not let us have public ownership, look at the Intercolonial." I want to point out, so that the country and the House may understand the facts, that the Intercolonial was built not as a commercial undertaking, but as a condition of Confederation. When the Maritime Provinces were brought into Confederation it was agreed that the Intercolonial should traverse those provinces. It did not take a direct course but ran from one town or village to another in order to serve the people. Let me emphasize another point: The rates charged on the Intercolonial for years and years were less than a quarter of the rates charged on privately owned railways in other parts of Canada. I am told that cars holding a very large amount of freight were credited with but a small quantity; all sorts of stories were circulated in regard to that railway. No wonder it did not pay. Then, moreover, it was under political management, it was always in the hands of the dominant party; and no railway or other enterprise can be successfully operated under political management. In the Australasian colonies where public ownership prevails, the railways are managed by commissions, appointed not by the government, but by the legislatures and only removable by them for cause.

Now, Sir Henry Drayton and his associates studied the railway situation very carefully. They saw the difficulties to which I have alluded and in their excellent report made recommendations intended to obviate them. I have often wondered why the Government has not adopted that report. Why is the Canadian Northern not put into the hands of an independent commission, responsible to this Parliament, as suggested in Sir Henry Drayton's report? That report contains these recommendations:

Having then arrived at the conclusion that the transfer of the three undertakings to a commercial company is not feasible, we recommend that they be handed over to a board of trustees to control and manage on behalf of, and on account of, the people of Canada. The trustees should be organized as a company with a nominal capital. But in effect they would be a public authority.

Before going further we desire to make a fundamental point clear. We express the conclusion to which we have come both in negative and positive forms. We recommend:—

1. That the Government do not acquire or undertake to operate any further railways; but:

2. That these three railways, Canadian Northern, Grand Trunk, and Grand Trunk Pacific, be transferred by Act of Parliament to an independent Board of Trustees (incorporated as a company), constituted as we shall hereafter describe.

These recommendations, from our point of view, hang together and must be regarded as inseparable. We do not recommend the transfer of the three companies at all, unless our recommendations as to the method to be followed are also substantially accepted. That the Government should itself take over the railways, and they should then be operated under the control of a Parliamentary Minister of Railways, is a policy which in our judgment would not be in the best interest of Canada.

Our personal belief is strong that, in normal circumstances, railway enterprise is a matter best left in private hands, subject to proper regulation by the Government. Were we asked to advise in the case of the railways of the United Kingdom or the United States, which have been constructed by private companies, with money found by private investors, we should give effect to this belief. We go further and consider that, in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway, as to which the Government does instruct us to advise, the fact that it received large help from public sources in its early days, is not any reason why the existing status of the company should now be disturbed. This company has carried out its bargain. It has repaid to the Government large advances made in earlier years. We believe that Canada has had good value for what it has given. We think that it is in the interest of the country that this company should be rich and properous, for such companies can be expected, not only to give the best service, but to be best able to provide in time to meet new developments as they arise. We have had no hesitation, therefore, in coming to the conclusion that the status of the Canadian Pacific Railway should be left undisturbed.

But in the case of the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific the circumstances are not normal. These companies have broken down. We see no way to organize new companies to take their place. Their only possible successor is in our view a public authority. We are confronted with a condition and not a theory.

Our formal recommendations are:—

1. That a Board of Trustees be constituted by Act of Parliament and incorporated as "The Dominion Railway Company."

2. That the ownership of the Canadian Northern, Grand Trunk, and Grand Trunk Pacific Railways be vested in this company.

3. That the Government assume responsibility to the company for the interest on the existing securities of these undertakings.

4. That the Intercolonial (including the Prince Edward Island) and National Transcontinental Railways be also handed over by the Government to the company.

5. That the whole of these railways, the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Intercolonial, and the National Transcontinental, be operated by the company as one united system.

I shall not read all the recommendations, although it had been my intention to do so if time permitted. The House will see that if such management as is suggested here were adopted it would absolutely eliminate the idea of political interference or political patronage in the management of Government railways. It is not necessary to take over the Canadian Pacific railway. Let that road go on doing its work. It is a well managed system which is serving the people of this country, and there seems to be no reason under the sun why it should be acquired by the Government. If we take the three of four railways that we have, eliminate all the unnecessary mileage, cut off the capitalization represented by that mileage, and have it apply to actual mileage that is required, we shall be able to fix reasonable rates—much lower rates even than those which prevail to-day—and even pay interest on the legitimate capital.

I would like to tell the House of the value of public ownership as we have it in the city of Winnipeg. We have there an electric light and power system which we established some seven or eight years ago.

Prior to that a private company, the Winnipeg Electric Railway Company, operated the electric lighting sysem of the city. But the people decided to establish a system of their own, and did so. In this connection I want to read a brief letter from the manager of that company, which I received from him when I was in Winnipeg last week:

Dear Mr. Richardson:—

Regarding the reduction in rates for electric lighting and power in the city of Winnipeg resulting from the construction of the Municipal Light and Power Plant in Winnipeg, the charge made per K.W.H. for ordinary power in 1906 was 10c per K.W.H. with varying discounts depending on the amount and conditions under which taken.

The rates now applying are on a sliding scale, as shown on the enclosed rate card (Schedule "C"), commencing at 3 1-3c and reducing to 8-10c gross with two successive discounts to be deducted therefrom, viz,—wholesale and prompt payment. The net cost of power now varies from 2½c per K.W.H. net to ½c net.

The three million dollar annual saving stated by Mr. Kensit to be effected comprises not only the saving made by the City Light and Power consumers but also. The following figures give in a nut-shell the results of operation:—

Year to 30th of April.	Total Investment.	Revenue.	Expenses.	Deficit.	Surplus.
1912	(6 months)	$ 68,534.15	$127,375.89	$58,841.74
1913	$6,143,693.04	544,736.03	628,168.93	83,432.90
1914	6,724,372.58	865,805.19	805,582.58		$60,222.61
1915	7,339,537.99	976,854.70	897,627.78		79,191.92
1916	7,443,771.74	995,511.37	915,781.70		79,729.67
1917	7,559,492.15	1,020,480.25	935,905.72		84,574.53

Increase in load.

Year to April 30th.	No. of Customers.	Units generated in K.W.hrs.
1912	6,686	7,071,735
1913	21,724	39,071,750
1914	28,788	59,138,154
1915	32,953	70,743,274
1916	34,345	76,234,740
1917	35,392	82,278,970

The reduction in rates effected by the construction of the City Light and Power Plant is best illustrated by the reduction in the domestic lighting rate. The original money appropriation bylaw was passed in 1906.

In 1906 the rate was 20c per K.W. Hour.
In 1907 the rate was 10c per K.W. Hour.
In 1911 the rate was 7½c per K.W. Hour.
In 1912 the rate was 3 1-3c per K.W. Hour.

The estimated saving to citizens in their domestic lighting bills alone since October 15th, 1911, when the civic plant was put into operation, is four million dollars. H. E. M. Kensit's estimate of a total saving of three million dollars per year would give a total saving of nineteen million five hundred thousand dollars since the plant has been in operation six and one-half years.

I trust these figures and information will meet your requirements.

Yours truly,

City Light and Power Department,

R. A. SARA,
Sales Manager.

I read this for the purpose of demonstrating to this House the great value of public ownership. Naturally, there is very great opposition to public ownership. I believe the Canadian Pacific Railway will oppose public ownership and operation of the proposed railway system, but it is the only plan. If we adopt the suggestions made in the Drayton-Acworth Report, I believe that Canada will be able satisfactorily to solve its railway problem. I do not know how it can be solved in any other way.

Before I sit down, there is another matter I desire to take up, because on the Budget one can discuss almost anything. I wish to refer to attacks made upon one of the greatest apostles of public ownership in this country, the greatest apostle of that gospel Canada has yet produced. I refer to Sir Adam Beck, of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, and a member of the Ontario Government. In one of the committees of which I am a member, a Bill came up recently in which that commission is interested. I received a marked paper a week or two ago, a copy of The Financial Times, of Montreal, and I propose to spread this article on Hansard, because I do not believe a more vicious or contemptible attack upon a noble Canadian public servant has ever been made. The article begins:

It is not a coincident that Sir Adam Beck is a German and that the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario has only one law—that of Might. It is cause and effect! The German cannot get away from the whip and spur policy. If anything is in the way, run over it; crush it under foot, and then set it ablaze if there is anything left to burn. That is the Kaiser policy; it is the Hindenburg policy; it is the policy of those in humbler walks of life. In fact, it is German, with a Capital Germ. It is not Canadian policy. Five hundred thousand Canadians are fighting that very policy in France to-day; fifty thousand Canadians have either died or have been blinded or crippled in an endeavour to crush the pretention that Might is Rigt.

You see how the creature who writes this article endeavours to bring in patriotism, utilizing even the blood of the noble men who have fallen in defence of freedom, when striking his deadly blow against this apostle of public ownership, Sir Adam Beck.

Bloodthirsty as the Germans have shown themselves to be, they don't want war for war's sake alone, however. War is only a means to an end with them. They want civic domination over the whole world, and as other nations have a little self-respect and a natural desire to hold what they have, the Germans were compelled to use force.

One German has tried the German game in Ontario, and has had a measure of success. He has given the individual householder cheaper electric light than was given by private-owned corporations,—

This creature had to admit the advantage that the people of Ontario have sustained through the operation of Sir Adam Beck's system.

—but he has made collective householders pay through their teeth, and has piled up an enormous capital obligation for Ontario, and is still going strong. This fourth year of war, when the Finance Minister has vetoed new capital outlay except with his special permission; when every man in Canada is entreated to save his pence to win the war; when we are compelled to go to Washington to borrow an occasional fifty million dollars in order to pay our way; when all these claims and others, such as income and business taxes, pensions for soldiers, hospital and patriotic funds, are confronting us, this German-Canadian with the manners of a Uhlan on the rampage, is granted, on a silver platter, if you please, $9,000,000 to $10,000,000 "government" funds, for one year's expenditure of "capital account" which expenditure of Government funds is directed towards the destruction of companies that had developed industrial Ontario many years before Adam Beck's father left his home in Prussia.

What a contemptible statement!

The people of Ontario, even during four years of war, are blind to the fact that the entire Hydro Electric policy is German-made. Adam Beck can't help it, he was born that way but it is surprising that British people in ultra-British Ontario would allow themselves to be seduced into a dishonourable cause. It has been charged that the Financial Times is prejudiced; that we represent vested interests and that we cannot see the good man is doing to the loyal householder who saves a cent a day on the pantry light bill. Frankly. The Financial Times is prejudiced; and The Financial Times has no apologies to make. We are prejudiced against the Turks for their Armenian atrocities and against the Germans for destroying the Belgians who refused to be bribed with a promise of "cheaper light". We have no use for the tribe! And we regret to see the Germans' disregard for the pledged word enter into the spirit of those Ontario people whose one defense of Adam Beck is, "He gave us cheaper light." A mess, a dirty mess of pottage!

It is distasteful to deal in personalities as above, but the entire ramifications of the Hydro Electric Group are peculiarly personal. The head of that concern has resorted to trickery and generally to methods not tolerated in the established relationship between men. In a word, he has not played the game, "the End" in his doctrine "had justified the Means," and that is a gospel proclaimed from the housetops in Germany by the blood relations of Sir Adam Beck. It is not British, and it is not Canadian to repudiate one's word, even in business affairs. This man has devised these unprincipled policies, and he and his dupes must take the consequences.

I read that article to illustrate the depths to which the creatures who are maintained by vested interests will descend to blacken the character of a great public servant and to prejudice the people of Canada against a man who has spent the best years of his life in bettering the conditions of the province of which he is so proud. The name of Adam Beck will stand in this country for much that is good, for the real progress of the country, and for service to the people of Canada, long after the creature who wrote this article is forgotten. Much as I abhor, much as I loathe the German and all his works, I would sooner be Von Hindenburg himself, or the menial Hun who blackens his boots, than the miserable, traitorous interest-serving creature who wrote that article.

I think, Mr. Speaker, I have wearied the House—I have certainly wearied myself—more than I intended to do. I have endeavoured to speak with great frankness particularly on the railway question which I believe to be the paramount issue in Canada to-day, next to the war. I believe that even members of the Government perhaps fail to realize the importance of this issue, and it is because I have made a study of the railway question for the last twenty-five or thirty years, and have watched the development of our railways, and have realized what transportation means to our people, that I conceived it to be my duty, in all kindness and in all frankness, to state my views, based upon my observations, to the Government. They may not adopt them, but they are presented in the kindliest manner, and I have no doubt the Government will give these views their attention. We must realize that at present the members of the Government are absorbed in war questions and other issues, and are, perhaps, unable to give the attention it deserves to a matter of such vast importance.

The real importance of the issue and the necessity for prompt action is my excuse for having dwelt on this subject so fully and dealt with it so exhaustively. I could discuss this subject until daylight, but, perhaps, I shall have an opportunity when the Railway Estimates come up of speaking further with regard to it.

Mr. W. K. BALDWIN (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) for the words of commendation which he addressed to the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). He made a good deal of capital out of the assertion that some company had bought one thousand square miles of land for $16,000. I do not know whether it was the provincial or the Dominion Government, but whichever it was, the fault was not that of the purchaser, but that of the government which sold the property.

The hon. gentleman spoke also of the large amount of money which is being made by the big interests. It would seem from the proposals brought down by the Acting Finance Minister yesterday that no matter how large the profits of these interests may be, the Government will get a big slice of them. A few years ago, when Roosevelt was President of the United States, he undertook to make an investigation of all the large interests throughout the country with a view to breaking up monopolies and trusts. This work proceeded for some years, with what result? They had to give up the idea of breaking up trusts and monopolies because capital was withdrawing itself from industry and labour would be the sufferer from any action taken. I hope to see the day when capital and labour shall be united in this country under such a co-operative system as is working so well in many of the industries of the United States.

As a plain business man I wish to suggest a few plain things that I think the Government should do. We have now been in war for four years, and during that period I have not seen such retrenchment as I think there should be. Representatives of the people should administer the affairs of this country as a board of directors administers the affairs of a company. The difference is that a company gets its money from the sale of stocks and bonds, and is watched by the shareholders, whereas we are administering the affairs of a whole nation and the ownership is in the people of Canada. We have no right, therefore, to consider ourselves masters of the situation; we are only servants.

In the country in which I live some men have been working on the international boundary line under a Boundary Commission which was established some ten years ago. It was deemed necessary that the monuments should be repaired or rebuilt, as the wooden cores in some of them had rotted and they had fallen down. For several years this work proceeded; the men said that their work was topographical, latitudinal, altitudinal, longitudinal, or some other term of that nature. But the people wanted to know what all this was about. The men engaged in this work were setting a bad example as representatives of the public service. They would lie around their tent until ten o'clock in the morning; if they lived among the farmers they would not get up until ten and would ask special meals in the afternoons. This is not a good example to set among the hard-working, labouring people of the country. This work has been going on every summer along the international boundary. Gangs of rugged men came in with motor trucks, went over the hills and put up tripods and towers in various places without consulting the owners of the land. Customs officers and immigration inspectors were suspicious of what was going on; indeed, one of the men engaged in this work himself said to me: "I will keep them guessing." The local papers took up the cry: "Are these men German spies?" I own a large section of land in that district—and taxes are pretty heavy, I assure you. One of these men said to me: "Well, we have run over your land pretty generally; of course, I should have asked your permission." I said: "Never mind, I understand that the Government have permission to do what they choose." I asked him what this work was for, and he said, "This is a triangular survey." I submit that in these times of war we should not concern ourselves with what latitude or longitude we are living in or what is the altitude of a certain district. Next year the Government will proceed to do hydrographic work; they will measure the depth of all the streams, ponds and lakes. Will that help us out any? I do not think so. We should account for every dollar that is spent in this country, and every man in the employ of the Government should do an honest day's work. We are spending money needlessly. As I have said, it was suspected that these tripods and towers were being built by German spies. After these people had been coming and going for some time and had left the place, the boys congregated on the heights and destroyed the works which the men had put up. One of them had been put up on an eminence 650 feet above the lake, and one Sunday the boys had a picnic and pulled it down.

A company that undertakes to make money with the people's money has to be administered honestly and carefully. Look at our banks; if you do not put a stamp on your note, it is charged to your account.

and you have overdrafts of from $3 to $15 at the end of each month. The Government should conserve every cent it is entrusted with. At a time when the private and public debt of Canada has reached $2,500,000,000, such stupendous expenditure should not be made by the Government, particularly in these appalling times of war. We have many things to do with our money. I believe that we should have national currency and national banks. We should provide national currency for the great transportation companies. The banking system should be such that a farmer could walk into a bank with his head straight on his shoulders and demand twenty-five or fifty per cent of the value of his ownerships or the equity of his lands, just the same as a business man can hypothecate his stocks and bonds. Moreover, we should have conservation of our resources, our forests, fisheries, mines and lands, because only in that way can we pay the interest on our vast debt.

I believe, not only in the conservation of all those things, but in the conservation of humanity, which is a thousand times more important. Our doctors and nurses bear testimony to that, as also do our insane asylums and hospitals. We have with us to-day things that are of very great importance without spending money on things that are of no use whatever. We are suspicious of the present Government because, in 1908 at Halifax, the leader of the present Government proclaimed a policy. Did he fulfil it in 1911? No, he did not. He there proclaimed a platform of retrenchment in the administration of this country, of doing away with the patronage system, and he promised other good measures. In 1911, did the Conservative party win the election upon that platform? Did they, during the six years of their administration, practise one thing that they promised? No. To-day we have a right to be suspicious of the present Government although it is called Liberal-Conservative or Union Government. I do not wish to be critical of the Government to-night, but I desire to give a warning against foolish and profligate expenditure of public money. I hope we have no such dominating influence in the present Government as there was in the last. The former Government was a government over which even the leader of the present Government and the past had no control. There was there a dominating influence that was, to say the least, vicious, bad and dishonest. As a plain business man, who knows something about business and who knows that every cent should be accounted for, I say that we should have here a system of accountability in regard to the Civil Service. We know there are, throughout the whole country, four or five times more civil servants than there should be. If you talk with one of them, he will say: If they should dismiss one-half of the staff of the office in which I work and give the rest a ten per cent increase in salary—he wants a little more salary—we shall do all the work.

The Government are spending money right and left throughout the country. I do not wish to go into Brome county, but just at Highwater they paid $5,500 for a house to be used as a customs house, which could have been built for $3,000. It was built on a clay hill, and it will have to be held there with guy ropes to keep it from falling down the hill. My hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) should have looked after these things rather than myself. A brand new building could be erected for $3,000, and I speak having knowledge of erecting buildings and of the price of building material, and I know that these are times of high prices. I believe the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) is right. Probably the reason I stand in the House to-night may be from the very fact of what he uttered in Sherbrooke a little more than a year ago, and if one-quarter of what he said then is true, it is abominable. I do not want to thrash this House for its past work, but we have a right to be suspicious because there may be in the present Government dominating influences that make the Minister of Public Works not able to do as he sees fit.

The Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) were both brought up under the influence of our grand old chieftain, the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who has stood for forty years without a blemish. The Exchequer Court has never had to be resorted to in his long career. There never was such prosperity in the history of Canada as there was from 1896 to 1911. We heard a speaker on the opposite side state to-night that a hundred years ago there was the same population on the north as on the south side of the international boundary. Why is there this difference now? It is because the United States was made a cheap country to live in, and this was an expensive country to live in. The best immigration agency in the world is to make a country a cheap country to live in, and you cannot make a country a cheap country to live in until every part of the business is done honourably, fairly and squarely, so that all commodities can be bought without a great taxation upon the people. We know that Englishmen who have come out from the old land and who have settled, some in Canada and others in the United States, when they meet again, ask one another: Where did you get your shoes, your ties, your hats, your suit, and what did you pay for them? Those boys, John and Tom, do not meet together very long before Tom goes over to the American side. Seven years ago tens of thousands of our young men were in the Canadian Northwest. My two sons went there and endeavoured to work out destinies for themselves. They invested all their money, but just before the war broke out, times had changed. Tens of thousands of those young men went over to the American side, because they had bought land, and they could not pay the taxes; they could not live. We need not lay the responsibility for all this on war conditions. The tide had begun to turn before the war broke out.

I am not here to-night to criticize the Government, but we are suspicious of your doings, and I am telling you to-night that in the county in which I have fought, I had as my opponent one of the ablest campaigners in the Dominion. It is pretty hard to hit a man when he is down; it is pretty hard to hit a man when he agrees with you, and the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) has almost agreed with us that things are going wrong on the opposite side of the House, and, for the last six weeks in this House we have seen that hon. members sitting on the back benches are suspicious of what is going on over there. I could talk along those lines further, but let us warn hon. members opposite that they must watch and do right or in the coming session they will be handled without mercy and without gloves. We have a united party on this side. We have men who can express their opinions. We believe in democracy and in the principle of Canada for Canadians. It would seem that some of the speakers in this House and the press of the country consider that the whole onus of this great European war must depend upon Canada; that Canada must render up her all and her future and not have sufficient left to keep herself together. I have a son in France at the front. I have as much interest in the winning of this war as has any hon. member on the opposite side, and I want Canada's resources to go to support my boy, because it seemed like the last long farewell when he went. We differ, however, as to method. I believe that conscription was a wrong thing and a failure. We should have used the money of this country in bonuses to recruit men here. In the American rebellion the authorities, by paying large sums, hired men to go to the front. That was even after the draft had been in force for several years. I am pleased to say here to-night that everyone of us on this side of the House is in favour of winning the war and takes as much interest in it as any hon. member opposite.

In regard to the railway situation, why did my hon. friends opposite not keep Mr Gutelius in Canada? I am not sure whether Mr. Gutelius resigned just before or after the present Government came into power, but why did he resign to leave this country? It was simply because a manufacturer down in Nova Scotia said: We are going to have our way; you cannot have yours.

Mr. Gutelius believed in the survival of the fittest; the other man believed in the patronage system. The result is that Mr. Gutelius is now in the United States, while our railroads are being run in a way that will lead to their everlasting financial ruin. We should keep such men as Mr. Gutelius when we find them in any branch of the public service. It was Lincoln who said, "You can fool some of the people all of the time, and all of the people some of the time, but you can't fool all the people all of the time;" and I think we have heard some hon. gentlemen on the back benches opposite express themselves to that effect; they will be an element to be dealt with. Robbers, thieves and dishonest men are allowed to go abroad in this Dominion, fleecing unsuspecting people in the rural districts. They are allowed to go among our people and sell whatever they like. This House should immediately pass a law similar to the "blue sky" laws on the other side of the international boundary. Just a short time ago I had the experience of trying to recover some notes and cheques for poor people in the rural sections who had been fleeced by one of the most nefarious characters in this country. He came from Colorado and had been in St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary for thirteen days when the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) had him released, as the man told me himself. As soon as he got out he fleeced the people of this country to the extent of $200,000 by putting false names on cheques and notes, and now he is back in St. Vincent de Paul for five years, and I hope to God he never gets a day short of it. So there is something else for the Government to do besides spending money foolishly.

Not long ago the Borden Government bought the Ross rifle factory, which was turning out a rifle that was a life saver for the Germans and death for our boys. Soldiers from the front have told me that they have pulled and pulled and the rifle would not go off, and the Germans came up smiling and then our boys had to use the other end of the gun on them. We have it from good authority in England that Great Britain could make all the Lee Enfields and small guns required for the Canadian forces, but nevertheless the Borden Government went ahead and bought this obsolete factory—I do not know for just what price, but they fooled away many millions of dollars. Why did they not wait until the war was over and buy it as junk—because it is only junk. I have a thousand such charges which I could make to-night, but I will not inflict them on the House, because it is no use. I am sorry none of the Cabinet ministers are here, but what can we do? We can only sit here and let them make the laws of this country by Orders in Council. It is the grand Cabinet of twenty-one or twenty-three members, I do not know which, who are doing the business of this country. I do hope that this country will not lose its democracy. I have every sympathy with the Government in this terrible war. I have no particular fault with the Budget except that the Government have taxed the breakfast table, and taxed nearly everybody in this land, but perhaps it will have a salutory effect on the people of Canada, who, when they have to dig down into their pockets, will take an interest in the proceedings of this House.

On motion of Mr. James McIsaac (Kings, P.E.I.), the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean, the House adjourned at 12.42 a.m. Thursday.

Thursday, May 2, 1918.

The House met at Three o'clock.

3. Under the British North America Act, has the Dominion Government the right to issue licenses for trading, or collect fees for the same?

4. Has there been a decision of the Privy Council on this question and did that Court give the sole right to license, to Provincial Governments?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In reply to question No. 1, the Canada Food Board was established under the War Measures Act, 1914. The remaining questions seem to ask for a legal opinion upon the interpretation of Statutes, and it is not usual to give such opinions in answer to questions.

ONTARIO MINING TAX ACT.

*Mr. MURPHY:

1. Has any application been made to the Government for the disallowance of the Ontario Statute, 7 George V, Chapter 7, assented to 12th April, 1917, which amended the Ontario Mining Tax Act, or as to any portion of the same relating to (1) the taxation of nickel, or nickel-copper mines, or (2) the ascertaining of the profits of nickel or nickel-copper mines?

MILITARY SERVICE ACT—EXPENDITURES.

Mr. PROULX:

Referring to the return showing the total amount expended up to the date of the said return in connection with the enforcement of the Military Service Act—

How much has it cost per man to secure each soldier enrolled under the said Act?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

The total expenditure to date incurred in connection with the Military Service Act is $1,803,581.61. This total expenditure includes the expenditures incurred in connection with the publicity campaign, the Dominion police, printing, subsistence and travelling expenses of men ordered to report for duty, and travelling expenses of men ordered to report for medical examination.

The registration of Class I men under the Military Service Act is, to date, 397,671. Therefore the total cost per registrant is $4.54.

There have been 39,760 Class I men actually placed on service to date, but to estimate the cost of securing these men, by the simple process of dividing the total number of men now on service into the total expenditure in connection with the enforcement of the Military Service Act to date, would not give a true estimate of the cost of drafting such men, for the reason that the greater percentage of the expenditure shown above has been spent in organization, the results of which are only now bearing fruit. One may safely say that every man drafted in future will materially reduce the cost of securing a recruit. It may therefore be plainly seen that at the present time it is impossible to estimate the cost of securing a recruit under the Military Service Act.

WAR INSURANCE PREMIUMS.

Mr. DESAULNIERS:

1. Is the Government aware that the Insurance companies charge an extra premium on insurance policies issued to enlisted men before such enlistment?

2. If so, is it the intention of the Government to pay the difference between the regular and the extra premium? If not, why?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. The Government is aware that on life insurance policies now being issued, and on such policies issued since the outbreak of war, extra premiums have as a rule been demanded in respect of military service. Policies in force at the outbreak of war have as a rule been continued without extra premium.

2. It is not the intention of the Government to pay the difference between the regular and the extra premium, for reasons which were fully explained to the House at the last session of Parliament. The discussion on this point will be found on pages 4019 and 4020 of Hansard for 1917.

CHAMPLAIN MARKET SITE.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR:

1. What area of ground and water frontage has been purchased by the Government for the Transcontinental Railway, between Sillery and the Champlain Market at Quebec?

2. What have these properties cost, and what use is intended to be made of them?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. The Transcontinental railway purchased all water frontage between Sillery and Champlain market at Quebec; 81.74 acres of land along said front.

2. (a) $1,039,377.02, which includes amount paid to the city of Quebec for Champlain market site.

3. These properties were acquired for right of way and station purposes of the National Transcontinental railway. They are available for future developments, docks and yards and wharves, in connection with the railway.

TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY QUEBEC SHOPS.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR:

Is it the intention of the Government to put into operation the workshops of the Transcontinental Railway in the City of Quebec, so as to carry out the agreement entered into between the Commissioners of the Transcontinental Railway, acting for the Government, and the Corporation of the city of Quebec, dated August, 1910?

Hon. Mr. REID: Yes, whenever required.

NORTHWEST GRAIN TRADE.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR:

Is it the intention of the Government to take any steps to put a stop to the diversion of the grain trade of the Canadian Northwest, two-thirds of which is now being shipped at United States sea ports, and to give this trade to Canadian ports?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is necessary, under war conditions and in view of the submarine peril, to utilize from time to time all Atlantic ports on this continent.

HALIFAX RECONSTRUCTION WORK.

Mr. BOURASSA:

1. Has the Government been informed that mechanics have been hired to go to Halifax in connection with reconstruction work, with the understanding that their return fare would be paid provided they remain at work during a period of three months?

2. If so, is the Government aware that in spite of that promise, travelling expenses have been kept back from the wages of mechanics, even from those who have been at work for more than three months?

3. Has the Government been informed that after a lapse of more than one month after notification given by Colonel R. S. Low, manager of reconstruction works in the Finance Department, a certain number of mechanics have not yet received the balance of their wages?

4. Is it the intention of the Government to order these men to be paid what they are entitled to and to be reimbursed with the moneys retained?

Hon. Mr. CROTHERS: 1. No.
2, 3 and 4. Answered by answer to No. 1.

DOMINION-WIDE PROHIBITION.

*Mr. CANNON:

1. Prior to or during the General Election which took place on the 17th of December last, did the President of the Council have an interview or interviews with Mr. Samuel Carter, M.P.P., for South Wellington, regarding the question of temperance or Dominion-wide prohibition?

2. If so, did the President of the Council represent the Government at the said interview or interviews, and had he authority to act for the Government?

4. If so, did the President of the Council request the said Mr. Samuel Carter, or was it arranged at the said interview or interviews between the said President of the Council and the said Mr. Samuel Carter, that the said Mr. Samuel Carter should consult W. A. Warburton, General Secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association and Chairman of the Committee of One Hundred, and the Reverend T. A. Moore, of the Methodist Church, with a view to lining up the Temperance and Moral Reform and religious denominations in Ontario in support of the Union Government, on the secret pledge or intimation that if the Union Government was returned, Canada would be made bone-dry, or that some other drastic measure would be taken in connection with Temperance?

5. In consequence of such request or arrangement, is the Government aware that the said Mr. Samuel Carter consulted Messrs. Warburton and Moore and that the said Messrs. Moore, or either of them, to further the line of action which he had been authorized to take by the President of the Council, or which the President of the Council knew he was to engage in?

7. Was the President of the Council aware of the advertisements published by the Citizens' Committee and by the Unionist Party Publicity Committee in the Canadian Baptist, of the 13th of December, 1917, and the Presbyterian Review, of the same date, and other Protestant religious papers of the same date?

8. Did W. A. Warburton, or any one connected with the Citizens' Publicity Committee, or the Unionist Party Publicity Committee, submit such advertisements to the President of the Council or to his private secretary?

9. If the foregoing was not the understanding or agreement arrived at between the President of the Council and the said Mr. Samuel Carter and others, what arrangement was made between the President of the Council and Mr. Samuel Carter, or with Mr. Samuel Carter and others, at the interviews which the said President of the Council had in connection with the secret assurance regarding the position that he and the Union Government would take on the Temperance question?

10. Did the President of the Council assure the said Mr. Samuel Carter at one of the interviews above referred to that if the Union Government did not carry out the views of the President of the Council and Mr. Samuel Carter in respect to prohibition, that the President of the Council would withdraw from the Cabinet?

11. Was it arranged or suggested by the President of the Council or by the said Mr. Carter at any of the interviews between the President of the Council and Mr. Carter, that the arrangement with regard to Temperance was to be kept secret, and that the issue to be presented by W. A. Warburton and others associated with him should be the policy outlined in the advertisements above-mentioned, namely, that Conscription was the only issue?

12. Did the President of the Council subsequently learn from the said Mr. Samuel Carter of the result of his conference with Messrs. W. A. Warburton, Moore, and others, that they were willing to accept the secret assurance and take the necessary steps to line up the Temperance, Moral, Social and religious denominations and their supporters and adherents in support of the Union Government?

13. In the agreements or assurances given by the President of the Council to Mr. Samuel Carter, did the President of the Council have the authority of the Government to enter into the same on behalf of the Government?

14. Was any other arrangement or assurance entered into between the President of the Council and Mr. Carter, or with Mr. Carter and Messrs. Warburton, Moore, and others, or any of them, respecting any other measure of moral or social reform?

15. Is the Mr. Samuel Carter above referred to the gentleman named by the Government authorities or the Minister of Militia to take the registration for the Georgian Bay District of the man-power of that district?

16. If Mr. Carter is the same gentleman above referred to, was he named by the President of the Council for such position, and what recommendations were given before such appointment was made?

17. Did any of the recommendations to the Government for the appointment of Mr. Samuel Carter urge that he should be rewarded on account of the efforts which he had put forward in connection with the secret campaign for temperance at the last election?

18. Was Mr. Samuel Carter appointed by the Government to the position of Registrar by reason of the activities which he showed on behalf of the Union Government during the last election?

19. Was Mr. J. M. Godfrey at any time prior to or during the election in conference with the President of the Council and Mr. Samuel Carter regarding the line of campaign to be adopted in the Province of Ontario?

20. Is the Mr. J. M. Godfrey appointed as Registrar for the District of Toronto to take the manhood power, the same Mr. J. M. Godfrey who acted as Chairman for the promotion of a Union Government at the meeting in the Arena, Toronto?

21. If the said J. M. Godfrey is the gentleman who acted as Chairman of the Arena Conference in Toronto in connection with the advocacy of the formation of Union Government, was he appointed to his present position on the recommendation of the President of the Council, and was the appointment given to him as a reward for the support of the Union Government at the last election?

22. Did the said Mr. J. M. Godfrey and the said Mr. Samuel Carter while actively supporting Union Government at the election in December last, publicly endorse the policy advocated by the Union Government of abolishing Party Patronage?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN:

1 to 6 and 9 to 14 inclusive. Shortly after the Union Government was formed, the Prime Minister brought the question of Prohibition to the attention of his colleagues and submitted to them copies of a memorial which had been received during the summer of 1917 regarding the prohibition of the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor in Canada. The Prime Minister advised that he had informed the committee which had presented the memorial, that the matter would be submitted to the members of the Union Government, when formed, for their consideration. After prolonged and most careful consideration of the whole matter in all its aspects, the Government reached the conclusion already announced, and embodied in several Orders in Council passed under the War Measures Act.

The action taken by the Government was not the result of any conference, agreement or compact with any party or parties relating to the election or any matters connected therewith, but was taken by the Government solely from the standpoint of the public interest.

7 and 8. No.

15. Yes.

16. No. Mr. Carter only accepted the position as a matter of public duty and on the understanding that he was not to receive any personal compensation for his work.

12. Have any of the articles written by the said Beaufort and sent by him to The Christian Science Monitor at Boston, been censored? If not, why not?
13. Has the Chief Censor for Canada any reason for believing that the said Beaufort has desisted from the practices that led to his dismissal from the Government Service? If so, on what is such reason based?
14. Will the intercepted letters on other documents written by Beaufort and handed over to the Chief Press Censor for Canada be land on the table of the House, or placed at the disposal of a Special Committee of the House should one be appointed to inquire into and report upon Beaufort's conduct as a member of the Chief Censor's Staff and of the Parliamentary Press Gallery?
15. How much was paid the said Beaufort while in the Government employ?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL: Respecting questions 1, 2, 3 and 15, Mr. Beaufort was employed on the Chief Press Censor's staff from July, 1916, to June 30, 1917. He was recommended by the Chief Press Censor. He did work as German translator and was paid $4 a day. In regard to other questions, Mr. Beaufort was not under surveillance and was not dismissed. His services were no longer necessary as the work he was engaged in had considerably decreased. The Government is not aware of the circumstances connected with Mr. Beaufort's subsequent employment. All articles from the Press Gallery are treated alike. As to further matters alluded to, the files and documents of the Chief Press Censor's office are necessarily secret and confidential, and it is not in the public interest to disclose them.

3. Did such sub-committee deal with any regulations, orders or report proposed or made by the said Commissioner? If so, what action was taken?
4. At the time the said sub-committee dealt with such proposed regulations, orders or interim report, did Honourable N. W. Rowell have any financial interest in the Toronto Globe or the Toronto Star?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN:

1. Yes.

6. Mr. Rowell took no such step except in so far as he may have communicated to the Commissioner the opinion of Council with regard to the scope of the investigation, and this he did in the discharge of his duty as President of the Council.

7. The sub-committee alluded to is still acting, when necessary, within the scope of its duties.

RELIGIOUS SERVICES FOR ROYAL FLYING CORPS.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Is it a fact that at the different camps of the Royal Flying Corps situated in the Province of Ontario, and particularly at Queen's Park, there are no church parades held to enable members of the different religious denominations to perform their religious duties? If so, why?

2. Is it a fact that at the above mentioned camps of the Royal Flying Corps, there is no Chaplain, specially assigned to attend to the religious welfare of the men now undergoing training? If so, why?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The camps of the Royal Flying Corps situated in the province of Ontario and elsewhere on this continent are under the direction of the British authorities, and not under the direction of the Government of Canada. It has been represented to this Government that there should be greater opportunity for the members of the Royal Flying Corps in camps in this Dominion to attend religious services, and this matter has been taken up in correspondence with the officers in charge of the camps.

MILITARY SERVICE.

TEMPORARY LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO FARMERS FOR SEEDING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The Minister of Militia and Defence stated the other day that the young men would not be taken from the farms until after those in the cities and towns had been called to report, but as a matter of fact young men on the farm are being called to report right along. Is any provision being made whereby these young men will be allowed to return to the farm temporarily until the men in the cities and towns have been called out?

Major-General MEWBURN: I think I stated clearly the other day that a request had been sent to the Registrars under the Military Service Act, in sending out notices to the young men between the ages of twenty and twenty-two inclusive to report, to first give notice to the young men living in urban centres. I understand that in some cases instructions have not been carried out to the letter, as there has been diffiuclty in ascertaining just who are and who are not farmers. I asked the Military Service Council to send another wire out to-day urging that our request be conformed with as far as possible. We are now endeavouring to arrive at some means whereby young men of this age who are in the midst of seeding operations, after reporting—it is necessary to report because otherwise the machinery would be complicated—shall be allowed to return to their farms for a couple of weeks to complete their seeding, and I hope arrangements to this end will be completed to-night.

Mr. P. MICHAUD (Restigouche and Madawaska): In the northern part of New Brunswick the seeding season lasts until the 15th or 20th of June. In the case of farmers in that section of the country two weeks' leave of absence would be altogether too short, and I would ask the minister to extend their leave.

Major-General MEWBURN: We are giving every consideration to the conditions existing in every province of the Dominion, and if it is possible to carry out that suggestion we shall endeavour to do it. But it depends entirely upon the urgency of the call for men.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Has the provision which has always been usual in war time been made, that the only son of a widow and the sole support of a family shall not be taken at all, whether or not they are on the farm?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think that matter was dealt with in the statement which the Minister of Militia and Defence made on Tuesday. I understand that his statement embodies all that can be said on that subject at the present time.

[Mr. Edwards.]

THE RETURNS OF THE LAST GENERAL ELECTION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright): It has been the custom to give the returns of a general election in printed form. Will that be done this year?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I understand the report has already been printed. A statement of the results of the last general election was prepared in printed form and placed at the disposal of hon. members about two weeks ago, I think. Perhaps what my hon. friend has in mind was a return in somewhat different form.

Mr. DEVLIN: I mean a return similar to the one printed after the twelfth general election giving the votes by polling divisions.

Mr. SPEAKER: The report is in course of preparation and will be issued in due course.

Mr. DEVLIN: Will there be a separate column in the report for the women voters?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I could not answer that without ascertaining what steps the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery is taking, but it seems to me that any such proposal would be attended with a great deal of difficulty.

THE NEW TOBACCO TAX.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. B. McCOIG (Kent, O.): Would the Acting Minister of Finance say whether the 5 per cent tax on Canadian-grown tobacco will apply to all qualities of tobacco? The reason I ask is that in many seasons we have early frosts in different parts of Ontario which damage the crop, and the tobacco has to be sold at five or seven cents a pound. Would the tax be applied in such a case?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The regulations will provide that in the event of the destruction of tobacco from any cause there will be a remission of the duty.

CORRECTION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. M. R. BLAKE (North Winnipeg): I wish to correct some figures I gave yesterday in reference to direct taxation. As I pointed out yesterday, the Department of Trade and Commerce have not accurate figures of the assessment of this country; they put the figures at five billions. I have no means of verifying this figure, nor has the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In the case of Winnipeg and Montreal, for example—we can take their assessment figures as about right—one mill on the dollar of direct taxation would produce one million dollars from these two cities. The full assessment of Canada does not differ fifty times over. The figures are only approximate, but I wanted to correct that point, as direct taxation, I feel, is a matter of urgent importance.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

ALLEGED UNLAWFUL DETENTION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): The right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) made inquiry with regard to an item which appeared in a newspaper, the Ottawa Journal, I believe, to the effect that the father of two young men, who were defaulters under the Military Service Act, had been arrested and was being held as a hostage. I have caused inquiry to be made, and the statement, as might have been expected, turns out to be entirely unfounded. The facts are that a man named W. Humphke, who had two sons liable to service under the Military Service Act, was arrested by the municipal chief of police and carried to Pembroke for having in his possession deer skins out of season under the provincial law and was held pending trial at Pembroke. The two young men who were defaulters, whether in their own minds they connected the arrest in any way with their default or not, did subsequently come forward and surrender themselves. There was no connection whatever between the two matters.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

ALLEGED CONFISCATION OF EXEMPTION PAPERS.

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Prevost) asked a question with regard to the report of an incident which was said to have transpired in the town of Terrebonne. It was said that a young man had been accosted by the police, that his exemption papers had been taken from him because, it was said, they were not in proper order, that he was detained, and only discharged in the evening after communication with the registrar. Another alleged ground of complaint apparently was that there were too many police officers in Terrebonne. I have caused inquiry to be made, and it is reported to me that the facts are that the inspector in Montreal endeavours, wherever it is possible, to get the co-operation of the local chief of police. For some reason that was not procurable at Terrebonne, and, in consequence, the inspector having received information that there were a certain number of defaulters in and around that place, made the necessary arrangements to investigate. In connection with the case of the man named as having had his papers taken from him, it was reported that his papers were not in order, and in order to prevent the man losing any time from his work, a constable took his papers, telephoned the registrar during the course of the afternoon and returned them to the man when he came along after his work.

ENLISTMENT IN ROYAL FLYING CORPS AT QUEBEC.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX: I have been asked by the president of the committee of the Royal Flying Corps at Quebec City to communicate to the House the following information:

> It may be of interest to the country at large to know that applications for Royal Flying Corps are pouring into my office from Quebec and rural districts; all well educated young men and belonging to good families.
>
> (Sgd) Adelard Tourgeon.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

ALLEGED IMPRISONMENT OF RETURNED SOLDIERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Major-General MEWBURN: Mr. Speaker, I might be permitted to reply to a question asked by the hon. member from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) with regard to a report in a paper a few days ago that a returned soldier had been placed under arrest and held in the jail at the Soo. I made inquiries regarding that matter and I have a report to show that this man was really not a soldier; that he never had anything to do with the Canadian Expeditionary Force, but that he was for some time employed as a Soo canal guard. Subsequently to that he got drunk, created a disturbance, was arrested by the civil police, was fined, but preferred to stay in jail rather than pay his fine. He was not a soldier at all.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Where did he get the liquor?

MEDICAL SERVICE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir SAM HUGHES: The following cable appears in the Montreal Gazette of to-day:

Dr. Bruce of Toronto to visit United States.

An important British commission will shortly visit the United States. It is composed of three prominent surgeons who will attend the National Medical Association at Chicago, and other gatherings. It is understood that Dr. Bruce, of Toronto, now with the Imperial Medical Service in France, will be a member of the commission and represent the body with which he is serving at the front.

I would like to ask the Government if, in view of the scandalous condition in which the medical service is reported to be in England, it is the intention to continue Dr. Bruce in charge of the medical service, or to reinstate him.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If he is going to the United States he could not very well be in England.

Sir SAM HUGHES: You might stop him.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In so far as the Canadian Medical Service in Great Britain is concerned, I have no information whatever that would justify the reflection that has been cast upon it by my hon. friend. My information is absolutely contrary to the opinion which he has just expressed.

ROYAL FLYING CORPS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir SAM HUGHES: I understand that more than fifty per cent of the members of the Royal Flying Corps are young Canadians. In view of that fact are any steps being taken whereby our men may be constituted a separate body from the Royal Flying Corps, whereby the Canadians would be able to form squadrons of their own, and whereby Canadian officers who have given very excellent service might be recognized by being promoted to some of the senior positions? There are one or two subordinate positions given them but that is about all.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will take into consideration the inquiry that the hon. gentleman has made and answer him on another day. He will recognize the difficulties which seem to stand in the way of organizing the Canadian flying men in a distinctive unit.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I knew all the difficulties and I had them removed.

[Mr. Lemieux.]

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am bound to say that such information never reached me. If my hon. friend will give us a suggestion as to how the difficulties may be removed, we should be very happy to consider his proposal. The difficulties which arose seemed to be pretty serious, but this is not the time to enter upon a discussion of the matter. It is possible that something might be done along the line which the hon. gentleman suggests, but I am not prepared to say to-day whether it is possible or not.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I want to ask the right hon. gentleman—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member cannot pursue the matter further.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Just a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not in order to have a discussion—

Sir SAM HUGHES: There is no discussion.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not in order to have a discussion on the Orders of the Day.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the information. I am well aware of it. However, I may ask a question. May I recall—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Sir SAM HUGHES: May I ask the right hon. gentleman if he proposes—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member cannot recall anything at this stage.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Well, then, I will ask the question: Does the Prime Minister not remember the fact that he took his information from the wrong source rather than from the right source in connection with these matters in days gone by?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have always endeavoured to take it from the best source available.

THE BUDGET.

The House resumed the debate on the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean (Acting Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means (resumed from May 1).

Mr. JAMES McISAAC (Kings, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the House for the first time, I crave that indulgence which is always so readily granted to a new member when he makes his maiden speech. The questions now before the House are so important and so far-reaching that those of us who are unaccustomed to parliamentary debate are encouraged to take the opportunity to express our opinions with a feeling of less timidity than we would otherwise entertain. It is not my intention, in fact it would be extremely presumptuous of me as a new member, to discuss the questions now before us at very great length, but permit me to say that in my humble judgment the Acting Minister of Finance deserves to be highly congratulated on the excellent Budget Speech which he delivered—the most comprehensive and most important Budget Speech ever delivered in the Parliament of Canada, and under the most momentuous circumstances that ever faced a finance minister of this country in presenting the annual financial statement. The new taxation imposed involves a number of new departures and is in many respects drastic, but, Sir, under the existing circumstances there is not a member of the House, there is not a loyal Canadian, who will not cheerfully accept the impositions called for and endeavour to meet them so far as he is able.

The assembling of Parliament annually for the granting of supplies is a basic feature of our system of responsible government, and the procuring of ways and means wherewith to administer the public business imposes upon those charged with the affairs of government a serious and onerous obligation. If that is true in normal times, it is far more so at a time like the present when such serious conditions confront us. The result of the financial operations of the year, as disclosed by the Acting Minister of Finance, seems to me to be quite satisfactory; that is to say, all the ordinary or civil expenditure of the country has been provided for, and there is available the sum of $55,000,000 to be devoted towards paying off the debt created by the war. In the debate which has so far taken place upon the Budget, as well as in the discussions which have occurred on other occasions since the opening of Parliament, two questions have been deemed by hon. members opposite to be of primary importance in dealing with the serious situation which the war has created: One consists of a demand for the removal of the duties on agricultural implements, and the other is founded on the cry that if men are taken from the farm food production will seriously suffer. With regard to the first, I cannot pretend to any expert knowledge as to the merits or demerits of the subject, and, therefore, I will not venture to discuss it. But I understand, and I have heard the statement made repeatedly here, that it has been agreed that all matters of this kind should remain in abeyance until the war is over. So far as regards the denuding the farm of labour is concerned, all will admit that it is a serious proposition, but it must be remembered that a far more serious proposition is waiting to be disposed of: The Hun is at the gate, the very existence of our Empire is trembling in the balance, civilization and liberty are in jeopardy, and the call is for men, more men, and still more men. I admit that serious inconvenience, and even hardship, will be caused to many by the taking of able-bodied men from the farm, but, Sir, this is a time when all our people are called upon to make some sacrifice, and I do not apprehend that the consequences to farm operations, as a result of conscripting our manhood, will be as serious as some would like to make us believe. Even after all our young men of military age have been called to the colours, we know there will be a certain percentage who cannot conform to the physical standard required by the Military Service Act, and such persons will be available for work on the farm. Again, there are a great many men employed in non-essential industries in our large cities, and these I think could also be commandeered to some extent to do farm work. The objection has been raised by the practical farmers, "Oh, such men do not know how to do farm work." Even so, Mr. Speaker, we must endure the inconveniences and hardships involved, and solve the problem as best we can. The great problem that faces us, and which we must do our best to solve, is to do our utmost to send men overseas to beat back the invaders.

Sir, we know, and it is a matter of record, that, at the special session of Parliament held in 1914, regardless of political parties or affiliations, Parliament and people were unanimous in declaring that they were behind those men, to the last man and the last dollar, who first went forth to do battle for Canada in the allied armies. Those sons of Canada who have distinguished themselves as brave soldiers, in numerous battles—Courcelette, Vimy Ridge, and other scenes of carnage—were assured when they went to fight for Canada's cause that Canadians to a man would stand behind them; and those forty thousand brave sons of Canada who made the supreme sacrifice for their country, and are now sleeping in Flanders fields, died with the conviction that their death would be avenged, because they were told when they left home that Canada was behind them to the last man and the last dollar. Our friends on the opposite side appear to question or to demur as to whether they should enter into the matter of supplying men or of doing what is necessary, or at least of doing so with enthusiasm and spontaneity, for they say: "The Government did not do this and that thing as it should have been done; the Government have made mistakes; therefore why should we show any enthusiasm in rallying to their support now?" Let us see: suppose we admit that the Government has made mistakes. Is there any Government that has not made mistakes? Has the British Government not made many mistakes in this war, as it has made in some other wars? The wonder to my mind is that Canada in this titanic undertaking has made so few mistakes. Canada had no knowledge, at least very little practical knowledge, of warfare. She knew little of recruiting men and making soldiers of them, or equipping and sending them to the scene of battle. She was engaged in peaceful pursuits, developing her great natural resources, when the war broke out. But, Sir, in face of all that, Canada did a marvellous thing when, within the space of a few weeks, she sent a flotilla of transports across the Atlantic carrying 33,000 trained Canadian soldiers who, but a few short weeks or months before, were all civilians. That is something for which Canada should get credit and of which she might well be proud. It is true that she has received encomiums. The United States, which had not then entered the war, that great nation, our last and greatest ally, of one hundred million people, say: We take off our hat, we bow to Canada for her extraordinary achievements in this war.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McISAAC: Canada became a name to conjure with in Great Britain, in France, and on the continent of Europe in consideration of what she has done, and of what she is still doing, towards upholding her place, her dignity and her prestige in this struggle.

There is something else that Canada has done in consequence of the war which has brought her before the world in, I might say, an envious light. She has become a great financial country. Before the war, when Canada needed money, she went abroad to borrow it. But the time came when it was very difficult, indeed next to impossible, for Canada to obtain money from other countries. She then turned to her own people, and you know, Mr. Speaker, the record of the loans that have been placed in Canada, the generous, enthusiastic, and overwhelming response Canadians have made by pouring their money and treasure into the coffers of the country for the purpose of carrying on the war. In this respect Canada has established herself among the nations in an important light, of which a few brief years ago we scarcely had any conception. Having done so much, it is our duty to continue in well-doing. When the Minister of Finance comes down to Parliament and asks for almost a billion dollars, there is no murmuring; every one is satisfied that this money must and shall be raised, and that that portion of it which it is necessary to raise by borrowing, apart from taxation, can be furnished by our people when the loans are issued, as has been done before. In view of all these things, we have reason to be proud of our country, and it is our duty to continue to make sacrifices even greater than those we have so far been called upon to make. The one thing necessary is to win the war. For, Mr. Speaker, should we fail, should the Hun break through, what would be the good to us of our farms, or our money, or anything else we possess and cherish most dearly? The iron hoof of the invader's war horse would despoil our country; we would become serfs; civilization would be wiped from the face of our land, and freedom and constitutional liberty would be trampled under foot. God forbid that there should be any reason for believing that this will take place—but the possibility exists. Under these circumstances, Sir, is any sacrifice too great to be made by an honest, honourable and patriotic people? I have all along been convinced that a great many of us in Canada have not taken the war with sufficient seriousness. Look at the conditions across the Atlantic, in England, Scotland, France, Belgium. No able-bodied men are found there; farming operations are carried on by women, old men and young boys. Yet we murmur if we are subjected to some inconvenience; if we are not allowed to carry on our farming and our fishing operations just as we have been doing all along. The venerable member for Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon) who addressed the House the other night, desires that the fishermen shall be allowed to carry on their business until the 1st of September, when they will be willing to enlist. In order that such a course should be of benefit to Canada, the hon. gentleman should have a conference with the Kaiser and ask him to restrain his forces until that time. That is the way these extreme proposals present themselves to me. However, I am satisfied that the men will be procured and that not such great inconvenience will be suffered by the farmers and fishermen as hon. gentlemen are disposed to conjure up. In any event, the winning of the war is the one and only grand and paramount object which we ought to have constantly before us.

Having said so much about the immediate question involved in the motion before you, Sir, I may be permitted to discuss a question which peculiarly affects the province from which I come. I refer to communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. Doubtless some of the older members of the House have often heard the complaint of members from Prince Edward Island; as a matter of fact, when the Island members made their statement regarding their disabilities in the matter of winter communication, the press used to say that it had been "Prince Edward Island day" in the House of Commons. Sir, I shall not inflict any wail or complaint upon you, but I wish to give a brief history of the winter navigation of the straits between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. To many members of the House the subject may not be of particular interest, but it is my duty to those whom I represent to raise my voice here with regard to the disabilities of Prince Edward Island, in the matter of railway facilities and winter communication.

It is a misfortune, perhaps, to live on an island. The people are necessarily shut off from other lands by water, and in northern latitudes, where the water congeals in winter, it is a serious problem to be on an island. We are isolated, and, if I may play upon the word, we are and have been ice-olated during the winter. But if we have been isolated, and if we have been ice-olated, I think it cannot be said that we are insulated; that we come here with insular ideas, or are not sufficiently broad-minded and magnanimous to meet the views of our friends from the other provinces. It is said that people born on an island sometimes have insular ideas, but I shall endeavour to show that I am not one of them, and that if there is anything like that in my make-up, it is something over which I have no control and for which I cannot properly be held responsible.

On account of our being in this isolated condition, the crossing of the straits of Northumberland during winter has been a very serious, difficult and hazardous undertaking. During all the days before Confederation, this was our condition. Some gentlemen here to-day may have gone through the experience of crossing the Straits in winter, the crossing being made in ice boats to which the passengers were, in a sense, harnessed with straps over their shoulders. They paid their fares and worked their passages, too. Of course, under these conditions passenger traffic between the Island and the mainland during the winter was not extensive; no one left during the winter season unless it was absolutely necessary for him to do so.

The first meeting to bring about the confederation of the provinces was held in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, which may justly be called the cradle of Confederation. Curiously enough, when Confederation was consummated in 1867, Prince Edward Island did not join the union because she thought that the terms offered were not such as would meet her necessities, the crux of the difficulty being the winter navigation of the straits. In 1873, however, when she thought the matter had been so arranged that there would be no further difficulty, Prince Edward Island, under what is known as the "better terms," became a province of the Dominion. In order that we may have a fair understanding of one of the conditions which induced Prince Edward Island to become a member of the Confederation and which was cited in the bond, I quote these words from the Imperial Order in Council under which Prince Edward Island came into the Dominion of Canada:

> Efficient steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers to be established and maintained between the island and the mainland of the Dominion, winter and summer, thus placing the island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial railway and the railway system of the Dominion.

That was the condition that the people of Prince Edward Island desired the most. Prince Edward Island became a member of the Dominion of Canada in 1873. About three and a half years later, the first attempt was made to implement the above promise by putting the steamer Northern Light on the route between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. The Northern Light, which was a fairly good ship with a wooden hull, commenced plying between Georgetown and Pictou on the 25th December, 1876. In that winter she managed to make thirty or thirty-five round trips between the island and the mainland, and for twelve years this was the only steamer, making anywhere from twenty-five to sixty round trips each winter. After the Northern Light had served for those twelve years, the Government of Canada supplied the steel steamer Stanley for service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. The Stanley was a splendid ship, well proportioned in regard to size and power. She was not a large ship; the horsepower of her engines was not very great, but she did good service. To show what an excellent ship the Stanley has been, after thirty years' service she is at the present time doing service for the Government of Canada. Just recently she was commissioned to go to the Magdalen Islands to take the first relief to those people after the winter. She has, as a matter of fact, been there during the winter, and she has been going around in the ice relieving other ships that have become ice-bound. On the 3rd day of January, 1900, the steamship Minto, which came out from the old country in the previous autumn, was put into the service in conjunction with the Stanley. She was a more powerful steamer than the Stanley, but it is a matter of doubt whether or not she did very much better service than the Stanley. Those two boats were doing pretty fair service. The Minto continued in the service until 1915. Later on the Earl Grey, a splendid ship, was commissioned for the service, and she started in the winter of 1909. The Earl Grey, which was a large ship, had very powerful engines, but I have been told more than once—I am not positive as to this—that her hull was not strong enough for her engine-power, and as a result she was unable to give as good service as she would had her hull been able to stand the full power of the machinery.

At this stage, before I proceed any further about the steamers, I wish to say this: As I said in the beginning, I am not here to complain as to the service which was done during those years by these steamers to keep up communication with the mainland in the winter time. I am simply giving a brief history of the service, and I am willing to give thanks where thanks are due. I am willing that those who did the service should receive due consideration and thanks therefor. While the steamers were doing fairly well there was in the minds of the people of Prince Edward Island all through those years an idea that those steamers were not giving such service as they considered would be carrying out, practically and fairly, the terms of Confederation. There was always that idea of instability, of lack of finality, that this was not the best service that could be had, and that some other means should be taken to bring about a better service. There grew up an idea that a tunnel could be constructed under the straits of Northumberland, a distance of nine miles, and that by that means the people of Prince Edward Island would have no difficulty, during the winter, in keeping in constant communication with the mainland. The agitation for the tunnel went on for a number of years, and assumed very considerable proportions. That shows the people down there were not satisfied, and that some better means of communication must be provided before the terms on which Prince Edward Island entered Confederation could be regarded as having been satisfactorily carried out. At different times the leading statesmen of Canada have had occasion to visit Prince Edward Island, generally in the summer, but sometimes in the winter. These distinguished visitors who came in the winter time were subjected to all the hardships and inconvenience entailed in crossing the Strait of Northumberland by an iceboat. I might add that there was hardly a winter when the iceboats had not to be used for a month or two, as the steamers could not get through the ice. Very often the people would be without mail for several days, until the iceboats were brought into requisition. In 1891 the present leader of the Opposition in this House visited Prince Edward Island in the winter season, and I believe he was subjected to the hardship and inconvenience of crossing Northumberland Strait by an iceboat. The matter was brought to his attention at all events, and on his return he wrote a letter to the editor of the Charlottetown Guardian, dated February 19, 1891, as follows:

> Dear Sir: I have your favour of the 2nd of February. I hardly thought that an expression of opinion as to the construction of a tunnel to connect the Island of Prince Edward with the mainland should be required. Every man who has given any attention to the condition of things and the necessities involved by the Island entering into confederation must admit that such a tunnel must be constructed if the thing is reasonably practicable. The first thing to be done is to have an accurate survey and estimates. I am only sorry that it was not done long ago.

Yours very truly,
Wilfrid Laurier.

So in 1891 he was strongly in favour of a tunnel if at all practicable. A few years afterwards the right hon. gentleman took the power reins in Canada. What representations were made to him thereafter regarding a tunnel I do not know, but I am informed, or misinformed, that he has never done anything towards building the tunnel except writing the letter I have just read. Let me tell what happened to those winter steamers. The largest of them all, the Earl Grey, was sold to the Russian Government in 1914, and in 1915 the Minto was also sold to that Government. There must be a tiny bit of regret in our souls when we reflect that these steamers, which have done such fine service in our part of the country, are now being used perhaps by the Bolsheviki or even by the Germans. I should like to read a despatch in a paper that has just been placed in my hands about the steamer Stanley. The ice seems to have a spite against the Stanley and never wants to let her get through. The despatch is as follows:

Halifax, N.S., May 2.—The Naval Department here has despatched a tug to the assistance of the Dominion Government steamer Stanley, before reported in distress at a point twenty-five miles off East Point, P.E.I., while en route from Louisburg, C.B., with mails for the Magdalen Islands. The first message from the Stanley stated that her rudder had been carried away. Last night the Marine and Fisheries Department had a wireless from her saying that temporary repairs had been made to the rudder, but that it was impossible for her to get through the ice floes.

I now turn to another phase of this question. In the year 1911 the right hon. gentleman who leads this Government visited Prince Edward Island. The question of winter communication between the Island and the mainland was brought before him and he made this statement (it may not be word for word, but it is substantially what he said):

I am willing to admit that in this beautiful and fertile province you have been labouring under serious handicaps ever since your entry into Confederation on account of your want of proper communication. I am so seriously impressed with this fact and the knowledge that although some serious attempts have been made to abate this condition, I may tell you that if elected to power I shall use every practical means either by tunnel, which has been much advocated, car ferry or some such mode best known to the scientists of to-day, to implement the terms of Confederation which thus far have been in abeyance.

This was the statement made in 1911. This was not a mere empty promise but it was a promise that had behind it earnestness, sincerity and the determination to fulfil it should the promiser be placed in a position where he would be able to do it. I want to tell you how that promise was carried out. A car ferry, the latest and greatest accomplishment of marine architecture and engineering, as far as icebreakers are concerned, was built for the service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland and came to Canada in the summer of 1915. It was placed in commission between the Island and the mainland in the winter of 1916. It was not placed where it is now plying for the reason that there were no terminals where the steamer could have docked. It plied between Charlottetown or Georgetown and Pictou, performing good service. It did not give its ideal service plying between these ports because the car ferry is a steamer on which there are two lines of rails that can accommodate six cars each. The ferry is capable of carrying twelve Intercolonial railway freight cars across the strait of Northumberland every time it makes a trip.

The cost of the car ferry was $670,000. In addition to supplying the steamer, terminals were arranged for, one on the Prince Edward Island side which now, most appropriately, bears the name of Port Borden, and one on the New Brunswick side at Cape Tormentine. These terminals cost $2,205,000. The car ferry and the terminals at present in operation cost $2,875,000. That, Sir, is the way in which the right hon. Prime Minister carried out his promise to Prince Edward Island.

But, that is not all. In order that the car ferry may be effective, that it may do the work which it was intended to do, it is necessary that the narrow gauge Prince Edward Island railway shall be standardized and become of the same gauge as the Intercolonial railway on the mainland, so that cars taking their departure from any part of Prince Edward Island may go through without transfer of freight to all portions of North America. The intention was to broaden the gauge of the Prince Edward Island railway, but, like many other projects of great importance contemplated by the Government, it became necessary, in consequence of the war, and the enormous expenditure involved in carrying it on, that the completion of this portion of the connection between Prince Edward Island and the mainland should wait until times are better and money will be easier to obtain.

During the past winter, for the first time, the car ferry plied between Port Borden and Cape Tormentine, and the success that has attended its operations during a winter of unprecedented severity has revolutionized the ideas of the people of the island regarding their connection with the mainland. They now feel for the first time that they are a part of Canada, that they are not isolated as they had been in past years. Here is the proof. There was not a day during the winter that the car ferry could not cross in these heavy ice flows, and on some days it made two or three round trips. It is able to make the passage in fifty minutes under favourable circumstances, and at no time was it more than three hours in making the crossing. There was not a day upon which it might not have crossed, although there were a few days when it did not cross, because there were no trains on either side and consequently nothing to cross for.

What we desire now is to have the Prince Edward Island railway standardized. We would like to see this work commenced as soon as possible, but no one realizes more fully than the people of Prince Edward Island that this is not a time when we should ask for extra appropriations when so much of our money is required to carry on the war. The standardization of the Prince Edward Island railway could be regarded in the light of a war measure. Prince Edward Island is an agricultural province, and it is extremely productive—in fact, we have really no idea of the extent of its productivity—but if facilities are afforded for the transportation of the island's products it is capable of increasing its agricultural production at least a hundredfold. If that be true, Sir, and if we can contribute that much more towards feeding the soldiers than we are now doing, would it not be sufficient ground for the Government undertaking the work of standardization without much delay? It is for the Government to say when that work shall begin, but the people of the island would like to see it started forthwith. If that were done the output of Prince Edward Island's products would be augmented to such an extent that it would be by no means a losing speculation for the Government.

Let me give further reasons why, in our opinion, it would be wise for the Government to undertake this work now. The operation of the narrow gauge car at present used costs about as much as the operation of the great car used on the Intercolonial railway, so that the improvement suggested would effect a saving there. Economies could also be brought about by a change in the system of handling produce. At present all freight shipped from Prince Edward Island goes to Port Borden, where it is transferred from narrow gauge to broad gauge cars, and then the cars are run on to the ferry and carried to the mainland. The cost of transferring freight in this way is from four to five thousand dollars a month. Now, taking the annual cost as $50,000 or $60,000, that amount capitalized would be equal to about $1,000,000, or, in other words, it would represent about one-half the cost of standardizing the road, as far as I am able to learn, in order to handle the increased volume of freight. Last year, owing to want of transportation, there were two million bushels of potatoes that could not be carried away from Prince Edward Island. More than that, the numerous steamships carrying freight from the island to other points—for example, to Newfoundland, Montreal, Boston and Halifax—have all, or nearly all, been eliminated owing to the abnormal conditions brought about by the war. As we all know, Mr. Speaker, almost any kind of vessel that is available is quickly picked up now for war transportation purposes, with the result that Prince Edward Island shipments are confined to the one route via Port Borden.

Another point arises in connection with the shipment of coal. In our province there are no coal mines, and coal has to be imported from Nova Scotia and other places. The volume of coal requiring to be transported by the car ferry, in addition to all the other products to which I have referred, represents something like forty thousand tons. There is this further point to be borne in mind: It is expected that Prince Edward Island, as a result of the campaign in favour of increased production, will this year have seeded some seventy-five thousand acres more. The product of that area, representing probably fifty-six thousand tons, will also need to be transported. All this great volume of freight, representing a total of something like 247,846 tons—calculating from the figures of last year's exports and taking into consideration the freight that was held up and could not be forwarded—will have to go by the car ferry during the present year. The present export facilities will therefore not be adequate, and when they involve a transfer it means delay and an increased outlay of money.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, I am not wearying the House, but even at the risk of doing so, I must present the case for my province. I am talking on behalf of those who sent me here and who expect me to do my duty, and it is in the humble endeavour to discharge that duty that I am making my plea to the House this afternoon.

In addition to the expenditures to which I have already referred it will cost, to begin with, probably four or five hundred thousand dollars to put the narrow-gauge railway as it now exists, into a condition for handling business this summer. Again, there is the further expense of transferring the freight, and handling the additional freight that will need transportation. These figures will indicate to you the extraordinary disadvantage from which Prince Edward Island is suffering at the present time; and in my opinion the improvements desired with the elimination of these extra costs would not involve such a large grant from the Federal exchequer as it would if none of these subsidiary conditions prevailed.

There are other items that might be introduced to swell present expenses. There are, for example, the claims against the Government which may be brought any day arising out of the loss of potatoes and other perishable goods owing to the failure of the narrow-gauge railway to move them from the Island. Adding all the items together, I estimate $936,409 as the amount which the Government stands called upon to pay under present conditions.

There are other reasons why the people of Prince Edward should have the railway gauge broadened and its standardization commenced. They are reasons which will be beneficial to the Dominion, and to Prince Edward Island especially. During the past winter, it cost $67,000 to fight the snowstorms blocking the road, which had to be shovelled out. Every one acquainted with railways will understand that with a broad gauge and more powerful engines the snow blockade could be better handled and its inconvenience reduced to a minimum at a much smaller cost.

There is the movement of certain perishable products also to be considered. In addition to being a great agricultural province, the richest and most abundant fisheries abound on our coast. The fresh fish industry would secure the best results from the quickest possible transportation to the markets on the mainland. If the beautiful fish that we catch on the coast of Prince Edward Island could be shipped from there in the morning and brought into Montreal, for instance, the next morning, fresh from the sea, would that not be something worth working for? Prince Edward Island would benefit by it, and certainly other parts of Canada would not lose by it. There are other perishable products which should get to the markets in the shortest possible time and in the best possible condition. We have no hope that this ever can be done until we have the gauge standardized. Standardization will come some time; we have got so far ahead now, and the conditions that I have laid down seem to me to be of sufficient force to be some inducement to the Government to take up the work at as early a date as possible. Altogether, apart from the sentimental question, there is no longer any doubt in Prince Edward Island about the feasibility of practical daily communication, winter and summer, between the island and the mainland. The problem involved in the winter navigation of the straits is solved, and we feel that, at least, we have taken the first and greatest stride forward towards being really part of Canada. We no longer feel ourselves isolated. We only wish the completing of the railroad standardization to make our railroad situation as that of any other part of Canada, and to enable us to ship our products from any part of the Island to any part of North America without breaking bulk, and that any passenger boarding a train on the Island will not be obliged to leave his car until he reaches his destination. These are reasons which appeal to us, and I wish I was sufficiently persuasive to convince the Government that now is the time to standardize the Prince Edward Island railway. If I could convince them, I feel sure that within a short time the work would be commenced.

I do not know that I shall trespass upon your patience any further, Mr. Speaker, unless to thank you very sincerely for the generous hearing that has been accorded to me, upon these matters so dear to the hearts of the people of Prince Edward Island, the first time that I have risen in Parliament to address you.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McIsaac) who has just taken his seat will pardon me if I do not follow him very much in the speech which he has just made. If I had any criticism to make of his speech, it would be that he was lacking, like some of us, in terminal facilities, in knowing where to stop. The great difficulty of the hon. member was where to begin. He began away too far back; if he had begun at the end of the railroad, as he should have begun, he would have been through with his business long ago. But, of course, when the hon. gentleman makes his next speech he will know better where to begin, and he will be shorter and more to the point. He will learn, of course, that if he desires to tell us that the sun is in the heavens, that the sea has its boundaries, and that they will not trespass them; that there is light and darkness—he can tell us these things without going back to Genesis and saying that the Lord created the heavens and the earth in a certain set number of days. Some of these things could have been taken for granted, and it would have shortened his time a good deal. However, there is great latitude to be given to men who speak for the first time in the House of Commons, and I rather congratulate my good friend on the way in which he presented his case.

Before I forget it, there is something else in connection with his speech which seems to be coming to us from that side of the House a great many times and from a great many members. It is this somewhat secretive agreement that was entered into some months ago evidently when the Union Government was formed. It was first mentioned in this House some three or four weeks ago by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) who made the open statement that there was such an agreement. There was no denial of it, except that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) was in his seat and I noticed that he ominously shook his head, which I took to be a disagreement with the hon. member's statement. However, the country had the advantage of hearing the statement of the hon. member for Brantford, but they did not see the Minister of Agriculture shake his head. So the statement of the hon. member goes uncontradicted. Last night we heard a revival of that statement by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) who told us again that there is such an agreement, and from his remarks we would gather that he is a party to it himself. To-day, the hon. member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. McIsaac), has once more stated that there is such an agreement. There are people in this country who would regard an agreement of that kind as unconstitutional and unparliamentary.

In dealing with public questions, representatives of the people in this House are supposed to be free agents, to be governed by the facts put before them, and it is at variance with the principles of proper representation that members should come into the House like sheep going to market, their legs tied and their heads in a bag, and do exactly what they are told. If they venture for a moment to differ from the course laid down for them, this agreement is pointed out to them. Some day an hon. gentleman on this side may move that this agreement be brought down—for, of course, we have every reason to believe that it is actually in existence. It will be interesting to learn when it was made and who are the parties to it.

I realize that any criticism we make of the Budget and of the Government should be sane, serious and well-founded, and that nothing be said that savours of a desire to impede the progress of the Government in the steps which it is taking to deal with the serious question now confronting the country. I think I may safely say that no criticism of an unfair kind has been made from this side of the House. I congratulate the Acting Minister of Finance upon the mechanical part of his speech—as to its style, construction and delivery—and, so far as it is consistent with the position I take, I congratulate him also upon his success in presenting to the House a very difficult and a very bad case. The hon. gentleman has disappointed some of his friends outside of the House by the ability he has shown in dealing with this very important matter. The Journal-Press, the special organ of the Prime Minister in this city, has, of course, a monopoly of the brains of this country and of the foresight and thought of the city of Ottawa. It is said that the editor of that great journal is in close touch with the Prime Minister, by whom he is guided in the more intricate and difficult questions with which he has to deal. Picking up this newspaper two or three weeks ago, I noticed that in an outburst of wisdom the Journal-Press had declared that surely the Prime Minister would not entrust such a very serious task as the delivery of the Budget speech to the incapable hands of the member for Halifax. For the sake of Nova Scotia and of auld lang syne, I am glad that the Acting Finance Minister has acquitted himself in such a way as to demand that the Journal-Press apologize and take back its gratuitous opinion of his capacity. We assure the hon. gentleman that whatever his friends over there may think of him, we on this side still have a lingering regard for him and hold a good opinion of his ability to deal with such important matters as have been dealt with in the Budget. Of course, in the minds of evilly-disposed persons there is a doubt as to the paternity of this speech. It is said that the speech was born in the United States of Canadian parents; that the hurried visit of the Prime Minister to New York recently was for the purpose of smuggling this infant into Canada and handing it over to the hon. gentleman who has presented it for christening to the House. Personally, I do not believe that. In any case, I give the Minister of Finance credit at least for not having written that part of it which refers to his own excellence and to all the wonderful things that he has accomplished.

Having said that much about the style and character of the Budget speech, a conscientious and God-fearing man like myself cannot say anything further in praise of it. The ridiculous suggestion is made that we have a surplus. That fallacy, that heresy, has been running through the speeches of the Minister of Finance ever since the war broke out. We always had a surplus in one part of the account and a deficit of some millions in another. The Acting Minister of Finance should not have been induced to incorporate in the Budget speech the statement that we had a surplus. To say that we had a surplus on ordinary expenditure might be tolerated. If since the war began we had continued the same revenue, the same taxation, the same sources of income that we had when the war broke out; if we had dealt only with ordinary expenditures and had something to the good, we might reasonably and with a fair degree of consistency say that we had a surplus on ordinary expenditure. But such is not the case. Immediately on the outbreak of war we levied war taxes. We levied business taxes, and we are getting money from stamps and from many other things which the minister mentioned in his Budget Speech. From the Business Profits War Tax the minister told us we are getting $21,271,283; from banks, $836,-724.28; from insurance companies, $385,-127.68; from trust and loan companies, $267,917.68; from inland revenue from railways, steamships, telegraph and cable companies, stamps, etc., $2,229,922.81; making a total, according to the speech of the minister, of $24,990,975.45. Besides those taxes which the minister has specified, there was the flat 7½ per cent extra duty which was placed upon the whole trade of every kind and description of the country. Possibly the minister could not tell us exactly what that amounts to, but it would probably amount to somewhere around $25,000,000. I am only guessing at the amount. At all events we have a specific tax of something like $50,000,000 or more, which we have collected from the people of this country as a special war tax. The minister has taken that $50,000,000 of special war tax, and he has applied it, with the rest of the revenue, to the ordinary business of the country, and then when he adds it all up, he does not put one cent of it to the credit of the war until he finds a surplus, and then he says: We have a surplus. It is perfectly clear to the most ordinary person that this is not a fair nor an honest way of stating the account. When we have gone after the people for special taxes for war purposes, they should be credited to the war, and if you are going to deal with special accounts, they should be kept evenly balanced, having the one fairly meet the demands of the other. When the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) in the past told us that we had surpluses, and when the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) to-day tells us that we have a surplus of $55,000,000, they are absolutely stating a case which is not fair, and which is not, so to speak, putting their cards on the table, and showing the people of this country exactly how the account stands. That is not dealing with us fairly, and we should have the account presented and stated just as it is, so as to let the Canadian people know exactly what they have to deal with. We, as representatives of the Canadian people, are willing to put everything we have into the pot in connection with war conditions, but on the other hand we have a perfect right, and it is the inalienable right of every taxpayer of this country, to know where every dollar goes and what is done with the moneys of the people. In the early stages of the war I remember well the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) making one of his eloquent speeches in this House, telling us that he, as a member of the Government, would begrudge the mis-spending of the moneys of the people for anything other than the purposes of the war. At that time, we expected that those words meant something, and that great care would be exercised in the expenditure of the moneys of the people in accordance with the true reason for which those extraordinary taxes were being collected. We are given part of the account, but we are not given all. It does not follow that, because our very hearts are set upon war duties, and because every nerve is strained to do our full duty in the war, we must be lax about other phases of our duty as representatives of the people, nor that the people of this country can be lax about the other branches of their business. If there ever was a time when proper care should be taken to safeguard every influence and opportunity for good and for the accumulation of wealth in this country, that time is the present. No advantage should be taken of the temper of the people and their feelings about expenditures, because in this time of war the people may not be as critical about expenditure as they otherwise would be. The closest attention should be given to expenditures, and we should know where every dollar goes.

This year there is a new departure in connection with some of the Estimates, and large amounts of money, that must come from the pockets of the people of this country for the purpose of carrying on the affairs of the country, are not being put into the Estimates at all in accordance with the old conditions. That is not right; that is not proper. If I should criticise the Government along those lines, I do so in accordance with my right as a representative of the people in this House. What is the good of sending men to this House unless they have a free hand and an open voice to place before you, Sir, and this country, what they regard as proper criticism and direction of the Government who, after all, are but directors of the big concern of the people of Canada to carry on, in the best way, what they regard the will of the people to be? That is the position, and that is the way in which the business of the House should be conducted. I complain, I find fault with and I criticise the Government, and I bring that criticism as squarely as I can before the people, that the Government have no business to endeavour to get money in the thousands of dollars, much less in the millions, and possibly the hundreds of millions, without putting that expenditure before the House and having the members pass it with the ordinary conditions attached to it as to how it shall be spent. That has not been done with the millions of dollars which we shall require for the purchasing of rolling stock and the operation of Government railways in this country. Why has that not been done? Is it because the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), or the Government has no confidence in the people? Is it because they are afraid that hon. gentlemen in this House are not big enough and broad enough and have not business ability enough to give them the money if it is properly required? And, are they afraid that we shall not place sufficient confidence in them to allow them to spend this money in the good old way? At all events we are, I am told, to pass an Act of Parliament by which we shall have nothing to say as to how this money is to be spent. That should not occur, and free agents in this House, whether they sit on the Government side or this side, should have something to say in the matter. We in this country are to-day in a condition when the people will not stand for monopoly of that kind, whether that monopoly is exercised by the Government under Orders in Council, or by concerns who have with the Government a pull which they should not have and which will perhaps induce and compel the Government to do things which they otherwise would not do. I submit that the temper of the Canadian people will not stand for that, and possibly we have stood too long for imposition of that kind. As far as expenditure of railway money is concerned, it is not in the Estimates at all, and if my hon. friend took the moneys he will require out of this $55,000,000 alleged surplus, the whole amount would be wiped out and there would not be even a shadow of a surplus left. In order to show a surplus, he leaves this expenditure out of sight altogether; but he deceives nobody.

We had a lecturing address from the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) last night, and I have not been able to tell exactly on which side he is. He reminded me of the fellow who was perhaps a little under the weather and who asked, when out walking, "Which is the other side of the street?" A man told him "There is the other side of the street over there." The man went over, and when he got across asked another man, "Is this the other side of the street?" "No," said the man, "the other side of the street is over there." "Well," said he, "that man over there told me this was the other side of the street." The hon. member for Springfield, I think, is somewhat in that position; it is difficult for him to find which is the other side of the street. However, he wanted to criticise us and criticise the leader of the Opposition. Of course he had to criticise the railway policy of the present Administration; had a right to do that, and a very excellent field for criticism. I will not weary the House by going very far into these railway criticisms, but somewhat in answer to the hon. member for Springfield, I must remind him that he has been in public life for a great many years. I have not the honour of his acquaintance, but I know he has been in this House before. He knows the history of the railway policies of the different parties in this country; how in 1903 the policy of my distinguished leader, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, was launched in this country for the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and launched in no hole-in-the-corner way, but in the most open manner possible. Before a sod was turned or a dollar expended on that magnificent enterprise the people of this country were appealed to, and their verdict was given on the Government's policy in connection with that great enterprise. It is well known that in 1904 the battle royal from the Atlantic to the Pacific was between the railway policy of the then leader of the Opposition, now the Premier of this country, and the railway policy of the Laurier Government, and the verdict of the people was overwhelmingly in favour of my right hon. leader. Whatever else there may have been a division on there was practically not a dissenting voice on that policy from coast to coast. So that, as far as the railway policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier is concerned and the course his Government took in connection with the railways of this country, he had the full sanction and approval of the people of this country. Again in 1908, after four years' work on the road, the people of Canada had the opportunity of passing judgment upon the railway policy of my right hon. leader again, and he was triumphantly returned to power. So satisfied were the people of Canada with his railway policy that during the campaign of 1908 the leader of the Opposition had really nothing to say about the railways at all. It was accepted by both parties that the proper course had been taken for the opening and development of this great country, of which we are all so proud and whose resources are so immense; it was this policy alone, within proper bounds, that was necessary to full discharge of the duty of any Government that might have been in power at the time. The difficulty is that new men have taken the wheel and are trying to work out the destinies of this country. Conditions which were all right in the hands of a master like the Premier of that day have become burdensome and too heavy to carry in the hands of people who do not understand the art of government as he did when he had control of the affairs of this country. The rod of empire has fallen into hands which are not capable of wielding it in his masterful way, and the mole has become a mountain and the grasshopper a load. The new men are unable to carry these matters along, and the result is that the financial conditions in connection with the railways are such that the Government of the day, if I am to judge from their actions, will not dare to bring before the House the real state of affairs in connection with railway matters. I would remind the hon. member for Springfield and the members generally who are supporting the Government that shortly after the Borden Government came into power in 1911 the Minister of Finance made his first speech in February of the following year. He was then, of course, fresh from his financing, fresh from the critical training which he had had as a financier, and anxious to discover any weak spots that could be found in the financial conditions of the country. There was a good deal of criticism then by newspapers supporting the Government of the railways the Government had on their hands at that time. If conditions were very bad, if there was anything that was dangerous to the finances of this country, or that might have a bad effect on the credit of this country I am sure the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) could very well have been entrusted with bringing that difficulty and weakness to the notice of Parliament and the country. Any person who wishes to see what he stated on that occasion can look up his speech. Of the financing of the country generally he spoke in glowing terms; he was delighted to find the country in such a prosperous condition, and glad that after every obligation had been properly met by the outgoing Government, that Government was able to hand over to him the sum of $40,000,000 to meet any fresh obligations that might arise; you will find that in his speech. He also said that while there was some criticism in connection with Grand Trunk Pacific, he was glad to be able to say that instead of that road being a burden or a debt on this country, it was a magnificent asset to the Canadian people.

That is the position as far as railway matters in this country were concerned at the time the Government of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), whom I am pleased to follow, passed over the reins of power to hon. gentlemen opposite. If there is anything wrong, if things are not what they were at the time they took charge, it is their lookout. It is for them to see that better, and more capable men are put in charge of the management, if necessary, and that the affairs of the country shall be looked after in a more efficient way in the future.

My hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. McIsaac), touched on local matters in his own province and if I very briefly touch upon a local matter in my own province, I am sure, that you, Mr. Speaker, will pardon me. I fully realize that the minds of the Canadian people are now directed to the one great purpose of winning this war and maintaining the standing of our country. Nevertheless, we have only the one Parliament to deal with the war and with other matters as well. Consequently, when members are speaking in this House, they may be excused if once in a while they digress a little or talk along other lines.

It is conceded, Mr. Speaker, that the production of food, and an abundance of supplies produced in this country for the support of our armies, is of equal importance to the furnishing of men at the front. Of course, the supplying of wheat, fish, and the other necessaries of life, has not the romantic appeal that there is in the boys' donning khaki and going to the front. There is not the same aspiration, the same pride about it, but at the same time, we must keep our feet on the ground all the time and realize that if the boy with the khaki and the gun and the yeoman's spirit that took him to the front is to do credit to himself, and if he is to withstand the hardships that are facing him, he must be looked after, cared for and well fed. Wheat, pork, potatoes, do not grow on the tree tops but they must be produced by the industry of the men and women on whom that responsibility falls. There must be conditions kept up in this country that will give our people an opportunity to provide these things which are so essential to our success in the war.

While touching on the questions of railways, I want to very briefly bring to the notice of the Government that in the province of Nova Scotia we have the most magnificent fishing grounds in any part of the world. I do not know very much about the fishing grounds of New Brunswick but I believe that from the State of Maine, along the coasts of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and clear down to Labrador, particularly the Nova Scotia part of it, we have magnificent grounds. There is no food that you can put before any human being better than the fish that is obtainable off our coasts. Our people, in catching that fish and placing it upon the market, are handicapped, not as my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. McIsaac) said the people of that province were by a narrow gauge railway. The difficulty is no railway at all. We have three hundred or four hundred miles of coast in Cape Breton, the most magnificent fishing territory anywhere to be found, where they have no railways and no proper facilities for getting this splendid food product for the market. I wish to say to the Government that, whether as a war measure or as a matter of business, they could not do anything better for the Canadian people than to open up these territories and put these magnificent fishing grounds in touch with the outside world so that every man and woman in Canada, at least from Manitoba east to the coast, would be able to get a cheap and abundant supply of fish. Without facilities it is impossible to do it.

While upon the railway question, I wish to touch upon the necessities of my own constituency of North Cape Breton and Victoria, and to speak for the other parts of the island as well. All around Cape Breton South, Richmond and Inverness there are the same magnificent fisheries, the same opportunities, and the same necessity for railway transportation. I hope the day is not far distant when the Government will implement the resolution accepted from me by the Borden Government in which it was stated that the time had arrived that we ought to build railways, or extend the Intercolonial, into all the non-railway counties of Nova Scotia and the Maritime Provinces generally. That resolution was accepted in this House two or three years ago but I am sorry that it has not been implemented in any way. Since the Government has accepted the proposition I have not bothered them with any further resolution. But it is a matter of record in this House and I trust that the condition which existed under the Laurier Administration will be restored before very long and that the moneys which were voted under the Laurier Administration will be put to use in order to bring about this much needed advancement and improvement in that part of the old province of Nova Scotia.

I appeal to hon. members from other parts of Canada for their support in this matter. We are spending money gladly in opening up avenues to the wheat fields of the West. That is a proper thing to do because the farmers of the West cannot cultivate the land and produce crops without railway connection. If that is proper and necessary, is it not good business for the western men and the Ontario men to see to it that proper facilities are provided in other parts so that they may get the other foods which are necessary for use with what they produce upon the farm? There is a broad, national principle underlying what we are asking for. I am sure that I am not asking for anything that is not in accordance with those national ideas and broad principles which should actuate all when dealing with matters of this kind.

The hon. the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean), told us the other day something about the Victory Loan. I am proud to know that the Victory Loan was such a success. The success of the Victory Loan proves to us what can be done with proper organization and the application of business methods. The machinery for carrying out the Victory Loan was well and properly organized; consequently, it was a success from the point of view of getting the money. But I wish to tell the Acting Minister of Finance and the Government that they cannot take to themselves very much credit for this money being in the country. If there is wealth in Canada, if the Canadian people are well off and generally have bank accounts, it is not by reason of any measures or any policy adopted by the present Government, or by the administration that came into power in 1911. The wealth of this country, the wealth that is in the possession of the people was accumulated during the administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and its acquisition was made possible during the fifteen years that administration was in office. History is repeating itself. We have somewhat of a reversal of conditions as they prevailed in the days of the early Egyptians; in Egypt the fat years came first, and the lean years afterwards. Or perhaps it is not a reversal after all, for the fifteen years during which that distinguished statesman, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, was in power were years of plenty, were years of clean, honest and progressive administration, so that the people of Canada had an opportunity of accumulating wealth and having that wealth when called upon by the Government for Victory Loans, they answered the call. I want hon. gentlemen opposite, when they felicitate themselves upon having obtained this money, not to forget where it came from, or who created the conditions in Canada that enabled the people to save that money.

There is another application I wish to make of the success of the organization in connection with the raising of the Victory Loan. I submit, Sir, that if the same organization, the same energy and the same lack of selfishness in arousing this country and developing a sentiment for voluntary military service had prevailed in connection with our efforts at recruiting, we would not have had the difficulties here that have been experienced, but we could have secured by voluntary and willing effort all the men we desired. The difficulty was —and I am not going to dwell very much upon the subject—that from the beginning of the war our friends on the other side of the House, and particularly the Government of that day, were simply running the machinery along party lines on the war question to the same extent as they did in connection with anything else which they handled. There was party advantage, they felt, to be gained by the exclusion of certain sections of this country, and by not giving the people of those sections the opportunity of participating in the war as other parts of the country were participating, and contributing their wealth and their men. I have not as yet heard read in the House a letter which was sent by my hon. leader to the Prime Minister very shortly after the opening of the war, and, in view of the assertion that the leader of the Opposition did not do as much for the war as he should have done, I deem it necessary, for the information of the new members more especially, to read that letter. Early in the history of the war Sir Wilfrid Laurier wrote in these terms to the Prime Minister:

> Dear Sir Robert Borden,
> There is every probability that the war will be of long duration, and I understand that the Government is already contemplating the organization of a second contingent.
>
> May I suggest that as our population is composed of various ethnical elements, it may be well to recognize the fact, and to allow the formation of these units out of those several elements. The War Office—

That is the War Office in London.

> —at all times has taken advantage of the force of race sentiments in the formation of the army. At all times it has recruited purely Scotch regiments, as well as purely Irish regiments, and we understand that Lord Kitchener has just authorized recruiting an exclusively Welsh force.
>
> The aim I have in view is in reference to the formation of a French-Canadian regiment. You are probably aware that a movement is on foot in Montreal and Quebec for the purpose of raising such a regiment. There is every reason to believe that if the formation of a French-Canadian unit were authorized there would be a generous response.
> I offer these observations with the sole object of helping in the cause which we have all so much at heart. If you think well of my suggestion I will be happy to assist in any way that may be deemed advisable, and I will hold myself ready to meet at your convenience for a mutual exchange of views, both as to the object itself and the best means of attainment.

Yours sincerely,

Wilfrid Laurier.

That offer was submitted to the Prime Minister in the early stages of the war. Why was not advantage taken of it? Was anything done by the Prime Minister to implement that offer? I am sorry to say nothing at all. The manner in which attempts were made to organize recruiting in Quebec has already been discussed several times, and the subject is not new, and what occurred is well known. If it was the intention of the Government to create dissension in Quebec and make recruiting a failure—and it was said that such was their intention—they could not have gone about it in a better way than they did. In most of the Canadian provinces our young men speak the English language, and they suffer no disadvantage from being trained by English instructors. But it is otherwise in the province of Quebec, where in large sections the population speak French exclusively. Not only the old people but the young folks use French entirely, and when it was a case of obtaining recruits it was but natural to look for instructors who could make plain to these young men the requirements of the drill in their own tongue. Had there been a proper organization in connection with recruiting in the province of Quebec, men who could speak the French language, and who were in sympathy with the French people and understood their ways and their peculiarities, would have been placed at the head of that recruiting and in charge of the training of French Canadians.

What has happened? You would say at once: Surely they did that. Nothing of the kind. They sent men there to do recruiting, at least for the first two or three years, who did not know a word of French, and who were not of the same religion as those to whom they were sent. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that we get closer to men who are of our own language and religion than we do to those who are not. I do not say that in a sectional way, or as finding fault with any man's language or religion; but these things are natural to us. As far as Quebec is concerned, men were sent there who were not in sympathy with the people on one or other of these very important phases of character, and the result was an absolute and a huge failure in recruiting. That failure has been taken hold of by some men who wanted to start a sectarian fire in politics and use it to win the election. I submit that if we had been playing politics and sectarianism with the Victory Loan the same result and the same failure would have followed that followed in Quebec recruiting when elements were introduced that were calculated to produce failure. I make these explanations on these statements to show that the Government of this country who were in charge of the war did not always have the singleness of mind and heart which they wish other people to have to-day, and that they always and at all times had something else in view different to the winning of the war. There was no stage of the proceedings when they did not have the primary idea of politics and the winning of the election which was really a very heavy factor in whatever course they took in connection with these matters.

Having said that much on this question, I propose to give a little attention to some matters which came before the House, particularly last night, regarding the political situation and the policy of the different parties so far as the trade of this country is concerned. Let me assure you, Sir, that I do not propose to go very lengthily into these things, or to take up too much time. But it is well that we should always, whether we are Liberals or Conservatives, have a proper understanding of the faith and doctrine of our party and the principles for which we stand. If we lose that, if we have not the proper chart and compass upon what we stand for, and what we believe our party to stand for, we lose the full force and effect of the service which a party is supposed to render in the Government of a country. For, after all, partyism is an institution in this country; we have two parties, Liberals and Conservatives, and whether the Government is good or bad, whether the system is good or bad, it is still the system, and I must submit as my own opinion that, so far, it is the best system of governing that we have yet found. If we are going to have clean administration and proper checks one on the other, we must have a Government party and an Opposition party, and I wish to remind hon. gentlemen of the fact that in any province in this, or any, country, where there is an admixture of parties, and a forgetting of the responsibilities, rights and privileges of parties, there has been corruption and a falling off in proper administration, much to the loss of the people. For that reason, if we are to recognize party government, we should have the best possible party government, and each party should take pride in its doctrines, ideas and traditions. Belonging, as I do, to the Liberal party, I am proud of its traditions and history, and I wish to keep it as much as possible unsullied from anything that might tarnish it, or stain the names of the great men who have been in the past and are to-day its leaders, or which would interfere in any way with the doctrines which we have always espoused as a party. The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) last night endeavoured to mix things up and to lead the House and the country to understand that the Liberal party was not true to its principles and to its professions as set forth in the platform of 1893, three years before the Liberal party took over the Government of this country in 1896.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (resuming): Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was approaching the subject of the 1893 platform of the Liberal party with a view to dealing with it in the light of the observations made yesterday by the member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson). The hon. gentleman wished the House to believe that the Liberal party went to the country in 1896 under false pretences and obtained power on a policy which they did not carry out when they were entrusted by the people with the government of the country. I propose to show, Sir, that the Liberal party in every way carried out the platform laid down at that time. The member for Springfield said last night that the present leader of the Opposition stated in 1893 and at other times that if the Liberal party were put in power we would have free trade in Canada as they had it in England. It is not true to ascribe to the right hon. gentleman any such statement; it is misleading to say that the platform of the Liberal party at that time contained such a plank, which was not afterwards lived up to. Nothing more clearly shows that the policy of the Liberal party was not the old National Policy than the attitude of the Conservative leaders towards the Liberal party when that policy was put in force. If any man in Canadian public life could recognize the National Policy, it was Sir Charles Tupper. He professed to be the author of that policy, to have cradled it in its infancy, to have brought it into full development and fruition. Of whatever glory came to the Conservative party by reason of the National Policy, Sir Charles Tupper was always willing to take ninety-nine and one-half per cent. When he made his first speech as leader of the Opposition in 1896, having become familiar with the policy of the Laurier Government, he declared that he had heard in the highways and byways as he went along the streets the sorrowful wail of the great industries from ocean to ocean that had been wrecked and smashed and sent to ruin by the policy of the Liberal party. That was the view Sir Charles Tupper took of the policy of the Laurier Government. If the Fielding tariff and the Laurier administration and policy were the same as the old National Policy, why was it necesssary for Mr. Borden, now Sir Robert Borden, who was leading the Opposition in 1903, to move the following resolution:

> That this House, regarding the present tariff as unsatisfactory, is of opinion that this country requires a declared policy for such adequate protection of its labour, agricultural products, manufactures and industries as will at all times secure the Canadian markets for Canadians.

This was some years after the adoption of the tariff under the administration of Laurier, and if it had been the same old tariff I am sure that the then leader of the Opposition would not have found fault with it; would not have criticised it in this way; would not have said that a policy of adequate protection should be adopted.

Three or four years, if not more, after the Laurier administration came into power and the platform of the Liberal party had been carried forward as the policy of the Government, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), speaking, I think, in Toronto with regard to the sufficiency of the protection under the Laurier administration—his remarks are reported in the Mail and Empire—said:

> So long as we import into this country $1,500,000 of agricultural implements in less than a year, every one of which might be made by the artisans and labourers of this country and import that amount from the United States, a market from which our products are shut out by an almost prohibitive tariff; so long as our binder twine is largely made for us in that country; so long as $11,000,000 manufactured iron and steel are brought in from the United States whilst in Canada the great natural vaults are bursting with iron and coal, Canadian brawn and intelligence is chafing to unlock them and set these riches and resources loose; so long as our pulp and paper resources are sacrificed in another market and we import millions of dollars' worth of their manufactured products; so long as the lead smelters of the United States grow rich whilst they put one and a half per cent duty upon lead in ore and 2 1-8 per cent upon lead in bullion; so long as those things are unredressed, there is reason for the existence of the Liberal-Conservative party.

That is the view which Sir George Foster, Sir Robert Borden and Sir Charles Tupper took of the difference between the policy of the Liberal party and the policy which they advocated when they were in power, their policy being better known and understood as the National Policy. It is only fair to the House and to the Liberal party at this stage of our history that I should again remind the House of what the policy of the Liberal party was in 1893. These are the ten planks of the famous platform of the Convention of 1893:

1. That the customs tariff of the Dominion should be based, not as it is now, upon the protective principle, but upon the requirements of the public service; that the highest interest of Canada demands a removal of this obstruction to our country's progress by the adoption of a sound fiscal policy which, while not doing injustice to any class, will promote domestic and foreign trade and hasten the return of prosperity to our people; that to that end the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical and efficient Government; that it should be so adjusted as to make free or bear as lightly as possible upon the necessaries of life, and should be so arranged as to promote free trade with the whole world, more particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

2. That the Liberal party is prepared to enter into negotiations with a view to obtain a fair and liberal reciprocity, including a well considered list of manufactured articles.

3. That the Convention deplores the gross corruption in the management and expenditure of public moneys.

4. That we cannot but view with alarm the large increase of the public debt and of the control of the annual expenditures of the Dominion and the consequent undue taxation of the public, under the Governments that have been continuously in power since 1878, and we demand the strictest economy in the administration of the Government of the country.

5. That it is the ancient and undoubted right of the House of Commons to inquire into all matters of public expenditure and into all charges of misconduct in office against ministers of the Crown.

6. That in the opinion of this Convention the sale of public lands of the Dominion should be to actual settlers only and not to speculators upon reasonable terms of settlement, and in such areas as can be reasonably occupied and cultivated by the settler.

7. The repeal of the Franchise Act, that we should revert to the provincial franchises.

8. To make the House of Commons a fair exponent of public opinion and to preserve the historic continuity of counties, it is desirable that the conformation of the electoral division, county boundaries, should be observed, so that in no case no parts of different counties could be put in one electoral division.

As regards the ninth plank, I am not sure that these are the exact words, but this is the substance of it:

9. That the policy in regard to appointments to the Senate of Canada should be revised and brought forward in conformity to certain public opinion.

10. That, whereas public attention is at present much directed to the consideration of the admittedly great evils of intemperance, it is desirable that the mind of the people should be clearly ascertained on the question of prohibition by means of a Dominion plebiscite.

In moving that resolution, the right hon. gentleman who now leads the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) made the following observations, which form a small section of the speech that he delivered to the Convention on that occasion:

I say the policy should be a policy of free trade such as they have in England—

That is, he says, it should be.

—That, I am sorry to say that the circumstances of the country cannot admit at present of that policy in its entirety, but I speak to you from this day forward that it should be the goal to which we aspire. I propose to you from this day forward, although we cannot adopt the policy itself, to adopt the principle which regulates it; that is to say, that though it should be your misfortune for many years to come to have to raise the revenue by customs duties, those duties should be levied only so far as is necessary to carry on the business of the Government. Nothing is more difficult—that is one of the evils of protection—than to wipe away protection because under it interests have been established, which every man who has at heart the interest of all classes must take into consideration. It is always easy to increase the tariff because by doing so you increase the private fortunes of certain individuals, but whenever you decrease the tariff it has always to be done with careful consideration, and I am sure that when the Liberals are in power they will not be in different to this primary truth.

I have quoted the particular part of the speech which dealt with the character of that policy. It was clearly laid down at the time that, although the goal of the Liberal party was to be free trade, it could not be accomplished at one bound, but that the Liberal party hoped to go forward from step to step and to adopt freer and freer trade from time to time as that could be accomplished without any deterrent to or interference with vested interests in this country. I need not tell hon. members, who are familiar with the progress of the country the rapid strides that were made under the administration of the right hon. gentleman and how this country prospered under that policy and under the management of it by himself and the wise men whom he gathered around him to compose his government. It is unnecessary to point out how, under his administration and under his policy, population rapidly flowed into this country.

The great West, which is of course the great hope of this country, has developed and expanded so that villages have become towns and towns cities, and those vast territories which were practically unorganized at the time the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) took office were flourishing provinces before he left power, and rapidly coming into a position where they could vie with the older provinces of the Dominion. Those were the conditions brought about by the policy of the Liberal party, and that is the policy which we want to keep to the fore all the time. We have no thought of departing from the policy which we followed when in power. When we return to power again we hope to bring happiness, prosperity and honest administration to this country, and we shall not be called upon to depart from that good old basic old rock of the constitution of the party, on which we have built for so long, and built so well.

The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) hinted last night that he did not know where the Liberal party was; he did not know whether there were any of that party still alive. He need only look across the floor to see a very sturdy section of them left, and if he will go to the country to-morrow, stripping his platform of this cry about the war, the cry by which the people have been falsely and improperly divided, if he will appeal to the country on a clean, straight administration and the best policy for the people in peace times, he will find out where the people are, and whether there is any of the Liberal party left.

Referring once more to the development of this country under the regime of my right hon. leader up to his going out of power in 1911, what is the testimony and what are the declarations not only of his friends but of his political opponents as to what he achieved in the glorious period during which he had charge of the affairs of this country? When we declared for reciprocity in 1911, what was the slogan of the then leader of the Opposition? From the Atlantic to the Pacific his appeal was: The policy which has been in force for the last fifteen years has brought this country to such a high mark of success, the country is in such a magnificent state of prosperity that it would be folly and a sin to interfere with present conditions. Let well enough alone; Sir Wilfrid Laurier with his immigration policy, his tariff policy, his expenditures of the revenues of this country, and everything that goes to the making up of a successful administration and a growing country, has done well; we have no fault to find; let us stand by the policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and leave well enough alone. That was the appeal made on every hustings by the then leader of the Opposition. He did not recognize that it was well enough; it was very good, and a magnificent departure from the conditions he found when he took office. Then the country was bankrupt. There was not enough revenue collected to meet the ordinary expenditure. One province was flying at the throat of another, and there were dissensions and dissatisfaction between men of different religious creeds. But Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into power, and brought this country into the harmonious and happy condition it was in in 1911.

We have a magnificent territory, extending from ocean to ocean. Our resources are just as good as those of the United States and we have a territory that is wide and comprehensive, and capable of receiving and looking after something like one hundred millions of people, but to-day we have only got seven millions, what was the vision of that great statesman? Am I to sit here, he asked, with a territory around me capable of making homes for one hundred or one hundred and fifty million people and be satisfied with only seven million people? Is it not my duty as the responsible head of this Government to provide such means as will make Canada a happy and contented country, an inviting country for people to live in? And he started out to make Canada a place where there would be open markets, where the man who was settled on the land would have right at his door a ready market for whatever he raised. Although the English market was very good, it was three thousand miles away, and you had to send your goods by rail to a steamer, and then by steamer across the Atlantic, and then perhaps by rail for a further distance. The English market was good, but it was not natural and proper to ship to that market when we had right by our side some one hundred and ten million of people, speaking our own language, and requiring the things we produced. Would it not have been better and more reasonable to sell our products to them, where we could get the best price, than to send them to the English market three thousand miles away? Was not that the proper course for the Government to take? That was the policy which Sir Wilfrid Laurier placed before the people at that time with a view to making Canada an inviting place for the millions of people for whom we had room, and who would no doubt have come to this country if reciprocity had been accepted. But there were people in this country whose interests were being interfered with. As was said by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) the other night, there was a Diana of the Ephesians in this country; the profits and trade of certain people were likely to be interfered with if the national barriers against trade between Canada and the United States were broken down. There was enough force brought to bear on that occasion to defeat us, not squarely and honestly, but through raising the cry of disloyalty and traitorism. The flag was waved and the question was asked, "Under which flag will you live? It is well enough to have trade, but we must stand by the flag." But those days have gone by, and now everybody who has any proper conception of national development can see that that would have been the best course for this country to pursue. Friends of the Government and the Government themselves, one after the other, are forsaking the props and pillars that supported them at that time, and everything that we advocated in connection with the trade relations between the two countries is about to be adopted; at least they are making a show of doing it, whether they mean it or not. It is pretty hard to know sometimes whether they are going or coming, because they try to make every circumstance suit their whims and caprices. At one time they put Ontario against Manitoba, and at another some other province against another section of the country, just as it suits them for the time being. We have evidence enough of that. On 3rd December last, a certain policy was good enough for them, but now it has been changed for the time being; there is now a new fiddle and a new tune, but they will find out that the people of this country will not change the tune as rapidly as the Government think they can do in matters of the gravest consequence with which they have to deal.

I have outlined the course which my right hon. leader has followed since he laid down his broad platform in 1898, and the policy upon which he came into power in 1896 under which he administered the affairs of this country so grandly and magnificently up to 1911 and upon which, in its advanced state, he gloriously went out of power in that year.

I said in the early part of my remarks that it was important for every man, if he belonged to a party, to do what he could to keep that party clean, strong and devoted to the best interests of the country. Let me remind the House that although we had fifteen years of office, although we had handled millions of money in dealing with every kind of public enterprise, service and work in the country, we went out of office in 1911 and every possible investigation was thrown after to discover where we had done anything wrong. It is the proud boast that we can make to-day that although every department of Government was rifled from one corner to the other, not only with such men as they could employ in that work in Ottawa but with men brought from the Old Country to investigate the books of the department in the effort to find some scandal, no scandal was found. It was not shown that one fifty cent piece was misappropriated in the fifteen years when we were in power. I do not like scandal-mongering and I am not a scandal-monger but I wish to remind the hon. gentleman of the conditions under which they went out of power in 1896 and ask them to compare the conditions of those days with the conditions under which we handed over the reins of Government when it was our duty to do so in conformity with the views of the people.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he remembers a man by the name of Miller whom we had to lock up in the Carleton County jail because he would not tell us who had received the money which he had paid out to obtain Government contracts and that part which the hon. gentleman opposite took in backing him up in defying the House.

Mr. McKENZIE: In what way did I back him up in defying the House? I will take no insinuations from the hon. gentleman. I will tell the hon. gentleman that I never exchanged one English word with a man named Miller; I never saw him. I do not know who he is and if the hon. gentleman thinks I shielded him in any way he is absolutely and entirely mistaken. If he has any such insinuations to make, let him make them like a gentleman. He has either said too little or too much.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I spoke about members of the Opposition defending Miller and backing him up in defying the House when we were trying to make him say to whom he paid the money.

Mr. McKENZIE: Absolutely incorrect. I defy the hon. gentleman to put his finger upon anything that will go to show that any member of the Opposition did anything to shield, protect or shelter that gentleman. That shows the straits to which these gentlemen are put, that shows their lack of information, that shows that they have nothing to talk about except this miserable, picayune Miller business. That happened years and years after we went out of power. That is the only thing they can talk about. The hon. member for South Oxford is the lone pelican on the housetop who has anything to say here to-night and that is all he has to say. The whole Dominion of Canada will have to accept my statement now that there was nothing wrong except that the hon. member for South Oxford says that there was a man by the name of Miller who paid some trifle as a travelling agent for something we knew nothing about and had nothing to do with.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The hon. gentleman asked us to point out a single instance and I merely referred to a single instance.

Mr. McKENZIE: Certainly; I was talking about the departmental conduct of the Government and this man never had anything to do with any department of the Government. He was never in the employ of the Government. He had never handled a dollar of the public moneys, and he never was a servant of any minister of the Crown during the fifteen years that we were in power. Now, Sir, I still defy the hon. gentleman or any other member of his party to point out a single instance of corrupt administration in any department of the Government with which we had anything to do. I did not desire to say anything offensive at all, but I was simply reminding the hon. gentleman and his friends of the conditions under which they went out of power in 1896 and in 1873. They no doubt remember these things.

I wish to deal further with the attitude of the Liberal party on the trade question not only while we were in power but after we went out of power. We have the same attitude to-day that we have always had. We have not one policy for one province and a different policy for another province. We have not one policy to-day and a new one to-morrow. The right hon. gentleman, whom I have the proud distinction of following, was always strong on that policy which suited the great West. He was always anxious to promote the development of that country because it is in the interest of us all that it should be developed. The older provinces are full of resources and they are only beginning to realize what is in store for them. Nevertheless, our wider and greater expansion must come from the great provinces of the West and for that reason it is of the highest importance that whichever party is in power, whoever undertakes to lead the thought of the people and to shape the policies of the country, whoever may be at the head of affairs, should support that policy that can consistently be supported by every province from the Atlantic to the Pacific. That is the kind of policy that we must have and that is the policy which has always been, and which is now, advocated by the leader of the Opposition. I am going to bring to your notice, Sir, the attitude which has been taken by the leaders of the Liberal party since we have come into Opposition in so far as trade matters are concerned. The Liberal party, on various occasions in the House of Commons and outside of it, announced itself in favour of the removal of duties on foods of various kinds and in particular on January 26, 1913, Sir Wilfrid Laurier addressed the Liberal Club Federation of Ontario at Hamilton and announced a policy of free food, free from customs duties. These are the words Sir Wilfrid used at that time:

> The policy I give you at this moment, the policy I believe every patriot in Canada ought to support and the policy I believe it to be the duty of a Government to immediately inaugurate is a policy of absolutely free food—free from custom duties.

This general statement has been followed up by specific motions in the House of Commons demanding that certain foods shall be placed upon the free list. On January 28, 1914, Dr. Neely, M.P. for Humboldt moved:

> That the House regrets that, in the gracious speech with which your Royal Highness has met Parliament, the said speech gives no indication of any intention on the part of your advisers to take any steps to secure free access to the markets of the United States for the wheat and wheat products of Canada, by removing the duty on wheat and wheat products coming into Canada from the United States.

The Conservative members of the House voted against this motion, the Liberals voted for it. On April 23rd, 1914, the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier moved:

> That this House is of the opinion that in view of the prevailing economic conditions of the country it is advisable to place wheat, wheat products, and agricultural implements on the free list; and that without doing injustice to any class, steps should be taken to alleviate the high cost of living by considerate removal of taxation.

The Conservative members of the House voted against that motion, the Liberals voted for it. On April 28th, 1914, Mr. Loggie, an hon. gentleman representing a New Brunswick county, moved:

That tariff item No. 83 be amended by adding thereto the following words:—

Provided, however, that potatoes, dry, dessicated or otherwise prepared, being the growth and production of the United States, shall be admitted free of duty when, and as soon as, the United States removes the embargo regulations now existing against like articles, the growth and production of Canada.

For that motion the Liberals members of the House voted, the Conservatives voted against it.

On February 23rd, 1916, Mr. J. G. Turriff, M.P., for Assiniboia, moved:

That in the opinion of this House, in order to secure to the farmers and people of Canada the advantages of the American market for wheat products and potatoes, steps should be taken at once to put these articles on the free list in the Canadian tariff.

The Conservative majority in the House solidly voted against the motion, the Liberals voted for it.

Now, Sir, that is the course that was followed by us as far as those resolutions are concerned.

Again, on the 16th of March, 1915, Sir Wilfrid Laurier moved as follows:

That the Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved;

That this House is ready to provide for the exigencies of the present situation, and to vote all necessary ways and means to that end, but it regrets that in the measure under consideration duties are imposed which may be oppressive on the people, whilst yielding little or no revenue; and that the said measure is particularly objectionable in the fact that instead of favouring, it is placing extra barriers against Great Britain's trade with Canada, at a moment when the Mother Country is under a war strain unparalleled in history.

The Liberals voted for that resolution, the Conservatives voted against it.

On the 23rd of May, 1917, less than a year ago, the Hon. Mr. Oliver, member for Edmonton, moved the following resolution:

In the opinion of this House it would be in the public interest if the Customs Tariff Act were so amended as to provide;

1. That wheat, wheat flour and all other products of wheat be placed upon the free list;

2. That farm implements and machinery, farm tractors, mining, flour and sawmill machinery, and repairs for same, rough and partly dressed lumber, illuminating lubricating and fuel oils, cement and fertilizers, be added to the free list;

3. That staple goods and food products (other than wheat flour), domestic animals and food therefor, be admitted into Canada free of duty when coming from and being the product of any country admitting like Canadian articles into such country free of duty.

4. That substantial reductions be made in the general tariff on all articles imported into Canada, excepting luxuries.

5. That the British preference be increased to fifty per cent of the general tariff.

This resolution was moved on May 23, 1917, by Hon. Frank Oliver, ex-Minister of the Interior, and seconded by no less a personage than the present Minister of Public Works. That, Sir, was the attitude taken at that time, and all the time, by the Liberal party in this House, and I have enumerated these resolutions so as to put the matter in concise form. I have done it so that everybody would know what our attitude has been throughout, and that we put ourselves on record, not upon the hustings, not where we might say one thing in one place and another thing in another place; in the House of Commons where everybody has an opportunity of seeing at all times the position we have taken.

Now, Sir, I come to another resolution of great importance to this country, and of particular importance to our friends from the West. As I said before, when we are talking on the question of development, when we are talking on the question of trade with the United States, and when we are talking on the question of free wheat, free farming implements, and free admission of all that enters into the proper and economical conducting of the farms of the West, we expect the western men to be particularly interested in what is taking place, in what we are saying, and in the purposes of political parties in this country. Everybody remembers the famous convention at Winnipeg last August. At that time the attitude of the Liberal party on the war was put in such clear-cut and concise language in the resolution that was adopted at that convention, that I wish to adopt it as far as I can as the attitude of the Liberal party, not only in the Western Provinces but in the other provinces of Canada where Liberalism is understood and acted upon according to its real meaning. The resolution in question was put to the convention, no doubt after discussion, and adopted, and it so well expresses my own views with respect to the war, that I wish to adopt it as my own and put it on record. It was moved by Dr. Neely, and seconded by Lieutenant C. B. Reilly, both of them returned soldiers.

In this war for the defence of democratic civilization against military despotism, the conditions call for the putting forth by each allied belligerent of its full power as the only assurance of victory. In times of peril the entire resources of the country, moral and material, man-power and wealth, are justly disposable by the state for the preservation of its national liberty. The imperative duty of the Canadian people in regard to the war is its continued vigorous prosecution.

(1.) By conferring with the British Government for the purpose of definitely ascertaining the scope and character of all the services that can best be rendered by Canada in the conduct of the war.

(2.) By the maintenance in unimpaired strength at the front, of our fighting forces, and the taking all steps necessary to secure the required reinforcements for this purpose.

(3.) By organizing the production of our other contributions to the war, such as food, munitions and other war necessities upon lines of the greatest efficiency.

(4.) By the complete extinction of profiteering in all business having to do with munitions and the necessaries of life, if necessary, by the nationalization of these industries or by an adaptation of the British system of controlled establishments;

(5.) By the recovery for the public treasury of undue profits obtained since the beginning of the war by the exploitation of the necessities of the people or the urgent requirements of the state;

(6.) By the application of a combined system of sharply graduated taxation upon incomes and assessed profits which shall insure that every citizen shall bear his or her full share of the war burdens, according to his or her means.

(7) By thoroughly organizing the nation and carrying out this program by whatever means may be necessary for its accomplishment.

Then comes another resolution by Mr. Roderick McKenzie, of the Manitoba Grain Growers, seconded by Mr. D. W. Warner. I will not detain you, Mr. Speaker, by reading it, because it is word for word the Oliver resolution, which I read a moment ago. Exactly the same things are asked for to be put on the free list by the Government. I come now to another resolution, and the last resolution I am going to read, and it contains the opinion of the convention as to the conduct of the Government then in power, and which is practically in power still. It was moved by Premier Sifton, of Alberta—I do not know whether that is the Mr. Sifton who is now in the Government—and seconded by Mr. Laidlaw, of British Columbia. I call the attention of the Government particularly to that convention's estimate of it, and to the estimate which the hon. gentleman who moved that resolution had of it at that time:

This Convention of the Liberals of the four Western Provinces of the Dominion assembled for the purpose of assisting in the solution of the many serious problems facing Canada at the present crisis feels compelled to place on record its most severe disapproval of the war administration of the Borden Government.

War is essentially the business and concern of the entire nation and not of any section, class or political party. It can be waged to the greatest advantage only when behind its prosecution all classes of its people are enlisted in the same passionate determination to defend the right, and triumph over the forces of despotism and unrighteousness.

Any attempt to arrogate to one section of the people or one political party a monopoly of its prosecution and the prestige of the conduct of the national struggle for freedom and existence can be characterized as only base and unworthy in the highest degree

Because the Borden Government has sought from the outset to make our national life and death struggle the prerogative of one political party, to the exclusion of one half of the Canadian people, and an instrument for selfish, political advantage rather than the triumph of national ideals; and because it has exhibited gross incompetency and inefficiency in the face of national peril; because it has substituted partisan selfishness for honour and fair dealing, because discussion has overcome leadership in its councils and weakness and vacillation have taken the place of firmness of resolution, courage and efficiency in execution we condemn it as no longer entitled to the confidence of the Canadian people.

That, Sir, is the resolution passed by the convention, and which was sponsored for by the hon. member (Mr. Sifton), who, I believe, is Minister of Customs in this Administration. What happened? Evidently the Prime Minister believed this statement. He believed, evidently, that he was not capable, with the outfit he had then, of running the Government, and he began to cast about as to what he should do. He saw that the Hon. Mr. Sifton, then Premier of Alberta, was rather a courageous gentleman, and thought it would be a good thing to have him out of the way somewhere; so he got somehow in touch with him, and I imagine that I can hear the mellifluous voice of the Prime Minister breaking forth in song to our friend, Mr. Sifton, and saying:

Come under my plaidie, the night's gone to fa';
Come in from the cold and the drift of the snaw;
Come under my plaidie and sit down beside me,
There is room, my dear Arthur, believe me, for twa.

That, Sir, is what happened. The Prime Minister can smell trouble, because his olfactory nerve has been cultivated strongly to trouble ever since he became Premier, and he could see what was coming from the West, and he thought he would steal their thunder by bringing these men under his plaidie, and in they came, and there they are for better or for worse—we hope not for worse. That is some history in connection with the stand of the Liberal party and the position they took, not only on the trade of the country, but on the war as well.

I am coming, Mr. Speaker, in sight of the end of my speech. But there is one matter that I am rather called upon to bring to the notice of the House, and with which I must try to deal as briefly as possible. I said in the early stages of my speech that it was of the highest importance for the Canadian people that we should have a clean-cut Administration and a Government that would be free from all trammels and influences, and which would administer the affairs of the country in the interests of the poor as well as the rich. It has been brought to my notice, and to the notice of every person in the country, that undue profits have been made in connection with the war by gentlemen who are supposed to be too close for comfort—that is, comfort to the poor men of this country—to the Government. It is my purpose to-night to bring before the House and the country some of the performances of these gentlemen so that the Government may take notice of them, and it is never too late to do good. It may be late to start it now to cut off those gentlemen who are parasites and leeches on the life blood of this country, but it is better to do it now than to let it continue. I have particular reference to the William Davies Co., or, in words more commonly understood, to the operations of that distinguished gentleman, Sir Joseph Flavelle, Baronet. I propose to call the attention of the House to the works of that gentleman and his company, and to the way that they have been grinding the faces of the poor and sucking the life blood out of the country generally, in the hope that something will be done to get rid of influences of that kind, and to let us breathe freely and understand, and hope that we understand, that everything is done openly and above board, that we are getting a dollar's worth for every dollar that we spend in this country, and that the poor man is not paying too much for the pittance that he can afford to accumulate for his little family, and that it will not be cut down, filched and stolen, so to speak, by men who are making their millions improperly at the cost and to the disadvantage of our poor people. I wish to pay a little attention to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) in connection with these things. He is a gentleman of wonderful activity. Nothing escapes him; when he finds out that trouble exists, he gets after it right away. The difficulty is that some things may not be brought to his notice. I wish to quote a letter which was read in the House yesterday as evidence of the eternal vigilance of the Minister of Labour. The moment he scents trouble anywhere he puts his sword upon his thigh, strides boldly forward, and, caring not who is in his way, breaks down every barrier and smashes to pieces anything that may interfere with the regulations of his department. In this letter, written on December 13th, 1916, he gives evidence of having discovered a combine in the city of St. Thomas—and his ardour was not as strong then as it is now. A dreadful combine was in process of formation in that city. Three men engaged in the cobbling business were concerned; they had no capital, but one of them had a couple of lasts and an awl which was used jointly by the three, one lending it to the other as occasion required. Here is what the minister says about this combine:

> I am advised that a few days ago yourself and several others entered into an agreement to raise the price of shoe repairing in the city of Chatham from the 8th instant.
> I am enclosing you a copy of an Order in Council recently passed, whereby you will see that if any such agreement was made you have laid yourself liable to prosecution under that Order. It prohibits the entry into any such agreement.

This awful combine, this incubus upon the body politic, was discovered in the home city of the Minister of Labour; but he went after it promptly, and no doubt the awl and the lasts and the cobblers and everything else at once disappeared in smoke, and the place that knew them once shall know them no more for ever. But the difficulty in connection with Sir Joseph Flavelle and other big guns who are making millions is that the minister does not hear anything about them, and it is my duty as a member of this House to bring certain facts to the minister's notice. Besides cobblers who are wicked enough to enter into combinations to the detriment of the body politic, other holy men in this land, while lifting false hands up in prayer, have other hands, the real ones, in the pockets of the people. At all events, this information has come to me, and when I have given that information to the minister my duty ends and his and that of the Government begins.

I have here an editorial from the Toronto Saturday Night, a well-conducted paper of very high standing, not only in Toronto, and Ontario generally, but throughout the whole Dominion. That it is owned and managed by men of public spirit is evidenced by the fact that at a certain inquiry that was being held in Toronto, Saturday Night, at their own expense, paid a very capable lawyer to attend as representative of the public to see that the interests of the people were safeguarded. This is what that paper says:

Those in high places in Ottawa Government circles continue to air their disapproval at the manner in which the affairs of the Imperial Munitions Board are being conducted. For one thing they allege that the policy of "you scratch my back and I will scratch yours," which is said to prevail among the "elect," is getting on their nerves.

As it now stands, Sir Joseph Flavelle's tight little family party are spending yearly over three times the amount enjoyed by the entire Federal Government, and as the money expended by the Board is, in the last analysis, Canadian money, Ottawa public men think they are entitled to a little more light. For instance, it is alleged that enormous contracts for various war materials are being let without calling for tenders, or taking the usual precaution to ascertain whether or not the best is being obtained for the money available.

On the other hand, steel men are up in arms over the manner in which shell inspections are being carried on. They charge that ignorant and unskilled men are being utilized as inspectors with the result that rejections of shells at the steel plants have reached a point where manufacturers are alarmed. And furthermore, some of these shell makers state that if the system of inspection is not changed they will be obliged to cease manufacture.

Ottawa also quarrels with the fact that there has been altogether too much hole-and-corner business in the manner in which the affairs of the Imperial Munitions Board are being conducted. In this connection the contract between the Imperial Munitions Board, the British Munitions Company and the Northern Electric Company is a case in point. It will be remembered that at the time the Shell Contracts Commission was in session at Ottawa before Sir William Meredith, Mr. Hellmuth examined Sir Joseph Flavelle. Sir Joseph, in his testimony in respect to fuses and the loading of the same, made the following explanation in respect to a loading plant located at Montreal, and known as the British Munitions Board, Ltd.: "Some business friends of Mr. Gordon agreed, as their contribution toward helping in the situation, that they would lend their business energy and judgment without charge . . . and we formed—

Notice the word "we."

We formed a small company known as the British Munitions Board, all the stock owned by the Imperial Board, and the Northern Electric lent the services of their Mr. Hathaway. . "

So far so good. It is to be noted, however, in the contract between the Imperial Munitions Board and the British Munitions Board, that in spite of the statement made by Sir Joseph Flavelle to the effect that these men were lending their business energy and judgment "without charge" the Imperial Munitions Board paid the British Munitions Company, known in the indenture as "the contractor," a five per cent commission upon all amounts expended by the said contractor in the purchase of land and in the erection and equipment of the buildings and in the operation of plant, all necessary funds for the work in hand being furnished by the Imperial Munitions Board.

Still another indenture serves to show where this money, this five per cent eventually went. Paragraph two of this second document, which is a contract between the British Munitions Company, the Northern Electric Company and the Imperial Munitions Board, is illuminating in this connection. It reads as follows:

"In consideration of the services rendered by the party of the second part (Northern Electric Company) to the party of the first part, (British Munitions Company, Limited), under the provisions hereof, the party of the first part (British Munitions Company, Limited) undertakes to pay to the party of the second part (Northern Electric Company, Limited) five per cent of the gross amount of all expenditures made by the party of the first part (British Munitions Company, Limited), in the conduct of its business, including the cost of land, buildings, plant, machinery, equipment, insurance, salaries, wages, cost of explosives, and all disbursements generally made by the party of the first part (British Munitions Company, Limited) from the date hereof until the completion of its contract with the party of the third part (Imperial Munitions Board) for the assembling and loading of time fuses."

Another interesting point in these documents is the fact that the plant was to have sufficient capacity to load, assemble and ship at least fifteen thousand fuses daily: The statement that all expenditures made by the Northern Electric Company from the funds of the Imperial Munitions Board are subject to this five per cent profit, including, it will be noted, the weekly wage bill, the cost of materials, etc., as well as the original expenditure for land, buildings, machinery, etc., is also interesting in view of Sir Joseph Flavelle's original statement to the effect that these gentlemen were lending their "business energy and judgment without charge."

We have no quarrel with the gentlemen of the Northern Electric over any sum which they are able to draw down monthly by reason of this contract. Five per cent on gross operating expenditure in a plant of this magnitude looks like a good thing, but perhaps we are mistaken. What we do quarrel with is the fact that Sir Joseph Flavelle did not make a frank statement of the facts.

The Government should know, and possibly they do know that Sir Joseph Flavelle, as chairman of the Imperial Munitions Board, makes a contract with himself as a member of the British Munitions Board. He says, "We formed a company." I have, of course, no personal knowledge of these things, but this is the evidence which he gave upon oath before the Commission here last year:

Q. Who is head of the plant?

A. Some business friends of Mr. Gordon agreed, as their contribution towards helping in the situation, that they would lend their business energy and judgment without charge, the leader in the movement being Mr. Sise of the Northern Electric Company, and we formed a small company, known as the British Munitions Board, owning all the stock by the Imperial Board, and the Northern Electric Company lent the services of their Mr. Hathaway, an expert, and by reason of our relations with the American Locomotive Company and the arrangement which Mr. Gordon was able to make, they gave him complete access to their loading plant at Providence so that we could learn from their mistakes and their errors if possible.

That is quoted from the sworn evidence as taken before the judges. There Sir Joseph Flavelle says: "We formed a company". And I think we have a right to suppose that he was a member of this company himself, and that, as the chairman of the other board, he made an agreement with himself. I suppose, of course, that may technically be all right, but he makes the statement that he himself and others are lending their business abilities and experience to the Government and to the country for nothing. We find, however, right on top of that, a written agreement, a copy of which I hold in my hand, and by which he agrees as one of the company to get 5 per cent on every dollar that is expended. That agreement is made by:

Imperial Munitions Board, represented by J. W. Flavelle, its chairman, hereinafter called "the Board," and British Munitions Company, Limited, an incorporated company, having its head office in the city of Montreal, hereinafter called "the contractor."

That is the agreement in which it is stipulated that 5 per cent of all the expenditure that is made by the Imperial Munitions Board, of which Sir Joseph Flavelle is the head and chairman—and no doubt millions were expended in this work—will go to this friendly company organized by himself, the members of which were doing nothing except out of the goodness of their hearts, giving all their time and energy and business experience to the country, but of course, as a matter of no concern, just as a sort of a side show to keep the matter lawful were getting a five per cent rake-off on the millions that Sir Joseph Flavelle himself was pouring into the hands of that concern. That is something that the people of this country do not like, and something about which we should have information, because, after all, those millions, according to the statement given to us by the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) the other day, are our moneys. It is the money of Canada that is being expended in that way, and for the present at all events, paying for those munitions, and at best we have to bear a fair share. It was given out, at the very outset of the war, that we are paying our share of every part of the expense in connection with this business, and whether we pay it all or in part now, or whether Sir Joseph Flavelle is appointed by the Imperial Government or not, we have power enough in this country, and this Government has no doubt its Minister of Militia Overseas closely enough in touch with the management on the other side of the Atlantic, to see that no connivance of this kind is permitted to go on; that no person is allowed to receive rake-offs, and that there are no holes and drops and chutes through which money will go where it has no business to go and where the soldiers of this country will not get full value for the money that is expended on these things. It is time that steps should be taken to inquire fully into these things. The people of this country are sick and tired of this great plutocrat, Sir Joseph Flavelle. Is there anybody on earth that can do anything but Sir Joseph Flavelle and his boys, or his young men, as I believe he calls them? Is it necessary that any man who has entrée to the Government, any man who receives the badge of capacity and ability and is entrusted with the spending of money, should have to receive the earmark of this hon. gentleman before he is entrusted to do anything? It is a weakness in the Government and the country that any man, even if he be as worthy as some people profess that this gentleman is, to think that nobody can do anything right but Sir Joseph Flavelle, Baronet.

I think the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) knows me well enough to believe that I would not say anything to hurt him nor anything to injure a hair on his head —although he has not any more than I have myself; but I must, as a public man in a small way, tell him, as a public man who fills a great space in this country as a minister, that I, at all events, am not satisfied with the vigour and vigilance that he is showing in bringing to time and to the ringbolt men who have been playing with the moneys of the people of this country and putting too much of it into their pockets, for which money the people have received no value. I must say to the minister that it looks bad to see him plugging after these poor little cobblers and putting them out of existence with one blow of his sword, while he says nothing at all to Sir Joseph Flavelle with all his satellites and companies, and companies within companies, and the banks that are in the pool with him. To all that great outfit, which in one second of time takes in more money than three cobblers will make in a century, he says nothing at all. When an officer of my hon.

friend's department undertook to be what the minister regarded as officious, he simply called him off and said: "This far shalt thou go and no further. There are certain things you can meddle with, Mr. O'Connor—cobblers and such cattle as that—but when it comes to bringing Sir Joseph Flavelle or any of that holy crowd to task, it is a different matter. You will keep your hands off him, leave him to me. I will touch him with a velvet hand. I know where I stand, and where the Government of which I am a member stands, so far as Sir Joseph Flavelle is concerned. Knowest thou not, Mr. O'Connor, that Sir Joseph Flavelle is the political godfather of the Minister of Finance, and would you dare to put your unholy and unconsecrated hands on a man of that kind?"

Those are the things which I complain about, and I think the Minister of Labour should explain to the country why he is so vigilant and active in going after the small things when the big things are left to go as they please. The case of Sir Joseph Flavelle was before a commission more than once. Mr. O'Connor made a report which was practically an indictment against him. He complained about it bitterly and was granted another court. Now I appeal to the ordinary common sense of this House. I think they will admit that when a man is tried in Canada, whether it is in a country place or in a city, whatever the jury find, if it is a criminal case, that is usually the end of it. There is no machinery in this country, so far as I know, by which a man can go before a judge and say: "I am not satisfied with this trial. I want to go before another jury, so dismiss this jury and give me another one." But that was done in the case of Sir Joseph Flavelle, and some people have been cruel enough to suggest that Sir Joseph had a considerable say in selecting the judge who tried him at Toronto. That may not be the case, but if he had anything to say in that matter, he was very unfortunate in his selection, because that judge also found him guilty and said that there was "profiteering beyond all reason, which should not be for one moment tolerated in this country." What does Mr. O'Connor say? As I have touched upon this matter, I may as well complete the job. I will briefly quote from Mr. O'Connor's report, which was filed in the Department of Labour some time in July last, I believe. On pages 3 and 4 of that report, Mr. O'Connor says:

> A few of the cold storage companies, however, have attained such dimensions, and have so centralized the business in certain lines that as respects particular commodities particular companies are able to exercise a practical monopoly especially of export business.....Out of the total quantity of 151,000,000 pounds of bacon handled, sold and exported in Canada during 1916 no less than 140,259,202 pounds were handled by these two companies, or ninety-three per cent of the total. Of this quantity the William Davies Company handled about sixty-four per cent, and Matthews-Blackwell Limited about twenty-nine per cent.

Further on he says:

> With regard to bacon we find one company selling 97 millions of the total 1916 cold storage sales of 151 million pounds at a margin of 5.05 cents per pound.

I am not going to follow that further. The charge is that Sir Joseph Flavelle was making a profit of 5·05 cents on every pound of bacon that he was handling. It was also charged, and was brought out in the investigation, that Sir Joseph Flavelle was using his position as head of the Imperial Munitions Board to get transportation for his goods across to the other side, when the ordinary man could not get his goods across at all.

Mr. CROTHERS: I think my hon. friend is misrepresenting the facts, unintentionally, no doubt. If he will examine the report carefully he will see that 5 cents is the margin, not the profit. The profit was considerably less than one cent.

Mr. McKENZIE: I will adopt the language of the minister and say it was a margin. The company took umbrage at Mr. O'Connor's report that they had even a margin of 5·05 cents, and immediately asked for another court. What did that court find? It did not find that they made a profit of 5 cents, but a great deal more than 5 cents. The company would not give Mr. O'Connor the necessary information to ascertain the difference between gross and net profits, so Mr. O'Connor figured it out from the overhead expenses of other companies and reached the conclusion put forth in his report. He found there was a margin of 5·05 cents. But what is that compared with what was found by the court that was appointed to whitewash Sir Joseph Flavelle, in the expectation that it would find that Mr. O'Connor was absolutely wrong and that there was no such margin. I have in my hand the report signed by Mr. Henderson, Mr. Brodie and Mr. Clarkson, the three gentlemen who were appointed to review the investigation of Mr. O'Connor and to report. It is only necessary for me to read the first section of their finding, as all I am concerned about is: Did they find that the profit was greater or less than 5·05 cent, as represented by Mr. O'Connor. Let me point out that Mr. O'Connor finds that on the turn-over, that is, in the handling of that particular quantity, there was a gross profit of the amount he mentions, but as I understand it, that does not include plant and overhead expenses generally, such as the land upon which the building stands and the machinery used in a business of this kind. I do not understand that Mr. OConnor figures on that at all. I think he simply deals with buying the goods and the turning over of them without any reference to the value of the stores, land, horses, engines or stock that the man might own. But what do Mr. Henderson and his commission find? They find that there is not only 5 per cent on the turnover but that the profits made by the companies during the war, were excessively high and yielded an extraordinary return on the capital investment. They say that in the year 1916 the trading profits of the Davies Company—that is Sir Joseph Flavelle—equalled eighty per cent on the company's investment in packing houses, plants, retail stores and everything else in connection with the business. Eighty per cent upon land, upon buildings, upon horses, upon engines, upon every conceivable thing they had in connection with the business. That is the finding of Mr. Henderson. It is plain, simple, clear and easy to be understood.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that there was no ground or justification given before the commission, of which Mr. Henderson was the head, for the appeal from the findings of Mr. O'Connor. I wish to bring this matter to the notice of the minister and to tell him in the most particular way that the people of this country think it was only because of the pull that this man, Sir Joseph Flavelle, and those who were associated with him in making these huge fortunes, have with the minister and the Government generally that has influenced them, and that it is only this hydraulic pressure that has lifted this man O'Connor out of office and thrown him on the street. That is the belief of this country and I submit that there is some fair ground for it. From the day that he found fault with this man, Sir Joseph Flavelle, to this, in so far as the office of the Minister of Labour is concerned, it appears that there was no continuing city for him any more and that he could no longer live in comfort there.

But the manœuverings and dealings of this great concern did not end with making eighty per cent out of the poor people of this country by reason of the fact that Sir Joseph Flavelle had the inside track, by reason of the fact that Sir Joseph Flavelle, through his influence, or his friendship with this Government, managed to secure a contract with the Imperial Government which no other concern could get. He could lose nothing no matter how much he paid. He had a contract with the Imperial Government that he would get a certain percentage on his buying price whatever it might be. There are hon. gentlemen sitting in front of me who know something about buying and they know that if they can go through the country with the knowledge that, whatever they pay, they cannot lose any money, and that if another man has not such a contract he cannot compete with them at all. A man, if he expects to make a few dollars, or a few cents, on his bargain, must buy at a certain price because he knows what he has to sell for. Sir Joseph Flavelle was in the fortunate position that if he bought at ten cents he knew that he had a margin beyond that and if he bought at twelve cents his margin was the same. If the market went up by twenty, thirty, forty, or fifty per cent, he could not by any possibility lose. Together with that he had access to transports which enabled him to send his goods over to the other side and make profits on the turnover there through agencies to which he attached his machinery and he went on dealing and working and squeezing money out of the poor people of this country without any check or interference whatsoever. As one of the representatives of the people of this country, I maintain that there should be a check on conduct of this kind. The Government should have known what was going on in this business and this man should not have been permitted to make these extraordinary profits out of the life blood of the poor people of this country. This is a fair subject for comment and it should be brought to the notice of the Government and of the people. I do not think that I should apologize, or feel that I am imposing upon you, Sir, or upon hon. members, in bringing a matter of such vast importance to the notice of the only tribunal in the world with which we have anything to do that can remedy matters of this kind.

There is one thing more. Sir Joseph Flavelle was not satisfied with what he had done in connection with the investigation that took place, but, before I leave that I venture to submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is a most extraordinary thing that although this man has been found guilty by Mr. O'Connor of extraordinary profiteering, and although Mr. O'Connor says that if this had been done while the Order in Council was in force, he would have regarded it as his duty and obligation to bring the matter to the notice of the Attorney General with a view to prosecution, no action was taken. If the minister discovered that this prosecution could be brought about by just making this Order in Council, which was produced with such a great flourish of trumpets, retroactive, by just changing the date from the twentieth to the first of the month, why did he allow this man, who was a criminal and who was robbing the people of this country, to escape punishment? If he were a cobbler he would have no show for his life, but this millionaire, this multimillionaire, a friend of this Government, the godfather of the hon. Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) and who has a lease evidently on everything that is powerful and strong about this Government, can do as he likes and smile at any person who may suggest that he is injuring the country and discrediting its Government. I make these somewhat extraordinary and strong charges in the hope that I may stir up the Minister of Labour a little bit and that he may get on his cobbler armour and go after the man who has millions and who has great strength in this country and that he will give the country to understand, the poor as well as the rich, that there is only one King, one Government, and one line of justice for every man whether he be rich or poor. It remains for the Government to satisfy the people that that is the way things should be done. If they leave this matter as it is now and let this man escape with his eighty per cent, his millions and hundreds of millions, this man who was enabled to make five millions in less than six months out of the life blood of this country, I do not think that it will be regarded as wholesome for the Government or for any person who may be supporting them particularly in this zone where this disclosure has been so keenly felt.

In the city of Winnipeg only the other day we had an investigation into the conduct of this same man and his agencies in that part of the country. Food of the most delicate character, food that is not easy to get, to the extent of thirty-five tons of chicken, I understand, was allowed to rot in a certain cold storage in Winnipeg. It was allowed to go to decay and had to be thrown out upon the dump rotten rather than sell it to the poor people of Canada at half a cent a pound less than the ordinary high price out of which these millions were being made as I have already stated. The Government appointed a Commission of Inquiry and this is what the commission says. But before I read its findings, let me say that it is sad to think that on a question of fact you cannot believe those people. You cannot believe Sir Joseph Flavelle, I am sorry to say, on a mere bald question of fact. He swears before Mr. Justice Meredith or Mr. Justice Duff, that certain work was being done for them for nothing, that it was being done absolutely free. We find his hand to an agreement according to which, in connection with identically the same work, he was getting five per cent on a million, or at least his company was getting five per cent on hundreds of millions of money. This man has spent a million dollars a day, the money of the Canadian people, three hundred millions of money a year, if not more, and a large slice of that was going through this company and somebody was getting five per cent. We would like to know how much it was.

Mr. EDMUND BRISTOL (Toronto Centre): Who owns the stock of the company that is getting five per cent commission? I understood the hon. gentleman to say that that stock was all owned by the Imperial Munitions Company which was giving the contract to the subsidiary company. So that if the hon. gentleman's statement is correct that five per cent profit would be something that would go back to the parent company who owned the stock in the subsidiary company.

Mr. McKENZIE: I must tell the hon. gentleman that when it comes to talking about Mackenzie & Mann's companies—

Mr. BRISTOL: But the hon. gentleman was making a statement and I merely asked him to explain it, I wish to understand him. If his statement is correct that one company owns all the stock in the other company then the five per cent is a question of bookkeeping, and neither Sir Joseph Flavelle nor anybody else is getting it.

Mr. McKENZIE: I can give the hon. gentleman an agreement with another company according to which this five per cent never comes back directly to the Munitions Board, never in the world. These agreements came into my possession as being genuine, and I believe they are. The facts are not of my creation, and all I am saying is this: Sir Joseph Flavelle states that this company was getting nothing at all. He says: Those men are giving their time and energy and experience for nothing.

Mr. BRISTOL: That may be so.

Mr. McKENZIE: Well, they are incorporated into a board, and right on top of that there is an agreement by which these philanthropists, who are giving their time, energy, and experience for nothing, are to receive five per cent.

Mr. BRISTOL: No, the company is getting five per cent, and the other company owns the stock. The philanthropists are not getting it according to the hon. gentleman's statement.

Mr. McKENZIE: Very good, I say that they are getting it, and that is what they are after. That is why a paper like Saturday Night is making an investigation and letting daylight into this matter, to see that the people of this country are protected. If it can be shown that there is nothing wrong about this transaction, well and good. It is no business of mine, and if the transaction turns out to be honest and above board no person will be more pleased than myself. On the face of it, however, it looks as if this man was making a statement that does not square with the facts as they develop afterwards. If that is not so all right, but, as I understand it, his statements are not borne out.

As to a question of fact, I have here the report of an officer, I presume appointed either directly or indirectly by the Government, in which the finding appears that a certain transaction of the William Davies Packing Company in Winnipeg was far from proper, and that the statements made in connection with the conduct of their business there are far from the truth. Now, Sir, there is no use in going half way with this matter, and I must ask your indulgence while I read to you a report:

J. D. McGregor, Esq.,
Western Representative,
Canada Food Board,
Winnipeg, Man.

Dear Sir:

I received your letter dated March 14th, 1918, instructing me to hold an investigation into the cold storage business of the William Davies Co. of the city of Winnipeg, with particular reference to the destruction recently of a large amount of poultry at the city incinerator.

After careful consideration I beg to report as follows:

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Meetings of the Commission for taking evidence were held on the following dates: March 18th, 19th, 20th, 21st and 23rd, of 1918. On the morning of the 20th an inspection was made of the plant.

Mr. Isaac Pitblado, K.C., and Mr. A. E. Bowles, were counsel for the William Davies Co., and Mr. C. E. Finklestein for the Canada Food Board. They were present at all meetings.

All witnesses were duly sworn and evidence taken under oath.

I enclose herewith the transcript of the evidence taken before me, together with Exhibits filed.

In the following findings I refer to the pages of the evidence. I take it from your letter that while you wished me to deal with and recommend upon collateral matters arising therefrom yet you desired me to investigate and report upon the following two points in particular:

1. Was there any "hoarding" of food?

2. What was the cause of the deterioration of the poultry?

Mr. Karl Symonds, Manager of the plant of the William Davies Co. of Winnipeg, swore that the Head Office at Toronto knew nothing of his purchasing the poultry but he bought them "off my own bat" (Page 41). He did not at any time report having this quantity of poultry on hand to the Head Office, but he reported daily temperatures of the room in which they were held. He further swore that he gave instructions to his travellers to sell "regardless of cost" (Page 23). He swore "no price was set to Williams," one of his travellers (Page 23) that his instructions to sell "regardless of cost" were for the whole of the summer of 1917 (Page 33) that he never fixed the minimum price (page 104) that he instructed his travellers to meet all competition (Page 35). On being recalled the following day he again swore that he gave instructions to sell "regardless of cost" (Pages 103 and 105).

Now that is the evidence of the manager, now comes the evidence of the travellers to whom he refers:

Symonds' evidence was contradicted by the evidence of his own two travellers, Messrs. E. A. Williams and F. D. Cundell.

E. A. Williams swore Symonds did not instruct him to sell "regardless of cost" (Pages 261 and 266) swore that he, Williams, had an offer from John Campbell at the General Hospital at 19c and Williams phoned Symonds who instructed him not to sell at less than 20c (Page 262).

F. D. Cundell, also a traveller of the Davies Company, swore that Symonds did not instruct him to sell "regardless of cost" (Pages 271-272) was not told that he had to undersell and get rid of it (Page 271); had to sell according to set price (Page 277); could have sold if price had been reduced (Page 272).

In addition to the evidence of the manager, Mr. Symonds, and the two travellers of the Davies Company, several quite disinterested parties gave evidence before me to which I give the utmost weight and to which I now refer. Mr. T. J. Coyle, broker, swore that Symonds offered him 20,000 pounds of poultry August 22nd, 1917, at 20 cents per pound. He wired order to Gunn-Langlois, Montreal, but they would not accept at that price. He swore Montreal firm would have purchased if price was reduced, and that if Symonds had had a standing order with him to sell regardless of cost he could have sold the poultry.

John Campbell, Steward of Winnipeg General Hospital, swore that Davies Company refused to sell at market price, in October, 1917. He swore that he offered 19c. to Williams, the Company's traveller quoted 20c. and says he got some fowl from Swifts and Gordon Ironsides at 19c. during the month of October, 1917. He swore that Williams told him there was no fowl for sale in December, 1917, and January, 1918.

John Guest, Manager meat department, T. Eaton Co., swore Eatons could have sold the poultry, says he would have purchased it in January, February and March, 1919, at 20c.

W. L. Haight, produce Manager, Gordon, Ironsides and Fares, swore he could have sold chicken in January, February and March, 1918.

James Gallagher, President Gallagher, Holman and LaFrance, swore he disposed of a carload in Montreal to William Clark in December, 1917, at 21c.

At this point I should state that the evidence submitted by the Winnipeg branch of the Davies Company was to the effect that the poultry in question, amounting to 70,000 pounds was put in cold storage in their Winnipeg plant during the months of October, November and December of 1916.

In March, 1918, about one year and five months later, 50,000 pounds still remained, and it was found that a large portion of it had deteriorated and 8,500 pounds was sent to the city incinerator for destruction. The W. Davies Company have been instructed and are rapidly disposing of all stock on hand that are fit for food at very reduced price and there will be about 1,500 and 2,000 pounds more to be destroyed out of the balance in storage.

A comparison of prices for storage poultry as shown in Gordon, Ironsides and Fares price list and Cundell's price list will show that the prices of Cundell, traveller for Wm. Davies Co., run slightly higher all through the year 1917 for both fowl and chicken.

The commissioner has added a table here which shows that the prices of the William Davies Company all through are higher than those of Gordon, Ironsides & Fares. In June, 1917, he says that Gordon, Ironsides & Fares quoted fowl 21 to 24 cents and chicken 23 to 26 cents, while the William Davies Company were quoting 22 to 25 cents for fowl and 25 to 27 cents for chicken, and right through to September they were charging more than other companies, and he recommends that the cold storage plant should not be permitted any longer to carry on business in that way, and he criticises severely the fact that this enormous quantity—perhaps not enormous, it is 35 tons or more of very excellent and delicate food needed in the country at that time of the year—was allowed to deteriorate and had to be thrown into the dump, and says that it should not be allowed to happen again.

In conclusion, I must say that this gentleman who is at the head of these great operations should not be allowed by the Government to go along any further having such power and control over these matters as he now has. Sir Joseph's power of spending is one million dollars a day, over three hundred millions a year, of the money of the people of Canada. His conduct in his own private business, his greedy profiteering, his defiance of public sentiment, his outraging of public opinion, do not make him a fit custodian and spender of this vast sum of the people's money, nor can the Government of Canada retain the confidence of the people when a thrice-convicted war profiteer and food hoarder is kept in the powerful position which he at present occupies. Surely the people have paid a sufficient price for the services of Sir Joseph Flavelle. He parades the fact that he works without salary, but he demanded as the price of his services not only a tribute to his bacon factory, not only a knighthood, the ordinary reward of public service, but a hereditary baronetcy, against the establishment of which in this democracy the people of Canada very properly rebel. The "pork barrel" in politics is an Americanism which is not required in Canada, and the time is long past due when this baronet with the conscience, which "has no qualm" should be retired from public life, and the Prime Minister of Canada should so intimate to the Imperial authorities, who, no doubt, would be only too glad of a reasonable excuse to conform.

A very small part of the operations of this concern has been in this way brought before the House, and particularly before the Government, and I trust such steps will be taken as will prevent any further profiteering at the expense of the good people of Canada. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that it is only necessary to bring this matter to the notice of the Minister of Labour and the Government to insure that such steps will be taken as will for ever put an end to any man having power to conduct his business in such a way as to unduly rob the poor people of the country of the food which should go to the sustenance of themselves and their children. It does not contribute at all to the high standing of the Government, or to the efficiency of our army and navy, or to anything that is being done in connection with militarism in this country, if it is for one moment believed that there are men who have backstairs and backdoor influences in connection with matters of this kind which operate to the disadvantage of the ordinary, everyday, poor man in this country.

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that I was obliged to take so much time in presenting this case.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE: I hear the hon. member for Brantford saying, "Hear, hear." I suppose that he is in full sympathy with those millionaires and men who make such extraordinary profits, and he does not feel very much in sympathy with me and other poor people to whom a dollar is a consideration. I can only hope that the hon. member will excuse me for living upon this planet and for having exercised my right of free speech as a member of this House in presenting these matters to a free Parliament.

Mr. D. L. REDMAN (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. gentleman (Mr. McKenzie) on making the longest speech which we have heard during the course of this debate. I regard this as the more remarkable because when commencing his speech he gave some very weighty advice to the member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. McIsaac) who preceded him. Perhaps the hon. gentleman thinks that the fact that he read for two hours out of the three during which he addressed the House will take something from the length of his speech. However, I will say nothing further with regard to that.

I wish to congratulate the Acting Minister of Finance (Hon. A. K. Maclean) for the able manner in which he presented his Budget to the House and for the firm way in which he has grappled with the tremendous financial problems that confront the country. The record of the Finance Minister and of this Government in the financing of the country's affairs during the war, in the splendid loans which they have floated, in the well-placed taxation which they have effected, is one of which they may justly be proud. The people of Canada have reason to be proud of their splendid response to the call for subscriptions to war loans, of the manner in which ordinary business affairs of the country have been carried on, and of the wealth which has been produced throughout the land. We can look with satisfaction upon our financial position, and we can feel that no matter how long the struggle may last we shall be able to keep up in the collar; we shall be able to maintain the position we now occupy until that victory comes of which we are assured.

While our position is an excellent one, we should not lose sight of the fact that at the end of March of this year our national debt is approximately $1,200,000,000. What that debt will be when the war is over no one can say, but if the struggle continues one, two or more years, we can be certain that it will be substantially larger than it is now. We must remember also that in addition to our current expenditures and capital outlays, we have to make annual payments out of revenue by way of interest on our national debt, which to-day is estimated at approximately $50,000,000, and which will increase as our debt increases. Moreover, we have to meet annual payments by way of pensions, for which in the Estimates of this year some $15,000,000 are being asked. It is safe to predict that when the war ends the amount payable for pensions will exceed $50,000,000 a year.

We should have regard to two things in considering this Budget: first, the manner in which we shall raise funds during this and possibly the next year; second, the financial position in which our country will be placed at the termination of the war. To-day we have an opportunity of greatly influencing that post-war condition. In discussing this matter I wish to keep that second point more especially in view.

For many years it has been the policy of this country to rely upon customs revenues for the means to meet ordinary expenditures. I shall not make any comment upon the merits of that source of revenue, except that in time of war we must without question continue it. But our reliance upon this source of revenue should not blind our eyes to other possible means of raising money; in the circumstances existing to-day, it is desirable that every possible source of revenue should be carefully investigated and, if deemed advisable, taken advantage of by the Government.

The other great form of taxation is direct taxation, of which in England the most important factor is the income tax—and it should be the case in Canada. Income tax has existed in England since the year 1799, when it was put on by Mr. Pitt to raise moneys for the prosecution of the Napoleonic wars. Since that date, and more especially since the repeal of the Corn Laws, that tax has been the mainstay of each Chancellor of the British Exchequer, and in England to-day that tax, more than any other source of revenue, is enabling England to carry on the war and to pay as substantial an amount as 17 per cent of its war indebtedness. They can do that in England better than we can do it here because they have been accustomed to income tax for one hundred years. It is proper that in Canada we should introduce new modes of taxation slowly; no important departure in the way of taxation should be made suddenly. Our people should be gradually educated to a new form of taxation, and only when they have accepted it can it be considered successful. What is the history of income tax in this country? The subject was discussed early last session. The Minister of Finance stated at first that an income tax would not be introduced—he pointed out various objections to it—but later, towards the end of the last Parliament, the income tax which is now on our statute book was brought in. The imposition of that tax was in itself a great step forward, and after six months we can feel that it has been favourably accepted by the people. They have looked into that tax; they have considered the rating under it, and viewing the matter in relation to the requirements of the country, they feel that it is a tax which they should be called upon to pay. That being the case, we should consider whether or not it is advisable to make any substantial increase in the rate payable under that tax. That brings us to the changes proposed in the tax as outlined by the Acting Minister of Finance. I agree with him in the lowering of the minimums of exemption in the case of unmarried men to $1,000 and of married men to $2,000, and the placing of the rate of 2 per cent on the amounts by which these minimums have been respectively reduced.

I feel that is only fair, and especially that those unmarried men, although not earning a great deal, should be called upon to pay some little part—I believe the tax amounts to about $10,—so that they will feel that they are citizens of this country; that they have responsibilities, and that they are taking their fair part in this war. The next important point in regard to this change in the tax is that it affects a very large number of people, and, as a consequence, a substantial revenue will be received. No one, I believe, can take exception to the exemption of $200 granted in the case of each child. A similar provision has for some time existed in the American and British Acts, and this provision will tend to make the Act a great deal more fair, and as an Act becomes more fair, so will it become more popular, and so will the people of Canada become more willing to pay it.

I cannot say that the surtax which is proposed to be imposed by the Government, has impressed me as have the other two items. I do not know for what reason this tax has been imposed in this manner. As I understand it, this surtax is a tax upon the super tax already imposed, and it varies in degree as the incomes become greater. I do not, however, think that this surtax is substantial. It commences with a tax of 5 per cent on the tax already assessed under the old Act, and a tax of 5 per cent on the former tax is, in my opinion, not substantial, and I cannot see that it makes any great difference in the Act.

Speaking of the classes who should be exempted, I put out in a more or less tentative manner this idea, that while possibly those who are serving in His Majesty's forces and navy should not be entirely exempted from the operation of this tax, some exemptions, greater than those ordinarily given, should be granted to them, because I think it is evident to every one that, in most cases, those who are overseas are not receiving as much as they were heretofore receiving, or as much as they would to-day be able to earn in this country. If by sending them overseas we have taken away a source of income from them, then to that extent they should be exempted from the operation of this tax.

Leaving, however, those points which are more or less smaller points in this subject, I come to the next change which has been proposed by the minister. That is the very heavily increasing taxation on incomes over $50,000. To this I can only most heartily agree and say that I personally would be willing to go considerably further in regard to those increases. There is another great class of incomes in which no change has been made. There are large incomes, underneath the sum of $50,000, per year which are not very heavily affected by the present tax. In order that I may present this matter definitely, I shall lay before the House a table showing what the tax on incomes between $5,000 and $50,000 would be if the rate were doubled. This will be in the case of a married man without children, premising that the exemption would be $2,000, and that the rate between $2,000 and $3,000 would be one-half of the normal tax. This is the table:

Income.	Tax.	Net Income.
3,000	40	2,960
4,000	120	3,880
5,000	200	4,800
6,000	280	5,720
10,000	760	9,240
20,000	2,560	17,449

I have read these figures to the House because I think they will show that even in the lowest income, for example, that of $2,500, the payment would be only $20. I do not think that could be considered as being too heavy a drain upon the individual, nor one which he could not well afford to pay. As we get up into the higher amounts, for example, an income of $20,000, I do not think the sum of $2,560 would be a tax which that man could not, having regard to everything in this country, pay, and I think that the balance of $17,440 should be sufficient for him to maintain himself upon each year. The first point I want to make is that I feel that the rate under the income tax should generally be substantially increased, and that especially the higher incomes should be very substantially taxed. I believe, upon the figures which I have just given to the House, showing the effect with the rate doubled, it is apparent that each person should be able to afford the tax which he would have to pay and should have quite sufficient left to maintain himself in the degree of comfort to which he has been accustomed. If any further evidence should be required as to the possibility of a family having an income of $2,500 being able to afford a tax of $20 and to live on a net income of $2,480, I should like, for purposes of comparison, to draw the attention of the House to a large class of families living to-day in Canada. Every hon. member has met with them in his constituency. I refer to the families of soldiers overseas who are living on the moneys which the Government and the Patriotic Fund give to them. We all know the sort of life that some of those families have to lead. We know they have nothing but the bare necessities of life. I believe $15 is the amount of the assigned pay, $25 the amount of the separation allowance, where there are no children, and the amount donated by the Patriotic Fund varies. Think for a moment of the amount on which those families are living, and they comprise no inconsiderable proportion of the people of this country. Some 400,000 men have enlisted, and from that we can deduce the number of families in our country who are living on that scale. Personally, I believe the amounts payable to those families should be increased; but I am using this illustration to show the possibility of a family living on a less income than it now receives. I quite agree with the statement that a tax to be successful must be popular. I believe the people of Canada would accept a very substantial increase in the income tax, and the more readily because the strain of war is upon them. Our people are interested in the war more than in any other question which could possibly come before them, and for that reason I think they would not object to the payment of this additional tax. It may be urged that the cost of living is higher, but on the other hand money is freer and wages in a great many, if not the majority of cases, are higher.

Another reason why I think the tax should be increased now is that we are having what might be termed a period of prosperity to a certain extent caused by war conditions, and I think we should collect for the purposes of the war a substantial portion of the money that has been made by reason of the war. I am not advocating any very drastic tax. I do not think the figures I have given could be considered drastic. Another reason why I think we should increase this tax now is lest our people might get the idea that the tax will never be increased, that the present tax is fixed and furnishes a precedent. If the time is ripe, and I think it is, we should move up logically to the next step.

Referring to the collection of the income tax, the Minister of Finance last session stated that one great objection to such a tax in this country was the vastness of our territory, compared to our population, which made its collection difficult, but that objection is eliminated as regards the increased tax I am proposing, because we already have our collecting system established, and it would cost very little, if anything, more to collect a higher tax.

Let us consider what would be the result to the finances of this country if the present income tax were doubled or trebled, and if higher rates were assessed on the bigger incomes. The Acting Minister of Finance, in introducing this tax, estimated it would yield between seventeen and twenty million dollars, and I do not think any public statement has been made in reference to that estimate since. Taking that as our basis, and premising the doubling or trebling of the rate and increasing the assessment on higher incomes, we could hope to obtain in this way a sum between fifty and seventy-five million dollars. I believe this amount is required in this country to-day. It is true we are paying our current expenditure, and still have some surplus to apply on our post-war indebtedness. It is all a question of the extent to which we should go in the imposition of taxes, in the reduction of our indebtedness, and in the amount of indebtedness we are justified in leaving to the future. I believe the amount realized from this tax, together with the surplus which we now appear to have from year to year, would enable us to reduce our war expenditure by at least one hundred million dollars a year, and I do not think we should set our ambitions at anything lower than that. England in the years 1916 and 1917 paid off 17 per cent of her war expenditure, and she did that almost entirely by direct taxation, for she has not, relatively speaking, any customs revenue. England has done that while she is fighting with her back to the wall, while she can hear the guns of the enemy thundering across the channel. In view of the great strain and financial demands upon them and their proximity to the war, it is astounding that the people of England have been able to pay off as much as 17 per cent of their war expenditure. The Americans are arranging to pay off 14 per cent, and while it is a matter for congratulation that we in Canada have paid off 11 per cent, I know of no reason why Canada should not do as well as England and the United States, and I feel that this is possibly the easiest and most proper way to raise the money required to retire annually such a substantial portion of our war indebtedness.

It may be said by some, that if we impose such a severe tax it would interfere with our war loans. I quite agree that the major portion of the money we require to carry on this war must be obtained by means of war loans, but I do not think the imposition of this tax would interfere with the success of the war loans. After all, while the sum is substantial in itself, it is not very great for each individual, nor is it very great in comparison with the amount which we may have to borrow. To take care of our war needs, the next loan may have to be for $400,000,000. I do not think the imposition of this tax would cause our people to subscribe less freely to the war loans, or decrease to any appreciable extent the funds which they would have to subscribe.

One thing at least is clear. By the imposition of this tax we should reach a class of our people who do not now subscribe to war loans, and who but for the imposition of some such tax as this will never contribute to this war. From one end of our country to the other there is scattered a class, small, it is true, who for different reasons are not contributing to our war loans, and this is the only manner in which they can be made to do their share.

I might suggest this further idea. If it is apparent to our people that their incomes will be substantially taxed for war purposes, and if we continue to make our war loans free from income tax I should imagine the imposition of this tax would incline people more and more to the purchase of war loan bonds. Whether we should issue our war loans free of income tax, is a very important question. In order to influence people gradually to buying loans subject to income tax, an option might be given to purchase bonds at par, if they want them free of income tax, or at something less than par if they are to be subject to the income tax. A gentleman suggested that to me in conversation to-day, and it is a possible mode of making the transition from loans free of income tax to loans subject to the tax. Personally, I do not think this tax would have any bad effect on the war loans, and I certainly think it should be imposed. I think that all we have to do is to grasp this question firmly and put it through. I believe that we will find that this tax will be popular, that our people will pay it without complaining and that they will rise to the necessities of the situation by purchasing war bonds as they did before.

Some people may object to the increase of this tax because they fear that our people, or their money to some extent, may emigrate to the United States. One can only estimate what the effect of a substantial increase in this tax may be in that regard. I can only say in the light I have been able to obtain with regard to the question that I do not believe that such a result as this will be brought about. Eventually our indebtedness must be paid. The United States are perhaps, in some regards, not in as good a condition as we are with reference to the financial side of our war operations. We are further on in the war than they are; we know where we are; we know how much we must provide, what we have to provide for and what our expenses are. On the other hand the United States are practically commencing. They do not know what their costs will be and they do not know exactly the form of taxation which it will be advisable for them to impose. So, I cannot see any great force in any comparison which might be made if we should raise the rates of taxation in this country higher than those which exist in the United States. While that may be true with regard to emigration to the United States, unless we substantially decrease our national debt that may act as a great deterent to immigration into this country. We should endeavour to so reduce our national debt that after the war Canada can be looked to by the prospective immigrants as a country which, if it has not a proportionately less debt has no greater debt than other countries which may be offering inducements to immigrants. Having regard to our great need of immigration after the war, the problem of the amount of our national debt will be an important factor, and we should endeavour to grapple with that problem now as firmly as we can. When the war is completed we will require a large amount of money to develop the resources of the country, to carry on until they become more productive our railways to assist our returned soldiers and to promote those more or less co-operative enterprises which are creeping into our national life. We shall be very seriously handicapped if, at the end of the war, we have made no substantial progress in redeeming an appreciable part of our national debt.

I do not believe that the imposition of this tax will tend to discourage or disorganize business in any manner. It may be true that the business profits war tax—that is, the tax on business itself—if carried too far, might discourage initiative and enterprise among business men but it must be remembered that this income tax is not being levied on business itself, where perhaps some surplus is required for the purpose of new enterprises and expansion, but it is being levied on money that is free even from the control of business organizations. It is not being taken away from any particular business. It is being taken from the moneys of individual people throughout the country and I do not see that there is any great danger of discouraging initiative or enterprise or harming business in any way. This is perhaps the feature of greatest importance that we must consider in imposing any tax. I feel personally that there is no substantial reason why the rate of this tax should not be doubled or even trebled and why incomes in the higher amounts should not be even more heavily assessed than they appear to be in the Budget which has been brought down. I have not been able to discover any good reason why this should not be done and I feel personally very strongly that it should be done. I think that I have made out an economic case for increasing substantially the rate of this tax. There is another feature and that is that this tax would act in the nature of an equalizer in the matter of sacrifice in this country. A large proportion of our people were called upon to go overseas, to work for $1.10 a day, to endure hardships and to run the risk of losing their lives, many have lost them. At home their families are living on the bare necessities. These men are not able to take advantage of the economic prosperity here as many of us who remain at home have been able to. We are enjoying all the conditions which we would have enjoyed in peace time. In addition, we are enjoying even greater prosperity than ordinarily exists in peace time. I have been very closely in touch with a large portion of those who are serving overseas ever since the outbreak of the war, and I think I can indicate to the House what their feelings are. They have a right to express their feelings in regard to this matter, and they feel that while they are doing these things for us we should sacrifice something ourselves. We should sacrifice something out of the money we are making and which we can well afford to part with. It seems to me that when our fellow Canadians overseas are endeavouring to defend us against the German onslaught we might be called upon to protect and defend this country against any burden of excessive debt or any possibility of bankruptcy. Therefore, I believe this measure will be an equalizer or sacrifice, and I believe further that those of our people who remain at home and who have not been called upon as yet to make as great a sacrifice as have the soldiers, wish to do their fair share. This tax will not be unpopular. On the contrary, it will be popular. I believe that the people expressed themselves on that point at the last election, and that it was their intention, and their mandate to the Government to increase the taxation as well as to obtain the necessary men. For the reasons I have given, more especially for the economic reasons, I recommend that the question of substantial increases in the rates under the Income Tax Act, should receive the most careful consideration of this House.

Mr. W. C. KENNEDY (North Essex): Mr. Speaker, like every member of the House and many taxpayers outside, I was very much interested in the Budget speech as brought down by my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance. I appreciate that at a time like this it is a very difficult matter to produce a Budget that will meet with the approval of every one. In this time of stress and trouble in Canada it is particularly hard, but I believe that it is our duty, not only in connection with the Budget, but in connection with any legislation that may be brought down, to have but one thought in mind, and but one object in view: that is to enact such laws as will best assist our country and the Empire at the present time. Any criticism that I may have to offer will be absolutely with that object in view and animated by that spirit.

I feel that the Government are deserving of particular credit for their Order in Council permitting the introduction of tractors free. Anything that will tend to increase production in Canada at the present time will be of real assistance to the Allies and of real assistance to the country. I only regret that the Government do not see their way to going further and absolutely eliminating the duty on all farming implements. Personally I stand, always have stood, for a tariff for revenue purposes, but as has been well said by various hon. gentlemen, this is not the time for tariff discussion. It is rather a time when we should come to a decision to do what is best for the country; and surely no one can gainsay that what Canada needs now is greater production. If free tractors will make for greater production, surely free agricultural implements of all kinds will make for that result to an even greater extent, and I believe the Government should give this matter further consideration.

So far as the re-imposition of the Business Profits War Tax is concerned, I feel that the action of the Government will meet with the approval of the people at large. I do not agree with one hon. gentleman who said that perhaps the business interests will feel aggrieved. My own experience of the business men of Canada, during this war, is that they have been generous of their time, generous of their money, and even generous of their families, and I believe they will be the last to grumble with respect to any taxes which the Government require them to pay. But, Sir, should there be men among them who do not desire to pay over to the Government some of the profits they are receiving at the present time, it is fitting and proper that measures should be taken that will enable the Government to collect such profits.

I quite agree with what my hon. friend from East Calgary (Mr. Redman) has said with reference to the Income Tax, and I think the proposition should receive the careful consideration of the Government. I believe that the men who are in a position to pay that tax should be required to pay, that the men who are in a position to carry the burden should be made to carry it; and the burden should be made as light as possible upon those who can least afford to pay it, that is, the working classes of Canada. I agree with the hon. member for Calgary that if it is not too late some action should be taken along that line.

In connection with the Income Tax, there is a matter which affects our own locality, to which I would be glad to call the attention of the Acting Minister of Finance, and it is this: Living on the border, as we do in the city of Windsor, there are many of our citizens who are employed across the river in the city of Detroit, and, vice versa, there are many citizens of Detroit who are employed in Windsor. To-day Canadians who cross from Windsor to work in Detroit are subjected to a tax of two and a half per cent on their wages, but there is no provision for such a tax on American workmen crossing to our side. I do not advocate imposing a tax on American workmen coming into Canada, because I realize that in many instances their wages are not very large and they could not perhaps afford to pay it, but I do believe there should be some reciprocal arrangement between the two countries that would free our people from the obligation of paying this tax. I do not know whether the minister has had the matter before him, but I hope that representations have been made to Washington that will enable us to bring about a settlement of this matter in a manner that will be satisfactory to our people.

There is another suggestion that I wish to offer to the minister. There may be reasons why it should not be accepted, but they do not occur to me at the moment, and that is in connection with the Business Profits War Tax and the Income Tax. It would seem to me advisable, if possible, that when statements are sent in by corporations or by individuals, they should be accompanied by a cheque for the amount which is owing the Government at that time. I know of some cases—and I have no doubt there are other members of the House who know of many cases—in so far as the Business Profits Tax is concerned, dating back to 1915 that have not been adjusted. This country is a heavy borrower, and if it is possible to adjust anything that may be wrong in this statement, it is just as easy and just as feasible to adjust it with a cheque rather than to allow the matter to drift for two or three years with the amount that is due remaining uncollected. I believe if the Finance Minister will take that matter under advisement he will probably find it will enable him to come into the immediate possession of many millions of dollars that otherwise he might have to wait for until the matters in dispute have been adjusted. I give the suggestion to the hon. gentleman for what it is worth.

I am heartily in accord with the tax that has been placed upon the packers; after listening to the statement of my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) tonight, I do not believe there is a man in the House who will say that he is not heartily in accord with the tax which has been placed upon those gentlemen. My thought in connection with this matter is this: I hope that the Government of this country will not realize a five cent piece from the excess profits so far as the packers are concerned; there should be some regulation of prices in the interest of the consumer, and if this is done there will be no excess profits. I know what I am talking about, because I live in a city and I am in touch with workingmen who are earning three to four dollars a day. It is difficult for them to get along as it is, and properly care for their families, bearing in mind the high prices exacted for food, clothing, shoes, rent and fuel, without paying profits either to the packers or to the Government. It does not make very much difference to the workingman with his three and a half or four dollars a day, whether the profits go to the packer or go to the Government. In the one instance he, perhaps, gets an indirect benefit, but that benefit is not very apparent to him when he draws his wages at the end of the week and settles his bills. Therefore, I believe that, if possible, legislation should be enacted with a view to regulating prices in the interest of the working classes. I do not know whether the Food Control Board can be utilized in this connection, certainly some effort should be made to regulate food prices so that the average worker may have the opportunity to live like a white man in this country of ours.

There is one tax that I do not agree with, but take great exception to, and that is the tax on tea. It does seem to me that the Government could have found some other method of raising three million dollars per annum than by taxing the poor man's table

I would suggest to the Finance Minister that he take a look at the Financial Times of Saturday, April 20, 1918, where he will notice an interesting statement. It shows that $500,000,000 constituted the three-year profits of ninety companies, and the paper in question gives a list of the companies. Some of them were food companies, some were steel companies, and all of them will bear inspection. It seems to me that many of these companies could well have contributed the $3,000,000 that is being exacted from the people of Canada by a ten-cent tax on tea. Now, the Financial Times is a very responsible paper; it speaks for "the interests" in this country, if any paper does, and it says this:

> Five Canadian steel companies: Dominion Steel Corporation, Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, Lake Superior Corporation, Ontario Steel Products, and the Steel Company of Canada for 1917 report earnings aggregating $27,582,623, compared with $9,341,460 in 1915, being an increase of 196 per cent.

I have also before me the annual report of the Steel Company of Canada, which shows that in 1914 the profits for the year were $539,811, and in 1917, the net profits, after deducting charges for repairs, maintenance and improvements, and providing for war tax, amounted to $6,040,318. The figures which I have given might well be investigated by the Government, when perhaps the Acting Minister of Finance would find some other way of raising the $3,000,000 that he proposes to collect by a tax on tea. I have another suggestion to offer in connection with the $3,000,000, and that is that the Order in Council to control the packers should be made retroactive, thus enabling the Acting Finance Minister to go back after Sir Joseph Flavelle and his eighty per cent. If the Acting Finance Minister does that it will meet with the approval of the people, and the Government will stand high in the public estimation. Furthermore, by carrying out my suggestion they will be placing the burden where it properly belongs.

There is another matter that to my mind merits the attention of this House, a matter which concerns the whole of our people and yet seems to have passed unnoticed—I refer to the amalgamation of banks. We who have been reading the press know that very recently there have been two amalgamations. and we know that slowly, but surely, the number of chartered banks in this country is decreasing. During the past ten years the chartered banks have decreased from thirty-four to nineteen, and it will only be a matter of a short time until we probably will have in this country three great banking systems, perhaps the Bank of Montreal, the Canadian Bank of Commerce, and the Royal Bank. And these banks, with a couple dozen of directors, will control the finances of this country. I do not believe that that will be a good thing for Canada. Nor do I believe that any amalgamation of banks should occur at the present time, at least until the matter is brought before the Banking and Commerce Committee and this House. We are the representatives of the people; the banks are the trustees of the people. The people place their money in the banks, and they should be under Government regulations, as they are. I cannot see why the Acting Minister of Finance, or the Governor in Council, should have the power to permit the amalgamation of banks without having the matter discussed in the House. I can appreciate that under some conditions there might be necessity for immediate action to protect the depositors or shareholders, but I do not believe that under proper Government inspection there is even a remote contingency of that kind. I think the banks in this country are strong financially, and certainly the amalgamation that took place the other day between the Bank of Montreal and the Bank of British North America had no justification. We, representing the people, should have the opportunity of knowing why these amalgamations are being made and what their object is.

You know, Sir, that in the United States very recently—and I speak very deferentially of the United States, because I notice that hon. gentlemen opposite are giving it some thought these days and are treating the United States rather deferentially too—a law was enacted as against what they term interlocking directorates. We in Canada seem to be getting away from that, and we are interlocking the banks rather than the directorates. I think the time has reasonably come when the law should be changed. Perhaps it is almost sacriligeous to say a word against the Canadian banking system. We are told from early morning till late at night that it is the greatest system in the world, that it makes currency elastic, that it keeps up the credit of the country, that it is so superior that no other possible system should be thought of. I believe it is a good system so far as elasticity of currency is concerned. But, while it may be a better system than they have in the United States, the Americans seem to have worried along pretty well notwithstanding the fact that their system does not begin to compare with ours. From my knowledge of it, I have no hesitation in saying that they seem to be pretty well satisfied with it. It does something which this system of ours does not do; it encourages the growth of smaller communities and builds up small towns and cities. Under the system in vogue in Canada, the banks, outside of two or three great centres, are simply depositories. They obtain what deposits they can, which are transferred as speedily as possible to the head offices which use them for any purpose desired. It is a well known fact that money which should have been used for the development of Canadian manufacturing and other enterprises has gone into Mexico, the West Indies, South America and even into far-off Spain;—and to Germany also, as the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Joseph Read) informs me. There is a difference between this and the American banking system. Under the American system, if a man wants a credit he goes to the bank, and fifteen minutes afterwards he knows whether he is to get it or not. The personality of the borrower, not always the collateral that he takes with him, is the basis of the credit. A man's character, his business ability, his record in the community, are large considerations under the American banking system. What happens under our Canadian system? When a man outside a large centre wants money, he goes to the local manager of a bank and fills out two or three forms, which are forwarded to the inspector for the district. The inspector examines these carefully and turns them over to the second vice-president, second general manager, or somebody else, who, if the loan is large enough or of sufficient consequence, turns the matter over to the board of directors. If the directors do not want the money for some one close at home on the day in question, the man is liable to get it—but he is more liable not to get it. That is the difference between the United States system and ours. The great New England manufacturing centres have been built up by the American banking system. In banking, as in other businesses, one requires competition. It is a mistake to permit banks to amalgamate, and I submit that no further amalgamations should be permitted without good reason therefore being given on the floor of this House.

Since I have been in this House I have heard a great deal about what the Government have been doing; how very capable the administration has been; how glad the people ought to be because they have Union Government. May I say to hon. gentlemen in all sincerity that the atmosphere of Ottawa is not necessarily the atmosphere of this whole Dominion. There are places in Canada to-day where ministers of this Government could go and not be met by a torchlight procession. Nine out of ten men who come to Ottawa to interview Cabinet ministers want something for themselves or for their friends, and very naturally they tell these hon. gentlemen that they are the annointed of Heaven; that they are the only Cabinet ministers that ever were, or ever will be; that this is the only Government that ever was or ever will be. Well, that is not the view which is taken by a great many of the people. The Government has been in office over four months, and I submit that they have not lived up to the advance notices of their press agents. I shall refer to two or three matters which will bear out what I say.

I supported the Government so far as the Military Service Act is concerned. No hon. gentleman can say seriously that the Government deserve credit for the manner in which they have administered that Act from its inception up to the present time. Hon. gentlemen have told the farmers one thing one day and changed their minds the next, to such an extent that men working on farms and engaged in various forms of production, thus assisting the men at the front, do not know whether to stay on the farms or not. The Government made a big mistake when they passed the Order in Council the other day with regard to military service. They would have been well advised had they accepted the amendment offered from this side of the House and adopted a different procedure with regard to the farmers. However, they changed their mind before the election and again after the election, and it is quite probable that they will change it again—it all depends on the number of deputations that come here. Throughout the country there is a feeling of unrest among the farmers, who have no confidence in what the Government does. The men who are exempted to-day do not know how soon their turn will come; do not know whether they are justified in spending money or in proceeding with their farm work. Their exemptions may terminate to-morrow or the next day, and consequently production is interfered with. On the whole, the Government have not administered the Military Service Act as they should have done. I supported them on the principle of military service and I therefore feel free to criticise them and to say that I am disappointed, as many of their followers must be.

Another matter about which I have heard a good deal of talk since I came here—some from the Acting Minister of Finance—is the Victory loan. I agree that it is a great credit to the people that they subscribed over $400,000,000 to the Victory loan; Canadians may always be relied upon to do their share at any spot in the road, whether in men, money or munitions—they have always done so. But the people's money should be economically and judiciously expended. In my opinion, the cost of floating the Victory loan and placing it before the people was excessive and extravagant to a degree that perhaps many hon. gentlemen do not appreciate. Approximately $400,000,000 were raised, and the acting minister says that the total cost will be in the neighbourhood of 1¼ per cent, or $5,000,000. That is too much money to pay for floating a loan of $400,000,000. It is true that a Toronto broker, interviewed by one of the Toronto papers, said that the cost was reasonable; that the ordinary rate was 3 per cent, and that the Government were to be congratulated on having handled the loan at such a low rate as 1¼ per cent. But to ask a broker his opinion of the commission paid on a loan is like asking a grocer whether his eggs are fresh—you get the same kind of an answer. Perhaps hon. gentlemen opposite will be interested in some figures with regard to the floating of loans in the United States, the country that they are now following so closely, whose example they are emulating so frequently, and whose precedent ought to have some weight with them. Last week in the city of Detroit subscriptions closed to the third Liberty Loan bond issue. I have in my hand a letter from John W. Staley, First Vice-President of the People's State Bank, Detroit, a responsible and respectable gentleman whom I know, who was Chairman of the Liberty Loan Campaign Committee for that district. He says:

> Acknowledging receipt of your telegram I beg to say that the United States Government has allowed no commission either to committees, salesmen or banks for handling the First, Second, or Third Liberty Loan bond issues. The Government has allowed a portion of the expense, which however, has been so small as to be of little importance. The allotment for expenses of our committee here for selling $52,000,000 bonds of the Third Liberty Loan is limited to $6,500.

In the city of Detroit the committee secured subscriptions to the Liberty Loan amounting to $52,000,000, and the cost was only $6,500. On the basis of the cost of floating the Victory Loan subscriptions amounting to $52,000,000, if secured in Canada, would have cost this country $600,000. For our $400,000,000 we paid $5,000,000; on the same basis, every time the cost of floating loan in Detroit was one cent, the cost of floating loan in Canada was one dollar. I do not believe that the Americans can do anything we cannot do. I believe, under Government leadership, if the Acting Minister of Finance will go out to the pe ple of this country, he can get the same results that are being secured in the United States. I know that he can, in our section, get men who will be glad, voluntarily to give their time. The newspapers have been a big item in the expenditure. The Government, as returns show, have spent a tremendous amount of money in advertising. What has been the practice on the other side of the line? The largest papers over there have voluntarily given their columns without a cent of expense. I have before me a statement issued which shows that space worth $4,712,238 was donated to the United States Government by 270 newspapers, newspapers like the Cincinnati Enquirer and the Louisville Courier-Journal, without a dollar of expense. I should like the Acting Minister of Finance to go to those newspapers that are preaching sacrifice and tell them to practise what they preach. Let him point out to them what the newspapers in the United States are doing, and what the American people are willing to do for patriotic purposes, and let him ask them if they are less patriotic than the people of the United States. That is one way in which to save money for the people of Canada. If the Acting Minister of Finance is going to float a new loan, let the people of Canada feel that the money is to be spent decently and economically. Let me give an instance—I give this only for the purpose, I was almost going to say, of a warning to the Acting Minister of Finance out of my personal regard for him. I find, in the list of expenses in connection with Canada's Victory Loan of 1917, a Victory Loan film of Sir Thomas White costing $7,368.91. Sir Thomas White is a great man. There is no question about that. He is so great, he must live in the United States at the present time while acting as our Minister of Finance. Notwithstanding that fact, I would suggest to the acting minister that he do not emulate the Minister of Finance when the time comes. I appreciate the fact that nature has been kind to the acting minister; that he probably would do well in the "Movies," but $7,368.91 is too much to pay even for a moving picture of the Acting Minister of Finance. Let me tell the acting minister—and this is worth thinking about—that while the people of Canada were asked to pay $7,368.91 for a "movie" of Sir Thomas White, it cost the United States Government in the city of Detroit $6,500 to get $52,000,000 worth of bonds subscribed. That is what a government is for, and that is what hon. gentlemen opposite are in office for, namely, to protect the people, to look after their interest and to give them a square deal. They are not doing that if they allow money to be spent in this way. I mention that fact only to show my hon. friends opposite that in union government it is not absolutely all plain sailing. Here and there one hears a word almost of disapprobation. Here and there one hears just a whisper that perhaps those gentlemen are not all heaven-born administrators. Perhaps they are just as human as other governments have been and are, and probably it will not do a bit of harm to tell them that the people of this country are watching them; that they expect them to look after their affairs honestly. If they do that, the people are willing to support them, but not otherwise.

I have, perhaps, taken up more of the time of the House than I intended to do. I have not much more to say, but in conclusion I want to say this: I gave the Government support on the Military Service Bill. I did so honestly and conscientiously. I want to win the war, as every man in this country wants to win the war but if this Government are going to get the support of the people and if they are going to succeed, they must let the people feel that they are handling the affairs of the country as they should be handled, honestly and fairly. It is just as much the duty of the Acting Minister of Finance to handle and to pay out the moneys of the people of this country so that value will be obtained as it is to provide for taxation. A man is not necessarily a great financier just because he can get in money. It helps a great deal if he knows how to pay out money. I am not satisfied with the figures before me in connection with this Victory Loan that his predecessor knew how to pay out money. I hope the acting minister will look over the expenditures in connection with this loan before he goes on with his new loan; that he will find out how the Victory Loan was arranged for, and that he will not do anything along the same lines, but will do something different. I do not believe that the Minister of Finance handled the Victory Loan in the proper manner. If the Government will go out to the people of the different cities and towns in this country, they will receive the support of all the business men, who will be glad to give their time for nothing so as to help this country in this great crisis.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, I presume it is the wish of the House that the debate should be continued. I do not like to inflict myself upon the members at so late an hour as this; but if it is the wish of the House, I shall proceed, and my good frend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) may bear a part of the blame on account of his three and a half hour's speech.

The proposals of the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) were very well placed before the House, and with them I am in hearty accord. I am sorry I cannot agree with the criticisms of my hon. frend from North Essex (Mr. Kennedy) with regard to the duty on tea. No fitter tax could possibly be placed on anything in Canada that is not taxed than the tea and coffee tax. That is a tax that touches everybody—and so it should. The war is everybody's war, and those that cannot be reached through the Income Tax, which is only for those who have a considerable income, can be reached by such minor taxes as that, and I must entirely dissent from my hon. friend in taking exception to the taxing of tea and coffee, because those are natural products that are used by everybody and are very legitimate objects of taxation. Our hon. friends opposite are very fond of quoting free trade England, as to what should be taxed and what not. Even now the tax on tea in Canada is very much less than the tax on tea in free trade England, and the same is true in regard to coffee and cocoa. Therefore, my hon. frend, if he is a free trader, must say that the precedent is good when the acting minister has adopted a tax that has been in vogue in Great Britain for upwards of a quarter of a century, and which is bringing into them million of pounds sterling per annum. In my judgment, this tax should have been imposed three years ago. When the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) made his first Budget speech after the war started, I told him privately that he had missed the best opportunity of taxation I knew of, and that was tea. He told me it would be putting a great deal of money into the pockets of tea holders, but the Acting Minister of Finance has shown that there can be placed upon tea a tax which is not only prospective, but retroactive, and it will be collected on all the teas that are in store as well as on teas that are now to be stored. This is very commendable, and the acting minister has followed that policy with regard to some other matters mentioned in his tax list.

The new taxation is moderate and judicious and cannot reasonably be taken exception to by any of our citizens. Exception has been taken to it to a certain extent, but, I think, in a very limited way by our friends opposite who have spoken on the question up to the present. Taxation, in all its forms, is more or less objectionable, and no one likes to be taxed in any way that can possibly be avoided, but in war times such as these taxation is absolutely necessary in order that the coffers of the Government may be filled. The coffers of the Government have been fairly well filled during the past year, and the Acting Minister of Finance has been able to tell us we have a surplus over ordinary expenditure of about $55,000,000.

It is true my hon. friend from Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) takes exception to that and says there is no surplus at all if the book-keeping is properly done. He says the acting minister is crediting all the taxes raised for war purposes in order to make a good showing. But in doing that he is only pursuing the policy that has been adopted by all Finance Ministers in the past, including the Finance Minister of the Government of which my hon. friend was a supporter for so many years. They all took this taxation and credited it as the Acting Minister of Finance has done on this occasion. There are those, I know, who think that the taxation should take care of pretty nearly all the cost of the war, but in my judgment that is not a well founded opinion. This is not a war of this generation alone. This war was not brought about by the men of Canada; we were forced into it, and in my judgment it is up to posterity as well as to the present generation to pay a share of the cost of this war, and future generations will recognize that in no uncertain way; they will admit that part of the burden borne by the Allied countries has justly been placed on them, and they will bear their fair share in the years to come. When the young men of this generation are going forth to fight—and they are worth more than our money, when they are giving their life's blood in order that the future generation may be spared such a war—it is but a light thing to ask that posterity should help pay the cost of this war. I think the Finance Minister has been very wise in not attempting to pay all the cost of the war at the present time, and I know that here I am not in accord with two or three hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who spoke yesterday. The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Blake) stated that the people should pay the cost of the war practically as we went along; that is an impossibility, and it would be unwise for us to do it even if it were possible. This war is for future generations as well as for the present, and posterity should bear, and will be willing to bear, part of the burden that has been added to the public debt. We are giving our young men, who cannot be replaced. Capital can be replaced, either by borrowing or by production. Therefore, I say, this generation is making a sacrifice that the future generations will not be called upon to make. We believe the object is worth the price. We are fighting for the liberties of the world, fighting that right may prevail, and that iniquity wherever it is exalted shall be brought low. The utmost that we can do to win the war is what is required of us at the present time. Nothing else counts. That is the reason we have at the present time a Government that has been brought together with the object of winning the war. That brings me to a point my hon. friend from North Cape Breton made in his discursive speech of three hours and a half. He referred to me as the first man to say that there was an agreement entered into as to the formation of this Government. I was not in the House when he made that statement—I endeavoured to put in the three hours while he was speaking, but I could not put in all the time. Now I am not in possession of any private information that is not open to the hon. gentleman, or that has not been open to him as to any agreement or agreements that were made between the various parties composing the present Government. What I stated the other evening was what I believed to be the truth, and what is common knowledge not only to the members of this House who take any interest in current events but to all those who read the newspapers. The newspapers have said there was an agreement by which Union Government was brought about. Otherwise, the Union Government could not have been brought together. This Union Government, as I understand it, is composed of men from both sides of politics who were prepared to sink all difference and strive to win the war; that was the one and sole purpose. That was declared from every platform in our part of the country, and I am sorry Cape Breton is so far from the centre of civilization and population that the hon. member did not hear of it until now. It appears our hon. friend from Cape Breton North never heard of it during the election. Up in our part of the country it was announced from every platform that that was the basis of Union Government, that all minor matters were to stand aside, that all these matters the hon. gentleman has referred to in his discursive speech of three and a half hours to-night were not to be mentioned by men on this side of the House. The one sole object was to win the war, believing that nothing else mattered, believing that if we lost the war we lost everything. That was what brought these men together—and all honour to them—who, holding their opinions just as strongly as I hold mine, were prepared to lay them aside and to say: This is a special time when men are called upon to sacrifice, and we propose to sacrifice our opinions for the general good, and to devote ourselves entirely to the winning of the war and to nothing else until that has been accomplished.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. gentleman will sacrifice everything but ploughs.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I will come to that presently.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: With reference to potatoes, I should like to ask—

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I shall come to McIntyre potatoes presently. My hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) has said that I am ready to sacrifice everything but implements. He may think I am a man who avoids difficulties, but I will tell him that I am going to face that question a little later on if he will have patience. I say that the people of this country are unanimously back of this Government with the object of winning the war. They sent this Government here with a majority the like of which has never been seen in Canada before, and great things are expected of it. If my hon. friends do not believe that, let them read the returns which were placed on the table a few days ago showing the majorities by which members of the House were elected, and they will see that the overwhelming opinion of this country was in favour of just what was proposed; that is, the winning of the war and letting all these minor issues which it is so easy to raise and so hard to allay, stand aside as matters of small moment until the one aim had been accomplished of downing the enemy, backing the boys at the front, and seeing that the sinews of war are provided in the way that Canada is able to provide them. That is what this Government was elected to do, and that is what this Government have set about to do. I do not admire the spirit that has prompted my hon. friend from North Cape Breton to-night to drag in so many ulterior subjects when the Empire is fighting for its life, when the liberty of the world is at stake, and when all those institutions that we have devoted generations to building up are in the balance and in danger of being lost. At a time like this my hon. friend would have us pay attention to some cobbler's letter that has been written from some little village or town up West. My hon. friend was surely trifling when he wished this House in war time to come down to such small talk as the greater part of his speech consisted of. I must say that for a man who has occupied a seat upon the Bench the frivolity with which he can debate public questions for such a length of time is surprising. My hon. friend asks if it was a shoemaker's bench. I cannot say whether it was so valuable as that. I do not know what kind of a bench it was but I am told that the hon. gentleman descended from a bench to come here.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. gentleman is possibly looking for another invitation to go outside.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: If my hon. friend is ready, I am quite ready to accept an invitation of that kind at any time although I do not think that such a spectacle would be fitting in the case of a judge. It might be in the case of an ordinary layman like myself but I think that the court that my hon. friend is supposed to stand in would not be elevated by the acceptance of such an invitation. This is a war in which, as I say, all provinces and all classes should be united. I am sorry to say that all provinces have not been as forward in this matter as they might have been but I am glad to say that in that respect the Dominion as a whole is improving. I believe that if the war continues, this pounding that we are getting will finally weld us together in such a way that we will, before the end of the war, be a united people with only one object, the winning of the war and the saving of liberty and civilization to posterity. That is what is entrusted to us at the present time and I hope we will not be remiss in our duty.

This is not a poor man's war only. We have often heard the statement: the poor man has to do all the fighting; let the rich do all the paying. That sounds very well. I do not know what part of the country these gentlemen come from who make such a statement as that. Up our way there is no division between rich and poor in that respect. The sons of the so-called rich, if there are such, are just as eager in proportion to their numbers as are the sons of the poor man in going out to the war and in offering their lives as a sacrifice for the benefit of the Empire and their country. There is no such thing as hanging back on the part of any in our community or throughout the province of Ontario. I am told that in most parts of the country it is the same. That is the general spirit that pervades rich and poor alike. All are contributing of their means and their blood to help to win this war. The war situation, too, is not as bright as we would wish it to be. The war situation has been, perhaps, more critical during the last few weeks than it has ever been at any time during the last three years. We hope that things are improving, but we know that more men are required to fill the ranks of our Canadian army, and, in my judgment, any man, whether he is an agriculturist or a city man, who throws any obstacle in the way of filling our ranks is not taking a patriotic view of the situation. I understood my hon. friend from Essex (Mr. Kennedy) to take strong objection to the call that is now being made. The Government have been most lenient in making this call. The Government have stood back as long as they possibly could from making that call and now not from choice, but from necessity all men from twenty to twenty-three years of age are called on without excuse to come forward and be ready to take their places in the front line. It becomes the duty of every citizen and of every business man to see that there shall be nothing allowed to stand in the way of the enforcement of this regulation.

I had intended to say a few words with regard to the railway situation, which has been dwelt upon by several members of the House. I have no apologies to make for the Government in purchasing this Canadian Northern Railway stock. I believe that it was the proper thing to do under the circumstances. We do not know yet what it will cost the country, but we do know that something had to be done to keep this road out of the receiver's hands. The Government, feeling that they would be called upon to put in money without finally owning the road if present conditions continued, agreed to buy the stock at a valuation that should be arbitrated upon. It was a very fair proposition and I think it should not be criticized until we know what the finding of the commission is. I believe that the nationalization of railways will come eventually, perhaps not entirely for a few years, but this is one of the problems that we cannot undertake during the war. We have enough on our hands now and we do not want to undertake a railway problem as well. The railway problem, as the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) last night said, is almost as big as that of the war itself, and its solution calls for almost as great a financial outlay. A few minutes ago the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) challenged this side to show where a dollar was every misappropriated by the late Government that he had the honour of supporting. I do not know that I can tell him of a dollar, but I can tell him of several million dollars. The late Government never thought it worth while to misappropriate a dollar. They went in on a much larger scale. My hon. friend's memory must be a little short if he does not know that. He will perhaps remember that there was once a road built named the Grand Trunk Pacific and Transcontinental and that it was built by a certain Government that my hon. friend was a supporter of. With all the virtues that he seemed to claim for that Administration, I think I can refresh his memory a little, although he seems somewhat sleepy at this late hour. There was a commission appointed to find out how this road was built, and this commission found that—

Mr. McKENZIE: A commission of superb liars.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I do not know whether my hon. friend thinks that he is parliamentary or not, but I do not think he is, Mr. Speaker. One or two of these gentlemen are in the Senate. They are just as honourable as is the hon. gentleman, and when he says that they are superb liars I would ask him to take that back. I would ask you to rule upon it, Mr. Speaker. At least one of these men is a member of the Senate.

Mr. McKENZIE: That does not matter; he was not a senator then.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I would appeal to you, Mr. Speaker. I ask if the characterization of superb liars, as applied to the members of a Royal commission appointed to investigate this railway, and one of whom at least is in the Senate, is a proper expression and whether it is parliamentary.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: I do not think that the hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) meant to cast any reflection upon any member of the Senate, but if he did so, he should withdraw the expression.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I do not wish to dissent from your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I think it is a very mild one under the circumstances.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the hon. gentleman tell this House why it was that the Government which he supports never dared to introduce that report into this House or to mention it within the walls of the Parliament of Canada?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: If my memory serves me, they not only introduced it, but we had a very long debate upon it.

Mr. McKENZIE: You never did anything at all with it.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I think the famous George Graham, who no longer sits where my hon. friend sits, but who, I think, filled the seat fully better than my hon. friend does, made his famous speech of seven or eight hours upon the report of that commission.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He killed the report.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It is still alive, and if my hon. friend will allow me, I am going to tell him what that commission found.

Mr. McKENZIE: I know what it found.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I might refresh the hon. gentleman's memory. If he does not know of any dollar that the Government which he supported misappropriated, I might remind him that this commission found that in that one matter alone they misappropriated $40,000,000 of the people's money. If the hon. gentleman has forgotten it I have not. Does he remember it now that I have refreshed his memory?

Mr. McKENZIE: It is not true.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The hon. gentleman says it is not true. What proof has he that it is not true? The facts and figures are all given and they are recorded in black and white on the testimony of three men who spent a year or more investigating the building of that road. My hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) comes back with a very glib statement. Well, perhaps I can remind him of something else he has heard about, and that is the Quebec bridge. Did he ever hear of that? Does he know what happened to that bridge? Does he know how it happened that this country lost about twelve or fifteen million dollars in that structure alone? Still the hon. gentleman says that the Laurier Government have not misappropriated a dollar. The hon. gentleman probably has also forgotten the Newmarket canal. Did he ever hear of that? No, it is a long way from Cape Breton, and he does not travel very far from there to get his information. The Newmarket canal is a canal which exists without water; water is supposed to be pumped in under pressure of man-power to keep it going.

Mr. McKENZIE: You have some windmills up there that you do not want to hear about.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: There are some gas engines in the House that are very good indeed. If my hon. friend wants to be pugnacious I am quite willing to be the same. It is not very edifying, I admit. but when my hon. friend undertakes to tell this House that the Laurier Government never misappropriated a dollar I want to remind him of a few millions that were misspent, and there are many more that he can be reminded of if he looks through the whole period of fifteen years that he has traversed to-night.

The basis, as I have said, of the present Union Government was the winning of the war, and in order that I might not be recognized as the sole authority that there was such an arrangement, I want to read before I conclude an article that appeared in one of the western papers. I am very glad it came from the West because the value of things of this nature is almost double if produced West of the Great Lakes.

An hon. MEMBER: It is a good place to get them.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It is a good place to get them, as my hon. friend says, and I certainly have got very good testimony on that ground from the West. I believe that the whole conception of this basis of union was a very wise one, and I think it is desirable that we should know whether or not it is true. My hon. friend has said that he did not know that there was such a thing until I brought it to his attention. Well, I have here an article which I am going to read.

I shall not take my seat until I have dealt a little with the tariff question, with which my name has been so much identified by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) and other hon. gentlemen. That is one of my reasons for taking part in this debate; I had no intention of doing so had not hon. gentlemen opposite devoted a great deal of attention to me. I am looked upon as a kind of a monster who is engaged in a business that is more illicit apparently than the liquor traffic, or anything of that sort. A man who is engaged in manufacturing, or supposed to be connected in any way, either directly or indirectly, with manufacturing, especially the manufacture of implements, seems to be regarded as a monster of the very deepest dye, who should not appear in polite society to any extent. My hon. friend from Brome shakes his head, but I am not imputing such ideas to him at all. Indeed, I have not the slightest objection to the remarks he made with regard to myself.

I am going to refer to that a little later on. I have said that there was a basis of union that was well defined, if not placed upon paper, and that was that all minor matters—I judge everything but the winning of the war to be a minor matter—were to be left in abeyance. That is the reason I made the statement. Hon. gentlemen opposite apparently thought that the joints of our armour could be most easily pierced in the tariff direction, and it is against the tariff, and especially against farm implements, that their attack is now directed. It is true that my hon. friend (Mr. McCrea) who is sitting on the front bench opposite, and who represents the paper business, has received a little bit of notoriety as well, and is, perhaps, a joint sinner with myself. He is a manufacturer engaged in the paper business. While my business is condemned by the member for Brome, that of the member for Sherbrooke I take it is largely supported by him—

Mr. McCREA: There is no protection on our business now.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: —at least, that is the attitude to which he addressed himself. I want now to read the article to which I referred. It is expressed, I admit, in rather strong language, but they do use rather strong language in the West. Being a man of moderate words, I think I should have put it more mildly. But it is so much in accord with what I believe that I cannot do better than read it.

An hon. MEMBER: Where was it published?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: In the Winnipeg Telegram, which, I suppose, is known to some of our western friends, especially those from Winnipeg. I have occasionally seen it, and think it a well edited paper. I think the article appeared on March 30, although there is no date marked on it:

THE TARIFF DANGER.

Nothing more dangerous to the continued existence of the Union Government could well be imagined than the injection into parliamentary discussion at this time of the tariff issue.

I commend that to my hon. friend the member for Brome.

This fact is recognized, not only by the more responsible members of the Union party, but by the Laurier Opposition itself. For the very reason that it recognizes this question as the most vulnerable spot in the armour of the Union party, the Opposition would welcome any introduction of the tariff issue into the deliberations of Parliament.

Only by some such means could Laurier hope to divert to his own purposes the votes of certain ill-advised and short-sighted advocates of tariff changes among the Union majority—and he has no doubt hopes also of certain of the members of the cabinet itself—with a view to overthrowing the Government by stirring up discord over such a bitterly controversial subject.

It was well understood that above all things the tariff question was to be shelved until after the war.

I hope my hon. friend from Cape Breton will take note of these words.

That was the understanding upon which the Union movement was based. In no other way could the Union movement have made any headway. Every public man who had anything to do with the negotiations which led to the formation of the Union party was a party to that understanding. It was openly discussed; it was freely published; it was authoritatively announced. On the question of whether or not there was such an agreement there can be no doubt whatever. The agreement was understood by everybody to be in effect.

To break that agreement now would be a breach of faith, a betrayal of trust, which would be inexcusable. Not only would it be morally reprehensible, but in practice it would have the effect of destroying the unity of Union. It would result in the wreck of the Union Government. It would jeopardize the most vital interests of the nation.

Unfortunately there are Unionist members of Parliament pledged to refrain from advocating tariff alterations during the war who are to-day openly advocating and demanding those very changes.

However honest such men may be in general, in this particular they are both dishonest and dangerous in the extreme.

Unfortunately the Government has given a measure of encouragement to such unreliable persons by showing a willingness to tamper with the National Policy on which Canada's successful past was built, and on which its present and future prosperity depends.

This war has shown us as nothing else could show us the essential need of protecting and building up great industries from one end of Canada to the other. We must contiue steadily to become a completely organized and completely developed nation. We must not specialize in any one line of enterpries to the destruction of all other enterprises. We must be universal. We must become self-contained and dependent solely upon our own resources in any emergency that may face us.

The majority of the people of Canada recognize this fact. The minority, unfortunately, do not. For a generation, majority and minority have fought over this controversial subject both in and out of Parliament. Probably for years to come there will still be those who are determined to keep it within the realm of controversy. Consequently there is no pressing need to attempt to finish this domestic fight to-day.

The Union Government was elected for one purpose, and for one purpose alone—that was to win the war. All its followers were pledged to the same policy to the exclusion of all other policies. Any man so elected who undertakes to change his mind at this late date will prove himself to be a traitor to those electors of diametrically different views on questions of domestic policy who united on the one great patriotic policy for the preservation of their country.

Canada is destined one day to be as great a nation as the great republic to the south. Canada will run a serious risk of missing that destiny, of ceasing to be a nation at all, if the present national trustees of her honour permit themselves to be drawn into a domestic wrangle that will incapacitate them for accomplishing the one great thing for which they were appointed trustees.

There, Mr. Speaker, is a strong finding, and one, I think, that will carry conviction to the minds of all when they review the circumstances under which we are placed. It was not my wish then that this tariff issue should have been raised at this time, but I say, as one who has been attacked considerably during this debate by members, perhaps, on both sides of the House, that I feel it is my duty to stand to my guns, even if I do not have very much support. I am one of those who hold my opinion as conscientiously and as consistently, I think, as most, and whether hon. gentlemen agree with me or not, I think they will recognize that I try to be a fair fighter, and hang to my opinions when I feel them to be right in the face of all opposition. And that is the reason I am to-day, as I have always been since I was a boy and took any part in public matters, a consistent supporter of the National Policy, or of protection to a moderate degree for the industries of Canada. I have no apology to make for holding that opinion to-day. It has been justified now by forty years of experience. Canada has gone too far along that road of development ever again to retrace its steps and become a purely agricultural country. I say that believing it to be absolutely true, and without any fear of successful contradiction. All men are not fit for the land; all men cannot make a success on the land; and why should my friend, who is a paper manufacturer, and I, who am more or less connected with the agricultural implement business, though having nothing whatever to do with its management, be condemned for helping in the upbuilding of the Dominion of Canada? That is what we are trying to do consistently, and we look upon a dollar produced in the factory as just as valuable as a dollar produced upon the farm. I know there are those who object to that statement, but that is our view which we honestly hold. I want to point out to gentlemen on both sides of the House that Canada to-day is no longer a purely agricultural country, that at least half its citizens, and I think a good deal more, derive their livelihood from other callings, and very nearly half our citizens are employed in factories. I am speaking now of that half of our citizens who are workers and producers. About half of them are workers in the factories of Canada.

My hon. friend from Brome, and, I think, most of those who took exception to the implement business being protected, say it is a mere handful of men that these duties are being exacted for. To all who hold that view I say, it is not the manufacturer who, I admit, is a negligible quantity, but all his workers who must be recognized as manufacturers and as master builders. Regardless of the opinions of those who may differ from me, I believe the workers in the factories of Canada work as intelligently and as hard, and put in as many hours, too, in the year, as do those of any other calling. That may be disputed, but let me point out that they work twelve months in the year, nine hours per day; whereas the agriculturist and the outside worker, though he puts in twelve to sixteen hours a day for a certain part of the year, has a great deal of sitting in in the winter time, while the workman has to put in just as many hours in the cold as in the heat. And, I tell you, it is the experience of many farmers who thought it was "easy money" in the city and have come in to make money in the factory, that, after putting in a few months, they have decided that the farm is hard enough for them and who go back to the farm. The lot of the workingman in a factory is harder than out on the farm, to say nothing of the danger he has of being injured, for in the heavy industries there are accidents every day. In the big smelting industries, and those requiring intense heat, he must work in the terrible heat; he has to endure that heat in the dog days when the temperature is 80 to 90 degrees outside and 120 degrees inside. Anybody who thinks that the workingman should not have some consideration is shooting entirely beside the mark.

I want to approach this subject, not from the position of a few manufacturers who control the capital, but from the position of the manufacturer and all his assistants, because the man behind the gun is the man that makes the factory, and the product cannot be turned out from the factory unless you have the men, as everybody knows. We have in the factories to-day probably six or seven hundred workmen, as intelligent as any in the world, who are producing per man as much as any country in the world barring only the United States, which exceeds us by a small amount. The average product of the workman in Canada is about four times what it is for the British workman, and between four and five times what it is for the German workman. You ask how I make that out. On the basis of the amount of power that is applied behind the individual workman, and on that basis the horse-power is threefold what it is in the older countries of Europe. In other words, we do by machinery, what is done in the older countries by hand. Anybody can see why production will be vastly more by machinery than by hand power alone. This applies to a very large number of the industries of Canada. The prosperity that has been experienced by the people of Canada during the war is very largely due to the fact that Canada was a manufacturing country when the war broke out, and we were in a very feeble position comparatively financially, and would have been in a very awkward position, had not our works been available for the manufacture of munitions of war. They were promptly turned to this work, with the result that millions and millions of money have come across the water and have helped to finance all our industries and have kept us going in a prosperous way, enabling us to lend hundreds of millions to the Mother Country, and to pay a large proportion of our war expenditure as we go along. That has been possible because years ago we established a protective policy and laid the foundations broad and deep to make Canada a world power. Let it not be forgotten that Canada is destined, if we manage our public affairs aright, to become a world power by reason of the variety of industries we have in our midst. We have immense natural resources in the forest, the mine, the fisheries and the field. Wherever you look, we have all the resources necessary to make of us a great people. And it is too late in the day, as I said, to think of turning back now when we are producing in our factories about a billion and a half dollars, as we did last year. In point of value, exports of products of the factory vastly exceeded those of products of the farm. Does the member for Brome object to that statement? I believe it to be absolutely true.

Mr. McMASTER: Would this year or last year be a fair period for the making of a comparison between exports of agricultural products and those of the factory?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: No; I admit the force of what my hon. friend says—a large amount of this export has been possible because of the war. But if we had not laid broad and deep the foundations of our industrial institutions while peace was with us, we should not have been able to take care of this war business. We had the plants, the resources, the enterprise, the skilled workmen—all that made it possible to produce what we produced last year, about $1,500,000,000 worth of goods, a large amount of which was exported to the Mother Country to help win the war. Exports to the Mother Country up to March 31, 1917—the figures for 1918, which I have not before me, are considerably larger— amounted to $790,000,000, a large portion of which consisted of munitions. This export has helped to sustain the Mother Country in her hour of need, and it speaks volumes for the industry, intelligence and enterprise of our people and the extent of the accumulation of capital in our industries. I do not know why a man should be blamed because he has been successful. As long as a man is losing money and his business is going to the dogs, he escapes criticism; but the moment he begins to make money, show enterprise, bring about development, people say: let us get after that fellow and put him out of business; he is making too much money. We had the spectacle last night of the member for Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. Joseph Read) asking that new duties be placed on lead, simply because he had a son in that business somewhere in British Columbia; and at the same time calling for the pulling down of an industry that it has taken thirty years to build up. In other words, he is prepared to throw away the successful work of thirty years and to start a new enterprise, such as the smelting of lead, because his son in British Columbia thinks it would be a good thing and asks him to endeavour to bring it about.

The member for Brome is an intelligent man and an acquisition to the House—I say this without flattery. I have had the pleasure of meeting him in committee work on different occasions, and have looked upon his opinions as being very valuable. The hon. gentleman paid particular attention to what he considered my own business. He probably does not know that personally I have nothing whatever to do with the management of any agricultural implement business or the fixing of the prices of agricultural implements. I am simply a shareholder who has long since retired from an active part in the management of a business. The hon. gentleman quoted from some remarks of mine which he said he had been carrying around in his pocket. I deem it a high compliment to me that he should carry my remarks for months in his pocket. If he wants to be an intelligent statesman, I do not know that I can recommend him to a higher authority, especially if he is studying matters pertaining to the tariff. I am glad that the hon. gentleman, who has been in the House only a short time, should have discovered that I made a speech on this subject six years ago, and that he has taken part of his inspiration with respect to the policy which he has propounded, from the remarks which I made on that occasion. I feel it my duty to myself and to those who are looking to me for information that I should make my own defence in my own humble way with regard to any connection that I have with the implement business and show exactly what that business is and has been and what it hopes to be in the future.

In the Canadian Almanac for 1918 I find that the tariff on "implements, agricultural (wheeled), operated by hand power for use as seed drills, cultivators and ploughs," is: British preferential, 12½ per cent; intermediate 17½ per cent; general, 20 per cent; while the duty on implements not otherwise specified as above is 15, 22½ and 25 per cent. In addition to that, there is a war tax of 7½ per cent. I do not know that this is considered a very excessive duty. In the old reform days, a tariff for revenue only of 20 per cent was looked upon as moderate; not until that rate was exceeded was there talk of protection for special industries. I do not think, therefore, that my hon. friend can reasonably make complaint with regard to the amount of duty charged upon implements.

To all who have criticised the implement business in this country, I say that that business occupies as high a position in Canada as any other industry, and that agricultural implements are sold in Canada of as good a quality and as cheaply, excepting only a few sold in the United States, as those placed on the market in any other country in the world. The member for Brome, who is giving me an attentive hearing, will, I am sure, agree with me in that respect. I am aware that the farmer chafes under this duty and is asking for relief. The Government endeavoured to grant him a little relief—it was a small mistake on the part of the Government, but I look upon it as a serious mistake in principle—when they took the duty off farm tractors. Within twenty-four hours after that action had been taken my protest was on the way to Ottawa. I do not know whether anything of that kind will occur again, but I hope not, because that is not what this Government was elected for, and it cannot be looked upon as a war measure. If the Government removed the duty from agricultural implements, not one additional bushel would be added to Canada's production during this time of war, nor would the slightest reduction in price be effected in respect of any article of food by reason of the removal of that duty. All manufacturers—not only those of agricultural implements—in sending out their price lists, have regard to the cost of production. The cost of production is the keystone to the selling price, and to that is added a fixed amount of profit which varies in different indusrties from 10 to perhaps 50 per cent. The member for Brome will agree, I think, that the cost of production should be the basis of the price. But when we come to compare that with agricultural produce, the argument is thrown altogether aside.

I only regret that my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. McCoig) is not in his seat. I wanted to hand out a small bouquet to him. I look upon him as a "seven by nine" statesman, that is, a man of very narrow breadth who cannot see beyond the water-ditches of his own county either in peace or war. Yesterday that hon. gentleman made an attack on the implement men who are just as good and stand just as high in the community as does my hon. friend. I want to ask him: What about the price of beans? Let him tell us what he charges for his beans, and we will give our prices on agricultural implements. He accused a company of which he says I am a member—he used my name very freely—of advancing their price 25 per cent over others, and he quoted a firm in St. Thomas manufacturing ploughs—and he will excuse me, I hope, if I say that I never heard of them before. Upwards of 75 per cent of the ploughs manufactured in Canada are manufactured in the city of Brantford. They are not made by the Cockshutt firm alone, but by other firms in that city, and we think we have the business down to a science. Since the National Policy was introduced, the price of those implements has been more than cut in two. That is something to say, but the hon. member for Kent who pointed out such terrible overcharges with regard to agricultural implements, is prepared to sell for seven or eight dollars a bushel beans that cost $1 to $1.25 in pre-war days. I have bought hundreds of bushels of them myself for that price. The same is true in regard to his corn. Let my hon. friend look to his own in the county of Kent before he begins to thrash the manufacturers of agricultural implements. We would think that we were robbing the people were we to ask the advances that his people—and I understand he is in the business—are making out of their beans and pork. We base selling prices entirely upon the cost of production, that is the basis upon which our sales are made. But the cost of production has nothing to do with my hon. friend who sells for $8 a bushel his beans that can probably be produced now in war times for $2. He charges $8 a bushel because the people must have them. Let him hand out his prices. If we were to listen to my hon. friend from Kent we would think he was a man who got along on about five per cent profit.

My hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) will excuse me for diverting for a moment to Kent, but I think that when I am called in question as I was by the hon. member for Kent yesterday as being the author of an outrageous charge that, he says, is being made on the people of this country, I have reason to resent an imputation that would mean I am excessively desirous of taking more profits than would be justifiable under the circumstances. I have endeavoured to bear my share of this war like a man. I have been called upon to make sacrifices. One of my friends, the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. J. F. Reid) read a pronouncement from the United Farmers. It certainly made a strong appeal to my mind and heart, especially that part where the hon. gentleman said that if I would only beg of this Government to remove the duties the United Farmers would wish me a place in everlasting bliss. I presume if the United Farmers control the portals of everlasting bliss, they probably also have the keys of the bottomless pit, and I am not sure, if they can consign me anywhere at all but that I shall have a better chance of the latter place than the former. My hon. friend, I am sure, desired to make that appeal to me in all frankness. I have said that personally I should be very glad to make the sacrifice in order that I might retain the good opinion of my fellows, but I am not the personification of agricultural implements; I am only a private individual of like flesh and blood with yourselves, the owner of a few shares in a manufacturing company which makes some of those implements. Although I am often charged with being the high priest of implement exactions, I am not the mouthpiece of those implement manufacturers. But I say freely that rather than have the reproaches that I have had to bear in this House from my fellows whose good opinion I do value, I would long ago have gone out of the business. Nevertheless, I think if I had been conducting a liquor business or something of that kind, I would not have been nearly so much persecuted as I have been with regard to my attachment to implements. I do not know whether it is really so serious an offence to be connected with an industry of this kind. We have endeavoured to manufacture good agricultural implements that have won a place in the markets of the world, and we are endeavouring to distribute them throughout the Dominion of Canada in a fair and proper way at reasonable prices considering the quality of the goods. I cannot say more than that. If the House, in its wisdom, is going to remove the duties on agricultural implements and run the risk of destroying all that business, it is going to jeopardise a great many million dollars' worth of capital and turn out of work a large number of industrious men who have spent their whole lives in the development of this industry. Let me tell the hon. member for Brome that such an action would hit probably from fifty to a hundred subsidiary industries that contribute the raw material of which the implements are made. I know he dealt a little with that subject, but seemed to think my figures were grossly exaggerated. It will touch all manner of things—iron, steel, nuts, bolts, screws, dies, cotton, varnish, dyestuffs, malleable iron, paints, and a multitude of other items that go into the construction of an agricultural implement, all of which articles are more or less manufactured in Canada. Let every hon. member remember that. If you gave us a reduction in the duties we pay on imported raw materials, and if we imported those goods, we would take all that trade away from the subsidiary manufacturers of Canada. I think my hon. friend will follow me in that, and I want him to follow me, because that is an important part of the situation.

Mr. McMASTER: I was merely estimating that the agricultural implement manufacturers took about one-sixth of the gross manufactures of iron and steel. I should be glad if the hon. member for Brantford would tell me whether my estimate was anywhere near the exact figure.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I should think that is a fairly liberal estimate, although I have not before me the figures. I find no fault with that. One-sixth is a liberal amount to allow. All the subsidiary interests, in which thousands of men were locally employed, were embraced in the figures which my hon. friend thought were grossly exaggerated. That is the reason he did not find, in the return with regard to implements alone, the figures I had given. All the subsidiary interests that are more or less bound up in the manufacture of agricultural implements would suffer to a greater or lesser degree. We have established an all-round tariff in this country with a view to developing all those industries that are native to our soil and that can well flourish here. Everybody will agree, after a study of the industries of this country, that Canada has made tremendous strides in that direction. All honour to the men who have had the enterprise, ingenuity and technical skill to make the splendid development our industries have made during the past twenty-five years. It is a marvel, and I do not think it has been exceeded by any other country in the world. I do not think we should begin to pull down what has been built up in the years gone by. It would be a dangerous policy for the people of Canada to attack our industries piecemeal. That has always been the way the enemy of industries works. He does not make a frontal attack and try to sweep them all away together. He says: "Here is an industry that ought to be got out of the way." He gets that out of the way, and then he looks around for another industry, and makes an attack on that. Let my hon. friend remember that binder twine was bowled out in that way. Eleven or twelve factories were put out of business at a stroke of the pen. The result was that binder twine became almost unobtainable in the West; that is a matter of common knowledge, and even to-day the supply of binder twine is very unsatisfactory. Take the case of barbed wire, an article that used to be manufactured in scores of factories in Canada. Barbed wire was suddenly put on the free list, and we have not had a pound manufactured in Canada since, not even during the war. Why not? Because the factories were put out of business long ago by the removing of the duty. I am not finding fault with that—let by-gones be by-gones—I am simply pointing out the result. You wipe out capital, put men out of business, destroy a valuable industry, and then in war time an essential industry like that is lacking. Free-trade Britain has wakened up lately to the fact that she had allowed Germany to take away many of her fundamental industries, and now when she wants these products she cannot get them at any price, and she has had to begin all over again to produce them. That is a deplorable state of things. I want every hon. member to realize that Canada is laying the foundation for a future great nation, and in order to have a great nation you must have a division of labour and different kinds of labour; and the tariff and industry are the only ways to produce the variety of labour into which our citizens should enter and will enter. Every man is not cut out to go on the farm, and I do not know why it is argued that everybody ought to be driven to the farm. I have heard farmers say that. If a farmer was talking about going into the plough business, I would certainly advise him against it, as a friend of the farmer and of the plough business. Farmers who would drive city men out to the farm would only be making more competition for themselves. More stuff would be produced and it would bring prices down. So it seems to me a very short-sighted policy for the farmers to adocate the driving of men back to the land. It would cut the prices down to where the stuff could not safely be produced, except in Prince Edward Island, where my hon. friend told us last night they could produce potatoes that beat the world at twenty-five cents a bushel; if that is so, all success to them, and if the farmers think the policy I have alluded to is the best to pursue they are certainly welcome to advocate the driving of men back to the land. I have tried to farm a bit myself in the last ten years, and in many cases it has cost me more than two dollars to raise a dollar's worth of produce.

Mr. McMASTER: The hon. member is an agriculturist, not a farmer.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: And yet I am producing more food than my family is able to eat in a year, so I am doing a little bit indirectly, even if I lose in the operation. But it is making more competition for the farmer, and if I am as successful in farming as I have been accused of being in the implement business I shall get into hot water all round. I must confess that I have found the little bit of experience I have had on the farm most interesting. I look upon a dollar produced from the land as worth any five dollars I can make in the city, and I appreciate it more. It will not buy any more, but it gives you a feeling of satisfaction to have it in your pocket. A dollar made on the farm gives you a tremendous amount of satisfaction, and I for one am only too glad to see the farmers so prosperous. I do not begrudge them these high prices, but I want them to remember that they are getting high prices, and that the price of farm products is higher than the price of any manufactured goods that I know of in proportion to the cost of production and in proportion to what prices were before the war.

An hon. MEMBER: On what do you base your figures?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: On the cost of production, on the value of the land, the labour required, and the amount of money employed in the business. As I have already pointed out, I do not think it costs two dollars to raise a bushel of beans in the province of Ontario, so it looks to me not fair to find fault with the merchant or manufacturer who bases his selling price only on the cost of production. In the case of the farmer the product is sold for what it will fetch, no matter how high the price, and I ask any hon. member which seems the fairer way. It looks as if there was certainly nothing in favour of the prices charged by the agriculturists that cannot be said in favour of the prices charged by the manufacturer or the merchant.

This is a country of varied interests, and it must not be developed in a lopsided way; that is, we must have a good development of all our resources, and so far as I am able to take in the situation, I think Canada has grown satisfactorily in every direction. I am delighted to see the farmers having a good innings, and I want them to make all the money they can while the sun shines, but I do not want them to starve the Allies or our soldiers. I want to help them in every way I can to produce more stuff, but I think the price in itself ought to be an inducement, and I think it is an inducement. But we must remember that the demands of the world are very great. I believe the West to-day is in a sounder financial position than ever before in its history. I think the farmers are well content with present conditions, and therefore I say that this agitation which has been started in this debate, and which appears to spread not only on one side of the House but on the other, is not wise. We are not doing ourselves justice in debating what are really minor issues when the great issue of the war is before us.

Mr. McMASTER: Suppose there was a great demand for munitions and a great demand for machinery to make munitions, would the hon. member think it right to remove the duty from the machinery coming into this country for making munitions?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: As far as I understand, there are very few of these machines made in Canada.

Mr. McMASTER: I was putting a hypothetical case.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I think if the machinery is not made in Canada—and I do not think it is—it would be quite proper to have the duty removed under the circumstances, because the industry of making munitions is a very temporary affair, and the machinery would have to be scrapped perhaps in the very near future. So I think in that case the Government would be well advised to let it in free. But I am not advocating that as a policy; I am in favour of protecting every interest and every industry; that is my platform, and I make no bones about saying so. I am a protectionist for every class, because I believe protection is good for every class. It has been proved so in the past, and will be proved again in the future, if we are not so foolish as to destroy what we have with pains and enterprise got together in the last forty years; and I do not believe Canada will do that. The farmers in Canada, in our part of the country at all events, have time and again supported the policy which I am now enunciating, and which I think is a very safe one to follow.

I will not weary the House any further. I have been drawn aside considerably from what I intended to say by a few interruptions, but I make no complaint about that, because it is always pleasant to be interrupted when you are speaking; it gives you a chance to get the blood circulating a little more freely. If I have spoken harshly to my hon. friend from North Cape Breton who seems to be resting quietly now, I hope he will be kind enough to forgive me for having provoked him to invite me to accompany him home. I have finished my remarks now, Mr. Speaker, and I regret having kept the House until such a late hour as this. But, I was compelled to go on.

On the motion of Mr. Papineau the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of the Hon. Mr. Maclean the House adjourned at 12.35 a.m. Friday.

SENATE BILL.

FIRST READING.

Bill No. 71, to amend the Criminal Code so as to provide for the revision of excessive or inadequate punishments.—Mr. Middlebro.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

MORNING AND SATURDAY SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Monday the 6th day of May next, until the end of the present session, the House shall meet at eleven o'clock in the morning of each day except Sundays, and that in addition to the usual intermission at six o'clock, p.m., there shall be also an intermission every day from one to three o'clock, p.m., and that on and after Saturday, the eleventh day of May next, and on each Saturday thereafter until the end of the present session the House shall meet on Saturdays and that the order of business shall be the same as on Fridays.

It has also been suggested to me that the following should be added, to which I at once assent if it meets with the view of the House:

—and that the various Committees of the House be at liberty to sit during the sessions of the House.

As far as the business to be proposed by the Government is concerned, it will all be on the Order Paper on Monday or in the Votes and Proceedings of that day. I do not think that anything which has yet to be brought down can be regarded as other than of a minor character, and I do not think it will be controversial. There are certain reasons which make it highly desirable that ministers should be relieved from their duties in Parliament at no very distant date, and we have our choice between two alternatives: One is to work a little harder and get through within the next ten days or so, and the other is to have an adjournment and for the House to meet again during the summer. I am convinced that the vast majority of the members of the House would greatly prefer the first alternative, and personally I certainly should prefer that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Prime Minister may rest assured that we on this side of the House have no objection to prorogation in time to allow the ministers to attend to the business that may call them elsewhere. I would observe, however, that there are a great many items which might be cut out of the sessional programme. We are engaged at the moment on the Budget debate; which is always important, and especially so on this occasion, in view of the circumstances with which we are confronted. The debate which has proceeded now for three days has been very interesting, and not a minute I think has been lost. The whole debate has been conducive to the public interests. There is also on the programme to-day the Inspection and Sale Act, which is important on account of the information it elicits; I suppose that Bill cannot be left over, but if we go on with it, it will take some time, though perhaps not very long. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has another Bill on the Order Paper for controlling exports and imports. I do not know exactly what it is, but it may lead to a very important discussion. Then there is the Civil Service Bill, which is largely technical, and will take one or two sittings to dispose of. The Consolidation of the Railway Act is also a very important and voluminous Bill, and if it is gone on with this session it will take a very long time. Perhaps the Government would let that stand over for another session. Then there is the Canadian Northern Railway Bill. I do not know exactly what it is, but it is important and will require a full explanation and a good deal of consideration. Then there are the main estimates which, however, are largely advanced, and the supplementaries. So, on the whole, there is still a pretty big programme. I understand, however, why the Government wish to press for an early close of the session, and I can assure them that we on this side of the House shall do nothing except to facilitate business as much as we can.

The only suggestion I would make to the Prime Minister with reference to his motion is that he amend it so that we would commence morning sittings on Tuesday, the seventh of May, instead of on Monday. The reason I ask this, is that many members are absent and could not be notified in time for Monday morning's sitting.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I shall certainly assent to that at once. With regard to the programme on the Order Paper, I shall go over it carefully to see what might be omitted. I hope we shall be able to pass the Railway Bill. It went through this House last session, but did not pass the Senate. This year it has passed the Senate, and if it should fail to pass this House, I am afraid the people of the country might reach the conclusion that we were only humbugging with it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is a new House this session, and many of the new members would like to study this legislation.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They would have to study it, of course, but it was very carefully considered by a special committee of this House last session, and the Bill which has come down to us from the Senate is practically the same as when it left this House, with one or two exceptions. One of those exceptions, I think is of some importance.

Mr. MURPHY: The Bill has been amended in the Senate.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is one amendment of considerable importance, but I do not think the others are of first-rate importance. I hope very much that we shall be able to pass the Bill this session. The Civil Service Bill is founded very much on the present Act, except for the addition of necessary provisions to bring the Outside Service under the rules which have heretofore prevailed with regard to the Inside Service. I hope it will not be controversial and that it will not occupy a very long time. With respect to the Inspection and Sale Act I shall confer with the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am informed from my hon. friend, the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) that the resolution, item 23 on the Order Paper, is of importance and he would like very much to have it advanced a stage to-day if that should be possible. There is nothing more to say at the moment about the other items. I therefore beg to move the motion as amended making the first morning sitting of the House on Tuesday next, instead of on Monday.

Motion as amended agreed to.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I ask the hon. the Minister of Militia and Defence (Major-General Mewburn) if the Order in Council affecting all unmarried men who were twenty, twenty-one or twenty-two years of age at the time of their registration last fall applies equally to those who have since married after having obtained their exemption. The Order in Council refers to unmarried men without mentioning whether it applies only to those who were actually unmarried or also to those who were unmarried on the 6th of July, 1917.

Major-General MEWBURN: The Military Service Act provides that every man who was married after the 6th of July, 1917, will be considered as unmarried, and I think that still holds good in regard to this.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

On the order for the House to again go into Committee on Bill No. 62, to amend the Insurance Act, 1917:

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Acting Minister of Finance) moved:

That order No. 13 be discharged and that Bill No. 62 to amend the Insurance Act, 1917, be referred to the committee on Banking and Commerce.

He said: It is desirable that this Bill be referred to the committee on Banking and Commerce, and I hope the House will accept this motion.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY.

RENEWAL OR POSTPONEMENT OF PAYMENT OF INDEBTEDNESS OF THE COMPANY.

On the motion of the Hon. A. K. Maclean (Acting Minister of Finance) the House went into Committee on the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the chair:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that as five-sixths of the six hundred thousand shares of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company have been transferred to the Minister of Finance as required by chapter 24 of the statutes of 1917, the Governor in Council may assist the Canadian Northern Railway Company, or any company included in the Canadian Northern Railway System, in renewing or postponing the payment of any indebtedness of any such company, on such terms as may be agreed on, by guaranteeing in whole or in part the payment thereof, with interest, or the notes or obligations given for such renewal or postponement: Provided that the amount of principal to be so guaranteed shall not exceed the amount of the indebtedness the payment of which is renewed or postponed; and, further, that the guarantee shall be in such form and signed by such person as the Governor in Council may approve, and shall enure for the benefit and security of the holder for the time being of the indebtedness or the notes or other obligations representing the same; and that any payments which may be required to be made pursuant to any such guarantee shall be made out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, and the Order in Council authorizing such guarantee shall be conclusive evidence for such holder that the terms and conditions of this resolution have been complied with and that such guarantee is legal and binding.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: I would remind the committee that last year a statute was passed enabling the Government to assist the Canadian Northern Railway Company, so soon as the Government had obtained a transfer to it of five-sixths of the capital shares of the company. This proportion of the total share capital of the company has been secured since the closing of the last Session of Parliament. Section 3 of Chapter 24 of the Statutes of last year provides as follows:

So soon as the said five-sixths of the said shares have been transferred as aforesaid, the Governor in Council may assist the Canadian Northern Railway Company, or any Company included in the Canadian Northern Railway System, in paying and settling any indebtedness of such Company or postponing the payment thereof on such terms as may be agreed upon, and for such purposes may make advances out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

This section limited advances under the Act to $25,000,000, and that amount was actually expended in caring for the maturities and obligations of the Canadian Northern Railway Company last year. A statement covering such payments was laid upon the table of the House early in the session as required by statute. The hon. gentleman will observe however that this section only empowered the Government to assist the company by way of advances to retire maturities or to assist in renewing maturities by a payment of money. The Canadian Northern Railway Company have a number of short term loans or notes which are maturing this year and which are at the present time secured by debentures, or bonds, of the railway guaranteed by the Government, or secured by securities of the Canadian Northern Railway Company which were issued prior to the Government guarantee. Therefore, we are in fact liable for the maturing note. The larger part of the collateral security of these loans bears a low rate of interest. Owing to the high rates of interest prevailing to-day, it is difficult to secure the renewal of these loans without increasing the rate of interest and perhaps increasing the collateral.

The section of last year's statute which I read does not empower the Government to guarantee payment of the short-term obligations of the Canadian Northern which have matured and are maturing this year, and we ask under this resolution that power be granted to the Government to guarantee when necessary the payment of such obligations or renewals of the same. Our total obligation is not to be increased under the terms of the resolution. The resolution provides, and the Bill will as well, that the Government can incur no greater obligation than now exists. In Great Britain and the United States during the balance of this year Canadian Northern short-term notes to a very substantial sum will mature. Naturally, we desire to renew them, if possible, in order to avoid at the present time the entire payment of such maturities. We wish, therefore, under the resolution to procure power enabling us to renew or extend, as circumstances will permit, these notes, and we ask power to guarantee the payment of any of such renewals, when necessary. I think it is a fair request to make, and I hope it will be readily granted. It is in the interest of the Canadian Northern railway, and it is particularly desirable, from the standpoint of national finance during the present year. I hope that any renewals which shall be made this year shall be for a period of at least three years, which will carry us over, I trust, the war period.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON: Can the Acting Minister of Finance state approximately what liabilities will mature this year?

Mr. CURRIE: I will supplement that question by asking the minister to read the list of securities that are coming due, the amounts, and what the guarantees are. I think he should take the House into his confidence with regard to this matter.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The names of the holders should also be given.

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

Mr. CURRIE: The names of the holders cannot be given, but the minister might state the amounts that are coming due. He has a list of them under his hand and might read it to the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I would like to have the names of the holders also.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Certainly. Perhaps the minister should have the list printed and distributed before the Bill comes before the House.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If it is agreeable to the committee I should like to have the resolution passed, and when I move the second reading of the Bill founded upon it, I will give the information desired. In the meantime, however, I will give a list of the maturities.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And the holders of the securities?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I can only give the information asked for partially.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Give us what you can.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I shall give a list of the securities which have matured since March 31st of the present year and one maturing in June next. The London maturities are:

On March 31st, 1918.....	$ 929,533
April 9th, 1918.....	1,472,167
April 15th, 1918.....	2,919,062
April 15th, 1918.....	5,201,407
June 9th, 1918.....	486,667

These obligations matured and are maturing in London, and I think are held chiefly by the brokerage firm of Lessard Frères, London, and their clients.

Mr. CURRIE: Are they notes or bonds?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: These are notes.

Mr. CURRIE: Bonds of the railway?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think in most instances they are the notes of the company secured by bonds of the Canadian Northern railway guaranteed by the Dominion Government or by some of the provincial governments.

Mr. CURRIE: What we want to know is whether we are releasing any of the terms or not.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I cannot undertake to give the exact information which my hon. friend requires, but I promise to do so on the second reading of the Bill. The maturities in New York are:

July 10, 1918	$ 2,700,000
July 10, 1918	3,000,000
September 1, 1918	10,000,000
January 10, 1919	1,250,000
June 12, 1919	2,190,000

The New York maturities were sold by the brokerage firm of William A. Reed, New York. On August 12, there is maturing in London notes of the Canadian Northern railway to the amount of $9,733,333, secured by collateral. In respect of the London maturities I think they can be renewed at full, providing a higher rate of interest is paid. I am hopeful that the maturities in New York may be renewed by a very small principal payment.

Mr. RICHARDSON: To whom are the liabilities due?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am sorry that I cannot give that information now, but I shall have it for my hon. friend when I move the second reading of the Bill.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would have supposed that the Government had the power under the Act of last session to do the very thing that the Acting Minister of Finance wants to do under this resolution. If he thinks differently I will not press the point; it is just as well we should know exactly what the Government's powers are. I think, however, that the hon. gentleman should state not only the amount of the liabilities that he undertakes to redeem or renew, but should give us a full and accurate statement of the liabilities that we have assumed.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Under this Bill?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes. Up to the present time we have not had a full statement of such liabilities. A statement was presented to Parliament last year, but it was understood then that it was not quite accurate, and that there were many subsidiary companies whose liabilities we are assuming. Up to date, therefore, we have not had that absolute and positive statement to which the House is entitled. We must therefore have an absolute and full statement of every liability that we have undertaken to provide for under the Act of last session. We are entitled not only to have the information which my hon. friend has just given us, but he should tell us who contracted those obligations. He should state not only the parent company, but the long progeny of subsidiary companies whose liabilities we have undertaken to deal with. We have no intention to delay proceedings at this stage, but when the Bill comes before the House we shall expect to have a full statement upon the points which I have mentioned.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I understand my hon. friend wants the fullest information possible as to all matters that would properly fall within the scope of the proposed Bill?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What we want is a list of all the liabilities which we have undertaken by the Act of last session. We had a statement last year with respect to that, but it was admitted to be only a partial statement; the Government were not able to give us a statement as to the full extent of the liabilities which we are assuming. That is what we want to have now.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My purpose in making the statement which I did a moment ago was this: My colleague, the Minister of Railways, proposes some day shortly to make a very full statement upon this subject, and I did not think it was necessary that I should now present a statement covering the whole scope of our financial liability in respect of the Canadian Northern railway. I am perfectly willing to give all possible information relating to the subject matter of the resolution and the Bill to be founded upon it. I merely want an understanding about the matter. I am willing to do what my right hon. friend desires, but I think it would be better to leave the complete statement as to our—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Minister of Railways will doubtless submit a mass of detail when he makes his statement, but the information which we desire is absolutely germane to the Bill which we are now asked to pass. That is to say, we should have a full statement of the liabilities which we have incurred by the Act of last session.

Mr. CAHILL: When this legislation went through last year, a statement was made by the Prime Minister that this whole question should properly be taken up by the first Parliament. We are in the position that we are passing legislation here day after day connected with the Canadian Northern railway. When the Minister of Railways and Canals takes up his estimates, he has only a simple amount of $25,000,000 to be voted as a loan to the Canadian Northern system. We are passing $50,000,000 and $78,000,000, and various other amounts. By the time he comes to his estimates the remaining Canadian Northern legislation will be all through and we have not yet had any statement as to who is managing this railway. We are told by the Minister of Railways and Canals and the Acting Minister of Finance that the people of Canada own the Canadian Northern railway. What I ask is: Who own the people of Canada? Mackenzie and Mann still seem to be running the Canadian Northern system. We are taking this road away from them by arbitration. They either have no interest in it or they have. If they have no interest in it, what is the object in allowing them to run it still? If we are taking over the liabilities, we should be in a position to manage the road. The legislation of last year authorized the naming of a commission to manage this road, not when we paid for it, but when we secured the stock. The Acting Minister of Finance says we have secured the stock. Then, why does he not put his own people in control of this system instead of leaving Mackenzie and Mann in charge of it. I have been trying to get that information from the Minister of Railways and Canals and the Acting Minister of Finance, but, so far, have been unable to get it. In his Budget speech, the Acting Minister of Finance did not mention anything about the liabilities of the Canadian Northern. We either own the stock or we do not. If we own the road, we should certainly have an interest in its management.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We are not proposing to make any fresh advance to this railway company. Parliament was given exact details last session of the obligations which the country was assuming in acquiring the Canadian Northern system. I assume my hon. friend can very easily get it now, but if he—

Mr. CAHILL: Has the hon. Acting Minister got it?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I should be pleased to have it sent to him before to-morrow. We are not incurring any further obligations by asking Parliament to pass this resolution, and the Bill to be founded upon it. We are simply asking power to assist in the renewal of certain obligations of the Canadian Northern railway for a few years, at least until the war is over.

Mr. CAHILL: At the last session of Parliament the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) made the statement that in taking over these short-time liabilities of about $98,000,000, he did not expect to have to provide further financial aid in connection with the obligations of the road, that the Canadian Northern would renew them.

[Mr. Cahill.]

During that debate the Prime Minister said more than once that it was not the intention that this Government should run the railway, that there would be a commission appointed, and he also said that the question would be taken up at this Parliament. It has not been taken up, and we are now told that we must rush this measure through Parliament, although the matter referred to by the Prime Minister has not yet come up. We do not know what the liabilities of the Canadian Northern system are. There are fresh liabilities coming in every day to the Arbitration Board sitting in Toronto. Is it not a fact that the province of British Columbia is making a demand on them, and are not others doing the same? We do not know what the liabilities of this road are, and nothing concerning them was mentioned in the Budget speech, or we were not told how it was proposed to meet these liabilities. I think we should know about these matters before passing any more legislation.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. member is not accurate in his quotation of what I said last session. I did not say it would be managed by a commission, but I stated it would devolve upon Parliament, I hoped at this session, to decide the method by which public ownership could be carried out so as to prevent that political interference and influence which would be absolutely detrimental to public ownership and operation. The liabilities of the Canadian Northern railway, according to my recollection, were very fully set out in statements which were presented to this House at the last session of Parliament. There is not the slightest reason why they should not be presented again. But every hon. member must understand that all those liabilities have to be taken into account by the Board of Arbitration which is determining the question as to whether or not the people of this country have to pay anything for the stock. Whatever the liabilities are they are to be taken into consideration by the arbitrators who are considering that question now. The purpose of this resolution is to enable the Government to have the right to carry on this business without interruption. By reason of financial difficulties the road has been unable to finance for long periods; and it was necessary to make these short term loans. During this year and next year many of them will become due. It is not desirable that the country at this time should be called upon to make provision for paying them in cash. Therefore, the Acting Minister of Finance comes to Parliament and asks for authority which will enable the Government to extend them by guaranteeing them. It is perfectly true that they are secured by bonds or debentures guaranteed by the Dominion or by the provinces, at least in most instances. But it is equally true that the short term loans so secured are not themselves guaranteed by the Government. It is considered a desirable thing that the Government acquire the whole of the stock so as to vest the beneficial interest of the road in the people of Canada, and that it should be enabled to extend these loans by giving a proper guarantee, which would obviate the necessity of raising the money at the present time for the purpose of paying them off. That is the sole purpose.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The present resolution is simply a corollary of the action taken by the Government last year. We all understand that. It is also true that there was presented to us a list of the liabilities of Mackenzie and Mann and their different enterprises. But it is also true, and this must not be forgotten, that the Government could not tell us what the total liabilities of Mackenzie and Mann were. The Government did not know whether they were included in the blue-book presented to Parliament. What we desire to know at this stage is, whether or not all the liabilities are shown in that blue-book, or whether others are coming in as well. We should know exactly the amount of liabilities which we have undertaken under the Act passed last session.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The information can be given, but, of course, the Government could not then pledge itself that the liabilities stated to the House last session comprised everything the company might owe. As a matter of fact, we have taken precautions, if I am not mistaken, either in the legislation or the agreement, that if any additional liabilities should be discovered, provision shall be made in the award to see that they are paid by the persons responsible for paying them; in other words, that they must be taken into account in the final payment made by the people of this country for the stock, whenever it may be acquired.

Mr. CAHILL: Before we give any further money to the Canadian Northern, I think it is a proper question to ask whether the Mackenzie and Mann interests are still operating that road. Are they still in charge as they were a year ago?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Government is represented by a certain number of directors on the board. It was not thought desirable to interfere with the present arrangements until the award is made, and the stock has been actually acquired through payment. As soon as that is done, it will of course, be necessary that the country shall have complete control of the operations thereafter.

Mr. CAHILL: Is the country not entitled to know who the directors of the Canadian Northern system are?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The country does know.

Mr. CAHILL: I do not know it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend is the exception.

Mr. CAHILL: Would the right hon. gentleman mind telling us?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I cannot name them off by rote.

Mr. CURRIE: When the Canadian Northern matter was before the House on a previous occasion, some hon. gentlemen suggested the advisability of foreclosing and taking the road over as a Government measure. Against that it was urged by the Minister of Finance that the road would have to do a great deal of financing on short term notes and that these, if they had to be guaranteed by the Government, would become a security of the Government in the market against other federal securities which might be on the market at the same time. Do I understand that the assurance given to the House that the road would stand on its own feet and do its own financing without any guarantee by the Government is now to be violated, and that the Government will now have to guarantee these short term notes and make them obligations and securities of the country on the United States and other markets?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Our liability is not increased. These short term notes are secured by debenture stocks of the company guaranteed by the Government.

Mr. CURRIE: I understand that, but these bonds guaranteed by the Government have not been sold. A number of these bonds that were guaranteed by the Dominion Government and by the provinces have been put into the banks as collateral security for money borrowed on the short term notes that now are being renewed, instead of being distributed among purchasers so that they would become an obligation thirty or forty years from now.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What was the rate of discount?

Mr. CURRIE: Twenty-five or thirty per cent, if the truth were told. The Minister of Finance gave as a reason for not foreclosing, the fact that the identity of the road should remain as it is so that when short term notes of this kind, or equipment notes became due, the railroad company itself would renew them without the Government guaranteeing the notes. I understand not only that the Government are guaranteeing the bonds now in the vaults of the bankers, but that every one of these short term notes will be guaranteed and also become a Government obligation. We are duplicating the security. Is that true?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If the Government acquire the assets of the Canadian Northern railway they cannot well disclaim responsibility for its liabilities. It would be a highly satisfactory bargain for the country if we could acquire the assets of the Canadian Northern Railway system and not become responsible for any of its liabilities; but that is absolutely out of the question. Therefore, acquiring the assets of the road by acquisition of the stock, it is necessary that the Government, if the road is not to become bankrupt or be put in liquidation, should see that the road shall not default in the payment of its liabilities from time to time. There are two ways of doing that. One is to raise money in cash and pay the liabilities off as they become due, looking to some opportunity in the future, when the securities which would be freed by that payment could be marketed in New York, London or elsewhere. The alternative is that this Parliament confer on the Government power to give such a guarantee as will extend these short term loans for a certain period, and it is hoped that after the conclusion of the war financial matters will become nearer to normal when it will be possible to deal in a permanent way with these obligations more satisfactorily than is possible at present. That is the meaning of this resolution upon which the Acting Minister of Finance proposes to found a Bill. When the second reading of the Bill is taken up in committee the Acting Minister of Finance will be prepared to furnish such further information as may be necessary to make the proposals of the Government absolutely plain.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would it not be wise to postpone this legislation until we receive the report of the commission appointed to determine the value of Canadian Northern stock? The many raids of Mackenzie and Mann on the treasury are alarming the people. When the poor man is being asked to pay a tax of ten cents a pound on his tea and coffee, it is not good policy to again bring Mackenzie and Mann near the treasury.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No one is bringing Mackenzie and Mann near the treasury. Nothing in this proposal has the slightest relation to any such thing. The Government is acquiring the stock of a great railway system which is passing into the ownership of the people. As a part of this proposal, it is necessary to make provision for the payment of short term loans, (with which Mackenzie and Mann have absolutely nothing to do) after the stock has once been acquired and paid for by the Government.

Mr. CAHILL: Has the stock not already been acquired?

Mr. RICHARDSON: The road will not be taken over by the Government and operated by a commission as proposed in the Drayton-Acworth report until the report of the arbitration now sitting in Toronto is made. That report will probably be strenuously resisted by this Parliament—most assuredly it will by the people of Canada —and the taking over of the enterprise may be postponed for a considerable period. The transportation problem is a most serious one, and is knocking persistently at the doors of Parliament. The people are very uneasy about this matter, it means so much to the country. If we leave it in the air, we may not be able to take possession of this road for one or perhaps two years, and that will postpone the solution of the whole question. The commitments and liabilities of Mackenzie and Mann grow more appalling as the days go by. While the Government acted, perhaps, according to its best judgment in deciding to acquire the road, it has always been my view—and I believe this is the view of a great many of the people—that it would have been infinitely better to let this road pass into the hands of a receiver and let the provinces that made such vast guarantees pay the price.

If British Columbia, which guaranteed an amount of $79,000,000, chooses to ruin itself, that should be no concern of the Federal Parliament. Let the people of British Columbia, if they choose to elect a Government that is willing to ruin itself at the behest of Mackenzie and Mann, take the consequences. Equally so with all other provinces—

Mr. LEMIEUX: Not all the provinces; there is one province which is not enmeshed in the net of Mackenzie and Mann.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I refer to all the provinces that guaranteed bonds to an enormous amount. This great question will not stand the postponement which may be necessary if the view of the Prime Minister is carried out. I do not wish, at the present time, to press for information beyond what the Acting Minister of Finance is able to give. The Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) has promised to make a complete statement when he brings down his estimates, and I thought perhaps that would be the time for this Parliament to consider the whole question carefully. Let us have a showdown on the railway question; let us know where we are at with the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Grand Trunk, and the Transcontinental, and let us reach a solution in the interest of the country, so as to allay public feeling which is daily growing stronger.

Mr. CAHILL: The Prime Minister stated just now that when we acquired the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway system, we would appoint our own directors and take charge of the management of the system. We have been repeatedly told in this House by members of the Government that we had acquired the stock, and I think before we vote this money we are entitled to know whether or not we have acquired the stock, who are our directors on the Canadian Northern Railway Board, and in what position Mackenzie and Mann are.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We shall give my hon. friend all the information on that on the second reading of the Bill to be founded on this resolution.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: There are two things that I wish to know before I can listen intelligently to the discussion. Who disposed of the five-sixths of the stock to the Government, and what is the Government going to do in regard to the remaining one-sixth of the stock?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: On moving the second reading of the Bill to be founded on the resolution, I shall be pleased to give the hon. member the information he desires. The greater portion of the five-sixths of the capital issue of the Canadian Northern Railway Company now held by the Government, was obtained from Mackenzie, Mann and Company, Limited. I think we have to-day $92,600,000 of the total par value issue of $100,000,000. The arbitrators now sitting at Toronto are endeavouring to ascertain the value of the equity in six hundred thousand shares as provided by chapter 24 of the statutes of 1917. I hope I shall be able to give my hon. friend all the information for which he asks.

Mr. CURRIE: How many shares does the Government now hold of the total issue? There seems to be some confusion in regard to the matter. I should judge the Government holds nearly all of the shares.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It was necessary, inasmuch as the resolution was, in its nature, supplementary to the Bill of last session, to use the words "five-sixths" in phrasing the resolution. As a matter of fact, the Government of Canada have $92,600,000 par value of the total issue of the Canadian Northern Railway Company's shares. I cannot, at the moment, say what is the par value of the shares.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am glad my hon. friend (Mr. Richardson) added a rider to his statement that all the provinces were more or less caught in the net of Mackenzie and Mann. I am bound to protest. While it may be true that the province of British Columbia is committed to the extent of $79,000,000, I may say to my hon. friend that the province of Quebec is not caught in the net of Mackenzie and Mann for a ten-cent piece. That explains why we are not so anxious to become drawers of water and hewers of wood like the other provinces.

Mr. RICHARDSON: You are going to pay your fair share just the same.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I thought we had done away with these raids on the public treasury by Mackenzie and Mann. When the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) have to maintain at Washington a permanent residence from which they may go hat in hand to the United States Treasury to get aid for the Canadian treasury, when our people are being bled white and are bravely paying taxes to carry on this war, we should stand for no more demands from Mackenzie and Mann. Last year we decided to take over the liabilities of Mackenzie and Mann under the express condition that we would take over the road. We have not got the road. The same management is in charge. It is still Mackenzie and Mann.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We have the road.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The day after the Canadian Northern legislation was passed last year, Sir William Mackenzie stated in a public interview that after the investigation was finished he would get a hundred cents on the dollar for his stock. Have you, Sir, ever dreamed of such brazen audacity? The country is committed to the extent of nearly $600,000,000 for Mackenzie and Mann, and Mackenzie and Mann coolly, quietly appear before a commission appointed by the Government and claim value for a stock which has been declared valueless by another commission appointed by the Government. It is a scandal to see those men around Parliament again, in these days of strain and stress trying to bleed white the people of Canada. Are we going to carry out the legislation of last session, legislation which was passed under compulsion much against the protests of His Majesty's loyal Opposition and of certain of the most able members of the Conservative party? I need not refer to Mr. R. B. Bennett, the former member for Calgary, and my hon. friend, the present member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) but I may say that, in Montreal, the gentlemen who constituted the backbone of the old Conservative party, protested most vehemently against that legislation. Be that as it may, that legislation has been passed. We have to assume the liabilities of the Canadian Northern Railway system; but in the name of decency and common sense, we should not allow Mackenzie and Mann to exact from this country the millions of dollars which they claim for a stock which has been declared valueless. Before we pass this legislation the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) will be kind enough to give to the House and the country a list of those liabilities and the names of the holders of those liabilities, because many names are being paraded before the public as being the names of gentlemen who were very active in the conspiracy which took place last year and which gave birth to the Union Government. It is unfortunate that many of the provinces were caught in the net of Mackenzie and Mann, and I am glad and proud that the so-called backward province of Quebec is free from that net. It is even stated that, when the provincial statesmen arrived in a great hurry at the capital city of Ottawa during the meetings which took place preceding the formation of the Union Government, they were welcomed at the station—by whom? Not by the right hon. gentleman, but by Sir William Mackenzie himself. I say this Parliament of Canada should not be under the control of any railway magnate who pulls the strings from behind the scenes. For my part, I shall be very exacting on the second reading of the Bill. I want a list from the Acting Minister of Finance of all the liabilities and the names of the holders, whether corporations or individuals, so that I can scrutinize every item. The country is in no mood to-day, when we have just committed ourselves to an expenditure of five hundred million dollars to carry on the war, to stand for any more raids on the treasury by Mackenzie and Mann.

Mr. JOSEPH READ: The province of Prince Edward Island, unfortunately, is in the same position as the province of Quebec with relation to this iniquitous agreement—I think I may use that word now—with Mackenzie and Mann. Our people have no interest whatever in the Mackenzie and Mann outfit. Their railway system may be of some benefit to the rest of Canada, but it is certainly of no benefit to the province of Prince Edward Island. When you realize that the purchase of this railroad is putting a debt of one hundred dollars on every child that is born in Prince Edward Island to-night, you can readily understand how our people feel about the action of the Government in drawing chestnuts out of the fire for these people and for the provinces that were foolish enough to guarantee their bonds. The Acting Minister of Finance should give us the names of the people from whom the Government purchased five-sixths of the stock. He has told us that Mackenzie and Mann held most of it, but we want to know who held the balance, and also who holds the one-sixth of the stock now outstanding. Then we also want information as to the accrued interest. I understand that the bonds are regarded as collateral security for the notes and, according to the Acting Minister of Finance, the interest is going to be increased on the renewals provided for by the proposed Act asked for. Will that increased interest be taken into consideration by the arbitration now sitting in Toronto, as a set-off against the watered stock that we are asked to take over?

Mr. PAPINEAU: On what date was the stock acquired?

Mr. J. D. REID: I accepted it about the first day of last October.

Mr. CURRIE: When was the annual meeting of the Canadian Northern railway held when the new directors were elected? Was it after October?

Mr. J. D. REID: There has not been any annual meeting since October.

Resolution reported and read the first time.

On the motion for the second reading of the resolution:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That can be taken to-morrow. I think we should have the information that has been asked for first.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I hope my right hon. friend will not press his objection, as I desire to have the Bill printed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There is nothing to prevent my hon. friend from having it printed now.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That may be quite true, but I do not see what advantage can be gained by postponing the introduction and first reading of the Bill.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The only objection I have is that we want to have the information that has been asked for, in advance of the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have told my right hon. friend I propose doing that, but it is not likely that there can be very much further information to give, because I imagine that practically every bit of information available was given to Parliament about a year ago.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If my hon. friend will say that he will give us all the information some day in advance of the second reading, I have no objection to his motion. Otherwise I shall raise my point of order.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What is the point of order?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The point of order is that this is a money resolution and cannot be read a second time on the same day it is taken up by the House.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: On what rule does the right hon. gentleman rely?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have not Bourinot here, and I will not press the point. All I want is this, that we have this information a day or two in advance of the second reading of the Bill, that we may have time to consider it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is no objection to that.

Resolution read a first time.

THE BUDGET.

The House resumed the debate on the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean (Acting Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means (resumed from May 2).

Mr. LOUIS JOSEPH GAUTHIER (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville): The Acting Minister of Finance, in introducing the Budget, said that we must provide (Hansard, page 1304):

For Civil Budget..	$230,000,000
For War Expenditure	425,000,000
For advances to the Imperial Government for financing in part our export trade with Great Britain	325,000,000
In all..	$980,000,000	$980,000,000

To discharge this there will be:

Revenue..	$270,000,000
Advances by Great Britain to pay for maintenance of Canadian troops overseas, about ..	300,000,000
Unexpended balance of Victory Loan, as of March 31, 1918	130,000,000
Leaving a probable balance for 1918-19 of..		280,000,000

That balance, our Internal Minister of Finance said, has to be made up by the people of this country. The Department of Finance is in the same position as the Department of Militia and Defence. We have an internal Minister of Militia in Ottawa and an external one in London. We have an internal Minister of Finance in Ottawa and an external one in the United States. The Acting Minister of Finance has told us that the money market in London is absolutely closed to us during war time and that the New York market is practically closed, so that, to get the $280,000,000 which we require, we will have to appeal to the citizens of this country to absorb the victory bonds that will be floated when the money is needed. I claim, Sir, that the Government must secure from the country its entire confidence and that the Government must answer for and explain every act of legislation, or of administration, so that there shall be nothing concealed. In order that Canada shall be able to make her full contribution to the war, we must have peace and harmony in this country.

I protest very strongly against the restriction of discussion in this House. I see by the Order Paper that there is a notice of motion providing for the censoring of speeches of members of this House. Before you, Mr. Speaker, are permitted to make speeches for me, I intend to make a speech of my own because there are certain facts and arguments that I wish to insert in Hansard and which should not go unanswered.

In the Budget speech the acting Minister of Finance announced that there is going to be a war excise tax collected upon—> —all automobiles and jewellery imported into Canada for sale or manufactured in Canada on or before the 30th day of April, 1918, and which on that day have not been sold to bona fide users of ten per centum of the amount of the duty paid value when imported and of ten per centum of the price when they have been manufactured and sold in Canada.

It is by legislation of that kind that you disturb trade in Canada. I believe it is my duty to state to the House that, in so far as the motor car trade is concerned, this legislation should not have been enacted and the tax should not have been imposed in the way it is intended to impose it. Here are my reasons for making that statement. I understand that the Government needs revenue and that the trade of the country must supply a part of that revenue, but if the Government disturb the trade of the country, traders will not be able to pay the income tax that they should pay, or to absorb the victory loan bonds that are going to be floated in the future. Take, for instance, the motor car trade. To secure an agency in that line of business, you must sign a contract in the month of December to distribute the quota in the territory in which you want to do business. The distributors of motor cars secured their agencies and brought in the cars they are going to sell before the new models come upon the market in July. They have been stocked up since last December with the cars they are going to sell up to the 15th June. They have been compelled to carry the transportation charges, the duties paid to the customs house, the warehousing charges, they are losing the interest on their money and just at the time when they are going to reap a profit, and be in a position to honour their signatures, the Government comes in and puts an excise tax on cars that are kept in stock to supply the regular trade. It is not fair to the trade, and I am afraid that the motor car distributors who have been loaded up since December or January with cars will not, on account of this legislation, be able to dispose of their cars. The result will be that the Government will have practically no revenue. The collection of this tax imposes an additional duty on the Department of Inland Revenue. More than that, this law does not distinguish between new cars and second-hand or used cars; and in second-hand or used cars the Department of Inland Revenue will be entitled to collect this tax of ten per cent. Such a tax should not be imposed. I have no objection to those who are using motor cars contributing their fair share to the revenues of the country, but in order not to disturb trade this legislation should not be put into force before the 1st July, at which date the distributors will commit themselves for the balance of the year and the prices will be fixed by the manufacturers. The Government will lose nothing because it is the manufacturing concerns that will pay, and at no cost whatever the Government will be bound to collect the whole of the amount of the duty imposed upon that trade.

I now come, Sir, to the question of Military Service in this country. When the Bill which preceded the inauguration of compulsory military service was presented, there was a statement made that created quite a flurry in this Chamber and out of it. It was stated that the law would be defeated by the law itself. What has been the result? The result has been such as to indicate that the law ought to be amended because you cannot have conscription with a law providing for exemption. In times of stress like those in which we are living every individual in the land must abide by the dictates of the State. The law, as it stood, compelled every citizen who was of military age to appear before the tribunals appointed by this Government. The spirit of the law was that everybody was conscripted except those who were exempted. To ascertain if he was to be conscripted or exempted, a man had to present himself before a tribunal and hear from the officials appointed by this Government if he was to remain in this country for the benefit of the country, or if his utility would be greater on the battlefield. I cannot but regret, Sir, that the law was such that we have heard hon. gentlemen holding positions of responsibility in this House make the statement that there had been wholesale exemptions.

It could not be otherwise, Mr. Speaker, because I claim nobody had a right to enlist unless the tribunals appointed to decide in each case had rendered their judgment, and in order to do that the case had to be heard and tried. But what has been the result? The law provided for exemption but it was interpreted as meaning conscription, and there should not be any reproach to those who have simply followed the law. The law was unable to supply the one hundred thousand men asked for, and it was amended, and what has been the result? That every young boy in this country is flying to defend the flag and is putting himself at the disposal of the Government. Why? Because the amendments made to the law are not amendments for the purposes of exemption, they are amendments intended to facilitate conscription.

There is a fact to which I wish to call the attention of the Government. We are asked to bear a heavy burden of taxation. Nobody complains. Everybody admits that we are in this war to the bitter end. We are willing to be in it, we are willing to buy Victory Bonds and to pay the amount of taxation that is demanded; but I claim, Sir, that when the Government is asking for money for war purposes, it is nothing but justice that certain acts which have taken place in the province of Quebec should be ventilated in the House so that the ministers will have an opportunity to give an answer, and allay public opinion which, as a result of certain proceedings is visibly uneasy.

Now I wish to refer to the Desjardins case. Here is a man who was an employee of the Government and whose depositions I have before me. I can give you his very words—they are to be found in his depositions of March 21, 1918—to prove my statements. It has been established by Desjardins himself that he was an employee of the Government, and there is something further: The Government hired two attorneys to defend Desjardins. What had Desjardins done? Knowing that a conspiracy was going on in the city of Montreal, having been told by Giroux, the inspector of the federal police, that there was an association in Montreal known, or to be known, as the "Knights of Death," he went and met those young men, among whom there were two bandits, two ex-convicts, two desperadoes just released from the penitentiary under ticket-of-leave, who were running this association. Desjardins pays $25 to become a member of the organization. He gives $1.50 to one to go to Belœil and steal dynamite. He gives a revolver to another man named Paquin in order that the heads of the Government and other leading men should be removed—meaning the right hon. the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Militia, the General Officer Commanding the District of Montreal, Lord Atholstan, and others. Well, Desjardins, the employee of the Government, becomes an associate of these desperadoes, and in furtherance of his designs pays out to them Government money. That, Sir, is bad enough, but there is something worse. I admit that before the trial of these men took place the Government might have been under the impression that Desjardins had done nothing but his duty, but they subsequently took public money for the purpose of bailing Desjardins out. I have here a copy of the cheque issued by the Government with that object in view.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the amount?

Mr. GAUTHIER: $10,000.

1917-1918.

Department of Justice, Canada (42).

No. 1114.

Ottawa, Jan. 4, 1918—$10,000 00.

To the Bank of Montreal, Ottawa:—

Pay to the order of A. E. Corriveau, Clerk of the Crown, Montreal, Ten Thousand Dollars.

Bail-Desjardins case.

E. L. NEWCOMBE,
Deputy of the Minister of Justice.

J. E. Narraway,
Accountant.

Here was the case of a man accused of conspiracy against the peace of citizens of this country. The King issues a warrant, under his own name and seal, to have this conspirator apprehended and put in jail, yet the Minister of Justice of Canada takes out of the public chest the sum of $10,000 to bail this conspirator out. The representative of the King in this Chamber desires to stop the King himself from exercising his functions in the judicial district of Montreal.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. GAUTHIER: He wants to stop the judicial authorities from dealing with this man Desjardins. As I have already said, it was quite possible that up to this time the Government might well have been under the impression that Desjardins had only done his duty; but when all the facts had been brought out at the trial do you not think, Sir, that it would have been better in the interest of appeasing public opinion that the Government should have stopped there. They did not stop, but after all the facts had been brought before the court, they gave a cheque for $10,000 to bail this man Desjardins out. So far no explanation whatever has been given. We have tried by every means in our power to bring this matter to the attention of the House, but at every attempt made there was always a reason assigned for postponing it. I want to be very clear on this point. I was a candidate in the last general election, but I knew that my party would not win. We have been beaten and I admit the defeat. I went to the table to play the game knowing that the dice were loaded against us. I do not complain of the result, but I say to the Government: If you have been elected by the will of the majority of the people of this country to administer the business of Canada, do not commit acts of that stamp unless you can explain them. The allegations in this matter should not be allowed to remain unanswered, and I hope that before the present debate is completed we shall have on this question a reply from the Minister of Justice who is in charge of the department which handled this matter. We want to know, Sir, why the public money was used to hire two attorneys to defend a conspirator like Desjardins, and why the public money has been used to bail out this man who was a friend and the associate of the conspirators banded together under the title of "the Knights of Death."

In this discussion, I do not want to bring in any political bias. Everybody knows that I am a partisan, and I am not ashamed of it. But, Sir, if I was as partisan as some hon. gentlemen may think, I can tell you that the head of the conspiracy was a man named Elie Lalumière. That name must sound familiar to those who sat in the last Parliament. This man, Lalumière, was the tool employed to secure the return of a minister of the Crown. He has been charged in this chamber with having committed a crime against the electoral law of this country. He had the help of an inspector of the federal police, and a private employee of the Department of Justice. I believe, Sir, that a charge like this deserves more than a postponement. We must have an answer to this charge, and the sooner we have it, the better for all parties concerned.

I now pass to the Department of Railways. The president of the Canadian Pacific railway in his address on May 1, this year, stated:

> In view of the abnormal and constantly increasing cost of railway operation, the Board of Railway Commissioners, after due deliberation, authorized an increase of ten to fifteen per cent. in specified zones in the tariff of charges for the carriage of passengers and freight.

We are suffering in this country from the same disease that is prevalent in the United States. Railway employees claim that the railway magnates, in order to comply with the demands of the employee, have increased the haulage capacity of their motive power, and have made their employees work like slaves. To secure an increase in rates for freight and passengers, they have left their rolling stock without being overhauled. That is the charge which is publicly made. I drew the attention of the Minister of Railways to that matter, and he told me that when his estimates came up he would give me the explanation. I intend to discuss this increase of rates, and to supply him with certain information, so that he may be in a better position to answer me. There has been in the United States a wage commission investigating wages of railwaymen, and I have here a statement made by Mr. Warren Stone, grand chief of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. I quote from the April issue of the Locomotive Engineers' Journal:

> The conditions confronting us at the beginning of winter could not have been much worse. Any practical railroad man could have foretold what was going to happen. Never before had the railroads made as little preparation of any kind for winter, and never before had we gone into a winter with our power in such rotten condition. On many railroads no effort was made to get power in condition. It looked to the men, at least the rank and file of these great labour organizations, as if the railroads were trying their best to make all conditions as hard for the employees as possible, and charge it all to application of the eight hour law, for the purpose of making a showing to support their claims to the higher traffic rates they were asking from the Government.

Mr. Stone was cross-examined by Mr. Lehmann, who asked him:

> You spoke of long hours of service, some cases twenty, thirty, forty and fifty hours. Do you mean that during that time the men were actually confined to their positions on the train, and they had no opportunity to leave and get rest and sleep?

Mr. Stone: No, sir. You have to keep your engine ready for service. You do not know what moment you will be ordered to move. The sleep they get if any is not much, folded up like a jackknife on a seat box in the cab of the modern locomotive.

Mr. Lehmann: How about the conditions of comfort and safety?

Mr. Stone: There is no comfort on the modern locomotive at all; it was not built for that; but to pull tonnage.

Further on, Mr. Lehmann says:

You said there was no shortage of engineers, Mr. Stone. Is there a shortage of engines?

Mr. Stone: There would be no shortage of engines if they had gotten their power in any kind of shape.

I am receiving every week complaints from railway employees to the effect that the same state of affairs exists in this country as Mr. Stone describes. Yet what do we see? This Government asks Parliament to grant it power to borrow on the credit of the country $50,000,000 a year this year, and until one year after the war, to purchase railway equipment for railroads which have done their worst to have their hauling power out of order. Is that fair? I say, no, and the people of this country should know the real reasons. The Government desires to take $50,000,000 out of the public treasury to purchase equipment for railroads who have not been able to take care of the property they have now, and who have been compelled to come to the Government to secure an increase in freight and passenger charges of ten to fifteen per cent. This should be explained in such a manner that the employees of the railroads and the public will know that the Government has reasons of its own for proceeding with this policy. Our Government will go down in history, I suppose, as a Government of imitators. They have been trying to imitate our neighbours. I do not complain about that, but I would like them to imitate more consistently, not merely the bad features, but imitate everything, the good as well as the bad.

When the eastern part of the United States last winter had no fuel, the United States fuel controller ordered a heatless day. In Eastern Canada, when we had all the coal we wanted, the Canadian fuel controller ordered a heatless day. In December last the United States Government decided that no State Government should issue bonds without permission of the federal authority —and that was according to their constitution. In Canada this procedure has been imitated, notwithstanding the fact that we have not the same constitution as they have on the other side of the border. One is amazed at the explanations given of this action on the part of the Government. The Government want to stop the issue of bonds by provinces or by corporations holding charters from provincial governments; they want to regulate the issue of bonds so that they shall be in a position to secure the best part of the money of the people.

I desire to call the attention of the Government, especially of those ministers who are supposed to look after the interests of the agricultural classes, to what has been done in the United States for agriculture. They have established a Federal Farm Loan Bureau; they have opened banks to help the farmers; they have done all they can to keep farmers on the farms and to bring from the congested cities all those who can engage in farm work. I commend to members of the Government an article which appears in the Literary Digest of April 6, 1918, with regard to what the United States has accomplished along this line. Permit me to quote the following:

The practical operation of the Federal Farm Loan Bureau has been almost co-incident with the first year of the war. While the members of the Farm Loan Board took the oath of office on August 7, 1916, they were occupied from that date until February, 1917, in the preliminary task of determining the boundaries of the twelve districts established by the Farm Loan Act, the location of the bank in each district, and the selection of the officers and directors of those banks. The first bank was chartered March 1, 1917, and the first Farm Loan Association March 27. The first loan was closed in April, 1917. Up to January 1, 1918, there had been 2,407 Farm Loan Associations chartered. In the month of February, 274 additional associations were incorporated, and the number in March will probably be about 250, so that the total number of associations chartered in the first twelve months will be about 2,931. These associations average about twenty members each, and their loans aggregate about $40,000 each, so that the 2,931 associations will represent a total membership of about 58,620, and a total of about $117,240,000 loans.

Up to January 31, 1918, there had been 112,146 applications for loans aggregating $260,556,981. Of these applications 71,035 had been approved to the amount of $139,050,471, while 24,020 had been closed, amounting to $50,782,432. A considerable proportion of the applications for loans have been either rejected, reduced, or withdrawn. The loans closed in the month of February amounted to a little over $11,000,000, and for the month of March they will probably approximate $15,000,000, making the total of the loans closed for the first year something in excess of $75,000,000.

Loans have been made in every State of the Union in amounts ranging from $100 to $10,000. These loans have all been made to owners cultivating their own lands, and for one or more of the purposes specified in the Act, viz., the payment of existing indebtedness the purchase of land, the making of improvements, or the purchase of fertilizers, live stock, or farm equipment. Where they have been made for the payment of existing indebtednes, they have relieved the farmer of doubt as to his ability to meet the maturing principal of his mortgage, by enabling him to substitute an amortized mortgage, upon which he makes annual payments of a constant amount until the principal is liquidated.

What has been the result of this policy of helping the farmers? According to the census of 1909, the total agricultural products of the United States were valued at $5,486,615,000 in that year. In 1915 the amount had increased to $6,768,598,000. Last year, on account of protection granted to the farmers, the estimated value of all crops in the United States jumped to the enormous figure of $13,580,768,000. I commend these figures, as well as the legislation described in the article which I have read, to members of the Government in the hope that instead of taking away the farmer's boys they will leave them here to engage in the work of production. Nobody believes that you can increase production by having college boys and women replace farmers' sons. Instead of pursuing that course, the Government ought to increase their protection of the farming community. Let the Government cease for a while their protection of the railway magnates and come back to the farmers. You are appealing to them to increase their production, and at the same time you are taking away from the farmers the very men who are able to increase production and thus benefit this country and the Allies.

I said in opening my remarks that it was necessary to the welfare of the country that trade should not be disturbed and that peace and harmony should be restored. Some people contend that this country is threatened with a yellow menace which is coming from the Asiatic continent. I believe that there is a yellow menace, but it is not coming from Asia; it is coming from Ontario. It springs from Orange lodges, and it sows hatred in order to reap votes at the polls. We have had enough of that campaign. I appeal to the Government to stop that campaign of arraying province against province, race against race and creed against creed. I do not boast of my religion, but I claim I have a right to belong to the Roman Church. If I have a right to belong to the Roman Church, I admit that another man may be directed by an Orange lodge. I do not complain of that; but if my own church intrudes on my political liberty, I resent it, and if another sect intrudes on the political liberties of the rest of this country, I resent it too. So far as I am concerned, a man may go to any church he wishes to attend; according to my feeling he may if he so chooses go to no church at all. But he should not try, through religious influences, to have a political preponderance in this country, because if this condition of things is not stopped, we shall have to take action in some way or another to have it stopped. We want harmony and peace in this country. We do not want to dominate any province or any race, but we do not want to be dominated by any other province or any race. The only thing we ask is to be allowed to do our duty as we know it. In Germany there are to-day two battle cries—one of hatred and one of admiration. The battle cry of hatred is "Got strafe England." The Prussians realize that Great Britain is the greatest check to German "kultur," and they want Great Britan to be badly beaten. Great Britain, paying no heed to the "Hymn of Hate," goes on fighting the battles of liberty and civilization. But there is another cry, the cry of admiration. This is "Hoch the Kaiser, hoch the superman." We have in this country the same two battle cries, and they are coming from the yellow men. The battle cry of hatred is "Got strafe Quebec." Have you, Sir, not read in the papers of this country, when the disaster occurred at Halifax, the statement that an injustice had been committed; that this disaster should have been the lot of Quebec, not the lot of Halifax. But there is another cry, the cry of admiration. In Germany the cry is "Hoch der Kaiser." In this country it is "Hocken the Sentinel." We are unmoved by the "Hymn of Hate" and by the hymn singers; but we want to have our share of liberty, and we are willing to assume our share of duty. But if we have to do our share of duty, we are entitled to our share of liberty, and the sooner this is realized, the better it will be for all parties in this country.

Mr. EDMUND BRISTOL (Toronto Centre): Mr. Speaker, I desire to congratulate the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) on the very able presentation he has made of the condition of the financial affairs of this country. I also desire, if I may, to congratulate hon. members on the splendid patriotic tone and character of the speeches which have been delivered in this House during the Budget debate. I can assure my hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) that we are only too anxious to see the people of his race have all the freedom and justice to which they are entitled. All we in this country ask is that as far as possible there should be peace and harmony, equality of service of sacrifice and of obligation.

I listened yesterday with a good deal of attention to the speech delivered by my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie). His speech sounded to me like one of the old time political speeches of pre-war days, particularly that portion in which he referred to Sir Joseph Flavelle and the Davies company and took the Government of the day to task, because, as far as I understood him, they had not in some way criminally prosecuted Sir Joseph Flavelle, or in other ways put the processes of the criminal law in motion. Sir Joseph Flavelle happens to be one of my constituents, and I think perhaps it is fair, and I am going to give the hon. member for North Cape Breton the benefit of the doubt, that in suggesting yesterday that Sir Joseph Flavelle was a criminal and had been robbing the people of this country, he really spoke in good faith. There are three matters to which he called attention. One was the cold storage destruction of poultry in Winnipeg. I do not suppose it needs any argument with him or any other hon. member to say that cold storage companies are necessary in this country. If there were more of them, and if they were under Government control, that would be very much in the public interest. The idea of a cold storage company is, as everybody knows, to take in the particular products of the season of the year when they are plentiful and keep them for use by the public in seasons of the year when they would otherwise be unobtainable. I do not believe my hon. friend suspects the Davies company of desiring to have spoiled in cold storage in Winnipeg a very large number of tons of chicken. When I tell my hon. friend that the cause of the spoiling of the chicken was due to the sinking of one of the walls and, in that way the putting out of order of the refrigerating surface of the plant, he probably will understand that the company was not desirous of having this happen, and that if it had not happened, the chickens and other products in this particular cold storage plant could have been sold for the benefit of the company and of the public. People, I suppose, in their own houses, have things spoil even when they exercise every possible care, and I am sure my hon. friend, who is an excellent laywer, would not say that anybody should be criminally indicted for an unfortunate accident of that character.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am sorry that the commission which inquired into the matter makes no reference to that as being the cause of the disaster to the goods.

Mr. BRISTOL: I have not, perhaps, read the report as carefully as has my hon. friend, but I am quite satisfied that my facts are right, and that is why I am stating them.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have a complete copy of the report, and I shall be very glad to give it to the hon. member. There is in it no mention of that cause.

Mr. BRISTOL: My hon. friend was very much concerned about the British Munitions Company, the whole of the stock of which was owned by the Imperial Munitions Board. It is quite obvious that if the whole of the stock of the British Munitions Company was owned by the Imperial Munitions Board, and if the British Munitions Company was making any profits out of the transaction, the Imperial Munitions Board would eventually get it. I do not think my hon. friend intended to suggest that Sir Charles Gordon, or Sir Joseph Flavelle, or any of the other directors are drawing a dollar from the treasury of either of these companies, which are the property of Great Britain. It is well known that such is not the case. One thing my hon. friend seemed concerned about was an agreement for a five per cent commission between, as I understood him, the Northern Electric Company and the British Munitions Company, Limited, which was payable by the latter company to the former, and which he suggested Sir Joseph Flavelle and his friends participated in. This is absolutely incorrect. The object, as I understood it, of the formation of the British Munitions Company, Limited, was the making of fuses in this country.

One of the most vital parts of the shell is the time fuse, which has to be accurately constructed to go off at a given moment, or otherwise it would kill our own people. The time fuse problem has caused a great deal of difficulty in England, in the United States and in Canada. When the British Government first gave contracts for shells in this country many of the constituent parts were made in different parts of the United States and Canada, but eventually the whole shell was made in this country. What caused the greatest possible difficulty with the time fuse, and resulted in the British Government being charged what they considered a high price for the shells, was that its manufacture called for a high degree of technical skill. There were very few men who could do the work, and they were hard to get. The Northern Electric Company, which I understand to be a subsidiary of the Bell Telephone Company, was the only company in Canada that possessed a technical staff capable of doing the work, and they furnished this highly trained and highly paid staff of technical experts on a basis of five per cent. That this operating charge was reasonable is shown by the fact that as a result, not merely has the whole cost of the plant of the British Munitions Company been written off, but the company has to-day, I understand, a surplus of over $400,000, based on the manufacture of time fuses in this country at the same price they were being manufactured for in the United States. So Great Britain has saved practically the cost of her factory, and has four hundred thousand dollars to the good, and has also, located and operating in Canada, the best time fuse factory on this continent, and to Sir Joseph Flavelle and his associates belongs the credit of this achievement.

Coming to the Davies Company, there is no question that the company made a profit of eighty per cent during a certain period of time, but the gravamen of my hon. friend's charge was that the Canadian people were being robbed in some fashion. The Davies Company has been in existence, to my knowledge, a generation or more, and has been doing business for fifty years in the English market. During the first two years of the war, if I am correctly informed, this company sold its entire product to the British Government at the market price such product was bringing in London at the time of its arrival there, and it was sold in competition with similar products from the Swift and Armour Companies and the other big packing plants of the United States. In other words, the Davies Company or any other of these packing houses had no more to do with the fixing of the price than had hon. gentlemen opposite. The price was fixed by the British Government on the arrival of the product in London. Subsequently, the British Government, on account of transportation reasons, changed their policy, and the product was sold at the price it would bring f.o.b. port of shipment in United States or Canada. So throughout all their transactions, the price the Willian Davies Company received for the bacon my hon. friend was speaking about, was fixed by the British Government and by no one else. I have been told that as a result of the prices ranging over a certain period of time the profit derived by this company from the sale of its bacon was two-fifths of a cent a pound—and I believe those figures to be correct,—on an article costing, I think, 32 cents, but varying of course in price. What I want my hon. friend to understand, and what I think it is only fair the Canadian people should understand, is that the William Davies Company had no monopoly. They bought their hogs in the open market in the United States against American competition, and in Canada, and they sold them at the market price that they and every other company had to take from the British Government, when that Government took over the product. And the best proof that the price was not exorbitant is that from the time these transactions started until now there has not been one word of complaint from the British Government against the Davies Company as to any price asked or received by them in the London market on the product they sold to that Government. I know from other sources that no company in Canada stands as high to-day with the British Government as does this same William Davies Company. There have been abnormal prices in this country for products of various kinds, and particularly for bacon. Every one knows that on account of the millions of men who have been taken out of production to engage in war, the price of wheat and other farm products has of necessity gone up, and, in addition to that, the soldiers in the camps are consuming enormous quantities of meat—far more than they consumed in peace time. With the gradual depletion of the world's stocks, prices have naturally gone up. I want to say to my hon. friend from Cape Breton that if this profit was made, it was not made by an exaction of high prices, but by reason of the fact that this Canadian company was able to do business better and cheaper than its American competitors in the open markets of the world, and with an enormous turn over they made a large amount of money on a small capital. Furthermore, forty per cent of the hogs that were made into the bacon in question, were bought in the United States in competition with Swifts and Armours and other packing houses there, were brought into this country and manufactured into bacon, and so were a benefit to Canadian labour. The bacon was then shipped to the English market and, being lower in price and better in quality, it beat the American product. In my humble judgment that was a credit to the company and a credit to Canadian enterprise.

So far as Sir Joseph Flavelle is concerned, I have personally no brief for him, and no interests directly or indirectly with him, but I have known him for a number of years and I do not believe that a more honourable and straightforward business man exists in this country. I say that the fact that the British Government have maintained him in the position he occupies in this country through all these years, and are continuing to deal with the William Davies company is proof that the charge that this company has made an enormous profit is absolutely untrue. As soon as the word profit appears we hear about profiteer, pirate, robber, and so on. These statements carry no weight with the British Government. The facts have not been given to the Canadian public in such a fashion that they could form an unprejudiced judgment of what the transactions actually were.

My hon. friend has suggested that the Government of Canada should in some way supervise the enormous expenditure of the Imperial Munitions Board in this country, because he says it is the money of the Government of Canada that is being spent. It is true that the Government of Canada has loaned money to the British Government in this country in order that she may buy through the Munitions Board Canadian farm products and Canadian manufactured products for the use of Great Britain in this war. It is true that Great Britain is paying out millions from day to day and week to week for the maintenance of our soldiers overseas. It is true that there is a balance in our favour for one hundred million dollars. But my hon. friend is too good a business man and too good a lawyer to suggest that because Great Britain has a credit with us we have a right to dictate how she shall spend her money, and who shall handle her finances in this country. The fact remains that the British people, and particularly the British Government, which I suppose comprises as able a body of business men as are to be found in the world to-day, continue to employ Sir Joseph Flavelle in the distinguished position he occupies, and until my hon. friend can show something more than he has done it is high time we left Sir Joseph Flavelle alone and let these baseless charges shrink into the oblivion they deserve.

What has been the position of our farming friends throughout these transactions? No Canadian can but desire that the farming community in this country should prosper; but we need not bother ourselves about that.

The farming community was never so prosperous. As a matter of fact, referring to the particular product that I was mentioning, while the farmers before the war, or about the time the war broke out, were getting from $6 to $9 per hundred for pork, since the war they have been getting from $13 to $20. So it is with practically all the products that the farmer has to sell. There was a long period in the history of this country when the farming community undoubtedly suffered and endured great hardships. I heard a friend of mine the other day saying that thirty years ago down in Nova Scotia he had started life as a boy working on the farm. He said that he was about fifteen years of age, that he got up at five o'clock in the morning, worked all day and in order that he might spend his evenings profitably he was allowed to string apples until three o'clock in the morning. He said that after three months of this work he gave up, ran away and left a note behind his stating to the farmer who hired him that he had broken his contract because the farmer, when he entered his employ, had promised him steady work whereas during two hours of the night he was allowed to sleep. Although that may have been the position of the farmer thirty years ago, the position of our western farmer, to-day is a very different matter. Our western farmer, although he had probably twenty years of struggle before the war, has now reached the point where he is in a more prosperous condition than any farmer in the world and I congratulate him. Manual labour for him is largely a thing of the past. He does his work by machinery. He no longer gets up early in the morning to milk the cows; he does not need to, because he uses condensed milk. He does not require horses because his farm machinery is driven by motor power or steam. He goes to town in his automobile and he spends his winters in Los Angeles. I have been told by one man who was out west that their condition was getting so bad, as regards exercise, that some of them were erecting gymnasiums in their barns, or Whitely exercise in their houses, because manual labour had become a thing of the past. The suggestion that the farmer is the sufferer at the present time is one with which I am afraid a great many people in this country, like Government employees and those who are living on fixed salaries, will not feel any special sympathy. I think that the farmer, the same as every other person, should bear his fair share of the taxes inasmuch as he has received his full proportion of the wonderful prosperity of the country so that I cannot at present sympathize with the claim for free agricultural implements.

I want to deal with one particular tariff matter and that is the business profits war tax. If there is one thing that we have tried to do in Canada, it is to attract capital and men to this country. We have tried to make this a splendid country for people to come and settle in. We have tried to make our farming communities prosperous, and we have tried to give people who come here and invest capital a reasonable opportunity for success. That has been the policy of every Government since Confederation. It is perfectly obvious that if we are to continue the wonderful prosperity which this country is enjoying, and has been enjoying for a long time past, we must make it equally as attractive as our great neighbour to the south for business and settlement. What happens? When the business war tax of 25 per cent was first enacted it was accepted cheerfully by the Canadian community, as will be any tax, because there is not a man who is not anxious, in my humble judgment, to do his full duty to the state in whatever capacity he may be able to serve it. I am not calling this matter to the attention of the Acting Minister of Finance from the point of view that somebody may wish to escape the tax, but I do urge that we must make this country as attractive as possible to foreign capital in order that it may be induced to invest and assist in the development of our resources. We must make it as inviting as any other country, such as the United States. We have alongside of us the United States, a country which for three years had immunity from the war. It is of necessity in a highly prosperous state. Most of its industries are not in need of any financial assistance from the banks to carry on their work now or for the purposes of extension after the war. We have imposed an excess profits war tax in this country, which works out on the average fifty per cent higher than the like tax in the United States. If a Canadian had a profit of $75,000 on a business having an invested capital of $300,000 he would pay about $12,500 more in taxes than he would pay if he were in the United States. I submit that it is not in the interest of the people in this country to put the business people of Canada in a worse position than are our friends to the south of us. It is unquestioned that capital will go where it is treated best. There is nothing in the financial statement which we had presented to us that indicates that the finances of this country are not in such shape that we should not carefully consider in any taxation measure we may enact whether we are doing anything that will drive capital out or thwart any existing industry in the country. The matter is so important that I want to put a couple of examples on Hansard. The Canadian business profits war tax was enacted on the 8th June, 1917, and the following rates were imposed:

Profits.	Tax.
7% to 15%	25%
15% " 20%	50%
20% and over	75%

In the United States the deductions include (a) $3,000 allowance, and (b) the profits up to an amount equal to a percentage based on pre-war period earnings. These may be 7 per cent, 8 per cent, or 9 per cent. The United States War Profits Tax was enacted on the 3rd October, 1917. That is about four months later than we enacted ours, and it was deliberately put lower than the Canadian tax. The rates are as follows:

7%, 8% or 9% to 15%	20%
15% " 20%	25%
20% " 25%	35%
25% " 33%	45%
30% and over, maximum	60%

I will give a couple of examples showing how these two systems of taxation work out:

Examples showing how the Canadian Business War Tax Act compares with the American War Excess Profits Tax.

Example A.

A firm having a capital of $300,000 makes $75,000 or 25% on a year's business.

If in Canada that firm will pay a tax of ..	$ 24,750
If in the United States it will pay a tax of ..	12,150
Under the Canadian Act it works out thus:—
Invested capital ..	$300,000
On which 25% is made or ..	75,000

			Tax.
Up to 7% or on	$21,000	these profits are exempt	000
From 7% to 15% or on	24,000	Tax 25%	6,000
From 15% to 20% or on	15,000	" 50%	7,500
In excess of 20%	15,000	" 75%	11,250
Total Tax			$24,750

Under the American Act it works out thus:

Invested capital, $300,000.

On which 25 per cent profits are made, $75,000.

Presuming that in the pre-war period this company had been earning 8 per cent, it would be granted exemption to that amount.

Profits up to 8 per cent or $24,000 exempt.

Addition allowance, $3,000.

Total amount exempt from tax, $27,000.

Amount remaining that is taxable, $48,000.

Taxable Profits.

		Tax.
From 8% to 15% or on	$21,000 at 20%	$ 4,200
" 15% " 20% "	15,000 " 25%	3,750
" 20% " 25% "	12,000 " 35%	4,200
Total Tax		$12,150

Thus where the Canadian firm pays $24,750 the American firm similarly situated will pay $12,150 or less than one-half.

Example B.

A company with $100,000 capital makes 33% profits or $33,000.

If in Canada it will be taxed.

Exempt to 7%	$7,000

20% to 33% or on	10,000 at 35% Tax	3,500

or under 17% of earnings.

In the case of example "A". Supposing the company pays out 10 per cent to its shareholders, the Canadian company, after paying the tax out of profits can carry forward $20,250. The American firm doing the same thing would have $32,850 to carry forward.

In a three year period the American firm could bring its capital to slightly less than $400,000, while the capital of the Canadian firm would be $360,750.

Example C.

A Montreal with a capital in 1914 of	$250,000
Made a loss in 1915 of	85,000
Made a loss in 1916 of	59,000
And a profit in 1917 of	130,000

The company's resources were impaired by the end of 1916 to the extent of $144,000, the combined losses of the two years, and were really down to $106,000. In 1917 the profits amounted to $130,000 and with this the directors had hoped to make up the impairment of capital. Their Excess Profits War Tax took $71,000, leaving them as the result of three years business $85,000 poorer than in 1914.

The American firms also have this further advantage.

The Excess Profits Tax in the United States only became effective on January 1, 1917. While the Canadian Excess Profits Tax has already been in force for three years.

Many American firms were allowed to accumulate large profits during the first, second and third years of war, during all of which time the Canadian firms were paying heavy taxes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is within the knowledge of many of us that there is always more or less capital seeking investment in Canada, and to-day that capital is south of the line. The position of England renders the investment of English capital in Canada for some time to come a very remote possibility. And unless, as I say, we treat Canadian companies and Canadian citizens as well as the United States treat companies similarly situated, we cannot expect to attract that new capital, by way of investment, to this country. Not only so, but the situation works out this way: If between the Business Profits Tax and the Income Tax you take from the Canadian companies a sum so much in excess of what the American companies pay, then after the war is over and it becomes a question of taking the industries in this country and putting them into a shape to carry on new industries or such new lines of manufacturing as they will have to have recourse to, they will be practically bereft of capital, and in the financial conditions that confront the country it is a very doubtful question where they will be able to get a new supply, or whether they will be able to get it at all. I would, therefore, ask the Minister of Finance to give this question the consideration which I feel, in the interest of the business communities and the prosperity of the country, it deserves. What is asked for is equal treatment for the great business interests of the country with our friends to the south, and at the same time to make this country so attractive that a very large amount of capital will be drawn here from time to time which will permit taxation to have a much larger spread, and enable Canada to meet more easily the obligations of the future.

There is another matter, Mr. Speaker, that so far as the cities are concerned, and particularly Toronto, has excited a good deal of comment, and it is the question of alien labour. There is a strong feeling in certain sections of tne community that for alien labour to be receiving eight to ten dollars a day, whereas our Canadian soldier is only in receipt of $1.10 per diem, is hardly a fair situation for the fighting men of Canada to be placed in. I understand that the Government have given a great deal of consideration to this question, and, so far as the labouring people are concerned, I can only say this: When they see the wife and daughter of the alien enemy walking down our streets attired in silk dresses, and so forth, and the alien enemy himself getting such high wages and taking the job of the son or brother or husband at the front, it certainly fills them with feelings of a very unpleasant character; and if the Government could take any action in that regard I am sure it would be welcomed by a very large section of the community.

There is a further matter which in Toronto has been attracting a good deal of attention, and that is the number of fires that have taken place in munition factories or other factories utilized for war purposes, resulting in the feeling that more stringent action should be adopted in reference to the internment of alien enemies or at all events the more careful watching of them. I understand that any communications sent to the Minister of Justice by any responsible citizen in regard to a matter of this kind will receive the most careful attention; and possibly it would be in the interest of Canada if different public bodies in this country would do as they have done in the United States, who of their own motion volunteer to give information to the Justice Department, and in that way practically attaching themselves and forming part of the secret service department, so that all loyal citizens might to a certain extent aid the Government in possibly finding out if there are alien enemies of the country who are doing the harm, or who should be interned in the public interest.

I am glad to see the tone which has characterized this debate and to find that, while we may differ, perhaps, on tariff questions, on one matter the members of the House are absolutely united. With no single exception every member has shown the strongest possible desire to help this country win the war. That is really what this Parliament was constituted for, and I am sure that there is no citizen in the country, man or woman, who is not most anxious to do his or her part in this great struggle, to the very best that in them lies. So, Mr. Speaker, I appeal to my friends, whether from Quebec or Ontario, from the Atlantic to the Pacific— no matter from what part of Canada they may come—with all the force I can to aid us in becoming a united and harmonious people. Let us endeavour with all the strength we can to show that we are worthy of those splendid Canadians who have won undying fame for Canada at the front, so that when these gallant men return to us victorious we in Canada will not be ashamed of the part that we have taken, and so that we may be able to say hereafter that the finest page in the history of this war was the part our country played.

Mr. J. E. FONTAINE (translation): Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested in listening to the financial statement delivered by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), the acting Minister of Finance. It was so much more attractive owing to the fact that the hon. member is the same gentleman who, year after year, since the people of this country have committed the serious error of overthrowing the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, was always the first to rise on behalf of the Liberal party and criticise the incautious and often unfair methods of taxation of Sir Robert Borden's administration. We, on this side of the House, were anxious to hear him, to find out which of the two groups that compose the Union Government would gain the upper hand. Would it be the Tories or the Protectionists? Would it be the Free Trade Liberals? The Right Honourable Prime Minister, when the cabinet was formed, stated that both political parties would be equally represented, on the basis of fifty-fifty, to use his own expression. If it is equally divided from a numerical standpoint, I believe I can say without fear of denial that those of our friends who left the cold regions of the Opposition to sit on the Treasury benches have endorsed the old protectionist Tory policy, which has never served to protect the people and the consumer, but has always assisted the manufacturers and the millionaires.

When I carefully look into the estimates submitted to our consideration, it appears to me that the Government is not over-solicitous of the lot which falls to the people; that is the workingman, the toiler; I even believe that they have more compassion for the Mann and Mackenzie Company. Why cannot the Government find some means of reducing the cost of living through a more equitable distribution of the taxes, in such a way as to lay the burden upon those who are better able to bear it? As you must know, Mr. Speaker, those foodstuffs which are absolutely essential to subsistence, have reached such heights in price that the workingman is forced to undergo the most cruel privations; still, this is the class which bears the brunt of the war. Shoes, clothing, in short, everything, is selling at exorbitant prices, while there has been scarcely any increase in wages. The manufacturer is allowed to double his wealth, while the workingman is put on short allowance, compelled to eat brown bread and to go without meat. Besides, Mr. Speaker, does not the Government itself set the example of extravagance? If we compare to-day's ordinary expenditure with that of the Laurier Administration, we find that it has more than doubled. Take, for instance, the number of Cabinet members: under the Laurier Government, we had fourteen ministers, and to-day, we find twenty-five of them; we even have two ministers of Militia and two ministers of Finance. I think that, in these times of war, several ministers have a good deal of spare time and that they could have taken over the management of two departments. But I readily understand that this would not have answered the purpose of the Government's friends.

Now, what about commissions? As soon as any question arises that might prove somewhat embarrassing to the Government, presto! a commission is appointed, in the belief that all responsibility ends there. And these commissioners, creatures of the Government, draw salaries of five, six and even seven thousand dollars per annum. The number of the Civil Service employees has also been increased twofold without any necessity whatsoever; so true is this, that the hon. Minister of Public Works, himself, stated in this House, that there were far too many employees in his own department. Now, Mr. Speaker, what shall we say of the Militia Department's expenditure? That I may not be taxed with disloyalty, I wish to state my position clearly: I am in favour of Canada's participation in this war, I want the Allies to win; I realize that it is a struggle of Democracy against Autocracy. We are fighting for Belgium, we are fighting for the smaller nations. However, we, French Canadians, the minority in this country, would carry on our part in this war with far greater enthusiasm, if the majority did not treat us in the same fashion as the Germans treat the lesser nations of Europe; if certain people stopped slandering, calling us pro-Germans and slackers, because we believe with Lord Rhondda, with Herbert C. Hoover and others, that the best way to help England is through an increased cultivation of our land, a more intense production to supply food to the Allies; for, after all, though we do need soldiers, if we are unable to feed them, they will not be fighting very long. I know the feelings of my compatriots, I know they all desire the ultimate victory of England. Is not our past a pledge of our loyalty? Was it not the French Canadians who, upon two memorable occasions, saved Canada for the British Crown? Every one still recalls the battle of Chateauguay; 1774 and 1812 are two dates which remain indelible in the history of Canada, and fanaticism, whencesoever it may come, shall never be able to efface their memory. And did not the Government themselves admit the justice of our claim when they adopted an Order in Council to the effect that farmers and farmers' sons should be exempted from conscription; but, at that time, we were on the eve of the elections, and in electoral matters as in many other cases, the fear of the voters is the beginning of wisdom.

Crushed under their taxes, direct and indirect, alike, our people are going through a crisis unprecedented in this country which one was pleased to call in former times a privileged land. What will be the outcome of it all? Let us hope that the people will willingly bear the new burdens imposed upon them. Our country is evidently passing through a novel experience. However painful, it must nevertheless be accepted, though not perhaps without recrimination. But once the war is over, the Government will have to face the harsh day of reckoning to the voters of this country.

If, owing to their heavy taxes, our private citizens are forced to economize, the Government must find it necessary to do likewise, and the least that can be expected of them, is to exercise the greatest care in the expenditure of public funds. To be extravagant in times such as we are now experiencing, is nothing short of a crime.

More than at any other time, the people are keeping a sharp eye on their Government; they closely watch its every move, scrutinize its doings, and it rests with this Government to provide the country with such an administration as will safeguard the essential resources of the nation, develop them at home and uphold our credit abroad.

Mr. J. E. PREVOST (Terrebonne) (translation): Mr. Speaker, the Estimates as brought down to this House, have been made the subject of elaborate discoursing by the greater number of the hon. gentlemen who preceded me. Avalanches of figures have been paraded before ours eyes; millions, batallion upon battalion of them, in close formation, have whirled in front of us in a dance of demoniacal fury, whilst close in their wake, came several regiments of taxes.

In fact, the Minister of Finance must have quite a tremendous army of these recruiting officers of the Exchequer, otherwise known under the name of taxes, and which have all been set loose on the trail of Canada's citizens; not a single one will escape.

What can you expect? It can't be helped: owing to the urgency of the fiscal needs—resulting from the exigencies of the war situation but arising as well from the extravagance of the Administration and from the improvidence which has characterized the guidance of the affairs of this country during the last three years, the Minister of Finance is compelled, every now and then, to increase once again the already heavy taxation whereby the people's gold is being diverted to the treasury.

It is not my intention to go into the matter of our expenditures, the amount of our debt, the total of our interest disbursements, and the assessment of taxes. Other gentlemen have dealt with these problems and still others no doubt will do so. Besides, there is another feature besides the purely material side of the management of affairs that must be considered; bread is not the only food required by man, and the financial policy of a government must not hold all the peoples' attention.

It is desirable, Mr. Speaker that, for a moment, the very soul of the Government be pried into, that its constitution be fathomed, in order to ascertain just what are the motives that shape its policy, as well as to find out if we, who are opposed to its policy, are on that account unworthy citizens, disloyal British subjects, and unpatriotic Canadians, according to what is being thought and said in certain quarters. To all the foregoing remarks, I feel sure the Government will deem its reply sufficiently peremptory when it shouts the pompous cognomen it has assumed and answer with emphasis: "We are the Government of national Unity!" Are we so sure of this?

The word Union, particularly in the present day, is a big word which stands for a high ideal because union makes for strength; and strength, the moral force, the national force, are the fruits of victory in the tremendous struggle we are now engaged in.

Now or never is the time, now when so many nations are fighting side by side in the same struggle for the triumph of Justice and Right; now is the time to put to shame those who think ill of others because forsooth, their race and creed are different from their own.

Now is the time, when all endeavours tend to insure the triumph of the might of right over might without right, now is the time for minorities to claim their rights.

Without the existence of a spirit of fellowship how can one fight for the liberty and equality of each and every citizen in the eyes of the law.

The ambitious dreams of a world-dominion, as imagined by Germany, are amongst the chief causes of the present war. It is evident that, for a considerable time in the past, this dream of world domination has haunted the minds of Germany's leaders of all ranks; it is reaffirmed in the conceit displayed by its generals, its philosophers and professors in their public utterances and writings.

It has been said, and rightly, that the causes through which this war was brought about, cannot be clearly understood unless one refers to the views expressed by the German philosophers and authors from time to time during the last half century. The consensus of their findings may be summed up in the following statement recently made by a German professor: "The German is conscious of his rights and of his duties, and he intends to rule the world."

And that is why the whole of the material and moral forces of those who had resolved not to be enslaved were lined up in this war in order to crush the enemy who would reduce them to slavery. The pursuit of this goal gave birth to union.

In Canada, unfortunately, I look in vain for the sacred union that ought to prevail.

We have, it is true, a Union Government, but, what a mockery, therein lies the very cause of disunion in the nation.

Twice in our political history has this word, union made its appearance: in 1840, Canada had a Union Government, and then came the Union Government of 1918. The latter administration has proved to be as unwholesome in its results as the former was mischievous in its designs. In both cases, they have failed to fulfil the splendid hopes which their very name implied; both have brought about the disunion of the nation.

The Union of 1840 was intended to abolish the political influence of the French Canadians to banish the French race from Canada; the administration sought to force itself upon the country through a fraudulent election at which part of the electorate were deprived of their political rights. This regime was inaugurated by a Cabinet which contained not one single French Canadian and only one minister of which professed the Catholic faith.

One is led to believe that the Unionist cabinet of 1918 reflects the image and the spirit of that first Union cabinet of 1840; so much so that one is tempted to ask if we may not say of the present Government what Lord Gosford said of the former in the House of Lords: "It was cradled in a trade conspiracy."

It is indisputable that Unionism has created disunion in the nation. The unfortunate disunion born of the Borden Government has been deepened and encouraged by the Union Government which is forcing upon the country a measure nowise called for and which has thrown Canada into an irrational, unreasoning and unreasonable participation in the war.

This union which the Borden Government sought to bring about for the elections, and which it proclaims blatantly, why was it not attempted and realized when the war started? The Government made no move in that direction. Every concession made for the sake of union came from the Opposition. But this union was short-lived, because of administrative scandals, in the first place. The love of gold was stronger than the love of civilization in the hearts of our administrators and their friends. The Borden Government outdid anything we had yet seen in the matter of administrative scandals. The partisans of the Government rifled the public treasury. All the transactions made by the Government since the inception of the war have been just so many scandals. From the contracts for clothing, for shells, for arms, for remounts, for boots, for hay, up to the purchases of binoculars and pharmaceutical products, in everything, the friends of the Government pocketed exorbitant profits. A scrutiny of the uses to which were put the funds necessary for carrying on our part in the war shows that these sacred resources were pilfered by the friends of the Borden Government. That was the beginning of the revolt in the minds of our people and of the disunion which made its way into their hearts. The Canadian Northern purchase capped the climax of the administrative misdeeds committed by the Government; this scandalous deal by which the Borden Government who, under section 24 of the law of 1914, had the right to take over all the property of the Canadian Northern without spending one single dollar, nevertheless went ahead and bought this very company, thereby adding $600,000,000 to the debt of the country and forcing us to purchase for $10,000,000 a load of stock which had been declared worthless by a committee of inquiry which the Government itself had appointed. This onerous transaction was condemned by every business man in the country, Conservative as well as Liberal, notably by a group of eminent financiers from Montreal and Toronto. The maladministration of the Government continued to widen more and more the cleavage among the people of the country. The cost of living, in which the Government took no interest, allowing the trusts and hoarders of the Flavelle type to pocket millions at the expense of the consumer, was also a powerful contributing factor to the discontent and profound discord which were rampant in Canada. Elsewhere, governments took a hand, at the proper time, in lightening the burdens which were bearing down on the shoulders of the people in this critical phase through which the world is passing. We can see that the intervention, opportune, able and wise, of the governments of other countries, has brought good results, which condemn the inactivity of the Borden Government in the matter. In other parts, the cost of living did not leap in the same proportions as here: for instance, between 1914 and 1917, the cost of living increased only 9 per cent in Australia, 25 per cent in the United States, while in Canada the increase was 44 per cent. The conduct of the Borden Government with regard to the cost of living can be stated in two words: inertia and ineptitude. The Borden Government, by their arbitrary laws drove the Canadian people still further asunder. I shall mention only the War-time Elections Act, which was not drafted to beat the Germans, but to defeat the Liberals.

This Act, with impudent cruelty, disfranchised thousands of British citizens. Canada had pledged her word to all those whom she accepted as her citizens that they would enjoy the same rights as other British subjects. This pledge is found in Chapter 13, Section 17 of the Canada Statutes, 1881. The section reads as follows:

An alien to whom a certificate of naturalization is granted shall, within Canada, be entitled to all political and other rights, powers and privileges, and be subject to all obligations to which a natural-born British subject is entitled or subject within Canada.

This guarantee to aliens who became British subjects was afterwards approved by the Acts which the Canadian Parliament passed in 1886, 1906 and 1914.

The War-time Elections Act disfranchised hundreds of thousands of the naturalized British subjects to whom the Government had promised equal rights with other Canadians. Yes, but we don't see the Government exempting these disfranchised subjects from paying taxes, especially the income tax which the present Government is demanding from them to-day.

In return, through this same damnable enactment, the Government granted the franchise to 800,000 women, whom they themselves selected in such a way as to make sure of a favourable plurality; moreover, they gave the ballot to thousands of alien soldiers who knew nothing of our country, its history, its geography, its politics and its interests.

Finally, with conscription, the Borden Government destroyed for many years to come the union which we so sorely needed in this country. This question inflamed the four corners of Canada. Rather than be content with volunteer recruiting, as in Australia, New Zealand, Ireland, the Transvaal, Newfoundland; rather than submit the Conscription Bill to a referendum, as was done in Australia, the Government throttled the will of the nation and imposed compulsory military service. This was fatally destined to accentuate the cleavage amongst the people. We will listen to the words of one of the former ministers in the Borden Cabinet, who resigned his post rather than be responsible for the conscriptionist policy of the Government.

In his letter of resignation, the Hon. Mr. Patenaude, amongst other things, said what follows:

Dear Sir Robert,

On the 18th of May last when you acquainted the House with your intention of presenting a Bill providing for compulsory service during the present war.

From the moment you submitted your intention to the Council, I drew your attention to its extreme gravity and to the consequences which, to my mind, would follow.

. . . . . .

I have, however, thought it my duty in these critical times, to abstain from any hasty decision, as long as I could entertain the hope that these considerations, as well as the very serious events which were meanwhile developing, would induce you to modify, if not to completely change your decision.

I cannot now expect that my hope will be realized; you have in fact decided to introduce, without further delay, your proposed Bill, and have it passed during this session.

Therefore, I feel bound to sever my connection with the Cabinet on this question.

I have always thought, and do yet think, that the best interests of Canada make it a duty for this country to give to the cause of the allies its most generous support. But to do this, I cannot concur in any measure which in my estimation imperils national unity. The proposed law, I have every reason to fear, threatens to destroy this unity, and to give rise throughout the country to deep internal divisions of long duration, and even detrimental to the needs of the present moment. Indeed it is better to keep the country united in the present effort then to attempt a mightier one at the cost of national disruption.

If only conscription had become necessary through the failure of volunteer recruiting. But that excuse does not hold water. The Prime Minister himself, in January 1917, in this House during the debate on the Speech from the Throne, used these words:

Recruiting has gone well in every province of Canada. The call to arms has been admirably answered. In the Maritime Provinces and in the province of Quebec, the movement was, perhaps, a little slow in getting under way, but I know from information received lately that everything is going along now as well as we could hope and that the call is being answered in splendid fashion.

And the Prime Minister was right. I find in Hansard for July 19, 1917, some very interesting figures. At the time when the Government was deciding to impose conscription on the country, of the 500,000 Canadians of military age, 550,000 had enlisted as volunteers. Twenty-five per cent had been refused as physically unfit, and 400,000 had joined the colours. Moreover Canada had, at that moment, according to the Prime Minister himself, 304,000 men in the munition factories. Besides, our railway transportation—and Canada has the highest railway mileage, per capita of population, of any country in the world—and other public utilities which contribute to war-work employed perhaps 200,000 men.

Now, in Europe, all munition workers, all transportation employees are considered as being on active service.

If this be so, then Canada had mobilized for war purposes, altogether 900,000 men; that is one-eighth of our population. While France had mobilized one in every six, England one in ten, Italy one in eleven and Russia one in twenty.

In order to appreciate Canada's splendid military effort, let us compare it with the United States. If Canada mobilized 400,000 men with a population of 7,500,000, the United States, with their population of 112,000,000 would have to recruit 5,600,000 men to equal Canada's proportion. Which fact prompted ex-President Roosevelt to say: "So long as the United States have not sent 5,000,000 men to the front we have not the right to place ourselves on the same footing as Canada in the great struggle which is now being waged for Democracy."

Furthermore I claim that conscription drags Canada into an unreasonable and unreasoning participation in the war; it throws us into an undertaking which is beyond our financial resources, it causes a continuous mobilization of our best men which is out of all proportion, and deprives us of the labour which is absolutely necessary to us if we are to play the economic role which belongs to this country.

More and more the war is becoming an economic problem rather than a struggle exclusively military. This war, which has lasted nearly four years and which threatens to continue just as long, is a war of endurance. More than ever do the words of Lloyd George ring true: "Victory will belong to the last golden sovereign, to the last stack of wheat."

Let us act in such a way as to be really useful to the Allies, and for that purpose, let us strive to maintain our national prosperity which is as important to them as to ourselves. Let us make sure of increased agricultural production. Let us enable ourselves to fulfil our role—a decidedly important one—in the economic effort of the nations leagued against Germany.

In a moment I shall speak of the labour shortage here in Canada. For the present I wish to say a word concerning our financial position.

Canada, as a country, is in the millionaire class, as far as wealth and natural resources are concerned, but she is comparatively money poor. Sir George Paish, reputed the highest authority within the British Empire on matters of political economy, placed the total indebtedness of Canada, just before the war, at $3,000,000,000, or over $400 per capita of population. Of this amount, $300,000,000 represent the increase in the debt during the 50 years preceding. Now, in three and a half years the war has added one billion dollars to our debt, which is three times more than Canada spent during 50 years for public works.

According to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, Canada's war expenditure has reached $875,000,000, and this amount does not include the outlay for pensions and for the interest on the war debt.

At present we pay $78,000,000 interest every year. This is equivalent to more than one half our customs revenue, with the war tax added.

Let us compare once more with the United States: if we presume that the total wealth of the United is 74 times as great as that of Canada, we find that our war expenditure represents an outlay of 80 billion dollars on the part of the United States.

Our railroads, with one exception, are bankrupt.

The Government is forced to impose an income tax, thus establishing direct taxes, a thing hitherto unknown in this country.

And we are forever borrowing. We must find 980 millions to meet our budget requirements for the present year.

Whither are we bound? What sort of future is in store for us, thanks to ourselves?

The war requires sacrifices, very well; but it does not require national suicide. If, in striving to avoid defeat, we ruin the country what will it profit us? Wouldn't it be acting like the man who jumped into the water so he wouldn't get wet in the rain?

Our extravagance is bound to bring reaction. This reaction will come about as surely as it did come in the past. We shall witness the same things over again: the ultra-imperialists of the present day become separatists. When all is said, it was a question of finance which, in 1774, separated the United States from England. And in Canada, after the business crisis which occurred here around 1848 and 1849, there arose an annexationist movement which had as its followers or rather, I should say, its leaders, the English inhabitants, men like Molson, Bleury, Holmes, De Witt, Holton, Abbott.

Amongst those who are eager to send our last man to the firing-line how many are not anxious to survive this last man? Amongst those who are eager to contribute our last cent how many would be willing to sacrifice their parliamentary indemnity to war needs?

They will answer that one must live. Well, the same is true of the nation. Only recently the Montreal Star declared that Canada should throw herself into the war "to the utmost of her strength, both physical and financial." This limit has been reached. It is anti-Canadian and anti-Ally to empty the country and to expend millions in the process. The Prime Minister's own words are an acknowledgment that up to the 4th of April, 1918, conscription had cost the country $1,424,785. It has brought us 30,000 soldiers and 200,000 exemptions as was stated by the Hon. Mr. Carvell. And the Manchester Guardian was justified in its statement of September 8, 1917, that conscription in Canada would not be worth what it would cost.

Let us observe that, due to the cost of clothing, of pay and of transportation charges, 400,000 soldiers cost Canada as much as 2,000,000 soldiers do England or France.

I say that we are making a military and financial effort which is beyond our strength, which is out of all proportion to our wealth and our population; moreover, it is a serious menace to the economic role which is ours by right in this war.

It is evident to every serious-minded and well-informed observer that the organization of our agricultural production is more important, more necessary, more urgent than conscription for the army. What the Allies are shouting for is food. Their cries of distress reach us every day, more and more insistent. At the beginning of March last the Food Controller of Great Britain sent a cable to our own Food Controller, saying that England was sorely in need of all the wheat, all the flour and all the meat that Canada could spare.

This cable announced the establishing of food-rations in England and explained the food situation in the Allied countries. We read in it that: "On March 1, London and its suburbs were put on rations. More than 14,000,000 adults are limited to one and a quarter pounds of meat, four ounces of butter or margarine and one-half pound of sugar per week. After March 25, this ration will be imposed on the entire country."

We all know that a few months back Lord Rhondda, the British Food Controller, made this statement:

"We are doing our very utmost to increase our own production and to reduce consumption, but the first solution of this grave problem is with our American Allies, and with Canada. I feel sure that they will not abandon us."

And elsewhere, the same Lord Rhondda, who seems to know what he is talking about, says:

[Mr. Prévost.]

"My experience of America, both before and since the war, has given the opportunity of appreciating how tremendous are her resources. If they are organized to their full capacity I am confident that the German hope of starving out the Allies or of depressing the people through food shortage and high prices must of necessity be abandoned."

You cannot get away from Lord Rhondda's conclusion: "The most perfect system of distribution and the most equitable regulation of prices would be merely a waste of time and effort unless the necessary steps are taken to maintain the Allies' supplies at a constant level. And that depends, to a vital degree, on the United States and on Canada."

At the very start of the war, the dictator of the British Empire, Mr. Lloyd George, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, sounded to the people of England this salutary warning I quoted a while back: "Victory will belong to the last golden sovereign, to the last stack of wheat."

I happened to read a circular sent out by the Ontario "Organization of Resources Committee". This committee is presided over by Sir John Hendrie, Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario; its vice-presidents are the Prime Minister of the province, Sir W. Hearst, and the former leader of the Opposition, Mr. Rowell, at present a minister in the Borden Cabinet. Amongst the members of this committee we find the names of several of Ontario's most prominent citizens.

In this circular, which is headlined: "A Crisis—Famine is at our Door," we find, amongst other things:

"Since February 1, 1917, more than a million tons of foodstuffs have been destroyed through the torpedoing of numerous vessels. Mr. David Lubin, the United States delegate to the International Institute of Agriculture has just made his official report to Washington in which he states that on the 31st of March last there was a shortage of 150,000,000 bushels of grain for the needs of the world until August, 1917."

"On the 10th of April the president of Armour & Company declared that the United States were well on the way towards a catastrophe if the government did not take immediate steps for the conservation of foodstuffs. Famine, continues the circular "is spreading more and more throughout the whole world. In Ontario, 365,000 acres less were cultivated than in 1915 and the harvest of grain of all kinds fell 27,141,615 bushels, while the vegetable crops gave 21,458,902 bushels less. This food shortage which is being felt the world over is such that there is grave danger of Canada being left without sufficient supply, and even if our production took a decided bound it is out of the question to hope for any improvement in the situation. Even if peace were to come within the year we can still see no bettering of food conditions, since we shall still have to send enormous quantities of food to Europe."

Before the war, France, England and Italy alone, imported each year more than one-half billion bushels of cereals. Next fall they will have to import nearly one billion bushels, according to the War Lecture Bureau, the official bulletin of the Director of Public Information at Ottawa.

The hon. Everett Colby, an assistant of the American Food Administrator, in the course of a speech delivered in Ottawa, a few days ago, said:

" Nine months from now we shall hear the cries of distress coming from the children of France and of Belgium; nine months from now famine will devastate these two countries."

This indicates an extremely serious situation; a situation for which the authorities should prepare.

Almost at the same time Mr. Crerar, the Minister of Agriculture emphasized the seriousness of the situation when he wrote in the Standard: " All the labour available in the country parts is being employed; our extra production must rely chiefly on the labour furnished by the cities."

The Prime Minister himself, Sir Robert Borden, in a recent message published in the bulletin of the Canada Food Board at Ottawa, speaks of how extremely urgent it is for America to feed Europe. Our First Minister declares that the production of foodstuffs in the country must be as great as possible during the present months, or else we will be confronted with a "serious" crisis which threatens us to-day " and the extent of which cannot be overestimated."

Dr. D. W. Robertson of Ottawa, lectured in Montreal, a few weeks ago, on the seriousness of the food crisis, and on the means we should adopt to increase farm production in Canada, both for the feeding of our own population and for the relief of our Allies. Dr. Robertson insisted on the fact that the success of the Allied arms is dependent in great measure on the agricultural production of Canada and the United States, and that the chief cause of the decrease in our agricultural production during the last three years has been the withdrawing of so many workers from the farms, whence they have gone either into the army or into the munition shops. The lecturer showed that, in 1917, France produced only 47 per cent of her normal crops of wheat and potatoes; both she and Italy are suffering from a shortage of wheat, flour and fats. England is no better off, for if she does receive more ood than they, she must divide it with them; England's supply is only 55 per cent of what it was before the war. Even if they limit their imports to what is strictly necessary, the Allies will have to import this year over two million tons, or 40 per cent more than before the war, although the total tonnage of ocean-going vessels has been very much curtailed. Therefore America, this year, must produce more cereals of every description, than she has ever produced before, since the Allies expect to receive from this continent 360,000,000 bushels of cereals over and above the amount of their total yearly imports before the war.

The President of the Council, the Hon. Mr. Rowell, thought he had discovered the solution of our farm labour problem when he said, in the eloquent speech which he delivered in this House, a few days back, that during the war the women of Canada, could and should do what the women of Great Britain and France are doing.

We know of the heroic task accomplished by women on the soil of France; but we know too, that, despite their efforts the agricultural production of France has suffered considerably during the war. The Hon. Mr. Rowell omitted to say so.

An article from the pen of a well-informed writer, published recently in the " New Republic ", shows that the total seed acreage in France was only 8,970,820 hectars, whereas in 1913 it had been 12,580,465; that her crops which amounted, in 1913, to 163,388,000 cwt., reached only 90,174,140 last year.

These figures mean that, notwithstanding the admirable work of the women, children and old men, the soil of France yielded only 55 per cent of its total harvest of 1913.

Here in Canada, harvesting is far more difficult for women than is the case in France, because of the tremendous acreage of our farms and also on account of the climate. In Canada, more than anywhere else, farming is a man's work.

Let us observe also that our country is one of the Allies' chief providers of cereals and foodstuffs. The Allies rely on us to make up what they lack. We must give it to them and at the same time insure the feeding of our own population.

And it is in the face of these crying needs of the Allies and of Canada that the Government brings on its Bill for compulsory military service, which is intended to deprive our country of 100,000 men or more. Still, there is a shortage of farm labour in our country which makes it impossible for us to keep up our agricultural production, while we really have need to double it. In The Agricultural Gazette of Canada, published by the Dominion Department of Agriculture, issue of May, 1917, I find some very important expressions of opinion on the question of farm labour in our country. The Departments of Agriculture in all the different provinces speak of their anxiety anent the shortage of labour on our farms.

Mr. Arthur S. Barnstead, Secretary of the Department of Industries and Immigration, in Nova Scotia, says:

The farm labour problem will assuredly be acute in Nova Scotia this year. Hitherto we have depended largely for extra farm help upon the immigration of agricultural newcomers from Great Britain. The supply of these is of course cut off, and, moreover, thousands of our young farmers are now engaged in military service overseas. Again, the services of many young men which would formerly have been available are now fully engaged in our munition factories and steel works. Thus the present outlook for securing, during the rush seasons, any extra help for our farmers from the usual sources is not encouraging.

Mr. W. A. Riddell, Superintendent of the Trades and Labour Branch, Department of Public Works, Ontario, has this to say:

The need for farm labour in Ontario is quite as acute as it is in any of the provinces. Evidences of this may be seen by such facts as the following:

"We can use 500 farm labourers in our municipality," writes one reeve. The same mail brought an application for a boy in which it was stated: "We could use a carload of boys in this neighbourhood".. .. .. .. With regard to the Americans, there are five men working in the United States at the present time urging men to come to Canada. In some cases their fare is advanced.. .. .. So far the attempt to get men in this way has not been successful, nor the men obtained very satisfactory. The class of men that can be drawn from the United States at the present time for farm labour is rather poor."

Now we come to Mr. E. H. Auld, Deputy Minister of Agriculture and Mr. Thos. M. Molloy, Secretary of the Bureau of Labour, Saskatchewan:

Realizing that a limiting factor in our crop production this year is the shortage of labour a special effort is being made to recruit all available former farmers and farm workers to assist in putting in the crop.. .. .. .. Then special farm labour agents from this province are in the United States.

Mr. H. A. Craig, Deputy Minister of Agriculture in Alberta uses these words:

During the past winter those who were interested in increased agricultural production have been anxious about the evident scarcity of farm labour. Owing to the fact that so many young men from Alberta have enlisted for overseas service, the available supply is much less than the requirements.

It was Mr. Marshall, Minister of Agriculture in Alberta who, at a reunion of all the Dominion's Ministers of Agriculture, at Ottawa, last fall, spoke thus to the Federal authorities:

You cannot satisfy the needs of both militarism and production at one and the same time; you must choose between the two. If what you need is increased agricultural production, then you should leave on the farms those who are already there and further you should attract to the land all those who could be of help in farm work. If, on the other hand, recruiting is the more necessary of the two, then we should enlist in a body and let agriculture go to the dogs. But for the love of God, let their be a choice made right now between these two alternatives and let the Government tell us what they want.

Then we have Mr. William E. Scott, Deputy Minister of Agriculture in British Columbia, telling us that:

The labour question, however, is the great difficulty, and the debarring factor at the present time to increased production. The farmer realizes that it is his patriotic duty to do all he can to increase the supplies of foodstuffs, and would do so, could he secure the necessary labour. It is a very acute question in British Columbia just now, and what is the best solution it is difficult to say.. .. .. They are facing the same situation in the United States, and labour for the farm is also scarce there.

It is not only the farmer who is suffering from scarcity of labour. Our mines, logging camps, mills and industrial works are all complaining that they cannot get the labour that they want for carrying on their work to the fullest extent. It must be remembered that approximately 35,000 men have left this province for overseas service since the war began.

As regards the province of Quebec, I received a short time ago a copy of a resolution adopted by the production engineers and other official agricultural experts, at a convention held recently in Quebec. Here is the purport of this resolution:

Whereas the scarcity of farm labour is becoming more and more acute at the very time when increased production of foodstuffs is most imperative; and

Whereas the Federal Government, through the Canada Food Board, has requested the province of Quebec to increase by 600,000 acres the land already under culture; and

Whereas the military conscription law deprives us every day of a large number of young farmers and of young city men who are able to give effective help to our farmers;

It is hereby moved by Mr. R. A. Rousseau, B.A.S., official agricultural engineer, Seconded by Mr. Georges Bouchard, professor at the School of Agriculture, Ste. Anne de la Pocatière,

And it is unanimously resolved:

That the official agricultural experts, the agricultural representatives of the district, the professors of the agricultural colleges and the travelling agricultural instructors, assembled in convention for the campaign in favour of increased production, this 26th day of March, 1918, urge upon the higher authorities of this country, to enact clearly and effectively, the exemption from military service of every farm worker duly engaged to labour on a farm during the present year.

While lecturing on the labour question, in Saskatchewan, the 26th of February, last year, Mr. R. B. Bennett, then Director of National Service, said what follows:

In all likelihood the scarcity of foodstuffs will be felt more acutely than at present before the next harvest, in Great Britain, in France and in Italy, and as Canada is, of all the Dominions, the least remote from the countries, they naturally turn to us; they see in us their first source of supply.. .. .. The labour shortage is the main obstacle to the accomplishment of these ends, and we intend doing all in our power to improve this situation.

In the presence of this scarcity of farm labour, which is making itself felt everywhere, it is small wonder that the number of acres sown in western Canada, showed, in the four years from 1912 to 1916 an increase of only 1,500,000, while in a single year, from 1910 to 1911, the increase has been 3,500,000.

Every province in the country is crying out for men for the next planting season, and especially for the next harvest. A carefully prepared estimate tells us that the farms need 83,000 men to carry on their ordinary work.

Alberta is asking for 6.000 men for seeding, and 7,000 for the harvest; Saskatchewan, 10,000 for seeding, and 15,000 for harvest; Manitoba, 7,000 for seeding, and 10,000 for harvest; Ontario, 7,500 for seeding, and 12,500 for haying and for getting in the crops, besides 15,000 boys and 5,000 women; Quebec needs several thousand men; New Brunswick, about 2,000; Nova Scotia, 2,500; Prince Edward Island and British Columbia, although suffering less than the other provinces, nevertheless require further hands.

We are shouting famine into the ears of our neighbours in the United States who sent us thousands of men last year. They cannot repeat the effort this year. In this connection let me quote you the important declaration of President Wilson, shortly after the great Republic had declared war on Germany. The first and the most urgent appeal of this statesman was towards the development of industry and agriculture. In a manifesto addressed to his fellow-citizens, Woodrow Wilson said:

Thousands of men, or rather hundreds of thousands, although fit for military service, will, owing to the needs of industry, be rightfully exempted from that service and sent to perform essential and productive work in the fields, the factories and the mines, and they will belong none the less, for all that, to the patriotic forces of the nation, just as much as do our men at the front.

The man who spoke these words is at the head of a nation of 112 million inhabitants; and we, a people of 7 millions, who have already seen 530,000 of our citizens leave our shores; we who are an agricultural people, whose country is rightfully styled the granary of the Empire, we would give no proof of the same prudence, the same foresight.

When we witness the unthinking policy of the Government which persists in mobilizing for the needs of the army the most healthy and most vigourous element of our country we do not wonder that public opinion is beginning to rouse itself all over Canada. We lately saw l'Evénement, a Government organ, reproaching the Government with not exempting young farmers. The English provinces are becoming alarmed over the question of farm labour. Telegrams from New Brunswick and from Ontario speak of meetings of farmers calling upon the Government to considers the necessity of keeping in Canada all young men adapted to work on the land. Toronto informs us that a delegation of 2,500 Ontario farmers is getting ready to come to Ottawa and demand the exemption of all farm workers, from 20 to 23 years of age, who have been called to the colours. I wish to point out that the last delegation of agriculturists which came to Ottawa was from the English farm owners and Anglo-Canadian agricultural experts from the Montreal district. The Toronto Star, a Unionist paper, in its edition of last Saturday, published the following report:

The farmers all through Ontario are taking definite means to force a reconsideration of the recent Order in Council which calls to the colours all the farmers, both freeholders and tenants, or farmers' sons who have never done anything else but cultivate the land. Last night farmers' meetings were held throughout the province and vigorous resolutions were adopted setting forth that the crops and food production in general would suffer if the farmers were forced to rely solely on the help from inexperienced city hands. The principal meetings were held at Brantford, Woodstock, Goderich and Ayr.

The same newspaper informs us that the United Farmers of Ontario intend sending a delegation to Ottawa. So that the policy and the maladministration of this Government have divided the Canadian nation instead of uniting it, as the Unionist Government boasts of having done. The grievous blunders committed by the Government were not resented in Quebec alone, as some people are pleased to claim in certain quarters. The other day, the hon. member for Russell eloquently vindicated Quebec of the attacks that have been made against her; he made triumphant reply to all these criticisms born of the frenzy of unseeing fanatics. Allow me to add just this: The province of Quebec was not the only one to disapprove of the Government's policy; she is not isolated in her opposition to the so-called Unionist Government which has sown the seed of discord in our ranks. An analysis of the vote recorded in the last election will bear this out.

According to the official figures, the Unionist Government holds a majority of 71 seats in this House, since the government has 153 representatives and the Opposition 82. Taking the vote as a whole, province by province, as also the distribution of the ballots cast throughout the whole of Canada, the exorbitant majority of the Unionist Government in this House is not justified. The total vote, both civil and military, was 1,057,793 for the Government, and 763,371 for the Opposition. But these figures do not take into account the election by acclamation (17 in the province of Quebec alone). Taking the number of votes cast for the Opposition in the 48 constituencies of Quebec province where contests were held, and where the Opposition was victorious, in order to establish an average, we find that we must add nearly 70,000 votes to the total of the Opposition if we wish to establish the true relation between the two parties throughout the Dominion.

In this way the total division would be 800,000 votes for the Opposition against 1,000,000 for the Government. This statement is important for the purpose of demonstrating that the Opposition, in Parliament, is not limited to the group from Quebec. It is a fact that, out of a total of 82 members on the Opposition side, Quebec elected 62, which leaves only 20 members from outside our province, but an analysis of the vote throughout the entire country shows that the Liberal group represents a very large number indeed of the voters of this country: outside of the province of Quebec there were 519,940 citizens who voted against the Government.

For instance, in Ontario: the Opposition holds only 8 seats with a vote of 269,093; while the Government, with 515,140 votes, has 74 seats.

That is to say that with a vote considerably less than double the vote accorded the Opposition, the Government is represented in this House in the proportion of 9 to 1. The true proportion of the votes obtained by the Opposition in Ontario is 34 per cent of the total vote cast in that province which, normally, should give us 28 seats while all we have is 8.

In the Western Provinces the total Government vote was 346,935, and the Opposition vote, 153,568. So that the proportion of the Opposition vote in the four western provinces and the Yukon is 31 per cent of the total vote cast; still, out of the 57 representatives that these provinces send to Parliament the Opposition has only 2, while the exact ratio, based on the number of votes obtained, should give us 17 seats.

In Nova Scotia the contradiction is—still more evident. The Government obtained 41,684 votes there and the Opposition, 41,305. But the Government holds 12 seats against the Liberals 4. The Liberals obtained merely 379 votes less than the Conservatives, and still they have only 4 seats, while the Conservatives hold 12. In Saskatchewan, where not one solitary Liberal candidate was elected, the Liberal candidates polled 33,500 votes, or nearly one-third of the total; the Conservatives garnered 81,420.

The province of Alberta elected only one Liberal. At the same time, the Liberal candidates polled 49,920 votes, while the Government candidates got 74,974.

In British Columbia one-half the total vote was cast in favour of Liberal candidates, and still, not a single one of them was elected.

We must deduce from this that, not only is our method of representation altogether unfair, but also—which is most decidely important at the present time—that very, very false are the claims of those who are waging a campaign of ignominy and of slander against the province of Quebec, seeking to make people believe that the opposition to the Unionist Government comes from Quebec alone.

The Government majority in this House is abnormal and nowise represents the real difference of opinion in this country.

I repeat that the province of Quebec is not isolated. The Opposition group in this House, though most of its members come from Quebec province, represents the wishes, reflects the opinion, of 800,000 Canadian voters, of whom 519,940 are from outside Quebec. Now this figure of 519,940 votes, is equal to one-half the total vote cast throughout the Dominion in favour of this Government.

Putting Ontario and Quebec to one side, we find that the voting in the rest of the Dominion resulted as follows: for the Government, 466,639; for the Opposition, 250,847; so that the proportionate percentage of the Opposition vote is 40 per cent of the total.

Now let us glance at the civil vote throughout Canada. On the total of this vote, taken altogether, the Government's plurality is only 97,095 which figure does not take account of the 70,000 votes represented by the 17 acclamations in Quebec.

In a word, out of a total of 1,586,793 votes cast the Opposition polled 744,849, or 47 per cent of the total vote.

Therefore the Opposition group may, and must, stand their ground solidly in this House; the province of Quebec is not isolated from the rest of Canada. The province of Quebec reflects the true Canadian opinion which the Unionists tried to gag and which they succeeded in stifling through that most perfidious enactment, the War-time Elections Act.

Neither is the province of Quebec isolated in its share in the war; and the French-Canadians especially have contributed most generously.

I cannot go into details and give statistics which would carry me too far afield, but I do intend to say that it has been proven, figures in hand, other things being equal, as many soldiers were recruited from the province of Quebec as from any other province. It has been proved that if we compare the Canadian-born enlistments, that is if we take away the British-born from the number of recruits in Ontario and the other provinces, the enlistments in the province of Quebec were proportionate to the enlistments in the province of Ontario and the other provinces.

The "Citizen" of Ottawa, day before yesterday, asks if the opinion of the English-speaking people of the country will not have to be altered with respect to enlistment in Quebec, when they have been informed of the figures recently brought down in the House of Commons concerning the volunteer recruiting of Canadian-born citizens. Out of a total of 197,473 all-Canadian recruits, the province of Quebec made the important contribution of 50,000.

In 1917 Ontario numbered 164,000 recruits, including 118,000 immigrants, which leaves a purely native-born enlistment of 46,000. The province of Quebec numbered 42,000 which figure included 25,000 French Canadians.

It would appear that Ontario with 46,000 native recruits takes precedence over Quebec by 50 per cent; but when we remember:

1. That Ontario has 265,176 males over 21 years of age, which is 114,138 more than Quebec, with only 151,038;

2. That, in the cities of Quebec province there are only 135,000 males between the ages of 17 and 45, whilst among the native-born population of Ontario, there are 395,050, or 260,000 more;

3. That in Ontario the males outnumber the females by 75,000, while in Quebec the difference is only 20,000;

4. That, according to the recent census (page 68, volume III) Ontario has 170,789 workingmen who earned, in 1911, less than $500 per annum, and Quebec (page 76) only 111,852; which leaves in Ontario a majority of 34 per cent among those men of the working class who would feel the spur of poverty and would be led to hope that by enlisting they would better the lot of their families; we realize that, as regards the facilities of volunteer recruiting the equation between 46,000 Ontario citizens and 25,000 French-Canadians is perfect. No native citizen, no matter from what province he has sprung, is entitled to criticize the province of Quebec or to claim that we have not enlisted in just as large proportion as any other group of Canadian-born.

The soil of Flanders and of northern France is saturated with the blood of French-Canadians who have offered their lives on the altar of the Allied cause. At this very moment our compatriots are fighting, and dying, always for the same cause.

Sorrow, mourning and anguish stalk in many of our homes. We should not be insulted, to boot, by hearing that the French-Canadians have not done their duty. They have done their duty generously, heroically, and with more credit than a great many others.

All the others are fighting for their own country, their homes, their families, their interests, their fatherland. The French-Canadians alone are fighting for an idea devoid of all personal interest.

They have no country but Canada, and still, they are fighting and dying three thousand miles away from their own land.

Let us reflect and remember that where a nation takes root is in its burying-ground; it is there, in the cemeteries, that you will find the palpitating heart of a people faithful to the cult of ancestry. It is here that our fathers were born and were buried: they are sleeping their last sleep beneath this Canadian soil where our ancestors have been laid away for the last four hundred years. What other race in this country can say as much?

But while defending the French-Canadians from the unjust attacks which have been launched against them I do not intend to preach a French Canadian doctrine. No, the political doctrine which must guide our country and towards which all our manifestations of national life should converge, should be, first of all, the Canadian doctrine.

We are proud of being British subjects, but we place still higher out title of Canadian citizens.

To give the last man and the last cent to this war is not a Canadian doctrine; it is an imperialist doctrine, an anti-Canadian doctrine.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier, a loyal subject of the British Crown, if ever there were one, and who in the turmoil of the difficult times through which we are passing, represents the true Canadian idea which will survive the present crisis; this statesman whom recent events have placed in history not only as the leader of a party, but the real leader of the Canadian nation; this patriot who is outside of unionism because he is above it, and dominates it, spoke thus in this House on the 24th of July, 1917:

> I would be delighted if we could send more soldiers to General Currie. I wish that our population and our resources would allow of our sending not only half a million but a million men. But the question is how many men can we take from the life of the nation at the present time without imperilling the public services which are essential to this country, and essential to carrying on our share of the war. This is a subject which, in my humble opinion, has not been sufficiently considered by the Government. They went into this war without any previous calculation whatever, without taking any census of our resources in men and in other respects. They asked for 100,000 men, 200,000 men, 300,000 men, 400,000 men, and, at last, for 500,000 men. When they reached the 500,000 figure they were told by several people that they could not get the men. One of the most important captains of industry in this country, Lord Shaughnessy, expressed his opinion in no uncertain terms, that the men could not be got without injury to the public services. But the Government paid no heed to that. They paid no heed to the other consideration, that it is not only men the Allies require at the present time, but food. They paid no heed to the question whether the men could not be better employed in producing food in Canada than in fighting at the front.

It is late, but not too late for the Government to look to itself and moderate recruiting until it has been clearly established, as I said to my constituents. "That after the tremendous effort which we have already accomplished, this recruiting may go on without harm to Canada, or to the Allies, and this can be demonstrated only after a very careful inventory of our local needs, the economic needs of our country, particularly with respect to farm labour, to the interests of industry, the needs of our transportation system, the operating of our mines and other natural resources which will insure our national prosperity."

I believe that I follow the true, the only real Canadian tradition; I believe I am moved by the real national spirit which must reign in this country and unite all our hearts.

To those imperialists who, wittingly or unwittingly, seek to betray the interests of our Canadian land for the interest of the Empire or the Allies, I will always oppose a heart that is adamant, a heart inflamed with one passion, and one only, the passion for Canada.

Glory to our dead who have offered their youth to the sacred cause which we all hold dear: Yes, by all means.

But glory as well to our own dead, at rest amongst us, to the fathers of our Canadian fatherland, to those who have discovered, colonized, developed this country, to those who have won us our liberty, our political autonomy and we have bequeathed to us a constitution, a deed of Canadian nationality which we should strengthen and not endanger.

Leaving to Germany her materialistic and ambitious aims, we have, ourselves, with the Allies, adopted an ideal goal; World Freedom and the Triumph of Right. This war is not between England, France and Germany, it is a war between might and right, between the pride of conquest and the lofty ideal of the equality of nations, between the hidebound spirit of caste; militarism; and the spirit of liberty, democracy.

Let us not fall victims to the evils we are striving to fight and conquer.

Let us first and always, safeguard the interests of Canada. We must not allow outside interests to dominate the politics of our country.

In all patriotism there is a legitimate part of selfishness. Is Canada's patriotism alone to have no "right to live"? We are perfectly willing to help others avoid death, but, before all, we must live ourselves.

In 1774 and in 1812 the French-Canadians took up arms in defence of Canada; they acted on those occasions as true Canadian patriots. They wish to follow the same rule of conduct in 1918, that is, to show themselves "Canadians, first of all."

Our country, I repeat, is Canada. Our patriotism which most decidedly takes cognizance of those great humanitarian principles which exist in the higher realms of all races, all creeds and all lands, our patriotism is first of all Canadian. We desire to do our share in defending liberty and civilization, and we are doing it; but we owe ourselves, before all else, to the defence of our own land first conquered by our fathers, to the defence of the soil which they have bequeathed to us, where they are at rest, and where we ourselves desire to live and die.

Like all people who do honour patriotism, we are bound first and foremost to our own fatherland. It is in that land, and for that land, that we are all willing to perish, if need be, to protect our homes and defend the nation.

Were the enemy ever to invade our territory and try to deprive us of the heritage bequeathed us by our ancestors, like the patriots of all times, just as the people of Carthage, in their supreme struggle gave their gold, made ships from the wood of their houses and rigging from the tresses of their women, we will give all for love of our country and, this time, it will be a sacred duty for us to contribute our last man and our last cent, since we will be acting in defence of our native soil, the land of our forefathers.

I would advise those who consider my words too Canadian and not sufficiently imperialistic to turn their gaze upon the escutcheon of the British Crown which has used French speech for centuries and which is entitled to exclaim with the authority of ages: "Honi soit qui mal y pense. Dieu et mon Droit."

PRIVATE BILLS.

TORONTO, NIAGARA AND WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

On the motion for third reading of Bill No. 37, respecting the Toronto, Niagara and Western Railway Company.—Mr. Morphy.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Stand.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: Is there any question about this Bill?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understand that some documents were to be supplied.

Mr. CURRIE: The Minister of Railways and I had a talk about it this afternoon, and he has not yet received the information that is needed.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stand.

THE CANADIAN NIAGARA BRIDGE COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill No. 43, to incorporate the Canadian Niagara Bridge Company—Mr. Stewart—Mr. Currie in the Chair.

On section 10—consent of Municipalities.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Currie): An amendment has been added to this section as follows:

(2.) The Company shall not construct or operate any of the works mentioned in Section 8 of this Act upon or over the boulevard of the Queen Victoria Niagara Falls Park Commission without first obtaining the consent in writing of the Commissioners of the Queen Victoria Niagara Falls Park upon terms to be agreed upon with the said Commissioners, and failing such consent then upon such terms as are fixed by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada.

That was agreed to by all parties concerned.

Section agreed to.

On section 17—amalgamated Company may borrow money and mortgage property.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Currie): There is an amendment to this clause, to the effect that the borrowing powers are not to exceed eight million dollars.

Mr. McKENZIE: Before you report the Bill, I note it contains a provision that the undertaking is "for the general advantage of Canada." I am not familiar with the terms of the Bill. Perhaps the promoter will explain.

Mr. STEWART: It is the usual clause which appears in all Bills of this nature. This is a bridge across the Niagara river, accommodating the United States as well as Canada, and in addition to the railway a roadway is provided for passengers and vehicles.

Mr. McKENZIE: Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that is an international bridge?

Mr. STEWART: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: If it is, that is quite satisfactory to me.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

THE DYNAMIC BALANCING MACHINE COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill No. 58, respecting certain patents of The Dynamic Balancing Machine Company.—Mr. Fripp.

On Section 2—Certain rights saved.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Currie): This clause is struck out.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

GOSPEL WORKERS CHURCH IN CANADA.

House in committee on Bill No. 59, to incorporate the Gospel Workers Church in Canada.—Mr. Middlebro.

On section 4—First General Conference.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Currie): A subclause has been added providing that the head offices shall be at Thornbury, Ontario.

Section agreed to.

On Section 5—Power to acquire property:

Mr. LEMIEUX: I suppose these are the usual powers?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Currie): The section has been amended.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Currie): The proviso that "the annual value of real estate which the Church may possess in any one municipality shall not exceed the sum of twenty thousand dollars" has been amended as follows:

Provided that the value of real estate which the Church may possess in any one municipality shall not exceed the sum of two hundred thousand dollars.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

FRASER LUMBER COMPANY, LIMITED.

On motion of Mr. Elkin, the amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 9, respecting Fraser Lumber Company, Limited, and Fraser Companies, Limited, was read the first and second times and concurred in.

THE BUDGET.

The debate on the Budget was resumed.

Mr. JOHN A. MAHARG (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, before commencing to discuss the Budget, I should like to refer to the few remarks that the hon. member for Toronto Centre (Mr. Bristol) directed at the farmers of Western Canada in particular. I am sorry the hon. gentleman is not in his seat, I would have been better pleased if he had been. I am at a loss to understand why hon. members, particularly those from the cities, have to be continuously referring to the position of the farmers. I have not heard the farmers or their representatives speaking in a similar fashion in regard to them. This reference to the farmers seems to come particularly from those who have a protectionist argument to advance. They seem to use the assumed prosperity of the western farmers as an argument why they should not be asking for more tariff reductions. If the farmers or their representatives so desired, they could use the very same argument in regard to those gentlemen. We could find it easy to do as they have done, to refer to automobiles, men of means and leisure and so forth, and we could go further; we could speak of limousines. There are many other things that we might use for our argument. But if you, Sir, will permit me to use the expression, that is not our style, we do not resort to that kind of argument to bolster up anything we wish to say; if we cannot tackle a question fairly and squarely from an economic standpoint and make our case good, then we are prepared to leave it absolutely alone. The hon. member said that the farmers should be prepared to pay a fair share of the tax. The farmers are prepared to pay their fair share of the tax. The farmers were the first class of people in Canada to ask that the income tax, which is now being so heavily imposed, should be levied. That request is and has been for a number of years a plank in their platform. What they, however, do object to paying, is a tax where for every dollar that goes into the public treasury, anywhere from two dollars to four dollars go into the pockets of private individuals or private interests. We do object to paying a tax in that way.

The hon. gentleman referred to the Saskatchewan farmers as men of leisure. He said: They keep no stock; they buy condensed milk. He made a number of equally absurd statements. I would advise the hon. gentleman, before he attempts to make another display of his supposed knowledge, to take the statistics of the western provinces, compare them with similar statistics of the eastern provinces, and I think he will not make as big a blunder and exhibit such a lack of knowledge of conditions outside of his own little sphere as he did in this House to-day. It is said that the smallest place in which a man can possibly live is within himself, and I am afraid that the hon. member for Toronto Centre is a very close inhabitant of that particular place.

He referred to the western farmers as all having automobiles. There are between 130,000 and 140,000 farmers in the province of Saskatchewan alone. The number of automobile licenses taken out last year in that province was a trifle over 30,000, nearly 20,000 of which, or possibly just a little more, were owned in the cities and towns. Consequently 10,000, out of 140,000 or so of western farmers, possessed automobiles. The hon. member might have looked up the statistics along that line. He also referred to the farmers as having to build gymnasiums on their farms so that they might take exercise. The waistline is a very good indication of the amount of exercise that a man takes, and I think if the hon. gentleman will go to the trouble of sizing up a few of the western farmers represented here to-night, he will find out that he is mistaken. I myself am probably about as corpulent as any of them, but up to the present I have found no difficulty in seeing my toes, neither have the rest of our friends.

The western farmers do not provide as much merriment for the boys when they come into the cities. The boys do not go up to the western farmer and ask him to get out and not be hiding behind that barrel as they do with some of our city friends. It is a common expression of the boys at least in some of the cities I have visited, when they see some of those gentlemen coming along the street, to ask them: "Why are you always hiding behind that barrel?" I am free to admit that the farmers of western Canada are in a better position now than they were a few years ago and if that were not the case, very few of them would remain on the farm. If they are prosperous, it cannot be said of them as was said by a Toronto editor of the manufacturers of eastern Canada, that their prosperity is ninety-five per cent due to protection and five per cent due to brains. For the farmers have had no protection whatever; they do not want it; they absolutely refused it when it was offered them. They were offered protection on their products going into the markets of the Old Country but they said: No, we will have nothing whatever to do with protection, we are prepared to sell our products in the open markets of the world, and if we cannot meet the competition there we will switch to another product on which we can compete in those markets; we will not ask for protection to enable us to live on the labour of others. There are, in my judgment, only two ways of securing wealth; either produce it yourself, or take it from the fellow who has produced it, and we believe in producing it ourselves.

I must congratulate the Acting Minister of Finance on the fearlessness he displayed in his Budget. I may criticise him a little, but it will be for sins of omission rather than for sins of commission. I also wish to congratulate the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Redman) on his remarks the other evening. I might be tempted to say he stole my thunder, but I will not. I am very pleased indeed to know that the young men of Canada, particularlyy of western Canada, are alive to the situation that confronts us at the present time as it is only by facing it squarely that we shall be able so to guide the destinies of this country as to escape the dangerous shoals. The only criticism I have to make of his remarks is that he might have gone a little further, and so should the Acting Minister of Finance. I do not see why the Income Tax should not be applied to smaller incomes than $1,000. There are thousands of young men in Canada, at all events in western Canada, who are earning higher wages to-day than they ever did before; thousands of them are working on the farm for from $600 to $800 a year, and found. That leaves a farm labourer with a nice sum at the end of the year, and I can see no reason why the tax should not be applied to such an income. I would not suggest that the same rate of taxation be applied, but a moderate tax. The minister has seen fit to tax the necessities of life of every one of us, so why should he not apply the Income Tax to all incomes, putting a moderate tax on the moderate income?

The Acting Minister of Finance referred to the taxes on household articles as a tax on luxuries, but I cannot quite agree that tea, coffee, and tobacco, if you will—I never use it myself—can be termed luxuries. But if they are luxuries, what shall we say about silks and satins and fine furs and other expensive articles of clothing? Surely these must be luxuries too.

I was disappointed at not finding in the Budget any provision for giving assistance or encouragement in any way to agricultural production. We had thought the minister would have seen his way clear to give us at least a little encouragement along that line, but the Budget proposals will have the very opposite effect. That may seem a little strange, but it is nevertheless true. Automobiles, for instance, are considered luxuries by the Acting Minister of Finance and are taxed. Now there are certain types of automobile that can be called luxuries, but there is another type the lower-priced car, which, so far as Western Canada is concerned, when we take into consideration the shortage of labour, the great distance some of the farmers live from town and a number of other considerations, are almost a necessity on the farm. Very many of our farmers in order to reach town have to travel from thirty to sixty miles, yet—labour being very scarce they have to put in every possible hour they can on the farm. I have in mind one particular district where there is a settlement of six or seven thousand farmers who are an average of thirty-seven and a half miles from market. Now if any class of our population requires assistance surely it is those people. But the minister in his wisdom, or otherwise, has seen fit to tax every class of automobile. I have no objection whatever to the tax on the higher-priced cars which can properly be considered luxuries, but I repeat, the lower-priced car running from $600 to $800 is almost a necessity on the farm; and when we take into consideration the price of harness, vehicles, horses and of hay and grain for feed, it is almost an economy to purchase an automobile, altogether apart from the great saving in time. These farmers who have to drive anywhere from twenty-five to sixty miles, take two to three days to make the journey with a horse without any load at all, and from two to four days with a load. The district I have in mind was settled six to ten years ago. A number of the settlers have been in there ten years, they went in expecting a railroad would be built. A line was projected, and the assurance given that it would be built, but up to the present time they have no railway and they are almost isolated. These people have done everything in their power to have a railway built. They have gone to the extent of getting a competent engineer and surveying the road at great expense. They put their case before the powers that be. But there was nothing doing. They went back again to their people, organized themselves from one end of the country to the other and then came back with another proposition that they were prepared to build the entire grade of the line absolutely free of cost. Up to the present time that offer has not been accepted. They came back still again and said that they would furnish the labour to lay the steel if the railway company would build the line. But they have not received much encouragement yet.

Where people have been so liberal in their offers of free labour, it seems a pity that the Government cannot devise some means of assisting them in the matter of transportation. They are living in as fine a strip of country as you can find anywhere. They are producing very little, simply for the reason that they cannot do it. The distances are too great for them to haul their grain in the winter time; consequently, when they are drawing their grain in the summer, the land is left and the result is that production in that part of the country does not amount to very much. If the Government in their greater production campaign could see their way clear to give these people that necessary assistance, it would increase production there to a degree that cannot be duplicated in any other part of Canada.

Then, speaking of the automobile in another direction, I would like to ask the minister why he is going to penalize the man who has yet to purchase a car and apply no tax whatever to those who have already secured their cars? Why would it not be far more equitable, if you are going to charge a man who has yet to purchase his car, anywhere from $75 to $300, to require those who already have their cars to pay an annual tax into the Dominion treasury? They are paying now into the provincial treasury. I cannot say whether this is feasible or not, but if it is I would have no hesitation in recommending that steps be taken along that line. Personally, it would affect me just about as much as any other citizen, as being a farmer, I have two cars, one for trucking produce and the other a family car. Therefore, I would at least be taxed as much as the average person.

But there is yet another use for the lower-priced car to which I would ask the minister's attention. They are being largely used in Western Canada as tractors for doing farm labour. We have an attachment now in the West for use on the lighter-powered cars, and they are working out a process of putting them on the higher-powered cars as well. For about $240 you can secure an attachment by which, in about twenty minutes, you can transfer your touring car into a tractor. It has been demonstrated time and again—I have seen it myself,—that it will do as much work and pull as great a load as is claimed for the much-talked of Ford tractor that they are introducing into this country now. The minister said the other day that this tax did not apply to truck or delivery cars. There are thousands of those lighter cars in western Canada that are changed into trucks of one kind or another; they are bought as cars but are changed later. Most of the trucks that are turned out from the factories are more useful for town delivery and such work, but the car that is largely used for working in the country is the runabout that has been purchased and afterwards changed by the person who has purchased it. We have hundreds of those cars working in Saskatchewan now, and I expect there will be several hundred more of them in operation before this season is over. I think the minister might make an allowance in the tax that would be paid on these cars, depending upon the classification which might be put upon them, distinguishing between utility cars and cars of a more luxurious class. The utility or working car is an absolute necessity as far as Western Canada is concerned, but I would not say that the other was. We could get along without the higher-priced car, and those who are able to purchase it, I think, might well make up the difference in the amount that would be lost in the levy by permitting the lower-priced car to go free of any duty or excise tax.

The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Blake) made a reference or two to the farmers. He seemed to have an idea that the income tax was not going to affect the farmer the same as other people, and he was of the opinion that the farmer could get along with much less income than could other people. There may be something in his argument. I agree entirely with his suggestion that the minister levy a straight tax on land values. We have been advocating that in western Canada for years and we have practiced what we have been preaching. We have had a straight land tax in the rural districts for the last twenty-three or twenty-four years and we have seen no reason for changing it yet. But the hon. member for North Winnipeg makes no suggestion whatever that would affect those who have an income of less than $2,000 and who have no land to apply this land tax to. His constituents largely, or probably almost entirely, are city dwellers. We are quite used, of course, to that. All kinds of suggestions are being made by the city residents and representatives as to ways and means of taxing the agriculturists. Just the moment that he begins to get his head a little above water there is some one in close proximity with a club ready to drive him under again. That is the reason, Mr. Speaker, why the farmers have decided that they will have at least a few representatives of their own in Parliament to state their case on the floor of the House. We have a few of them from western Canada. From the province that I represent, out of sixteen members, there are thirteen or fourteen that are actual farmers—not buckboard farmers at all, but actual farmers living on the soil and carrying blisters on their hands. If you do not believe me come to rooms 116 and 117 some day and I will demonstrate to you that they are the horny-handed, sunburned sons of toil.

An hon. MEMBER: Room 216.

Mr. MAHARG: Did I say 116? I am sorry; it should be rooms 216 and 217. I do not want to get into room 117. I would not want to make any predictions as to what would be found there, but as to the occupants of the other two rooms I am well posted.

For the benefit of those who are championing the cause of the eastern manufacturers, I may say that we are not quarreling with them at the present time. We have not asked for tariff reductions, as such, since we came here. Any of us who have spoken on that subject have spoken of it as a war measure, a temporary means for the increase of production. If, after the war is over, the Government considers that a reduction of the tariff is not warranted, well and good; but our argument is that nothing should be left undone that can be done at the present time to encourage production in all lines. There are many things that can be done, but for the benefit of the member for North Winnipeg I made a suggestion a little while ago. I referred in particular to the farm labourer, but I think it would apply equally to the labourer in the city. In case the hon. gentleman was not in the Chamber at the time, I would say for his information that I would propose a lowering of the minimum amount of the income to which the tax should apply. Probably it might be made $300 lower. I do not think any serious hardship would result. The hon. gentleman referred to farmers as not being bookkeepers. How many of them, he asked, keep books? For his information I would say that there is not the incentive to the farmer to keep books that there is for those engaged in other occupations, because he is not one who furnishes credit. If there is any credit insofar as the farmer is concerned it works the other way; he is generally the debtor and not the creditor, consequently he has not the necessity for keeping books, and he has not the other incentive that some other business concerns have for keeping books either; he has nothing to gain by cooking accounts, by watering stock, or doing any of those things that are so skilfully manipulated by bookkeeping. He has nothing to gain by that even if he wanted to; so his books are honestly kept. But for the hon. gentleman's information I would say that there are thousands of our farmers who do keep books, and I venture to state they keep them as systematically probably as the men in his own profession. We have farmers who are quite capable of doing that. I keep a slight record myself, and I know just about where I stand. I never had any university education or academic training, but I know that two and two make four, and it is a matter of addition, multiplication, subtraction and division; that is all there is to it. If you do your book-keeping honestly, there is no scheming or hidden secrets whatever in connection with it.

The hon. gentleman also referred to the prices that the farmers are getting for their grain; $2.21 for wheat, $20 to $21 or something like that for pork, eggs, butter and other products in the same proportion. The hon. gentleman has quoted those prices correctly, but they are for a No. 1 article. You have got to produce the goods, Mr. Speaker, before you get those prices. I venture to say that if there were fixed prices for the services performed by the members of some of the other professions, and they had to produce a No. 1 article, or give a No. 1 result, possibly they might see where the farmer comes off sometimes when a hail storm strikes him, or frost or rust blights his crop. Then probably they would have a better idea of what it means to produce No. 1 articles. Possibly, also, it might have some effect on their income, just as it has on the income of the farmers, and that in a great many cases their incomes might probably come within the category of those that escape taxation.

The hon. gentleman also said that the farmers are making money faster than they ever did before, and in the very next breath he said there are very few of them that are making $2,000 right now, that is, who have got incomes of $2,000 a year. Now if they are keeping their families on $2,000 a year, and if they are making money faster than they ever did before, I would ask the hon. gentleman what must the position have been of those people a few years ago. As I stated a minute ago, the farmers have a good representation in this House now, a quite sufficient representation to be very effective along any particular lines that they wish to pursue. But, Mr. Speaker, this Government was elected to win the war. That was the chief purpose for which they were returned to power, and in so far as the farmers of western Canada are concerned they are prepared to assist the Government in every way to win the war. It has been said that there was an agreement between the two parties, before the Union Government was formed, that the tariff would be left in abeyance during the duration of the war. It is hard for me to believe that any group of men would enter into an arrangement whereby the fiscal policy of the country would be left in abeyance for an indefinite period of time. Personally, I cannot conceive of such a thing. Such an arrangement may have been entered into, but I am very doubtful of it. To go further: Some of the eastern papers, I think certainly some of the Toronto papers, have said that the western members were pledged to support the Government through thick and thin. Well, I cannot speak for all the western members but I think I can speak for some of them and I can speak for myself, and, so far as I am concerned personally, there is no arrangement, no agreement, no understanding, either written, spoken, or implied, of that nature. And I know of a number of other western members who are in exactly the same position. They may speak for themselves a little later on. Nevertheless we are prepared to give this Government every assistance, and just as loyal assistance as though we were pledged.

But there are differences of opinion as to what should be done. I may think that it would be essential to deal with the tariff to assist in winning this war. A number of us are of that opinion. But we have been told recently that it is not a question of food production, but a question of men. Well, time will tell. We had the figures given us, and it looked as though that was the situation. Every person seems to be of that opinion. But it is difficult to understand why conditions should change so rapidly. We suppose that those in charge of our affairs nationally and internationally have a fair perspective of what may be expected at least a few months ahead, and it is only a few short months since we were told that production was paramount. Now, production apparently is being left in the background, and the cry is for men. As I said, time will tell. We from western Canada will give this Union Government every opportunity to make good, if you will pardon the use of that term. We will give them every opportunity and assistance, but we are not prepared to take their say-so for everything for an indefinite length of time. We will use our own common, horse sense acquired during the years we have followed rural occupations, and there may come a time when we will ask the members of the Government at least for a little more information than we have so far asked for. It will not be more than a year, probably six or eight months, until there will be another session of Parliament. In the meantime we will keep our ears close to the ground, and will use what little intelligence we have, and when we come back here we may have something to say. That is the western viewpoint and it may be stated a little plainer, than it has yet been stated this session.

As I said, the western people were prepared to give this Government every assistance. We buried our economic views entirely last December. We have not changed our views at all—not at all. Our economic views have not been changed, at least in one direction, in fact war conditions have intensified them, and we are more convinced now that the views held by western Canada for the last few years have been economically sound. They are being gradually adopted by this Parliament, one after another; and if this keeps on it will only be a matter of a few years until Parliament will have swallowed holus-bolus that platform propounded in 1910.

The people of our country are probably just a little different from those of eastern Canada; they may see things from a different viewpoint. This was fairly well demonstrated during the visit of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to western Canada last December. A demonstration was given then as to the spirit and feeling of the western people. I do not think any politician or statesman or any other man ever had a greater reception in western Canada than did the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In all the cities the people who went to hear him could not be accommodated. The churches and halls in which the meetings were held were crowded, and overflow meetings had to be arranged. To the eastern mind, and possibly to the leader himself, things looked very hopeful for a Liberal victory in western Canada. But we who were on the ground knew differently.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If I may be permitted, I may tell the hon. gentleman
10 p.m. that the leader of the Opposition acknowledged that the receptions were most cordial and enthusiastic, but he never entertained the illusion, in view of the War-time Elections Act, that he could rally the West for his party.

Mr. MAHARG: Since the hon. gentleman has mentioned the War-time Elections Act, I might say that, so far as the results in western Canada are concerned, that Act cut a very, very small figure. Hon. members from western Canada know that, and I will make bold to say that had the War-time Elections Act never been placed on the statute books the result in western Canada would have been very similar to what it is at the present time. I venture to say that that Act drove probably as many votes away from the Unionist candidates as the Act itself drove away by disfranchisement. I know whereof I speak. The War-time Elections Act gained no sympathy in western Canada, not a bit. I have no sympathy with it, and never had. It never was necessary in so far as western Canada is concerned. She has shown her patriotism; she has been loyal. The protectionists of the East charged us a few years ago with being annexationists and traitors. If that was so, the West has redeemed herself—she never needed to redeem herself, for she has shown continuously that there is no more loyal part of Canada than the western plains. And in so far as the West is concerned, you can take your War time Elections Act off the books any time you like. If it is necessary to rally in order to win this war, western Canada will be found there every time "with the goods," as the saying is, and as she always has been. Take her patriotic efforts, if you like: We have a very large foreign population, particularly in the province of Saskatchewan, but take that foreign population out of Saskatchewan, and there is not a province in Canada which has contributed as much per capita as Saskatchewan has, and I think the other prairie provinces have done about as well. It used to rile us somewhat some years ago when they commenced talking about our unpatriotic attitude; but practically all the things we have advocated have been done. We have our free wheat, and a lot of other things, and there is not a word about it.

But, Mr. Speaker, I must not depart from the Budget too far, although it seems to be quite the order of the day to go anywhere you like, and not even to mention the Budget at all. I do not want to get too far away. Coming back to what I was saying when the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) interposed, I was referring to the reception given to Sir Wilfrid Laurier as illustrating the spirit of our people. They talked about us a few years ago as being a bunch of Grits; everybody was a Grit out there. For the information of this House, I want to say that we have no Grits now, or very few of them, and no Conservatives, or, if any, very few. We do not recognize the old terms "Grit" and "Tory." We regard the issue before the people, and act accordingly; we do not care what it is. That is why I say that western Canada in the meantime will be keeping her ear close to the ground to hear what is going on. If anything requires mentioning, she will not be backward in making herself heard when the proper time comes.

This Budget is designed to take care of our debt. During this war we have been piling up a national debt the extent of which is indeed becoming alarming. Several changes will have to be made in our policies if we are to meet the commitments that we have undertaken during the last few years. It is simply a question of development. In every province we have the natural resources, but the difficulty is that they have been largely dissipated; they have fallen into the hands of private ownership, and we are not receiving the benefit from them that we should. I am glad that the minister has taken steps to take into the Treasury at least a portion of the profits made by some of these industries; I wish him Godspeed, and suggest that he go a little further. In western Canada you can apply income tax as severely as you like, so long as it is fairly and equitably administered. We stand for that, and have always stood for it. We stand for the direct land tax, have always stood for it, and are prepared to bear our share of it at any time.

As I say, in order to meet our commitments we should see to the development of our natural resources. The western plains are possibly a field easier of development than any which may be found in the other provinces. We have there very large areas of uncultivated land which is owned or held in trust by the Government. The prosperity of our country for some time to come will depend largely on the production of the western plains. True, we have other resources, but it takes time to develop mineral or timber resources. On the plains it is different; the resources of that part of the country can in twelve months be converted into productive activities, and the Government should look around and see whether something cannot be done in that respect. Millions of acres of land out there, held by private corporations—railway companies and land companies—have been lying idle for years, do not produce anything, and are a detriment to the country because they retard development and education. The Government could do nothing better than devise some means whereby this land could be brought under cultivation; that is the quickest way of producing revenue. The people of the western country have initiative; they are prepared to go ahead. If you take our labourers from us, we will simply increase our man-power, as we have been doing for the last ten or twelve years. Most of the people who went to western Canada were accustomed to driving one, two or three horses—we see it done often down here yet. But they have gradually developed until in the West to-day it is not uncommon to see a man driving eight horses on an ordinary farm implement—and they will continue increasing their man-power indefinitely by the addition of more up-to-date machinery, and the like. The western plains, therefore, offer a field which, for immediate results, cannot be duplicated in any other place.

In western Canada large acreages of what are known as school lands are held by the Dominion Government in trust, as it were, for the assistance of education in the provinces. A great demand for that land exists all over the country; people are anxious to cultivate it; they are prepared to take the chance, expensive as it is, of bringing that land under cultivation if the Government would only make it available to them. I have done all I can to persuade the Government to throw that land open for cultivation. Large acreages are being put up for sale, but hundreds of thousands of acres are not being sold, notwithstanding the demand that is being made for them. I have had numerous inquiries in this respect from people in my constituency. I have had inquiries from men who are prepared to break an entire section of this land, 640 acres, during the month of June and bring it under cultivation next year. One gentleman who wrote to me has a large engine and twelve horses ready to start to break up one of these sections any day; another has sixteen horses ready to engage in similar work. Numerous others are anxious to cultivate sections of this land, but our Government says: no, you cannot do it. The only excuse I have so far been able to get from the Government for their attitude in this respect is their fear that the land will become infested with weeds. Weeds will grow on it anyway; they have been there for years. Whenever the land is cultivated, weeds will grow upon it; we are not worrying about that. Weeds have produced better farmers and more of them in western Canada than all the work that has been done by the Department of Agriculture, either of the Dominion or of any of the provinces. Weeds will tell you what to do; you do not have to go to the experimental farms for advice. You either look after them, or they put you on the road. Even if there was a danger, we might better have the difficulty of eradicating a few weeds than have the blot on our nation that we refused to allow this land to be put under cultivation when millions of people were starving. The policy of the Government in this respect is a most short-sighted one, and I can see no excuse whatever for the position which they take.

The member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) during the course of his remarks the other night, congratulated the Acting Minister of Finance, and then entered into a tirade of high-protection talk. I have no quarrel with him in so far as his high protection talk goes, he can speak as much as he likes. But I do object when he commences to speak about the farmers as he did. I shall not attempt to deal with his argument at all. In fact, to my mind, he did not advance any argument whatever further than that as, in his opinion, the farmers were prosperous, they should be satisfied to continue paying the duty into the packets of the manufacturers. That seems to be the argumentative stock in trade of those gentlemen.

I should like to refer to one remark my hon. friend made in regard to the basis the manufacturers took for fixing the prices for their goods. I am prepared to agree with him that the cost of production should be the basis, but only in so far as an industry is a suitable industry for the location in which it is being carried on. To carry his argument to its logical conclusion I might just as well advance the argument that, if I as a farmer should start growing sweet potatoes or oranges in western Canada, the Government should protect me in order that I might be able to take the cost of producing those articles of food as a basis on which to fix the prices which the consumer will have to pay for them. If there is in any country any industry that cannot stand on its own feet, there is something wrong; either it is in the wrong country, or there is mismanagement. Possibly the editorial columns of a Toronto paper describes the case properly. A location may be a proper place for an industry, provided the management is one hundred per cent brains instead of five.

The hon. member also to some extent enlightened me on what he had been basing the prosperity of the western farmers. He said that he was a farmer, and that he had made a certain amount of money from his farm. He also stated that he valued a dollar that he made off that farm twice as highly as a dollar that he made anywhere else. Probably he is of the opinion that the same thing applies to the western farmers —that when they make a dollar on the farm it is equal to two dollars, or three dollars, or four dollars. That may be where he gets his ideas of the untold wealth of the western farmers. He further stated that the removal of the duty would not increase production. The hon. gentleman no doubt is wise in his day. According to his address here he would lead us to believe that he was a walking encyclopaedia, but there are a few of us who have spent from twenty-five to forty years in western Canada, who have just about as good an idea as the hon. gentleman from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) himself as to what will increase production in western Canada, and we have no hesitation whatever in saying that the removal of the duty will enormously increase production in that part of the country. We are not, however, holding out for that. If production is not as essential as it appeared to be six months ago, all well and good, but if a time should come again when production is absolutely essential, then we shall at least advise the Government as to what we think should be done in regard to increased production.

I just want to refer briefly to a little piece of poetry which the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) gave to the House, and which was afterwards added to by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson). With your permission, Sir, I should like, before sitting down, to offer a further contribution in the hope that when Hansard is completed we may be able to select from it a volume which even the most fastidious collector would desire to have on his bookshelves. In order to make the matter intelligent, so that hon. members will understand it, I think I had better quote the poetry from the beginning. By the way, I was just going to say that apparently some of the legislation that the Union Government has been passing is at least very productive of some things, possibly the season of the year may have something to do with the case—we usually have in the spring a number of budding poets. The hon. member for Brome started out something like this:

> The clock we have pushed forward
> For gardening after tea;
> But as for farming implements—
> We can't admit THEM free.

Then the hon. member for Springfield added this contribution:

> In his celebrated platform
> Of eighteen ninety-three,
> Upon which he was returned to power,
> Farm implements were free.
>
> But when, later on, the tariff
> Was brought down by Lauri-ee,
> The combine was on top again
> And the farmer up a tree!

I have a little further contribution that was handed to me by another spring poet. I wish the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) were here so that he would have the benefit of listening to the poetry being spoken instead of having to read it in Hansard. My contribution runs in this fashion:

> We are told that the farmer is now up a tree
> In regard to his implements coming in free;
> But that tree is now pulpwood, and between you and me,
> The High Priests of Protection will soon be at sea.

Mr. H. A. FORTIER (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, at this very important stage of the session when the Budget is under discussion, I rise to express my personal opinion on the policy of the Government concerning the war. It seems to me that the Government does not fully realize the actual condition of the war and deliberately refuses to meet the obligations which are evidently imposed upon this country. The great task of the hour, that our full and effective participation in the war requires us to perform, is to give immediate assistance to the millions of soldiers at the front and to the people of the mother country who are on the verge of starvation. Since the beginning of the war I have stood with those who believe that Canada should do her utmost to keep the British flag flying. It is not necessary for me to recall the fact that since 1912 I have had the honour of being a member of the Quebec legislature, and during the progress of the war I have given my hearty support to the Gouin Government in everything it has done to help the mother country and the Allies. Not only have I done that, but in 1915 in our district, the district of Ottawa, I had the honour of organizing an important committee of relief, the presidency of which was conferred upon me.

I shall stand in this House against any measure of conscription, and I think I may be permitted to say I am close to the heart and soul of my fellow-countrymen in the province of Quebec. I was elected as an anti-conscriptionist, and I am more and more convinced every day that the voluntary system would have produced better results than conscription. I am more confident than ever that the greatest contribution we could make to the Mother Country and the Allies is an increased food production. In fact, we have been told by this Government since this session began, and before, that the paramount duty of the moment is increased food production. The Prime Minister himself said on the 19th of March last:

> I cannot emphasize too strongly the absolute, urgent and vital necessity of increased food production in Canada during this year and next year. I absolutely agree with what my right hon. friend said a moment ago that the issue of this war may depend upon food production in the United States and in Canada.

It is of vital importance that we should increase the production of food in this country as upon the production of food the issue of this war may depend. The Prime Minister in his message sent out to the four corners of Canada said:

> The campaign for increased production of foodstuffs now launched by the Canadian Food Board is of the most vital importance to the victory of the Allied cause. Because of our geographical position, the United Kingdom and the Allied Nations are depending on Canada for food as never before. Specific suggestions will be issued from time to time by the Canada Food Board for the guidance of the people; and it is the earnest hope of the Government that every citizen will realize his or her personal individual duty to adopt and carry out these suggestions. Mere perfunctory observance will not be enough; the crisis is grave and urgent beyond possibility of exaggeration; and it will only be through an earnest sense of individual responsibility that Canadians will be able in this matter to honour their obligations to their heroic soldiers overseas, who are defending our liberties at a cost beside which any personal inconvenience or discomfort on our part is insignificant.

R. L. BORDEN.

But that is only one of the appeals which have been made to the people of Canada. Other appeals have come from the other side of the ocean. Only a few days ago the British Food Controller appealed to our people in these words:

In these stern days it is inspiring to learn that Canada is tackling the food problem with redoubled energy. The terrific pressure on our military front makes it all the more imperative that those behind the lines shall strain every nerve to defeat the enemy's avowed object of destroying the British Empire.

Germany hoped first to starve the Old Country by the submarine campaign, and then to smash her land forces. She has failed to starve us and she will fail to smash us, but we cannot achieve victory without food. There never was a time when it was more needed.

The Canadian farmer and Canadian farmhand now have the opportunity to make an effective reply to the enemy's present onslaught, by bending their undivided energies to the increased production of those food supplies, for which we depend to such vital extent upon your great Dominion.

That is not all; we have been told by our own Food Controller in his last report, dated the 18th March, that food production is vital. On page 15 of that report he says:

When I accepted office as Food Controller I studied the situation very carefully and very seriously. I was guided not only by the knowledge of others in Canada whom I called into council, but by experience in Great Britain and by the attitude of Mr. H. C. Hoover, Food Administrator for the United States, whose qualifications for the part he fills are admittedly very high. I came to the conclusion that several things were essential, and my policy throughout has been based upon the consideration involved:

1. To stimulate production—to speed it up to highest limit. The need of increased production are based not so much upon our own home requirements, as upon those of the Allies. If the people of France and Italy starve (and they are on the verge of starvation), and if their armies are not fed up to the standard of fighting strength, the war will be lost. We must bear in mind, too, that before the next crop is harvested there will be six million men—British, Americans and Canadians—in arms at the French, Belgian and other fronts—men taken away from productive pursuits—to be victualled as well. If there be not enough food raised and saved so that we can spare for overseas the amount necessary there, then again the war is lost. I have tried with all earnestness, and the Food Control Administration has tried with all its might, to impress upon the public the great seriousness of production. And along with production go the other essentials.

If we would answer those urgent appeals—and it is our duty to do so—we must see that the necessary farm help is secured. On the 15th March the War Lecture Bureau of this Government under the heading "Soldiers of the Soil" appealed to the school boys of the land to go and work on the farms, stating that twenty-five thousand would be required. The appeal read:

The Bureau has been asked to get behind the recruiting of boy labour for farms. Canada is in urgent need of twenty-five thousand boy volunteers for farm work. From no other source can the necessary number of farm workers be obtained. In no other way can the Greater Production campaign be a success . . . . The principal factor, if the effort at greater production is to be successful, is to have sufficient farm labour for seeding and harvest. The land is waiting, but we must have farm help to work it.

I humbly submit that the scarcity of farm labour is sufficiently proved, in fact, it is admitted by every one who knows the actual condition of affairs in this country. I say that if you want effective production you must have good farm labourers, not school children from the city. Farming is a professtion, a great profession especially when carried on by those who have experience in it. Farmers and the sons of farmers are needed here to maintain our food production which is so necessary to the success of the Allies.

If you read the Votes and Proceedings of this House since the beginning of the session you will find that several motions have been introduced by members tending to demonstrate the fact that there is not sufficient labour in this country for the requirements of our great national industries. The Government acknowledges the necessity of farm and industrial labour, for it has seen fit to create a portfolio of immigration and colonization. But what kind of immigration could we expect to get during these days? It is now time, in the interests of this country, in the interest of our efficient participation in the war, and in order to help the mother country, that the Prime Minister should re-consider his policy and tell us what the Government intends to do in order to solve the important problems of the hour.

If I had to express a personal opinion, I would say, first, that food production seems to be the paramount necessity, and to take precedence over all other demands, if we are to render the greatest service to the Allies and to the Mother Country. Connected with that question is the problem of transportation by rail and ocean. Then, there is the new industry of shipbuilding to which the Government is giving its attention. Second, if you want to make a success of those industries you must not count upon immigration but you must retain in this country our farm helpers and labourers. Let us stop at once the emigration of our workers by the suspension of the Military Service Act of 1917 and employ immediately on the farms, and in the industries the thirty thousand soldiers who have been raised but have not yet left the country.

Why should we not discuss this matter now before it is too late? The Government of Great Britain discussed the other day the question of getting back from the front twenty thousand soldiers in order to meet the requirements of labour, and nobody as a result has been taxed with disloyalty. During a discussion in the House of Commons of submarine losses and shipbuilding enterprises in Great Britain Mr. Asquith said:

> In the next place you must exert every possible effort to draw more skilled labour into the shipyards. I know the difficulties perfectly well. We were at this task of trying to get men from the army, and I know the difficulties and the objections the military authorities raise, in perfectly good faith, and it is nothing but the strong and direct exercise of cabinet authority that can really bring from the front the men who are needed for this purpose; but that they can be brought is proved by the fact that they are being brought though not in the numbers or at the rate we should desire.

During the same sitting of the House, the Prime Minister, Mr. Lloyd George, said:

> That has got to be done with very great care. Twenty thousand is the figure wanted; it is the figure we shall work up to.

In Great Britain they have discussed this question of getting the necessary skilled labour for the shipyards, and if they do not find it in Great Britain they go as far as the army, even to the front, and they contemplate bringing twenty thousand back in order to work in the industries of England. As a citizen of the Empire, with equal rights before the King, I ask the same privileges as those enjoyed by the citizens of the United Kingdom. I stand in this House as a free man and I say: Stop at once the emigration of our boys; they are needed at home for the sake of the Empire.

Have not the Government abused their power? They have been elected on their programme of selective conscription with the understanding that farmers would be left to pursue their occupation. It is true that this election which took place in virtue of the War-time Elections Act was nothing else than a camouflage, because the will of citizens of this country as expressed at the polls, has not prevailed. At the first opportunity, the Government, contrary to the wishes of the people and in defiance of the constitutional rights of Parliament, hurriedly adopted an Order in Council abolishing selective conscription and enacting the most rigid form of conscription under which it is proposed to send farmers to the front. The Government have introduced regulations, under the Military Service Act contrary to the rules of civilized countries, by virtue of which they are conscripting for overseas service the only living son of a widowed mother supporting a family.

We must realize unfortunately that the party in power and their majority have denied the privileges, responsibilities and sanctity of fatherhood. Only one man can know, and he will never disregard, the sacred words which fell from the lips of his dying father addressed to him as the eldest son: "You will now take my place and take care of your mother and your little brothers and sisters." There is no sane man who will dare to deny that that son is the head of the family and that he fills the place of the departed father. In conscripting that son the Government have deliberately violated the last will and testament of the father. I accuse the Government of deliberately depriving widows and orphans of their only support, of throwing them into the street and making them beggars.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret very much to have to call the hon. gentleman to order, but he is calling in question an Order in Council which has been passed by this House. It is the law and it is not open for him to call it in question.

Mr. FORTIER: I was only referring to the Military Service Act, 1917, which does not provide for the exemption of the son of a widowed mother or the only son of a family. I say that in every civilized country of the world there is no one who would take the only son of a widow, when that widow has a small family to support and when that young son is working to provide the livelihood of mother and orphans. There is no power on earth that should take that son and send him away, and allow that widow and her orphans to become a charge on the public.

In the presence of this great conflict, in which for the last four years the British and the French have been fighting under their respective flags for the eternal principles of civilization, Canadians are confronted with the two-fold duty of facing the enemy and if necessary dying at the front, and of saving their own country and their homes. But the province of Quebec is opposed to conscription. Not only is that the attitude of the people in general, but the educated men of that province have favoured voluntary enlistment rather than conscription in this young Dominion. Is it not a regrettable fact that nearsighted politicians by the policy which they have adopted have thrown this country into its present unhappy state? The attitude which the French Canadians have taken on the question of conscription is, in my opinion, honourable and patriotic. That French Canadians are lacking neither in patriotism nor bravery is attested by the record of their compatriots who have been honoured at the front as well as by the conduct of those French Canadians who in earlier days defended Canada against the incursion of military forces from the country to the south. The French Canadian is opposed to conscription because he loves his country and his family above everything else in the world. How is it possible that the supreme authority of the Dominion can condemn such sentiments as these in any man? Is it not the supreme duty of the Government, not only to save our country and preserve our homes, but to procure for the Allies what they apparently are most in need of, supplies of food on which to subsist and to enable them to conquer and throw back the invader? Under the circumstances it seems to me that, confronted as we are by such a situation, the Government should not persist in the policy of conscription which seems likely to prove so ruinous to our fair country.

Mr. THOMAS EDWARD SIMPSON (Algoma, W.): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to detain the House very long at this hour of the night. I did not intend to take part in the debate until I heard my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) address the House a day or two ago, when he introduced the very important subject of the development of our natural resources, particularly the iron ore industry. I then felt that it was my duty to make a few observations in connection with this particular subject.

The development of our iron and steel industry, to my mind, is of paramount importance to Canada and should receive the sympathetic and favourable consideration of this House. Our national debt is increasing very rapidly, and it is bound to go on increasing so long as we continue to bear our just share in the defence of the Empire. It necessarily follows that ever increasing amounts will be required from year to year in order to pay the interest and sinking fund charges on that national debt. Is it not fair then to expect that our national resources of forest, of field and mine might be utilized to the fullest extent in liquidating these obligations? The hon. member for Fort William has submitted figures to show that there are vast deposits of iron ore in Canada awaiting development. In New Brunswick they have approximately 20,000,000 tons of magnetic ore, with a concentrating plant capable of handling about 1,000 tons of ore per day. In Nova Scotia the iron mines are said to have about 4,000,000 tons of ore proven, and one company has a plant capable of treating over 200,000 tons annually. In British Columbia experts estimate that the iron ore deposits already discovered contain over 35,000,000 tons of ore, and in Ontario we have the Atikokan range with 10,000,000 tons of ore proven up, and the company there has a blast furnace and roasting plant at Port Arthur. Large deposits of magnetite ore have been discovered near Kakabeka falls, and promising deposits of hematite ore have recently been located east of lake Nipigon, and also near Loon lake. These deposits are quite close to the Canadian Northern railway. The Moose Mountain Company have developed their mines, proving the existence of about 100,000,000 tons of magnetic ore. They have installed a mining plant, and erected a Grondel concentrating plant capable of producing some 250 tons per day of concentrated ore, assaying 63 per cent iron content. There are the Balmont, Wilbur, Farnum, and many other magnetic properties in eastern Ontario. Then we have the Lake Superior Corporation and the Algoma Steel Corporation of Sault Ste. Marie. They have shipped from the Helen mine at Michipicoten over 2,263,000 tons of hematitic iron ore; on the same range about 10 miles north of the Helen, the Josephine iron mine has been proven up by diamond drilling, and it contains about 1,400,000 tons of hematite ore; and both of these properties have vast deposits of siderite ore. The Magpie mine also contains large deposits of siderite ore, carrying about 36 per cent iron, but when roasted it carries about 52 per cent iron of excellent quality, and supplies about one-sixth of the ore used in the Algoma Steel Company's furnaces at Sault Ste. Marie.

Canada apparently has hundreds of millions of tons of iron ore scattered from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and on the extreme East and West we have abundant sources of fuel and flux. We have some eighteen blast furnaces, and several extensive steel plants, costing approximately $100,000,000, and producing about 1,500,000 tons of finished product per annum, worth about $75,000,000. Notwithstanding the immense deposits of iron ore we have in this country, we find that over 90 per cent of the iron ore used in these furnaces is imported largely from the United States.

Why is this being done? Because most of our iron ore is of a lower quality, containing a smaller percentage of iron content and a greater percentage of sulphur than the American ore from the lake Superior mines, and in order to bring it up to a value equal to the American ore and to make it suitable for use in the manufacture of steel, it is necssary to have the ore roasted to eliminate the sulphur and other injurious contents. This necessitates the erection of expensive roasting or concentrating plants to treat the raw ore. This treatment, we are told, costs from 35 cents to $1.25 per ton, with the result that American ore can be laid down at the blast furnaces in our own country for less money than ore from our own mines. In addition there is the problem of raising the large sums of money necessary to provide the concentrating and roasting plants. I submit that at a time like the present, when the Government is endeavouring in every legitimate way to reduce the trade balance standing against us with the United States, they would be well advised to consider favourably the suggestion of my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) and to allow a bounty, of say fifty cents a ton, on the iron ore mined and smelted in Canadian smelters. I feel sure that this would result in increased activity in the mining industry, and would also remove to a very large extent the reason the steel manufacturers have to-day for importing from the United States and other countries. I would like to read a few lines from the first annual report of the Commission of Conservation in Canada. It says:

> Only a few years ago the ironmasters of this continent would hardly look at an iron ore if it contained less than sixty-two per cent of metallic content. Now ore of fifty per cent is gladly received. We are, and will continue to be, industrially handicapped until our iron industry is developed sufficiently to meet the demands of our country and render us independent of outside sources for the all-important metal. What we need is not conservation of iron ore resources, but vigorous development of our iron industry.

I have no doubt the Commission had in mind the very large amount of steel products imported from the United States every year when they made this report. We find that, in 1913, over $146,000,000 worth of steel products were imported into Canada from the United States, and about $156,000,000 in 1917. Could we not reasonably assume that, with the necessary assistance given to our iron ore mining industry in due time all of these steel products could be made in Canadian rolling mills from Canadian ore and the money circulated among Canadian workmen? Our steel plants are all working at the present time to their full capacity; they are turning out shell steel of the finest quality for our own use and that of our Allies. I am convinced that after the war is over the demand for steel products for the railroads and building trades of this and other countries will be great, and if we get our iron and steel industry on a sound basis now, utilizing our Canadian ore, it will prove to be one of the bulwarks on which we can depend while passing through the period of reconstruction.

Now a word with reference to the newsprint industry, which was introduced into the discussion here the other evening. It is a well known fact that the press, and particularly the large dailies, have been carrying on a persistent campaign against the manufacturers of newsprint paper in an attempt to show that the manufacturers were charging exorbitant prices and making abnormal profits on their output. The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) took occasion to dwell at some length on the iniquities of the manufacturers, and quoted from a very cleverly prepared brief to show the excessive dividends they were receiving on their common stock. And some of these manufacturing companies, he said, had common stock which represented no actual cash investment. He also told the House that some seven officials representing the manufacturers in Canada and the United States, were convicted and fined in New York for conspiring to increase prices, and that the publishers had requested the Government to investigate conditions existing in Canada. Right here I want to say that I compliment the Government on the immediate action taken to investigate this matter when it was brought to their attention. I want to say further that the members in this House will stand solidly behind the Government in checking every attempt that may be made in this country to form combines. A commissioner was appointed to investigate thoroughly the cost of the manufacture of newsprint in Canada, and while his final report has not yet been made known, an interim report was submitted, in which we are told that the commissioner suggested that the fixed price of $50 per ton previously paid to the manufacturers of newsprint be increased to $57 per ton. I presume, in fact I have no doubt, that the commissioner had authority to summon the manufacturers and their agents before him to be examined under oath, and that they had to present their books of account showing the cost of manufacture. And after these had been presented and had been examined by the commissioner, to a certain extent at any rate, he was apparently convinced that the price paid the newsprint manufacturers was not sufficient, and suggested that it be increased from $50 to $57 per ton. In the face of that fact, I think the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Springfield against the newsprint manufacturers falls to the ground. I hold no brief for the newsprint manufacturers. The reason for the attack on the newsprint manufacturers is quite obvious. It is a well known fact that the publishers of the large daily newspapers in this country for some time have cut the subscription price of their paper to the ground for the purpose of increasing circulation and thereby commanding a larger advertising patronage at remunerative rates, and now they expect the newsprint manufacturer to pay the shot. Manufacturers are asking that the price of newsprint be fixed at $60 a ton, which is an advance of less than fifty per cent over the price that they were charging prior to the outbreak of war. When we consider that the price of pulpwood, which was $6 a cord before the war, has increased to $10, and in some instances $12, and when we consider that wages have increased at least seventy-five per cent, we must come to the conclusion that the price asked by the newsprint manufacturers is not exorbitant.

While our national debt has increased very largely since the outbreak of war, it is encouraging to note that the greater portion of it is held by the Canadian people themselves. This shows conclusively that people who cannot take part in the conflict on the field of battle are loyally carrying out the pledge given to the first contingent when they went away and repeated many times since, that we are prepared to stand behind them to the last dollar. The methods proposed for the increasing of our revenue will, I believe, meet with the approval of the people. The increased business and income taxes will place the burden on the shoulders of those best able to bear it, and the taxing of automobiles, player pianos, phonographs, talking machines, and even tobacco and tea, will meet with the hearty popular approval.

Just a word with regard to taxing the alien enemy. I hesitate to introduce this subject, because it has to be treated with the greatest care. Anything we may do in the way of taxing or conscripting the alien enemy in Canada may be communicated to the enemy country and meet with reprisals there on our own prisoners; consequently, we have to be careful in whatever method we may adopt. Nevertheless, we have alien enemies in our midst. They came here before war was declared, and they came largely at our invitation. They were satisfied to accept whatever wages were prevailing at that time, and, to my mind, they should be satisfied to take to-day the wages that were prevailing at that time for the class of work they are doing, and the difference between the wages prevailing at that time for the class of work they were prepared to do and those prevailing to-day for the work they are doing should be turned over to the public treasury to help carry on the war. This increase in wage is due entirely to war conditions. I believe that the plan can be worked out by insisting that every manufacturer and employer of alien labour report to the Government once a month, showing the number of alien enemies on his pay roll, and stating the standard wage paid for that class of work prior to the war and the standard wage paid for it to-day. Let the employer of labour pay the alien enemy according to the standard before the war, and remit the difference to the Minister of Finance for war purposes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I regret to have to call the hon. member to order. I had hoped that his remarks were merely by way of reference to the subject of alien enemies, but as that subject has already been debated and disposed of by the House, it is not in order for him to deal with it further.

Mr. SIMPSON: I regret that I exceeded the limit of the rules, but as the matter has direct reference to methods of taxation,

I thought that I was in order. However, I congratulate the Acting Minister of Finance on the splendid Budget that he has presented to the House. I think that the methods of taxation proposed will meet with the hearty approval of the people.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I have much pleasure in tendering my congratulations to the Acting Minister of Finance (Hon. A. K. Maclean) on his able performance of an unpleasant duty, a duty thrust upon him by the exigencies of present conditions. When I think of the past and my pleasant relations with the Acting Minister of Finance, my memory takes me back to the years from 1896 to 1911, when he appeared on various platforms in the good old county of Lunenburg and advocated the Liberal policies of lower tariffs, of thrift and of economy; and my heart was filled with sadness as on Tuesday I heard him assume the burdens laid upon him on account of the absence of the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) and make the statement of the present financial condition of the country.

While we rejoice that the Finance Minister (Sir Thomas White) has recovered his health, we cannot look with equanimity upon his resuming his duties as Finance Minister of this country. The financial affairs of Canada would be safer in the hands of the Acting Minister of Finance. Owing to the crying need for reform, economy and efficiency in the administration of our finances, I suggest that a commission composed of three practical business men, men of large affairs and successful in various fields of activity, be appointed to guide and advise the Finance Department and the Government regarding the financial affairs of the country. This is only a suggestion which, as a new member, I submit in all humility, but I feel strongly that some action is necessary to protect the citizens of Canada.

Before I take up a discussion of the Budget I wish to refer to a statement made this afternoon by the hon. member for Toronto Centre (Mr. Bristol), who came to the rescue of his friend, Sir Joseph Flavelle, Baronet, and made certain statements which the facts will not sustain. He said that Sir Joseph Flavelle was on the same footing as other buyers and sellers of bacon to the British Government. Such was not the case. Sir Joseph Flavelle had a contract with the British Government under which his bacon was taken off his hands at his buying price, plus a certain profit, plus whatever advance the market price might make. This advantage no other company had. He also had the privilege of sending all his bacon in British transports free of freight, as he was permitted to deliver at Montreal instead of London, which no other company could do. As to his standing, the moment the O'Connor and the Henderson reports were published, the British Government cancelled their special contract with him, refused to do any further business with his agent at London, and are now doing all their buying direct, and not through the agency of Sir Joseph Flavelle.

The Acting Finance Minister informed us that the expenditure was $173,000,000 on current account, which included the interest on the war debt, $45,000,000, and $7,000,000 for pensions. If you deduct these two latter amounts and add $12,000,000 interest on debt before the war, that leaves an expenditure of $133,000,000, which is excessive, and my memory harks back to the night when I listened to the Prime Minister in the town of Lunenburg in 1911, telling the citizens of that town that it was a criminal waste of public money to spend $70,000,000, and that if he were elected to power, he would reduce it by $10,000,000. He also on that occasion promised free medicine to the shore fishermen, but that promise has not been kept, nor do the fishermen want free medicine. With regard to the $7,000,000 for pensions, I wish to say that every right-thinking man in Canada is willing and anxious to make life easy for those who have fought for our country, and every effort should be made to do the right thing by them. But if we are to judge from the two returns brought down in the House a few days ago, the administration of the pensions is not built on a sound foundation. I need not elaborate on any of those returns, but there was a case where a colonel who had seen the sun shine over France for only fourteen days who is now back in this country and I am told he is receiving a pension of about $780, and he has also been promoted to a seat in the Senate and will draw a salary of $2,500 a year for the rest of his life. Does the Government intend to appoint any private or corporal or sergeant to the Senate of Canada? Why should they not be appointed just as much as a colonel who was over in France for only fourteen days? Why should those gentlemen draw these large amounts whereas the ordinary private soldier receives only from $2.50 to $48 per month? It is necessary for the Government immediately to organize this department properly, and to place at the head of it not a fourth-rate politician, not a ward heeler, not a political major, but the best business man obtainable and a man with a strong personality. If this is not done, we shall find ourselve in the position of the United States after the Civil War with regard to pensions.

We are told that the war expenditure in 1917-18 was $345,000,000, and that altogether, since the war started, the large sum of $878,000,000 has been expended. The motto of the Liberal party, Mr. Speaker, is every dollar necessary for war, but not a dollar for graft. There is no doubt about it that the expenditure on war account has not been satisfactory to the general public. Case after case might be cited where expenditures were abnormal and excessive, but I will only refer the Minister of Militia and Defence to an article published last year in one of the Government organs, the Halifax Chronicle, which dealt with conditions at Halifax in the Militia Department. Conditions have not improved since then. Practically every doctor in the city, with a few notable exceptions, has donned the khaki, and they are still attending to their private practice. The same thing applies to some of the gentlemen of the cloth, and others too numerous to mention. A similar state of affairs exists in the Naval Department at Halifax, though not as glaring. There is need for economy there. We have a cruiser which is known as H.M.C.S. Niobe. Perhaps this ship of war is better known to the general public as one of the "Laurier tin-pot navy," as our Conservative friends were in the habit of calling it in the election of 1911. This cruiser served a very good purpose last year, after the late minister of elections, Hon. Robert Rogers, came back from the Old Country and hatched the goose egg known as the Conscription Act on the way over. A number of young men from the province of Nova Scotia who, for reasons sufficiently known to themselves did not want to volunteer and join the army or come under the new Act felt that perhaps a position on board the Niobe would suit them better than anything else. The result was that the wires were kept hot between Nova Scotia and Ottawa, and through the influence of some of the members for Nova Scotia, these young men, not sons of Liberals, not sons of Quebecers, but sons of good Tory fathers, got jobs aboard the Niobe as oilers and wipers and so forth. To-day those young men are still aboard the Niobe. They remind me of a story I read in the Good Book which I hope we all read, but perhaps not as often as we should do. That story is to be found in the 19th chapter of Deuteronomy. In the olden times, the chosen people founded a nation, and they set apart three cities for a certain purpose. If any one got into trouble or committed some misdemeanour, he could flee to one of those cities and find refuge there. It seems to me that we should change the name of H.M.C.S. Niobe. She has been an ever present help in time of need and a shelter in time of storm for the sons of some of our Conservative friends in Nova Scotia, and I think that the Admiral of the Fleet, or the Minister of Naval Affairs (Mr. Ballantyne)—I am sorry he is not here—should change the name of H.M.C.S. Niobe to H.M.C.S. City of Refuge.

The people of this country, Mr. Speaker, will demand that proper safeguards be taken by the Government to see that for every dollar spent value is given. With regard to the general expenditure, I would like to speak of one item in which extravagance is apparent. I refer to the matter of advertising by the various departments of the Government. When the Liberals were in power from 1896 to 1911, a large amount of money was spent in advertising various matters in newspapers. The method of that party was to send copy to Liberal newspapers, and only Liberal newspapers were paid for such work. The same system applied during the regime of the Conservative party from 1911-17, except perhaps that the Tories went one better than the Grits, and now and again you would see advertisements entirely relating to a matter in the Northwest provinces or British Columbia published in a two-by-four Conservative paper in some small town on the Atlantic coast. But what a change has taken place since the present Government came into power. Of course, I understand that the labourer is worthy of his hire, and the work done by the newspapers of this country in boosting so-called Union Government, deserved financial recognition, in addition to the large amount received by them for advertising the Victory Loan. But there is absolutely no justification for the present state of affairs. Nearly every newspaper in Canada is to-day receiving patronage from the Government in the shape of advertising, and in a great many cases the large amount expended is unnecessary, and not justifiable, and I strongly protest in the name of the Canadian people against such a waste of public money.

I was wondering whether this synchronized —to use a word used some time ago by the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White)— with the sudden high regard of the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) for the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). The Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) admits that we have practically no immigration at the present time, but he holds out the hope that after the war the tide of immigration will flow to our shores. My humble opinion is that the European nations will not allow their depleted populations to leave those countries, and I have no such fond hopes as have the Acting Minister of Finance and the Minister of Immigration. Whether such will be the case or not, I have no hesitation in saying that in the meantime such an aggressive member of the Government as the Minister of Immigration is reported to be should devote his energy and ability to another department instead of the Government making new appointments at great cost to the country.

When the Acting Minister of Finance referred to the exchange rates between the United States and Canada, my mind was carried back to the 1911 election when that gentleman, in eloquent terms, advocated reciprocity with our great neighbour to the south, and had the views of the acting minister and the Liberal party been upheld at that time, such an impetus would have been given to our export business to that country that no such conditions as exist to-day would have to be dealt with by the Government and the business men of Canada. Give us free food as advocated by the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Joseph Read), and soon the balance of trade will be equalized in a great measure.

The Acting Minister of Finance spoke of the Victory Loan. As he truly said, the people of Canada are to be congratulated on the spontaneous response which came from every province in the Dominion. Money poured into the public treasury, proving conclusively that the people of Canada realized the responsibilities and were determined to provide sufficient funds to carry the war to a successful conclusion. The only criticism I have to make is that owing to the fact that the affairs of the country were not carried on in an economical manner by the late Government, and because our credit was so impaired, it was necessary for them to pay 5½ per cent interest for the money, they borrowed at a time when other nations were borrowing at 4 and 4½ per cent. It goes to show that something was rotten in Denmark when the Government had to pay such a large interest for that loan. Other amounts were borrowed previously by the Government, and where did they find the money? From no less a nation than the United States, a nation about which we were told in 1911 that the Jews should have no dealings with the Samaritans, or, to quote the battle cry of the opponents of reciprocity, "We want no truck or trade with the Yankees." And we witnessed the humiliating spectacle of the Finance Minister, that member of the noble band of eighteen going with his hat in his hand to the financiers of the United States begging for funds to carry on the business of the country. And did they pass him by on the other side? Nay, they bound up his wounds, and sent him on his way rejoicing.

The Acting Minister of Finance has told us that other great loans will be required in the near future, and that they will have to be raised in this country. He informed us that to do this we must produce wealth, and more wealth, and produce in greater quantities than ever before. This is not the age of miracles. To produce, we need producers, and the people of this country expect a lead from the Government. But no such lead has been forthcoming, and no stable policy has been enunciated by the leaders of the party in power. Some people are even unkind enough to say that, far from encouraging business, they are actually hindering it.

I read a few days ago in a great family journal, one of the organs of this Government in the city of Halifax, the following:

> In an interview yesterday a local fish dealer summed up the situation as follows: Fish merchants in Halifax in the course of their legitimate business are having the hardest time in their history. All kinds of vexatious technicalities in the first place are put up to them by the Government. The Food Control authorities seem to delight in asking for statistics hard to prepare and so intricate as to require an experienced bookkeeper to tabulate, and when the schedule is complete no living man has any specific information of any value to himself or any person else.

It might be well to change the name of the food controller by altering just one letter. One month the Government tell the people they must produce; they tell them they must build ships, and the people make their plans to help this country by carrying out their wishes and invest millions of dollars in farm implements to produce greater crops, and in building ships with which to catch fish, and in purchasing fishing gear to carry on that great industry. The Government even go farther and exempt the farmer and the fishermen from military service and convey, if not in the spoken word, by their actions, that the producers shall not be called upon for military service. Then suddenly, as a bolt from the blue, in a "moment of weakness" that order is countermanded, and a few days ago the fiat went forth in the shape of one of the famous Orders in Council taking practically every farmer and fisherman of a certain age. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want the Tory organs in the country to understand that I am not in favour of producers doing their bit in this great struggle. They have been doing their bit, they are doing their bit, and they will continue so to do. But it will be said the demand for additional troops is paramount. What a time to wake up to that fact!

We are all anxious and willing, Mr. Speaker, to do everything in our power to help the Allied nations win this war. We mean to win the war, whether it is by providing men, ships or food supplies, and we are willing and anxious to strain every nerve to do everything possible to bring to a successful conclusion a fight which we all believe is in the interests of democracy, truth and righteousness. But I hold that that Order in Council is ill advised and will be ruinous to certain industries. If these men were to be enlisted, they should have been taken before they had made all arrangements to carry on their business for this season. I am not a farmer, and others have dealt with this phase of the question. The Minister of Militia evidently realized that the Order in Council had gone too far because a few days ago he found it necessary to make a further explanation with reference to the farming interests, but he did not make any reference to the great fishing industry of this country, and I am rather surprised that two members of the Cabinet, the right hon. Prime Minister and the Acting Finance Minister, coming as they do from Maritime constituencies, did not realize the gravity of the situation.

Let us for a moment see what would happen to the great fishing industry if that Order in Council is enforced,—but first it might be well to give the House a few figures on the value of that industry. The total number of vessels engaged last year in the fisheries of Canada was 1,965, and their value $5,267,724. The number of boats was 40,105, and their value $4,829,793. The value of nets and seines was $4,485,269, and the value of other fishing material $14,-146,176. The total capital invested in Canada in the fishing industry last year was $28,728,962. The total number of persons employed in canneries and fish houses was 25,680; the number of men in vessels 9,192; the number of men in boats 60,432; the total number of fishermen 69,624, and the total number of persons engaged in the fishing industry 95,304. The total value of the fisheries for Canada last year was $29,208,-378.

I would point out it is not the large corporations that are engaged in this industry of so much value to the country, but the fishermen themselves own their vessels and boats and fishing gear, and it seems to me the Government should carefully consider before taking any drastic measures that would interfere with an industry of so much importance to the country, and in which so much money has been invested.

The number and value of fishing vessels, boats, nets, etc., in the province of Prince Edward Island for the year 1916-17 was as follows:

	Number.	Value.

In my own county, and I am perhaps more particularly interested in that than in any other part of the province, the fishing industry will be seriously affected by the last Order in Council, as indeed it will be throughout the whole province. The fishing industry is a peculiar one. It differs perhaps from any other industry by reason of the fact that the fishermen have to commence so early to get ready for the fishing operations of the coming season. Vessel fishermen have to make arrangements as early as December of the previous year, or perhaps in January of this year, to engage their nets or trawls and to build or repair their vessels and boats. These men, depending on the legislation passed last year, and, having been exempted by the tribunals, made arrangements in December and January to carry on the industry this year. The consequence is that at the present time millions of dollars owned by these fishermen, and not by large corporations or the big interests, have been placed in jeopardy. The money was expended by the fishermen themselves upon boats, rope, twine and other gear. They have spent millions of dollars in order to enable them to prosecute the fishing industry this season. In Lunenburg alone there are about 150 fishing vessels. Early in March the fishermen started to get ready. They bought their new cables—and I would like to mention here that since this Government came into office rope for cables has increased from fifteen to thirty-nine and a half cents per pound. It is necessary for the fishermen to buy three hundred and ten fathoms for each vessel, and the cable weighs sixteen pounds to the fathom. The acting Minister of Finance can figure out what it will cost to buy a cable for a fishing vessel this season. Then, the fishermen have bought their salt and provisions, have hired their men and have gone fishing. If this Order in Council is enforced, these men who had been exempted, can be taken from the vessels. What will happen? You cannot fish with these vessels on the deep sea with old men. It is a young man's business. Young men ranging from sixteen to twenty-five are mostly engaged on these vessels fishing in the North bay and on the Grand banks. If the young men are taken off these vessels, it will mean ruination to the fishermen whose money is invested in this industry. The same thing applies to the boat fisherman. As this branch of the industry is carried on around the coast of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Quebec, you will usually find that there are three men fishing in a boat. One of them is an old man, the father of a family, one a boy of perhaps twelve or fourteen years of age, whilst the third is a young man, practically the only one who can handle the boat. The Conscription Act will take that young man away and leave the old man and the boy, and that will be the end of the fishing industry. The right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and the Acting Minister of Finance, men who come from Nova Scotia and who should know something about the fishing industry, before bringing in that Order in Council, should at least have consulted the business men of that province.

We are told to build ships. How can we build ships if you take away the men? And how can you transport supplies without ships? You cannot build ships with old men. It is quite true that you can use a few old men in the shipyards, but you cannot use old men to lift the heavy pieces of timber and put them in place when they are building ships. One of the most urgent requirements in Canada to-day is increased food production and greater shipbuilding activity. A large amount of money has been invested in the establishment of new shipyards and in the building of ships. I would like to read what the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries has to say on this subject. He is a gentleman of intelligence who understands this question, and I think that what he says should have a great deal of weight with this House and with the country. He says:

> In last year's report the question of shipbuilding in general in relation to the war was taken up, tables were furnished of the number, tonnage, and speed of the ocean freight carriers of the principal maritime nations, and an account given of methods adopted in a number of foreign countries to stimulate and aid shipbuilding by means of bounties, subsidies, or the free entry of shipbuilding materials.
> As the war has progressed, and an ever-increasing amount of the ocean tonnage of the allied nations (now including the United States) and of the neutral nations has been sunk since Germany's declaration of unrestricted submarine warfare, the need of shipbuilding activity throughout the world to supply the wastage has become of paramount importance.

This has been thoroughly realized, I think, in Canada. A little further on he says:

> In Canada, since the beginning of the war, the number of privately owned shipyards has been about doubled, a description of some of these yards was given in last year's report; and later, in the present one, will be found an account of the new yards established, and also one of the enlargements and improvements made to existing yards, with a view to meeting the demands for increased tonnage.
>
> Apart from the introduction of the larger yards, there has been in the Maritime Provinces generally, and in Nova Scotia in particular, a revival of the wooden shipbuilding trade, particularly in the form of small schooners with or without auxiliary power; these are quickly and cheaply built, and at anything approaching the present abnormally high freight rates should pay handsomely.

He states also:

> It would be difficult to exaggerate the importance of shipbuilding as a national undertaking to a country that has, like Canada, an extensive coast line both east and west, superb inland communication by lakes and rivers, and whose export trade is chiefly overseas.

I notice, Mr. Speaker, that last year there were built the following steel vessels: On the Atlantic coast, ten steamers with a gross tonnage of 20,560 tons; on the Great Lakes, eleven steamers with a gross tonnage of 31,936 tons; and on the Pacific coast, nine steamers with a gross tonnage of 42,000 tons. The number and tonnage of wooden vessels were: On the Atlantic Coast, five with a gross tonnage of 3,540 tons; on the Great Lakes, one with a gross tonnage of 40 tons; and on the Pacific coast, sixteen with a gross tonnage of 19,729 tons. In addition, there were in course of construction on March 31, 1917, fifty-three schooners of a gross tonnage of 17,496 tons. These are wooden vessels averaging about 300 tons net, and most of them are being built in different parts of Nova Scotia. Now, Mr. Speaker, the people of Nova Scotia, having taken this Government and the Government of the Old Country at their word, how are they going to man these ships and sail them? How are they going to carry food to foreign countries, if the only men who can be used as sailors are conscripted under the Order in Council recently passed by this Government. It has been flung in our teeth by some of the press—notably by a paper published in the city of Halifax, one of the Government organs—that the fishermen and sailors of Lunenburg county were slackers and cowards. I want to state here that the fishermen and sailors of that county are nothing of the kind, I think the members of this House will agree with me that men who leave their homes on the 15th of March, when the ice is on the coast, and the March winds and gales are blowing, and go out and anchor one hundred and fifty miles from land, and every morning at daylight start off in the dories and haul their trawls, and continue that occupation for perhaps a month before they see land again—men who pursue that occupation all through the summer fogs and during the August and September gales, before returning home, cannot be called slackers or cowards.

And after these men return from the fishing grounds what do we find them doing? They go freighting in their vessels; and for a period of nearly four years, since this war started, there have been about five hundred fishermen from Lunenburg county going down to the sea in ships; taking fish to Portugal, Spain, Italy, the West Indies and Brazil, carrying food to the Allied nations and thus helping to win the war. Do you mean to say, Mr. Speaker, that a man who faces the deadly submarine at sea in a small vessel of one hundred tons is either a coward or a slacker? I say no, I say he is discharging, when engaged in that hazardous occupation his full duty to his country.

In the remarks made by the Acting Minister of Finance with respect to taxation, he deplored the fact that $15,000,000 of revenue would be lost by the enactment of prohibition during the war. You will notice, Mr. Speaker, the expression "during the war." Let us hope that the Government will take steps in the near future to amend the prohibition law so that prohibition will remain for ever and ever, amen. I am not a so-called temperance crank, nor am I a teetotaller, but I believe that permanent prohibition would be a good stroke of business. I cannot agree with the Acting Finance Minister in his statement that the $15,000,000 would be lost to the country. On the contrary the large amount of money heretofore expended upon spirituous liquors will, under prohibition, be expended upon various commodities dutiable at about 30 per cent, or will go into the savings bank accounts and the health and prosperity of the people will be greatly improved by the abolition of this traffic.

I also take issue with the Acting Finance Minister with regard to the tax on the business community. I do not think that the business of this country should be overtaxed. Whilst I feel that the tax imposed on war profits should be much larger I do not think it is wise to unduly tax business concerns that are engaged in the development of the industries of the country. If you do you will kill the goose that lays the golden eggs. Business men will tighten their purse strings and will curtail their industrial activities, and will invest their money in Government bonds or other securities instead of taking the risk which attends investment in ordinary commercial enterprises. It will be noticed by reference to Hansard of last year that the Finance Minister said these taxes would not be imposed in the future, but I take it that announcement was only a "scrap of paper."

I have carefully studied the income tax proposals, Mr. Speaker, as brought down, and I have no hesitation in saying that the man of small salary is required to contribute more in proportion than the man of large means or the millionaire. To my mind those proposals bear too heavily on the man of moderate means. Has my hon. friend, who in days of yore advocated the cause of the common people so eloquently, fallen from grace? Has he partaken of the forbidden fruit, or is he only submitting a schedule made up by one of the eighteen wise men of 1911? "The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau."

[Mr. Duff.]

I was more than surprised when the Acting Finance Minister submitted extra taxation on the poor man's necessities, tea, coffee, and tobacco. In this time of stress and strain when the labouring men of the country are keyed up to the highest pitch, when they are doing their bit in increasing production, when they have their noses to the grindstone and are compelled to economize and save owing to the excessive prices which the big interests compel them to pay for everything they use, eat and wear, at a time when they are giving their sons for the cause of the Empire and Canada, I say that the Government is not protecting the common people as they should, and the time is not far distant when the voice of the people will be heard in protest with no uncertain sound.

We were told, Mr. Speaker, that no changes would be made in the tariff. In fact, the member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) informs us that a pact was made by the Union members not to advocate any changes in the tariff. Is not this a combine? I would suggest that the Minister of Labour be called in to smash this combine along the lines of success he achieved in smashing the combine of the three cobblers in a certain city in Ontario. But you will notice by the schedules submitted by the Acting Finance Minister that he has changed the tariff in some commodities. Why not reduce the tariff on farming implements, which are so necessary for greater production?

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that whilst I criticized the Government on their Budget, and their shortcomings, we will back them up in every honest effort to carry on the present great struggle in which we are all interested, and will do everything possible to help bring the war to a successful conclusion. Let us all work together for the common good. Let us have a united country, a country free from bickering and petty strife, a country united in a common cause, but free to exercise our right of free speech and with liberty to worship at whatever altar our consciences and our early training dictate. Let us say as Ruth said to Naomi, "Whither thou goest I will go, your people shall be my people, and thy God my God."

On the motion of Mr. M. Steele (South Perth) the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean the House adjourned at 11.55 p.m.

Monday, May 6, 1918.

The House met at Three o'clock.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED.

John Alexander Stewart, Esq., member for the electoral division of Lanark, introduced by Sir Robert Borden and the Hon. J. D. Reid.

WAR-TIME ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved leave to introduce Bill No. 72, to amend chapter No. 39 of the Statutes of 1917. He said: One of the provisions of the War-time Elections Act was that polling day should be the twenty-eighth day after nomination day. That provision was inserted by reason of the enactment in regard to military voters. As the Military Voters Act does not apply to by-elections, it is not desirable that there should be an interval of four weeks instead of one week between nomination day and polling day, in the case of by-elections. The purpose of this amendment is to provide that paragraph D of section 2 of the War-time Elections Act shall apply only to a general election.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT VOTE—PAIRS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. I. E. PEDLOW (South Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise to a question of privilege. I find in the Renfrew Mercury, of Friday, May 3, the following:

> The editor of the Mercury, happening to pick up in Toronto a copy of Hansard recording the votes in the Commons on the amended Military Service Act, was somewhat astonished to find that the M.P. for South Renfrew had failed to record himself on that issue.

I beg leave to state to the House that on that occasion I was paired with the hon. member for Port Arthur and Kenora (Mr. Keefer), who was desirous of leaving for home on one of the night trains. At his special request and in order to accommodate that hon. member and with the permission and approval of the Liberal whip, I agreed to pair my vote and that was distinctly understood between myself and the Liberal whip. I wish to go on record as having been paired on that occasion, and if the hon. member for Port Arthur and Kenora were in the House I am sure he would corroborate my statement. Had I not been paired I would have voted against the main motion, as I had voted for the amendment exempting farmers.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE FOR SEEDING OPERATIONS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. A. FORTIER (Labelle): I ask the Minister of Militia and Defence (Major-General Mewburn) if the sons of farmers are to be left on the farm for seeding purposes. I understood that the minister, when questioned from both sides of the House on Friday, gave us to understand that the sons of farmers were to be allowed to stay on the farm until a later date. In our district—Military District No. 3—they are already called; they were called immediately after the boys in the cities had been called. The boys have been ordered to report on the eighth, ninth and tenth of this month. I would like to know if further orders will be given to the registrar to allow these boys to remain at their occupations on the farm for some time yet.

Major-General MEWBURN: Mr. Speaker, I thought that the statement I made in the House last week was very clear. I said that the registrars had been requested to send out notices to those in urban centres before they sent notices to the farmers. I stated that I believed that in some instances this direction had not been carried out in its entirety. There was no date specified at which the farmers' sons were to be called. I announced on Friday that arrangements had subsequently been made by which these men must report as notified, and then on giving proper notification to the commanding officer of the battalion, that they desired to go back to complete their seeding, they would be given at least two weeks' leave of absence for that purpose.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understood the statement which my hon. friend made the other day as he has just made again; is that the boys will have to report on being notified but that they will be given an extension of time for seeding. It has been represented to me in numerous letters that at this time of the year when every hour counts in seeding operations it is most detrimental to call these boys away for two or three days at a time as it means so much time is lost.

Major-General MEWBURN: I quite appreciate that and our desire is to save the boys delay as much as possible, but it is necessary for them to report so that the commanding officer of the district will not treat them as deserters. Arrangments have been made by which, when they get their notices, they will get transportation to the points at which they have to report to the commanding officer. The commanding officers were instructed by telegram on Friday to see, that those who get leave of absence shall be supplied with transportation back. It will cause some delay but we are trying to expedite matters in every way possible.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Would it not be possible to notify these young men without having the country put to the cost of their transportation to and from divisional headquarters?

Major-General MEWBURN: We are endeavouring to do that now.

TORONTO, NIAGARA AND WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY—THIRD READING.

Mr. H. B. MORPHY (N. Perth) moved the third reading of Bill No. 37, respecting the Toronto, Niagara and Western Railway Company.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals): I promised when this Bill came up for third reading to furnish some information with respect to it. The question was raised as to whether the title to the right of way was in the name of this company. I took the matter up with the officials of the Canadian Northern railway, and I will read a letter which I have received from Mr. F. H. Phippen, General Counsel for the Canadian Northern railway system:

Toronto, May 4, 1918.

Hon. J. D. Reid,
Minister of Railways and Canals, Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—

In answer to your enquiry with regard to the titles covering the right of way and terminals on the proposed line from Toronto to the Niagara fontier, I beg to advise you as follows:

(1.) The titles to the right of way acquired between Toronto and Hamilton are in the name of Toronto, Niagara and Western Railway and Canadian Northern Ontario Railway.

(2.) The titles to the right of way acquired through Hamilton are in the name of Toronto Niagara and Western Railway, Toronto Dwellings Limited and Canadian Northern System Terminals Limited.

(3.) The titles to the right of way acquired through St. Catharines are in the name of Toronto, Niagara and Western Railway and Toronto Dwellings Limited.

All the Capital Stock of the above companies is owned by the Canadian Northern Railway System.

Yours very truly,

F. H. Phippen,
General Counsel.

[Major-General Mewburn.]

I was in Toronto on Saturday, and I took the matter up with Mr. Tilley, counsel for the Government in connection with the Canadian Northern Railway arbitration, and he assured me that the titles to the right of way in connection with this road are all vested in the Canadian Northern Railway system through the subsidiary companies, as already mentioned. I asked why some part of it was in the name of the Toronto Dwellings, Limited, and the Canadian Northern Railway officials told me that at the time it was decided to purchase this right of way, they thought it would be better to take out the title under the name of another company, so that it would not be known that the Canadian Northern system was purchasing this right of way, otherwise the price of property in that locality might advance. However, at the time the charter was taken out for the Toronto Dwellings, Limited, the stock was immediately transferred to the Canadian Northern Railway system and it is therefore a part of that system.

Another question was raised as to whether bonds had been issued on this right of way. The answer to that is:

No bonds have been issued. Capital stock issued—

That is, of the Toronto, Niagara and Western railway.

—$125,000. This is all held by the Canadian Northern Railway system who have advanced the necessary moneys for the purchase of the right of way between Toronto and Niagara.

Then the question was raised as to whether the poles of the Electrical Development Company were located on this right of way. I made inquiries as to that, and the answer given to me by the Canadian Northern Railway officials was that no poles are located on that right of way. The answer they gave me in writing was:

At certain points between West Toronto and Bronte, where it was an advantage to the railway company on account of bridge crossings to occupy land owned by the power company, arrangements were made for an exchange of locations, but no poles or lines of the power company are on the right of way to be occupied by the railway.

The question was further asked as to whether any leases on any part of the right of way owned by the Toronto, Niagara and Western railway have been given. To that I have this answer:

No leases have been given by the Toronto, Niagara and Western Railway for right to put poles and string wires. The Electrical Development Company has no lease for right to place poles on this property.

The expenditure made under the charter up to the present time is $1,577,876.

The larger part of that expenditure is for property that the company has purchased in the city of Toronto, in the city of Hamilton, and between Toronto and Hamilton. The House will see that the Canadian Northern Railway system owns this right of way absolutely, and that there are no incumbrances in any way, shape, or form against it. No leases have been given, and the property therefore belongs to the people of Canada through their ownership of the Canadian Northern Railway system.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (North Simcoe): The explanation of the minister is satisfactory, but I would like to have some additional information. Did I understand from the minister that the right of way from Toronto to Hamilton is owned by the Toronto, Niagara and Western Railway Company?

Hon. Mr. REID: The right of way is owned entirely by the Canadian Northern Railway system, through the subsidiary companies, as stated in the information which I have just read. Let me repeat, in answer to the hon. gentleman, that the titles to the right of way acquired through Hamilton are in the name of the Toronto, Niagara and Western railway, Toronto Dwellings, Limited, and Canadian Northern System Terminals, Limited. The titles to the right of way acquired through St. Catharines are in the name of the Toronto, Niagara and Western railway, and Toronto Dwellings, Limited. All the capital stock of all the above companies is owned by the Canadian Northern Railway system.

Mr. CURRIE: That does not clear the situation at all. The facts are simply these: The Electrical Development Company, or the holding company, the Toronto Power Company, owns the right of way from Toronto to Hamilton. They also own the right of way from Hamilton to the Falls with the exception of a piece of land in Hamilton, a piece of land in St. Catharines and a piece of land in Toronto. The rest of that right of way is entirely owned by the Electrical Development Company, or Toronto Power Company, and these companies are not owned by the Canadian Northern, but by the Toronto Street Railway Company. My information, which I think is absolutely correct, is that the Toronto, Niagara and Western Railway Company has leased a right of way from Toronto to Hamilton from the Electrical Development Company or Toronto Power Company. They have expended over a million dollars and they have only sold $100,000 worth of stock. I think that before we put this Bill through the Minister of Railways should tell us, for instance, how much of this liability is going to be taken over by the Government and how much is the rental to be paid annually for the right of way from Toronto to Niagara Falls, and whether the Toronto, Niagara and Western Railway Company, whose charter we are now renewing, has an agreement with the Electrical Development Company, to pay so much a year for the right of way? I have never yet heard how much that amounts to. I would therefore ask the minister how much he expects he will have to pay annually for the lease of this right of way, and whether, instead of acquiring an asset, we are assuming a huge liability. The Canadian Northern interests control the Toronto Street railway, but that is a different corporation altogether from the Canadian Northern. All this right of way from Toronto to Niagara is owned really by the Toronto Power Company through the Electrical Development Company or the Toronto Street Railway Company, and they own the land from Toronto to Hamilton, and lease it to this company. What is the rental per annum, and what liability are we taking over by renewing this charter? I am safe in saying that in renewing this charter and continuing these obligations the country will be mulcted for at least half a million dollars of rental a year. I would like to know if the minister knows how much this railway company is obligated to pay annually to the Electrical Development Company, a subsidiary of the Mackenzie and Mann interests, and how much liability is assumed if we carry out this agreement? This company which we are virtually rechartering has no railway right of way, no tracks or anything else, and for a number of years it has rented a right of way over this ground owned by the Electrical Development Company. I think the minister himself will acknowledge that his information is not correct when he says that the whole right of way from Toronto to Hamilton is owned by this new company. I think he has been misinformed in that regard. The letter is very skilfully written. It says that this company owns a piece of land in the city of Hamilton, also in Toronto and in St. Catharines, and that the title to all this land is in the Canadian Northern Railway Company. As a matter of fact, the title of that strip of land, the land through Hamilton, is not owned by this railway company, but is owned by a company of Sir Henry Pellatt's, known as the Toronto Dwelling Company. It is believed that the stock of that company is all held by the Canadian Northern, and probably that is correct. The fact remains, however, that this company is obligated to the Toronto Power Company for the annual lease of the land between Toronto and Hamilton.

Mr. J. D. REID: The statement I made disproves that statement altogether. It is absolutely wrong. The letter I have received, as I stated, came from the accountant for the Government of the Canadian Northern in Toronto. The Canadian Northern system owns this right of way absolutely. The Electrical Development Company have a right of way alongside this road. There is nothing in the statement made by the hon. member for Simcoe.

Mr. CURRIE: I can assure the minister of what I know are facts, and the titles examined in the registry office show exactly the condition of affairs as stated by me. If there is any right of way between Toronto and Hamilton owned by this company, it has been recently purchased. The Toronto Power Company own a strip of land one hundred feet wide running from Hamilton to Toronto. I am not a betting man, but I would be safe in betting any amount of money that not one inch of that land outside of the corporation limits of either Toronto or Hamilton is owned by anybody except the Toronto Power Company's subsidiary, the Electrical Development Company, but this railway company has a lease of it. I want the minister to state to the House whether this company owns title to those lands, or has a lease for this land, and if there is any liability for the annual rental for it. Before we pass the third reading, I want to be assured that this company, which we are taking over has not to pay a large sum annually for the lease of the land between Toronto and Hamilton.

Mr. J. D. REID: I may say that they have not to pay one dollar. There is no lease.

Mr. CAHILL: I am not quite clear on the question as to whether or not we have a right of way from Toronto to St. Catherines or only a right of way in a part of Toronto. Have we a right of way between Hamilton and Toronto? That letter does not say so.

[Mr. Currie.]

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind hon. members that we are not in committee, and the minister has already spoken.

Mr. CURRIE: There are some questions to be put on this Bill which should be answered.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has exhausted his right to speak.

Mr. CURRIE: I move that the Bill be not read the third time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, the hon. member has exhausted his right to speak. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and Bill read the third time.

On the motion of Mr. Morphy that the said Bill do now pass and its title be as on the Order Paper:

Mr. CURRIE: Before that motion is passed, I move that it be not now passed, and that its title be not as on the Order Paper, but that it be referred back to committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is not in order.

Mr. CURRIE: I have the right to speak on any motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may move to change the title of the Bill but he cannot move at this stage to recommit it.

Mr. CURRIE: I move, if some hon. gentleman will second it, that the title of this Bill be struck out.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Before the Bill passes, I would like to know if this railway is one of the assets which is to be transferred to the Dominion under the Act of last session?

Mr. J. D. REID: This company is a subsidiary of the Canadian Northern, and the stock is owned and controlled by the Canadian Northern Railway system.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It comes to the people of Canada now?

Mr. J. D. REID: Oh, yes.

Motion that the Bill pass and that the title be as on the Order Paper agreed to.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

3. If so, with whom was the contract made, and what are the particulars thereof?

Mr. READ (Prince)—:

1. What amount has been paid by the Government to each of the following newspapers: Charlottetown Guardian, Charlottetown Examiner, Island Patriot, Summerside Journal Agriculturist, Pioneer and Farmer, Charlottetown Herald, Charlottetown Watchman, from the 1st of August, 1914, to the 1st of January, 1918?
2. What portion of the amount so paid was for advertising in connection with the war?

Mr. LAVIGUEUR:

What were the gross earnings of the National Transcontinental Railway for the year ending 31st March, 1918; how much was earned between Moncton and Quebec, between Quebec and Cochrane Junction, between Cochrane Junction and Winnipeg, and between Lake Superior Junction and Fort William, and what amount has been paid by that railway to the Canadian Pacific for terminal charges at Quebec?

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has the Government notified the civil servants who have enlisted with the first contingent with the understanding that they would receive their salary besides their soldier's pay, that they would now only receive their soldier's pay?
2. How many civil servants enlisted under that agreement?
3. What is the total amount involved by the proposed reduction?

THE BUDGET.

Lieut.-General Sir SAM HUGHES (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the House owing to the fact that I am suffering from a rather severe cold, but it may turn out for the best, after all, in that my remarks will necessarily be curtailed.

At the outset I wish to compliment the Acting Minister of Finance (Hon. A. K. Maclean) on the plain, unadulterated, and modest financial statement which he has submitted. On the occasion of its delivery I remarked that it was the first intelligible Budget speech that I had heard for a good many years. Those of us who were members of the last Parliament will remember that about a year ago I felt called upon to express in the House my views of the hon. gentleman (Mr. A. K. Maclean) as financial critic of the Opposition. I have pleasure now in saying that his constructiveness in formulating an intelligible Budget has been very successful. The plain, simple manner in which the financial statement was presented has satisfied the House and, I think, the country as a whole. I therefore have pleasure in expressing my appreciation of the work of the Acting Minister of Finance.

If I may be permitted, Sir, I should like to place on Hansard a few ideas concerning democracy and the right of Parliament and the public to free speech, as far as that is consistent with the carrying on of this war to a successful issue. Undoubtedly the liberties of England, which have spread to other lands, are largely due to the fact that from time immemorial Englishmen have claimed the right of free speech in Parliament and in the press. True democracy is open, frank, free trust in the people, bogus democracy, or autocracy, fears the people, suppresses the facts and suppresses the people as far as it may. Autocracy is mistrustful; autocracy imposes restrictions and repression. Chloroform is a splendid anesthetic, but it is a mighty poor food, and even as an anesthetic it must be carefully administered. I therefore deprecate anything like the imposition of chloroform methods in connection with public affairs, whether those of the country generally or those pertaining more particularly to the war.

We hear over and over again in the press the cry of the autocrat, or the imbecile—for the two are very often the same—that in war democracy fails; that democracy cannot meet the situation caused by war. I have been a careful reader of history and a student of matters connected with the war, and I have yet to see the situation presented during this conflict, whether in Britain, Canada or France, that could not be successfully met by the application of the old methods of responsible government to which we have so long been accustomed. No situation can arise that calls for autocratic methods which are not in harmony with the principle of responsible government. We have had a recent illustration in Canada. On a certain occasion a certain gentleman in a certain place wanted to give utterance to certain ideas. Every restriction that gentle autocracy could devise was placed upon him, without success. Free speech and free action have settled and calmed the great Dominion of Canada to a greater degree than any one could believe possible, and they have most successfully alleviated the situation. Repression is always the policy and the practice of weak and incompetent men. The freedom of the press must be maintained; the press must be given the opportunity of selling itself, or not, as it chooses. The press must be left free. As the poet says:

> If the ways to hell are free,
> We leave them free to Heaven.

I think, therefore, that the press should be left absolutely free and untrammelled, each newspaper being allowed to conduct itself in its own way, as far as possible consistent with the rights of the people in this great war. Recently it has been my privilege again and again to see some censored articles that have been prevented from going before the people. Really, one would scarcely believe it possible that men of such narrow vision could be found as to repress and cut out section after section of articles that have been published again and again in England. If you talk with any one coming from England you will find that things are known there concerning our forces and concerning everything that is going on which are religiously suppressed in this great Dominion. I do not know who the censors are; I assume that they are men of great breadth of judgment, soundness of conception, and so on. I do not know whether they are inspired by some of these new councils and committees that are being formed; I know nothing about that, and care less; but I do say that the repression and censoring of articles that should find their way into the public press should be stopped. We knew that we got a trimming at Cambrai; what was the use of trying to hide it? We knew that we got a trimming at St. Quentin; what was the use of trying to hide it? Let us, like men, roll up our sleeves and say to the enemy: It was your turn then; we will meet the situation and in a very short time the tables will be turned; our boys will be on the attack and the German hordes will be rolling back over the very ground on which they advanced a short time ago. That is the spirit that should prevail among the people.

We had a secret session of Parliament here; I ask every hon. gentleman who was present at that secret session whether one word was uttered which might not fairly and squarely have been published broadcast in the newspapers the day before or the day after the meeting? Not a word. To my mind, this eternal fear of trusting the people is laughable. Who are the people? Who are we? Who are the Government, that they seek for one instant to muffle public sentiment or prevent the people from knowing what is going on? The Government is composed of magnificent honourable gentlemen; I have not a word to say against them, but I do think that two or three good Cabinets could be formed out of the material found in the members of Parliament gathered around this Government. There is scarcely a township or county council in Canada could not furnish material just as good—I say this with all due respect—as that which is found in those who are carrying on the affairs of this country. There is method in my madness; what I want to impress on the House is that we should trust the people. If some of the people I have mentioned could not make a better showing than some members of the Government, God pity them. Let us, therefore, be careful that, in seeking to establish democracy in Germany, we do not establish autocracy in Canada.

Some few months ago a general election was held in Canada. In the election campaign the one great issue that was set before the people was: "Strain every effort to win the war and to preserve the priceless gem of liberty, and do it quickly." We supported the Government and demanded prompt action with efficiency rather than slow deliberate action without full efficiency. That was seven months ago. In 1915, within seven months from the organization of the first Canadian expeditionary force, 33,000 men from Canada had crossed over to Great Britain, and between 15,000 and 20,000 of them had crossed to France and Belgium, and had immortalized themselves by winning one of the greatest victories in the world. These men, who were termed by gentlemen of repressive tendencies as untrained, undisciplined soldiers, when they were confronted in that battle with from ten to twenty times their number of Germans, showed the world what democracy could do. It is my prayer and, I believe, it is the prayer of the Allied forces, that the remnant of that gallant band shall yet tread the soil of Germany as conquerors and victors in this great struggle. Seven months ago the Military Service Act was brought in. Comment is needless.

This is a new House, composed of new men, independent thinkers, men not yet circumscribed by so-called party discipline. True discipline in educational as well as in military matters, means, as I have always maintained, freedom of thought and action, instruction, development, polish, capability, strength of character, and resolution. These are the characteristics of discipline, according to the proper interpretation of the term. The so-called discipline is merely repression. The members of this House are not yet influenced as the party whips mildly crack the lash, but they are strong, capable men, resolute of purpose to help this Government and if necessary, to compel this Government to live up to its pre-election promises in regard to winning the war, and to go as far and as fast in that regard as the Government chooses to go. We are behind the Government's back until the finish. The people at large impel hon. members, while they in turn, in firm, kindly ways, will inspire the Government to action. The aim which actuates this House is to help to win the war; to help to smash the enemy; to help to maintain pure and unsullied the freedom our ancestors won and which they have handed down to us; to help to overthrow and root out every vestige of tyranny to be found in Germany, aye, or in Canada,—and, let it be done quickly. Action is the word. I know I voice the sentiments of my colleagues when I urge the Government to full, energetic, effective and whole-hearted action, and I have said, we are behind them as far and as fast as they choose to go along those lines. The true people of Canada, worthy of the fullest trust and confidence, stand behind us and them. Let chloroform methods, therefore, disappear from the public life of this country, and let true democratic principles prevail.

There are immediately before the people of Canada four great problems. There is another problem which I look on as an after-the-war problem, of which my hon. friend from Moosejaw (Mr. Calder) has charge, and which I regard as only second in importance to the furnishing of men. These four problems are food, money, inspiration, and men, and in these the problems of producing and saving in producing and of spending and saving in spending, are simple. With the production of food I shall not detain the House, as that matter is in good hands. Production has been hampered by the cost of agricultural implements, not so much on account of the duty as on account of the long term notes and high cost of financing these articles. As regards the saving of food, it may be noted that at the beginning of the war, it cost a great deal of money to dispose of camp refuse. We set to work, however, and turned what had formerly been a great source of expense into a source of revenue, and I have every reason to believe that the Minister of Militia has been carrying out the plan laid down in the early days of the war. All the garbage of the camps was turned into a source of revenue. Hundreds of hogs, and in some camps, thousands of hogs were fed and sold, and in that way the country reaped large sums of money. I would respectfully suggest that if the Food Controller wants some simple lines upon which to act, he might consult General Langton, who is now Paymaster General at headquarters, and Colonel Mullin, of Winnipeg, who has had a good deal of experience in this matter. At the start, the quantity of rations issued to the men was here and there a little too great. This excess was claimed by those people as their own property and was disposed of in ways which we did not consider to be to advantage of the people of Canada who were footing the bills. Accordingly, we formed plans which we put into operation, and I have it on the authority of the Paymaster General who has recently retired, that up to that period we had saved upwards of $2,000,000 on little odds and ends in connection with rationing alone. The same policy was carried out on the other side, and by saving in little things in our food production, we saved very large sums of money to the Dominion of Canada. I believe all these plans, perhaps with improvements, are being carried on by my successor.

Let us next take up the question of raising money, and saving it while we are raising it. I regret exceedingly that the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) is absent. We miss his genial smile and presence. I regret his illness very much, but there are conflicting reports regarding it. The House was one day officially informed that the Minister of Finance was ill. The next day the press agencies of California offered to the press of Canada a message of a thousand words comprising an interview which had supposedly taken place with the Minister of Finance and proving that he was not ill, but that he was in the best of health. That report was confirmed by travellers and others who had the pleasure of meeting the Minister of Finance in California. The House was subsequently informed that it was the purpose of the Minister of Finance to return to Canada, but he was importuned not to return to this country until his health was fully restored, but to go to Washington. There has been considerable comment throughout the country on these statements. I do not wish to enter into them, but there is nothing that the public like more than to be fully trusted, and nothing that they dislike more than to find themselves sidetracked. I shall not use any stronger terms. One is impelled to ask this question: Is the real aim in this regard to help the boys at the front to win the war, or to help certain directors to retain peaceful possession and control of munitions and money raised by this Government?

At the outbreak of the war in 1914, times were hard; depression was found on every side; dinner pails were empty, and poverty stalked through the homes of the land. The Minister of Finance declared that he could not finance for more than 20,000 men, and objected to sending 33,000 men overseas. He was reasoned with and urged to raise sufficient revenue, and finally we got the 33,000 men across. I shall not enter into the details of this, because they are all well known to hon. members and to the people of this country. Lord Kitchener, early in the war, cabled me for 200,000 shells, asking me to get them made in the United States of America. I shall not enter into this matter further than to point out that at once the idea of raising revenue and making the country prosperous presented itself to us, and the shells were accordingly made in Canada. The only member of the Government whom I consulted on this matter was the Prime Minister, and in all fairness to him I must say that on that and every other occasion I got every assistance and backing from him. It was impossible to get these two hundred thousand shells made in Canada at first, because our manufacturers and financiers lacked confidence, and it took a week or more to get the thing under way. But I knew that if once the thing were started, money would come into this country; we should have plenty of money in the banks for carrying on the war and for any other purposes for which we might require it, and the dinner pails would be filled. The plan was that I was to act as Lord Kitchener's direct agent. The Shell Committee was set up, who were to make contracts for shells with me, as the representative of the British Government. Several questions came up; for instance, whether we should use basic or acid steel; then there were the questions of copper and zinc and explosives and of procuring fish and other supplies in this country. But these are all old stories. Suffice it to say that in a very short period thereafter we had money in Canada in every bank, and in the pocket of every man and woman throughout the length and breadth of this land. We had a period of prosperity such as we had never experienced before. Upwards of one billion and a half of money was deposited in the banks in this country at three per cent or less.

A good deal has been said about profiteering in connection with the manufacture of munitions. I have made a careful analysis, but other hon. gentlemen in this House are better posted, having gone into the matter more in detail. Briefly, the record is as follows: Twenty-five per cent of those who entered into the manufacture of munitions completely failed and lost their money, and I have yet to find any person express the slightest bit of sympathy for any of these poor beggars who put up their own money—not the Government's money as was done in Great Britain and the United States, but their own money—and then failed in the manufacture of munitions. Fifty per cent came out a little more than even, and about twenty-five per cent, owing in some instances to good work and in others to slight encouragement from the Munitions Board and elsewhere, succeeded in making money.

Upwards of a year ago the United States entered the war. Then they wanted shells, and our own industries not being very buoyant at the time, I personally took steps with a view to having the United States get a proportion of their shells and other munitions of war made in Canada, but the Chairman of the Imperial Munitions Board declined at that time to permit American munitions to be made in this country. I had this in view: We were making munitions for Great Britain; large sums of money were being raised in Canada for making munitions, not for the Canadian Government alone, but for the British Government as well. The British Government could have had these supplies made in England, but so long as we could raise the money in this country they turned the work over to us. At that time we had an adverse trade balance against the United States, we owing them, roughly, four hundred million dollars, and I felt that we could pay that off and restore the equilibrium of exchange, and make money for Canada, if we could make shells and munitions of war for the American Government; and I still hold that view. But as I have said, Canadian manufacturers were not permitted at that time to manufacture munitions for the United States. Later on, it is true that after considerable agitation arrangements were made whereby these munitions were made in Canada, but in the meantime a number of our fellows, wearying of doing nothing in Canada and despairing of this arrangement ever being brought about, established their plants in the United States, and to-day our manufacturers have plants in the United States at Buffalo, Batavia, and twenty other places I could name, where Canadian capital is being employed in making munitions for the United States Government. In my opinion, these munitions should have been made by the factories of our own country. Then the balance of trade would have been in our favour, and we should not have had to pay from two to two and a quarter per cent exchange when sending money to the United States. I am not saddling responsibility for this directly on the Government, but I say it would have been money saved for this country. So much for that.

Money has been lost or wasted in Canada in the following, among other, ways: The National Service Commission was time and money frittered away and wasted. I have discussed that matter before in other sessions, and shall not take it up again to-day. The Canadian Home Defence Force was also time and money frittered away. The Military Service Act has cost the individuals of this country affected by it many many hundreds of thousands of dollars. I know one young man who has had to spend upwards of fifty dollars, through no fault of his own, in running back and forth to tribunals and for medical examinations. The Act has not only been an annoyance to the people of Canada, but a tremendous bill of expense as well. I might interject here that when the Act was introduced I appealed to the Government, both privately and on the floor of the House, to enforce the Militia Act, as it would much better fill the bill. We could have called out three or four hundred thousand men for training in Canada, and out of that number who would have been training in Canada last fall we could have secured at least two hundred thousand volunteers for the front; and if they would not volunteer, we could have sent them to the front under the Militia Act just as we are sending them to-day. Under that Act we could also have conscripted other men for any useful employment in the Dominion. I am satisfied that if that Act had been applied, there would have been no trouble and everything would have gone on harmoniously. Many of these boys object to being called conscripts, but after a week or two they are just as keen as the lads who volunteered early in the war, and I am satisfied that with a few amendments to the Militia Act, and a few regulations here and there, we could easily have got two hundred thousand men more than we have to-day, and I know they would have been much better trained. However, that is past, and I do not want to raise ghosts.

I am sorry the Minister of Justice is not present, because another place where I think a great deal of money has been wasted is on the so-called Dominion Police officers running up and down the country, riding on the trains, and arresting everybody except the men they should arrest. I have again and again submitted a list of the people in the county I have the honour to represent who should be taken, but not one of them has been approached yet. On the other hand, I could name fifty decent fellows whom the Act does not affect at all who have been bagged and put to all sorts of inconvenience and trouble, kept waiting hours and sometimes days by the so-called Dominion Police officers rambling up and down the country. These officers should be put to some useful occupation; sawing wood would be very congenial.

Another place where money has been deliberately wasted, in my opinion, is on the War Lecture Bureau. I do not know yet what its purpose is, or how it is composed, or who was responsible for selecting its head. But I realize this, that ninety-nine per cent of the people in the county I represent can deliver just as good lectures as the men who are sent there to lecture to them.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Better.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I believe that the Bureau has been established, not to educate the people on great national subjects, or to maintain the spirit of our people, but along lines congenial to the hon. gentleman who has been instrumental in setting this thing up, and he has certainly added insult to injury so far as I am concerned by placing at the head of the Bureau a man who year in and year out has persistently blackguarded, maligned and lied about me in every imaginable way.

If the hon. gentleman thinks I am going to permit any fiddling concern like that to go up and down the country robbing the people, all I can say is that he is reckoning without his host. I shall expose them on every occasion. I look upon it merely as a four-flushing performance and as under-estimating the intelligence of the people. There is not a line they send out in these circulars that cannot be sent out by the newspapers, and the information can be better placed before the people through the medium of the Press than by these lecture bureaus which are performing up and down the country. I am sorry to think that the Government could be so hoodwinked and I cannot understand what was the strange, unseen, hidden hand pressure that these gentlemen were able to put upon the Government of the day to induce them to permit this sort of thing and to impose upon the people and on the treasury of the country. There is nothing like talking out in meeting and having the facts put clearly. I know what the sentiment of the country is and I feel satisfied that in what I have said I have only expressed the sentiments of the people.

Furthermore, we are to have a Registration Board, or something of that kind, the only difference between the registration now proposed and under the National Service Board being that whereas this is compulsory the other was not. In a widely scattered country like the Dominion of Canada any such registration as that which is proposed is doomed to a miserable failure. The records will show in a very short time that the whole thing is a farce, that it cannot accomplish any useful purpose that might not be accomplished by taking up the voter's lists or consulting the assessment rolls in any township or municipality in Canada. It can all be done in that way, but, if we are only to get lists of men and little girls who are willing to go out on a farm—why it's piffle. In a great country like this, thousands of miles in extent, you are going to ask a man who saws wood here if he will go and work some place else and you are going to get some little girl in the Civil Service to give up her job, go some place else, put on a pair of breeches and pick berries. The thing is ridiculous and I wonder that any man with an ounce of common sense in his head ever thought of such a thing or allowed it to be undertaken. What is the malign influence, what is the hidden hand which this gentleman seems to exercise in connection with this war lecture bureau and this registration business?

Another waste of money is in having two Militia Departments. We have one Militia Department here presided over by a mighty good fellow. We have in England another Militia Department. I asked a question in this House last year and I received a deliberate mis-statement in reply, regarding the number of people employed at Argyle House. I knew it was a falsehood at the time, but I let it pass.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman is not in order in saying that the Government furnished him with a deliberate mis-statement and that remark should be withdrawn.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Did I say that the Government furnished me with a deliberate mis-statement?

Mr. SPEAKER: I so understood the hon. gentleman.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I said I was furnished.

Mr. SPEAKER: By whom?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I did not say. At all events, the facts were not made public, and I am in a position to say now that two weeks before the answer, such as it was, was given in the House there was a great cleaning out. There was a hurried clearing out of the fellows in order to reduce the number of men who had been hanging around Argyle House and kindred places at that time. The quibble—I can say that—and I do not charge any one here with being guilty of quibbling—was this: they limited the answer to a number of people employed in Argyle House, but it should have included the number employed in four or five other buildings, I understand, in the immediate locality. If half of that army of employees had been behind Gough when the line broke at St. Quentin the German attack might have been checked. We have a great many men in England, some hundred odd thousands, and, according to the returns which we get, there are only fifteen thousand or sixteen thousand fit to keep up the strength of the men in the trenches. The money is going to pay for the service of the hundred thousand men we have in England and for those who are doing very little work, whereas the same work is being done and duplicated here. This work should be and could be done here. Under the old system General Carson and thirty men did the work in England which is now being done by hundreds of men and minister surrounded by his retinue. I shall not say anything with regard to the way in which the work was done in those times, but if a comparison be made between then and now it will be entirely in favour of the old system.

I desire to say a word about that magnificent young officer, General Turner, who was put in command in England. When that happened I wrote him and warned him that he was committing military suicide. I pointed out to him that it would be utterly impossible for any man to carry on the work of his command circumscribed as he was and with such a minister as he had. There was loaded upon him without his consent an officer who had no more conception of a democratic army than a hen has of logic. That is the way that poor Turner has been driven from pillar to post. General Turner was one of the best officers that ever entered the field and one who always kept in view the necessity of saving the lives of his men. He would carry out his plans in such a way as to minimize the loss of life. He first looked after the lives of his boys. He would not send his men up against machine guns as some officers do with reckless disregard for life. No body of men can stand up against machine gun fire; it will mow them down by thousands. Two machine guns brought down eighteen hundred British soldiers at the Battle of Neuve Chapelle before the position was finally captured. The idea of rushing men up against machine guns may look nice in the papers but General Turner had too much regard for his men to have them butchered in that way. I notified the British Government when I was Minister of Militia and Defence protesting against sending our Canadian boys up against machine gun positions without any protection in the way of shields and I said that if they continued to do so it would be my duty to provide them with a bunch of Texas steers because they would afford the German machine gunners the same amusement and practice as our gallant lads would, and would make just as good targets for the machine guns as would our men. General Turner would have made a magnificent corps commander in the field if he had been put in command of one or two Corps when the Dominion had the honour and credit of sending her brave boys to the front. But, he is held in London and as a result the career of a gallant soldier is blighted. The minister, under whom this has been going on has no reputation of his own to blight.

There is another reason why a great deal of money was lost last winter and that was because of the absence of motive power on our railways. The whole trouble last winter was not the want of coal but the want of motive power to haul the coal. The daily consumption of coal per locomotive on our railways is usually about four or five tons, but last winter they burned double that quantity and they could not haul more than half a train. If they had spent money to get motive power on the railways traffic would have moved more quickly over the different lines. The Government should get the advanced idea rather than the repressive idea.

The question of loans is a very interesting subject of discussion. In this matter not only millions but tens of millions of the money of the people of Canada might have been saved. With your permission, Sir, I shall read an extract published, I think it was in 1915, in The Courier, a standard publication in the city of Toronto, and I shall assume responsibility for the statements in it because I have the whole thing in detail. However, I shall not weary the House with those statements to a greater extent than is set forth in the article in the Courier, although I have an analysis of all the loans. This refers to the best loan of the lot, one for $45,000,000, made in the United States in 1915, I think:

Did the Hon. Mr. White Succeed in Wall Street?

The Story of the Getting of Forty-five Million Dollars from Shrewd United States Investors.

Did Mr. White score a triumph, or was the triumph scored by Morgans and their associates? Will Canada lose ten million dollars by this transaction?

When the Canadian Government borrows money and agrees to pay a certain rate of interest, that transaction affects every borrower, public or private, in the Dominion. For example, if the Canadian Government will pay only 3½ per cent., the Provinces will probably be able to borrow at 3¾ or 4 per cent., the municipalities at 4 or 4¼ per cent., and private borrowers at 4½ or 5 per cent. The Dominion Government, according to history, can always borrow a little more cheaply than the Provinces, while the Provinces borrow a little cheaper than the cities, and the cities a little less than the private borrower.

Incidentally I may say that I took up a paper the other day and saw where the city of Victoria, B.C., is to-day paying seven per cent interest, and some other city more than seven per cent interest, on loans.

Hence, every transaction by the Dominion Government affects the Provinces, the municipalities and the private borrowers. The Canadian Minister of Finance sets the rate at which all borrowers shall pay. If the minister is careless or extravagant, and pays an excessive rate of interest, he forces all other borrowers to pay a higher rate. If he is frugal and a good borrower, he helps all other borrowers to get money cheaply.

To take an extreme case. Supposing we had a lazy, small-headed bungling Minister of Finance at Ottawa who borrowed money on a large scale at seven per cent interest. The Provinces would be compelled to compete with him, and might have to pay 7½ per cent. Then the municipalities would have to compete with the Dominion and the Provinces in the money markets, and would have to pay 8 per cent. Private borrowers, say railways, traction companies, manufacturers, and so on, would be forced by competition to pay 9 per cent. Thus we see that every loan of a big nature must be made on terms which are set by the Dominion Minister of Finance.

Why We Went to New York.

With these circumstances in mind, let us examine the latest exploit of the Hon. Thomas White, Canadian Minister of Finance. He is getting all the money for war expenditures from London. The British Government has agreed to help him in this respect. He has no difficulties so far as war expenditures are concerned. But if he has not enough money to pay for other expenditures, such as canals, post-offices, armouries, docks, dredging and other public services. He must borrow elsewhere.

Now, Hon. Thomas White needed forty-five million dollars to meet the deficit of the year 1915. Whether there ought to be a deficit or whether there ought not to be a deficit is not a matter to be discussed here. There is a deficit and that deficit must be met. Therefore the Hon. Thomas White arranged with the Bank of Montreal, J. P. Morgan & Co., Brown Brothers & Co., First National Bank and National City Bank of New York to raise the necessary forty-five million.

There can be no objection to our going to New York to borrow. It is practically the only market open to us, though the Dominion had never gone there before. The Provinces and the municipalities have been going there since the war broke out. They have borrowed over a hundred millions in that city during the past twelve months, and they also got their money at reasonable rates. Moreover, Canada is buying so much more from the United States than we are selling to that country that it was difficult to pay for all we wanted. The rate of exchange was therefore against us. A big borowing like Mr. White contemplated would help to restore the balance. That is, the Dominion Government would get its money not in cash, but in credits due American firms by Canadian creditors. Thus it would be beneficial all around and prevent the necessity of sending $45,000,000 in gold to New York to pay our debts there.

How the Rate was Decided.

So far so good. The next point for Hon. Thomas White to consider was "What rate of interest shall I offer the New York bankers?" In deciding this he had several points to keep in mind. In the first place, the New York bankers were anxious to see Mr. White borrow there. They were willing to make the loan. They are interested in seeing United States firms continue to sell largely in Canada, which they could not do if Canada has no money to pay for goods. It was just as vital to the United States to lend us that money as it was for Canada to get that money. Each party to the bargain was interested. Hence Mr. White must have known that the situation favoured a low rate of interest.

In the second place, Mr. White knew that the Ontario Government was borowing there at five per cent. interest, and that the city of Toronto had got money there at five per cent. He would know, therefore, that he should be able to borrow in New York at 4½ or 4¾ per cent.

In the third place he had to consider what other countries were doing. Great Britain has just raised over three billions of dollars at 4½ per cent. But this interest is subject to income tax, so that the borrower would be netting between 4 and 4¼ per cent. If the income tax goes up in the near future, the man who lends to the British Government will not net more than 4 per cent. Having examined this situation, Mr. White would have to decide whether the interest on his New York borrowings would be subject to any taxes. He did this and decided that they would not. It was announced that these interest payments would be "free from taxes imposed by the Dominion of Canada, including any income tax." Not only did Mr. White promise not to tax these interest payments himself, but he will not let any one else tax them. Thus whatever interest the United States investor got would be "net." As the British Government was paying about 4 per cent. net the Dominion Government should pay about 4½ per cent. net.

The Generous Terms Offered.

These are the preliminary figures. Now let us see what Hon. Thomas White actually did. He agreed to take $45,000,000 from the New York bankers, and give 5 per cent. gold notes as follows:

$25,000,000 .....Due August 1st, 1916
$20,000,000 .....Due August 1st, 1917

He agreed to pay the interest half-yearly on February 1st and August 1st. He agreed to pay the interest in United States gold in New York City. He agreed that these notes should be convertible, at the option of the holder, at any time prior to three months before maturity, into twenty-year five per cent bonds of the Dominion of Canada, par for par, to be free from any right of prior redemption. Further he agreed to take this loan at the following prices:

The one year note at 100, and interest.

The two year notes at 99½ and interest.

Finally, he agreed to pay the New York bankers ¾ of one per cent commission on the proceeds.

This was all he agreed to do. Yet when one figures it out, no other bonuses were necessary. Five per cent. interest for the gold bonds of the finest British Dominion, no taxes, half-yearly interest, payable interest and principal in gold, convertible into twenty-year bonds at option—what more could the keenest Yankee want? And he didn't want any more. As a matter of fact, that forty-five million loan was taken up in five minutes. The books opened, the investors yelled "We take it" and the books closed. It was the swiftest sale of bonds ever made in the history of the world.

It was easy money for the bankers. Their commission amounted to $336,750, and they earned it in five minutes. Of course, that wasn't much among five of them, but it would buy quite a few dinners at the Waldorf. It would pay the rent of the five institutions for two or three months at least.

Then the vital question comes, "Why did the United States investor grab that issue as if he were getting gold dollars for ninety cents?" The only possible answer is that the Hon. Thomas White agreed to pay five per cent when he could have get the money for 4½ per cent. There cannot possibly be any other answer.

Now, let us see what Canada lost. The interest on $25,000,000 for one year at five per cent and on $20,000,000 for two years at the same rate is $3,250,000. The interest at 4½ per cent would be $2,925,000. Mr. White, therefore, cost Canada $325,000 by a mistake in judgment.

There seems to be no possible defence. He knew that the credit of the Dominion was better than that of the Provinces or the city of Toronto, and that those authorities had borrowed at five per cent. He knew that Great Britain had just borrowed at about four per cent net. He knew that the United States bankers have more money than they know what to do with, and that they realize that they must lend to Canada to keep up their sales in this country. All these facts were known to every financial writer and every financial broker in Canada, and hence should have been known to the Minister of Finance. All these facts were public facts.

Then Why Did Mr. White Promise to Pay Such a High Rate?—What Will be the General Effect?

Finally, think what this means to Canada. Suppose the Provinces and the municipalities want to borrow another hundred millions in New York during the next year, what will happen? The bankers of New York, having found Mr. White an easy victim, will hold up the smaller borrowers. They will demand 5½ per cent as sure as fate. Think of the loss that will mean?

Figure it out for yourselves. The various borrowers want a hundred millions for an average of five years. They pay 5½ per cent. instead of five per cent. What will it amount to? The answer is, two and a half million dollars.

But there is another way to look at it. Mr. White decides to pay five per cent and he invites tenders. J. P. Morgan & Co. offer to buy the bonds at 99¾, another firm offers 101, another offers 102½, and another offers 104¾. Who will get it? The firm that offered 104¾ of course. In that case, instead of getting $44,563,250 for his forty-five million dollars' worth of bonds, Mr. White would have got about $47,250,000, or nearly three millions more than he actually got.

There are financial men who believe rightly or wrongly, that Mr. White could have got two and a half millions more for his bonds than he did get. The test of their belief will be the selling price of these bonds three months hence. If they were then selling at 104, or thereabouts, then these men will be right.

The financiers who claim that Mr. White lost two and a half million dollars have no animus against him. But the fact remains, that the financial world, rightly or wrongly, is laughing. Canada cannot afford in these days to be laughed at.

I have the figures here representing analyses of other loans, made since that time, and, if possible, each succeeding one is worse than its predecessor.

The rate of interest charged is very high and Canada, in consequence has suffered. Every municipality has to pay pretty heavily. As I stated a few minutes ago, Victoria has to pay seven per cent and can scarcely get the money even at that high rate.

There is another matter in connection with which we have lost many millions of dollars, and I would ask the special attention of the Acting Finance Minister to this in the hope that it will be a guide to him for the future. In his speech the other night he stated that bonds of other issues to the extent of $150,000,000 were transferred on the Victory Loan. Am I right in that understanding?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN: Yes.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Those, of course, do not count in the $400,000,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is right.

Sir SAM HUGHES: These, of course, are not included in that $400,000,000?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Nevertheless these $150,000,000 were former issues of bonds that were transferred and came in under the higher rate of interest and better terms of the Victory Loan. Am I right there?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I chanced to be in New York city one day, and in conversation with a gentleman he asked me: "Why not buy some Canadian bonds of the previous issue, you can get them as low as 91 to 93, and you can take them up and plant them in this new loan at 97½ and make money?" I told him I would be delighted to do it if he would loan me the money, that as I had only enough to pay my hotel bill I could not indulge in the experiment. What did happen was this: Bonds to the extent of $150,000,000 were so bought up, and many of them, selling at that time from 91½ to 93, were taken up and turned over; and I would venture to say that the average gain on each was at least 4 per cent. Six millions of dollars went into the pockets of brokers and speculators because of that little transfer clause in the Victory Loan. I would suggest to the Acting Minister of Finance that he should make it impossible in future loans for a graft of $6,000,000 to be made out of the people of Canada. The brokers and stock gamblers of this country netted $6,000,000 by a little turn or trick in the placing of the last Victory Loan. Moreover, Sir, the man who invests his money in business takes his risks before the public. He has to pay an income tax on every dollar of profit above a certain per cent, whereas the man who acquired these bonds by speculation on the market is free from that tax, and can profit to the full extent. That is not fair to the honest purchaser in the Dominion of Canada, and I would like some one, sometime, to give me an explanation of why this sort of thing was permitted. I trust the Acting Finance Minister will see to it that no such game is ever perpetrated again.

Speaking of the Victory Loan, you can ask any banker, bank clerk, or any one handling these bonds, if any purchaser could understand the terms and conditions set out on the application forms. Unless they were paid up in full, the people have to come for them. Some have been lost in transmission. An army of clerks is required, and I understand that a new building is to be put up somewhere in Ottawa to handle this loan, when the whole thing could have been done for nothing. I was in Paris in 1915-16, when a loan was being offered there. There was a row of officers at desks where the loan was being offered. A man would come in, ask for a fifty or one hundred franc bond, would whack up his money, the clerk would make out the bond, keeping a duplicate, and the original would be handed to the man when countersigned by the inspecting officer, and that was the end of it. There was no such paraphernalia such as we had in the Victory Loan. I know, as a matter of fact, how the bank clerks all over the Dominion worked, and worked for nothing. There was an allowance given by the Finance Department to the banks, but not for the work of these clerks, who worked at their regular business in the day time, and put in hours every night to help out this Victory Loan, and they got scarcely a "thank you" for their services.

Then there were bonuses paid to the brokers of upwards of $5,000,000. Does it not seem strange, Sir, that the returns from these brokers are not all in yet? I asked the Acting Minister of Finance the other day what brokers had handled this loan. He was trying to remember the pretexts that the President of the Privy Council puts up: he could not remember who these brokers were. The contract was farmed out to them, and they got many honest, enthusiastic people throughout the country to get out and canvass for the loan. I am satisfied that if a tithe of the energy had been used in other ways, the results would have been more satisfactory, although we raised, by offering the bonds at 5½ to 6 per cent, $400,000,000 out of a surplus of a billion and a half, not counting the money put away in old teapots and stockings. These people should have jumped at taking these bonds as an investment, but we find only $400,000,000 coming forward out of a billion and a half to take advantage of this high rate of interest on the Victory Loan.

Then there has been a loss in connection with separation allowances of a million dollars. That, however, has gone to a good place; it has gone to the wives and widows of the soldiers who went to the front.

Then there has been a loss in connection with exchange on the United States. We have a balance of trade of $400,000,000 against us with the United States. The rate of exchange is 2 1-8. By the exercise of ordinary common sense on the part of the Imperial Munitions Board or the Government, the exchange situation could have been turned into an asset, if we had encouraged the United States to come into Canada and get their munitions early in the game, as they wanted to do. But our munitions makers went to the United States instead and located at Buffalo, Pittsburg, Batavia and other places. I shall not enter into that question further at this stage, although there is another story in connection with it.

We could save time in training men. Time is money. We are wasting money in this respect as things are going now, but I do not blame any one here for that. I have already pointed out the loss in connection with the exemption from interest on Government bonds. I trust that in future the Finance Minister will see that the finances of the country are placed on a common-sense basis, and that the people are not put at the mercy of the bond sellers and brokers of Canada.

Now, as to the raising of men. Men have been raised in the past, not by chance but by system. In the time during which I had the honour to be Minister of Militia we were ahead of our programme right along until the spring of 1916, when recruiting was held up. I pointed out, and said so, that we should apply the Militia Act in the fall of 1916. However, I will not discuss that question. I believe the Government is doing its best to meet the situation, and I am free to admit it has been a difficult one. More important than the raising of men is the saving of men. It costs $3,000 to train a man up to a point of efficiency, and it is necessary to save our men to the greatest extent possible. There are times when it is necessary to sacrifice both men and money. Generalship is too often measured by the number of one's own casualties rather than by the number of the enemy's dead. It is always more congenial, Sir, to your humble servant to bury a dead enemy than a dead friend. Moreover, Sir, I have always stood for the protection of our men both positively and negatively. I had the honour, Sir, of first proposing the trench warfare two years before the war, as the Prime Minister is well aware, and on the very night war was declared, as on occasions both since and before that date.

Suggestions as to trenches, trench mortars, dug outs, trench plates, trench and field shields and many other simple and effective methods of saving the lives of our boys and of overcoming the enemy were furnished by me in this war. Some were adopted, and some were not. At Lens and Passchendaele upwards of 40,000 Canadians went down—fully three divisions. What was the object? What were the aims? One thing is certain: these things prevented the formation of the fifth and sixth divisions. In 1915, when British and Canadian troops were being wasted in foolish attempts to rush soldiers in line over open ground against machine guns and wire entanglements, I pointed out to the British Government the folly of such action. I am happy to say that it was stopped, and that methods to prevent machine gun execution were adopted, although they have not yet been anything like successful. Mind conquers matter. Machine guns can be readily overcome. Without some definite object in sight, no Canadian soldier's life should be sacrificed. The force must have good officers. There must be even-handed justice, no undue or ulterior influence in promotions, either in England or at the front. Fair play for all must be the word.

It is our duty to stop this talk of peace and this talk of when the war will end. It is our duty to realize that the war will end only when Germany is trimmed to a finish. It is our duty to exert every nerve, to roll up every sleeve, in order to accomplish that object. We must accept our rebuffs like men, fill up our ranks, and go on once more. The free democracies of England, France and United States, and their colonies will teach autocracies the world over that the trained freeman is superior every time; that democracy must triumph and autocracy in the end be overthrown.

Mr. D. C. ROSS (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to follow the hon. gentleman seriatim through the various arguments that he made, or to refer in detail to his philosophical dispositions concerning the relative merits of autocracy and democracy. Every member of this House is fully seized of those merits or demerits, as the case may be. But when he was describing the demerits of autocracy and the merits of democracy, I was reminded of the description given by an eminent English statesman of the tenets of the Liberal and Conservative parties. As I remember it, his statement was that Conservatism was distrust of the people tempered by fear, and Liberalism trust of the people tempered by prudence.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Who gave this definition?

Mr. ROSS: Mr. Gladstone, I think. That definition fits in so well with what the hon. gentleman was ascribing to autocracy and democracy that I wondered if he would accept it as a proper description of the standing of the two parties in this House. I agree with what my hon. friend said when he took exception to the autocratic methods of this Government in legislating by Order in Council. Every true democrat in this country will concur in that. Indeed, many hon. gentlemen now sitting to the right of the Speaker, if they would speak their minds frankly, would condemn the Government for many of the steps they have taken by Order in Council during the last six months.

The speech of the hon. gentleman (Sir Sam. Hughes) was really a treat, as his speeches generally are. One was struck very forcibly with the love that must have prevailed between the hon. gentleman and the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) who is not now in his place; it must have exceeded the love of Damon for Pythias. One was struck also with the delightful unanimity that must have prevailed in the old Cabinet when the member for Victoria was a member of it. He charges this Government with more crimes and misdeeds than any member of this House has so far ventured to attribute to it—and I have no doubt that he is telling the truth. He says that their loans were bad and extravagantly made; that the interest was too high; that the lecture bureau was not right; indeed, that everything was bad.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The lecture bureau was a Liberal organization, I understand.

Mr. ROSS: I understand that it was part of the Unionist campaign, and that its object was to cause the people to believe that the Union Government was the only Government that this country ever had or should have. I agree with my hon. friend that members of this Parliament could be chosen who would make up a Government probably more able than the present Administration. I cannot see that the Government have adopted any policies of exceptional value since they came into office; I cannot see that they have even lived up to all their promises. What puzzles me is this: if the Government are as bad as the member for Victoria would have us believe they are, why in the world is he sitting on the right side of the Speaker? Why did he support them in the last election?

Sir SAM HUGHES: The hon. gentleman is puttting words into my mouth; I did not find fault with the Government. In order to show that there were many able men on this side, fit for any Government, I pointed out that many gentlemen here were eminently qualified to govern, even as members of this Government are.

Mr. ROSS: I accept what my hon. friend says, but as I remember his remarks he said that from any township or county council in Canada men could be chosen who would form as good a government as the men on the Treasury benches. I do not know that that is very flattering to members of county councils. I know many members of the county council in Middlesex, men of eminence and pre-eminence, who could give members of this Government a few pointers as to how the affairs of the country should be run. However, I am willing to accept my hon. friend's view of the matter.

I was very much pleased the other night as I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson). I know that he is a radical among radicals, and I admire him for it; I belong to that category myself. I agree absolutely with most of the conclusions he arrived at concerning the railway situation. I take exception to the action of the Government in increasing freight rates; it was improvident, extravagant, uncalled for; it placed an undue burden upon the producing people, and no good can come from it.

Let us take the figures which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) gave to the House. He pointed out that the increase of 15 per cent in the railway rates would mean an imposition of $45,000,000 in additional freight rates on the people of this country. He pointed out, moreover, that the increase in freight rates would cost the consumer from $45,000,000 to $50,000,000 in the amounts added to the prices of commodities affected by that increase. In other words, he pointed out, and, I think, he properly and accurately pointed out, that the people of this country, by this increase of 15 per cent in freight rates, were to be subjected to a tax of $100,000,000.

That was not a good business arrangement. The justification urged by the Government, namely, that they have taxed the Canadian Pacific the small sum of $7,000,000, does not meet the case. What are the facts? The railways of Canada, as the hon. gentleman pointed out, have been paid for time and again by the people of this country. We suppose that the Canadian Northern and some of the other raliways are at the present time owned by the people of Canada. We know we have been putting into their coffers millions upon milions of dollars in land and in money. We know we are still putting money into their coffers, and we are to be asked this session to put more money into their coffers. I cannot understand the inaction of the Government at the present time. It looks to me as if they were trying to steer clear of the whole question. I cannot understand why this Canadian Northern matter has not been brought before the House at an earlier date in the session. I do not understand why the Government had not urged the arbitrators, who are inquiring into the value of the Canadian Northern railway stock, to make their finding earlier, so that on the floor of the House the members who are sent here to represent the people can thresh this thing out and thus avoid further action by Order in Council.

If the members of the House saw, as I did the other day, the report of Lord Shaughnessy in regard to the Canadian Pacific, I am sure they were very much struck with that report. Lord Shaughnessy says that the Canadian Pacific has assets aggregating $818,000,000, that is for railway property. He says, moreover that, apart from that, the Canadian Pacific has extraneous assets—I suppose land, and companies such as steamship companies—aggregating $253,000,000. What is this country doing?

What is this House doing? What is this Government doing? They are allowing this little institution, with assets over $1,000,000,000, to impose a tax on the people of this country, in the way of additional freight rates, of 15 per cent. This company will receive from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000 in the way of profits out of that tax. This company has immense assets and it is paying immense dividends. Those assets were made by the people of Canada, and yet the people of Canada are asked to put into the treasury of the company $25,000,000 or $30,000,000, and the Government says, forsooth: We will take back from the Canadian Pacific $7,000,000 to relieve the taxpayers. That is an absurd, improvident bargain, one that this Government should never have made.

How is this increase in the freight rates going to affect the farmer? The farmer at this time is a very important factor in the winning of the war. Probably he is the most important factor after the man at the front, if not as important. This increase is going to make the farmer pay both going and coming. This Government has seen fit by Order in Council to fix the price of wheat to the farmers at $2.21 per bushel at Fort William or Montreal, as the case may be. Then the Government says: We shall raise the freight rates 15 per cent. That means that the freight rates are taken out of the price of the farmer's grain, and he is, therefore, deprived of that amount of money for his grain. How does the increase affect the manufacturer? The Government has not put its unholy hand on the manufacturer. That would never do. The Government never seems to touch its friends. It does not give the farmer free agricultural implements. It does not put a limitation on the price of binders, stating that they shall be sold for $200; but it allows then to be sold for $250. The farmer has to pay the price of the binder plus the freight on it, because the manufacturer adds the freight to the price. You have the farmer, therefore, losing both ways. He pays the extra freight rate on his binder, and he pays the extra freight rate on his grain. A much more sensible way to have arranged this matter would have been for the Government, if they must wait until the report of the Canadian Northern arbitrators has been received, to pay any deficits that may be incurred in the running of those railways which they say they own. In that way they would save to the people the $30,000,000 which the Canadian Pacific would get, and if there is a small deficit it can be taken out of the public treasury and the Government can in this way economize in this time of stress and strain.

That brings me to another question which also touches the farmer. That is the question of production and free agricultural implements. Since I have been in this House, I have had occasion more than once to vote for free agricultural implements. I was rather surprised to hear the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) say that there was an agreement, implied or expressed, that the members for the West were going to lay aside all tariff issues during this session, and probably during this Parliament. I was pleased on the other hand to learn from the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) that, as far as he was concerned, no such agreement existed. I do not think, in this free, democratic country, members of this House should come to Parliament bound by agreements of any kind. They should come here free to vote in the public interest, and whether a party has to stand or fall, it should stand or fall by that gauge of battle alone. If at the present time production is very important; if it is as important as we believe it to be; if it is as important as this Government said it was six months ago and as, I think, they will still say to-day; if production is so important that they allowed tractors to come into this country free in order to increase production; if production is so important that advertisements for farm labourers have appeared in almost every journal in this country, I contend that the sole rule by which hon. members of this House should be guided in their action on a question of this kind is this: Are free agricultural implements going to help increase production; and is producing more going to help to win the war?

At the last election we on this side of the House submitted to insults, charges and attacks which we did not deserve. We were told that we were disloyal; we were told that we were not true to the Empire; we were told that we did not want to fight for the Empire, simply because we urged upon our people what had been urged upon us by the Government, namely, the necessity of production. All through my riding and in other ridings, that was the charge that was levied against us. Some of the men who levied those charges against us are in this House. Those men who are manufacturers of agricultural implements have at the present time a fine opportunity of standing by the reasons they contended at that time led them to join the Union Government, and the same may be said of the men from the West.

The Union Government, they said was to win the war. Now, if we can prove, and I think we can, that free agricultural implements are going to help production, and so help win the war, these gentlemen should not let their pockets or their politics stand in the way of their patriotism, but be manly enough to say, "We will give the farmer that relief, forgetting our own interests in the interests of the nation at large, so that we may help win the war." I do not think this Government is giving the farmer a fair chance. I represent an agricultural riding. I have tried to be absolutely honest in my actions in connection with this war, I voted for the Military Service Act. I told my people on the hustings I was prepared to stand by the sending of one hundred thousand men to the front. I thought that probably the exigencies of the case demanded that they should be sent. I also told them I had spoken in the House in favour of exemption for farmers, and I still stand for that. But this Government, all along the line, are not giving the farmer and the agriculturist a fair show.

I have already cited the freight rates case, and will now give an instance in connection with the horse trade in this country. Every man who knows anything about farming in this country knows that horse raising is one of our greatest industries, and that the easier a farmer can sell his horses the more prosperous he will be, and the better able to help in a greater production. But since the war began, this Government seems to have only trifled with the horse industry in Canada. I put a question on the Order Paper the other day asking how many horses the Government had bought in Canada last year, and I was told that $212,000 had been spent on horses bought in Canada, for use in camps in Canada, as the Prime Minister afterwards explained. But on looking through the estimates of the Militia Department I see that for the year ending March 31, 1917, $3,400,000 was set aside for purchasing remounts for use on the continent, and I find in the estimates this year an item of $3,000,000 more for the same purpose. Now what are are facts? As far as I can get them, they are these: very few of the horses that have been bought with that amount of money have been bought in Canada. Why is this? Our horses are well known to be the best in the world on account of being the best hoofed, owing to the limestone in the soil, and they have as good legs as any horses in the world, which is a most desirable thing for horses used in war. The Government cannot say we did not have the horses in this country, for in the western part of Ontario horses are a drug on the market; many people are simply clamouring for an opportunity to sell their horses. But this Government, which pretends to look after the interests of the farmers and of production, arranges with the British War Office for a Remount Commission to come out here, and they take our $3,400,000 and use it for buying American horses. Train loads of American horses are passing through Sarnia and Windsor every day, as my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) will confirm, while our Canadian horses are left on our farmers' hands.

I have in my hand the monthly bulletin of Agricultural Statistics, and it shows conclusively the growth of the horse trade in this country. The figures, in round numbers, are as follows: In 1912 we had 2,692,000 horses in Canada; in 1913, 2,800,000; 1914, 2,900,000; 1915, 2,996,000; 1916, 3,258,000, and in 1917, 3,412,000. That proves conclusively, to my mind, that there are thousands of horses in this country that could be spared, and that our farmers have been neglected so far as the purchase of their horses is concerned. I think this Government, including the new Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar), would be better employed in giving some of their attention to the farming interests of this country, and particularly the horse industry, than in devoting it to matters of minor importance. There is this also to be taken into account: If the horses are left on the farmer's hands, he has to feed them during the winter at great expense, and the more feed he needs for his horses, the less there is for his cattle, and the less he has to sell; so his stocks are thereby depleted.

I should like to point out another matter in which the farmers have been treated unfairly by this Government under the Order in Council method. The Government fixed the price of wheat at $2.21 Montreal and Port Arthur, and since then the Food Board have passed an order prohibiting the shipment of bran and shorts from the West to the East. The result is that at a time when the farmer is being urged to increase production and to raise cattle, he is unable to do so because he cannot get bran and shorts for feed. I think the shipment of bran and shorts should not have been prohibited by Order in Council or in any other way. I know the farmers of Western Ontario are suffering very greatly on account of being unable to get bran and shorts for feed for their cattle, and how in the world the Government can expect the farmers to raise more cattle, without the means of feeding them, I do not know. That is another way in which our farmers are being treated unfairly by this Government.

Before dealing with the Budget proposals, there is one other matter I shall mention. This Government was elected—that was their claim, anyway—so to guide the destinies of this country that the war might be won. Its platform, as I understood it, was equality of sacrifice in the conscription of men, and equality of sacrifice in the conscription of wealth, as far as that was possible. It was to be a 50-50 proposition; not one of those 50-50 propositions such as the Cabinet amounts to, which is in reality on a 75-25 basis, but a real 50-50 proposition. The men who could fight were to be taken, and the men of wealth were to be made to contribute to the exchequer of this country in order to carry on the war. The Government gave another pledge, and that was that men who were necessary to production on the farms should be exempted. Mr. Speaker, in all seriousness, I do not think the Government has kept these pledges. It has not kept its pledge to the farmers in regard to exemption where necessary for agricultural production. It has not kept its pledge to the common people, that men of great wealth shall sacrifice their wealth for the common cause. The Government claim that military exigencies compel them to depart from their pledge of exemption to the farmers. But a pledge is a pledge, and it should be kept. Germany gave the same excuse when she invaded Belgium; she said that military exigencies made it necessary to invade Belgium, and she must hack her way through. I appeal to this Government to keep their pledge to the agriculturists of this country in so far as is necessary to provide that our boys at the front and our Allies shall be fed.

No person can doubt the importance of that. Australia is so far away and shipping is so scarce that, although there is any quantity of produce, it cannot be brought to England. We must be the bread basket of the army and anything this Government does to reduce production is going to have a very detrimental effect on the winning of the war. Did the Government make this pledge to the people, and especially the farmers, of this country?

We know what took place in Western Ontario. There are men sitting in this House who would not be sitting here if certain promises had not been made to the farmers, and there are men out of this House who would have been here, and who deserve to be here, if these promises had not been made. I know as a matter of fact that one Oliver Hazelwood, a so-styled captain, I think, sat down in the Tecumseh House at London and sent everywhere throughout the country thousands of telegrams stating that the farmers would be exempted. I know that the agricultural representative of this Government did the same thing. I saw telegrams and letters sent all through the country stating that farmers would be exempted and these were submitted to the exemption tribunals as evidence in support of claims for exemption. It would be interesting to know who paid for these telegrams. I find in the accounts of last fiscal year, up to the thirty-first March, an item of $437,000 for cablegrams, telegrams, etc. I would ask the Acting Minister of Finance (Hon. A. K. Maclean) if he could tell me whether, in the accounts for the year ended March 31, 1918, items will appear that will show that the Government paid for these telegrams that were sent out by Oliver Hazelwood to the farmers of this country for the purpose of winning the election, or any other purpose whatever. Were the people of this country paying the election expenses of the Union Government? I would like to ask another question in regard to telegrams. The hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) pointed out how extravagant this Government was in regard to some things. I know that to be true, and I would therefore like to know, as a matter of fact, who paid for these telegrams. It has been stated that when a ship was about leaving with fifteen hundred invalided soldiers the officer in command would say to each of the boys: "Would you like to send word to your people at home that you are about to sail for Canada?" They would say: "Certainly, we would like to send home to our people that we are coming."

Therefore a cablegram would be sent in the name of each man and at the end of the cablegram the person sending it would put these words: "Be sure to vote for Union Government." I would like to know if that officer did that under instructions from the agents of this Government across the sea, I would like to know who paid for these cablegrams and I would also like to know if the people of Canada paid the election expenses of the Union Government in 1917.

I want to point out to the House and to the Acting Minister of Finance that this Government is losing the confidence of the people because it has made pledges to them that it has not kept. This Government made a pledge to the farmers in my neighbourhood who were depositors in the Farmers' Bank which they have never kept. Although they can give $25,000,000, or $45,000,000 to Mackenzie and Mann, and that class of people, they cannot give $1,250,000 to the depositors of the Farmers' Bank although they pledged themselves to do it. The Prime Minister himself pledged the Government to do it.

The hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) not very long ago, four or five years ago, but long enough ago to enable him to implement the promise, said that he was going to start in this country a system of rural credits. It is true that the war intervened and that it would be rather hard to do so but there could be no greater boon to the country than a system of rural credits all over Canada. Yet, that promise has not been implemented.

The last promise and pledge made for the purpose of winning the election in 1917, that men actually engaged in farm labour bona fide, and whose farms cannot be run without their work, would be exempted, has also been broken. This Government is losing the confidence of the people by these various breaches of faith. Somebody has said that you are commercializing——

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Christianity.

Mr. ROSS: —that you are commercializing religious virtues or pretended virtues, but it would seem to me that both Christianity and humanized statesmanship demand that you should keep your pledges. A pledge is a pledge and this Government should adhere to it to the letter. What is going to be the result? We are needing large sums of money to carry on this war. The hon. the Acting Minister of Finance says: "We would have to borrow $280,000,000 to carry on the war. We will have to get it from the people of the country because there is no other place we can get it; we cannot sell our securities in the United States; we cannot get the money from Great Britain but we have to go to the plain people of Canada and get $280,000,000 to run this country and carry on this war. The minister will get some from the banks but in the end he will have to go to the people in the small towns and villages and on the farms and ask them to loan the Government $280,000,000. The Acting Minister of Finance is going to have some trouble to convince the farming people of this country, and the people in the towns and villages, that this Government can be trusted with $280,000,000 to carry on this war after these various breaches of faith. I would not preach that doctrine among them because I want to see them give their money and I know they cannot get any better security, but what I have mentioned is going to have a very bad effect on the next loan that the acting minister has to float. There is going to be an absence of confidence and of faith. There is only one way this Government can get back into such a position that their war-like operations, in so far as loans are concerned can be successful—They have got to restore their pledge, wherever the breaking of that pledge is going to hurt production; they have got to say that the only son of a widow shall not have to go to war; they have got to say that a man who is on a farm, and the sole proprietor in his own name of one hundred acres, and who is doing the work on that farm, shall not be taken away so that the work on that farm will cease to be carried on, when he is between the age of twenty and twenty-two; they have got to say that the man between twenty and twenty-two, who, while not the sole proprietor of the farm which he occupies, is the only help of his crippled and aged father, shall be left to carry on production. It is only in this way that the present Government can posibly hope to regain the confidence of the Canadian people which they have lost in such a marked degree during the last four or five days.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us return to the question of equality of sacrifice, and to what I was speaking about in connection with the sacrifice of wealth. My contention is this: You are asking that the only son on the farm shall be taken away, and you are asking that the son of a widow shall be taken away, although the old Militia Act, severe and all as it was, did not contain any such requirement. You are asking that every boy between the ages of twenty and twenty-two shall be taken from the farms and placed in military service, except during seeding, which is in actual operation at the present time. Now, what sacrifice is this? A mother gives up her son, a father gives up a son, a sister gives up her brother. These young men risk their lives, they risk their limbs and they risk their liberty. You compel them by force to undergo that risk, you compel them to fight for Canada. My contention is that you should try, as far as you can, to equalize that sacrifice by, in the case of the wealthy man, extracting from him sufficient of his income to make him feel it. From my point of view the Income Tax which has been introduced by the Acting Finance Minister does not do that at all, or does not approach doing it. It will have to be increased very much indeed in order to do that. What do we find? We find that a man who has an income of $3,000, under the new Income Tax pays $20; the man who has an income of $6,000 pays $140; the man who has an income of $10,000 pays $392; the man who has an income of $20,000 pays $1,382; the man who has an income of $75,000 pays $11,000. My contention is that the sacrifice does not consist in the amount that a man pays when he has more than an abundance left him. What sacrifice is there in a man who has an income of $10,000 paying $392 compared with the sacrifice of a widow who is giving up her only son, her sole means of support? What comparison is there between that sacrifice and the sacrifice of a father who is giving up a son? I maintain that the Income Tax introduced by the Acting Minister of Finance should be very much more drastic, and I agree with the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Redman) in that regard. I would say that the taxation should start at $3,000 income and that the taxes provided for in the schedule should be doubled.

I would like to go further—although this may not seem practicable, but I think it is because you have already adopted the principle with regard to man service by providing that if a family has already a son at the front who has been disabled or killed the remaining son shall be exempt. I think, Mr. Speaker, that in the case of a family having no sons at the front the income tax which that family pays, where it is over $3,000, should be double the amount which is paid by a family who has a son at the front. You may say: Maybe there is no son in that family. Very well, my reply is, there are daughters who are being protected by the sons of other men and women that are being sent to the front, and that protection should be paid for. If the head of that family cannot fight he should be willing to pay for the protection of his wife and his daughters. The principle which the Government have embodied in their resolution with respect to service at the front, I wish to see carried out with respect to the Income Tax. It is not a hard principle to put into force, it is not impracticable when you consider it, because when the Government are finding out, in connection with the requirements of the Military Service Act, whether a man has a son at the front or not, the same information can be utilized in connection with Income Tax if the departments are co-ordinated. In that way there is no difficulty about the matter whatever.

There is another point I wish to allude to: I believe this Government are borrowing too much and not imposing sufficient taxes on the people at the present time to provide for the expenditure. What are my reasons for saying that? We have in this country wealthy men who are making money out of munitions, out of food, out of bacon, out of shoes, and out of gasoline; people are making millions and millions of dollars out of all these things, and instead of increasing the taxes which these men pay we are borrowing millions and millions of dollars. What does that mean? It simply means that posterity is going to pay this debt that is being incurred. It simply means that when the 400,000 men or thereabouts, that are fighting our battles at the present time and doing their duty, return to Canada, after having fought and bled for us, they will be required to pay taxes which they should not pay at all. It seems to me that those of us at home, who have not gone to the front, should bear our share of the burden to a greater degree, and that more money should be raised by taxation, as is done in England, and that there should be less money borrowed.

These are some suggestions in regard to the Budget, but there is one further suggestion and I make it with some hesitation. I doubt whether it will be acceptable to the people, but at the same time I think it is right. The first principle of good taxation is to make those pay who can pay. Another principle is to tax luxuries. A tax of ten per cent has been placed on automobiles. That is all right as far as it goes, but the Government seems to lean towards loans rather than taxation. It would seem as though it were easier for them to raise money by loans than to raise money by taxation at the present time. But that is not the point. What we should consider is, what is the best method of financing. I contend that raising money by taxation, to largely finance the war, as they are doing in England, is the best method to pursue. There is another thing the Government should consider: They are talking about taxing luxuries but so far they have not done so. They have gone after the poor man. They want him to pay eight cents more on his pack of cards; they have already taxed his entrance to the moving picture shows, and now they are going to tax the films; they have put a tax on tobacco, and they have taxed tea and coffee. They have taxed all these things affecting the table, or the comfort, of the poor man. But what are the Government going to do with the gentleman who rides down the street in a sixty horse power Packard or Wolseley, or some other type of car, clothes himself in purple and fine linen, and dines sumptuously every day? You are not touching his income to any extent. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that at this time no man in this democratic country should be allowed to have an income of over $50,000 a year.

An hon. MEMBER: Less than that.

Mr. ROSS: That is enough for any man in these days of stress and strain. You say to the man who is going to buy a motor car: "You have to pay 10 per cent on the price of that car.' If a car costs $1,500, there is a tax of $150 and the buyer consequently puts his price at $1,650. That is a pretty large tax. If that car is bought after the 30th April, that is the tax that must be paid. What happens in the case of a man who buys a car before the 30th April? Is he not just as much entitled to pay for his luxury as the man who chances to buy a car after the 30th April? Should not the first man's luxury be taxed just as much as the others? It seems to me that is the logical and only fair way. A man buys a car on the 15th April, and the tax has raised the price after the 30th April from $1,500 to $1,650. Instead of being fined, that man is made more wealthy, he can sell his car and make perhaps $75 on the sale. He is not hurt by the tax one bit. A very just method in this country would be to impose a small tax, a very small tax, on the poor man's car, say a twenty horse-power car, and as the horse-power increases an increasing tax should be imposed. That is what is done in England. A man pays so much for the license of a small car, and as the horse-power increases the license fee is increased. I would say that on a car of twenty horse-power in our country there should be almost a nominal fee. This would not hurt any person very much, because the license fee, at least in the province of Ontario, is paid to the province, and the money is used by the Provincial Government to provide roads in the counties from which these taxes come. If there is to be a war tax on luxuries, it seems to me that would be a proper tax for the Minister of Finance to consider.

I may say, in closing, Mr. Speaker, there is another thing which the Minister of Finance and the Government might do, which would almost reconcile the people who use cars to the imposition of a tax such as I have suggested. The Government will have to come to it before long as they did in England and the United States. My suggestion is to regulate the prices of foodstuffs and other necessities used in the daily life of the people. The Government must come to it sooner or later. They should bestir themselves to look into the gasolene question, for instance, and to investigate under the Combines Act or the Enquiries Act, exorbitant prices charged by those who sell gasolene. Such action would meet with the commendation of the whole people. Gasolene is a necessity to-day. It is used on every farm in Ontario, either for a gasolene engine to cut silage or straw or feed, to pump water or drive a tractor. It is a necessity, we all know that. The Minister of Labour knows that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The farmer uses it to milk his cows.

Mr. ROSS: Yes, in some cases. What are the facts? We know there is practically but one company selling gasolene. We know the price the people pay in Canada is much in excess of what the consumers in the United States pay. There is practically no duty on gasolene except the 7½ per cent war tax. I submit that it should be the duty of the Minister of Labour to look into this question which seriously affects the people of this country, and, as was done in the United States a few years ago, have a commission issue to inquire into what profits are being made by the companies, and whether they are just and fair. It is common knowledge that the stock of these gasolene companies is quoted at 400 per cent, and that they are cutting melons all the time. It is common knowledge that they have increased their capitalization by $150,000,000. And it does not matter who is the president of these companies, whether a friend of the Government or not, it is the duty of the Government to protect the people. Four or five years ago I wrote a letter to the Minister of Labour in regard to this subject. At that time, this matter was troubling the people of the United States; prices there had become excessive. The price here was far more excessive than it was there. The reply of the minister was such as we usually get from him across the floor of the House; the reply of the Minister of Labour was a copy of the Combines Investigation Act. I think I know that Act as well as he does. Just as we often get a smile from him across the floor in answer to our questions, his reply in that case was equally useful. We have a War Measures Act, and the Government and the Minister of Labour are free to act. I think the Government would do well to look into the Department of Labour. I think the Government would do well to look now into the Department of Labour and give it a shaking up. Probably if the Minister of Labour could be relieved of his duties, and a man who has given faithful service to the country, like Mr. O'Connor, placed in his stead, we would have a far better administration of the affairs of that department. I doubt very much if the hon. gentleman is just quite big enough for the job. I may be wronging him, but I believe that is the impression among the people all over the country, and it certainly is the opinion of the press.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In the Government press.

Mr. ROSS: The Government press at that. We have great problems before us. We have 220,000 labouring men at the front fighting for us, who are coming back to this country to help reconstruct it and build it up. I submit that if there is one department of the Government which should be strong, and able to meet the needs of the workers, it is the Department of Labour. It not only has to deal with the labouring man himself, but with his food and necessities. I therefore submit, in all kindliness, to the Government that one of the most useful things they could do, just as soon as this House prorogues, or sooner, is to look carefully into the Department of Labour and see that men are not dismissed at the whim of a mere young girl in the department, and that affairs are run in the best interests of the country.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright): Mr. Speaker, since this war began I have not been in the habit of criticising the actions of the Government. When the question of conscription was before the House last session, I gave my views upon that subject, and I have left the operation of the Military Service Act to the Government, and have tried to do my little share towards the winning of the war as I best saw fit. This afternoon I do not intend to criticise the Government. I will not even be as harsh as the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), who invited the Minister of Labour, Mr. Crothers, to resign his portfolio. As to that, Mr. Speaker, I would say that the minister's own judgment, if he has judgment, should prompt the action. If he has not judgment, then his personal pride, after the manner in which the newspapers of the government of which he is a member have been speaking of him, should tempt him, at least, to preserve his self-respect. If neither of these can affect him, then I leave his case to my hon. friend the Prime Minister to deal with as he best sees fit.

The hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) said in the course of his remarks that there were four things absolutely necessary to be done if we wanted to win the war. The first is food, the second, wealth; the third, inspiration; the fourth, men. Of wealth and inspiration I will not make mention to-day; I shall deal only with the questions respecting food and men.

I have listened to the member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) for several years in this House, and I have read the speeches he has delivered out of the House. His addresses are inspiring, and the remarks which he made this afternoon are no exception. Just what caused him to accept the Prime Minister's invitation to resign has always been somewhat of a mystery to me, but I have no doubt that if he continues to give such lectures on inspiration as he gave us this afternoon, when he made certain references to the Minister of Finance, perhaps we will, through inspiration, some day ascertain the cause of the course which he took on that occasion.

I wish first to bring to the attention of the House—as seriously, I hope, as it has been brought to the attention of the country by those in authority to speak—the absorbing question of food production. We have had messages from our own Government, from France, from Italy, from England, that food, and still more food, is necessary. It seems to me that at this moment the question of men is secondary to the question of food. It is time for the Government to consider how many men they can send overseas next year, the year after, and perhaps the year after that—because he is a great prophet who can foretell when this war will end. The Government should consider the matter seriously, rather than act upon sentiment, because they will be held strictly to account by public opinion in this country, in Great Britain and in all the allied countries, if they fail in what they have set out to attain—and they most certainly will fail if they proceed as extravagantly as they have proceeded thus far. Does the Government know how many men are at present available for service overseas? I challenge them to tell me how many men are available, having due regard to the number necessary for food production.

I wish to give a few figures which I have taken from the Canada Year Book of 1916-17, and from other sources. I approach this question from the point of view not of what England is or may be able to do, but of what Canada is able to do and must do. The population of England, according to the last census, 1911, was 36,000,000 in round figures. One month before the war the population of the United Kingdom was estimated at 46,098,249. These people are on a small island, and are doing what they can to meet the need for men at the front and for food production. Steps have been taken there to push food production to the limit, while our Government has been inactive in that respect.

The population of Canada, according to the last census, was something over 7,000,000. I will not tire the House by giving the odd figures. The school population was 1,226,000. In 1913 over 400,000 immigrants came to this country; in 1916, 48,000, and in 1917-18, 68,000, the latter coming almost entirely from the United States and Great Britain. It is safe to say, therefore, that we have lost an average immigration of 350,000, which would leave the population of the country at 5,628,000. Then, 511,000 men are over 60 years of age, 500,000 are cripples and invalids, and 2,358,000 are females. If we deduct these figures, we have a remaining male population of 2,258,000. The rural population is about one-half of the total, and the alien population, according to the last census, was 212,000. The total male population of Canada between the ages of 18 and 45, including aliens, cripples and invalids, is 1,720,000; 717,000 people are employed in agricultural work. What was our population able to do for Great Britain immediately before the war? I commend this to the very serious attention of the members of the House. We were able to send to Great Britain $63,000,000 worth of grain, $5,839,000 worth of meat, and $30,000,000 worth of dairy products, a total of $99,365,0000. The Government say they are obliged to take young men from the farms for military service. Remember that that means taking men from a population of 1,720,000—and I am not taking into account men who have already enlisted and have gone overseas. I am not taking into account the men who may be in other parts of the Empire rendering service; I am simply taking into account what the male population of this country was in 1911, and I am giving the figures of the agriculturalists of this country, and of what they could produce. That production is infinitesimally small to-day for Great Britain; that production is practically nothing for the Allies, and the Government has realized that by calling upon the people of this country to produce and produce more. As late as April 10, Lord Rhondda sent to the Canada Food Board at Ottawa a cable message in which he made this statement:

> The Canadian farmer and Canadian farmhand now have the opportunity to make an effective reply to the enemy's present onslaught, by bending their undivided energies to the increased production of those food supplies, for which we depend to such vital extent upon your great Dominion.

We are being constantly asked by the Government and by the Allies to develop our land, not only to work the land at present developed, but to develop at present undeveloped land. This is not a small country. We have still 1,000,000 square miles of undeveloped territory, a great deal of which would at the present moment be fit for cultivation. But you absolutely require men to cultivate it. We have a great deal of agricultural land now under cultivation, and what is the cry that we hear from all sides. It is not the cry of the man who is not willing to do his utmost towards the winning of the war, but the cry of the farmer throughout the land, of the man who has contributed towards the winning of the war more than any other class of men in this country, and he says: It is impossible for me to go on producing unless you give me men and more men. The Government answers that cry by saying: We will not give you the men; we will take from your farms the men who are necessary for production. Then the farmer says to the Government: Will you at least give me an opportunity to bring in my agricultural implements free of duty? Will you at least give me a chance to replace the farm hand by machinery? What is the answer of the Government? We will take your men, and we will not give you any aid in bringing agricultural implements into this country. These are not idle words. These are the words that have been uttered by the ministers to delegations coming to Ottawa. Last week it was a delegation from Ontario of three hundred men. We are told by to-day's papers that next week there will come to Ottawa a delegation of 2,000 men from Ontario, all with one cry. If you take our sons off the farms, how are we going to work the farms?

It is common sense, it seems to me, and the Government ought to be able to realize it, that if you take the farm help from the farms you cannot produce. What are the cries for more production? I do not want to weary the House by reading more than is necessary but I have been following this question, as I am sure every hon. gentleman in this House has been doing, ever since the war began, and I find that from the very beginning of the war the cry has been: It is useless to send soldiers unless you can feed them; send us men, it is true, but send us food. The two essentials come concurrently even at the most hysterical moment for the Government. Away back in January of this year, I find that Mr. W. J. Black, Commissioner of the Department of Agriculture, said:

> The active assistance of the people now living in the towns and cities of Canada who have had farming experience will have to be secured to carry on farm work during the coming summer if this country is to do its duty in food production.

Mark well, there was not then the question of taking away the farmers' sons, and the Commissioner of Agriculture makes the statement as far back as January that even the townspeople will have to come back to the farms if we are to go on producing. Why do I say that it was not then a question of taking the farmers' sons? The people had before them this statement in big headlines in all the papers throughout the country:

> General Mewburn, Minister of Militia, has issued the following statement from the Government. All farmers coming within class A called out for military service under the provisions of the Military Service Act, who are actually employed on the farms for the production of foodstuffs for Canada and her Allies and whose services are necessary for the work of the farm, will be exempted from military service. If their claim for exemption is not allowed by a tribunal, an immediate appeal should be made.

I want my hon. friends opposite to listen to those words coming from the Minister of Militia of this country:

> If their claim for exemption is not allowed by a tribunal, an immediate appeal should be made.

Yet we hear in certain parts of this country as respects certain other parts of the country that too many appeals have been made. Why, they were made at the request of the Minister of Militia. The statement goes on:

> Arrangements are being made to extend the time for such appeals.

The statement goes on to say:

> If a farmer so called out for military service, who is now engaged in the production of foodstuffs, should be drafted into the army, General Mewburn feels it will be his duty to relieve him from military service on the condition that he returns to the farm and continues to be so employed.

I am quoting from a Government organ, published and distributed in the county which I represent. There were sundry other statements. My eye falls upon this one:

If you want the boys of the First Contingent to get a furlough of three months soon, vote for Union Government that is making preparation to send overseas 20,000 men by the new year.

And there are certain other things that I do not wish to read because there is now in this House and in this country a spirit which will, I hope, tend to the betterment of conditions respecting the different races in Canada. I shall, therefore, not read more of the Union campaign literature that was distributed in my county. I wish, Sir, to go on with the argument I am making. There were published by the Union Government certain circulars. I hold in my hand one dated March 18, just last month, where the Government of Ontario is telling the people:

To-day the shadow of hunger, famine, disease and death hangs over the Allies.

I am not saying anything, nor do I want to convey outside of the confines of my own country any of the conditions which might not be optimistic, which exist in this country. I am simply quoting what the Government of the country have been bringing before the people of Canada. This circular goes on to say:

Upon the 1918 crop from Canada and the United States depends the fate of the democratic peoples of the world.

That is pretty strong language. It goes on:

If that crop is sufficient the Allies can be fed. If that crop is not sufficient the Allies may have to accept a German peace. At all costs production must be maintained. That is why farmers and farmers' sons are being exempted from military service. Working on a farm is equivalent to service in the second line trenches.

I quote this, not to make an argument in favour of the Opposition as against the Government, but because I believe it is the imperative duty of the Government in the present crisis to follow the advice which they have given throughout the length and breadth of this land.

I have said that the Government, instead of aiding the agricultural classes to increase production, have been placing taxes upon the machinery bought by the farmers. They have been taking the boys from the farms contrary to any requests from England, because England never made a request that these lads should be taken off the land. Why, England is placing her young men on the farm and is actively engaged, as I shall show in a minute, in producing as much as her soil is capable of. France is doing likewise; she has taken men out of the army and put them on the soil. So the Government cannot tell me they have received any message from overseas that they must cease farm production in order that the farmers' sons may go to fight.

The Government has refused to take off the duty on agricultural implements. A short time ago the Hon. A. L. Sifton, Minister of Customs in this Government, published a statement pointing out that during the past fiscal year agricultural implements in this country paid import duties aggregating $2,120,000, divided as follows: Separators, $353,000; parts of separators, $124,000; tractors, $896,000; binders, $89,000; ploughs, $373,000; other farm machinery and parts, $260,000. May I not ask, if we are to produce and produce more, why cannot the Government forsake a few men in this country, a paltry dozen perhaps, who happen to be interested in keeping up the price of agricultural implements? Let them listen to the appeal of the farmers throughout Canada, and to the appeals made by France, and to the appeals made by England and all the Allies, and take off the duties even if they do it only as a war measure. They have power to do this under the War Measures Act. Let them do it as a war measure, then; let them follow the example of England.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (resuming): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I was endeavouring to point out to the Government that they had failed in taking sufficient means to find out how many men we had in this country who might be available to fill up the ranks at the front. The second point I had attempted to make was that there was an urgent need for increased production and that the Government had not taken any steps to meet in an efficient manner the demand for food. I had said that there was a cry from the farmers from one end of Canada to the other for a reduction in the Customs duties upon agricultural implements. To that cry the Government has so far turned a deaf ear.

With regard to the taking of measures to find out just how many more men were available, if this war is to continue beyond the present moment, the Government have done absolutely nothing. It is true that the Government have informed us that in the month of June next they will begin to make a registration of the man and woman power of this country. Here I would like to interject the remark that the women of Canada, since the beginning of the war, have taken a noble part. To the women of Canada is due all the conservation of food that has taken place. The women of Canada have been active in helping the Allies in every way possible. They have not sought any one point upon the battle field, but they have extended a helping hand, by way of the Red Cross, by way of contributions to the soldiers' comforts, by way of contributions to the Patriotic fund, by way of every possible contribution to the soldiers at all points on the battle front, and they have only asked that the soldiers for whom they have been working shall be soldiers who are fighting the battle for liberty, freedom and higher civilization.

With regard to the need for food production, we have statements from different authorities. For instance, we have Lord Rhondda, who, up to a few days ago, was food controller for Great Britain, writing:

> The Allied larder is dangerously empty, but we are carrying on in a resolute belief that we can rely on the people of North America to prevent our food supplies from becoming so diminished as to imperil the issue for which we are all fighting.

We have a statement from Sir William Goode, Secretary of the British Ministry of Food, to the following effect:

> Few people have yet grasped the fundamental fact that Great Britain still relies on the United States and Canada for 65% of her essential food stuffs. Unless we can get this food, or nearly all of it, we shall peter out.

Dr. J. W. Robertson, chairman of the Advisory Council of the Canada Food Board, says:

> Unless we can get more food now, we shall go under, and 1,000,000 people will starve. This is my conviction, and I know as much about the situation, perhaps, as any one.

The Right Hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) said:

> I cannot emphasize too strongly the absolutely urgent necessity for increased food production. The issue of the war may depend on the quantity of the food produced in Canada and the United States.

Mr. Herbert Hoover, the United States Food Administrator, says:

> The cereal exports to the Allies from this continent are 45,000,000 bush. short of the amounts promised, while most exports are also very far behind the quantities which it had been planned to send, and upon which the Allies were counting.

We have other statements from prominent men but I do not want to take up the time of the House in quoting them. I would like to point out to the Government that in Western Canada the farmers, whose co-operation in such matters naturally the Government would ask, drew up a platform wherein is to be found a resolution reading as follows:

> And whereas agriculture—the basic industry upon which the success of all other industries primarily depends—is almost stagnant throughout Canada as shown by the declining rural population in both eastern and western Canada, due largely to the greatly increased cost of agricultural implements and machinery, clothing, boots and shoes, building material and practically everything the farmer has to buy, caused by the Protective Tariff, so that it is becoming impossible for farmers generally to carry on farming operations profitably;
> Therefore be it resolved, that the Reciprocity Agreement of 1911, which still remains on the United States statutes books, be accepted by the parliament of Canada.

I may say, in justice to the Government, that that reciprocity agreement, in many points, has been adopted by them, and instead now of crying out: No truck or trade with the Yankees, the Government go so far as to try to be financed by the United States, and are at the present moment, if the report be correct, on a begging mission to the United States for some of Great Britain's credit. The farmers' platform continues:

> That all foodstuff not included in the Reciprocity Agreement be placed on the free list.
>
> That agricultural implements, farm machinery, vehicles, fertilizer, coal, lumber, cement, illuminating, fuel and lubricating oils be placed upon the free list.
>
> That the customs tariff on all the necessaries of life be materially reduced.
> That all tariff concessions granted to other countries be immediately extended to Great Britain.

On that platform the Government say that they will take no action. However, to complete the case, that I undertook to make out this afternoon, I want to quote from a report of the former Food Controller, the Hon. W. J. Hanna, published on January 14, 1918.

> What I endeavoured to make plain, was that there was something even more important than reducing the cost of living in Canada, though that was one objective. What that supreme consideration was is the winning of the war, and the requirements for that purpose are summed up in a statement made by me;

"Far greater than the necessity of production for home supply is that for the supply of Great Britain and her Allies.

Great Britain is producing more of food stuffs than for many years, but the supply is, of course, wholly inadequate for her population and her armies.

Belgium is practically all in the hands of Germany, so also is a considerable portion of France, Serbia, Roumania and Russian Poland, and now a portion of Italy are in the hands of the enemy.

The productive power of our Allies is lessened by the number of inhabitants in arms.

The situation in France and Italy from a food point of view is serious, and that is what makes the demand in Canada and the United States for conservation of resources and increased production so imperative. To feed the Allies is the paramount duty of North America. It is far greater than the necessity of production for home supply or the cost of living. Unless the war is won nothing matters.

Now, Sir, among our own papers at home we have Government organs giving their views upon the subject, and I shall not quote from any Grit press. I take it, for instance, that The Citizen of Ottawa is a Government organ, and in an editorial in that paper I find these words:

The Canada Food Board is getting down to essentials. Mr. Charles A. Dunning, Director of Food Production, is reported to have recommended to the Federal Government that the customs tax against agricultural implements should be taken off. It has long been one of the absurdities of the Canadian fiscal system that while the farmers are urged to increase their productive efforts, they are taxed heavily when they invest in the farm implements that are absolutely necessary for production.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that I have sufficiently made plain that the Allied countries are calling upon us for increased food production. I hope, also, that I have made plain to this House the absolute necessity that lies upon every man in this country to increase, and to go on increasing, production. Have I made plain that we cannot go on producing more and still more food, helping to feed the Allied countries, helping to feed the soldiers who are upon the battlefields of Europe, fighting the fight of liberty —if we continue conscripting labour from the farms without providing adequate help to take the place of those young men? I do not say this in any carping spirit, or with the slightest idea of attacking the Government. I am quite ready to give the Government credit for everything they have done, but I want to point out that when the Government received a mandate from the people to perform their part in the winning of this war they assumed the gravest responsibility that has ever devolved upon any Government in the world. It becomes the imperative duty of the Prime Minister, of his colleagues, and of every man in this House, to contribute towards the carrying on of a programme that is essential towards the winning of the war. For that reason, and for that reason alone, I have tried to bring before the House the fact that we must produce more, that we must bend and bow to this cry that comes from abroad for more food and still more food. There is something worse than being killed upon the battlefield, there is something far more painful. There is the fact that the soldiers at the front may be starving, and I say it with all the feeling that can animate me, that the Government will not fulfil its duty towards the boys in the trenches, and will not fulfil its duty towards the Empire, if they do not exercise every effort, and do not assume all the power that may be necessary to see that we produce more and still more food.

What have the Government done towards increasing production in this country? Have they done anything? Yes, I shall be answered, they have issued a few pamphlets, in this form or some other form, telling the people of Canada that they should not put sugar icing between their cakes, and should see that their garbage is not wasted. Is that what is going to save the Allies? What direct or efficient action have the Government taken up to the present moment in aiding the farmers of this country to achieve the desired results? Canada has not done anything, and if my hon. friend the member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) were here, I would point to him and say, "Now is the time to take a leaf out of the history of England and follow what England is doing; now is the time to take a leaf out of the history of France and follow the example of France." Here is what England is doing for increased production: The English Government did not content itself with issuing pamphlets, but it formed a general agricultural committee and sub-executive committees.

These sub-committees,— and I am quoting from the Labour Gazette of this Government—

—consist of from four to seven members experienced in agriculture, who are expected to meet weekly or at least fortnightly. They report to the county committee any land which is not producing its full quota of food and suggest the necessary action. They also report on the labour shortage, and assist farmers to obtain seed and manures, and the use of horses and implements. In short the business of the sub-committee is to help the farmers in every possible way.

That is what England is doing. What is Canada doing for the farmers? I said it was well to take a leaf out of the history of France at the present moment. Turning to The Economist of March 30, 1918, I find this:

> Elaborate measures have been proposed by M. Boret, Minister of Agriculture and Supplies, with the view of intensifying agricultural development. The first of three Bills introduced refers to special cultivation of land that has been abandoned. The ordinary tillers of the land may lack necessary means for cultivation, and in this case a communal committee will assist them, or arrange for some one better placed to render assistance for cultivating the land. In the event of disagreement, the committee is to be given rights to deal with the land as they think best. In the event of the ordinary cultivator having disappeared, and the land being unoccupied, and the communal committee not being able to settle the situation, the Bill arranges for the direct collaboration of the State. There are penalties both in the way of fines and imprisonment in the event of deliberate persistent obstruction. The second Bill aims at facilitating the acquisition of mechanical tractors by agriculturists themselves and by the motor culture agents. It proposes the alteration of the existing law so as to enable small units or individuals to be given grants not to exceed half the total value of their purchases for the object of buying mechanical tractors. Further, it is arranged that the Minister of Agriculture shall have special facilities for the purpose of such machinery, and will be authorized to lend it out to those able to make good use of it. Lastly, the third Bill provides for the civil mobilization of men between the ages of 15 and 50 resident in France, whether of French, Allied, or neutral nationality. Lists of persons between these ages are to be drawn up, but students and men following useful professions and men unsuitable for agricultural work are to be excluded from the lists.

I bring this matter to the attention of the Government to show them the right way to take action to increase agricultural production. I am not blaming them for not having done it up to the present; I am not saying that they should have done it. I believe, Sir, that they should have done it. I believe it is impossible for any hon. gentleman, even the most humble of the Cabinet, to plead ignorance, because this action on the part of England has been in the Government publications for months past. Unless the Government do not read their own publications they cannot plead ignorance. Let us for a moment forget to copy the United States of America in everything. In the United States there are some good things, but there are many superficial things. I have always believed the judgment of Canadians to be sounder than that of the average American, and our form of Government to be better. If the Government will only awake to the fact that we are at war, if they will only try to do something effective, I believe that their combined judgment is at least as good as the individual judgment of any state legislature in the United States. With this matter before them now they should take some action, or else stop preaching increased production. They ought at least, in charity to the Canadian farmers and to the people of Canada, send this message to England: We have failed; we are unable to carry out your wishes; we are unable to keep up with the situation that faces us. That would be a charitable message to send; because we are at a critical moment of the war, and if the Government is unable to cope with the situation it should resign. If my right. hon. friend the leader of the Government (Sir Robert Borden) cannot face the situation with any element of success, let him resign, and let His Excellency the Governor General call upon some other Canadian, seated upon the treasury benches perhaps, or some man who had not yet been tried and who sits behind the Government, to form a new Government, and see what action he can take to cope with the present situation. In an army, if a general does not succeed he is immediately set aside; if his successor does not succeed, he also is set aside. We have seen it right here in this country. We have seen General Hughes take up a question at a moment when it was difficult to handle and do certain things, and if any one on this side of the House undertook to criticise General Hughes the Prime Minister at once got up and said: "Hands off the General." Then other members sitting behind the Government benches got up in turn, saying "Hands off the General; he is doing wonders." And there the poor General sits leading his lonely life to-day, but still charitable enough to tell the Government wherein, in his judgment, they have failed, and wherein are their weaknesses. He does not try to make any great storm about what he did, or even to tell the people what he would do if he were minister again. He contents himself with saying that the Minister of Finance has wasted the money of the country this way and that way through war bonds—Victory Loans—in different other ways, and he does not say it in a critical spirit, he does not want to attack the Minister of Finance, he is too loyal a man to do that; he simply wants to do it in a kindly spirit in order that the successor of the Minister of Finance may not fall into the faults into which the present minister fell.

I have concluded what I have to say. I believe that the Government ought to be in a position to tell the great delegation of two thousand people from Ontario who will interview it next week just what they propose to do. The country is tired of the old argument used by the Government that they are going to take a registration of man and woman power next June. When June comes along they will all be off to the seaside. The people will not be content with that. A registration of man power has already been taken in this country. And registration of woman power—the idea! I ask any hon. gentleman on the opposite side: Do you mean to tell me seriously that any young girl in this country who has never been trained to work upon a farm can get out and do the work that the young men on the farms are doing to-day? Do you mean to tell me that the Government will undertake to ask your daughter, Sir, or the daughters of hon. gentlemen in this House, to leave their homes and place them out on the farms throughout the country? Do you think they will do that? Will any minister of the Government get up and say that he will send his daughter out to work upon a farm away from home? I do not think that that is going to be very practical. I believe that the women are willing to do the best they can; I know they are doing the most they can; but they will never aid in increasing production to the extent that Great Britain and the Allies are asking to-day. The Prime Minister asks us to have pity upon the Government. We are ready to have pity upon the Government. We will aid the Government in everything they do tending towards the winning of the war. But let me put it to hon. gentlemen seated opposite, and especially to those who came into the House as Liberals supporting the Union Government: Is it to be expected that gentlemen seated upon this side of the House must do absolutely nothing but vote tremendous sums of money for any purpose towards the winning of the war, when they have in their possession returns such as were brought down respecting the Order in Council recently passed providing for a staff and salaries in the Food Controller's office? In turning over the pages we find that hundreds of thousands of dollars are spent in salaries; we find that people are taken from the Toronto Evening Telegram and from the Famous Players Film Service and given salaries of $3,500, and that men from the Toronto Daily News receive appointments at $4,000. We find men taken from the T. Eaton Co. appointed at salaries of $2,000 and $2,600. And such entries appear on page after page of the return. Is it to be expected that the Opposition must simply vote sums of money and not criticise the Government? Sir, I could go on turning these pages over to the end of the evening's sitting, and show where thousands of dollars are being wasted.

We shall not occupy the time of the House in criticism of every detail; but can you ask us to support every one of these measures? We are willing to assist in all measures necessary to the winning of the war. I think I speak for every hon. gentleman on this side of the House when I say that we will give our general aid; that we will do everything we can with a view to seeing that Canada does her full share and that she comes out of the war with honour —for when peace comes we wish it to be said of us that we acted according to our best judgment.

We have been condemned on account of the Naval Policy of the Laurier Government—a policy adopted to-day by the Union Government; condemned because we wanted to trade with United States—a policy adopted to-day by the Union Government; condemned because we advocated food production—a policy to-day forced upon the Union Government; condemned because we asked that the people be heard on the question of conscription—and thousands from Ontario are asking to-day for that very thing. When you bring in new measures affecting the farmers' sons, the men of Ontario say: Hold; wait until we have had a say.

But I leave the consideration of this subject to others who will follow me. I wish it to be distinctly understood that what I have said has been actuated by no harsh or mean intent; I have presented my views in the kindliest spirit, with the firm desire of offering to the Government some suggestions the adoption of which would, to my mind, aid in the winning of the war.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this discussion has engaged our attention for five days. Having regard to conditions in this country as well as in Europe, I believe that we are not warranted in encouraging protracted debates. We have a large task on hand which demands our whole time and attention, and there can be no justification for spending time here on trifles. I should not have risen to say one word but for some of the personal expressions to which my hon. friend (Mr. Devlin) gave utterance. I assure the hon.

gentleman, who in his closing remarks affirmed that all his utterances were of the kindliest character, that the men best qualified to appreciate the quantity and the quality of the work that has been done in the Labour Department during the last six and a half years are the wage earners and working men, whose approval and confidence I have enjoyed during that period in greater degree than have been bestowed upon any of my predecessors. So long as I enjoy that approval and confidence, I shall give little concern to the featherweight opinions expressed by my hon. friend and by the member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), or by any of the press supporting them.

Last week the member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) occupied half a day largely in a rehearsal of the alleged principles of the Liberal party, which have been repeated in this House hundreds of times during the last forty years. I shall not attempt to follow him in all his wanderings, but I wish to call attention to one criticism that he made of the Labour Department, that it did not administer impartially the Order in Council passed early in November, 1916. He said, as reported on page 1442 of Hansard:

> These are the things which I complain about, and I think the Minister of Labour should explain to the country why he is so vigilant and active in going after the small things when the big things are left to go as they please.

The hon. gentleman referred to a letter which I wrote to a shoemaker in the county of Kent—on which letter the member for Kent (Mr. McCoig) seems to have secured his election last December. The member for Cape Breton North and Victoria enjoyed an exalted position on the Bench for a number of years and I have no doubt that he discharged the onerous duties of that office with marked ability and fairness. I do not know why he descended from that position to that of an advocate. While he was on the Bench I am sure that in addressing a jury he would never think of presenting only one side of a case; if he desired to be fair—as I have no doubt he did at that time—he would present both sides of the case and all the material facts concerning it. However, he has descended to the position of an advocate and to it he has rigidly adhered ever since he became a member of this House. On no occasion was his rigidity in that respect more marked than in his reference to the work of the Labour Department the other night.

Members who had seats in the last Parliament are familiar with the Order in Council passed on November 10, 1916, authorizing inquiries and investigations under oath, concerning food, fuel and clothing, and placing the Administration of that Order under the Department of Labour. But those who were not in the previous Parliament will perhaps be glad to have me read a few of the provisions of that Order in Council. Section 2 is in these words:

> No person shall conspire, combine, agree or arrange with any other person.
> (a) to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing in any necessary of life;

"Necessary of life" is defined in this Order in Council as including food, fuel and clothing:

> (b) to restrain or injure trade or commerce in relation to any necessary of life; or
> (c) to prevent, limit or lessen the manufacture or production of any necessary of life, or to enhance the price thereof.

Section 3 says:

> 3. (1) No person shall accumulate or shall withhold from sale any necessary of life beyond an amount thereof reasonably required for the use or consumption of his household or for the ordinary purposes of his business;
> (2) Every person who shall at any time hold any necessary of life beyond an amount thereof reasonably required as aforesaid, and every person who shall hold for the purpose of sale, whether as manufacturer, wholesaler, jobber, retailer or otherwise, any stock-in-trade of any necessary of life, shall offer for the sale the said excess amount, or the said stock-in-trade, as the case may be, at prices not higher than are reasonable and just.

Section 9 provides:

> 9. (1) Any person who contravenes or fails to observe any of the provisions of these regulations shall be guilty of an indictable offence and liable upon indictment or upon summary conviction under Part XV of the Criminal Code to a penalty not exceeding five thousand dollars, or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years, or to both fine and imprisonment as specified.

This is section 4, which places the administration of the Order in Council in the hands of the Minister of Labour:

> 4. The Minister of Labour may, by notice in writing under his hand or that of his Deputy, require any person who operates, controls or manages any cold storage plant, packing house, cannery, factory, mine, warehouse, or other premises in which or in any part of which any necessary of life is prepared, manufactured, produced or held by such person for himself or for another, or who in any manner deals in any necessary of life, to make and render unto such minister, within a time set in such notice, and such person shall make and render unto such minister precisely as required by him, a written return under oath an affirmation showing in details—

Amongst the particulars the person is required to show are these:

Such other information concerning any necessary of life as the minister may require, including a full disclosure of all existing contracts or agreements which such person, or his principal or agent, may have at any time entered into, with any other person, touching or concerning the sale or resale prices of any necessary of life, for the period of time during which any necessary of life should be held, as bailee or otherwise, before sale or resale, or limiting the quantity of any necessary of life which should be sold to any one buyer or combination of buyers or within any limited district.

On the passage of that Order in Council and the placing of its administration in the Department of Labour, we proceeded under section 4 to prepare suitable questionnaires concerning coal and different foodstuffs. We did not commence by dealing with clothing. We sent those questionnaires out to some 400 of the principal dealers in coal throughout the country, and we received from them monthly returns under oath showing the quantity of coal that they bought during the month, the price paid for it, the quantity they sold, and the price at which they sold it. We were authorized, under that Order in Council, if those answers were not completely satisfactory, to send out an examiner with authority to inspect their books and examine witnesses under oath.

We also submitted a series of these questionnaires to 110 cold storage concerns in Canada, and we received from them statements of the quantities of supplies that they get in every month, what they pay for them, the quantities they sell and the prices at which they are sold. That inquiry went back for five years up to the time we started to operate under the Order in Council, and after that we got monthly returns from those concerns. My hon. friend from Cape Breton North (Mr McKenzie) says that we have done nothing; that we have attacked the little fellows and have done nothing to the big fellows. What has resulted to some of the big fellows through the action that we have taken under that Order in Council? I have already said that we submitted those questionnaires to 110 cold storage plants in Canada, and as a direct result of the information we got through those questions, and from a report we issued based on this information, we have to-day the packers of Canada paying to this Government a large portion of their profits. Yet my hon. friend from Cape Breton North says that we have not attacked the big concerns at all. The packers under the last Order in Council are entitled to retain only 11 per cent of their profits on their capital, and they have to pay the balance into the treasury of this country.

I am going to call the attention of the House to a few cases. I remember very well a case of a large and wealthy sugar refiner who had refused to supply a retail merchant with sugar unless he would keep up the price fixed by the sugar manufacturer. I have here the whole correspondence touching the matter. I shall not read the whole of it, but I shall read to the House enough to satisfy hon. members that we have not devoted our whole attention under that Order in Council to what may be considered the "little fellows." This first letter was written by an officer of the sugar manufacturer to the retail merchant:

May 23, 1916.

Dear Sir:

We have yours of recent date. Now we might as well be frank with you and advise that we cannot send on the sugar that you request as our representative stated to you when he was in last that our good customers in your vicinity were complaining about you cutting prices and of course have written complaining rather harshly. Of course we wish to do all the business we can and we think by cutting your prices you have hindered your cause a great deal. However, this is all we have to say at the present time and regret that we cannot send on sugar as ordered.

He communicated with me, and on the 8th of December, 1916, I wrote to the company in the following words:

I have information, which seems reliable, that you are refusing to supply sugar to dealers except upon the terms that they re-sell at a price to be fixed by you. I am enclosing a copy of an Order in Council recently passed, which will probably satisfy you that the attitude you take in this regard is a violation of the provisions of that Order and renders you liable to prosecution thereunder. I hope, therefore, that you will at once notify any persons to whom you refused to supply sugar except on the terms as to the price of re-sale that you withdraw from that attitude, and that you will supply them what sugar they require, regardless of that condition.

I think that I should say to you frankly that we should not, and will not, permit any such conditions to attach to any such sale.

He was not very long in changing his attitude, as will appear by the following extract from his letter in reply:

We assure you we are very sorry this letter was written, and further assure that it will not occur again, as we have notified all our selling force to this effect. If you are at all dissatisfied with our explanation, which we are trying to make as frankly as possible, we would be quite agreeable to come to Ottawa and explain it further, or if you would prefer, we will be very glad to have an inspector look over our books and files.

I got a letter from the retail merchant afterwards, saying they had sent him all the sugar he was able to pay for.

I have also a lot of correspondence here concerning bread. I think I should be strictly accurate in saying that we have received hundreds of complaints concerning bread, milk, and other articles. In every case I have taken the matter up, forwarded a copy of this Order in Council, and the party against whom the complaint was made has receded from his position. So our efforts have not been confined, as my hon. friend from Cape Breton North (Mr. McKenzie) says, "to a few shoemakers." In that case we received complaints that the shoemakers had entered into an agreement to charge a certain price for their work. Following our usual practice when a complaint of this sort comes into our office, we wrote them enclosing a copy of the Order in Council, and I am glad to say that they also have receded from the position they had taken. So we have not been idle in enforcing this Order in Council, and we have not confined our efforts to small men, as the House will realize after what I have said about the packers of this country, the bakers of bread, the vendors of milk, and so on. I rose to refer to only one or two matters. I would not feel justified, whatever others may feel, in taking up one minute of the time of this House in discussing matters that are but trifles when compared to the great task before us of saving this country and the liberties of mankind.

Mr. A. B. COPP (Westmorland): I agree that it is hardly necessary for my hon. friend (Mr. Crothers) to take up any of the time of this House in making explanations in connection with the work of his department, except that some of the new members of the House are not familiar with the story that the rest of us have heard told over and over again by the minister in sessions of the last Parliament. I congratulate my hon. friend on having an exceptionally good memory, for he has followed the speech he made several times in the last Parliament almost word for word. He always used to refer to the coal question, to the questionnaires his department sent out and the answers received to those questionnaires, and to the sugar manufacturers.

Mr. CROTHERS: I would remind my hon. friend that when a man is dealing in truth he does not have to change his statements every day.

[Mr. Crothers.]

Mr. COPP: Quite so, but if he tells the whole truth it is not necessary for him to repeat it time after time as my hon. friend has done. But I am not going to criticise my hon. friend for taking up the time he did in making his explanation, because it is the privilege of every member to take, within reason, the time he desires to express his views on the different public questions that arise from time to time, and it is for that reason I take this opportunity of saving a few words, as a representative of a portion of the province of New Brunswick, on the subject now before the House. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) I might add, might have done better if he had just quoted the volume and page number of Hansard containing his speech on these matters last session.

In ordinary times and under ordinary conditions the annual Budget of the Minister of Finance with its statement of the revenues and expenditure of the past year and its estimate of the expenditure for the ensuing year is not of very deep interest. It affords, however, an opportunity for hon. members of this House to express their views on almost any matter that may be of interest to their several constituencies or to the Dominion as a whole. But the Budget during the last three years of this terrible conflict now waging in Europe has been of more than ordinary interest to the members of this House and the country as a whole. This Parliament meets under very changed conditions. The people of this Dominion since Confederation have been divided into two great political parties—the high-protection party, and the low-tariff party, or tariff for revenue only, with a general grading down of the tariff, as the situation warrants, almost to a free trade basis. To show that my right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was true to his pre-election pledges in 1896, he had two of his distinguished and representative colleagues in his Government, in the years 1910-11 enter into negotiations with our American neighbours the result of which was a reciprocity agreement. If that agreement had been carried into effect it would have practically established free trade in food products at least between these two great countries. But that agreement was fought persistently and viciously in this Parliament during the session of 1911 and when the Government of that day appealed to the country on the twenty-first of September of that year they were defeated, not on that issue, but on other issues. By the defeat of the Government that measure, which would have been of incalculable benefit to the people of Canada, was annulled and became of no effect. The people of Canada were debarred from learning by actual experience, the very great advantages which would have accrued to them had that reciprocity pact been carried into effect.

The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) the other night, in discussing some matters before this House, referred to my right hon. leader and criticised him because he did not carry into effect his pre-election promises when he came into office in 1896. It seemed to me that my hon. friend was seeking for excuses to explain his own political meanderings and ramblings rather than establishing any charge against my right hon. friend.

Those of us who had the privilege of seats in this House during the historic session of last year cannot fail to be impressed with the situation as we see it in Canada to-day. Quite a number of hon. gentlemen who occupied seats on this side of the House and gave loyal support to the party lead by my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) saw fit, conscientiously I have no doubt, to withdraw their support from the Liberal party on the stand which our leader took upon the question of the Military Service Act, better known as conscription. I have no fault to find with the hon. gentlemen who took that view. As a matter of fact, they were strong conscriptionists themselves. They have proved their faith in conscription by allowing themselves to be conscripted without question or murmur to different positions in the service of this Dominion. When my right hon. friend, the leader of the Government (Sir Robert Borden) attempted to form what is known as his Union Government, he wended his way to Toronto and there met my hon. friend the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell). That hon. gentleman had, early in the campaign apparently realized the duty devolving upon him to support the Military Service Act or conscription measure. He fell a willing sacrifice to conscription himself and said: While I have urged young men to go to the front, and while I believe we should force young men to go to fight the battles of the country, I am quite willing to go to the front benches of the Treasury, occupy a seat there and fight the people's battles, but of course I must have a salary of $7,000 per year, and have all the perquisites attaching to the position. It is also stated that the hon. gentleman insisted on his particular friends in the city of Toronto being provided for and getting good jobs in the Government services and I have no doubt that condition has been carried out. He willingly and patriotically came forward and said, "Here I am; take me." The next gentleman that the right hon. gentleman appealed to was the hon. the Minister of Customs (Mr. Sifton) who, after making due apology and repentance for his action at the celebrated Winnipeg convention last summer, enlisted and was at once made chief recruiting officer in the safety first election Union battalion, better known as the Union Government. After he had accepted the position of returning officer, he had little trouble in persuading the hon. the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) that it was his duty to get into uniform and training. True, there was not actual front trench work then but it was necessary to have a man properly trained for service after the war when immigrants would again flow into Canada and he fell a willing sacrifice.

In the meantime, the hon. the Minister of Militia and Defence (Major-General Mewburn) and the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne), realizing that colossal mistakes had been made in the past, decided it was not in the public interest to longer continue to hide their lights under a bushel, and chose the Departments of Militia and Defence and Marine and Fisheries respectively to be the candlesticks upon which they would place the light they had to illuminate the dark political and mismanaged recesses of these departments.

Little trouble had so far been experienced, but the Maritime Provinces had to be reckoned with and the name of the present the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell), who had the reputation of a dangerous foe and who had undoubtedly locked within his breast and desk reams of most damaging information against the different departments of the Government, as was proved by the results of the investigation of the affairs of the Militia Department by a Royal Commission the year previous, was added to the list of new ministers. This doughty erstwhile Government opponent, whose patriotic offer to go to the front in the early days of the war had been refused for reasons one can only guess, was pressed into service, and he in the interests of his country at this time decided, if not to completely bury the hatchet and forget the past shortcomings of the Government, to at least place them in cold storage for a time—not that their value would be enhanced, but that they might be preserved for personal use or the country's benefit in future.

The only obstacle in the way of the hon. gentleman's entry into the Union Government was that he preferred the Department of Public Works to that of Marine and Fisheries. This was overcome by the occupant of that office being forced to realize that he was best fitted to reorganize and conduct the Department of Marine and Fisheries that had been left in somewhat of a chaotic condition by the sudden, and, of course, unexpected resignation of its former head, after having been conscripted to the position of Chief Justice of the Appellate Court of New Brunswick. I am bound to say, however, Mr. Speaker, that the present Minister of Public Works has shown his worth in his department and he is the only member of the Government who has evinced a desire to cut down expenditures and to do house-cleaning as he always did when he was on this side of the House.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The hon. gentleman has intimated that the reason why the Minister of Public Works was selected for a place in the Cabinet was, that he held certain dangerous secrets within his breast, and that it was a means of quieting him. Will the hon. gentleman be a little more explicit in that regard?

Mr. COPP: I have taken the responsibility of making the statement I did, and the hon. gentleman will be good enough to draw his own conclusions, either from my remarks as he has heard them, or as he reads them in Hansard to-morrow.

Now, Sir, the Government was not yet fully constituted. There was a province remaining to be considered, and that was the old reliable province of Nova Scotia. After Hon. Mr. Murray had consulted with his friends and decided that he could not well be spared from his duties in that province, the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) was induced to join the Cabinet. His demand for responsible office was not so pronounced as that of other members of the Cabinet, provided, of course, the question of salary was not overlooked, and there was provided for the hon. gentleman the chairmanship of some committee. I do not know just what the duties of that committee are, but doubtless the hon. gentleman is eminently qualified to discharge them with distinction.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) who is a member of the House, also willingly allowed himself to be conscripted for the Cabinet, and I have not yet heard him making any appeal to any local tribunal to be relieved of his duties. Whether he may be forced to do so or not, I cannot say, but I am sure we on this side are willing to give him a fair trial and if he continues as he has commenced, I personally, shall have no fault to find with him.

In the position of Solicitor General we now find an old and very respectable member of the Opposition (Mr. Guthrie) in whom we had very great confidence. He also saw fit to withdraw from this side and accept a position of emolument in the Government that is now controlling the destinies of Canada. I have no doubt that a number of others would have been quite willing to accept office, if the opportunity to do so had been vouchsafed to them.

Mr. EDWARDS: Including the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp).

Mr. COPP: I have never yet had occasion to withdraw from the party that I have always supported, and so long as they continue to advocate the policy which I believe to be in the interest of the country I shall not forsake them. I am not finding fault with those gentlemen who retired from this side, but when I am convinced that the policy of my party is wrong, then, I may tell my hon. friend, I shall have no hesitation in saying so and taking such steps as I believe to be in the interest of the country. That is the duty and the privilege of every hon. gentleman.

Now, Sir, the Union Government was formed, they went to the people and received a mandate from them. Let me impress upon the Acting Minister of Finance that I do not believe it was in the interest of the country that for the purpose of forming a Union Government the necessity existed for creating five or six new Cabinet positions, at additional expense to the people, at the present time. If hon. gentlemen opposite had the interest of this country at heart, as they wanted to make the people believe they had during the last session of Parliament, if it were in the public interest that a Union Government should be formed, and that politics should be dropped for the time being, in my opinion it would have been a more truly patriotic course for a sufficient number of ministers to have retired from the old Government, and to have replaced them by Liberals from this side of the House, and to do that without causing any extra expense to the country. Economy should be the watchword of the Government, but by adding these additional departments to the administration of public affairs, the Government have augmented by between a million and a half and two million dollars the expenditures entailed in the carrying on of public business. Such a large additional outlay the Government were not justified in undertaking at the present time, when the people are being taxed, and practically bled white, to maintain the ordinary and capital expenditure of Canada, to say nothing of the enormous cost of carrying on its share of the burdens of war.

The advantage of the Union Government has yet to be demonstrated, and so far as the new members of that Government are concerned, no criticism can be offered on account of past acts, because they were not a party to those expenditures. I have no criticism to offer of the gentlemen now on the Treasury benches who went from this side of the House. That must be deferred until they come before Parliament to give an account of their stewardship and to explain the conduct of their departments, as they will have to do next year.

The Acting Minister of Finance in his Budget speech announced that the revenues of the Dominion during the fiscal year 1917-18 amounted to $258,000,000, of which, he told us, $203,000,000 were required to meet capital and ordinary expenditures, leaving $55,000,000 to go towards war expenditure during the past year. While $55,000,000 is a fairly large sum of money, yet, if we may judge by the criticisms in which the hon. gentleman himself indulged with respect to past financial statements, that sum is not nearly enough to meet our requirements. In 1913-14, the financial year immediately preceding the war, our total revenue was $163,000,000. If out of $163,000,000 Canada was able to carry on her business affairs and meet her outlays in both ordinary and capital expenditure, I say that during these times there is no reasonable or fair excuse that $203,000,000 is needed to pay our annual disbursement. If the Government had economized as they should have done, surely we would have been able to get along without larger expenditures than in the year 1913-14. And if that had been done, instead of having $55,000,000 to pay towards war expenditures this year, we would have had $94,825,000. Under these conditions we should have been able to save a larger amount than $55,000,000 by paring down our expenditures on public works and civil government all along the line. I wonder if I may have the privilege of reading to this House a few lines from a speech made by an hon. gentleman whose word, I think, should have some weight with the present Government, and, at least, upon the present Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean). In a speech delivered in this House on April 24, 1917, a year ago, criticising the Budget of that date, the following language was used:

> Now it is a fair question to put to this House and to the country: With our expenditures on war account, great as they are, and with this country so prosperous, whether it is satisfactory that we should have contributed out of our revenue toward that expenditure only $60,000,000 or less? Are we now doing our full duty or are we leaving too much to the future to pay? I believe that we are borrowing too much and paying too little.
> There are facts which should be carefully considered in this connection. After the war, we shall have a national debt of from $1,300,000,000 to $1,500,000,000, with charges for interest and pensions approximating, as I have already pointed out, $100,000,000 a year, which must be paid and for which the people must be taxed. We shall have a smaller supply of capital, interest rates will be higher, and the productive capacity of the country will be less. The transition from a state of peace to a state of war, was made easier in our case by the absorption of men into the army, but the transition in the reverse direction will be complicated not only by the discharge of munition workers from their employment, but in addition there will be the demobilization of the army. These are important facts and should be considered in discussing the question whether we should or should not now tax ourselves more in order to pay a greater portion of our war obligations than we are paying. We must further remember that the immense expenditure for war which is being added to our debt is unproductive. It leaves us richer in ideals and in history, it is true, but in a monetary sense the expenditure is unproductive. If the amount which we are obliged to borrow for war purposes were expended in the construction of railways, the development of agriculture, and the establishment of industrial enterprises, it would add to the productive power of industry and trade thus making it relatively easier to meet interest and sinking fund charges upon the debt. With these things in mind, is the Government policy with respect to taxation for war expenditure the correct one? Is it one which is approved by the best judgment of our people? Are we not handing down to posterity the obligation to pay too largely for patriotic performances?
>
> Taking the position, as I do, that we are not presently contributing sufficiently to war expenditures, I realize that hon. gentlemen opposite will naturally enquire what suggestion hon. members on this side would make, what policy they would propound. In the first place, I assert, and this is but a repetition of what we on this side have said on every Budget deliverance of the Minister of Finance since the beginning of the war, there should be further retrenchment in civil expenditure so as to leave a greater amount to apply to war expenditures, thus minimizing the additions to our debt.

That was the statement made by a gentleman who occupied a seat in this House. He pointed out distinctly, when $60,000,000 was put aside for war expenditure for that year, that that sum was not enough. We have had a lesser amount put aside during the past fiscal year, because only $55,000,000 was saved out of a revenue of $258,000,000. In spite of that fact, the hon. gentleman from this side of the House who made that criticism of the Budget of last year is the very gentleman who brought down the Budget this year as Acting Minister of Finance. I want to ask that hon. gentleman frankly, and my hon. friends on the other side of the House, in what position is he? Was he right when he made that criticism, from this very chair, I believe, last year, or is he right to-day in bringing down a financial statement such as he has and asking us to vote a large amount of money, while giving practically no promise for the coming year of any definite amount being put aside for war expenditure? He does say, however, that he hopes there will be some reasonable amount left out of next year's appropriations and the revenue he expects to derive from taxation he is now bringing into force for paying off some of the war expenditure.

The Acting Minister of Finance has suggested that he is making some changes in the taxes. Taxation is necessary. Money is required to carry on this war, and money must be got by taxation of some sort. My hon. friend has started in by putting a special tax upon tea and tobacco. I want to say to him frankly, and to put myself on record, that I am absolutely opposed to that taxation on these two articles. In the first place, it brings in only a very small amount of revenue—by his own estimate I think $3,000,000. To-day, tea on the table of the labourer or of the rich man is a necessity, and tobacco, to a very great extent, is the same. I grant you that on cigars and cigarettes, and possibly on high-priced tobaccos, a substantial tax might very well be levied. With that I find no fault, because I am one who believes that taxation should be so adjusted that we could pay more of our war expenditure as we go along and not leave so much to be paid by those who come after us. But I want to suggest to my hon. friend that, instead of putting this small tax on tea, which would only net the comparatively small amount of $3,000,000, he might have tried another means. I want to refer briefly to the amount of income tax that he proposes to put upon the people. I am sure that every hon. gentleman on this side of the House will agree, and will very gladly congratulate my hon. friend, if he is responsible, for increasing, in the very small degree that he has, the income tax. We have advocated from this side of the House ever since the commencement of the war that an income tax should be placed upon the rich people of our country who are receiving large incomes. They are the people who should be very thoroughly taxed, and taxed until they feel it. I submit to my hon. friend that in the small increase he is placing upon the rich men of this country, they are not being taxed to an extent that they will feel. Let me refer to a few of the incomes on which my hon. friend proposes to increase the tax to some extent. I start with the income of $10,000. At the outset, I want to say that I care not how people have lived in the past or how extravagant they have been, or what city they live in, but, to-day, when the Dominion of Canada and her sons are sacrificing everything under Heaven, no man should be left with an income of more than $10,000 a year to live on.

I go further and say that no man with an income of $10,000 or $20,000 up to $100,000 should be allowed to receive additional wages or profits during the war. The Government should allow him a fair annual living expenditure and take the remainder of his income for war purposes. Even then he would not be sacrificing nearly as much as the young man who is sent to the front to fight for the protection of the property from which the large income is derived. The tax should be made sufficiently high to cause the man of large income to feel that it really means something. For instance, the hard-hearted Acting Minister of Finance says to the man living in St. John, whose income is $10,000: I am taking $300 from you and leaving you the mere pittance of $9,700 to live on for a year. The man in Halifax—where the people are richer than they are in St. John—with an income of $20,000, is left only $18,618 to get along with during the year. The man of $30,000 income is left with only $27,298; the income of $50,000 is reduced to a mere $44,218; $75,000 to $63,000; $100,000 to $82,000; $200,000 to $150,000, and so on up to $400,000 and $500,000. I am not finding fault because the young men are taken, nor am I criticising the Military Service Act. But consider the matter from this viewpoint: a young man appears before a medical board and is examined in respect to his eyesight, hearing, chest measurement and general physical fitness. The Government then says to him: you are physically fit; you go to the trenches and fight for us at $1.10 a day. Would it not be just as fair to have an auditor examine the accounts of the millionaire, so that he may be instructed: You have no son to go to the front, but Mr. T's son has gone; you must deliver up some of your wealth to help pay the cost of sending the boys to the front? It is only fair that the rich man should make sacrifice as well as the poor man or the man who goes to the front. The small increase proposed in income tax is not yet sufficient. I can see hon. gentlemen on the other side who last year made this chamber ring with their denunciations of the Government because they did not put on a larger income tax. I sincerely hope that they will have sufficient influence with the Union Government to induce them greatly to increase the tax on the incomes of rich people, and to do so during the present session.

Mr. EDWARDS: How much would the hon. gentleman allow the so-called rich man before he confiscated his salary?

Mr. COPP: That question I am not in a position to answer. In ordinary communities the man who has $10,000 a year to live on has a munificent salary. Even if we allowed him $20,000, large amounts could still be collected for war purposes from the incomes of rich men.

Something has been said during this debate with regard to the operation of the Military Service Act. I regret exceedingly that this Act has not been successful in securing the number of men it was expected to secure to reinforce the Canadian lines at the front. I doubted at the time that it would be successful. Realizing the responsibility resting upon them, the Government recently passed an Order in Council cancelling all exemptions of young men who had reached the ages of twenty, twenty-one and twenty-two. Since that time farmers' organizations, agriculturists—some through deputations which came to Ottawa —and the press have protested against this Order. I am not in a position to say whether young men engaged in farm work should be left here to assist in greater food production, or whether they should go to the front and let production take care of itself. I do know, however, that farm production in my constituency will be much hampered and decreased if this Order is carried out to the letter. The Government must take the responsibility for their action in this respect. In view of the reports of the food controllers of Great Britain, United States and Canada, and the representations of Senator Colby, who gave addresses in various parts of Canada on this subject, the Government should consider carefully whether they should take the young men from the farms, or whether they should leave them there to engage in much-needed production. It is of very little use to send men to the front if there is danger of their being faced by shortage of food.

I am not here to-night holding a brief for the farmers generally. There is no more reason why a farmer's son should be exempted because he is a farmer's son than there is that a merchant's son should be exempted, unless the exemption of the farmer's son is necessary for the greater production of food. If the demand upon Canada is for greater production, the farmers cannot produce the crops unless they have men to plant, cultivate and harvest those crops. I sincerely trust; in fact, I feel sure; that the Government will take into careful consideration their action in this particular case.

It has been frequently stated in this House—and I need not elaborate—that the Government could do nothing better to assist production in this country than just to take off their protectionist goggles for a little while and look through free trade spectacles and put agricultural implements on the free list, at least during the war. A number of hon. gentlemen who occupy seats on the other side of the House must realize that that would be a very great advantage, one of the greatest advantages to the farmer, to the man who goes on to the farm to produce. If that man could have his harrows, ploughs, tractors, binders and other farm machinery come into this country free of duty, what a tremendous impetus would be given to greater agricultural production. What a stimulus and encouragement it would be to the farmers who, to-day, with a number of their sons overseas, are working hard endeavouring to produce greater crops, if they could buy machinery at a cheaper rate and so be able to buy more machinery for use on their farms. I do not suggest that my hon. friends should go too far in this matter, because it is important that there should be more or less union and working together, and I do not wish to raise political questions at the present time; but I ask those of my hon. friends opposite who have the feeling and conviction that farm implements should be put on the free list, as I know a number of them have, to turn to Hansard of last year at page 1707, where they will find a very strong advocate. I know this hon. gentleman, who occupies a position in the present Government, will stand by what he said last year. I am going to read only a few lines of his speech, and I would ask my hon. friends to read all that he said in regard to this question This is what he said:

> And then take the trade returns. Last year we imported altogether, of agricultural implements and parts thereof, everything which you can possibly imagine, including scythes and hand rakes and all the little things used on the farm, only $1,673,000 worth. I have again no idea how many million dollars worth are consumed in Canada, but there must be a great many millions, tens of millions of dollars worth of farm machinery consumed and yet we imported only $1,673,000 worth in Canada on which the Government received only $309,000 in duty, a mere bagatelle.

Imagine what a trifling amount. During the year 1916 we received only $309,000 in duties paid upon agricultural implements imported into Canada, while we used tens of millions of dollars worth of agricultural implements. But what we on this side of the House lay stress on is the fact that the consumer who uses agricultural implements has to pay the amount of the duty on these goods when manufactured in this country. The hon. gentleman goes on to say:

> And yet, Sir, we paid from 12 per cent to 17½ per cent and 25 per cent on all these millions and tens of millions of dollars worth of machinery used in Canada. We paid this, not to the Government, but to a little coterie of manufacturers in Ontario, and that same little coterie of manufacturers in Ontario were able to sell to the rest of this world practically $4,000,000 worth of these same articles. The exact figures are $3,854,000.

Those are the words of a gentleman who now occupies a seat in the Union Government, and I have no doubt, if the hon. gentlemen who sit behind him and who are and must be in favour of agricultural implements coming into this country free, could refer him to the speech he made last year in this Parliament, he would give their suggestions careful consideration and give them some encouragement that in the near future this action might be taken.

Mr. EDWARDS: Who is the gentleman?

Mr. COPP: If my hon. friend will read Hansard of last year at page 1707, he will find the remarks I have quoted.

Mr. EDWARDS: I was not asking for the page; I was asking for the name of the gentleman who made the remarks.

Mr. COPP: If the hon. member will read the page, he will find out the name of the gentleman.

[Mr. Copp.]

Mr. EDWARDS: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has quoted a speech made by some person. My contention is that he should give the name of the person who made the speech.

The CHAIRMAN: I know nothing in the rules of the House which obliges an hon. member quoting from a speech to give the name of the speaker. The hon. gentleman has quoted the page of Hansard from which the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) can get the information.

Mr. COPP: The hon. gentleman will, no doubt, as he is interested in the paragraph I have just read, look up Hansard and read carefully and fully the whole speech, and I know he will be very much impressed by the remarks made by the hon. gentleman whose words I have quoted.

I want to congratulate the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) upon the action he has taken in regard to embarking on a shipbuilding programme in Canada. I regret exceedingly that the Government have, during the past four years, been absolutely silent and dormant in regard to this great industry. I well remember the gentleman who represented the city of St. John in the last Parliament, hour by hour urging upon the Government to embark on a shipbuilding programme. I am sure if the whole time he consumed in this way were added together, it would run into weeks of steady argument and talk, and yet the Government turned a deaf ear. Two years ago he told them that the transportation question would be practically the deciding issue in this great war, and he urged upon the Government to embark on a shipbuilding programme, as we had the materials and the opportunity. He stated that we could buy or construct shipbuilding plants, and he urged upon them the necessity of immediate action. Yet during all those months not a hand was turned, until the Minister of Marine and Fisheries came down this session with a policy of establishing a shipbuilding industry in Canada.

I am sure every man who has the interest of his country at heart must realize that is the proper thing to do. While I sincerely trust the war will be over before the ships now under way can be turned out, we shall still require a great amount of shipping for transportation purposes after the war, and I trust that my hon. friend's policy may be crowned with success, and that in the future we shall have steel ships built in this Dominion sailing over the seven seas. I regret that my hon. friends on the other side of the House have not been able to influence the minister to start a shipbuilding plant in the Maritime Provinces. There we have the men, the material, and everything that is necessary for successful shipbuilding. In days gone by there was no place in the Dominion from the Atlantic to the Pacific that was richer in opportunities for the shipbuilding industry than the ports of the Maritime Provinces, and I sincerely trust that the minister, after studying this question carefully will reach the conclusion that there is a splendid opening there for shipbuilding.

I sincerely believe that every man, woman and child in this Dominion is heart and soul in this war. We are all willing and anxious to do everything we can to win this war, but naturally there are differences of opinion as to the best things to be done, and that, I suppose, is the reason for so many different suggestions being made in this debate as to the taxation methods and other matters. We have been told to save, serve and sacrifice. If we will study those words carefully and apply them each to his own individual case, I am sure it would be very much better than to apply them to the other fellow. The rich men with large incomes do not require to save, but they should be forced to serve and sacrifice. The acting Minister of Finance the other day, in introducing his Budget, spoke of the deep feeling of earnestness throughout the country, and commended the patriotism of our people who subscribed so handsomely to the Victory Loan last year. While I do not wish to detract in the slightest degree from the loyalty and patriotism of the people who subscribed, I say it is no very great proof of patriotism for a man with $50,000 in the bank drawing three per cent interest to withdraw it and invest in a war loan paying six per cent, when the security, moreover, has the whole resources of the Dominion behind it. The Government, instead of borrowing this money from these people at such a high rate of interest, should take a little of it if these wealthy men are not willing to sacrifice, so that they will be made to pay a fair share of the money necessary to carry on this war. If we only will examine ourselves we will see that we are all more or less selfish. The other night one hon. gentleman, who no doubt thinks himself a high-souled patriot, one of the most patriotic people in the Dominion, said that the Cockshutts had done everything possible to win the war, and no doubt he believed it. But in his very next breath he said that within twenty-four hours of tractors being put on the free list, in the interests of greater production and to help win this war, he had a delegation on the way to Ottawa to protest against any such action. Why? Was it because he thought the Government were not sincere in their efforts to win this war? No. It was because he feared its influence on the industry in which he was engaged. I speak with all due respect to my hon. friend because if our hearts were searched to-night I have no doubt we should find many Cockshutts among us, who would take the same course were our interests affected. It is as natural as it is to breathe for a man to stand up for his rights, and when his particular industry is interfered with he will naturally rise in protest. That is a reason, I contend, why the Government should come down with a strong hand. Now is their opportunity. We have now a Government, we are told, from which politics has been divorced, and which is carrying on the affairs of this country in what they believe to be the best interests of our people. Here is their opportunity, then, to do away with all political interference such as has been going on for some time.

The Acting Minister of Finance said that the Union Government had abolished political patronage. I sincerely hope he is right, but I am afraid he has not been on the penitent bench long enough to realize he may be mistaken as to the outcome of what he thinks is Civil Service reform and the abolition of political patronage. When this Union Government was formed some members of the Borden Government had to give place to the new members. The Minister of the Interior in that Government was waited upon and was willing to step out provided he got an equally good position. So he was made Chairman of the Civil Service Commission. Another gentleman from my own province, when asked to retire, also professed his willingness provided he got a good position. So he was made Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the province of New Brunswick. I think the only member of the Borden Cabinet who retired without getting some position almost as lucrative as that of a minister of the Crown was the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane), but I understand he is still hoping that when the railways of this country have been nationalized he will secure the very honourable and lucrative position of chairman of the commission that will operate the system.

I have trespassed longer on the time of the House than I had intended, particularly after the Minister of Labour had lectured us so severely for taking up the time of the House, but I sincerely trust that when he remembers I have not occupied more than fifteen minutes of the time of the House this session he will forgive me for speaking at such length to-night.

It will be my pleasure—I believe, my duty—to give to this Government all the support that will be in the interest of the country to give it in connection with the very great and grave questions and responsibilities with which it is faced. I realize as fully as any one what these responsibilities are. I trust they will be successful in working out the very difficult and knotty problems that arise in connection with the questions which are engaging their attention. I have no desire to take any part in any party or petty criticism of their acts. I sincerely trust that they will realize more this year than the Government did last year the very great importance of the responsibilities resting on them and will see to it, when the country is asked to bear such a heavy load of taxation to assist in carrying on this war, that they themselves set an example by practising rigid economy as well as preaching it.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, the last Parliament will be referred to in history as the long Parliament. This, I suppose, will be referred to as the Union Parliament. It may also be referred to in some respects as a remarkable Parliament. I find myself hardly yet used to the changed conditions which I find around me. Men who were formerly sitting opposite to me in the House and directing their criticisms to those on your right, Mr. Speaker, I now find associated with me on this side of the House and supporting the Union Government. I have noticed that one or two of these gentlemen, who formerly sat on the other side of the House and who are now on this side, have thought it advisable to offer something in the nature of an apology for being on this side of the House. That reminds me of a story I heard once of a bashful young man who saw a lady home. He was afraid that his friends, if they learned about it, would joke him, and when he reached the home of the young lady he said: "Mary, don't tell any body I came home with you to-night." Mary said: "Don't worry, John, I am just as much ashamed of it as you are." I hope that will not be taken too literally to represent my feelings in regard to the newcomers on this side of the House. I am only referring to one or two, who, it seemed to me, thought it necessary or expedient to shed one or two tears in parting with their friends across the way and to make a sort of apology for their position over here.

Hon. gentlemen who are occupying seats on this side of the House, whether they are Cabinet ministers and drawing salaries, which seems to go against the grain of my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Copp), or whether they are ordinary members like myself, need make no apology for sitting on this side of the House or for leaving the party with which they had always been associated and taking their places in the ranks of the Union party. Whose fault was it? Was it the fault of these hon. gentlemen who were formerly staunch supporters of the Liberal party? The fault was not theirs. The fault was in the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and it was due to the fact that during the many years in which he has been in public life in this country he has failed to rise to the great responsibility of his position. He failed to appreciate what was due to himself and what was due to the people of this country at this great crisis in the history of the Dominion and of the Empire. These men suddenly severed their connection with the party with which they had always been associated because they had always been determined that there was something above party ties and that was keeping faith with the boys who had gone overseas to fight for the people of this country.

I regret very much that my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Copp) has departed somewhat from the ordinary custom in refusing to give the name of the gentleman from whom he quoted. I suspect he was quoting from one of his own former speeches and notwithstanding the fact that he put it again on Hansard he was not altogether pleased with it but that he was rather a little ashamed of it and therefore did not want to give the name. I cannot conceive of any other reason, because if he had considered the matter worthy of commendation he would have been doing honour to the man responsible for these observations by placing them on Hansard and would not have objected to giving the name of the person who had made these remarks.

I am not going to occupy many minutes of the time of the House to-night but I want to say a word or two with regard to the Income Tax. The matter was dealt with, in my judgment, in a splendid manner by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Redman) the other evening. I want to endorse his remarks. The proposed tax might have been reasonably increased on the higher incomes. I will not go to the length of the hon. gentleman who preceded me in the idea that you should confiscate all property. I can see very many objections to placing a limitation upon a man's energies. In that case he might use his energies only to the extent of making the income he was allowed to possess and the country would lose. But I do think there is a feature in regard to the income tax which it is worth while calling the attention of the House to. I presume the idea is to be fair to all parties. One reason why I think the tax could be reasonably increased on the higher income or that a higher percentage could be taken is this: The men throughout this country who have given their sons to go to the front are contributing far more than the hundreds of people who have large incomes. Take, for instance, a man who has an income of $5,000 a year. The amount of the tax which he will contribute under this Income Tax Bill is comparatively small when compared with the contribution which is being made by a man who has a hundred acre farm and whose only son has gone overseas. I venture to say that the man whose only son has gone overseas will lose, because of lessening production, several hundred dollars a year. The financial loss which he will sustain will be far greater than the amount of money which actually passes from the pocket of the man who has an income of $10,000 or $20,000 a year.

In view of such facts, it does seem to me that the larger income might very properly bear a greater percentage of taxation than it has to bear under the Government's proposal. I will say furthermore, that whereas it might be advisable to place the tax where the Government are placing it at the present moment, I am quite certain that the time will come, and that in the very near future, when the suggestion that has been made by several hon. gentlemen on both sides that the tax on higher incomes be increased will be acted upon, and a higher percentage will be exacted from those who have the greater wealth and the greater income. That is all the comment I have to make in regard to the income tax.

I would like to express an opinion with regard to the tax on automobiles, which, of course, can be discussed more fully in committee. The object of the tax is to obtain revenue, but having talked the matter over with persons in the business during the last two or three days, I am not sure but that the purpose for which the tax is being imposed will be to some extent defeated by fixing the amount at ten per cent. I am not sure but that we would obtain more revenue if the tax was placed at five per cent instead of ten per cent, coupled with a tax of, say, two cents per gallon on gasolene, to be collected from the wholesalers at the distributing centres, and not from each little town where gasolene is used, or from each individual consumer. I am sure that would produce a very large sum of money and I think every person who uses an automobile, or has means enough to buy an automobile, would have sufficient money to pay the extra two cents on the gasolene that he uses. That I put forward as a suggestion which may be enlarged upon, or further considered, at a later stage.

My chief object in rising was to make some observations in regard to a matter which has been dwelt upon more than any other by hon. gentlemen opposite, and that is, the removal of the duty on agricultural implements. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), in his speech outlined the way for other hon. gentlemen, and has been followed by several speakers who have advocated the total removal of the duty on agricultural implements. In his speech the hon. member for Brome said:

> I am sure that the Acting Minister of Finance who has not yet had time to dissipate the sound economic views which he held on this side of the Chamber, will agree that no national policy could possibly be founded on the absolutely artificial financial conditions which confront the country at this time.

I wish to say that I entirely agree with that statement. I have always been a pretty strong protectionist, but in my judgment it is at the present time absolutely impossible for any Government, or any set of statesmen, to outline a fiscal policy for this country until after this war is over. So far as I am concerned, notwithstanding that I have always held very strong views along protectionist lines, I shall keep an open mind with regard to the consideration of this question when the war is over. We will have to consider the subject then in the light of the changed conditions which have been brought about by the war. I do not believe we are in a position at the present moment to properly consider the question, and to say what should or should not be done with regard to the duty on this or any other article. At all events we are not in a position to make a sweeping demand such as has been made by the hon. member for Brome when he asked that the duty be removed entirely from agricultural implements. Does not that hon. gentleman see that he has been inconsistent? He says that no national policy could possibly be founded on the artificial conditions which confront this country at the present time. Yet, after expressing that conviction, the hon. gentleman immediately proceeds, with dialectical ingenuity which he has developed to a remarkable degree, to lay down a policy and asked the Government to carry it out. Surely the hon. gentleman can see the inconsistency of his position. But if his dialectical ingenuity in argument is great, I must say that in my judgment he has shown himself somewhat reckless in his statement of facts. After he had given reasons why the duty should be removed from agricultural implements, and had said that a refusal of his request must be based upon some other consideration than the loss of revenue, the hon. gentleman was asked by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) how much the Liberal party, when they were in power, reduced duties—at least that was the substance of the question. In reply, the hon. member for Brome instanced the case of cream separators. He stated that cream separators were dutiable under the Conservative Government, but when the Liberal party came into power they removed the duty. If the hon. gentleman had wished to be exact he might have called attention to the fact that the Liberal party came into power in 1896, and did not touch the duty on cream separators until 1907, and in giving the whole history of the facts he might also have added that in the tariff of 1894 the Conservative party removed part of the duty from cream separators. That change in the tariff, however, was not alluded to. A further fact might have been added to make the story complete, and that is that after the duty was removed from cream separators—done, as the hon. gentleman says, in the interest of the farmers—the price was higher than it was before 1907.

We will pass to another item. The hon. member for Brome referred also to Indian corn. The Conservative Government, he said, allowed corn to come in free of duty in order to enable the distiller to make whisky, but when the farmer wanted to import Indian corn he had to pay a duty of 7½ cents a bushel. That, I suppose, in the hon. gentleman's opinion, makes a very nice statement.

I suppose that will appeal very nicely to some persons who do not know the facts.

[Mr. Edwards.]

But allow me to tell the hon. gentleman that he is absolutely wrong in his statement of facts. The duty was kept on corn for distilling purposes by the Conservative party at 7½ cents a bushel, and was retained by the Liberal party at that figure after they came in office. The hon. gentleman thereis down to 1907. The hon. gentleman therefore in making his assertion about the Conservative party catering to the distillers—making an appeal to the temperance elements of this country, I suppose, was his object—was entirely outside of the mark.

Mr. ROBB: Does the hon. gentleman state as a fact that the duty on corn for feeding purposes was kept at 7½ cents a bushel until 1907?

Mr. EDWARDS: I won't evade the hon. gentleman's question. I think he will give me credit for never evading questions put to me in this House. I was referring to the remark made by the hon. member for Brome that the Conservative party when in power had taxed the farmer 7½ cents a bushel for corn for their purposes, and had allowed corn to come in free when the distillers wanted it to make whisky. I say that that statement is absolutely wrong. There was a duty of 7½ cents a bushel on corn under the Conservative tariff. For what purpose? On corn that was used by the farmer for feeding purposes, and on corn that was used for distilling purposes. All that paid a duty of 7½ cents a bushel. But the tariff of 1894 removed the duty on corn used by the farmers to be sown for ensilage purposes. Let me give the item, No. 610 of the tariff of 1894, as follows:

> Indian corn of the varieties known as "Southern white dent corn" or horse tooth ensilage corn, and "Western yellow dent corn" or horse tooth ensilage corn, when imported to be planted or sown for soiling and ensilage and for no other purpose, under regulations to be made by the Governor in Council.

All that the Liberal party did in regard to the matter was to permit corn to come in if the farmer wished to use it for feeding purposes, and 7½ cents a bushel was taken off that corn, but a duty of 7½ cents a bushel had to be paid for distilling purposes just the same under the Liberal party as under the Conservative party. In looking over the tariff, my hon. friend from Brome stopped before he got to the free list. That is the mistake he made, perhaps not a very extraordinary mistake in view of the fact that the hon. gentleman, I presume, has not studied tariff matters very closely.

Mr. ROBB: May I again be permitted a question? The hon. gentleman admits that the Liberals removed the duty on corn in 1897, which was to be used for feeding purposes. Will he also admit that there was a drawback of 99 per cent of the duty on corn used for distilling purposes?

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not admit either part of the hon. member's statement at all, because I understand that the Liberal party did not remove the duty in 1897, they did not get busy until 1907. That is my understanding of the fact, and I think I am right. The hon. gentleman said that in addition to corn and cream separators, there were other changes made. Yes, there were some other changes made in 1907. The duty on cattle and sheep was increased from 20 to 25 per cent by the Liberals. The duty on meats, poultry, lard and tallow was left just as it was in the tariff of 1894. The Liberal party reduced the duty on eggs from 5 cents to 3 cents a dozen, although the duty on the American side was 5 cents against our eggs. The Liberal party left the duty on butter and cheese the same as it was, at 4 cents and 3 cents respectively, although the United States duty was 6 cents on each of these articles. The Liberal party increased the duty on tomatoes, and on cabbages and onions; they put 10 cents a bushel extra duty on beans and 5 cents a bushel on peas. The Liberals also, in 1907, increased the duty on potatoes from 15 cents to 20 cents a bushel, and even that was 5 cents lower than the American duty against our potatoes. When the duty was raised on potatoes from 15 to 20 cents a bushel, did any one hear any great noise from the hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Read)? Not that I heard of. Did any one see any tears running down his bronzed and weather-beaten face because they had increased the duty on potatoes? Not that we have ever known of. The hon. gentleman at that time, and others who sit on the opposite side, and who at the present moment are great free traders when potatoes are in question, had not a word to say during all those years that the Liberal party kept the duty on potatoes and actually increased it when they made a change. Was that a step in the direction of free trade? No. But it was accepted, and accepted cheerfully, by those hon. gentlemen who laid aside their great principles very readily when party expediency called for it, when their party leader said: You must take this and accept it. Then they had not a word to say about free trade. They tied their free trade principles up into a bundle and conveniently tucked them away. Even when an added duty was put on potatoes, there was not a whimper from any of these gentlemen, not even the hon. member for Brome.

But the hon. member for Brome paid his respects principally to agricultural implements and it is in regard to agricultural implements that I desire to give a little past history. The hon. gentleman has said that the acting Minister of Finance has not yet had time to dissipate the sound economic views which he held on the other side of the House, that he has not been long enough on this side to be contaminated entirely with the protectionist doctrine. He, and other hon. gentlemen on the other side, have spoken of the sound, economic views which the Acting Minister of Finance learned when he was on that side. What were they? Well, in 1871, the Liberal party deplored the fact that Canada was dependent upon foreign countries for manufactured goods and said: "It is our duty to foster our national industries." That strikes me as pretty strong protectionist doctrine. In 1876 the present leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) said:

> It is asserted by many and assumed by more that free trade is a Liberal principle and protection a Conservative principle. If I were in England I would be a free trader, but I am a Canadian born and resident here and I think we require protection.

In 1878 his policy was "tariff for revenue"; in 1887, "commercial union"; in 1891, "unrestricted reciprocity"; in 1893, "free trade as in England." In 1895 and 1896 the Liberal party came out with blood in their eye; nothing short of complete destruction of protection would satisfy them. They said: We will cut off the head of protection and trample on its body. And these hon. gentlemen who back up that party learned sound economic views, we are told, from leaders of the Liberal party on the other side of the House. Why, those leaders were changing their views practically every day. It has been known for years that there are as many fiscal policies on the Liberal side as there are Liberals; each one has a fiscal policy of his own. The member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) will speak very loudly of free trade till you touch something in Cape Breton North—and then he shies off to one side. So it is with other hon. gentlemen from different parts of the country: When their own district is affected, they want protection. They cannot and never have been able to see this matter from the standpoint of Canada as a whole. The Liberal party has been an absolute failure so far as fiscal policy is concerned.

Let us consider the question of agricultural implements, which the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) wants to make free. In 1907 the Liberals reduced the duty on agricultural implements from 20 to 17½ per cent. The people thought that that was a step in the direction of free trade. When the matter was before the House on that occasion the member for Souris, now Senator Schaffner, proposed this resolution:

That the Committee reconsider item 445, and that it be amended by striking out the figures 17½ per cent. in the general tariff and inserting in lieu thereof the figures 10 per cent.

The resolution was negatived by a vote of 56 to 22. Every Liberal in the House voted against it and several members from the West spoke against it, notably the member for Moosejaw, Mr. Knowles, who said:

I shall give the Government hearty support, for I believe the policy of the Government is in the interests of the country.

The member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) also spoke against the proposed reduction, in the following words:

The Tariff Commission got information all over the country. I do not think the farmers of the West, at all events, asked for a great reduction such as is proposed by this resolution on agricultural implements. They ask that the duties be left alone. I shall give the Government hearty support on this quesion.

That is, on retaining the duty at 17½ per cent. Hon. William Paterson, who previous to 1896 had declared for free trade in everything except biscuits, said, as reported at page 5582 of Hansard:

I do not disguise the fact that we propose to give these people—

That is, the manufacturers.

—nearly the amount of reduction in duty that has been made. For it must be remembered that 17½ per cent. is no more than a revenue tariff.

That was the "sound economic school" from which the member for Brome and others on the opposite side get the free trade principles which they now enunciate with such gusto. What did the present member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding), then Finance Minister in the Liberal Administration, say with regard to the position of the Liberal party concerning these duties? His words are to be found on page 5621 of Hansard, and are as follows:

By a careful calculation we are advised that the drawbacks we allow are somewhat less than the disadvantage under which the manufacturer is placed by the reduction of the tariff. Even suppose for a moment that he got everything free and had a duty of 17½ per cent. on the implements, would that be an extravagant duty as things go in this country? I believe this proposal of the hon. member for Souris, if adopted, would do an injustice to an established industry.

My belief is that if this motion were passed we would strike a severe blow at one of the great industries of the country. I believe the International Harvester Company would find it to its interests to close up its business at Hamilton, at least so much of it as is devoted to mowers and binders and have them made at the American branch and bring them from the United States. The factory in Hamilton is an American concern. With a moderate duty we have induced American capital to come into Canada and to establish that great industry and after we have brought it in and established it in Canada I believe that if we were to pass this resolution the company operating that industry would find it profitable to close the Hamilton factory and bring in the goods which they make in the United States.

That was the position taken by the Liberal party at that time with regard to agricultural implements. But I wish to recall the statment made by Hon. William Paterson, that in reducing the duty from 20 to 17½ per cent they were giving back to the manufacturers nearly the amount of the reduction that had been made. How was that done? The duty under the Conservative party was 20 per cent. A binder was valued for duty purposes at $80, making the duty $16. When the duty was reduced from 20 to 17½ per cent, immediately the value of a binder for duty purposes was increased from $80 to $100, making the duty $17.50. This party which, according to the members for Brome (Mr. McMaster) and Westmorland (Mr. Copp), is the authority on economic questions, said to the farmers: We may not have proceeded as rapidly in this matter as you would like or as you had a right to expect in view of our promises, but we are starting now; we are taking off 2½ per cent, and we will take off more. The farmers said that they were satisfied.

At last, they said, the manufacturers are getting 2½ per cent cut off the duty, and that will help a little. The Liberal Government, however, immediately turned around to the manufacturers and said: Do not worry, we have a way of fixing this so that the farmers will not catch on; they are too busy; they have to work from before daylight until after dark, and so they will not have time to look into these things; we are simply raising the valuation from $80 to $100, and we are really making the farmers pay one dollar and a half more, and they will not catch on. I do not believe the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) would have caught on to it until to-night, because if he had, I fail to see how, clever lawyer as he is, and with all his ingenuity, he would have had the face to point to his side of the House as a place for one to go for sound economic views, and for the principles of free trade. When this matter was under discussion, the then Minister of Finance, the present hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) made certain remarks which will be found in page 2452 of Hansard of January, 1911, when the great reciprocity pact was brought before the House. Some queer skips were made in the reciprocity pact. Did the hon. member for Brome, the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp) and other hon. gentlemen, when they were considering what a boon this was to the people of this country, when they were talking about dinner pails and all that sort of thing notice that when Hon. Mr. Paterson and his colleague went down to Washington, when they took the duty off certain things, they raised the duty on biscuits? That was not exactly along the line of free trade, but still it was done. It was not exactly consistent, but there was some person who was deeply interested in biscuits. There were also some friends of the Government who were deeply interested in cement, so the Liberal Government made a bluff at cutting the duty on cement, but it was only a bluff. When the matter was being discussed in January, 1911, the Minister of Finance of the day said:

They—

That is the farmers of the West—

—would be glad to have them—

That is, agricultural implements.

—free of duty; but I must frankly say to them that we do not think that it is fair. Like all others they must be prepared to give and take; they must be prepared to bear their share of the burdens of the country.

And so on. He then proceeded to say that the duty, which was 17½ per cent, had been reduced to 15 per cent. The then hon. member for Dundas, Mr. Broder, put this question to the Minister of Finance of the day. You can see the reason why he put the question:

Mr. Broder: Is there any change to be made in the valuation for duty?

Mr. Broder was a farmer who thought and read and who knew what had been done on the previous occasion, and naturally he put this question. What was the answer given?

Mr. Fielding: Our negotiations have not touched the question of valuation; that must be left to the operation of the customs authorities of the two countries.

And so they intended at that time, with the support of hon. gentlemen like the hon. members for Brome and Westmorland in this House supporting them, if they possibly could, to pull the wool over the eyes of the people of this country, making the farmers believe that they were free traders and were moving in the direction of free trade, while at the same time they were holding out the glad hand to the manufacturers, who, of course, were the source of their election fund. That was the situation in regard to agricultural implements. I do not blame the hon. members from Western Canada one particle for asking for free agricultural implements. Everybody understands the position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite on this particular occasion. They have to throw something before the public, and they think this will be catchy out in the West. But this is not the time to tinker with the tariff. It would, in my judgment, be absolutely impossible, while the war is in progress to arrange a fiscal policy for this country which we could be sure would be perfectly satisfactory after the war had terminated. We are passing through great changes. Our tariff will necessarily, to a greater or less extent, be affected after the war is over by the position taken by our neighbours to the South and by the position taken by other countries. I do not believe any man is in a position to say what the fiscal policy of this country should be after the war is over. We shall then have to meet changed conditions that have been brought about by this war, and so far as I am concerned, while I have strong views in regard to protection, while I believe in protection for a country like Canada, I have an open mind as to what should be done after the war is over in dealing with the duty on agricultural implements or on anything else. I am a believer in protection because I represent a farming community, because I represent a constituency which is as strictly rural as perhaps any constituency in Canada. In my constituency I have not a single incorporated village. I am in favour of protection for the farmers of this country because, every year that goes by, science has more and more annihilated distance; science had brought the countries of this world closer together. We now reckon distance in time, not in miles, and our competitors are brought closer to us to-day than they ever were before. Do you mean to tell me it is fair that a farmer in the province of Ontario, who has to spend thousands of dollars in building expensive barns and stables in which to house his stock; who for five and six months of the year is under the expense of feeding that stock, awaiting the opening of the next season; who, during that time is not making a dollar out of this stock which is a bill of expense to him, should be placed on an equality, his protective duty being removed, and obliged to compete with farmers from the Argentine Republic and from certain parts of the United States where they have not the climatic disadvantages which we have? A protective duty is, in my estimation, the only means of equalizing conditions which are made unequal by climatic conditions.

I do not think that I would be doing my duty if I did not express in a few words my opinion in regard to another matter. We have in this country men of different races and different creeds. We have our differences, and no doubt will continue to have them. But I, for one, do not despair of unity in Canada in the days to come. Why, Sir, in England they have been working for a thousand years rectifying mistakes, smoothing out wrongs, and adjusting difficulties, and they are not free from dissension and strife over there yet. But who will say that progress has not been made in England? No one, I venture to say. Progress has been made in that country, and at this moment England is recognized as the leader of that world democracy which had its origin in and which circles around her to-day in the fight for human liberty on the battlefields of Flanders. We have our differences here, and our differences, in my judgment, are due to a great extent to political cowardice. They are due to the fact that so-called statesmen in this country, place, and have placed, political party expediency ahead of the future good of this country. We have had too much compromise in this country. We have often heard it preached that compromise is the proper way to deal with differences in this country—compromise, compromise. Compromise is illogical. It is an invitation to future trouble; that is all it is. A question is never settled until it is settled right, and I do not believe in the compromise which has taken place in this country. By a system of compromise we have encouraged people in this country to carry on a propaganda here which is nothing less than seditious and treasonable. If we are going to have unity we must teach all races that no one race in this country is going to dominate, that all must obey the laws, that if they want to share in the privileges this country offers they must share in the responsibilities this country places upon them. And I repeat here to-day what I have said on former occasions in this House, that it strikes me as disgraceful that men should be allowed in this time of trouble and stress to maintain their rank in the militia of Canada who have been a disgrace to the uniform they wear because of the seditious utterances they have been allowed to make. Compromise is not the way to deal with a man like that. There is only one of two things to do with a traitor: either put him behind the bars, or put him with his back to the wall and shoot him.

There is another thing I wish to raise my voice against. There has been too much compromise in regard to the press of this country. Newspapers in the Dominion of Canada, and notably in the province of Quebec, have been allowed to preach treason day after day, week after week, and year after year since this war started. Those are the people who are largely responsible for the situation down in that province, a situation which does it no credit, and which in my humble judgment is unfair to the habitant and to the ordinary people of Quebec, who I think would show themselves to be made of the same timber as the men who made name and fame for themselves at Courcelette if they had not been wrongly led by certain men and certain newspapers. I say we are not doing our duty as public men if we do not raise our voice against any sort of compromise in dealing with these people. I for one have no use for that kind of compromise. In my judgment there is only one way to deal with them, and that is to deal with them in such a way as to silence them forever.

Just one word more. An hon. gentleman speaking in this House the other day alluded to the Orange Order in the Dominion of Canada as the Yellow Peril. Do we need to be afraid of that Yellow Peril in this country? Let me tell the hon. gentleman who spoke that way the other day that there have gone over to France more members of the Orange Order in Canada than the whole province of Quebec has enlisted from 1914 down to the present time. That is a fact. If these men are a menace to this country, then I ask him what can be said of the men in the constituency he represents. I resent anything of that kind. We have too many men connected with the Orange Order in this country, who lie in Flanders to-day, having given their lives for the great cause, and I for one will resent on the floor of this House any aspersions on an Order which not only in this war but in all former wars has always shown a loyalty to British institutions and to British principles which hon. gentlemen opposite who criticise the Order might very well emulate.

I have not dealt with public finances to any great extent, and I shall not do more now than to express my very great gratification at the speech delivered by the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean), which indicates that the people of Canada, so far as their financial burdens are concerned, are prepared to do their full part in carrying on this war

Mr. FRANCIS N. McCREA (Sherbrooke): I arise at this late hour to express my views, not at too great length I hope, but whatever time is required that I shall have to take. The question under debate is the expenditure and revenues of this country. I had not the pleasure of being in the House when the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) brought down the Budget, and I have not had time since to go into it thoroughly. I have no very serious comments to make on it. Taxation is something that nobody likes, whether he be rich or poor, but taxation under the present circumstances is something we cannot avoid and we may as well accept it cheerfully.

There are two things in a Budget which always interest the people. The first is that all taxes should be equally apportioned so that every person bears his share according to his circumstances. It has been said by some and by an hon. gentleman on this side of the House only this evening, that we should not tax tea and coffee, that we should not tax the poor man. The rich man, in his opinion, should bear the whole burden. If I understand him aright he argued that the poor man and the poor man's sons were doing the fighting, and therefore the rich man should pay the bills. As he belongs to the middle class I presume he would be exempt from both. I do not look at it that way at all. This war is the nation's war and every man, rich and poor, should bear his fair share of the burden. This should be demanded if only as a matter of principle, that every one may realize that the country is at war. I admit that the rich man is the best able to pay and I think under the present taxation proposals he will have to pay. So long as the taxes are evenly distributed, whether they be high or low I have no fault to find. Personally, I would rather favour high taxation at the present time. The country is prosperous. There is an immense amount of money coming in. Everybody is prosperous, the farmer, the labourer and every one else. When the people have money is the time to provide for paying the bills. There is a time coming after the war when probably the country will not be as prosperous as it is at present and we will be less able to meet the taxation that will be imposed. Consequently, I would not object to high taxation to meet a large part of the expenditures which have been made for the defence of our country, providing every person bears his equal proportion according to his means.

I have no objection to taxation providing the money is legitimately, properly and economically spent. That is quite as important as the imposition of taxes. We must provide the amount of money necessary to meet such expenses as cannot be avoided, but on the other hand we should not spend a dollar for any purpose that can be avoided. The expenses should be cut down in every department of government and otherwise. The Government should see to it that every man in its employ gives service for the money that he receives, gives a dollar of value for every dollar that he receives, whether it be in labour or anything else. One of the ministers, when submitting his estimates the other day, admitted that his department was very much overloaded, that other departments were in the same position, and that offices were maintained where there was nothing doing. But he wound up by saying that it was a hard thing for a man who has a heart to say to a person in the employ of the Government: We have nothing for you to do; we must discharge you. I would be sorry to think that the whole Cabinet would be so tender-hearted as that.

Let me put this matter in a proper light before the House. The Union Government went to the people on the question of conscription. The mothers of this country have spent their lives sitting up at nights weary and tired, nursing and caring for their boys. Now, when these boys have grown to be nineteen or twenty years of age, the Government, under the authority of Orders in Council which they have passed, say to each of these mothers: Your King and country requires your son; kiss your boy good-bye, it may be good-bye forever. I am not finding fault with this; it may be necessary to do it, but the Government that has a heart to tell the mothers of this country to give up their sons and say good-bye to them surely cannot turn around and say that they have not the heart to tell a man in their employ for whom there is no work that there is nothing for him to do and that he must look for another position. I am not finding fault with the Government for imposing conscription, but they cannot escape their responsibility when asking the country to sustain heavy financial and other burdens, by saying that they have not the heart to dismiss an unnecessary employee. That does not seem to me to be logical. I am not finding fault with the Government for their measure of conscription. It is the law and we must abide by it. I was not in favour of it because I did not believe it was necessary. But I say it is necessary to preserve the money and resources of this country, to see that the money is properly spent and that no man is kept in his position simply because he has a position unless there is something for him to do and he can give value for the money he receives.

The conscription measure brought down last session does not seem to have produced the desired effect. It was evidently a measure of conscription to get exemption. The Government have brought in a measure lately by which they have tightened the screws and made conscription more stringent. It may be wise, or it may be otherwise. My judgment is that if it is true that the overseas forces need reinforcement and that we should send men over, I doubt very much the wisdom of doing it just now. The men who are conscripted now cannot be trained, equipped and got into the firing line before winter. This Government and every other power we have in Canada, have been preaching greater production to the people. The farmers have just got to the point where they were ready to commence their seeding when this Order in Council was put through declaring that every man from nineteen to twenty-three should be conscripted. The order has gone out and some of these young men have been called. Inasmuch as these men cannot be got into the firing line before winter is on, it would have been wiser on the part of the Government to have delayed until the crop was in, and probably out. Then they would have had all the winter months to prepare these men and get them into the field ready to take their places at the front.

This brings up another matter which I have in my mind. I have never heard it expressed by anybody else; perhaps there is nobody else who thinks as I do on it. But, I think it is a very grave question and one well worthy of consideration, whether Canada would not have better served the Empire and the Allies if she had sent less men and more food. We are told that Italy has two million five hundred thousand men whom they cannot put into the field simply because they cannot equip and feed them. Would it not have been the part of wisdom if they had said to Canada: Your country is one of unlimited and unbounded resources from an agricultural standpoint; produce food and produce munitions? Would it not have been equally wise if we had said to Italy: Put your men in the field and we will equip and feed them. This is a combination of nations at war, and a combination of nations resembles a combination of people. If one nation can supply men, and another nation can supply food, why not develop their resources along those lines? This is a suggestion I am throwing out. I believe, and have believed for a long time, that the Government would have been well advised if they had considered the question of producing more food and more munitions, and had sent fewer men. The point may well be worth considering yet, but I do not imagine that the Government will take my advice. The people of the country perhaps may not credit what I say now, but when they recover their rational senses and get over their enthusiasm they will conclude that it would have been wiser and better for Canada, and this country would have been of greater assistance to the Allies, had we followed to some extent the suggestions which I am now making. So much for matters of finance and the Budget.

There is another matter which has been raised by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) which I am very glad to have the opportunity of discussing, and that is the matter of the pulp and paper business in Canada. I shall endeavour to deal with it as briefly and as carefully as I can. I shall endeavour to place before the House and the country the respective attitudes of the manufacturers, the publishers and the Government. At the outset let me say that this great industry has attained the proportions of being the third largest exporter in Canada if not the second largest. Under the circumstances we would expect the Government and the press of Canada to show it due consideration. The press sets itself up as being a public educator, if not a public benefactor, and a public benefactor is one who supports everything that is in the interest of the country. Now the paper industry is not only a source of revenue to the people engaged in it, but the export of paper of all kinds from Canada, if we take this year alone, represents a value of upwards of $60,000,000. This large sum of money attracted to this country and distributed among its people indicates that the industry is one which is not only worthy of the attention of the Government, but is entitled to their support, as far as they can give it.

Perhaps it would be well for me, as a sort of introduction, to briefly review the state of the industry prior to the outbreak of war in 1914. At that time the industry was at a very low ebb and so keen was the competition that only those mills that were located close to the raw materials, with the advantages of cheap water-power, cheap labour, freedom from strikes, and things of that kind, could succeed in making any money. For example, the International Paper Company had reorganized once, if not twice, in the five years immediately preceding 1915, and had not paid a dividend even on their preferred stock for some years prior to that time. They were not alone, for there were some manufacturers in Canada who were in the same position, and could not even pay a dividend on their preferred stock. The war broke out and in the latter part of 1915, or in the early part of 1916, the business of manufacturing paper commenced to improve. The demand increased, but the cost of production increased as well. Let me illustrate my statement that prior to 1915 the paper manufacturing industry was in a very bad state, by stating what the conditions of doing business were. The conditions were these: The manufacturer of newsprint had not only to manufacture his paper, but had to ship it and prepay the freight to destination in the United States, and had to store it at destination and deliver it from day to day at the publisher's sidewalk—what they call "sidewalk delivery."

This meant that he had to keep at least two months' supply at his storehouse to guarantee the publisher against strikes or other interruptions to trade that might happen. Such were the conditions of the paper trade prior to 1914. Under the circumstances any gentleman in business, or who understands the situation, realizes how essential an improvement in prices was. But, strange to say, when prices commenced to rise early in 1916, the publishers came down to Ottawa and interviewed the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), and I do not know who else, and practically, without consultation with the manufacturers, without hearing what their claims or reasons were, the minister undertook to fix a price. In the autumn of 1916 he wrote a letter to Mr. Chahoon to the effect that a suggestion had been made to him in some way, or from some source, that the publishers would consent to a rate of 2½ cents a pound on paper, and he wound up his letter by saying: My advice is accept it, because if I have to pass an Order in Council I shall make the price much less. From the interviews we had with the Minister of Finance, as the arbitrator between the publisher and the manufacturer, we thought we discovered that we had an adverse jury. and we also found that the Finance Minister had been at one time in his life connected with one of the large papers in Toronto, and still had a leaning that way, and rather than take any chances the manufacturers consented, for a period of four months, starting from March 1st, 1917, to undertake to supply the necessary requirements of paper to the publishers of Canada at 2½ cents a pound, but with this rider and understanding, however, that the Government would appoint a commission to investigate the matter. Not only did they ask the Government to appoint a commission, but they asked that they should also appoint an auditor, which they did. Mr. G. T. Clarkson was appointed to examine and audit the books of the manufacturers and to establish from the books what the cost of manufacturing paper was. Mr. Clarkson audited the books of thirteen of the largest newsprint mills in Canada.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who is Mr. Clarkson?

Mr. McCREA: He is a chartered accounted, appointed by the Government.

Mr. LEMIEUX: From Ottawa?

Mr. McCREA: From Toronto. Mr. Clarkson reported that from the books of these thirteen companies, as he had examined them, the cost of manufacturing paper was $56.90 a ton. Mr. Pringle, after having held I don't know how many sessions at different places, but very many, on the 1st of September, or prior to that, made an interim report to the effect that he had not completed his investigation and examination, but that he had gone far enough to satisfy himself that the cost of making paper as established by the auditor was a fair and reasonable conclusion to arrive at, and he stated in effect: Whilst my examination is not completed, I would recommend that the price of newsprint to the Canadian publishers from September 1 to January 1 be 2.85 cents a pound, or $57 a ton. The publishers, who had all the opportunity they needed, could have produced any evidence that they wished to, attended all the sessions and sittings, and asked all questions. They could have been represented to establish their case that paper should be sold at $50 a ton. They evidently did not take any part in the investigation, or not very much, but instead of accepting the recommendation of Mr. Pringle of 2.85 cents a pound they came down in force to Ottawa and simply told the Cabinet and the minister: You shall not accept Mr. Pringle's report; if you do—I do not know what they said, but it sounded to me like a threat.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Nothing of the kind. The hon. gentleman will permit me to say so, as I was present. Nothing of the kind was said by the publishers. There was no threat whatever.

Mr. McCREA: No threats? Just listen. Mr. Richardson, Member of Parliament for Springfield, is, I may state, the proprietor of the Winnipeg Tribune, and was one of the publishers who attended that meeting, and spoke before the sub-committee of the Cabinet. The publishers came down to protect against the Government accepting Mr. Pringle's report. Naturally, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. gentlemen, if you would not expect, when this delegation came before the sub-committee of the Cabinet, that they would offer some argument why they could not stay in business and pay the increased price, or give some reason to show that the manufacturer was getting an exorbitant price. But what did Mr. Richardson say?

Mr. LEMIEUX: What was the date of that interview? Before the election?

Mr. McCREA: Shortly before the election. Here is what Mr. Richardson said:

> The newspapers are doing a good work for this country. You may find if you grant this order that it will be necessary for the Union Government to take over the national newspapers and furnish their own editorials.

Is that giving an argument why the publisher could not pay the price, or why the manufacturer was getting too much? Was that a threat or what would you call it? I would call it a threat not an argument.

[Mr. McCrea.]

Mr. RICHARDSON: Will the hon. gentleman allow me a word? That is not a correct transcription of what was said because there is no such thing as national newspapers. However, the point I made was a joke and was laughed at and accepted as a joke, as the hon. Acting Minister of Finance, who was there at the time, knows.

Mr. McCREA: Did you ever see this in print?

Mr. RICHARDSON: As to the furnishing of their own editorials, the hon. member must see, as everybody saw, that that was a joke.

Mr. McCREA: Did you ever deny having said so?

Mr. RICHARDSON: I never saw it before to-day. I do not deny it now.

Mr. McCREA: Mr. Rowell, replying to your statement, said:

> They would lack variety in that case.

Mr. RICHARDSON: That proves that what I said is right.

Mr. McCREA: Hold on a minute. Here is what follows:

> Mr. Richardson: If you contemplate that possibility I think you would rather hesitate before making an order of this kind.

Is that a threat, or giving a reason? I ask you—

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member must address the Chair.

Mr. McCREA: Is that an answer or a reason why the manufacturers of newsprint should not get the price suggested by the commissioner who had been appointed by this Government?

Mr. RICHARDSON: It was no particular reason. The reason the publishers waited upon the Government and asked that the order be not enforced was that the publishers withdrew from the investigation months before, having made up their minds that the investigation was loaded against them and that they could not rely upon having a decent investigation. They refused to proceed. They never asked that the price of newsprint be less than cost plus a reasonable interest on capital.

Mr. McCREA: Who was to establish the cost?

Mr. RICHARDSON: An honest investigation was all we required, not a loaded one.

Mr. McCREA: Mr. Speaker, I put it to you and to this House, the Government had not been asked by the manufacturers alone to appoint a commission, but by the manufacturers and publishers jointly. They appointed Mr. Pringle, who is well known to the members of this House, and I do not think any hon. member has a right to impugn Mr. Pringle's character or honesty. They not only appointed Mr. Pringle, but Mr. Clarkson, a capable and prominent auditor. The Government appoints only capable men. Mr. Clarkson's reports that he investigated the books of thirteen of the leading manufacturers in Canada, and that he found the cost to be $56.90 per ton. Mr. Pringle recommends that $2.85 shall be the price from September 1 to January 1, and when he completes his report the price may be more or may be less.

Mr. RICHARDSON: What did you say the cost was?

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The House is not in committee. The member for Sherbrooke has the floor.

Mr. RICHARDSON: He puts questions to me, Mr. Speaker.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: He has no right to.

Mr. McCREA: Here is what Mr. Pringle says about this:

> I must say that when the investigation commenced the manufacturers of newsprint loyally came forward, produced evidence when I required it, brought witnesses from long distances at their expense and asked no compensation. On the other hand, the Press Association of Canada have given me no assistance.

The publishers practically intimated that the Government might be called upon to write their own editorials if the requests made were not acceded to.

Mr. LEMIEUX: A hold-up.

Mr. McCREA: When the commissioner brought in his report the manufacturers were not satisfied with it and they are not satisfied with it to-day, because the price of materials, labour and everything else is steadily going up. The manufacturers say this: we will abide by Mr. Pringle's finding for the time being and accept $2.85 per hundred provided the commissioner makes his final report within three months and, in the event of that finding or report not being satisfactory to either party, we simply ask that the matter be referred to a judicial tribunal of three of the most eminent judges in Canada. That is what has been done in the United States. I understand that this Government have expressed their concurrence in the suggestion, but so far I believe that no judicial tribunal has been appointed. All we want in this matter is a fair and square deal and no interference with our business, which represents an export valued at some $60,000,000. At a time when exchange is heavily against Canada, the matter of the export of newsprint and the bringing into Canada of $60,000,000 from a foreign country for circulation here is very important. I believe that eventually we will get justice, but this is one of the things which the Government should take an interest in protecting.

The member for Springfield said the other night that the publishers of Canada succeeded in obtaining an indictment at Washington against certain Canadian manufacturers; that these manufacturers pleaded guilty and paid their fines, and that the publishers were consequently entitled to a great deal of credit. The newspaper publishers of this country are supposed to be the educators of public thought, to be engaged in every good work, to do all they can to promote Canada's interests. Is it a credit to them that they should hound and follow the manufacturers of newsprint down to Washington and assist in getting indictment against them for having sold their goods in a foreign market at the best possible price? The newspapers claim that they are a public service; that they are one of the things that cannot be dispensed with.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I did not say that the newspapers of Canada did any such thing as my hon. friend suggests, for they had no part or lot in the transaction.

Mr. McCREA: You said "we."

Mr. RICHARDSON: I said nothing of the kind. It was the American Publishers' Association that brought these men to justice and had them fined. The Canadian publishers had no part in it. The hon. gentleman must not misrepresent my position.

Mr. McCREA: I will show the hon. gentleman before I get through that his statement is not correct. The member for Springfield said: we have succeeded in bringing them before the tribunal.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is obliged to accept the correction of the hon. member for Springfield.

Mr. McCREA: All right. I will tell you what happened. Some Canadian manufacturers were indicted and called to Washington to answer a charge of having violated the Sherman Act. They went there three or four times for hearing. Meanwhile, the publishers of the United States and the manufacturers came to terms, agreeing that the price of paper should be a certain amount for a certain period; and nothing remained except the litigation that was pending. The publishers expressed their desire not to proceed with it further. The manufacturers of Canada had, at great expense, already been down there three different times with witnesses—and, as every one knows who has employed a lawyer in the United States, a litigant has to pay for counsel whether he wins or loses. The court said that they could not dispense with the fine, and counsel said: You may have to come down here three or four times more, and if you do, the cost will be two or three times the amount of any fine. Would you rather confess judgment, pay the fine and let the thing drop, or proceed with it? I believe your case is good. A number of them said: We prefer to pay the fine, whatever it may be, and drop the thing. But Mr. Henry Wise, a New York advocate who represented George Gould, said: No legal wrong has been committed; we will confess no judgment; proceed with your case. But the publishers did not proceed further with the prosecution and Mr. Gould, who was answering the same charge as all the others, was discharged without paying one cent by way of fine, and went home a free man. That is what that prosecution amounted to.

In the section of the country that I come from, bordering on the eastern New England states, there are a large number of paper mills. Thousands of cords of wood pass through my home town every day. The Burland mills alone use 1,200 cords of wood a day which is largely exported. We hear politicians and business men throughout the country who know about these conditions saying: Why should this not be manufactured in Canada so as to give employment to Canadians? That is a sound view. The Government of the province of Quebec, in their wisdom, some years ago passed a law by which timber taken from the Crown land had to be manufactured in Canada. The same thing was done in Ontario. The tendency has been to build up the pulp and paper trade in Canada.

If this Government are going to take the attitude that paper must be sold at 2½ cents per pound, which is less than cost—I do not want to tongue-thrash the Government, but I want to put them in possession of the facts. A business which is bringing into Canada some $60,000,000 a year, a business which might be extended and enlarged so as to prevent this export of raw material to a neighbouring country, is worthy of consideration. The fact of supplying the Canadian press with their requirements at 2½ cents per pound, even though it be at a loss, is not the most serious matter. Only eleven or twelve per cent at the outside of the paper manufactured in Canada is required to supply the press of Canada. Here is where the most serious part comes in. The manufacturers in the United States are up against the same thing as we are confronted with here. The press of the United States is daily and hourly pressing their Government for the same ruling to fix the price of newsprint and not to allow the manufacturers to charge them too much. One of the arguments they are putting up to the Government of the United States is this: Why should Canadian paper manufacturers be allowed to sell paper in the United States at 3 cents or 3¼ cents a pound when the Government of Canada are forcing them to sell paper to the publishers of Canada at 2½ cents a pound? That is sound argument, sound reasoning. Supposing that the Government of the United States takes this attitude and says to the Canadian manufacturers: Inasmuch as you can sell paper to Canadian publishers at 2½ cents per pound, which your Government thinks is a right and reasonable price, why should we allow you to sell paper in the United States at any price you see fit? Hon. members may say: Oh, he is a crazy paper manufacturer, speaking for himself. This is an industry. While it affects me directly, it affects every man in Canada indirectly. Any business that brings into Canada $60,000,000 to $80,000,000 per annum is worth considering, and the amount is increasing. In 1890 the exports of pulp and paper from Canada amounted to $7,574,118, and the number of men employed in paper mills was 2,718. In 1915 the amount of capital invested in the paper industries in Canada was $133,760,602, and the last report we have, that is of 1917, shows that the capital invested in the paper and pulp industry of Canada was $145,800,000. The exports we expect will this year exceed $60,000,000, and the amount is increasing every year. At this particular time, when the exchange is so adverse to Canada, it is in the interest of everybody to encourage an industry that is bringing foreign money into Canada in exchange for our raw material.

Another matter that the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) somewhat emphasized by rapping his desk while he was discussing it, was the Brompton Pulp and Paper Company, which, he said, had made enormous profits. He read their annual statement, showing a profit of 14½ per cent on the common stock. That is correct. Does the hon. gentleman understand, first, that the Brompton Pulp and Paper Company have not supplied one pound of paper to Canadian publishers? We have no customers in Canada with the exception of one in Sherbrooke. Perhaps the House is not aware that the newsprint produced by the Brompton Pulp and Paper Company is less than one-sixth of our total product, and whilst we are not making one dollar on newsprint, we are making money on some other things. That is how the Brompton Pulp and Paper Company have made the enormous profit, as it appears to the hon. member for Springfield, of 14½ per cent. on their common stock, but they have not made it on newsprint. I am not speaking for the other newsprint manufacturers, but I know that the Laurentide Company, which was cited by the hon. member for Springfield as being a company which was very prosperous, have large interests in what is known as the Shawinigan water-powers, which give them large profits. They are also manufacturers of 100 tons per day of sulphite pulp, on which there are no restrictions, and those who have been manufacturing that class of goods have been making money. They are the manufacturers of 100 tons per day of ground wood, which they have for sale in addition to what they use for themselves. If you take those three items, they will pretty nearly explain the large profits that firm is making. I do not think the hon. member for Springfield made his statements with bad intent, but he was not informed. I am not making these statements with any intention of knocking him, but simply to put him in possession of information which he evidently does not have.

There is, in connection with this pulp and paper matter, another feature which I wish to draw to the attention of the House, and it is this. The Minister of Finance passed a ruling whereby the publishers of Canada should receive what paper they require for their publications at 2½ cents per pound. The manufacturers said: "There are some mills in Canada which have no Canadian customers and which are not supplying the Canadian business." The minister said: "Those who do not supply any Canadian customers will have to pay the manufacturer who does the difference between the price of 2½ cents and the price that he could get which, at that time, was estimated to be 3¼ cents, the ruling price in the United States. That is, any mill in Canada which did not supply its proportion of newsprint to the Canadian press would have to pay its neighbour for whatever its proportion of newsprint would be. Here comes in a peculiar circumstance. Lord Atholstan, who is a very important man, the owner of the Montreal Star and some other papers, is also the owner of a paper mill at St. Remo in the province of Quebec, a mill which has a capacity of some thirty or forty tons a day. Lord Atholstan, better known as Sir Hugh Graham, did not buy or build this mill for the purpose of going into the business of manufacturing paper for sale, but simply for the purpose of supplying paper to his own press. Instead of supplying eleven per cent of his paper to the Star and shipping the balance across the line, he supplied all the paper he made in his mill to the Star. Then in September last he presented a bill to the Minister of Finance and said: "Your ruling, Sir Thomas White, was that any mill in Canada that did not supply its proportion of paper would have to pay some other mill that had supplied more than its share. Under your ruling I was bound to supply eleven per cent of my production to my press, and the balance was to be supplied by the other manufacturers of newsprint in Canada. However, I have supplied the total production of my mill to the Star and here is my bill for the eighty-nine per cent supplied to my press at two-and-a-half-cents a pound. I could have got three and a quarter cents if I had shipped that balance to the United States. That represents fifteen dollars a ton more than my proportion under your ruling, and I want you to collect that from the other manufacturers of newsprint in Canada and reimburse me." What did Sir Thomas White say to Lord Atholstan? And let me say that there are lots of men with less titular honours than Lord Atholstan who have a great deal more honour than he has, and who would not have been guilty of that kind of business. What would I have said? I would have said: "If under my ruling the paper manufacturers of Canada are compelled to supply paper to the press at less than cost during war time, when conditions come back to normal, they will at least have a customer. If these manufacturers had been supplying the Star they would have a customer in the Star, but as it is they will not have the Star for a customer after the war, as you will supply that paper from your own mill." But Sir Thomas White did not say that. He said: "My ruling is that every mill in Canada must supply its proportion or pay somebody else for doing it." What do you think of that Mr. Speaker? Here was a mill that was acquired for the sole purpose of supplying the Montreal Star and the other publications of Lord Atholstan with paper. The Government's ruling was that the manufacturers must supply all the paper that was required in Canada at two and a half cents. Then Lord Atholstan comes along and says: "I supplied all my paper, and under your ruling I must be reimbursed by the other manufacturers." Mr. Pringle, I might say, has intimated to the manufacturers of Canada that Lord Atholstan should be settled with, but the manufacturers have not consented to it yet, and I do not believe we will right off. That is how the manufacturers of Canada are being treated. I do not make any accusation against the Government because they have not pronounced finally on the matter, and it is not right to pronounce on unfinished work. But I appeal to the Government and to this House and to the people of this country that this industry should not be crippled for any trifling foolish nonsense. I quite admit that the press may not have been able to afford a higher price when the war broke out, but there is no reason in the world to-day why the press of Canada cannot do as other people have to do. Pass it on. Before the war the price of newsprint was somewhere around two cents a pound. To-day it is only two and a half cents. Prior to the war the price of pulpwood was less than fifty per cent of what it is to-day, and labour was only getting half the wages it gets to-day. Repairs of every kind have gone up in price. Let me give one illustration. Prior to the war we averaged up the cost of fourdrinier wire for eighteen months, and it averaged $212 a wire, and the life of it was almost six weeks. To-day it is costing us $490, and its life is less than half what it was before the war. The manufacturer says he cannot get the material; I do not know whether it is on that account or because of poor work that the life is so much shorter, but it now lasts only three weeks as against six before the war. And the price of all other repairs has gone up in the same proportion. Is it reasonable, therefore, that we should be asked to continue to supply paper at the same price when we have the figures of the Government's own auditor and commissioner to support us? I was very pleased the other evening when the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) speaking of railway conditions in this country, referred to the Drayton Commission as comprising men held in high esteem, and he said the Government should be guided by their advice and report. I agree with him. But if the Government should accept the report of the Railway Commissioners and be guided by their counsel, why should they not accept the report and advice of Mr. Pringle? I do not think any man in this House will accuse Mr. Pringle of being anything but a straight, honest and upright man who uses his best judgment. Not only Mr. Pringle but the Government auditor have shown that the cost of newsprint is $6.90 more than we are getting, and under the circumstances I think the whole matter is entitled to greater consideration than it has hitherto been getting, and I trust the sub-committee of the Cabinet or whoever has charge of it will see that the manufacturers are protected.

Shortly after the price of newsprint had been fixed a delegation came from Toronto and other parts of Canada to interview the minister at Ottawa in an effort to get him to fix the price of book papers, wrapping paper, and many other classes of paper. They said: "You have fixed the price of news print at 2½ cents, which is a twenty-five per cent increase over the ordinary price. Here are our invoices showing what we paid for this grade of paper prior to the war, and here are our invoices showing what we are paying to-day. In some cases the increase is very high." I think that is the strongest kind of argument they could lay before him—to show the invoices before the war and the invoices of to-day. I was there to defend our case if necessary, but I was not needed. The minister said, "Gentlemen, I am sorry for you. The law of supply and demand governs, and it is dangerous to interfere with that law. If you interfere and curtail the production of this particular article, you will drive the manufacturer of that article out of business, and eventually you will suffer." The hon. member for Springfield the other night told us that a combine had been established whose object it was to discourage and curtail the building of mills.

It was not a combine for which the manufacturers were responsible. The concern I am connected with had placed an order for a new machine which should have been made and delivered by December, 1917. But when the Government commenced interfering with our business, and fixed the price so that we could not manufacture except at a loss, we said: Stay your hand and do not make that machine for us; we are already losing money; that is enough. These publishers are responsible if there has been any curtailment in the business. They have put their hand, their authority and influence on this business and they have said to the Government: We will not allow these people to make money; we must dictate the price. And they have dictated it so far. I beseech this Government, in the name of the business interests of the country and of everybody, to hesitate before they proceed too far in curtailing prices. Newsprint and wheat are the only things of which the prices have been fixed. The price of wheat was fixed at $2.21 a bushel, which was double the normal cost, whereas the price of paper was fixed at a twenty-five per cent advance. Is there any equality in that? Not in my judgment. I think I have dealt sufficiently with this matter. I have not spoken with the object of tongue-thrashing or abusing anybody. I have but stated the facts as they appeared to me, and I am pleading with the Government to give us justice and fair treatment. We do not want this industry to be made a football of for the sake of pleasing a few publishers. It is too important to the country and to everybody in it.

Now I pass on to the railway situation. I think that the taking over of the Canadian Northern railway was a rank deal put over on this country. I do not know that I could express it more strongly in view of all I know about it. With reference to the arbitration to fix the value of the stock, it appears to me that it would be a good deal fairer to arbitrate to see how much the promoters of the road should refund of the money which they misappropriated and did not put into the road at all. However, I shall not further comment on that. It is not much use, and I have expressed myself before.

But one of the questions that I do propose to say a little about is the increase in rates. A good deal of fault has been found with the action of the Board of Railway Commissioners in granting a fifteen per cent rate increase especially to the Canadian Pacific railway, who, they say, are already rich and should not be allowed to make any more money. I never had a dollar of interest in the Canadian Pacific railway and I have always given preference, as far as I could personally, to the Grand Trunk railway because that was the road I knew when I was a boy and I have grown up with it, and I kind of hang on to old things. I have understood from members of this House that the Canadian Pacific railway had been lavishly dealt with; but in looking over the reports and comparing the assistance that has been given to the Canadian Northern railway, the Canadian Pacific is not in it. The Canadian Pacific railway has received $35,000,000 in cash, 18,700,000 acres of land and two short pieces of railway. That is the total assistance that it has got, but by good and careful management it has been made a success. I venture to say that if you put the Canadian Pacific railway, with all its great prosperity, into the hands of a few freebooters, in the next ten years it would be on the rocks and appealing for assistance. A fifteen per cent increase has been granted but the Canadian Pacific railway is penalized to the extent of $7,000,000 because it is prosperous. I do not know that that is good reasoning. You are simply penalizing prosperity and good management and putting a premium on bad management when you undertake to bolster up the weak ones at the expense of the prosperous ones. You are penalizing those that are giving good service. Some hon. gentlemen have criticised this increase which has been allowed to the railways and an hon. gentleman speaking the other night said that fifteen per cent means $40,000,000 taken out of the pockets of the people of this country. Very true; probably it does. This hon. gentleman says that the farmers of the West are going to be taxed $40,000,000. I am probably as large a shipper as there is in this House. I have never had a dollar's worth of stock in the company, but I would like to be fair. We have all had some experience of what additional costs amount to. We know that coal, labour and all these necessary things are more expensive, and if you figure out the additional cost of all the material and equipment you will realize what the railways are up against. A car that you could buy prior to the war at $600 or $700, costs more than double now, and everything else is in the same proportion. Suppose you do take $40,000,000 out of the people of this country, and part of it from the West, you must not forget that the people of the West are getting for their crop now more than they got prior to the war. What does the increased rate that the railways are getting for carrying the goods amount to compared with the increased price the farmers are getting for their goods? If you balance the thing you will find that the railways are getting a very moderate increase. I repeat that I am a shipper and that I ship as much freight probably as any man in this House, but, we want to be fair. Whilst the times are good, and farmers and all others are getting rich, we should allow the other fellow who carries our goods to market a fair compensation for his work, too.

I hope that the Government, in their wisdom, may see their way to deal fairly with this pulp and paper question. It is a very vital question, not only to the manufacturers but to the business interests of the country, and I hope the Government will not be carried away by any threats such as I have just read, even though the Press of Canada did elect this Government. It probably would have been elected without its assistance. Whether it did or did not elect it, all we ask from the people of this country is a fair show and no favours. We will take our chances and we will conduct our business as it should be conducted. The manufacturers of Canada are endeavouring to build up their industries and to build up a very prosperous country if they get the necessary protection. We believe that we are entitled to it. We are not asking it as a favour, but as a right, and something that we are justly entitled to.

Mr. ANDREW KNOX (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, permit me, briefly, to draw the attention of the House, to another phase of the situation developing from the application of the Budget, so ably laid before us by the hon. minister (Mr. A. K. Maclean). We have been treated to many views of this subject and from many angles, but I ask that the House look on it for a few moments, with the eyes of the West, the Northwest, at that; and let me say I am not going to treat—or ill-treat—the House to a vast array of figures.

The minister states that we must rely on our own capital and our own labour so far as we can see, to carry on our present war trade programme; and that to enable the people to do this, it is necessary that we continue to produce wealth. I wish to point out, Mr. Speaker, that nowhere in the Dominion can greater production for the outlay involved, be secured, than in some portions of the West. The per capita production of Saskatchewan for 1917 stood unequalled in the world. I wish, particularly, to draw the attention of the House to the great hinterland in the northern portions of the three prairie provinces, more particularly the province of Saskatchewan. Many localities throughout this vast territory are well suited for agriculture and I wish to remind the hon. members that the farther north wheat is grown the better is the sample likely to be in the percentage of the more important constituents, which go to make up that sample. In proof of this, I would point out that the wheat produced in the Canadian west shows up very much better in competition tests than that produced farther south; and I will carry this point a little further. The wheat which has won the championship of the world on a good number of occasions, has been grown in the province of Saskatchewan, and on most of those occasions in the constituency which I have the honour to represent, and which, with the exception of the Yukon, is one of the most northerly in the Dominion, a neighbour of my own, Mr. F. D. Cherry, located near Prince Albert, having won the coveted trophy twice, while on several occasions it has been won by Mr. Seager Wheeler, of Rosthern, also in the Prince Albert riding, whose research work has been worth millions of dollars to the Western farmer, and whose work, I think, the Government would be well advised to recognize in some tangible way.

I said, Mr. Speaker, that I wished to draw the attention of the House to the great hinterland to the north. For many years this has been a fruitful source for talkfests, and several commissions have been appointed to investigate it; but, like many other commissions, no results ever came from them, and it was left entirely to private enterprise to prove what this northern country is capable of. Most of the talk in former years was more or less conjecture, but I think I can show what is now being really produced. I will touch on three of the natural resources which, along with agriculture, are being developed. These are now past the conjectural stage, and from these the Dominion can very materially increase her wealth production. These three are minerals, timber and fish.

The copper and gold deposits of the northeast section of Saskatchewan and of the northwest section of Manitoba are showing wonderful and almost unlimited possibilities at the present time, and I have been informed from an authoritative source that this will develop into one of the largest mining camps on the American continent. One company which has been making extensive and expensive investigations down to a depth of twelve hundred feet, has already blocked out ore, which at the present price of copper, would total two hundred millions of dollars, or more than the total production of minerals in the whole Dominion in 1917. The reason why I emphasize the importance of copper production is that at the present time copper is very essential in the carrying on of the war. Another company has been shipping ore last year and this year at great inconvenience, having to transport it a long distance by team and water before reaching a railway, to a smelter in British Columbia, ore which runs as high as twenty-two per cent pure copper.

Another industry which is doing good work in Northern Saskatchewan is that of lumbering. I have been informed by the manager of a company, operating at Prince Albert and Big River, that they have already got the logs and expect to cut in the neighbourhood of one hundred million feet of lumber this year. This goes to show that the territory to the North, from which the logs are brought, is rich in timber and there are great possibilities for pulp factories located on almost unlimited water-powers, a fact which should be of special interest to some hon. members who have taken part in this debate. I might say in passing, that the estimated water-power of Saskatchewan is over three million horse-power, and that this is nearly all in the northern portion of which I have been speaking.

Then there is the fishing industry. This should also be encouraged, as its possibilities are very extensive, many of the lakes never having had a net placed in them. From lakes north of Prince Albert, during the season just closed, which lasts only two and one-half months, there were shipped, roughly speaking 2,500,000 pounds, mostly white fish with a fair proportion of lake trout. A portion of this was shipped to consumers on the prairies, but a large percentage was also shipped overseas for the use of the forces.

I think I have pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that these regions can produce a tremendous amount of wealth, and that without any very great outlay. I am not asking for a bonus for any of these industries, neither am I asking for protection on any of them. Protection is something which does not sound good to me, and I may also say that it does not sound good to the people of the West. The point which I wish to make is this: These three industries of which I have spoken are badly, very badly, handicapped by the lack of transportation, and if the production of wealth is going to help to supply the necessary sinews of war, then, Sir, I believe here is an opportunity which should not be overlooked.

I said protection was something which did not sound good to the West. We have passed through a long term of it and know whereof we speak. In this connection I would like to state that anything that has been said in regard to the western members being pledged at election time does not apply in any case that I know of. It certainly does not apply to me. As to this I would like to endorse everything said by the member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg), and I have no hesitation in saying that we are all hand in hand in supporting this Union Government in every legitimate effort to push the war to a successful finish, and are willing to carry our fair share of the financial burden. At the same time we want to know that what we are contributing goes to the coffers of the Government and not into the pockets of the private individual.

Mr. ARTHUR L. DESAULNIERS (Champlain) (translation): Mr. Speaker, in taking the floor in this debate I am animated by the best of feeling towards the British Empire and its Allies; I am here to represent Champlain county, one the richest farming districts in Quebec province.

Hence I feel it my duty to express in this House what I take to be the unanimous opinion of my constituents, since my opponent in the contest of December 17 last, the Hon. Lieut.-Col. Blondin, who, by the grace of the present Cabinet, is still Postmaster General, succeeded in polling only 398 votes out of a total of 10,000.

I wish first of all, Mr. Speaker, to declare that I fully approve of Canada's participation in the present conflict, this great war in which so many of those we hold dear are shedding their blood and offering up their lives on the battlefields of old Europe for the triumph of democratic liberty throughout the world. However, Mr. Speaker, I hold that we should take a rational and reasonable part in this struggle; a part proportionate to our resources in men and money. That is why the tone of these few words, Mr. Speaker, is a note of protest against the actions of our present Government, who have brought about a condition of things whereby all the energies of Canada are being practically wasted. The British Empire with its 450,000,000 subjects has raised an army of a little more than 7,000,000 soldiers, or 1½ per cent of the total population, while Canada alone, a young country, barely three centuries in existence, has already given to the Allied cause nigh onto 7 per cent of its British subjects.

Our powerful neighbours, the Americans, with a population of over 110,000,000, have sent across the water so far only a few thousand troops. Should the war continue for some years to come it is my humble opinion that the United States will be neither willing nor able to equal, in proportion, Canada's effort. Hence I conclude that the people of this country have done their duty nobly and in doing so, have gone beyond the bounds of their resources.

Now, if we look into the conduct of the war from a financial standpoint, we find that, through the most abject favouritism, the people of this country have been mulcted in millions upon millions of dollars —the people who are being forced to-day to pay abnormally increased taxes so as to balance the public treasury. It is not necessary for me to go through the political history of these last few years and read the list of the notorious scandals which have darkened our horizon—for I wish to be brief—but if the Government wishes to economize, let them lead the way by the adoption of measures which will not run counter to their policy of economy.

Let our friends to your right, Mr. Speaker, inaugurate a programme of reclamation and of economy rather than a policy of highway robbery.

In the course of this excessive prosecution of the war the Government, there is no doubt about this, have given undeniable proof of their systematic opposition to the people of Quebec, just as the old Tory party did last session on the Lapointe motion with regard to the French language.

If the Government are sincere, if they really wish to win the war, let me tell them this: It is true the Allies require guns, munitions and men; but let us meet the chief need of those "over there" who are fighting for the liberty and civilization of the world by sending them the means of living and of fighting: food.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, food; the hungry men in the trenches seem to cry out for food and still more food while the trusts, backed by the Government, close their ears to every appeal.

At present labour is scarce because so many of our men have gone to the front.

If we want the wheat which constitutes the food of mankind to ripen and bear fruit, we need hands to care for it. Therefore, we need the help of the farmer. What shall we say, then, of our conscription of to-day which is tearing our sons of the soil away from the land and sending them in serried ranks into the trenches; what shall we say of the Government's appeal for increased production, of the convening of the provincial ministers for the purpose of promoting increased production while the Government, on the other hand, with their ridiculous way of doing things by Order in Council, are advocating a contrary policy. We want to win the war; very well. But then we should pass a law to curtail, if not indeed do away with the manufacture of articles of luxury which require so many workers, musical instruments, victrolas, pleasure cars, which entail such heavy expense, children's toys, of such questionable usefulness.

How is it that the food controller, who receives his salary from the Government, who is paid by the people of this country, forbids all excessive consumption of sugar in our restaurants and then closes his eyes to the manufacture of candy and sweetmeats which are of no possible use and which are even injurious to health? How is it that the Government encourages and tolerates pleasure cars into the construction of which enter so many things necessary to our soldiers, for in the materials which go to make these automobiles we find large quantities of brass and leather. Now, if economy were practised in these things we would arrive at much better results for the Allied cause and we would lighten the burden which is bearing down on the people.

We are living through a terrific crisis, Mr. Speaker. Does the Government wish to carry on our part in the war in a sensible and rational manner or do they wish to bankrupt the country, in the words of the hon. Minister of the Interior. The great necessity of the moment is to help the Allies to the limit of our strength. This help means building ships, transporting food and leaving our sons on the farms to cultivate them and increase their yield.

In this manner we shall no longer witness the sorry spectacle of citizens of the same country staining with their own blood the pages of our national history. The Canadian, no matter what his nationality, would have to choose between working in this country and enlisting. From whatsoever standpoint we should view Canada's part in the war we would see the youth of our country working together in perfect harmony for the triumph of the sacred cause of the Allies, through the assiduous and constant participation of Canadian labour.

You invite the youth of Canada to give themselves to the Allied cause. But why force them into the trenches where they cannot give the full measure of their capacity, for constraint can never be a justifiable motive of human actions.

At least let the Government adopt a policy which allows a choice between enlistment and work on the farms, in the munition factories, in the shipyards. In any case the conscript will have given useful service to the country and to the Allied cause.

Let the Government adopt this means, Mr. Speaker, and there will be an end of the racial cleavage which paralyzes the efforts of those who live in this country. At last we shall see the dawn of the day when all men of good-will, united together in a single purpose, will give all that is in them for the ultimate triumph of the cause so sacred to the civilized world.

Mr. E. D'ANJOU (Rimouski) (translation): Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the speeches delivered by the members on the other side of the House. To hear them one would think that they are not Canadians and that, to their mind, Canada does not exist. To win the war they would wipe Canada off the map.

Well, allow me to tell you that I do not entertain the opinions of these hon. gentlemen; I am a Canadian, and I am quite content with that title. I acknowledge no other country than Canada and Canada alone has all my love, and all my unswerving fedelity.

It is evident that we folks from the province of Quebec have not the same frame of mind, the same aspirations as the majority of our fellow-citizens from the other provinces of Confederation, and I may assert, with full knowledge that what I say is true, that we are the only true Canadians. We have proved this on more than one occasion and we are proving it to-day by our constant devotion to the true interests of Canada. We were born in this country and we are proud of our origin; we are the descendants of the discoverers of this country, the heirs of those who blazed the way and of those intrepid missionaries who, one day, left the enchanting shores of old France, to bring to this land of America, with the Cross of Christ, the seeds of civilization. This explains, Mr. Speaker, why we hold so tenaciously to this soil which has been sprinkled with the blood and the sweat of our martyrs and our missionaries. We are here to stay, and here we will remain. Just as our fathers were born and buried in this country, so do we intend to live and die here, too. As for myself, I acknowledge no country other than Canada and never will I acknowledge any other. Nevertheless, although I should like to see the Government take a little more interest in Canada than they have done during the last four years, I must say that I have never been opposed to Canada's taking a rational and reasonable part in this war, with the free consent of the Canadian people.

I should not like to see the Government abandon our soldiers at the front who enlisted as volunteers; but, to be consistent with my anti-conscription attitude, and faithful to my mandate from the voters of Rimouski county, I must say that I cannot accept the war budget in its entirety, and I wish to express a most energetic protest against the sums of money being voted to defray the expenses brought about by the application of conscription in this country.

Mr. Speaker, if I have the honour of a seat in this House, I owe it assuredly to my sincere and well-known views against conscription. I have given my pledge that I would fight against conscription in any manner or form, and from whatsoever source, and I intend to keep my promise and respect my pledge; and I stand opposed to the present Government while the conscription measure is part of the statutes of Canada.

I fail to understand, Mr. Speaker, how a Government which is asking the people of this country to sail overseas and fight for violated liberty did not itself hesitate one instant to violate the liberty which is most dear to the Canadian people.

Didn't the Borden Government merely to further its political ends, disfranchise a very large part of Canada's population? The Government acted like the Kaiser, taking away their political rights from thousands of Canadians to whom we had granted all the rights enjoyed by every citizen on this free soil of America. And this, Mr. Speaker, is done in Canada, under a Government which declares its willingness to bankrupt the country, in striving to avenge the violation of Belgium and to uphold the sanctity of treaties and the freedom of the small nationalities. While our soldiers are dying on the other side of the water for the freedom of civilization, here, in a British country, a Government which claims to guide itself by British institutions, has the tremendous and cynical audacity to deprive the people of Canada of the last shreds of liberty. The Canadian Parliament is no longer consulted on questions of the highest importance, which affect every one of our citizens.

The Government, in violation of all constitutional law, even while Parliament is in regular session, passes Orders in Council which ratify certain changes brought about in a law passed by Parliament during the session which preceded the general elections. The Government evidently has gone mad over Orders in Council.

If the Government decided, some day to pass an Order in Council repealing the conscription Act, they would have my entire support and the support of all the Canadian people. On the 3rd of December last, a few days before the election, the Government passed an Order in Council exempting farmers from military service. We have the blinding proof to-day that the said Order in Council was simply a shameful political manœuvre meant to catch the votes of the Canadian farmers. Only a few days ago the Government cancelled the Order in Council exempting farmers, and at the same time abolished all other exemptions. Still the Government preaches production, and still more production. The conduct and the acts of the Government are pitiably inconsistent. How can we increase production if we take away from the land all those whose work we need so as to obtain from our soil the yield we have the right to expect? If the Government is sincere in its desire to increase production—and I do not believe that it is—there is but one thing left for it to do: keep all the farmers on their farms instead of sending them into the trenches. In this way it will attain its object and will be infinitely more helpful to the country and to the Allied cause.

I will not delay the House by arguing, point for point, the speech delivered by the Hon. Minister of Finance. I merely wish to note that the new taxes set forth in the budget speech will fall, as usual, on the shoulders of the poor man, who never ceases his sacrifice and toil in an effort to earn a living for himself and his family. When the Government puts a tax on the necessaries of life, it is the poor man who must pay, for the wealthy can always obtain what they wish, no matter what the price may be or what taxes the Government sees fit to impose. It is evident that the Government have not the slightest intention of taxing their good friends, the war profiteers, these new millionnaires, who in the course of the last four years have waxed rich by speculating on the equipment and the blood of our soldiers. Let the Government make these leeches disgorge; they would like to see the war go on for ten years more so as to continue their shameful and criminal exploitation. Instead of conscripting the blood of the Canadian people, the Government would have been more just and more patriotic if it had conscripted the millions of all these bloodsuckers, who live by the war while the blood of the poor and unhappy people of Europe is flooding the continent.

Mr. Speaker, it is high time we began to give a little thought to our own poor country, threatened with horrible bankruptcy. Let us be, first of all, Canadians; let us guide ourselves by the proud and noble motto of the illustrious leader of the Opposition: "Canada, first; Canada, always; Canada alone."

On the motion of Mr. J. A. CAMPBELL (Nelson) the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Hon. A. K. MACLEAN the House adjourned at 12.46 a.m., Tuesday.

The House met at Eleven o'clock.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill No. 73 (Letter F of the Senate) for the relief of Frederick Ernest Zang.—Mr. Redman.

Bill No. 74 (Letter G of the Senate) for the relief of Thomas Bailey Wainwright.—Mr. Middlebro.

Bill No. 75, respecting the Protective Association of Canada.—Mr. Demers.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT EXEMPTIONS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I desire to draw the attention of the Government, if their attention has not been already called, to an article which appears in this morning's Journal-Press, which, in describing the proceedings of an exemption tribunal held in the city of Hull yesterday, states that fourteen exemptions were granted, all the applicants being between the ages of twenty and twenty-three. The cases cited are:

John Burns, burner, aged 22, claimed he was sole support. Disallowed.

George Charron, merchant, 21, claimed ill-health. Allowed.

Louis Carufel, culler, 21, claimed domestic conditions render his presence necessary. Allowed till August 1, 1918.

Albert Bourgoin, papermaker, 20, claimed he was sole support. Allowed till Oct. 1, 1918.

Oscar Demers, clerk, 20, claimed he was sole support. Allowed till Oct. 1, 1918.

Auguste Guerin, employment not stated, 20, claimed domestic reasons. Allowed till Aug. 1, 1918.

Major-General MEWBURN (Minister of Militia and Defence): I saw in this morning's paper the article from which the hon. gentleman has quoted, and I immediately telephoned the Military Service Council, who had no knowledge or information regarding it, but are having the matter investigated. It is presumed, but I am not positive as to that, that these were claims that were pending under the Military Service Act on which decisions had not been given. Any appeals by young men between the ages of twenty and twenty-two inclusive who come under the Order in Council, even if exemptions are allowed, are immediately and automatically cancelled as the men are called up for service. The Military Service Council have promised to present a report on the matter, but they say the explanation that I have given is the only way in which the matter referred to by the hon. gentleman can be accounted for.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Do I understand from the answer which the Minister of Militia has given, that the tribunals are still sitting and that they have authority to grant exemptions?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The tribunals, of course, are still sitting as their functions still continue. The effect, however, of the Order in Council, which has been approved by both Houses of Parliament, is this: Any exemptions heretofore granted, or now claimed, or that are now pending, are abolished in respect of men between the ages of twenty and twenty-two, both inclusive, or in respect of any other age that may be called out under the provisions of the Order in Council so approved. Do I make myself perfectly clear to my right hon. friend? Of course tribunals have to do their work, because until men of other ages are called out, the question of exempting them must still be determined by the various tribunals, and eventually by the central appeal judge. But as soon as men of any particular age are called out—and men from twenty to twenty-two years inclusive have been called out—, this exemption, whether granted or claimed, ceases to be effective so far as they are concerned.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is what I understood. I understood that by the recent regulations, approved by this House, all exemptions granted by tribunals, were null and void.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In respect of the young men of the ages mentioned.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: But do I understand that the tribunals are still sitting for the hearing of claims of men of other ages?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, because it is uncertain yet whether men of other ages will be called out under the provisions of that Order in Council. If they should not be called out then, of course, the question of exemptions would have to be dealt with.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Then the tribunals are sitting for other reasons than those specified in the last Order in Council?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The tribunals are sitting. As far as men between the ages of twenty and twenty-two years are concerned, it would not seem to me that the tribunals ought to deal with them once they have been called out.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is the way I understand it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I entirely agree with my right hon. friend. All the tribunals would have to say with respect to these men is, "This Order in Council has been passed, and it is of no further use to consider your exemption." But with respect to men between the ages of twenty-three and thirty-four, who have made claims for exemptions, their claims must still be heard.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Pardon me again. This is a matter of some importance and there may be some confusion abroad. I have understood that with regard to the men between the ages of twenty and twenty-two no exemptions are to be allowed.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is correct.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: And that with respect to men between the ages of twenty and twenty-two all the exemptions that have been granted are of no account.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is quite so.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If that be so, what is the use of the tribunals sitting?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is no use for the tribunals to sit with respect to men between the ages of twenty and twenty-two. But there are men not within these ages who have claimed exemption and whose claims have not finally been dealt with, and these must be considered by the tribunals. Do I make myself clear?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not know that I understand exactly.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Men from twenty to twenty-two years inclusive have been called up. So far as they are concerned exemptions are abolished whether already allowed or now pending. But there are men from twenty-three to thirty-four years, both inclusive, who are in Class 1 and who have claimed exemption, and appeals are pending with regard to them. Some of these appeals have not yet been disposed of, I believe, by the first tribunal. It is necessary to proceed with the consideration of these claims because it is not yet known whether these classes will be called out.

Mr. J. E. LESAGE (Hochelaga): I call attention to certain matters which have taken place lately in Montreal. I have been aware for quite some time that the medical examination is not as complete as it should be. Now that we understand that all exemptions are supposed to disappear under the Military Service Act as amended, it seems to me most important that the medical examination should be made conscientiously.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is proceeding to enter into a discussion. I would remind him that such is not in order at this stage.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Ask your question.

Mr. LESAGE: I want to know if a chemist or a dentist, who voluntarily reports to the proper depot in his district for military service is entitled to be examined as he should be, and how he would be classified by the medical boards? The reason I referred to the medical examination was not to discuss the subject, but simply to have an explanation on that particular point. I understand that a chemist or pharmacist who applies naturally expects to be classified by the medical board. If he should be examined and classified in Category A he is not entitled to be considered, as I understand, as eligible for service in his particular medical branch. That is why I wanted to submit this detail to the Government in the hope that they would see that the medical examination is properly done. I would like to know from the Government what proceedings should be taken and what this young fellow should do to be classified by the medical boards as he should be.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am afraid I do not understand the hon. gentleman's question.

Major-General MEWBURN: Men reporting for service will undergo a medical examination as to their physical category to determine whether they are fit for general service or not. If a man is found fit for general service he is put in Class A, and he will join the regular depot battalion. The medical board have nothing to do with the classification of a man according to his trade or occupation. The intention is to try and utilize the services of a man where his professional knowledge or otherwise may be best for the nation. If he is a chemist and desires to join any particular branch of the Army Medical Corps, it is a question of whether there are vacancies requiring such men. I understand that in England they are trying to classify men according to their trade and occupation, whereby their knowledge will be best utilized. The medical examination made when a man reports does not go into that: It is to determine whether the man is physically fit or not.

Mr. J. ALFRED LEDUC (Westmount-St. Henry): With reference to the exemptions from twenty to twenty-two years of age, I would like to understand this matter thoroughly so that when we go before our constituents we can tell them about these exemptions—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is not in order.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What is the question?

Mr. LEDUC: The question is: are the exemptions still in effect, or are they withdrawn with respect to men from twenty to twenty-two years old?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They are absolutely withdrawn in the case of men between the ages of twenty and twenty-two years, both inclusive, but in respect of other ages the tribunals may adjudicate.

Mr. LEDUC: What I wanted to put before the House, Mr. Speaker, is this: a man who—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What is the other question?

Mr. LEDUC: The other question is: I want to know if a man can still go before a tribunal in cases where he has had his exemption claim in his pocket for about two months, the hearing being postponed from one day to another, and no decision having been given?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What age does the hon. gentleman refer to?

Mr. LEDUC: Twenty-one years, going on twenty-two.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: His exemption is of no avail if he is twenty-one years. If the hon. gentleman wishes further information he might see the Minister of Militia and Defence who will endeavour to make it perfectly clear to him.

THE BUDGET.

The House resumed the debate on the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean (Acting Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means (resumed from May 6.)

Mr. J. A. CAMPBELL (Nelson): Mr. Speaker, it seems to be the consensus of opinion in this House that the Budget speech of the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) was a businesslike and comprehensive effort and that his taxation provisions are along right lines. However no taxation proposals are free from criticism and such as has been given has been mainly of a constructive character, being of the nature of suggestions with the idea that certain changes would bring the Budget still more in harmony with existing conditions. There are so many things to be considered in a large question of this kind, that I venture the opinion that were the hon. acting minister himself to go over the ground again he would himself advocate some material changes. It is not in a spirit of condemnation, but with the same helpful idea that has actuated previous speakers, that I shall venture to discuss certain items.

A feature of the Budget proposals which stands out prominently in this connection is the tax on tea. I am anxiously looking forward to the minister's explanation as to why he proposed a specific duty on tea rather than an ad valorem duty. Tea is a commodity which, owing to its universal use, would lend itself to a tax which would bear equitably upon all. Those who are in the poorer circumstances of life buy the cheaper brands of tea, while those who are in in better financial circumstances buy the more expensive brands. The result is that an ad valorem tax would bear equitably on the different classes of society. In this case a straight duty of ten cents per pound has been fixed, so that the burden is not equitably distributed. Possibly the acting minister has an explanation for this.

In this case the burden is greater than it appears, for although the tariff is only ten cents per pound, it is placed presumably on the import price of tea, on which two or possibly three profits will be charged, with the result that by the time it reaches the consumer the tariff will have increased the price of a pound of tea by twelve, fifteen or sixteen cents—and this increase will be no less on a forty cent pound of tea than it is on tea which sells at $1.40.

In the West we have always looked forward to the time in the near future when the duty on agricultural implements would be materially reduced, if not altogether eliminated. It was stated some time ago that an arrangement had been made whereby matters affecting the tariff should not be considered during this session of the House, or before the conclusion of the war. I am in conformity with hon. gentlemen from Saskatchewan who have already addressed the House, and who say that as far as they know such an arrangement was not made. For my part, I never heard of it until I came to this House. I have been confidently expecting that some reduction, at any rate, would be made on agricultural implements, thus lightening the burden resting on the farmer and bringing about that which is of such serious importance at this time, increased production. However, the West will do its duty; will bear whatever burdens are placed upon it; will even accept more or less gracefully any unfair discrimination that may be made in connection with the tariff. We reserve, however, to ourselves, the right to our opinion of those who use the tariff for their own advantage, at the same time pretending to wear the cloak of patriotism. I regret that some measure of reduction has not been made in the tariff on agricultural implements; perhaps there are reasons of State more important than I know of why this has not been done. We shall, therefore, in the meantime, in view of existing conditions have to wait, but trust it will not be for long.

The acting minister intimated that the debt of Canada is now $1,200,000,000. The interest on this debt at 5 per cent would be $60,000,000—and the principal amount is increasing by leaps and bounds. Interest charges and pensions will certainly bring the annual outlay in this connection up to a far greater amount than what was the total outlay of the Government a few years ago. This is an increasing burden which, if the present plan is followed, is to be handed down to posterity. It seems to me that the situation is not as it should be. While posterity should, perhaps, have to bear a large share of the burdens of the war, it is possible that too great a share is being unloaded on them. The remedy for this state of affairs is rather in the nature of a preventive; that is, we should pay more at the present time. Now is the time to tax the people; the people are prepared to pay and to accept with equanimity and patience whatever reasonable burdens are placed upon them. Any criticism we have to make along this line is that the acting minister has not gone far enough in his taxation proposals. Incomes might be taxed to a greater extent than they have been. I am informed that a man in England who is receiving a yearly income of $6,000 pays $900 by way of income tax, whereas a man receiving a similar income in Canada pays only $120. No matter what we at home have to pay in money, the burden we have to bear cannot compare with the sacrifice of those who are fighting our battles at the front. There is far too great a discrepancy between the $900 paid in England and the $120 paid in Canada on the same amount of annual income. I am not contending that at this time the income tax in Canada should be as great as it is in England, but the discrepancy should not be nearly as marked as it is.

As has been pointed out on several occasions, the Government should exercise the most rigid economy in the administration of all its departments. Several ministers have already indicated in what way this economy is to be brought about; others, we are satisfied will follow along the same lines. But there is an opportunity now under Union Government for practising such economy and making it of the most rigid nature, that has not prevailed hitherto under any government that Canada has had. The Union Government can set an example which all future Governments of Canada, whether Union or of the party variety, will feel it incumbent upon them to follow strictly—it will be hard for them to get away from it. I do not advocate that Civil Service salaries should be cut down, except to the extent that many salaries paid to those who are uselessly employed might be eliminated. As a matter of fact, in quite a number of cases salaries should now be increased. I might mention specifically salaries in connection with certain departments of the post office, with regard to which more will be said later.

As the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Knox) pointed out last night, there is another way of providing for the tremendous debt that the country will have incurred for war purposes, and that is by creating as much wealth in the country as we can. As he pointed out, there is no way whereby so much wealth can be created with so little effort as by giving proper attention to our vast natural resources. With the exception of the three prairie provinces, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, these natural resources belong to the provinces themselves. In the three provinces which I have mentioned, however, the natural resources belong to the Dominion. Vast resources have not yet been alienated from the Crown; possibly they were not known to exist hitherto, or the situation might not be as it is. Developments have taken place within the last few years which show that immense resources exist in the northern parts of these provinces which hitherto have been undreamed of. These prairie provinces have been looked upon as great wheat producing areas, solely devoted to the raising of grains and cattle. But would it be surprising to you, Mr. Speaker, and to hon. gentlemen of the House to know that a comparatively small proportion of the vast areas of these provinces is really known as wheat producing land, and that only a very small proportion of this is actually used in the raising of grain and cattle? To illustrate this, I point out that Prince Albert, which is looked upon as a city pretty far in the north, is really several miles south of a line which might mark the northern boundary of southern Saskatchewan. That is, Prince Albert is down in the southern part of the province of Saskatchewan, thus leaving the vast northern part of the province to a certain extent unknown land.

Some years ago a scheme was devised for the marketing of the increasing crops of grain of the prairie provinces in a more expeditious and less expensive manner. The idea was to build a railway from the wheat fields to Hudson bay. It is not within the purview of my remarks to discuss at all the Hudson Bay railway. I do not need to argue the advisability of the construction of such a railroad on the grounds mentioned, because I know of no national enterprise that has had behind it such unanimity on the part of the people as the construction of this road. Both great political parties are pledged to its support. Both of them had this programme in their platforms. The right hon. gentlemen who now lead the respective sides of this House both spoke in favour of the project, and addresses along the same lines were delivered by Sir Charles Tupper. When Saskatchewan and Alberta were formed into provinces, the platforms of both parties in the first elections in those provinces contained provisions to the effect that it was necessary, in the interests of the country, and particularly in the interests of the West, that this road should be built. If there is any question regarding the attitude of the people of the West as a whole in the matter of tariff reform, in the matter of reducing the duty on agricultural implements or eliminating it altogether, there is absolutely no question in the minds of the people of the West, they are absolutely and entirely united, as to the advisability of constructing the Hudson Bay railway.

As I have previously intimated, the argument used hitherto has been entirely of the character stated, but a large quantity of water has passed over the rapids of the Nelson river during the past few years, and now we find that conditions have materially changed and that there are other arguments, probably of more importance than those already advanced, for the construction and early completion of that railway. It is well known that there are in Hudson bay resources of great value, in particular, minerals of various kinds, and fish. The construction of the railway will, therefore, give Canada another ocean port, and will bring to the people, particularly to the people of the West, the benefit of the immense resources which lie in and around the shores of Hudson bay. The most important feature in this connection is the fact that we now know that in the northern parts of the western provinces, and particularly in Manitoba, in which more results have been brought to light within the last few years, and in which, by the way, lies the whole extent of the Hudson Bay railway, resources of great importance have been shown to exist. Up to that time that northern territory was looked upon as a vast waste of rock, forests, water and muskeg, and the railway was simply considered as a bridge between the wheat fields of these provinces and Hudson bay, and regret was expressed that the intervening distance was so great, because there would be no local traffic therein whereby the railway could earn any revenue. In the mind of the people, the only industry in that country was the fur trade. The fur trade is still very important, producing a yearly revenue of a million dollars in that district alone, but it is the least important of the resources to be found in that particular stretch of territory.

People tell me that there are no agricultural possibilities in that northern country. There is a general opinion that land that is not of agricultural value, that territory that does not produce crops of grain or raise stock, is of no particular use. I do not for a moment admit that there are no agricultural possibilities, but I want to emphasize the fact that these are not the only important resources; that there are other resources that are worthy of taking a place beside those of an agricultural nature. But in that northern country there are great areas which are suitable for farming purposes of different kinds. It is true that there has not been definite exploration and investigation of the agricultural possibilities of that northern country, but explorers have been there at different times, missionaries have lived there, surveyors and other men have been sent out by the Dominion Government, and there are settlers in different parts of the country. I have here a number of opinions regarding the agricultural possibilities of that stretch of country, but I shall just quote a few of them. I shall start off with a quotation from an article by Mr. J. B. Tyrell, than whom, perhaps, there is no one more cognizant of the situation in the northern country. Mr. Tyrell has made many trips of exploration throughout that territory, and he has, during the past twenty or twenty-five years, paid considerable attention to it. He says:

> Incidentally we determined the existence of an extensive area of rich alluvial land in the valley of Grass river and its vicinity.

This is in the neighbourhood of a mineral deposit about a hundred miles north of The Pas:

> For a hundred miles north of the Pas the country is almost level, and the soil is often quite thin, being underlain by flat-lying beds of limestone. Thence onward almost to the end of the track the land is generally rolling and sparsely wooded with spruce and poplar. The underlying rock is chiefly granite but it is usually covered with a considerable thickness, perhaps thirty feet or more, of beautifully stratified clay which looks as if it would yield abundant crops to the farmer if it were properly cultivated. Very few cuttings on the railroad go down into the granite rock, but there are a number which show beautiful sections of this rich stratified soil.

Mr. Dickson, of the Department of the Interior, who made a special trip of exploration and investigation into that territory, has this to say:

From 50 to 75 per cent thereof is arable land, and probably has a good agricultural future. I estimate the area of that portion included from north to south, between Wintering and Cross lakes, and from east to west, between Setting and Sipiwesk lakes, at 2,000 sq. miles. The soil is exactly similar to that around Cochrane, in new Ontario, which yields such large returns under right treatment. On well drained spots, as far north as Split lake, the flora is almost identical with that of similar sites in Riding mountains of Manitoba, proving that during the growing season these localities lie under one and the same isotherm, or nearly so. And yet Riding mountains are nearly 400 miles south-west of Split lake. Two other factors which help vegetation in this northern clay belt are the low absolute elevation—only 500 to 700 feet, and the large proportion of sunlight during the growing season.

Mr. R. H. Campbell, Director of Forestry of the Forestry Branch, Department of the Interior of Canada, in an address delivered before the Canadian Forestry Association at Winnipeg in 1913, said:

In northern Manitoba, an area approximating three to four million acres on the Saskatchewan river might by drainage works be made of agricultural value. At present lake and muskeg cover most of this area.

A start has already been made in the raising of cattle in the district around Moose lake, and has met with very great success. Several men are engaged in the business and have fair sized herds. In the future these will be increased, and doubtless other men will engage in the enterprise. The oldest inhabitant is Mr. T. H. P. Lamb, who in talking to me some time ago said that a two-year old steer which he drove into The Pas in March, tipped the scale at 1,224 pounds. It was rolling in fat and had been out in the open ever since it was a calf.

I have travelled over that northern country extensively, and while I have not gone far back from the railway, except along the watercourses, I can confirm the statements made in the extracts I have read. For a distance of a hundred and twenty-five miles north of The Pas to the crossing of the Nelson river, at Mile 240, there is a territory which compares favourably with the scrub land of the southern portion of Manitoba. The soil is a rich clay loam, with sub-soil of different kinds, and is capable of growing satisfactory crops.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What about the climate?

Mr. CAMPBELL: The climate of The Pas is practically the same as in Winnipeg, but further north it gets colder. I would not advocate the raising of wheat crops in that northern country; I think wheat crops could be raised to better advantage in the southern portion of the province. But I would advocate the raising of the coarser grains, cattle, roots and vegetables. In some places cattle can stay out all winter. Of course, there is a great diversity in conditions throughout that vast district; some places would be quite suitable for raising cattle, while others in the same latitude would not be suitable at all, but on the whole the crops I have mentioned can be grown satisfactorily. I might quote from the Rev. John Semmens, who is well known in the West, and has spent several years as a missionary in the North. He has lived in that country year after year and is therefore in a position to say definitely what are the possibilities for that country.

He says:

There are found large areas of open country and valleys of tributary rivers, where the soil is rich and deep and there grazing and stock raising could be very successfully carried on. The sheltering forests and the abundant water sources and numerous beaver dams, and the rich native grasses, would indeed make this locality ideal to sheep raisers and general ranchmen. The absence of anything like a market has hitherto kept this country from being reported of, but if a railway becomes an actual fact, Manitoba will add very much to her available resources when extension comes, and settlers will find that in soil, in wood, in grasses and in waters, this unknown land will afford comfortable homes for thousands.

But it is not in the matter of agriculture that we look for immediate development. In the last few years development has been mainly among mineral lines. Before going into that, I might touch on some of the other resources of that country. First, take timber and pulpwood. There are vast possibilities in that country for the extension of this industry. As to merchantable timber, there is a mill at The Pas with a capacity of one hundred thousand feet per day of ten hours, or of two hundred thousand when two shifts are working. If it were not for the scarcity of labour, this mill would double its capacity, but as conditions are, that will have to be a later development. The timber around there is practically all spruce, and runs from eight to twenty-four inches in diameter. I am not prepared to say how much of this kind of timber can be found north of the Saskatchewan river, only somewhat cursory examinations have been made, but there are at any rate areas of merchantable timber sufficient for the needs of the settlers and development work in that district. Timber, of course, is a commodity which comes in very useful in the development of other resources. There are however extensive areas of timber valuable for pulpwood, and these demand careful investigation. I am satisfied that before long there will be mills up in that north country rivalling those in the East. It is to be noted that tributary to these areas may be found, as a rule, water-powers of considerable magnitude.

With regard to fish, the cold waters of the northern lakes turn out a product which is second to none in this country, the main varieties being sturgeon, whitefish, trout, pike, pickerel and several others. Eighty cars of fish from this northern district were shipped from The Pas this winter. That perhaps is not a very great quantity, but this is the first time commercial fishing has been attempted in that country, and the quantity would have been considerably more if it had not been for peculiar conditions affecting the fishing at the beginning of the season. One was of a local nature, and the other was the ruling of the Food Board. Just about the time when the fishermen were ready to go out to the fishing grounds the Food Board fixed the price delivered at The Pas at seven cents. This was not high enough to justify the fishermen going out, and a number of them did not fish at all. Shortly afterwards, the board realized they had made a mistake, and increased the price to seven and a half cents, but then it was too late, and there was not as much fishing done as would otherwise have been the case. While I do not wish to criticise the actions of the Food Board in any way—I think it is doing a good work—I would point out that when prices are to be fixed, a fair margin of profit should be allowed to those engaged in the industry, and an announcement should be made sufficiently ahead to give those affected time to make their preparations. In the case of fish, the price should be announced not later than July. I must say that the price fixed for fish last year was not high enough to justify the fishermen getting out the quantity required. It was not on a parity with the prices fixed for wheat and other commodities, and perhaps not as many fishermen will go out next year for that reason. The best of them could barely make a living at the price fixed last year, and many of them played a losing game. I have no hesitation in recommending that the price this year should be fixed one or two cents higher, in order to give the fishermen who are doing this work for the country reasonable remuneration for their efforts.

Perhaps, Mr Speaker, one of the features which has been given least attention is that regarding the water-power resources of the country. I do not wish to delay the House by going into detail here, but I have read over the reports of the Conservation Commission and of the Water-Powers Branch of the Department of the Interior, I have gathered information from far and wide, and I have arrived at what I think is a very conservative estimate of the horse-power that can be developed from the water-powers in northern Manitoba. The hon. member from Prince Albert (Mr. Knox), in his address last evening, gave us some information with regard to the water-powers in Saskatchewan. In the district to which I refer there may be developed the following:

	Horse Power.
Saskatchewan river (in Manitoba)	100,000
Nelson river	2,500,000
Churchill river	500,000
Hay, Burnt Wood, Grass and other rivers	400,000
Total	3,500,000

These figures, I am satisfied, are well within the mark, although we have no definite measurements or reports on a number of these water-powers. The important point is that the falls which furnish this power are in close proximity to the resources which I have already mentioned, and the development of which will be assisted by the utilization of such power. Perhaps the most important mineral deposit which has been discovered in the North is within thirty miles of a water-power from which 50,000 horse-power can be developed, and it is the intention of those who are in charge of the property to develop that power as soon as the labour situation is such that the work can be done. I would also point out that the Hudson Bay railway practically parallels the Nelson river for a stretch of about 300 miles. At no point during the whole of this distance is the railway far from the river. The river is one that drains one of the largest areas in the world, and, while short itself, it is very rapid. It is 400 miles in length and in that distance drops 700 feet. Naturally there are numerous rapids during its course and some very considerable falls. At the points where the railway crosses the Nelson river are places where power could be developed with advantage. I am looking forward to the time in the not very remote future, I hope, when double tracking will be needed and when the business will warrant the electrifying of the road. When that takes place the power with which to operate the road will be found easy of access.

Now, I come to the final point in this connection, and it is the one which is creating the greatest amount of interest in the West. I refer to the mineral possibilities—I might say the mineral actualities—of that north country. There are three mineral districts in Manitoba, the Star lake district, east of Winnipeg; the Rice lake district, east of lake Winnipeg, and the district north of The Pas. Regarding the first named district, I have not very much to say, because I am not conversant with it. As to the Rice lake district, I do know something, because I have seen samples of gold quartz, some of the most wonderful ores that have been found on the North American continent. What this area will develop into we cannot say, but the samples are certainly marvellous. North of The Pas the mining activities extend over a much wider range. The mineral district that has been discovered so far consists of a region bordering on a chain or series of lakes and rivers extending from within the eastern boundary of Saskatchewan almost to the Hudson Bay railway. This would form the base of a triangle with The Pas as the apex, the other sides respectively being the Hudson Bay railway and the Saskatchewan river. Either end of this particular district can be reached without difficulty by the railway on the one hand and by the Saskatchewan river on the other.

At the present moment there is a dump or pile of copper sulphide ore at Sturgeon Landing almost on the boundary of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, containing almost 9,000 tons, 22 to 23 per cent copper with gold and silver also present to the extent of $5 per ton. This pile, or dump, would be worth, in round figures, over $1,000,000. This ore was hauled by teams a distance of 40 miles during last winter and is piled there awaiting its taking out by barge and boat during the summer, a distance of 125 miles, and further by railway to Trail smelter, a distance of approximately 1,200 miles. It must be a commodity of exceeding richness to stand 12 noon. such an amount of handling as that does. It needs to be handled half a dozen times, and in each case actually by hand, before it reaches its goal. However, over 100 per cent is realized on the output. That will give you, Mr. Speaker, a kind of idea of what we have in the way of copper in that north country. The mine from which this is taken was discovered in October, 1915. During the winter 1916-1917 about 3,600 tons of ore were shipped out. The owners of the mine have been so actively engaged in getting out this ore that they have not yet learned the extent of the ore body but it is known that there are over 100,000 tons of that ore in one lens. It is probable that there is considerably more than that and that other bodies will be found when further prospecting is done. Four or five miles north of this there is the greatest body of ore in the whole country and one of the greatest bodies in North America. This is being thoroughly investigated, diamond drills have been on the job now for two years, two of them having been working during that time, and a third one has recently been taken in there. The result of this very careful investigation is that from 20,000,000 to 25,000,000 tons of this copper sulphide ore has been proven up. This, however, is not of the exceeding richness of that which I have mentioned, although it is of a fair average value, about $10 per ton. It will not stand the great expense necessary to ship it out to a smelter in British Columbia and in order to develop it a railway and a smelter will be necessary in that district. These undoubtedly would have been in course of construction at the present time but for the serious conditions created by the war. It is confidently expected that in the not too remote future this body of ore will be developed in the way that I have mentioned.

Going from there to the other end of the district, to the Herb lake region, we find a gold mining proposition. The Rex mine there is now in operation, a mill has been erected which has a capacity of forty tons a day, and machinery has been installed. If this mill is not already in operation it will be in the course of a few days. Other properties there are in different stages of development. From one of these, the Moosehorn, a carload of ore has been shipped to the smelter. This was not hand picked but was taken in the ordinary way from the shaft. The shipment realized over $80 per ton. Considering the fact that only a very few prospectors have been engaged in the work in the north country the results have been most gratifying. There were more prospectors in there at one time but they have gone out to perform other duties in connection with the war, and for the same reason, others have not gone in. The country has merely been scratched, and possibly in no other part of North America, or in the world, can such results be shown after such small effort. Were it not for the great monopolization of men and the vast expenditure of money entailed by the present great war, much greater results would have been accomplished by this time. I am satisfied, however, that we will have most satisfactory reports from this northern country, and that our expectations will be realized.

The remarks which I have made had reference only to northern Manitoba, but a similar situation, I have no doubt, exists in northern Saskatchewan, and we aleady know, to a certain extent, what the conditions are in respect to mineral resources in northern Alberta. I would therefore urge that special attention be given by the Government towards the developing and working out of a scheme whereby these resources shall be most advantageously utilized.

In connection with our returned soldiers, I have grave doubts about the number who are likely to go on farms. It would seem to be the idea of a great many persons that the majority of these soldiers are going to occupy land after they come back. From any experience I have had with them, I would say that only a small proportion are prepared to go on the land. I have talked with a number of them, and I am inclined to think that more would be favourably disposed towards the work of prospecting and investigating the northern area which I have mentioned; and I would suggest to the Government that steps be taken to provide as far as possible for the returned soldiers carrying on this line of work, that they be given the advantage of such education as is necessary for any prospector to have, and that the way for them to investigate our resources of minerals, or otherwise, be made as easy as possible. I am quite satisfied that their natural inclination would lead them along this line rather than to go into farming operations, although I have no doubt a great number will do that.

I had intended to discuss the matter of mining regulations, and kindred matters, in the Northwest, but as the time at our disposal is limited, I shall defer that until later. I shall merely say this: In connection with the possibilities of mining development in Canada, there is, it appears to me, a situation in connection with the laws of this country regarding minerals which is not conducive to such development as we would like. The Department of Mines, for instance, has no authority or control over the mining claims themselves. These are in the hands of the Mining Lands Branch of the Department of the Interior, and the Department of Mines appears to be constituted more for the purpose of investigating the mineral resources of the country and of acting in an advisory capacity. To me it would seem to be a proper thing to enact a comprehensive act covering all matters in connection with mines. At the present time there is no statute regarding the taking up of mineral claims and the obtaining of title thereto. This is all governed by regulation. There may be some reason in the present unsettled times for using Orders in Council to a considerable extent; but why such matters as pertain to mining should be governed by Orders in Council, or regulations passed thereunder, is beyond my comprehension. Even the best of Orders in Council, or the best of regulations, I am told by those who know, are not as satisfactory as mining laws, even though the latter may not be quite as good in their character; but laws are certain, whereas regulations are intermittent, and we do not know when such regulations may be abrogated; and I would strongly urge upon the Government the advisability, at as early a date as possible, of comprehensively dealing with this whole matter, by incorporating all mining ordinances and regulations into one law.

Recently—I think it was in the year 1914—there was passed by this House an Act which affected regulations in connection with the holding of titles to mineral claims, whereby people who were entitled to such claims, instead of getting a patent or grant, were compelled to content themselves with a lease. There may be arguments for adopting such a policy, but on the whole the opinion of those best calculated to know seems to be that it is desirable in the interests of the country generally to restore the old order, so that when a man has done his duty on a mineral claim he shall be just as much entitled to a patent or a grant for it as the man who does his duty on a homestead. Just why there should be this difference I do not know. There is this further ill-effect which has been wrought by the change: the mining regulations are out of conformity with regulations or laws in the country to the south of us and in adjoining provinces. The provinces of Ontario and British Columbia have enacted laws under which grants or patents are given to the holders of mineral claims, and similar laws are in force in the United States. We, therefore, find that in the country surrounding the prairie provinces there is one style of procedure, and in those provinces there is an altogether different kind of procedure. I will not delay the House longer by discussing the matter at any further length, but would strongly urge that it be taken up comprehensively and a law passed covering the whole subject.

I have sketched in a brief manner some of the existing conditions and possibilities of the great northern hinterland of the three prairie provinces, and I would express the hope that the Government will give to the development of the vast resources indicated their very earnest attention and consideration so that the greatest and best results may be obtained therefrom for the people of this country.

Mr. A. M. DECHENE (Montmagny) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the financial statement which has been submitted to this House by the "alter ego" of the Minister of Finance, this year, requires to be studied with most particular attention. With the war raging throughout the world, with the famine threatening everywhere, with the economic ruin of several people; is this not sufficient to awaken those who rule this country? On such a momentous occasion, one must not let himself be carried away by the impetuosity of passion; we must not allow ourselves to be swayed by any question of feelings; reason should be our sole guide. Unfortunately for this country, for a period of almost four years, emotion and sentiment have been dominant in the councils of the Government and are still directing their management of public affairs.

The present budget is the necessary and inevitable conclusion of the way in which our dictators have ruled over this country. It is a short statement expressing their desire of affirming their strength, without providing for the requirements of the people of the Dominion, as regards man power and pecuniary resources as well.

Their Orders in Council override the Acts of this Parliament. Have they not amended the Military Service Act merely through Order in Council. The War Measures Act, notwithstanding the extraordinary powers it confers on the Government, does not satisfy their ambition. They require more than that to quench their thirst. Did they not go so far as to ask this Parliament to vote unlimited amounts for the use of the hon. Minister of Railways, and even in certain cases, without any obligation of accounting to Parliament for their expenditure? There is no country on earth, except Prussia, to-day, where a Government would dare make such an attempt at dictatorship. For once, reason got the better of emotion, in this Parliament, and only a few scraps of power have remained in the hands of the representatives of the people. It is a national disgrace for Canada that such an attempt should have been made in this House.

To justify their drastic measures, the Government, and the Prime Minister himself, tell us that we must win the war at any cost, no matter by what means. His idea was strengthened by the statement made by the hon. minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell), who believes that, to attain this end, we must lay aside part of the constitution of Canada. Thus, do they not state very clearly that the Government is determined to act as dictators: let us lay aside part of the constitution, if necessary. Are we living under the rule of Ancient Rome, or are we still on the morrow of the French Revolution? However, I fail to see any Caesar or Bonaparte occupying the Treasury benches.

The revolutionary and anticonstitutional spirit that prevails in the cabinet grieves me less considering from what part of the country the ministers hail.

We also want to win the war on this side of the House; we want the cause of Justice and Liberty to be triumphant; the cause of the Allies is our cause.

That object is dearer to us than any other. We are British subjects, and it is our wish to remain such. We are at odds with the Government not concerning the end in view, but concerning the means and methods whereby to win the war which is unanimously sought for by the Allies and by the Canadian people.

What are the means advocated by either of us to win the war? What is their military or economic value? What will be the effect now and in the future? At this time when a gigantic struggle is being carried on by the nations, we are justified in asking ourselves with the poet "what will tomorrow be made of"

The Government wants tomorrow to be made of compulsory enlisting of all men, without taking into account the financial resources of Canada and the necessity in which our geographical position puts us to feed the Allies and to produce more than ever before.

The Government would like to have plenty of food and they call on the people for increased production.

The duty to feed Great Britain and her Allies rests with Canada, I believe it is our foremost duty; but they want to supply the armies with men, first, last and always.

It is impossible to apply both these means of winning the war at the same time in this country today. One is the negation of the other. After so many of our people had gone to the front, the rural districts had become depopulated, and to such an extent that now comes from all parts of the country a cry for farm labour and the request that the farmers be kept on the land.

What are the various provinces asking for today? If I refer to the organ of the War Lecture Bureau, I find in the issue of March 15, the following:

GREATER FOOD PRODUCTION.

"The average Canadian household to-day has "been little affected by the war so far as food "supplies are concerned, and for this reason too "many of us do not fully appreciate the "seriousness of the situation at home—as well "as overseas— Meatless days and such other "regulations already passed may remind us of "the necessity of being economical, but a fuller "understanding is necessary if we are to not "only save at home but also economize suffi-"ciently to permit of the export of the neces-"sary foodstuffs with which to help fill the "already greatly depleted larders of our Allies.

"The principal factor, if the effort at greater "production is to be successful, is to have "sufficient farm labour for seeding and the "harvest. The land is waiting—but we must "have farm help to work it.

"Greater food production is only possible "through augmented labour facilities and with "the drain on our man-power through the call "for fighting men. the call of the munitions "plants and other war time industries, the "farmer finds himself so short of labouring help "that even to bring his crop productions up to "ordinary standards will be a hard task. But "ordinary standards will not suffice. Not only "must we feed Canadians at home, but we must "feed our Canadian boys overseas and also "help feed the peoples fighting side by side "with our men. With this end in view and with "a full understanding of all the conditions pre-"vailing, the Canadian Food Board is calling "upon the older boys of the Dominion."

(Translation.) The shortage of labour is still more evidenced by the fact that a delegation of farmers from all parts of the province of Ontario came lately to submit a resolution to the Committee of Agriculture of this House, and asked the Government to exempt from military service all the young men between nineteen and twenty-two years of age who are working on the farms, and to allow them to remain there as long as they will be required for agricultural purposes.

What about the requests made by the various provinces, as published in the issue of March 15, of the War Lecture Bureau?

Alberta was asking then—that is in March, the 15th of March—6,000 men for spring and summer work and 7,000 for harvest time.

Manitoba was asking also for 7,000 men for spring and summer work and 10,000 to take in the crops.

Ontario was asking for 7,500 men for spring and summer work, 12,500 men for haying and harvesting; 15,000 boys and 5,000 women.

Quebec was asking then 10,000 men.

New Brunswick wanted from 1,500 to 2,000 men, and Nova Scotia 2,500.

Before the Committee of Agriculture, the other day, the Western Provinces alone were asking as their share upwards of 54,000 men for sowing and harvesting, and we have nothing to give them save the help of women and school-boys.

Therefore I believe that both means are ineffective when applied simultaneously, because if you send all the men to the front you shall be without help on the farms.

When facing these facts, can we think of raising more men to force them into the fight? For each request for men we have ten for food. Without plenty of food, we cannot win the war. It will not be the soldiers alone who will win the war, it will be the food and the economic power of the nations who are behind them that will achieve that result:

Mr. Hoover, Chairman of the United States Food Commission, said recently: At the present stage of the war the question of food overshadows all others, those of economy, of strategy and even of the management of public affairs, not only among the nations at war but also among neutrals.

Furthermore, food production is recognized as one of the most effective forms of patriotism. Professor Kellog, a member of the Food Commission of the United States, and a member of the committee for the relief of Belgium, told the Americans that we must follow the example set by Germany, who claims that the production of food is on a par with the best form of patriotism.

What must we think in the face of such statements coming from men of authority, and the denunciations of those who insult our farmers' sons and the fishermen of our coasts? The patriotism of the tiller of the soil, the patriotism of the fisherman is equal to that of the warrior who goes down into the trenches. His work is just as useful. True, he toils without danger and dives without glory, but his patriotism is superior to that of his detractors who do nothing for the country or the army, who are, themselves, the real cowards, the real slackers. It is to hide their cowardice and their shame that they throw mud in the faces of their fellow-citizens who perform the work of the country. It is not they who will help to solve the food problem which is so important, we learn from Mr. Hoover, "that our inability to solve it in all its details will result fatally in our inability to solve the problem of the war in the way that all civilized nations, together with ourselves, would like to see it solved."

These words of authority would already be sufficient to cause all thinking men to stop a moment and reflect and to imbue them with a more fruitful purpose than that which guides them to-day, if these gentlemen would only consent to lay their emotions aside and direct their conduct by the dictates of reason. It would be well to reflect still further on the cable addressed by Lord Rhondda to Mr. Hoover on the 25th of January, 1918, in which he says:

> Unless you can ship to the Allies 75,000,000 more bushels of wheat than you sent up to the 1st day of January last, irrespective of what we have received from Canada, I cannot take the responsibility of assuring our people that we shall have enough food to win the war.

So this question of food is all-important and in no respect secondary to our duty to furnish reinforcements to our troops in the war zone. We must all do our best, our absolute best, to produce food in abundance. It is not in spending enormous sums of money to raise battalions of soldiers that we will attain the object desired by the Empire as well as by the people of Canada.

As regards this problem of food we should ascertain what the different provinces are doing. I note in the official publications of the Government, for instance in the Canadian Food Bulletin that Ontario intends putting one million acres under cultivation to insure the greatest possible production of foodstuffs. I note also that it is the intention of the Maritime Provinces to increase the number of acres under cultivation to 400,000, an average gain of five acres for each farm; and I note that Quebec has placed its objective of cultivation at 600,000 acres.

I observed, the other day, and several members of this House noticed it also, perhaps with regret, that Ontario farmers had come here to interview certain ministers of the Crown. They had to admit that if the young men were taken off the farms they would be obliged to retrench in their production campaign and reduce the acreage which they intended planting next spring.

I had heard, moreover, a few days previously, that Ontario was threatened, in all likelihood, with another crop failure.

I am sorry Mr. Speaker that I have not at hand statistical data in connection with last year's crop in the different provinces; however, since, on more than one occasion, members have taken the floor in this House to throw stones at the province of Quebec, pronouncing it backward and benighted, and qualifying the French Canadians as lazy shirkers, allow me to lay before you a statement of what Quebec has happened to accomplish the matter of increased food production during the last few years. Let those who have produced more and done better, cast stones at us.

Note.—The areas under cultivation in 1917 are based on more exact data than were supplied in the preceding year; therefore, they are not strictly comparable to the figures of 1916.

Let part of the money which it is proposed to spend for the purpose of strengthening our military efforts be appropriated to the aid of agriculture and of the different forms of food production; leave the men in the fields instead of sending them to war, and this country will be in a position to furnish the Allies with what they need above all else: food, and still more food. In this manner we shall fulfil our duty entirely, we shall constitute ourselves a force to the Empire and to its Allies.

You should not be astonished, Mr. Speaker, if in the presence of these facts one part of the country has shown itself opposed to conscription. I was, myself, opposed to it, and I shall continue to be so, until I have been convinced that I am at fault.

We have not sufficient men to produce the necessary food; have we enough to furnish soldiers? We evidently have not. The time has come when we must admit that we have reached the last man; haven't we also reached our last penny?

I was asking a moment ago "what will be done with to-morrow." We already know that to-morrow will see the last man gone. To-morrow will see the Allies, our brothers in arms, left without food. To-morrow will see the last penny spent; to-morrow, national bankruptcy will stare us in the face.

At present we owe more than one billion dollars. Before this session is over we shall have voted another billion to meet the needs of the country and to pay for the administrative bungles of the Borden Government.

The Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Maclean) foretold of a deficit of over 245 million dollars, exclusive of the amounts required for the purchase of the Canadian Northern stock and other of his colleagues' fancy tastes in railways. Doubtless we shall need 150 millions more to meet these requirements; so that we find a deficit of 400 million dollars in this year's budget. This figure alone will open the eyes of the most reluctant and show them which way we are heading. The fine words of our ministers are evidently meant to camouflage our national bankruptcy. What is our credit worth at the present moment? The 47 per cent specie which we have to guarantee payment of the Dominion's notes is not sufficient to place our credit on a solid foundation either at home or abroad. At the present time are we in a position to pay the tremendous sums required by the Government to continue its work of ruining this country? We may well doubt it when we observe the Prime Minister's silence regarding his American visit. Could they, perchance, have made him the answer: "No trade nor truck with the Canucks?" And our credit is too weak to afford us a share in the money lent England by the United States. We are financially exhausted; after the last man, the last penny.

That is the state to which the present Government has brought this country: ruin, national poverty, bankruptcy, that is the price of victory that our administrators are ready to pay. What will remain of our citizens' freedom when our ministers will have satisfied the ambitions and swelled the fortunes of their friends? The people, who are forced to pay taxes on their most essential needs, will toil and sweat to keep the wolf from the door and to pay the unfairly distributed taxes of the day, while our millionaire war-profiteers will continue to laugh at the poor man's burdens and to wax still richer, immune from taxes on the privileged yield of their millions.

War profits, swelled by the blood of our soldiers, are taxed no more than others. Still they should be the first to pay. Every war industry, living on the war, and by the war, should be first to contribute to the cost of the war. These industries are temporary and in no way tend to strengthen the industries of our country for the post-bellum period. It is the industries of peace-time which invigorate a people and raise it from the sloughs of despond. What has the Government done to further the development of these latter and to insure their stabilty now and hereafter? The Government is trying to destroy, to discourage our peace-time industries. To-day these industries are barely able to hold their own; why not give them the preference over the industries of war? These are principles of justice and politico-social economy which are being deliberately ignored, the more easily to favour those who are building fortunes out of the money voted for war purposes.

Bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that the people are suffering, that they are groaning beneath the ever weightening load saddled upon them by the Government. Why not help the farmer in his endeavours towards increased production by allowing him access to agricultural implements without having to pay prohibitive duties. Why not adopt immediately a policy of free trade in food with our American neighbours. They are fighting side by side with us for the same rights, for their flag, for the freedom of the seas. In addition they are fighting to repay a debt of gratitude; "Here we are" said Pershing over the tomb of a French soldier; they are fighting for France.

Let us go back to them; let us start anew the negotiations of 1911 and find among them all we need to help our people bear the burden of the war, so that this country may be of more assistance to the Empire and to the Allies.

Is it not astonishing that our Government should have done so little concerning the civil re-establishment of our returned soldiers? These brave men left all they had, and to-day they must be content with their poor pension of from $20 to $40 a month, according to rank. On the battlefields of Europe our heroes fell in glory; others, at this instant, are facing the German gunfire to carry on the glorious task of their brother volunteers; they have fought, they are fighting still, for their country, for their family, for their little cottage, for that little corner of the globe which is enshrined in their hearts, and where their dear ones are anxiously living and yearning for their boys' return.

Alas, what will be our answer to these brave men when they demand their share of happiness and comfort! The awakening, once they have come back, will be terrible for them. They will cry out vengeance and their voices will find an echo in the hearts of their countrymen who will then condemn, as we do, the extravagance and the inertia of the present Government. On their return they will find in ruins the country for which they will have fought in vain. What will it profit them to have won the war if the victory has cost them the loss of their own country?

Pause a moment, you gentlemen of the Cabinet, and contemplate our Canada that you are leading to ruin; reform your ways. Save what is left of our dying country. To-morrow the history of your administration will be inscribed for all time; like that of Nero, your page will be a black page; you will see yourselves buried alive beneath the ruins of our country, beneath the ruins of Canada.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): I would like to add my congratulations to those tendered by other members to the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) upon the presentation of the Budget, and upon the reasonableness of the proposals which he has submitted. I think, Mr. Speaker, that it will be agreed that the imposition of taxes is one of the functions of Government which usually produces the keenest criticism. So I have been interested to notice that the criticisms levelled at the Budget on this occasion have not been very severe, and more interested still to notice that throughout the country the new taxes have been assented to with a cheerfulness quite unusual. I think that is a very great credit to the people of Canada. Some of the taxes which have been imposed, especially the increased income tax and the excess profits tax, while I entirely agree with them, touch a great many people in such a way as might reasonably lead them to offer protest, but we have had no objection of any consequence, and the result must be very satisfactory and gratifying to the Government.

There has been one feature which has been impressed upon me by my correspondence, and that is that the tax on tea operates somewhat against the British possessions. I have no knowledge of the tea business myself, but I am told that a very large quantity of tea comes to Canada from Ceylon and other portions of the British Empire, and that recently large quantities have been coming from Java in Dutch bottoms. I presume that there should be a preference in taxation shown to the teas that come from the British Empire. But even that objection is not impressed upon me with any great force, and it does not appeal to me as being something for which the Government should be severely criticised.

But there is one question before the Government which, according to the newspapers, is to receive some attention, and which I think should receive attention; I refer to additional remuneration for the letter carriers and mail carriers of this country. We have had no definite word as to what the Government intend to do in this matter, but I am quite sure that any hon. gentleman who has regard to the small salaries paid to the men who are distributing the mail in our cities must agree that their remuneration is entirely inadequate. I trust that the Government will see that that condition is remedied, and that those employed in thus serving the public shall be recompensed in a reasonable way for the labours they perform. The duties of these Government employees are exacting and onerous. They are on their feet all day; they have the responsibility of carrying letters of great value, and, on the whole, the nature of their duties justifies their receiving better remuneration than they have been receiving. I trust that the Government will consider this matter and see that the requests made on behalf of the letter carriers are met as far as possible.

It was not my intention to make any speech on the Budget until the member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) made certain reflections upon an organization with which I am connected—reflections which, to my mind, should not be allowed to stand on the record without correction. The hon. gentleman compared the Loyal Orange association, a great loyal and tolerant institution, to Chinamen—rather to the disadvantage of members of that association. That may be due to his lack of knowledge of this institution, but he could easily have become better informed, and if he had obtained information which was within his reach I am sure that he would not have gone so far as to compare those who compose that organization with subjects of nations which we are accustomed to refer to as constituting a yellow peril. The members of this organization may have yellow as their colour, but recent events have shown that the yellow is all on the outside, and that members of this institution have not exhibited the faintest trace of any yellow streak inside, because they have done their duty in this great war in such a way as to command the respect of all classes.

I have sometimes been surprised that in some sections of the country this organization is so greatly misunderstood. I wish it were possible for me to present its real character to all the people who do not believe in it, because were I able to do that I could convince them that they are labouring under a misapprehension as to its purposes or as to any desire existing among its members to create trouble. I say that I am surprised, because an institution organized on similar lines exists in great strength and prosperity among particular classes of our population which seem to misunderstand the Orange institution most grossly. I refer to the St. Jean Baptiste society in the province of Quebec. I have observed some of the parades of this patriotic and religious society, and for colour, for music, for all things that make up a very entertaining demonstration, they have certainly been remarkable. I think I have seen nothing in Canada that could surpass a certain demonstration which I witnessed in the province of Quebec a few years ago. The organization to which I refer has the same aims as the great Orange order, with the one difference that it represents a different religion, and, perhaps, a different idea of patriotism. The St. Jean Baptiste society is patriotic, as patriotism is understood by the French Canadians, and it is religious as representing the Roman Catholic church. That is within their right; nobody ever heard a complaint from Ontario that the St. Jean Baptiste society was an evil institution and should be disbanded. Indeed, nobody has ever heard from Ontario any adverse criticism of that society. But we have heard some very bitter denunciations at times of the other organization in Ontario. The Orange order is patriotic and religious. Orangemen have a different idea of patriotism from that of the French Canadian society, mainly in this respect: that the Orange order stands for the maintenance of connection with the Mother Country—that is one of their cardinal principles. The other difference is that they represent the Protestant religion. The member for St. Hyacinthe says: "I have a right to belong to the Roman Catholic church." Surely he has. That is one of the things that the members of the association which he rather discredited, if not seriously misrepresented, not only concede to him as a member of the Roman church but is obliged to protect him in. I suppose if there is any party of extremists in Ontario, I should be called an extremist. I am satisfied with that classification, however, because I do not believe that I or those with whom I am associated are extremists. Holding the views we do, differing very sharply from some of our fellow citizens, we make no attempt in Ontario or elsewhere and have never done so, to deprive them of any right which they enjoy under the constitution. That is a feature of this great loyal Orange order. The only time in Canada's history when an agitation arose in Ontario with regard to anything that had happened in Quebec was when the legislature of that province passed an Act restoring a considerable amount of money to the Society of Jesus, an Act known as the Jesuit Estates Act. The passing of that measure aroused considerable discussion in Ontario and it is interesting to note that the men who organized that movement and carried it on, the men who were the head and front of it, were among the warmest friends that the present leader of the Opposition had in Ontario. The president of the movement was Principal Caven of Knox College. Nearly all the leaders of the movement were well known leaders of the Liberal party in Ontario. Their agitation brought to them a great many from the other side; but this is what happened. There were men in our province who recognized that that Act was within the law, that it was within the constitutional powers of the legislature of the province of Quebec. Among those men was the late E. F. Clarke, for many years a member of this House, a very prominent man, who might have been called, as I have been called, an extremist. I myself heard him at large Orange gatherings tell the Orangemen of Ontario, who were dissatisfied with that legislation, that they were wrong; that the Act was within the power of the legislature of Quebec, that they had no right to object to it, and that it would be very unwise for them to do so. He was not the only leader in Ontario who took the same stand at the same time. As I recall these circumstances I have been greatly disappointed that in agitations which have later arisen in the province of Quebec, there were not men in that province who would take the same stand as did the late E. F. Clarke, and who would go to their people and say: "This is within the power of the legislature of Ontario, we must accept it loyally and faithfully." An organization that produces men like the late E. F. Clarke, who will stand up and oppose their friends when their friends are very angry about certain things in the light of justice, and constitutional rights, and peace and harmony in this country, is an organization which should not be discredited upon the floor of this House.

I should just like to read a few lines to show the kind of men that this organization brings together. As it has been traduced here, its true status ought to be presented. These are the qualifications that are essential for membership in this organization:

> An applicant for admission should have a sincere love and veneration for his Almighty Maker, productive of those lively and happy fruits—righteousnes and obedience to His commands; a firm and steadfast faith in the Saviour of the world, convinced that He is the only mediator between a sinful creature and an offended Creator. His disposition should be humane and compassionate, and his behaviour kind and conciliatory; he should be an enemy to savage brutality and every species of unchristian conduct; a lover of rational and improving society; faithfully regarding the Protestant religion, and sincerely desirous of propagating its precepts, i.e., charity and good-will to all men. Zealous in promoting the honour, happiness and prosperity of his King and country; heartily desirous of success in those pursuits, yet convinced that God alone can grant them. He should have a hatred of cursing and swearing, and of taking the name of God in vain; he should use all opportunities of discouraging them among his brethren, and shun the society of all persons addicted to those shameful practices. Prudence should guide all his actions; temperance, sobriety and honesty direct his conduct; and the laudable objects of the association be the motives of his endeavours.

An organization based upon these lines is one that should at least command the respect of those who do not see eye to eye with all its members. While all its members have not lived up to these requirements, they have lived up to them as nearly as the members of any church obey the injunctions of their religious teachers. Some church members come very far short of living up to the full professions of the sect, or denomination, to which they belong. That is the case with every human organization, and this is a human organization; but this is what we ought to do, and that is the kind of men we aim to have within our organization.

At one o'clock the House rose.

The House resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto) (Resuming): When the House rose at one o'clock I was going on to discuss the political side of the Orange order, which has been referred to in a way that I thought required an answer; but before doing so, I should like to say a word on its religious aspect as my hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier) has referred to that. He claims the right to belong to the Roman Catholic church—a right which no man in this country would deny to him. We in Ontario, or a good many of us, at any rate, claim the right to belong to the Protestant church, and the right to exercise the same privileges as are exercised by any other denomination. To show how far from intolerance are the people of Ontario, and especially the members of the Orange order, I would point out that we welcome to the city of Toronto every year a number of the Paulist Fathers, who come on evangelical missions to the Protestants of that city. I invariably receive an invitation to their revival meetings, and I attend as often as I have the opportunity. I have in my hand at this moment the last invitation they sent me, covering a period from March 10th to March 17th of this year. Our people hear the Paulist Fathers presenting their religious views with the idea of making conversions, and we say that Protestant evangelists have just as much right to make the same appeal from our side in the province of Quebec or in any other part of this country. While I have attended a good many of the meetings of the Paulist Fathers they have not yet succeeded in converting me to their way of religion, but if they persist long enough no one can say what may happen. Nobody in Canada threatens to invade this right, and as representing the extreme party in the province of Ontario, I would assure the members from the province of Quebec, as this question has been raised so often, that no man in Ontario could possibly raise an agitation that would threaten the religious liberties of any man in the Dominion of Canada. So far as I know, there is no organization nor even a small group of men anywhere in the province of Ontario or in western Caanada that has the intention of doing anything of the kind.

As to the patriotic side of the Orange organization, which I am trying so inadequately to defend, in all their professions of loyalty, which have been derided on many occasions, they have been absolutely sincere. Since the war broke out, Orangemen have sealed those professions of loyalty with the blood of a good many thousands of their brethren, and I submit that no stronger proof could be adduced of a man's sincerity than when he lays down his life in defence of the principle in which he believes.

Our members have gone out to fight in such numbers that our lodges are depleted. I will reveal the secrets of this institution so far as to inform the House that it takes only seven members to make a quorum, and yet there are many lodges throughout the Dominion in which they are unable to get a quorum, due entirely to the fact that the membership has so unanimously gone to the defence of Canada and the Empire. How is this? For hundreds of years in this country we have been teaching loyalty in our lodges. Be the lodge large or small, whether its membership be only twenty or whether it be one hundred or two hundred members, the exercises invariably touch on the question of loyalty—loyalty to the flag of the Empire, and loyalty to our connection with the Mother Country. The result of this teaching of a hundred years is seen in the fact that from this one organization, composed of perhaps two hundred and fifty thousand members in the Dominion of Canada, over sixty thousand have enlisted to go to the front. General Sir Sam Hughes places the figure much higher, but I place it at sixty thousand, and I am convinced that figure will be verified when the returns are in from every district in Canada. That is a substantial contribution to our overseas forces. It is one of which this institution is proud, and one which should place the Orange order beyond the pale of unfavourable criticism so far as are concerned its political duties and its loyal devotion to the British Empire. We are just as sensitive as any other class of the community, and when it is suggested that our organization should be disbanded, we offer these facts to support our argument that it is one of the last institutions in this Dominion that should be disbanded. It is not only at the present juncture that Orangemen have shown this amazing loyality. If we go back in history to the year 1812, we find that members of this organization were among the Loyalist forces fighting for the preservation of Canada to the Empire. Again in 1837, in 1866, in 1870, in 1885, in the Boer War, as to-day, the members of this organization have been ready to shoulder a musket in defence of liberty, to defend the interests of the country, and to maintain its laws.

I am convinced that if reasonable men would give consideration, not to the professions but to the practices of this order, instead of wanting it disbanded they would want its principles extended the world over. I do not believe they will be extended very largely in the province of Quebec, but the Orange Order will certainly not interfere with the rights of the people of that province.

I wish in the kindest possible spirit to make a few references to what has happened since this war began, and I trust that in doing so I shall not wound the susceptibilities of any member of this House. At the outbreak of the war we were acquainted in our province with the fact that the young men of French Canadian extraction in the province of Quebec were enlisting in a splendid way. I believe it could be substantiated that at Valcartier the French Canadians did enlist in magnificent numbers. We rejoiced at that fact.

It looked as if the prediction of a very good friend of mine and a faithful follower of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) would be proven to be true. This gentleman is Mr. John McMillan, who was brought up in the city of Quebec, and who, until the last few years, was a member of the Liberal party and a great admirer of the leader of the Opposition. He used to come to my office on many occasions to talk about the possibility of effecting national unity in Canada, something that he desired quite as much as I did. In the course of our discussions he used to say that, as far as he could see, having an intimate knowledge of all parts of Canada, and particularly of Quebec, that if the British Empire and France should by any fortune or misfortune be found fighting a common enemy, and should their forces be aligned together for the defeat of that enemy, it would most certainly produce that national unity in Canada which we all so much desired. I entirely agreed with him, as I think any person who looked at the situation at that time must have agreed. When the forces were gathered at Valcartier we congratulated ourselves, he and I, that this thing had at last been brought about.

But then something happened. I am not going to discuss what happened, or to venture to make a guess at what happened. I refrain from doing so in order to avoid anything that may be considered acrimonious in this discussion. But something did happen in the province of Quebec. That flocking to the colours, which we saw prior to the Valcartier camp being formed and the first contingent going away, ceased. I might say a good deal about the stories that came to the province of Ontario, giving us the reasons for that, but I am not going to say it. I have been in the habit for many years of visiting Montreal and Ottawa, and I myself heard a great many explanations. I heard a great many things that were not creditable to certain leaders in Quebec. But the fact filtered through Ontario that recruiting in Quebec was not going on. Is it any wonder that there should be some feeling west of the Ottawa river under such circumstances? We had recruited men in the city of Toronto, in every town and village in Ontario and in the West—in fact, recruiting in the West was rather better than in any other part of the country—and we were forced to look upon one province of Confederation which was not doing its duty. When I say that I think I am within the judgment of the members on the other side of the House. But I will not pursue that any farther. I mention it only to point out that if those hon. gentlemen who represent Quebec constituencies would put themselves in our places, and if their constituents would put themselves in the places of our constituents they must agree that there would be no more feeling expressed in the province of Ontario and the western provinces against Quebec than would have been expressed in Quebec against us if the situation had been reversed.

We are told that the people of Quebec are sensitive, being a minority. Well, the people of Ontario are sensitive, and they are particularly sensitive on the question of loyalty to the Mother Country. These people of British birth have love for the Mother Country and its institutions, which arises from the fact that Great Britain is their birthplace. They are just as sensitive as any other part of the population, and that sensitiveness was very strongly felt under the circumstances to which I have alluded. If our friends from the province of Quebec will put themselves in our place and review the whole situation calmly, earnestly and sincerely, they will admit that nothing was said or done in my province which was unnatural or which called for the severe criticism directed at us by the French Canadian press. I am not going to refer to the French Canadian press. I have kept a scrap-book on the French Canadian press. I am very fully informed as to what the various papers in Quebec have been saying, and I might read a great many extracts here, but that would serve perhaps only to excite those antagonisms which I am trying to avoid. While I am trying to avoid these antagonisms, I am yet trying to put our case as we view it to the hon. gentlemen who sit on the other side of the House and who represent the other province, and I am trying to do it in such a way that they will get our viewpoint. We are told that we do not understand the province of Quebec and that we ought to get their viewpoint. I quite agree that we do not understand Quebec as well as those who live there, and I think their viewpoint is very different from ours. Let me point out one thing that is not generally known. I think the members from western Canada are not aware of it; at least they would not have been aware of it from their reading of the general press. It was one full year before a single newspaper in the province of Ontario criticised the province of Quebec for its lack of recruiting. I make that statement, Mr. Speaker, after having recently gone over the files of the principal papers in Ontario, and I make it with this further knowledge that when the dispute arose as to the recruiting in the different provinces, I got information from the cities of Quebec, Montreal and Ottawa, but I, representing those people, whom they regard as fanatics in the province of Quebec, deliberately, and of settled purpose, refused to discuss it. The newspaper which represents the Orange organization did not print one word of criticism of French Canadian recruiting until after the Globe had discussed it, which was on the 29th of July, 1915. I have the clipping here. The first criticism on any lack of recruiting in the province of Quebec which was made in a public journal of the province of Ontario, was in the form of a news despatch from Montreal to the Globe under date of July 29, 1915. The Globe at that time, I think, would hardly be considered to be unfriendly to the province of Quebec. It was then the organ of the leader of the Opposition and it was defending him and his policies with a good deal of vigour. The Globe is conducted by men whom I know, and have known intimately for a good many years. There is no finer staff on the North American continent than that which is made up of the gentlemen who are responsible for the publication of that newspaper. I know Mr. Stewart Lyon. I worked with him for many years; I know Mr. John F. Mackay, the business manager, and I know that there are not two more public spirited men in Canada than they are. I make that statement without reference to the question whether we agree or disagree. I do not agree with them on many political questions but I know their sincerity of purpose and I know the reliability of the Globe newspaper which first published this matter. I feel that any paper in Canada would be free to copy its statements and to refer to the facts that were contained in any of its articles. The papers in Quebec have been telling us that the existing friction arises through our insulting the people of Quebec.

Mr. J. BUREAU (Three Rivers): That statement is true.

Mr. HOCKEN: I did not catch what the hon. gentleman said, but it does not matter. The fact is that for one full year there was no criticism of any kind by any newspaper in the province of Ontario. The men in our province who are styled fanatics, showed remarkable restraint. They were sending out their young men by the tens of thousands when they had reason to believe that another province was pursuing an opposite course, and was retarding and restraining its young men who wanted to go to the front. I say that those people in Ontario showed remarkable restraint in not making any criticism for one year after the policy to which I have alluded became apparent. I was determined, Sir, that so far as I could control it, the newspaper organ which represents the Orange order should not be the first to be chargeable with saying things by way of harsh criticism of that particular element of our population. Now I am not going to place the responsibility for what was done in Quebec. But it is only fair to say that in Ontario practically every pulpit was a recruiting centre, and practically every public man was out on the hustings urging our young men to enlist. Whether that was so in the province of Quebec I am going to leave to hon. members opposite to state,—a good deal might be said in that regard which I do not wish to say.

I think it is true of the province of Ontario, as of the provinces west of Ontario, that we keep our politics pretty much apart from all religious issues. No religious leader in the province of Ontario can bring to bear, in political matters, any influence other than his powers of persuasion with his people. I am not going to discuss the question as to whether in another province much more extensive powers are sometimes exerted; but in our politics we are absolutely independent, and that particularly refers to the element of the population of which I am speaking. You will hear it said in our own province that that element is a Tory organization. Nothing could be further from the truth, although it might perhaps be said that the majority of those connected with it are Conservatives in politics. But the explanation for that goes back a long way, and it might be interesting to the House to know its genesis.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Hear, hear.

Mr. HOCKEN: This was how it began: It was about the year 1870, or sometime in the sixties—I was too young to have the exact date fixed in my mind—that the late Hon. George Brown ran an election campaign with the late John Hilyard Cameron in the city of Toronto. The latter was the Grand Master of the Orange association, and the Orangemen of Toronto voted for him. That incensed Mr. Brown to such a degree that from that day forward, as long as he occupied the position of editor of the Globe, he denounced the Orange organization. The entire party press took up Mr. Brown's denunciation and it has almost become a habit for Liberal papers in the province to curse that association. The result was that it had the effect of keeping out of the association the very men the Liberals should have wanted in it, because, being a democratic and liberal organization its principle should have appealed to Liberals.

Going back to the year 1896 we find that the men connected with the Orange order supported the right hon. leader of the Opposition. At that time there were four constituencies in the city of Toronto. Two of those constituencies elected supporters of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and the candidates for the other two constituencies were compelled to pledge themselves not to support the policy of the then Tupper Government. I sat in Massey hall, Toronto, in the early summer of that year and saw an audience, composed of these young men who are described as Tory fanatics, refuse to give the Prime Minister of the day, Sir Charles Tupper, an opportunity of speaking, so enthusiastically were they at that time supporting the leader of the Opposition. Coming down to a later date, in order to prove the political independence and loyalty to principle of these men, I could refer to happenings in the province of Manitoba when amendments to the School Act were enacted, which seemed then to threaten the integrity of the public school system. The members of the Orange order had been in the main supporters of the then provincial government, but upon their refusal to repeal the amendments complained of, the Orangemen of Manitoba went to the polls and defeated the administration, and placed in power in Manitoba a Liberal government, which fact I am sure will satisfy hon. members opposite that it is not a political organization with the one purpose of voting to keep a Tory government in power.

I have but a few more words to say. I would like to mention to hon. gentlemen opposite what the province of Ontario, and the provinces west of it want from the province of Quebec. It is not a very large or unreasonable request, and I think it is one that men who are anxious to bring about national unity should be very glad to concede. What the other provinces want from Quebec is a recognition of their obligations of citizenship, and a respectful and obedient observance of the constitution of the country. I submit that this demand is not unreasonable. It is because the people in the province of Quebec have been unwilling to accept Senator Belcourt's interpretation of the constitution, that much of the existing acrimony and friction has arisen. Let the people of Quebec loyally accept the provisions of the constitution as we have accepted them. There are features of the constitution which are not altogether acceptable to hon. gentlemen opposite, and there are features of it which are not acceptable to us. There are provisions in the British North America Act which the people of Ontario and of the western provinces would wipe out to-morrow if they had the power. I submit to you, Sir, that there has never been a community in any country that has more loyally observed its constitutional obligations, notwithstanding the fact that there are obligations with which they do not agree, than have the people of the provinces of Ontario and the West. All we are asking is that the same spirit shall be manifested and expressed by the people of all the provinces. And, Sir, if that happy condition had existed loyally at the beginning, I think there would have been none of this unfortunate friction.

The people of Quebec have certain special privileges defined by the constitution and confined to their province. We say to them: We make no attempt to infringe those privileges, but you must not extend those privileges over the rest of the Dominion of Canada; they have no constitutional effect in the other provinces and they should be confined to the province for which the British North America Act provides them. We welcome French Canadians to the province of Ontario if they will come in the spirit of obedience to our law. If we go into Quebec we go in the spirit of obedience to the law of that province; we recognize the power of its legislature to enact laws within its own sphere. We say to those coming to our province: You must recognize the power of our legislature to enact laws within its own sphere. If objection can be found to that principle, I submit that it is unreasonable.

But if the French cannot live happily in Ontario, they have room enough in their own province. They evidently find it to their advantage to come to Ontario, and there is no objection made to their coming. The only thing we do object to is that they should bring with them ideals which are repugnant to the ideals of Ontario, and for which they have no constitutional warrant, and which the people of our province will not submit to. I have said, Mr. Speaker, that Ontario has not interfered with the domestic affairs of Quebec, but Ontario has contended that the principles upon which Quebec is governed shall not apply to her. There is no party in Ontario advocating interference with the province of Quebec. But there is a settled determination not to permit the French to establish their special Quebec privileges in our province. I say in all frankness that the British Canadians are ready to co-operate with the French Canadians to unite in building up a great free democracy, but it must be based upon obedience to the laws and the constitution. If they are unwilling to co-operate on that basis, they may depend upon it that the people of Ontario and, I believe, the people of the western provinces will with all the influence they possess resist the attempt to impose upon Canada any ideal of national life which they consider to be lower than that they now possess, and which they have inherited from their forebears, and the maintenance of which they believe to be necessary to make Canada within this century the most powerful and prosperous nation in the world; a nation which I dare to hope will make a contribution to the advancement of civilization and liberty equal to, if not greater, than that of any nation on the earth to-day.

That is the ambition animating the English-speaking people of this Dominion. They see in this emergency the necessity of making enormous sacrifices if they are to achieve this high destiny. That is why feeling exists in some places because of the indifference heretofore of the people of Quebec. And I ask hon. gentlemen from Quebec to give consideration to that sentiment, because it springs from the highest and holiest motives which stir the human heart. I intended to say before, Mr. Speaker, but you will allow me to interpolate here, that, speaking for that extreme faction I have referred to, we believe the French Canadian is potentially as good a citizen as there is in the world. We have not called him a coward; that charge has been made in the French papers, but not by us. Some of us have read the history of France, and know that the same blood flows in the people of Quebec as in the veins of the men of France. We look over their history, we see their heroic conduct to-day and we are forced to believe, and we want to believe, that those who are of that language in this country have the same possibilities and potentialities as the men who are valiantly holding the lines against the Huns. We ask the French people of Quebec to recognize the situation and be loyal to that Act of Confederation which is our constitution, accepted by their representatives just as it was accepted by ours.

We have heard some eloquent appeals and pleas for national unity in this House and in many other places. In trying to achieve that aim, Sir, we have a difficult task, rendered difficult by the fact that the makers of our constitution incorporated in it two disintegrating elements which stand there now, which probably will stand there, and which will, in my judgment, make absolute and complete national unity an impossibility. These two disintegrating features of our constitution are the two languages and the two sets of schools. There is no proposition from our side to interfere with them. That being the case national unity depends upon one thing and that is that the advocates of these two principles, who regard the dual langage and the separate school as among the vital and sacred things to them, shall accept the situation as it is and shall not try to extend these privileges to the province of Ontario or to other provinces outside of Quebec. I am quite satisfied that if they will do that there will be no friction between any other province and the province of Quebec. If they will not do that, then I submit there is nothing else for the English-speaking people of Canada to do, than to resist the attempts to impose upon them something in which they do not believe, in which they never did believe, but which was conceded to the people of Quebec in order that they might enter Confederation freely and voluntarily and take their part as citizens of Canada. In the acceptance of the situation, Mr. Speaker, we can reach, if not a complete, then a very considerable, degree of national unity. But if not in that way, then I cannot see how else it can be accomplished. I put the onus upon the leaders of the province of Quebec to bring that unity about.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I did not expect when speaking on the Budget that I would have to discuss the Orange Sentinel's orthodoxy, but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hocken) has chosen to deliver a lecture on the ideals of the Orange party and of the Sentinel, which he edits. I shall, therefore, for a few moments, reply as best I may to the very specious arguments brought into this discussion by that hon. gentleman.

I wish at once to correct one of the views to which he gave expression. The hon. gentleman has been very kind—indeed, over-generous—to the French Canadians. He has conceded that the French Canadian is "potentially" as good a British subject as any British-born or any Anglo-Canadian. Let me add a little rider to my hon. friend's definition. The French Canadian, I am proud to say, is not potentially but actually as good and as loyal a citizen as any British-born or any Anglo-Canadian in this free Canada of ours. It is because some people of my hon. friend's ilk choose to consider their fellow men as inferior beings that the other fellow—to use my hon. friend's word—resents such assumption on the part of an alleged superior race. My hon. friend aptly defined himself this afternoon—and I must congratulate him for his sincerity—when he said, "I am an extremist; I represent the extremist views of Ontario." Mr. Speaker, the bane of this country is the extremist. My hon. friend said a moment ago: I will tell you what we the people of Ontario—and this reminds me of the "three tailors of Tooley street" and the editors of the Orange Sentinel—expect from the province of Quebec; and he then gave his charitable advice without charge. Will he allow me to retort what we, the "potentially" good citizens of Quebec, expect from the true Britishers of Ontario? We expect that the President of the Council, who specially represents Ontario in the Cabinet, will forthwith appoint a special censor with a lucrative salary and locate him at the Sentinel office so that he may delete from that paper the incendiary articles which are being published every week with a view to inflame racial and religous passions.

My hon. friend says: But you do not know what are the aims and objects of the Orange Order. I do not care to know them. This is a free country; the Orange Order has been legalized by Act of Parliament, and I do not object to its existence. What I object to is that the Orange Order, through some of its members, should claim the monopoly of loyalty and fidelity to the British institutions. There is no such monopoly in Canada. There is as much loyalty in the St. Jean Baptiste Society, the St. George's Society, the St. Andrew's Society, the St. Patrick's Society, the St. David Society, as there is in the Orange Order. The St. Jean Baptiste Society, referred to by my hon. friend, is a French Canadian national organization. It was founded in 1834 at Montreal. Its first celebration was held in the gardens of a Mr. Macdonald, a good old Scotchman—the Scotch and the French never had any quarrels. The first president of the society was Mr. Duvernay, editor of La Minerve, and the song of French Canada—"O Canada, mon pays, mes amours"—was heard for the first time at that meeting. It was composed and sung by a young student who later became the great leader of the Conservative party, Sir George Etienne Cartier. The St. Jean Baptiste Society has on its crest the words " Rendre le peuple meilleur " to improve the people —that is to say, to educate the people, to preserve their national traditions, to preserve their language, too—the language which has been so mercilessly assailed in Ontario through Regulation 17—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. LEMIEUX: —the language which was denied privileges which were given to the German minority in Ontario.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend says that he would circumscribe the French language to the province of Quebec. Half the words of the English language are French words. I can take the last issue of the Orange Sentinel and show him that fifty per cent of the words which appear in that paper are of purely French extraction. The English language is partly French and partly Saxon. By the way, I stand for British, not for Saxon ideals. His Majesty the King has adopted the expression " House of Windsor," instead of " House of Hanover "—and I, following the example of my King, will stand for British, not for Saxon ideals. The attitude of my hon. friend and his compeers of the Orange Order with regard to the French language is ungenerous and unBritish; they should at least during this war respect the language of Joffre and of Foch.

My hon. friend read to the House the guiding principles of the Orange Order. These aims as he read them are not in question. What I object to is the wrong use made of these principles and aims, so lofty when they are read. What I object to is that the Orange Order should import into this country the bickerings, the contentions, the miseries which have desolated old Ireland for so many centuries. Lessons of loyalty from the Orange Order? Do we not know contemporary history? When the King, Lords and Commons of England had passed an Act of Parliament in the old British fashion, by the majority of the elect of the people, what did Sir Edward Carson, the leader of the Ulster party, do? Did he not promote a rebellion in Ulster, at a time when the Germans were planning the great war which broke out a few weeks afterwards? No lessons of loyalty from the Orange Order for me. My hon. friend has given us some advice; let him accept some from me. Let me suggest to him not to make of the Pope of Rome the bogey that he is making of him every week in his paper. He should remember that in 1914, for the first time since the Reformation, a British ambassador was sent to the Vatican, and if His Majesty George V is wise enough to have an ambassador at the Vatican, to confer at times with the Pope of Rome, surely my hon. friend, as a superloyal British subject, will refrain from those innuendoes against the personality of the Pope of Rome. He should also remember that one of the leading Protestants of the Nineteenth Century, speaking of the Roman Catholic Church, said that no one could deny that at least it was a great school of respect. My hon. friend, for reasons of his own, perhaps in order to avoid discussing the income tax, brought in the Jesuit Estates Act. I shall not relate the history of the Jesuits on the continent of America. If I had to offer a prize to my hon. friend, my sweet revenge would be to send him Parkman's History of the Jesuits on the North American Continent. He would learn there that the Jesuits were the pioneers of America; that not a hill, not a mountain, not a lake, not a river, was discovered without the presence of the black robe. At Washington, in the Capitol, under the dome —the Tories being in office trucking and trading with the Yankees, my hon. friend may now go there—would find that an overwhelming Protestant American majority have erected a monument to the memory of Father Marquette. In spite of my hon. friend—perhaps because of him, as some day there will be a reaction—I do not despair of seeing, under the roof of the legislature at Toronto a monument to the memory of the Jesuit martyrs, Fathers Lallemand and Brebœuf, who evangelized the province of Ontario before going to their martyrdom in the state of New York. Perhaps such a monument would be an object lesson for the descendants of my hon. friend.

My hon. friend knows that, under the French domination, the Jesuits received from the King of France certain estates. My hon. friend knows equally that the Order was dissolved by the Pope of Rome. Then the cession of Canada to Great Britain took place—because we were never conquered, we were ceded.

An hon. MEMBER: History disproves that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is why the treaty of Paris was so benevolent to us. After the cession of Canada to Great Britain, when the British Governors took over control of this country, the Jesuits' estates escheated to the Crown; but later on, when the Order was reorganized, and when we were granted free constitutional, responsible government, Queen Victoria, because this occurred during Her late Majesty's reign, decided to dispose as she pleased with the Jesuits' estates. In other words, the Government of the province of Quebec, under the late Mr. Mercier, undertook to divide the revenues of those estates between the two sections of our population with a view to promote the cause of education. One share went to the Catholics, and the other share went to the Protestants. The minority in Quebec accepted it quite willingly and was very grateful to the late Hon. Mr. Mercier for his action in the matter. The agitation against the Act did not arise from the Protestants of Quebec; it arose from the Order of which my hon. friend is a noble representative; it came from the province of Ontario.

Mr. HOCKEN: From the Liberals.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When, later on, the question of disallowance came before Parliament, Sir John A. Macdonald, who was a great Canadian, said: "No, this is a provincial statute which the province of Quebec has constitutionally the right to enact and the Dominion Government will not interfere." The views of Sir John A. Macdonald were shared by the then highest authority on the constitution, the late Hon. Edward Blake. That is the history of the Jesuits' estates. All the agitation came from the troublesome element, from the extremists, as represented to-day by my hon. friend in this House. I wonder why my hon. friend brought again into the debate all those contro-

4 p.m. versial issues. He is, of course, an extremist. He admits that. He must therefore create trouble. The circulation of his paper would be nil if it did not contain those rabid articles against the Pope of Rome and against that French minority which diabolically intends to dominate the majority in Canada. What a great compliment to the English people of this Dominion of Canada, that Quebec might dominate the majority! Let me repeat to my fellowmen of British blood and of British ideals what that sturdy old sailor, when the Titanic was foundering, said in the midst of the Atlantic ocean: "Be British!" he said to his sailors and to the passengers on board. I say to my fellowmen: Be British! do not be Prussians, as you are asked to be by such articles as are weekly published in the Orange Sentinel. After all, the British should not be afraid of the French.

Mr. EDWARDS: They are not.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Bear in mind that, on this North American continent, the French can never aspire to dominate the English-speaking people. From the Gulf of Mexico to the Polar sea—where the Orange editor should be relegated, — there are in round figures one hundred million English-speaking inhabitants, and there are not five million French-speaking persons, Lousiana included. Be not nervous.

The five millions French can never dominate the one hundred millions of English-speaking people. The British Empire, to which we are proud to belong, is ours as much as it is yours, Mr. Speaker. It is made up of a diversity of races and of creeds. No one in this free Empire should dominate, and no one should be dominated either. We are all equal before the law, and it ill becomes some people to look upon the descendants of the founders—the pioneers of this country—as domestics and inferior beings. We will not be the inferiors of any one; we are not your superiors, but we will not be your inferiors; we are all equal before the law. Possibly my hon. friend has not read the memoirs of Sir John A. Macdonald published by his secretary, Sir Joseph Pope. Let him read them, and he will find there some very ominous words. Sir John A. Macdonald was a big Canadian. He once said that in this country there was no conqueror and no conquered, that all Canadians under the British North America Act were equal one with another. Let him also read the speeches of Hon. Edward Blake—the history of his life has not yet been published, but I hope his brilliant son-in-law, Professor Wrong, will stop making Imperialistic speeches for the Round Table clubs and follow out his idea of some years ago, when he was a fervent Grit, of publishing the Blake papers—and in one of his speeches, referring to the minority, he will find this sentence:

> The measure of justice to be served to the minority of this country should be not only full, but abundant and over-heaping.

That is the proper spirit to foster if we would all be true Canadians, true patriots, and true Britishers. If my hon. friend will accept from me the remedy, the patent medicine which would cure this country of all its racial evils, he will please take a few sips now and then of the beverage known as the milk of human kindness, instead of offering me and my compatriots the cup of bitterness. Or, if perchance the President of the Council should remove the prohibition law from the Statute book and should my hon. friend revert to the moderate use of good old French wine, I would advise him to temper it with some water. It is an old French proverb, "Il faut mettre de l'eau dans son vin," or "One must pour a little water in his wine." Does my hon. friend appreciate the philosophy of that proverb? It means that in a country like Canada, with many races and many creeds, there is no room for extremists like my hon. friend. This is a country of compromise, of mutual concessions, where even prejudices as well as virtues must be respected.

My hon. friend admitted that at the beginning of the war French Canadians enlisted in good numbers at Valcartier. That the Jean Baptistes were numerous there, he granted. Was the cause in which we are engaged more sacred at the beginning of the war than it is now? Was the Empire in greater danger in the month of August, 1914, than it is now? True it is that French Canadians enlisted in large numbers from all parts of Canada; they were splendid soldiers, and my friend asks how is it that suddenly all recruiting stopped? There must be a reason. Has my hon. friend ever inquired why recruiting among French Canadians was not so popular after the first year of the war? Of course, he has made inquiries, but from his own prejudiced angle of vision. Let us have the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth.

Mr. EDWARDS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I hear the voice of the statesman from Sharbot Lake. The House of Commons is a big pond, but it is nothing when compared with Sharbot Lake, in Frontenac county. My hon. friend admits that the right hon. leader of the Opposition and French Canadian leaders generally did their duty well at the beginning of the war. The famous 22nd Battalion was the result of my right hon. leader's campaign in the first months of the war. I myself was chairman of a committee in Montreal which recruited the Asselin Regiment. We had no difficulties in raising the two regiments as the people responded magnificently. But when the Orange Sentinel and other papers kept systematically insulting French Canadians, labelling them as shirkers, slackers, and as disloyal people, they resented those attacks bitterly, and lost their enthusiasm. My hon. friend forgot that they were a rural population and had not the same opportunities for enlisting in as large numbers as the men in the industrial centres of Ontario. He also forgot that they had been separated from Europe since three hundred years, and had therefore not the same links with the old land as the British born and Anglo-Canadians. When, moreover, the French Canadians saw the privileges granted to the minority by Sir Oliver Mowat, a man of broad vision and noble ideals, being disregarded by the provincial legislature of Ontario, they paused. Be that as it may, conscription, against the best judgment of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, and against the sober judgment of the country, was forced through this House by closure. The referendum was voted down by Parliament. To-day, after the campaign of hysteria which ended in the victory of Union Government on the 17th of December last, the French Canadians and all those who were opposed to conscription are at last being vindicated—by whom?

By the Ontario farmers, by the members who represent farming constituencies in this House and who form part of the Committee on Agriculture, as I shall show in a few moments. Yes, Sir, the Quebec habitant is being vindicated by the Ontario farmer. I have said, not once but ten times, and I repeat it here, Mr. Speaker, that there is no great difference between Jack Canuck and Jean Baptiste. There is this difference that Jean Baptiste thinks aloud—the French blood is responsible for that—and Jack Canuck thinks silently, but in the long run they both think alike. Jean Baptiste was against conscription and he shouted his opposition to conscription. Jack Canuck was against conscription but he was quietly told by the ministers of the Government to "produce, produce; conscription is not aimed at you; it is for the other fellow in Quebec; you will never be conscripted; therefore, vote for the Tory Government." Sir, the handclasp given to the Ontario farmer was nothing less than the handcuff. The Ontario farmer realizes it to-day and he came here the other day to protest—five hundred strong. A friend of mine from the Senate who is somewhat of a cynic and a fellow Tory senator were on their way to the committee room where the sturdy, horny-handed, tan-complexioned Ontario farmers were sitting silently staring at the Hon. the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell). This Tory senator said to the cynical Grit senator,—if there are any Grits left, Mr. Speaker: "Where are you going?" The latter replied: "I am going to the circus; there is a delegation of French Canadian habitants that have come to ask Major-General Mewburn to repeal the last Order in Council. They say they were promised that there would be no conscription of the habitants." The Tory senator said: "No, you are mistaken; it is not the French Canadian habitant; surely it is the Ontario farmer." "No, no," replied the cynic, "it is a delegation of habitants; were they not the only ones to oppose conscription?" They reached the committee room and the cynic disappeared. But, to his awe and consternation, the Tory senator saw the chickens coming home to roost. He was heard stating after the interview: "Old Abe Lincoln was right. You can fool some of the people some of the time, you can fool some of the people all the time, but you cannot fool all the people all the time." If my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will now permit me to repeat the language of a Unionist Grit, he said, after he had left that meeting, "After all, the old chief was right." I repeated the story to my leader, and his only comment was: "It is my revenge; I am glad of it." But, as I said a moment ago, I did not rise to discuss the Orange orthodoxy nor the Military Act. I never dreamt I would be called upon to fight the battle of the Boyne in the precincts of the House of Commons.

I shall now proceed with my remarks on the Budget speech. Let me say to my hon. friend the hon. Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean), who is now in his seat, that I cannot congratulate him on the speech which he delivered the other day. I do not deny his ability. You know, Sir, that every Nova Scotian is able. No province has given to this Dominion Parliament such a galaxy of statesmen as the little province by the sea. But I cannot congratulate my hon. friend on his speech, because it is not his own; he only read the speech of the real Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White). As was said in days of old, "The voice was the voice of Jacob, but the hand was the hand of Esau." In my judgment there has been no change of Government, but I am sorry to say that on the part of my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance, there has been a change of heart. Yesterday he sat on this side of the House and he was the much vaunted financial critic, to-day he is Minister of Finance in a Tory Cabinet. I cannot congratulate him, Mr. Speaker, but I hasten to say that he has all my sympathy. It is hard anyway to quarrel with such a genial friend. The most that any one can say against him is that if his convictions are weak his intentions are honest. My hon. friend knows that I have always had in store for him much true friendship. Will he allow me to speak to him as a candid friend? Since he has taken the plunge, and crossed to the other side of the House for the time being I hope, may I warn him against that wily financial ring which defeated the reciprocity pact of his then leader the member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) under circumstances much similar to those which existed in the election of 1917? It is extraordinary, and here I quote from memory from an English historian, how dull the English people sometimes are. The French are a vivacious race; the English race is dull. I would like to inject some of that French vivacity into my fellow-members of English origin.

The member for Queens and Shelburne (Mr. Fielding) knows full well that the people of Canada were stampeded in 1911 with the same flag-flapping that stampeded the people in the month of December last. But yet there were Grits--political heirs of George Brown, of Alexander Mackenzie, of Blake, of Cartwright and of Edgar—who were carried away also. They are so honest that they believed what some other wily, crafty people whispered to them. I want to warn my hon. friend (Mr. A. K. Maclean), because I look for the ultimate salvation of his soul politically, I wish to warn him against that financial clique that defeated reciprocity under false pretenses. I want to warn him against the buccaneers who are already shadowing him in the lobbies of this House in the hope, or rather in the quest, of further subsidies for the Canadian Northern. He knows what happened as the outcome of many conferences which took place last year—strange coincidence—at the Chateau Laurier, between Sir Clifford Sifton and Sir William Mackenzie. Oh, what would I not give, Mr. Speaker, to get the book of the recording angel, as Mr. Dooley said, and know what passed between those two knights. Yes, I am honest and sincere in warning my hon. friend that if he wishes to live up to his reputation of sterling integrity he must take great care not to be seen with the buccaneers, whom he knows just as well as I do, because he fought them when he sat on this side of the House; he must not only not be seen with them, but must not be influenced by them in these days of stress and storm. If he should succumb during the present session to their wily arts, it may be his lot to receive what the right hon. the Prime Minister received the other day —a visit from the sturdy farmers of Ontario, and there are farmers in that province, especially among the Scotch, who know their arithmetic. Would my hon. friend allow me to say why I cannot congratulate him upon his Budget speech? It is because he has not lived up to our expectations. When he sat last year on this side of the Chamber he criticised very bitterly—I should not say bitterly, because my hon. friend is not bitter—but he criticised very severely the Minister of Finance. He claimed that there was an opportunity of administrative retrenchment which would amount to $25,000,000 or $30,000,000, and he said: Be bold and strong in the crisis! Let me ask what retrenchment has my hon. friend accomplished? I give him credit for having reduced the main estimates this year by some two, or, let us say, three million dollars in round figures, but this is very far from thirty or forty million. It is true that I have no ministerial responsibility here, but I have my responsibility as a public man and, I hope, as a patriot, and I say to the Acting Minister of Finance that it is possible at the present time, when the people are being bled white in order to reinforce the boys at the front, to repeat a homely phrase, to reduce the expenditure of this country by at least $50,000,000. My hon. friend last year spoke of a possible reduction of thirty or forty million. I say that this year, in view of the impending crisis, a reduction of $50,000,000 would be hailed by the people, Grits and Tories alike. But alas! the Acting Minister of Finance has not carried out any such policy. He said further last year that the time to secure or impose a tax on business profits is when the maximum profits are being earned. Has my hon. friend lived up to our expectations? Has he increased the revenue from the tax which he was entitled to receive from the profiteering companies? Why, Sir, I have a list which would fill a Doomsday book, of industries in Canada which before the war yielded something like seven or eight per cent on their investment, and which today realize as much as the capital which they had originally invested in their business. I say that my hon. friend should take heed of the present hour, and should not permit those companies that are piling up millions out of the agony of the nation to escape without further taxation. I do not object to the tax on tea or coffee, I do not object to the tax on automobiles, I do not object to the tax on tobacco; but my hon. friend knows that by taxing tea, coffee and tobacco he is hitting the poor man. Why should he let escape the Canada Cement Company, the steel companies, the canners, and various other enterprises that I could name? Last year the hon. gentleman advocated the removal of the surtax of seven and a half per cent on the general tariff. He said that it did not permit the development of trade but rather impeded it, and that it involved hardship to the masses of the people. I ask my hon. friends, from the other side of the House who hail from the western provinces and who are not a party to the famous unwritten agreement—the more dangerous because it was unwritten,—has the Acting Minister of Finance lived up to the expectation which they entertained of him? He said last year that the surtax of seven and a half per cent on the general tariff should be removed because it did not promote but rather impeded trade, and that it involved hardship for the masses of the people. And yet he comes before Parliament with financial proposals intended to meet the situation, and does not remove the surtax which he formerly criticized. He blamed the Government for superseding the authority of Parliament by Orders in Council, because, forsooth, a short time before the opening of last session, the late Borden Government at last removed the duties on wheat; and the Order in Council authorizing that removal was passed a few days before Parliament assembled. My hon. friend protested because the Government assumed to govern this country by Orders in Council instead of taking the people's representatives into their confidence. What has happened since? My hon. friend is a member of a Government which not only governs by Orders in Council before Parliament meets, but he himself assents to Orders in Council passed during the session of Parliament, and to the same practice being continued after the session will have prorogued. Again, my hon. friend has stood the blow against responsible government, and in this, as in many other things, he has not been the faithful disciple of Joseph Howe, the father of responsible government in Nova Scotia.

My hon. friend advocated last year the removal of duties on farm implements to encourage and increase production. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing but a curt sentence in the speech of the hon. gentleman about any changes in the tariff: it is the last sentence. There are, he said, no changes in the tariff except the new taxes imposed on the people of Canada. The representatives of the western provinces have to be satisfied with that. My hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson) smiles. He confessed the other day that there was an agreement. I think the only agreement he was referring to was that which mulcted the newsprint manufacturers, and gave to my hon. friend and the press of this country cheaper newsprint during the elections and since.

The Acting Finance Minister also advocated last year the removal of duties on foodstuffs, and he stated that every other protectionist country had done it, that ours was the only one which deliberately undertook increased taxation on the actual necessaries of life. Here, again, the hon. gentleman will not remove the duties on foodstuffs; therefore I cannot congratulate him; he has not lived up to his pledges. But I can deeply sympathize with him; his burden is heavy, indeed. The net debt of Canada is, we are told, $1,200,000,000. It has increased, and is increasing at the rate of $13,000,000 a month. These figures are stupendous.

The population of Canada is only eight millions, and the per capita debt is now $125 or $625 per family of five. In March, 1914, before the outbreak of war, Canada's net debt was $335,996,000, and the total annual interest charges were $13,353,000 including $1,371,000 towards the repayment of the principal of the debt. The cost of carrying the debt was therefore slightly less than $1.70 per capita per year, while $10 or more per capita must be raised hereafter for debt and pensions. So I can well afford to offer to my hon. friend my heartfelt sympathy. The burden will be heavy on his shoulders. I think I am well advised, speaking on behalf of my electors, and of those of the Dominion, in telling my hon. friend that he must practise the strictest economy in the administration of our affairs. Greater men than my hon. friend have been Chancellors of the Exchequer. The grand old man, William Ewart Gladstone, delivered probably his best speeches when he was presenting the Budget of the British nation, and in one of those speeches he said:

> A Chancellor of the Exchequer must be prepared to be unpopular, he must learn how to say no to many requests which are made to him, he must be cheeseparing.

My hon. friend, with this stupendous national debt of Canada before his eyes, can well afford to be cheeseparing, as the great Gladstone was. As to ways of cutting down expenditure, I will put some cases to my hon. friend. I shall not recite the many grievances of His Majesty's loyal Opposition on account of the fearful leaks in the Administration. I will only mention three concrete cases. In these I appeal to the honesty of my hon. friend. Is it fair or right that Colonel Labatt, one of the members of the Board of Pension Commissioners, should receive a salary of, I think, $6,000 a year, plus a full pension which has been awarded to him? Is it fair or just that Colonel Bradbury, a former member of this House, who never went to the front, mind you, Mr. Speaker, but only crossed to England, who received the appointment as senator from the late Government, should, before being appointed, have exacted from the pensions board a life pension? I say that if my hon. friend has the same honesty of purpose which he had during the many years I had the honour of being his friend, he will see that these two pensions are wiped off the blue books of Canada. I say to my hon. friend that, like Diogenes of old, he must take his lantern, go into every department of the Government and cut and reduce, and be absolutely intractable on these reductions and cuttings.

The other day I happened to read the Ottawa Citizen—and I direct this matter to the attention of the right hon. gentleman in the absence of the Minister of Justice. I noticed that an expropriation case was pending before the supreme court of Canada concerning the river St. Charles in Quebec. By the way, I must congratulate my absent friend, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) upon the decision which he wisely took the other day to stop the works on the river St. Charles. This river St. Charles business was engineered by a few real estate speculators during the last Parliament. A few years ago a man by the name of Bélanger bought a piece of property—a beach lot; a few weeds growing under the water—for $18,200. It could not be used for building purposes, but he knew that some works might some day be carried out by the Government on the estuary of the river St. Charles. For this property which he bought for speculative purposes and which two years previous to the expropriation proceedings did not yield enough revenue to pay the taxes upon it, this gentleman, when expropriation proceedings were had, claimed from His Majesty the sum of $800,000. A judge of the exchequer court went to Quebec; witness after witness was heard. The Crown, I am sorry to say, did not follow up the case very closely, and the judge, who had to accept the evidence adduced before him, adjudicated in favour of Bélanger for the sum of $200,000, plus 10 per cent because of the forced expropriation, making a total of about $227,000. But in his judgment he said that it was with reluctance that he adjudicated for that amount. The case was appealed and came before the supreme court of Canada. My attention was directed to it because I read in the Ottawa Citizen that the judges had been astounded at the amount awarded by the exchequer court.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Was the case appealed by the Government?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, by the Crown. Mr. Bernier, a Tory candidate in one of the last elections, represented the Crown. When Mr. Bernier appeared before the supreme court with his factum, a copy of which I hold in my hand, he said that he appealed from the judgment only in respect of the 10 per cent—about $27,000—not in respect of the $200,000; he agreed that the Crown was quite satisfied to pay that amount to Bélanger. The judges of the supreme court were so shocked by the admission of the Crown, having regard to the reasons given in the judgment of the judge of the exchequer court, that they interrupted the proceedings and sought new instructions from the Minister of Justice. I do not know what these instructions were, but I thank Providence, not the Government, that the judges have their eyes wide open. I thank the supreme court of Canada for the service—the "potential" service—which they have rendered to the country. The Minister of Public Works said the other day that his department would stop the works at river St. Charles. I hope that the Crown will revert to the status quo ante and hand back to Bélanger his beach lot for which he paid $18,000, so that the Crown may keep for the boys at the front the $200,000 which was to have been paid for that property.

The Acting Minister of Finance will perhaps think that I am parochial—that is the expression he uses when he and I happen to differ. As a matter of fact, that was his rejoinder the other day when I pleaded for provincial rights in the matter of the Order affecting the borrowing powers of provincial governments. When I was pleading as a Canadian, and, surely, as a good Liberal, for provincial rights, my hon. friend answered, with a wave of his hand: "Oh, you are parochial." Since then, I moved for the papers on this subject; the return has been tabled, and I am pleased to inform the Acting Minister of Finance that with respect to that Order in Council restricting the borrowing powers of the provincial governments, Mr. Murray, of Nova Scotia, is with me; Sir William Hearst, of Ontario, is with me; Mr. Martin, of Saskatchewan, is with me; Mr. Stewart, of Alberta, is with me; all the champions of provincial rights are with me. Has my hon. friend, perchance, become an Imperialist? Because for an Imperialist, any one who happens to be only a little Canadian is at once labelled a parochialist. My hon. friend should know to what school of thought I belong. I belong to a school of thought which in years gone by stood for provincial rights in Canada—the school of Blake, of Mackenzie, of Laurier, of Fielding, too. In 1886 the present member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding), then the honoured Premier of Nova Scotia, on a parochial question such as I brought to my hon. friend's attention the other day—the question of better terms—moved for the secession of Nova Scotia from the Confederation. What is most surprising, after the motion had carried before the legislature by a vote of 15 to 7, it was approved by the people at the polls. I am parochial, like the Fielding of 1885, the Blake of the 80's, the Mackenzie of the 70's, the Joe Howe of the 50's. My hon. friend should be more generous when, taken to task on questions affecting the constitution, he happens not to share the views of his opponents.

Speaking on the tariff, the member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) said that an agreement had been made that no change should take place during the present emergency. I do not know whether he used exactly these words, but that is the meaning I gathered from his remarks in that connection.

I am glad to get the ear of my genial friend, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar). If it is true that such an agreement exists between the western Liberal members and the eastern protectionists in the Union Government, no one should boast of it. I say further, it is an abject agreement. The western Liberal members had no right to make such an agreement because the people, their masters, were not a party to it. My hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson) says that we are at war, and that because of the war we should not disturb the financial ring, the high protectionists of Toronto. We were at war last year, two years ago, and the western farmers without any hesitation advocated tariff changes. I have before me the farmer's platform of last year. Has my hon. friend from Springfield read that platform? Surely he has. Springfield is not an industrial centre. The name conveys the idea of a constituency of smiling farms. The farmers' platform of 1917 contains this plank on the tariff question:

Be it resolved that the Canadian Council of Agriculture, representing the organized farmers of Canada, urges that as a means of bringing about these much needed reforms and at the same time reducing the high cost of living, now proving such a burden on the people of Canada, our tariff laws shall be amended as follows:

1. By reducing the customs duty on goods imported from Great Britain to one-half the rates charged under the general tariff and that further gradual, uniform reductions be made in the remaining tariff on British imports that will insure complete free trade between Great Britain and Canada in five years.

2. That the reciprocity agreement of 1911, which still remains on the United States Statute books, be accepted by the Parliament of Canada.

I am glad to see my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) in his seat. May we not hear from him during this debate? What better exponent could we have of the principles underlying the reciprocity pact than the gentleman who prepared it, who negotiated it, who was defeated by the stampede of 1911, organized and paid for by the same financial ring and the same buccaneers who put the Union Government into office?

3. That all foodstuff not included in the reciprocity agreement be placed on the free list.

4. That agricultural implements, farm machinery, vehicles, fertilizer, coal, lumber, cement, illuminating fuel and lubricating oils be placed on the free list.

5. That the customs tariff on all the necessaries of life be materially reduced.

6. That all tariff concessions granted to other countries be immediately extended to Great Britain.

Last year we were at war, but the unshackled farmers of the western provinces did not enter into any pact or agreement with the Tories of the East to jeopardize the tariff reforms which they advocated. They spoke plainly and boldly, and the gentlemen who to-day say: well we cannot discuss this matter; we must not change this tariff; there has been an agreement—a fifty-fifty agreement—are not the true representatives of the western farmers. I have not consulted my friends on this side of the House, and I am speaking only for my humble self, but I make bold to say that, if the representatives of the western farmers, will move an amendment along the lines of the resolution passed by their masters in the West, the whole Liberal party will stand behind them. If the representatives of the western farmers are under an agreement not to discuss the tariff, not to change it, the protectionists disclaim any such arrangement, and they are not idle, they keep busy. The men who defeated reciprocity by the flag-flapping process are to-day entrenching themselves in their privileges. They are more active than ever. Let me read this circular:

Canadian Industrial Reconstruction Association.

We are at war. Our boys are fighting at the front. Our people are being bled white, but the protectionists of Toronto are doing business as usual. They are not idle as are the farmers' representatives in this House. Let me read some names, which are familiar:

Provisional Executive Committee: Hon. N. Curry, Senator; Huntley R. Drummond, Esq.; George E. Drummond, Esq.; J. H. Sherrard, Esq.; John F. Ellis, Esq.; W. K. George, Esq.; W .K. McNaught, C.M.G.; S. R. Parsons, Esq.; T. A. Russell, Esq.; Sir John Willison, et cetera, etc.

Yes, I may well say, etc., etc., after Sir John Willison's name. Hide-bound protectionists, all anti-reciprocity men, engineering at the present moment in the city of Toronto their pet scheme of higher tariff walls for after-war conditions. I shall not read the whole of the circular, but I must say that these gentlemen unhesitatingly speak for number one. First of all, they are against any higher taxation on profits. Secondly they say: you should raise the customs duties—in order to protect a little more their interests which are already so well protected. And finally they say: we must do as the United States will do after the war:

5 p.m.

Prices will be cut too far below the cost of production in order that the new industry of America fighting single-handed against the single-head German trust may be driven from the field. The German Government will take a practical hand in this contest, and only the combination of American manufacturers and the erection of a tariff wall of defence can prevent the Americans, if each fights single-handed and for his own end, from falling before the united, efficient and bitter assault of German trade rivals. Mr. Gerard's warning has as much significance for the people of Canada as it has for those of the United States.

My hon. friends who represent western constituencies after listening to what I have read, should be vigilant. Mr. Speaker, although there are in the Government as many Liberals as there are Conservatives, the influence of the magnates of Toronto is none the less paramount. I care for the reputation of my friends of Grit origin. They are astray at the present moment, but I hope that some day they may repent and see how they were duped by that coterie, the members of which I have just mentioned to the House.

Now a word about compulsory service. It is admitted on all sides that the Military Service Act has been a dismal failure. My hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Hocken), the editor of the Orange Sentinel, has spoken in laudatory terms which one would hardly expect from a rival journalist, of the Toronto Globe as the great exponent of Canadian ideals. He said that the Globe had always looked upon political questions with magnanimity and equanimity. I have nothing to say against the Globe; this is a free country, and we can hold what opinions we like. But, I wonder however, if my hon. friend read the Globe of June 15, 1916. If he did, he will know that the right hon. leader of the Opposition, and we who represent constituencies from Quebec, followed exactly the lead then given by the Globe on the question of compulsory service. This is what the Globe said:

No responsible Canadian statesman to whom the representative of the Crown could turn as a possible Premier would take office to enforce compulsory military service in the Dominion. Sir Robert Borden would not do it. Nor Sir Wilfrid Laurier. No man of eminence in either party would attempt what the recognized party leaders know and admit cannot be done. There are not less than three million people out of a total population of about eight millions in the Dominion who would resent fiercely the application to the men of military age among them of a law compelling enlistment for service in a European war.

Thus spoke the Globe. And we Liberals said Amen; the Globe is talking common sense; it is uttering a truism when it says that no man can successfully enforce compulsory service in a country like Canada. But the Globe afterwards suddenly altered its course, and we on this side of the House when faced with the issue insidiously raised by the right hon. leader of the Government, asked for a referendum. The answer of the Government was the passing of the most demoralizing piece of legislation which has ever disgraced the annals of a British Parliament. The Government forced through the War-time Elections Act, and started the campaign of hysteria the results of which we know only to well. The dice were loaded; the jury was packed. It is true that a coalition was offered to the right hon. leader of the Opposition in the dying days of last session, but we know under what circumstances. The right hon. the Prime Minister should have known that one of the attainments of the right hon. leader of the Opposition is his profound knowledge, not only of British politics, but of English literature and British parliamentary history. The right hon. leader of the Opposition knew there had been a coalition under George III between Newcastle and Pitt, and being a great student, he had read Macaulay's description of that coalition, when "the vilest arts of corruption were wedded to stainless integrity." Macaulay says:

> Newcastle brought to the coalition a vast mass of power . . . The public offices, the church, the courts of law, the army, the navy, the diplomatic service, swarmed with his creatures . . . . Pitt, on the other hand, had what Newcastle wanted, an eloquence which stirred the passions and charmed the imagination, a high reputation for purity and the confidence and ardent love of millions.
> Newcastle took the treasury, the civil and ecclesiastical patronage, and the disposal of that part of the secret service money which was then employed in bribing members of Parliament. Pitt was Secretary of State, with the direction of the war and of foreign affairs. Thus the filth of all the noisome and pestilential sewers of government was poured into one channel. Through the other passed only what was bright and stainless.

I repeat that the venerable leader of the Liberal party, when the Prime Minister made his offer of a coalition Government, remembered what happened to Pitt. He knew that Pitt's alliance with Newcastle led to Pitt's downfall, and he refused the offer of the Prime Minister. There is, however, a coalition to-day, or a Union Government based on self-interest, and formed on a fifty-fifty basis. But that coalition will not last. It won the election on the shallow pretext of winning the war. I am told by my hon. friend from Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) that in this Government there are no Grits and no Tories. My hon. friend is labouring under a delusion. There is a Tory party to-day, and the Government is a Tory Government. Otherwise we should not have the junta we have in Canada governing by Orders in Council under the War Measures Act, governing with the aid of the profiteers and the flag-flappers. But the most serious thing of all is that the Tory Government has shattered national unity in Canada, because the country has been deceived. Pledges and promises have been made to the French Canadians on the one hand, and to the Ontario farmers on the other. The Government has been riding the old pair of horses, the Catholic and the Protestant. But we know what will happen when that delegation of farmers, two thousand strong, arrives in Ottawa on the 14th of May next. I say the farmers were deceived. The Government had recourse to all the expedients of a good old Tory campaign. They first of all showed their best cards, one of them was a four-flusher in the person of Lord Northcliffe. He came to Canada and said:

> It is known to economists that the world's supply of food is not sufficient to feed the world's armies and the civilian population, too.

Right here in Ottawa he said:

> Owing to the shortage of labour caused by the war, labour has been taken away from the farm, which has produced varying harvests with the result that there is a world shortage of food.

The food controller, Mr. Hanna said:

> Labour must be supplied to the farms by the cities in time of war when labour is scarce. Canada is the base of supplies. Canada must not fail. Canada must produce.

Naturally, the farmers of Ontario said: we will vote for this Government which urges us to produce for the boys at the front. The then Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Burrell) repeated the same thing in the leaflets which he issued. With all these appeals, pledges and promises, the Unionist Government carried the election. But, to-day they have changed their minds. To-day it is man-power, not food production, that is needed. Sir, it is a long lane that has no turning. Because the French Canadian habitant would not be bullied in the ranks he was said to be shirking. Because the province of Quebec is a rural province, affording no such basis for recruiting as the industrial province of Ontario, Quebec was labelled as disloyal. Because the French Canadians have been for 300 years on this continent, have no link with Europe and may not have the same reason to cross the Atlantic and join their fellow-men on the battlefields as have British-born or Anglo-Canadians, they are called slackers. It is now found after the tornado of last December, after all the flag waving, after all the money spent in insulting placards, that the Quebec habitant and the Ontario farmer think exactly alike.

Let me say one more word as to the spirit of Quebec on the question of service in this war. The people of Quebec are a God-fearing, law-abiding, liberty-loving people. They protested against the passing of this conscription measure through closure. There were a few riots, not engineered by the people of Quebec but engineered by agents provocateurs, some of whom were paid by the Department of Justice. The sober minded people of Quebec never thought of rioting or revolting. There is only one instance, in recent years not of a riot, but of a revolt against one of His Majesty's statutes passed by this Parliament. In the eighties when the Parliament of this Dominion sanctioned the Canadian Pacific contract, there was a clause known as the monopoly clause. The people, and legislature of Manitoba protested against that monopoly clause, and when they had exhausted all their protests in a constitutional way, the people of Manitoba—the Britishers of Manitoba,—armed themselves with rifles and guns, met the sheriffs despatched at Winnipeg by the Government at Ottawa and thus resisted His Majesty. That is the only instance of revolt against a statute of His Majesty's Government. The people of Quebec never revolted. They protested, as it was their right to protest, but now that the law has been embalmed on the statute book, out of respect to the majesty of the law, the people of Quebec will obey it. They will do their duty, all their duty, and they will do it with credit to themselves and to their native land.

The arguments which were advanced by the Quebec people against the passing of conscription were the same arguments as those which are being advanced to-day by the Ontario farmers, which are being advanced sub rosa by representatives of farming constituencies in this House, and which are being advanced by the committee on agriculture. Let me read a resolution which was unanimously passed the other day by the Unionist members of that committee:

> That in the opinion of the committee on agriculture the Minister of Militia should be requested to order:
> (a) That actual farmers who have been called up shall be given leave of absence and
> (b) That no actual farmers be required to report until all others in the class affected by the Order in Council of April 20th, 1918, have been put in service; such leave of absence and delay in reporting to be conditioned upon their actual employment in farming.

So that, Mr. Speaker, Quebec is being vindicated.

Mr. PEDLOW: Is that a resolution which was actually passed by men who voted down the amendment in this House in favour of exempting farmers?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I say "yes" to my hon. friend, and what is most tragic is that the committee had put themselves into communication with the various Ministers of Agriculture, not only in Quebec—the Quebec minister was asked his opinion only at the last moment—but in all the provinces. This resolution was endorsed by the Minister of Agriculture in the province of Ontario, who said: "Yes, we want all our farmers on the farm." It was also endorsed by the Ministers of Agriculture of the other provinces which had elected Unionist members at the last election. So there is reflected in that resolution the unbiased, the unshackled opinion of the honest people of this country. Not only are we vindicated by the members of this House, by the committee on agriculture, but we are also vindicated by one of the ministers, the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne). The minister has lived in Quebec all his life, he was born there, and I am proud to say that his brother is one of my electors. That hon. gentleman, speaking in Montreal on Friday last, said:

> Mr. Ballantyne praised Quebec's way of answering to the call, stating that while its attitude towards the Military Service Act was not the same as that of many in the country, there was no more loyal province in the Dominion. He also paid his respects to the fighting qualities of the French Canadian, and thanked Archbishop Bruchesi—

Is my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Hocken) here?

> —for the great assistance he had given throughout the war.

I would like to sprinkle my hon. friend of the Orange Sentinel with holy water.

In conclusion, let me say that we must all help win the war and we on this side of the House are ready to accept our share of the financial burden which Canada must face. We forgive the discreditable arguments used by most of the press of the Unionist party during the last campaign. Indeed, after the battle was over, surveying the debris on the battlefield, we found here and there, many glittering stillettoes still dripping in blood, daggers, Rogers knives, etc., etc., constituting a collection which many a rogues' gallery might well envy. Those were the weapons that had been aimed at the breast of the right hon. and venerable leader of the Opposition. But thank Heaven, he is still living, and the banner of true Liberalism is still floating over this Dominion. We can well afford to exclaim: "All is lost but honour." I wish that every leader of a Canadian political party could say the same. Sir, in one of his great Midlothian campaign speeches Mr. Gladstone used the following words:

> We cannot reckon on the wealth of the country, nor upon the rank of the country, nor upon the influence which rank and wealth usually bring. In the main these powers are against us, for wherever there is a close corporation, wherever there is a spirit of organized monopoly, wherever there is a narrow and sectional interest apart from that of the country, and desiring to be set up above the interest of the public, there, gentlemen, we, the Liberal party, have no friendship and no tolerance to expect.

Above all these, and behind all these, there is something greater than these—there is the nation itself—The nation is a power hard to rouse, but when roused, harder still and more hopeless to resist.

These eloquent words admirably reflect the attitude of the Liberal party, and, we believe, the ultimate unbiased and undaunted spirit of the Canadian people.

My last words must be essentially Canadian. I gather from the newspapers that some ministers are at the present time scheming—yes, if my information is right, scheming—an ex parte trip to London. But the Prime Minister is not going, and I am glad that he is not going, to London. At the present time he can well afford to follow the example of General Botha; his presence is urgently required in Canada as the leader of the nation. I am told that the Minister of the Interior and the President of the Council are going together to the English metropolis. Why that association? I would be suspicious if I were one of the other ministers. Is Beaufort going to London? Is the famous secretarial organization going to London? Perhaps my hon. friend from Russell may have something to communicate to the House in that regard. I have read somewhere that Caesar was always suspicious of the pale man. I also am suspicious of that pale pair travelling together, and if I were a member of the Cabinet I would ask my hon. friends, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Minister of Public Works, to accompany them. Why give the two ministers to whom I have referred, a monopoly of the loyalty of Canada in London? Why not the Minister of Labour, for instance? Why not my good friend the Secretary of State, who doubtless would be glad to see his native land, because I know that he is British-born. I spoke with him once at a St. George's Society dinner in Montreal, when I tried to explain to him that St. George when he killed the dragon did not kill the Tory party. Sir, the duty of a minister of the Crown at the present time does not lie in joy-riding in London. We have a minister there in the person of Sir Edward Kemp, we have a High Commissioner there in the person of Sir George Perley. Lord Milner does not care to see those gentlemen, nor Lloyd George either; let them stay at their post. My hon. friend the President of the Council should rather go into the county of Durham this summer and spend his vacations there among the farmers, cajoling them to allow their sons to be conscripted. Moreover the Imperialistic dreams of the Round Table clubs and jingo associations, of which we have counterparts in Canada have had their day in England. The rising and predominating influence over there is the Labour party, and the Canadian jingoes will get very little comfort from that source. Let them read, learn and inwardly digest the following words from the leader of that great party. Speaking about the persistent jingo conspiracy against the autonomy of the Dominions, Mr. Henderson said:

With regard to that great Commonwealth of all races, all colours, all religions, and all degrees of civilization, that we call the British Empire, the Labour Party stands for its maintenance and its progressive development on the lines of Local Autonomy and "Home Rule All Round"; the fullest respect for the rights of each people, whatever its colour, to all the Democratic Self-Government of which it is capable, and to the proceeds of its own toil upon the resources of its own territorial home; and the closest possible co-operation among all the various members of what has become essentially not an Empire in the old sense, but a Britannic Alliance. We desire to maintain the most intimate relations with the Labour Parties overseas. Like them, we have no sympathy with the projects of "Imperial Federation," in so far as these imply the subjection to a common Imperial Legislature wielding coercive power, (including dangerous facilities for coercive Imperial taxation and for enforced military service), either of the existing Self-Governing Dominions, whose autonomy would be thereby invaded; or of the United Kingdom, whose freedom of Democratic self-development would be thereby hampered; or of India and the Colonial Dependencies, which would thereby run the risk of being further exploited for the benefit of a "White Empire." We do not intend, by any such "Imperial Senate" either to bring the plutocracy of Canada and South Africa to the aid of the British aristocracy, or to enable the landlords and financiers of the Mother Country to unite in controlling the growing Popular Democracies overseas. The absolute autonomy of each self-governing part of the Empire must be maintained intact.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, to have spoken at such length, but I thought that this was the proper time to utter the words which I have spoken, in order, in company with my fellow-members, to place the sentiments of my race rightly before the people of this country. As was said so eloquently the other day by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) no press has been debauched to present only one side of the case for us; no press has been bought to defend the French Canadians. This Parliament is our only forum.

In conclusion, let me say on behalf of my compatriots that their national creed can be summed up in one sentence: Credo in unam patriam.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, we have just had a confession on the part of the hon. member (Mr. Lemieux) who has resumed his seat that he is sorry he spoke so long. I think I should like to give him the assurance that he is not nearly so sorry as the House is.

Mr. McKENZIE: We are not sorry if you are.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: My hon. friend from Cape Breton gives at the same moment a beautiful example of his want of self-restraint and of his egotism. He mistakes himself for the House.

Mr. McKENZIE: I never mistake you for anybody else.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I am sorry indeed that the chief lieutenant of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) should, so early in the speech of an opponent, who has been left only twenty-five minutes to reply to a speech of an hour and three-quarters, so far forget his duties and courtesy as to interrupt to the extent that the Speaker has had to rebuke him. I hope my hon. friend will in future exercise greater courtesy.

I am quite sure that neither the House, nor any one else outside it who knows me, will expect me to dwell long upon the first portion of the speech of the hon. gentleman from Maisonneuve. Indeed, Sir, it is not my intention to speak long at all, because I think it will be a fair criticism of his speech as a whole to say that the ideas contained in it were in inverse proportion as to number to the vociferousness with which it was propounded. I want to say in all honesty that I have never risen to reply to a speech which required so much time to deliver and which contained so little. When my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) ventured, in what I think was a very gentlemanly and courteous speech—a speech which certainly did not show any of the bitterness which he was advised not to cultivate by the gentleman to whose speech we have just listened and which was not itself quite free from bitterness—when he (Mr. Hocken), ventured to give his political opponents certain advice which he thought really would make for the unity of Canada, my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) retorted in kind and gave the hon. gentleman from Toronto advice as to what he thought Quebec might expect from Ontario. Well, if I could do it with due modesty I might, as a distant westerner, venture to give both hon. gentlemen some advice as to what would be best for the whole of Canada. I think I should do it in this way: I should remind my hon. friend from Maisonneuve, who is a great reader, that it has been established before commissions both in Belgium and in France, that priests caught by the modern Huns at the head of the greatest military force that this world has ever seen, have been stripped in passing a pig sty, and the pig has been taken out and the priests put back naked in its place. Before the same commissions it has been established that women have been outraged until they died, by man after man from the same army. And if my voice—and I say it in all honesty, Sir—could reach the remotest nook and cranny of the province of Quebec to-day, I would try to say in all kindness but in all sincerity: It is the altars of your faith that are being outraged and desecrated; it is the children learning to prattle your tongue who are being mutilated; it is the civilians of Belgium and of France who, against all international law, are being shot. I make the appeal to my hon. friend in the presence of these facts; what good can come of an altercation on matters of religious sectarianism when there is a cause like that to champion? That is all I need to say, I think, and I do in all sincerity and kindness, on the first forty minutes of my hon. friend's speech.

The men in the trenches are not bothering themselves about a single sentence or a single thought that was contained in the first forty minutes of his speech. They realize too well that the civilization and the freedom of the world are at stake, and Catholics and Protestants are meeting the foe breast to breast and not fighting with one another about matters which are not worth the wind I have spent upon them, or the tremendous hurricane which raged in the speech of the hon. member for Maisonneuve

My hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) said there had been no change in the Government; that the Government in power now is the old Government. That was his charge. Well, at the beginning of last summer my hon. friend was confident that he would beat the old Government, and what was the infusion of strength which made the Union Government do to him and to his friends what has happened to them? That was some change, anyhow, from my hon. friend's confident expectations. Why, my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), I believe, was in his heart already Minister of Justice in the new Government to be.

Mr. McKENZIE: I follow my profession; that is more than you do.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: There must have been an infusion of new blood and new ideas of some kind. Is woman suffrage for the whole of the Dominion of Canada an illiberal idea? If it be a Liberal idea it must have been the infusion of new blood that produced the legislation brought down this session, which was passed in spite of the almost unanimous opposition of hon. gentlemen opposite. True it did not have the absolute opposition of my hon. friend from Maisonneuve, because he told us, having learned at the feet of the right hon. gentleman so near to him, that he was a woman suffragist, or would be, in Alberta, but he could not be in Quebec. Well, that was a lesson which I say had been learned from some one who was well able to teach him that method of playing the political game.

I could give other illustrations to show that a change has occurred. Last summer we had an Opposition that held up the House for eight months, confident of coming victory at the polls, and this year we have an Opposition which are barely able to hold it up for eight weeks, and who have had all the fight knocked out of them. That is a change.

As I said, I would like to take the liberty, as a westerner, of saying something both to my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) and to my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Hocken). They gave advice to one another. I will give them some information, anyhow. Having sat with my hon. friend from Maisonneuve for years, and having, I think, deserved the encomium, which I appreciated very much, from my hon friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) the other day, who does not agree with me on the subject of the tariff; I think I can claim the credit of what he says: that I have been a persistent and consistent advocate of free trade in this House. No honest man opposite will deny that. But what amazes me is the extent to which the opposite side has now been permeated with free trade and direct taxation ideas, notwithstanding my absolute want of success to produce any effects along these lines while I sat amongst them. They now want low tariff. They say that it is wrong to have an agreement on the tariff. Well, in the time of the Government of which my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) was a member there was an agreement on the tariff comparable to his views on woman suffrage; that is to say, the members of the Cabinet, including the leader of it, were protectionists in the East and free traders in the West. That is an historical fact; there is no getting away from it. I have to say this about an agreement on the tariff. I know nothing about such an agreement as the one that has been spoken of, but I have not the least doubt that this Government will show themselves as strong to proceed along good lines as they have shown themselves able to take good lines to start with.

If a study of war conditions as they arise leads this Government to see the wisdom of introducing more direct taxation and lower tariff, I believe that the change of Government—a change which my hon. friend denies—consists in this very fact: that they will show their strength by reducing tariff and by introducing more direct taxation. But imagine the member for Maisonneuve coming here as an advocate for low tariff. Why, Sir, I conducted a missionary enterprise of persistency and consistency for years in the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite. When they were in power and I sat in the colony and made attempts at their education, the moment I mentioned the rights of the farmers, or anything relating to low tariff, I want it recorded as my distinct impression that I saw nothing but frowns on their faces. And the reason was this: they came into power in 1896 practically a professing free trade party. They certainly did take the duty off cream separators. Mr. Speaker, I worked that free cream separator on western platforms until my arm was absolutely aching. They took the duty off binder twine. Sir, I threaded binder twine until there was not a fibre left between my fingers. They introduced the British preference, and as long as I could I kept trying to defend my own consistency for sitting in such a Liberal party by praising the British preference, turning the free cream separator, and fraying binder twine. That having been done, what is their little subsequent record? After their early attempts at tariff reduction, hon. gentlemen sat back, enjoying luxurious office, drawing their salaries with promptitude, and basking in the smiles of those gentlemen whom I would never describe as buccaneers—basking in the smiles of those buccaneers and companies that my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) denounced this afternoon in a voice which reared itself to the skies.

And what about direct taxation? There are only two things about free trade: one is lower tariff, the other direct taxation. What is the record of my hon. friends opposite with regard to direct taxation? I am not ashamed of my own. On August 20th, 1914, before the war was three weeks old, I stood in my place in the old House and advised the Government of the day to put on an income tax at once, beginning with incomes of $1,500, and making it a very high tax on the larger incomes. What support did I get from the Liberal party, amongst whom I was sitting? The only vocal support I got was from the labour member for South Cape Breton, Mr. Carroll, and from my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works in the present Government (Mr. Carvell). These were the only sources from which I got any vocal support of my advocacy of direct taxation at that time. Yet my hon. friend begins with a criticism—with which I am in agreement; I shall never hide it—of this Government because they are not going far enough along the line of direct taxation.

There were other chances of examining into what the country had to expect along the line of direct taxation from hon. gentlemen opposite if they had carried it out at this particular time. It is to be said to the credit of the last Government that they took my advice. They were too late in taking it; they should have taken it when I suggested it, because it was good policy at that time as it is now. But there was not enough support behind me from the Opposition benches to get them to adopt it then. They afterwards introduced very drastic business profits taxes which have been largely imitated in the United States and in Great Britain. What was the attitude of my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) with regard to those business taxes? Was he vociferous in their support at that time, or was he coquetting with the buccaneers and corporations? I leave the question to my hon. friend and his conscience. But we all know what the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite was. They sat night after night and smiled approval on my late lamented political friend from Pictou (Mr. E. M. Macdonald)—who led my right hon. friend to the edge of the precipice and then ran away so that he himself should not tumble over—they smiled approval on his opposition day in and day out to that very drastic direct taxation. I do not think I need to say any more to explain to my hon. friends where they are so far as western Canada is concerned. Western Canada did not quite believe in their sincerity, because western Canada knew their record. If there was anything outside the intense patriotic enthusiasm of the West that led to the remarkable results of the last election—in what I claim to be the most progressive part of this country, whether you have regard to woman suffrage or to lower tariff—it was a knowledge of that record, and the disbelief, which it was impossible to avoid in a reflective mind, that the present professions of these gentlemen of belief in direct taxation, freer trade and lower tariff would have any other results than followed the promises that were given before 1896. It was not for professions of that kind that the stalwart men of Canada were going to do what they believed they would be doing if they took any other course than they did—deserting the boys in the trenches for a mess of porridge—and that only possible porridge.

I do not think there was in my hon. friend's speech anything else that needs any answer, and I do not think there was much else that I do not approve of. If the House would have patience with me, I think that in a very few minutes I could get through with what I have to say.

An hon. MEMBER: Call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (resuming): Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to make a little further criticism of the speech of my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), I should like to summarize, if I am able, the points at which I hinted this afternoon. That speech in my judgment had two cardinal faults. In the first place, it was made in apparent oblivion of the great events that are happening in the world today. From anything my hon friend said from the beginning to the end of his speech he might have been unconscious that thrones are toppling, that empires are falling and that all the freest nations of Europe in conjunction with the free outlying commonwealths of the British Empire are now joined with the most pacific but perhaps the greatest country in the world, the United States of America, all of them filled with the consciousness of the events which my hon. friend forgot—filled with the consciousness, not that the British Empire is in danger, which of course it is, but that the military power opposed to us is struggling, not for the defeat of any given one of these free nations, but for the abolition of the very idea of freedom from the face of the earth. The hon. gentleman who is suffering from such apparent oblivion—I do not want to be too harsh with him—naturally lapsed into the second great fault of his speech. For an hour and three-quarters he talked, and I appeal to any reasonable and fair-minded man opposite—and there are many of them; some of them I rejoice to know as old friends and some as newer friends, to point to a single sentence in that speech which was not saturated with partyism from beginning to end; it was purely a partisan speech. Of course, to make a party speech under such conditions as prevail in the world to-day comes perfectly natural to a gentleman who even deceives himself into the notion that he is one of the true Simon-pure Liberals remaining in the world to-day, and forgets there is one place and one place only where the battle of Liberalism is being fought to-day, and that is on the continent of Europe. My friends opposite say they are Liberals.

Mr. RICHARDSON: The remnant of them.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I object to their dreaming for a moment that they are even a remnant of the Liberal party. The fact of the matter is they are not Liberals, they are not democrats. For this simple reason—that their attitude, the attitude displayed by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve this afternoon, of pure partyism, unforgetfulness, overlooks the fact that if Democracy is beaten in Europe, Liberalism, real Liberalism, and real freedom disappears from the world. The hon. member for Maisonneuve allows his partyism to carry him so far that he tries to prove to this House, and probably wants to prove to the country, that we have the same Government in power now that we had last summer, that there has been no change in the Government, that there are still nothing but Liberals and Tories. Every one who sits with my hon. friend and votes against woman suffrage and talks as they did twenty years ago about lowering the tariff, which they did not do—everything of that sort is Liberal, everything else is Tory. If my hon. friend had been in his place I would have put a very simple test to his narrow partisan view of the events that are taking place in the world. I would have just asked him in a single sentence: "Is every member of the American nation a Tory?" Almost every man of intelligence in that Republic, whether he was formerly a Republican or a Democrat in the party sense, has forgotten that party ever existed, and they are all to-day standing together behind President Wilson. And the party sitting here are the men in Canada who forgot the same thing, forgot whether they were Liberals or Tories, and they swept the Dominion outside of one province. That is my answer to my hon. friend's taunt that there has been no change of Government. The change is one that may go further in this country, and far further in the world, than he has ever begun to dream of.

The Union Government is a new combination. It is a combination of all the best forces that have grasped the events in the world in the way I have just tried to describe, and if they will keep grasping those events, and keep studying the results that are likely to come out of them, and keep watching the events that do come out of them, they will rule Canada for many a long day. For one reason, what would you put in their place, Mr. Speaker? I trust my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will live until he is a hundred and twenty, but I cannot help my imagination sometimes enabling me to wonder what the Opposition would look like if he were taken away by the hand of Time. There is no possibility of making a Government to govern Canada or any other progressive country out of the elements that took a day to prove that woman suffrage was a bad thing, a very wrong thing according to the Book of Leviticus or something that was written even earlier than that. How far such thinkers are removed from the current of present day events, from the tremendous need of the fight that is going on in the world, from the colossal events which in some senses it is a privilege to live through, and which events will become more colossal before we are very much older.

If I wanted to illustrate how much this Union Government transcends, from the point of view I have been trying to bring before the House, the party governments which have largely ruled in this country during the past half century, I should take the simple method of referring to the events of this brief session. But before doing that, I would remind hon. members that a party came into power in this country in 1896 and held power for fifteen years. I was not a citizen of Canada before that time, but I have talked with many intelligent citizens of this country who watched the events of those years carefully, and it is a moot point, according to the evidence I have gathered as carefully as I can, whether of the platform convention of 1893, from which the chief lieutenant of the Liberal party read at large the other night—it is a moot point whether there was no plank of that platform honoured or only one. I have never heard anybody claim that there were two. That is the way that Government honoured its mandate. Then there was a Government came into power in this country in 1911, a party Government of the other description, and they were not very strong on fulfilling their mandate either. My hon. friends around me must just take the truth in season as it comes to my recollection. That is how party government has carried out the mandate of the people. I said a moment ago that we have been in session for two months. What advantage does the Union Government show over the party government that preceded it? In these two months they have shown the most utter earnestness in endeavouring to make a fair start to carry out the mandate which was given them by the people. Take the subsidiary points in the programme that was brought before the people last autumn. There was abolition of patronage. I am glad to say that my correspondence has dwindled almost to the vanishing point because the people are already learning that the Government is going to govern in so far as patronage is concerned, and is going to govern on a very different principle from getting a member to toady around a minister and ask him if he will do this or that, because that is the definition of patronage. In other words, the Government have made a most honest start and endeavour to abolish patronage by putting all appointments to the Civil Service, and all other services in the State, upon the platform of principle and taking them off the platform of party.

There is another question which I have referred to more than once. It is difficult to believe it possible, but some members on this side of the House have chided the Government in conversation with me because they introduced woman suffrage in the first session of this Parliament. I have said to them: "Do not open your mouth along those lines, because that is the most charming thing that the Government have done." They have taken this great step in broadening the franchise in this country in the first session of Parliament after they had promised the people that they would do so. These I can refer to as subsidiary points in the platform of the Government and in the mandate they got from the people.

There cannot be any successful denial of the fact that the main proposition put before the country—as far as my part of the country is concerned, and I do not think it was different in any other part of the country—was that this war was of such transcendent and overwhelming importance that it was necessary to mobilize the man power and the material power of the country to enable Canada to do her full and proper share in the winning of the war. That policy did not appeal to the party opposite, or the method of pursuing that policy in Britain, in France, in America, did not appeal to them, which is pretty well the same thing. They opposed in reality, if in unconsciousness, the only method by which the man and material power of the country could be mobilized. It is true we had the criticism from the right hon. the leader of the Opposition that the Government was conscripting the man power of the country and not conscripting the money power. If that had been true I still would have voted for Union Government because, from what I could see of my right hon. friend's policy, he would not have conscripted anything, and half a loaf is better than no bread. But, I do not think it is strictly true. In regard to the man power of the country, the party opposite stand where they did, except that they do not fight the further application of compulsory military service with anything like the keenness they did last year, and I beg to say to you, Sir, that I think it is very greatly to their credit, it shows that their psychology has been somewhat affected at any rate by the tremendous offensive on the western battlefront in Europe. No one but a child could fail to appreciate what that offensive means to the world. We heard of this military power, ad nauseum, as the greatest military power that the world had ever seen, and can anybody doubt it? They swept into Belgium and France, to begin with, and they nearly gained their objective of Paris before being held up. On the eastern front they went through with incredible swiftness and ran the enormous Russian armies back beyond Tannenberg. That was in the first autumn of the war. In the next autumn of the war they swept over a little country like Serbia and squeezed it like a small sponge. In the next autumn of the war they did the same with Rumania. Last autumn they hurried south and swept Italy backward in the same way. I want to put the question very seriously to my hon. friends: What remains? I will tell them. The last front of freedom in the world is that held by Britishers and equally by glorious, bleeding, but still unbeatable and triumphant Frenchmen. What are we in Canada to do in face of circumstances like that? What becomes of the strategy of my hon. friends in my own province? They had all become strategists, and they showed us that minor individuals like General Haig and Mr. Lloyd George did not really know anything about the facts of the situation, and that there was no need of men in Europe at all. "What you want is wheat." What would all the wheat in the world have done to save us from the results of that offensive if the men had not been there, and what advantage would it be at the present time if you had multiplied your production tenfold if they were not now there? You must realize that if that one last bulwark of freedom were swept aside you need not bother any more about what you are going to produce in Canada, because the Germans will direct you what to do.

Now, I admitted a moment ago that the psychology of hon. gentlemen opposite has evidently been affected somewhat, but they have still, apparently, a very small appreciation of the situation as I have tried to describe it, and as I claim it to exist, because, only a few weeks ago, we were favoured with a repetition of the arguments of last year, full of that party stuff about breaking our pledges to farmers in regard to exemptions. That does not bother me a moment, and it will not bother the western farmers, because they appreciate the situation. Why should it, in the light of the statement I have just made?—for, evidently, there will be no farming to do except under autocratic rulers if we do not send the men. That is what the Government was confronted with in the fulfilment of half of what I would call the major portion of their programme for which they got such a magnificent mandate from the people. If it were understood that the Government were going to exempt the farmers, they might turn on hon. gentlemen opposite and say they are the men who are to blame for the Government's pledge, because they told us there was no need of men. But no man with his eyes open to the course of events would argue that to-day. The need of men was obvious, it was pressing. But the Government broke its pledge, my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) says. Yes, but it kept its eye fixed on the goal of victory and the need of men.

Now I think I have made out a very good case for the fact that there is a Union Government, as distinguished from a party government, up to now—a very good case. But I have to be fair to myself and to my convictions, and to carry the actual facts of the case just a little further. I want to say that the Government was equally pledged, as far as I understood their position—I certainly was, and every man from the West was, I think—to mobilize the material power, the money power, of the country, as well as the man power, and in so far as it is made from non-party motives I appreciate the point of view that was so well put by my hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) the other day, and was put not quite so well by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) this afternoon. I appreciate the point of view; I appreciate the criticism, and I am going to extend it a little. And when I come to speak of the Budget I am bound to say that, just as I have tried to point out the reasons why a very great change in the thought and attitude of hon. members opposite is necessary before they will be entrusted with power by the people of this country, so it is true from my point of view that the Government, this Union Government, which, after all, is only human, has fallen down a little on its Budget. I do not refer to the non-reduction of the tariff. Personally I hold the same views about trade matters as I ever did; I suppose I am the only man here who is really open to the accusation of being fully deserving of the madhouse in regard to them, but still they are fully shared by most of my countrymen in the little land from which I come. I have been a strong free trader all my life, and I hold my free trade views still, but I want to repeat what I said this afternoon: that the Unionist Government has given evidence already of its determination with full strength of purpose to do the best things to carry out its programme and to fulfil the orders that were given it by the people. I have so much confidence that the members of the Government are alive to the events that are taking place in the world, and so much confidence also in their intellect, that they will see and be alert in repairing anything in regard to the tariff that needs to be repaired in the next session of Parliament, if not in this. I believe that all the countries at war will not go in the direction that some people are looking for, a war of imperial zollvereins and protection. I will tell you why I believe it. What is it we are all fighting for, Sir? We are fighting for the triumph of democracy in all the advanced nations in the world, or in all the world, and it is inconceivable in thought that the triumph of that democracy and the introduction of the principle of human brotherhood can lead the free peoples of the world in the direction of fighting a trade war after they have abolished military war forever. That is my view, and I venture to base a prophecy upon it—that you will have a movement of world opinion and world action along those lines. If that is to come about it will come about in this country at the hands of the Government, because Union Government is a reality, in spite of what my hon. friend from Maisonneuve says, and it is composed of men in whose ability and integrity I have the highest confidence. It will be quick to catch the signs of the times and the needs of our nation. I shall very likely live to see far more lowering of the tariff under a Unionist Government than I ever saw under a Liberal one—and that might not be much either.

Now I come to the point of the conscription of wealth, so-called. Well, I think a wise Government, Sir, will be led by the force of events to go a considerable direction in the way of conscription of wealth further than this Government has been led now. Because, in the first place, we will have to copy the wisdom of the other great nations with which we are allied in this contest; and in the second place, if we do not go further than we have gone now in a wise direction towards the conscription of wealth, forces will be let loose in the world, after this triumph of democracy for which we are conscientiously fighting—forces will be let loose which will be anarchistic forces, which will be socialistic forces, and instead of taking a great deal of the income of the rich man they will take all he has got. That is my contribution to prophecy along this line.

I want to say on this point candidly—and I apologize for keeping the House so long—that I do not believe the Government has gone as far as it should with its income tax. I do not believe in a levy on capital, although there are many people in the West looking to the possibility of that after the war—many people are looking to it and believe it will come to a considerable extent. I believe the proper thing is to get as much of the money as you possibly can for carrying on the war by means of an income tax, just as they are doing in the United States, and as they are doing to a very much greater extent in Great Britain. I repeat that I do not think the Government has gone far enough in this matter, and I believe public opinion will compel it to go further at the next session of Parliament. It is impossible, of course, as has been said again and again, to make anything like an equality of sacrifice possible in this war. I met a man, within the last few days, who came into the town of Medicine Hat a few days after war broke out, from a ranch some distance out in the country. He was a South African veteran, and seeing a crowd around a building he asked what was the matter. They told him there was a war on. His hired man was with him, and he said: "Take the wagon back to the farm and tell the wife I will come back after I have done my bit towards beating Germany." That was in the first part of the war, and he came back this week. He went to the war prepared to lose his life, if necessary. I know of other cases, well authenticated cases, in the northern part of my province, of men who left their rich farms with cattle and horses, allowed the horses and the cattle to roam the prairies, went to the front and have lost their lives. I know of one man in particular—and this is also a well authenticated case—who after being wounded three times returned to the battle line. He was killed—struck in the middle of the body by a shell and had both his legs blown off. There is no amount of money that we can pay, the richest of us, that will make us equal in sacrifice to what these men have done. But surely the argument is made stronger by that very consideration, for a Government going as far as it is possible, in accordance with sound economic thinking and the economic condition of the country, to make the sacrifice of those who are left at home as great as possible along the line of the giving of wealth. If we compare the Budget, that my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) introduced the other day in a speech of conspicuous ability, with what they are doing in Britain, the comparison compels me again to think that this Government has not gone far enough. In the year 1916 Lloyd George had predicted a total revenue in England of five hundred million pounds. As the House well knows, nearly all the taxation in England is raised directly. Well, the English people did better than Lloyd George, who at that time held the position of Chancellor of the Exchequer, anticipated. They raised five hundred and seventy million pounds—$2,800,000,000—in the year 1916, almost entirely by direct taxation.

We are, roughly, rather more than a seventh of the population of Great Britain and Ireland. A very simple sum in division, seven into twenty-eight, would have told my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Finance a simple method by which he could have raised $400,000,000 for next year, and he only wants $280,000,000—he is not a very greedy chancellor compared with those they have in Great Britain. He wants $280,000,000, and he proposes to raise it by borrowing from the people of Canada. If he had made his taxes as high as they are in Britain, and provided the people here are as rich as are the people there—I suppose they are richer in Britain, although it has always been a mystery to me how they could get so much wealth under the "mistaken" fiscal policy of free trade—he could knock off $120,000,000, and get all the money required without borrowing at all. If we are not as rich as are the people of Britain, it would be hard to get the money; that is a moot point; there is none of us who would admit that we are not as patriotic. I think sound fiscal thinking will lead the Government to go further along this line before another Budget is brought in.

I want to make another comparison between the action of the Government upon the income tax and the other taxes they have brought in. I do not want to say much about the tax on matches—I have a recollection that Robert Lowe, a Chancellor of the Exchequer in Britain, was nearly driven out of public life for introducing a tax on matches, and in view of that precedent I rather wondered at the courage of my hon. friend in his action. The people of Britain would not stand for it a minute. They were probably right. It is one of these small irritating taxes, and we had better wait until next year before we prophesy anything about it. But I want to make a comparison which will perhaps bring out my point of view a little better. The Government are taxing tea ten cents a pound. Now, you can get a pretty fair pound of tea in western Canada for fifty cents. That means a tax of twenty cents upon a dollar's worth of tea. A simple calculation by the House will make it aware of the fact, therefore, that this Government is practically putting $2,000 taxation upon $10,000 worth of tea—tea which the women who have sent their relatives to the front need, or think they need, to cheer their nerves three times a day, in the circumstances we are passing through. But on an individual income of $10,000, the Government charges only $392. I think they are too kind about that transaction. I have always been extremely anxious to pay an income tax of 95 per cent on a million dollars. I would like to do that just for one year to know what it felt like to have $50,000. And then if the war went on I would make a fair deal on that $50,000 afterwards, but I am ready next year, if the Government will tell me where to get the million dollars, to let them have 95 per cent of it. Of course, people living in the eastern parts would not be so rash, because they do not know the glorious freedom and independence of our western country. If the Government had gone further along this line they would have pursued the path of sounder finance, in my humble judgment. I have given them full credit for what they have done along this line. The late Government was the first which ever raised a cent of direct taxation in this country, and, after all, that is something to be rather proud of. Some of the taxation by which they raised money was very drastic taxation indeed. The business tax—I referred this afternoon to the extraordinary shynesss which those enthusiastic direct taxers opposite showed for these direct taxes when they were introduced in this House. It seemed to me self-evident—of course, I was raised and got my fiscal thoughts in the Old Country, where free trade and direct taxation have prevailed for three-quarters of a century—that it would be sounder finance for us to take more of the money from the pockets of the people as you go along, and not by way of loans. Mr. Speaker, there is no great amount of patriotism, or sacrifice either, in buying a good bunch of Victory bonds with the credit of Canada behind them and 5 per cent interest. I would do a great deal along that line of patriotism if I had the money. But he is a great patriot who says: Take the money now, and you will never have to pay either principal or interest. The Victory bond business is not one of the things which I consider to be the biggest exhibition of patriotism. As a matter of fact, the man who buys a big bunch of Victory bonds is the embodiment of selfishness. This may be extraordinary heterodoxy to the people of the United States and Canada, but I believe what I say, and I have a habit of saying what I think. In the first place he looks over to the trenches and says: "Poor fellows, they are losing their lives; we have to support them." Then he looks at his own pocket and sees a fine bunch of money, and the Government comes along and says: "We would like that money at 5½ per cent interest"—and the beauty of the arrangement is that you may never be called upon to pay the principal, you will have to struggle with the interest, but posterity will pay the principal. This Victory bond business is not an example of sacrifice; it is an example of selfishness and shirking of duty. The man in the trenches is sacrificing, as are the people who will subsequently pay back the principal of the bonds and the interest—none of us knows how long we will carry that debt. We are really putting our sacrifices of blood, on the one hand, on the men in the trenches, and on the other hand our financial sacrifices are put on posterity. The Government have lacked courage in regard to their income tax, which should have been higher. Personally, I would die from the lashings of my conscience,—and I do not profess to have the most tender conscience in the world,—if I received anything like an income of $20,000 a year in times like these. I would like to take all the millionaires out to my ranch, build them each a shack, and let them know the pleasure of working for a living, if they would give most of their wealth to carry on the war. Since the beginning of the war business men have been asking to be taxed, and that is why, with great regret, I have to say that on this one point the Government have broken down, they have failed. There was a gentleman in Hamilton, whose name I forget now, who handed over the whole of his profits for one year, amounting to seven or eight hundred thousand dollars, without being taxed at all,—conscience money he could not take. I met a business gentleman, who, with his brother is the head of one of the biggest businesses in Ontario, the other day, a lifelong Tory, fifty years of age,—it is only an accident, perhaps, but I never met a Grit of that kind at all,—He said to me, with the utmost seriousness and in the terse language which business men use; Your income tax is all right, but you have not gone for enough with it; do it now and do it quickly; I want to pay my shot now; it is interest that is the ruin of Canada. Sir, that man knew what he was talking about and his views are representative of those of hundreds of other business men of this country.

The Government—some members of it anyhow—have with laudable energy preached economy since this war began. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) has been very earnest along that line; I am told that he smokes only one cigarette a year, so it runs with his nature. To preach economy is good, but it is in the power of the Government to enforce economy. If you only take plenty of taxes from the rich they will have to be economical, and, because of its newness and its otherwise generally admirable character, it will be a blessed experience to them. How are we economizing on war accounts? I do not know why the Government went in for these petty dockages of a few civil servants who went to the front. Get the money by direct taxation, and give the men who have gone to the front the fairest show in the world—that is the view of every right-thinking man in this country. I believe the Government have actually done something in making separation allowances less; but not one man in ten thousand in Canada will approve these petty dockages.

I have said a great deal in praise of the Government and it is just as well for them to have a little medicine of the other kind. They are men of open mind and I believe they will take it in good spirit; they know that I mean well, anyhow. I do not think they have economized as much, perhaps, on contracts as they might have, although the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell), has been an admirably busy man along these lines. I have said this in good part; I have said it with the utmost earnestness and the utmost seriousness. I think that Union Government is giving a splendid justification of its formation and its existence, as will be admitted by any gentleman on the other side of the House who gives reasonable attention to the points that I have raised in that connection, if he has any fairness in him and gets rid of that partyism which took such a violent hold of my hon. friend this afternoon. They have made a fair step at fulfilling their promises to the people. They are putting hard work into this business. Some people attribute to me some share in the parentage of Union Government. It would hurt me if the Government went much further along that direction of being prodigally patriotic with the sons of the rank and file in the trenches and parsimonious with the pockets of the rich. I believe that the opinion of the people of the country is absolutely behind me in this respect, irrespective of party, I know what the people of the West want in this matter. I know them well—I know them better than some folks thought I did last fall, anyway. I think I know what the labouring men of this country want in the matter; if Canada was canvassed to-morrow they would support the view that I have tried in my own way to bring before this House, and especially before the Government. Realizing their immense responsibilities wishing them well, knowing that they are dominated by patriotism and by the desire to win the war for freedom on which we are embarked, I believe the Government will yet rise to the fulness of their duty on this the only point on which in my judgment they have fallen short.

I should like to finish with an appeal to my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux), whom I love—he used to entertain me in his own house at one time, and would yet, I think, if I needed it. With the greatest political powers in the world he cannot become a real leader of a united country if he gives way to outbursts of racialism, and to what I am afraid was narrowness, as he did this afternoon; and leads a debate which betrays extraordinary imperviousness to the course of events in the world, as he did when he spoke against woman suffrage. "Coming all over the world—but we cannot have it in Quebec,"—that attitude will never produce a united country.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Asquith would not have it in England, nor would Mr. Gladstone.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK. Mr. Asquith has more wisdom than my hon. friend; he was not long in seeing the light. I had taken the chair for Mrs. Pankhurst before Mr. Asquith saw the light—I do not know that the accidental combination of Mrs. Pankhurst and myself at a public meeting had anything to do with it. However, the facts are in favour of Mr. Asquith, because he has changed his mind in the right direction. The fact is that war will lead my hon. friends opposite—will lead us all—to develop far more quickly along the lines of progress in one year than people heretofore have done in a generation. Half a century ago you could not have formed a Union Government in this country; it was the pressure of war that did it. Of course my hon. friend says that it is not a Union Government; that it is a Tory Government.

With the indulgence of the House, I would like to put a question to him. He still sees nothing but Liberals and Tories; he himself and his right hon. leader are the only two of the Liberal persuasion worth very much consideration. There are some good, promising young fellows behind them, and everything else is Tory. Why, Sir, everybody on this side of the House holds almost precisely the view with regard to world events that every advanced thinker in America does to-day, irrespective of party. Would my hon. friend make the charge that the United States of America—the freest and in many respects the greatest country in the world—is composed entirely of Tories? He has to get away from this to be on his old pinnacle.

My hon. friend told me the other day that I was an exile. I am not an exile from the belief in freedom; I am not an exile from the belief that the only fight for liberty and democracy is now going on on the battlefields of Europe. My hon. friend knows that; he has given a splendid young man to the cause, and I am proud of it—his only son, if I mistake not, standing with mine. They have forgotten all party strife there; they see only the danger to the world. I speak with the utmost kindness and the utmost sincerity in the last words I utter on this occasion to my hon. friends opposite. Press along; get the Government to go further in the way of conscription of wealth, but give up partyism for the moment. Get in behind the boys in the trenches. My message to-night is the same as it was last year: Realize the great object of the fight and the privilege of living through this period. Then you will have a united Canada—united under a Union which, I trust, will not be lightly broken again.

Mr. JEAN J. DENIS (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I listened with attention and interest to the very able speech which was delivered this afternoon by the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) and with no less attention to the reply of the member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark). Notwithstanding what has been said on many occasions during this debate, I want hon. gentlemen opposite to realize that we concur with them in the view that the present circumstances and the situation which we are now facing are the most serious and most inspiring that have ever existed in this country—indeed, that have ever existed through all the ages of time. On the other hand, I wish every member of this House to understand that, no matter how great the crisis, no matter how great the issue at stake, it is inevitable, especially in such circumstances as these, that men in the same country, having the same aims, the same aspirations and tending towards the same destinies, should, on matters so momentous as these, have different views and opinions. That is the stand that I am going to take this evening in the course of my few remarks, and that is the stand which has been taken by my fellow-citizens of French origin. Future generations and ages will later show—and perhaps the time will come sooner than we expect—who was right and who was wrong; but if I am now raising the question of right or wrong, it is not because I want to contend that we alone are right and that we possess right. I do not contend that at all. I am not so strong a man as to be able, under these circumstances, to say: behold, right is ours, and hon. members on the other side of the House are wrong. But I am strong enough a man to say: We have studied the situation as it has presented itself to us; we have done our best to comprehend and understand it, and if we have arrived at a solution which is different from the solution to which our hon. friends opposite have come, our opinion in this respect, notwithstanding the greatness of the effort, should be respected just as highly as the opinion of any hon. member in this House.

One of the main arguments made by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) in order to overcome the effect of the speech of the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) was that the vigorour address which the latter delivered this afternoon contained nothing substantial and, in fact, nothing that was deserving of an answer. I was very much surprised to hear the hon. member for Red Deer make that remark at the beginning of his speech, for he did make it, as I took a note of it at the time, and it will appear in Hansard. For a person who can find nothing fitting with which to challenge or contradict the arguments of an adversary, it is always wise to say: The reasons you have given are worthless, and I shall not attempt to answer them. It would be folly on my part if I were not aware that I am far too inexperienced to place myself between these two stalwarts, the hon. member for Maisonneuve and the hon. member for Red Deer. Let it be sufficient for me to say, in conclusion, upon this point, that, at all events, we on this side of the House all greatly admired the speech of the hon. member for Maisonneuve, and we are all happy that, in these times of stress, we are able to enjoy the privilege of having such a man in our depleted ranks.

It is recognized, and I can safely say, that this Budget is one of the most important delivered since Confederation. It embraces greater scope than any other measure which was ever introduced into this House. The figures are amazing. Yet the discussion of it remains a delicate subject to handle on account of the many delicate questions which are dependent upon it, and of this every one of us has had proof this afternoon and on previous days.

The feature which will at first sight strike the layman is the colossal amount of money which we have already spent, and the still more colossal amount which will be spent under the new measures and also under the old ones. In view of these facts one can hardly avoid making reflections of the most serious nature. May I be listened to by this House, however, when I say that my desire is to avoid launching into any unjust criticism or undue manifestation of hostility toward those who do not believe as we do. For I have always believed that earnestness and sincerity are the best policies for any man to follow in all walks of life—politics included—and although this disposition of mind has been the cause of many bitter deceptions I have suffered—mainly in politics—yet I still cling to these primeval principles. Because I look upon it as a boon, which tends to make a man a better man, to be given the privilege of making an address in the presence of such a distinguished body of men as I now behold. I look upon the situation as serious, and I believe we cannot emphasize this too much. If it be the policy of this Government to spend hundreds of millions, even billions of dollars, blindly and without any regard whatsoever to Canadian interests; if it be the policy of this Government to forget that Canada is a country which owes to itself preservation and survivance, then this Government is rightfully pursuing its policy. Again, if this Administration is content with the principle, once dwelt upon by one of its members, that it is proper and expedient, if needs be, to drive Canada into bankruptcy in order to assist the Allies in Europe; if such be the consensus of opinion amongst the hon. members of this House, then, again, I say we would be only following our course by adopting this Budget and pursuing the policy which the Government has adopted. If, on the other hand, sound counsel still prevails in this House; if the ideals of the Canadian people are still those which, until a very recent date, had been pursued by all political men, political associations and political parties in this country, ever since Confederation, then I say it is high time that this wild stampede which has been forced upon us should be halted, and every man in this country should now pause and meditate a moment.

If it be true that I am opposed with all the strength of which I am capable to conscription, yet I am not, we are not on this side of the House by any means opposed to Canada's contribution to this war. On the contrary, we have always said and declared that, regardless of whether or not we were compelled to contribute according to our obligations towards the Mother Country, we were willing to do what we could. But what I want, what we want, is that this contribution be made to the extent only which our means warrant.

What we want is that Canada should not be ruined, bankrupt in both men and money, in her attempt—successful, we all hope but nevertheless uncertain—to win the war by giving the Allied nations the relatively scant and meagre support which we only can produce.

I have said we all hope to be successful, but that the result is nevertheless uncertain, and I want to be well understood on that point. What does Canada's contribution represent in this war? If we are to accept as true the statement in the newspapers that there are now five million men opposing the Germans, what does Canada's contribution of four divisions or ninety thousand men amount to, relatively speaking? It represents about two per cent of the whole. If by sacrificing Canada it was in our power to win the war, I am not ready to say I would not be the first to say, Let us do it; because Canada is not as big as the whole of Europe or as big as civilization, and it might not be a bad bargain to sacrifice even our own country to save Europe and civilization. But what will be the actual result of our contribution in this war? We can add only a very small amount to the forces which are now opposing each other; I might almost say, a negligible amount when we consider the final result of this struggle. But we are taking it for granted that it is the proper thing to do, to ruin and bankrupt this country for the sake of the war. I say this is not acting on sound principles. It is not doing justice to ourselves or to the country to sacrifice Canada in order to win the war, when we all admit that Canada by itself cannot win the war and can only assist in a very meagre way in bringing that end about.

I have expressed in a few brief words what I believe to be the sentiments and ideals of my own province, and what I believe to be also the sentiments and ideals of a great many citizens of other provinces in this Dominion. Of this we have new evidence every day. What answer do the delegations get that come here from different parts of Ontario? What do they come here for? They come here, I suppose, because they accept the argument I have just advanced. If the Prime Minister said to these men, "Canada is the only country that can win the war, and if we give our whole we will win it," I credit the people of Ontario with patriotism enough to say that they would do it and I believe every one of those men would return to their homes satisfied and prepared to do what had to be done. But all that can be said to them is this, "Do your best; we are simply a drop in the bucket; sacrifice your whole for the war but be assured that your contribution is not important enough to win the war." Many criticisms have been made of the stand taken by my province. On an occasion like this, where the main if not the sole object of the Budget is the prosecution of the war according to the means adopted by the Government; the application and the enforcement of the law of conscription according to old and new methods, the payment of expenses which have already been made, which are being made now, and which will necessarily be made in the future, and, as an immediate consequence of all this, the necessity of levying enormous amounts of money upon the people—all matters about which we do not agree with the Government or at least differ as to methods—I think I should be given the privilege of explaining some of the reasons why my people have opposed, and are still opposing, the policy of the Government in regard to the different matters I have just mentioned, and I feel I will not be doing wrong or injustice to any one in expressing the views of my constituents on these divers subjects, if I do so openly, frankly, and honestly, without craft, guile, or suspicion. If I were only relying upon my own authority in reference to these reasons it would not be worth any more than the opinion of an inexperienced man; but such is not the case. In support of my views I can quote the opinion of all the public men this country has produced, great and small, learned and ignorant, Whigs and Tories, from the fathers of Confederation down to the public men of present times. Every one in this House admits that this new policy of sacrificing Canada to win a war in Europe has always been deprecated by all Governments and by all public men in this country ever since Confederation. We are so well aware of that, that when war was declared we heard the Prime Minister say that no one in England had asked us to send troops overseas. If we had been obliged for some reason or another to contribute in this war, why did not England send for the soldiers of Canada just as she sent for her own soldiers in India and elsewhere? Of course, everybody admits we are not obliged to contribute. We are doing it simply because we are satisfied to do it, because the issue at stake is so tremendous we cannot help doing it, and we should not avoid doing it. The difference of opinion between us is not so great as some people think, and it would not be so great if the facts which I am now going to bring before the House were better known. I have just said that this is a new policy for Canada. We never contemplated a contribution in this war to the extent of conscription, and in this connection I cannot do better than refer to the declaration of the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) himself.

In January, 1916, in the House of Commons, in answer to a question asked by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, the right hon. the Prime Minister said in the most unequivocal manner that there should be no conscription in Canada. What did that mean? It meant that the effort of Canada was to be a limited one and that it was to remain within the limits of voluntary recruiting which, even at that period, had begun to diminish to a noticeable extent. To say that Canada would not have conscription was virtually to declare that the contribution in men would not go beyond a certain limit and that, as a consequence, the moneys to be expended, being proportionate to the number of men who had enlisted, might also be limited. No other meaning could be attributed to those words.

But the course of things changed. All of a sudden conscription came, and some people are now surprised because the French Canadians did not jump at conscription, did not take off their hats and acknowledge that since the Prime Minister has changed his views, we should change ours also. But I would point out to hon. gentlemen who take this view that we had been taught otherwise for generations and generations, and no one can change the mentality of a people in a single hour no matter what the circumstances are. Since then the policy of the Government has been changed so that no one can tell now where we are going, save that we are going full speed ahead towards bankruptcy? This is just where the divergence of opinion arises. I deny the right of any member of this House or any Government to drive Canada full speed ahead into bankruptcy in order to try to win the war. That is where the divergence of opinion comes in. One group contends that we should give everything to the war, while the other group supports the idea that we should give everything we can without driving this country to destruction. It is only a question of degree and I humbly submit that both opinions, although perhaps not equally wise, are nevertheless equally sincere.

Although I do not admit the idea of those who would sacrifice everything to the war, still I can understand the sentiment and ideals of those men, and that is the reason I rose and said that I wanted to speak and to say things honestly and sincerely without craft, pretense or guile. I can understand the sentiments and ideals of those men, but what I cannot understand is that those who do not agree with our ideals should find it impossible, or should refuse, to understand our sentiments and ideals as we do theirs. The only explanation would be that these men are practical exponents of the selfish doctrine of self-infallibility.

An important question which has often been asked and which I will now seek to answer is this: Why did not the French Canadians of the province of Quebec enroll voluntarily to the same extent as those of English speech throughout Canada generally? Why did they oppose conscription, and at this present juncture why are they not willing to give their own to the war, or, to be plain, why are they not willing to give the "last man" and spend the "last dollar" for the war? This query is nothing less than the enunciation under a different form of the problem I have already disclosed. The answer is manifold, and if I take the time of this House to give the answer it is because I think earnestly and frankly that from a proper understanding between this side of the House and the other good will come to all of us. It has been pointed out before that the enrollment throughout Canada has been by reason of inverse ratio to the time during which people have inhabited this country. In other words, those who were newcomers enrolled in much greater numbers than those who had been old time settlers. And this is only natural. The man who has left Europe recently has not yet become attached to the soil of this country. He feels himself a stranger in Canada and he has always in mind the idea that the old country is his home. The opposite applies to the old settler. He has lost interest in all things across the ocean and looks upon Canada as his real and only country. But the same condition of mind exists still more deeply with the French Canadians for historical reasons. These historical reasons are not known by every one in this country. If they were better known our sentiments and ideals would be better understood. In the year 1763, when the Treaty of Quebec established English domination in this country, history teaches us, all those noble Frenchmen who had sufficient means to return to France made their exit from this country leaving behind the poorer classes of the population, whose numbers were a little over 60,000. These people considered themselves exiles, and English domination in those days of strife between France and England was looked upon with the same terror as we now look upon the dreaded German domination. These things may seem strange, but hon. gentlemen who are listening to me now, and who are scholars, know very well that these facts as I state them are true. No French nobleman would stay in Canada to submit himself to the yoke of English domination. In speaking of English domination, I am not saying that the yoke of English domination was anything like the German domination, but that was the sentiment of the time. It was the same sentiment as that which existed at one time in England that Catholics should not have the same rights as Protestants, and it was the same sentiment as that which existed in France at one period that Protestants should not have the same rights as Catholics. Fortunately, those times have passed, but we know that these sentiments of the French Canadians have their root in these facts of history. If the French Canadians have attached themselves to the soil, if they made this country their home, having lost all hope of ever returning to France, I hope no one will blame them for this, because it has been held in all countries of the world and through all ages that the immemorial tenure of land and of estates was the very foundation of nobility.

Now let us consider the case of the new settler from Britain. The man, perhaps, arrived from the Old Country, five, ten, or fifteen years ago and settled in this country. This man's family was in England, his ancestors were buried there, his recollections were of England, his lore is that of England, the better part of his heart very often had remained in England; and it was only natural, on war being declared between Great Britain and Germany, that, forgetting at once that he was in a colony, he should flee back to England and take his place in the ranks of the British army. Such action was only natural, but how can you reasonably expect that the French Canadian whose ancestors had been domiciled in Canada for one hundred and fifty or two hundred years, who had no relations whatever in Europe, and had no interest there, should do the same thing? You could not reasonably expect it. Of course, in my remarks I am speaking entirely outside of the legal question, outside altogether of the question of the right to impose conscription and the obligations that devolve upon us thereunder. I am dealing solely with the question of sentiment, the force of which has been urged so many times in this House. So, for generation after generation, the French Canadian had lived here, his affections divided equally between love for his native village and love for the numerous members of his family for whom he had to care. He was taught to think, to believe, and to understand that Canada alone was his country, and that in the event of war his obligations did not go beyond defending his native land; and we all know that this opinion was in conformity with the views held by many Englishmen, not only in Canada but in England as well. It is recognized that this is the first time such an issue has ever been raised in Canada. If I am emphasizing the point so much it is because I see some of my hon. friends opposite smiling, but I am very serious in this matter. I argue that it could not be otherwise than for the French Canadian population of Canada to hold the views they do, bearing in mind the conditions under which they had lived here for one hundred and fifty years and more; and when people declare that the French Canadians are disloyal, that they are anti-British, that they do not want the war to be won by the Allied nations, and all such kind of stuff, they must be either ignorant of the conditions under which the French Canadians have lived, or else they are acting in bad faith. When Canada was attacked, what did the French Canadians do? I have just stated that according to their conception of their duty it was imperative for them to defend Canada. Well, they defended Canada, and history stands as an unfaltering witness to testify that they did their duty. They were taught, and learned, that such was the limit of their duty, and I believe they were taught the truth according to the only possible true interpretation of our constitution.

Such, Mr. Speaker, was the state of things which existed when Confederation was brought about. The drafting of the Confederation pact left no doubt in the minds of the Canadian people that their military obligations were limited to the defence of this country, and if room had been left for doubt, the uncertainty would have long ago been dispelled by the teachings of Canadian public men during the last fifty years. What is Confederation? It is nothing more or less than a contract between different provinces, just as a contract is made between individuals. The province of Quebec was not compelled to enter Confederation, but she did so, and I here declare to-night that we people of that province are glad of the fact. We are not sorry that we entered Confederation, because we believe in the destinies of Canada, we believe that when these days of stress pass union will exist—not the Union Government, but a real union—between the two great races of this country once more, even if that union has been broken recently. I believe that by exerting our united efforts we can accomplish a lot for Canada; I believe we will achieve such results that in a very few years no one will be displeased, or will entertain sorrow, that Confederation ever existed. I speak from what I know of the sentiment in my own province, because that province entered as a partner into Confederation.

Taking the facts as they exist, under that compact the French Canadians have been taught for the last fifty years that they have nothing to do with wars in Europe. The man who came to this country from England, one, two, five, or ten years before the war, did not understand that condition of things here. He was supposed to know that Confederation existed, but we can well imagine that he never troubled his head about the underlying principles. That man left England and came to a "colony," or at least came here with the idea that most Englishmen have, namely, that colonies, being dependencies of the Old Country, must submit to everything that the Old Country demands of them. Of the ruling spirit which influenced Confederation they knew nothing. I am not blaming such Englishmen, I admire their patriotism, but how could it be expected that French Canadians could have the same mentality, the same point of view, as that which influenced the Englishman to leave Canada and return to England to fight on her behalf in this war?

Now let me refer to other events. About twenty years ago the South African war occurred, and lengthy discussions took place in Canada with regard to our contribution to it and the relatively small number of men who were sent on active service at that time. If I am not mistaken, Canada sent four thousand men to South Africa, but before a single soldier was despatched, it was declared in the House of Commons of Canada in a most authoritative way, in such a manner that no one could be mistaken, that the contribution of men which we were then making should not be considered as a precedent. Well, Sir, if so much care and trouble was taken to announce to the people of Canada that the despatch of that force to South Africa should not be considered as a precedent, it meant implicitly that Canada was not obliged to contribute men, and if we did contribute men it was because we wanted to render more cordial the good relations that existed between England and this country. So the people of the province of Quebec had another reason for believing that they were not compelled to participate in European wars.

But the newest, most amazing and most dissolving manifestation against out participation in foreign wars, was witnessed during the general elections of 1911 and the period which followed. In the province of Quebec, a new party called the Nationalist party was in the field. According to these men we owed England nothing, and in case of war ought not to furnish her one button for a uniform. They vehemently condemned the Laurier policy of a Canadian navy, to be Canadian in time of peace but Imperial in time of war. They denounced with still greater vigour the policy of the hon. gentleman who is now Prime Minister. They denied allegiance to either of the two leaders whose policies they equally reproved. The result was that several Nationalist candidates were elected, and, immediately after, the Prime Minister whom they had denounced with the utmost violence received them into the shelter of his fatherly arms just as the patriarch of yore received the prodigal son. The records show, however, that this wonderful metamorphosis was not altogether spontaneous, for, before being allowed to enter the precincts of a new Cabinet the Nationalists had to severely punish their rebellious minds with anchoretic repentance and show signs of remorse such as even the prodigal son never approached. On the other hand, it is nevertheless true that no penitent sinner ever derived from repentance such magnificent and gorgeous rewards as these men received. Oliver Goldsmith writes:

> Scarcely any virtue found to resist the power of long and pleasing temptation.

The author of the Vicar of Wakefield did not write for the men of his time alone, but rather with a prophetic instinct he wrote also for some of the distinguished gentlemen who were elected in the year of grace 1911. The temptation to which these Nationalists were subjected on the part of the hon. Prime Minister—for he seems to have been an irresistible tempter,—were indeed long and pleasing temptations which the heroic virtue of the reformers could not withstand. Both the tempter and his easy-to-win victims have been since greatly punished, the former on account of the many difficulties which he has encountered and of the bitter reproaches which ever since have assailed him from the faithful of his party; the latter by the discredit into which they have fallen among their own fellowmen, a disgrace perhaps equal to none in the political annals of this country.

But what would the French Canadians think while some of these Nationalists were playing that low style of comedy? What could they believe other than that they had been deceived? Was this a reason for them to change their ideas? Certainly, this would never change their convictions and ideas and they still remained even firmer than before in the sentiments I have already described. It is not by deceiving people that you will bring conviction into their minds. When these Nationalists had preached all through the province of Quebec that we owed nothing to England and that we should not furnish a button for a uniform if she were at war, they should never have received from the Prime Minister the recompense they did receive. That was a very bad lesson to give to the province of Quebec because it was intimating to the people that credit and confidence were being placed in men who had been preaching to them a doctrine which I believe is altogether false, because I have never thought myself that we should go to the length of saying that we owed England nothing and that we should not give her a button for a uniform in time of war. So, I say again, that was a very bad example to the French Canadians and would never change their minds or ideas upon conscription or their contribution in this war.

Let us take a more recent event. The last, but not the least event was the general elections of 1917. If anything should be held as sacred in a country which is governed on democratic principles and is under a democratic constitution, it is certainly the right of suffrage, for all other rights proceed from the right of suffrage. Yet, prior to and during the last general election, every scheme and contrivance of devilish ingenuity were set to work to defeat the right and the ends of justice. I am not going to give the details. They will be given later to the country. Let it be sufficient for the moment, however, to mention that the War-time Elections Act was a scandal and an infringement upon the rights of the people unparalleled in the annals of this country. The application of the Act was equally scandalous, and we should not wonder at this for indeed the Act seemed to have been purposely drafted with such loopholes as would invite fraud and conspiracy, and the invitation was not unheeded either because imposition, trick, cheat, and treachery even were rampant during the elections. Last Friday night I heard the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) say that in Saskatchewan the War-time Elections Act was not conducive in any degree to the success of the Administration, and that the result would have been the same had that law not existed. Sir, if that statement be correct what a pity that this precious Government, as it was ironically termed this session by an hon. member on the right, did not think fit to dispense with that ignominious law. For I do solemnly declare to this House and the country that had the elections been just, free, fair, lawful and unstained, if the verdict had not been one of part only, but a free verdict of all of the population of Canada, the French Canadians would have abided by the decision and submitted to it. This Government had, indeed, a fine opportunity to win to their cause the French Canadians or else to prove to the world that they were really unworthy and unreliable partners in the great pact of Confederation. All the Administration had to do was to win a fair election, and this they did not choose to do. And that is one more reason why the French Canadians would not change their opinions about conscription. It had been proposed in this House—I do not wish to refer to a debate which is now closed—by my right hon. leader that a referendum should be submitted to the people, but it was claimed that this was unnecessary. Very well, let that question remain settled. But a free election, a right election, was necessary.

This Government—I do not know whether it is the same Government or a different one, but I am inclined to accept the view of my leader, who says that it is the same Administration as the previous one, whose complexion only has been changed—this Government, to impose conscription, had only to say to the French Canadian people: We have the people of Canada behind us; if you are not now ready to follow the lead given by the majority of the people, you are unworthy subjects. Had the Prime Minister said this, he would have been telling the truth. Any class of persons in a democratic country who are not ready to submit to the will of the majority, properly and fairly given in an election, are not worthy of consideration or of the deference and respect of their fellow-men.

Such was the state of affairs when the war broke out. It was announced from the beginning that Canada's participation should at all times and under all circumstances be voluntary; that Canada would never have conscription. This was another reason for French Canadians being confirmed in their previous ideas concerning conscription. But when, in May, 1917, the Government changed its policy in a fundamental manner and French Canadians did not follow suit, the latter were and still are denounced as slackers, anti-Britishers and traitors.

I do not want to hurt anybody's feelings. I am working, not on a policy of disruption, but on coalition and union of the races of this country. It is nevertheless true that French Canadians think logically; that they have only followed the traditions and laws of their country, while those who reproach them have not. What more should we ask of the best citizen than that he follow the traditions and laws of his country? The French Canadians are without reproach in their conduct. They might have enlisted in greater numbers, but it was their privilege to do so, or not to do so. The system was entirely a voluntary one, and they are therefore above reproach for what they have done. This is only sound logic.

There is a sentiment in certain parts of Canada against my people which I cannot too deeply regret, but which we are powerless to avoid. This sentiment did not find its origin in their non-participation in this war; it has existed for a longer period—indeed, for several generations. I am sorry to say that the province in which this House sits is mainly responsible for this regrettable state of affairs. Long before this war, over twenty years ago, I learned through my own experience of the state of mind of many of the Britishers in Ontario—things which are rather sad to admit. According to these people, all other considerations being even, a French Canadian is not equal to an Englishman for the sole reason that he is a French Canadian. I have probed this problem and I make this declaration because I acquired the knowledge through the experience of my boyhood when I was attending college in Ontario. I do not say this by way of reproach; we are working to unite this country. I say to the people of Ontario: You think you know something about the province of Quebec; but you know nothing; you think you were born to teach the people of the province of Quebec what they should do and what they should not do; but you are mistaken; send your boys to Quebec, have them learn the French language, have them study our institutions, have them see what kind of life we live and what kind of people we are, and you will have more consideration for the French community than you have now. If the people of Ontario wish to confine themselves to their own province, that is their own business; but if they do so they cannot be aware of the facts pertaining to our province; they cannot be alive to the conditions which existed in Quebec long before their ancestors came to this country. If the French Canadians do not contribute enough to the war, our friends from Ontario criticise us. If there is a change in sentiment, and the announcement is made that the French Canadians are willing to contribute, our friends from Ontario want to know why. Not later than last week we were given an example of this. The Minister of Militia had said:

> I am happy to be able to report to the House many evidences of a marked change of feeling in that province.

He was speaking of the province of Quebec. Assuredly this declaration should have been gratifying and sufficient to the virtuous men of Ontario, but it was not. One of them could not help asking the minister to what he attributed the better feeling in Quebec. When the feeling is bad, they say: Let us strike the province of Quebec. When the feeling is good, they say: To what is this better feeling attributed? If the hon. member from West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) had developed his auditive sense to the same degree that he has cultivated and fostered his labouring mind in the discrediting of all that is French and Catholic in this country he would have known that the answer had already been given more than once to his query by a man who has been sitting in this House for over forty years, and who has full authority to speak in the name of his compatriots, for he is one of the most noble figures which our race and this country generally have ever produced. On April 5th, 1918 (page 410 of Unrevised Hansard) this hon. gentleman spoke as follows of the French Canadian people:

> I know the people well, and I repeat what I said on a former occasion, that there is not to be found, in any part of Canada, a more peaceable or law-abiding population.

The hon. gentleman from West Toronto will find a complete answer in this. The people of Quebec do not approve any more of conscription this year than they did last year, but they submit to the law because they are virtuous enough to do so. Let the fanatics and the pseudo builders of the Empire not forget this, even though a different announcement might be dearer to their hearts, that the French Canadians are such as represented by the gentleman I have just quoted; that they have been such in the past; that they shall continue in the future and remain forever a peaceful and law-abiding people.

The people from eastern and western Canada, although they have often disagreed with us, have, to a large extent, endeavoured, so far as I am aware, to treat the French Canadians with consideration and respect, and I cannot thank them too heartily for this. Unfortunately the same cannot be said of Ontario. Just as Germany, at the time this war began, assumed the role of the bully of Europe, so Ontario has assumed the same nefarious role towards Quebec. Time flies quickly, and the day may not be far remote when some of the people of the sister province will meet their discomfiture; they will find that in bullying the peaceful province of Quebec, they have arrayed against themselves the other provinces of this Dominion. If I am saying this, it is because I have been able to come into touch with the sentiments of people from the Maritime and Western Provinces. At the present time we do not agree with the people of the Western Provinces on the matter of conscription; but I think I may be permitted to say in this House to-night, that I have listened to many a speech from these hon. members which has pleased me greatly. They are broad-minded people. The broadness of their minds seems to bear the print of the immensities of the prairies on which they live. We of the province of Quebec have always regarded these settlers as our friends, and although we are separated on conscription to-day, we still regard them as our friends. As to the people from the Maritime Provinces, I have met several of them who still bear within themselves the old stamp of the Acadian civilization. Meekness, kindness, tenderness, are the words used by Longfellow when he speaks about those people, and we still find the same spirit, to a large extent, if not wholly, in the Maritime Provinces. Why do we not find the same spirit in the province of Ontario? I have just said that some of the people of the province of Ontario, if things continue as they are going on now, will some day or another meet their discomfiture. I feel—I hope for them I am mistaken—that the day will come when Quebec will stand like a giant stretching his powerful arms to embrace the East on the one side and the West on the other, on top and over the head of Ontario.

An hon. MEMBER: Never.

Mr. DENIS: I am not a prophet, but I say now that if, in a few years, I am permitted to again address this House, I think I shall be able to tell hon. members who are listening to me to-night that I was not mistaken. What do we actually see on the other side of the House? A very big cry—win the war. That is all very well, but our hon. friends opposite cannot go beyond that. If to-morrow morning the European war should suddenly terminate, what would happen between Ontario and the West? The people of those provinces have not the same feelings; they have not the same toleration. The West is tolerant, Ontario is not. I am not a statesman, I have no experience; I am a newcomer in this House, but I am greatly mistaken if I am not telling the truth when I say that the people of Ontario have to do a great deal in the way of improvement if they ever want to impress their opinions upon the minds of the western people.

My presentation of the case has been totally incomplete and inadequate. The description of the actual conditions cannot be defined in a few words or pages. If, however, my unworthy remarks can be of any service towards the welfare of my people and our beloved country generally, I shall not have taken up the time of this House unduly. There are facts which it is not always agreeable to utter, but which must be exposed just the same. And it is through the enunciation of these verities that often good is accomplished. The French Canadians are not by any means to be blamed. They have acted in accordance with every law of God and man. My hon. friends on the other side of the House cannot say as much of themselves, for they have committed the crime of violating the constitution of their country. That is a strong statement to make, but it has been proved in this House that they have done so. The arguments have not been controverted. It has been proven that, according to the constitution, there was no power in Canada to enforce conscription and compel a free subject of His Majesty to fight in Europe. Yet my hon. friends opposite have enforced conscription, and when they are themselves violating the constitution of the country, they say that the French Canadians are disloyal and do not deserve to be looked upon as creditable partners in this Confederation. According to that fundamental law, that is, the constitution, they have no right to enforce conscription upon any citizen of the land, and yet they have done so. They have invoked the necessity of the hour. Necessity is no excuse for breaking the law. Otherwise the Huns who invaded Belgium for reasons of necessity would equally find excuse. Conscription has been unlawfully and unjustly enforced upon our people. We have protested; we are still protesting, and I do here again protest against this injustice. Yet we shall obey the law, for the law, however unjust it may be, is the law. We believe in the justice of our cause, and we feel confident that we can without fear submit our conduct to the judgment of future ages and generations.

Mr. Speaker, I have reached the conclusion of my altogether too lengthy remarks. I hope I shall be forgiven by this House for speaking at such length. For ourselves, for hon. members on the other side of the House, for the whole of Canada, I want, before I resume my seat, to make this last statement. The French Canadians want the good, the welfare of this country, and the happiness of its people, and they want this in preference to anything else. They want the good and the welfare of the British Empire, but not at the cost of depopulation, ruin and bankruptcy of this country. They have been in the past, and they wish to remain in the future, faithful and dutiful subjects. They want concord, peace, harmony and bonne entente to reign in our dear country. But in order to attain these aims, we want justice in full for our fellowmen. We want our ancestral rights and privileges with regard to education, our language, and our faith, to be not only recognized, but respected. We ask that our fellow citizens should act towards us with that spirit of toleration and justice which is one of the fundamental principles upon which the British Empire has been founded; for we must not be looked upon otherwise than as equal partners in this pact of Confederation, and then, when these conditions have been realized, we will be only too happy to join hands with the other people of Canada, so that our confraternity may extend from the restless, labouring Atlantic to the calm and tranquil Pacific, from the bleak and barren shores of the Gulf of the St. Lawrence to the smiling, sunny coast of British Columbia, to unite with all other people in this country and contribute with them our worthy share in the weaving of the fabric of a great and prosperous nation, so that we may enjoy all together and without heed to race or creed that peace on earth which has been promised from above to all men of good will.

Mr. R. C. HENDERS (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, I would not attempt to occupy the time of the House at this late hour had it not been for the position taken on more than one occasion by gentlemen on the opposite side of the House with regard to the attitude of certain members now occupying seats in the Union Government. I am not going into ancient history, for we have had a sufficient number of reviews to keep our memories fresh along that line for a considerable length of time, but I feel it is my duty to explain the position of a certain section on this side of the House in order that we may be properly understood.

When the war broke out in the year 1914, nearly all the people of Canada gave a great deal of time and thought to the issues that were at stake, to the questions involved and the interests that had to be considered. I along with others gave some study to these matters, and two months and a half after the war broke out, at a very large gathering representative of a large proportion of the agricultural interests of the province of Manitoba, I made the statement that Canada was in this war to win, even if it involved the sacrifice of the last man and the last dollar; in it because we were defending the great principle of democracy and the great principle of liberty; in it because if we failed to defend that which had cost our forbears so dearly, nothing else mattered much. My recollection is that after full and deliberate discussion of the stand Canada should take in the war was submitted by Government to the House, by a unanimous vote Parliament decided to participate in this war. Furthermore, not only the people's representatives in this House but the people of Canada themselves in their trades unions and different organizations called together for the special purpose of making a pronouncement on this question, almost unanimously agreed that we were in this war to a finish, no other course being open to us.

I am glad to hear hon. members on the opposite side of the House profess their desire to see this war won, but putting the professions they make in this mild form alongside other expressions they have given utterance to outside this House, I am constrained to think that their ardour slackens somewhat when they reach the eastern part of the Dominion of Canada. Down there, their utterances are more like this: Yes, we are in the war, and you may do your part but it is just as you feel about it; if you like to enlist, all right; if you do not like to, it is a question for you to decide. That kind of teaching does not work up much enthusiasm in bringing men out to fight, and it seems to me it has had its influence on voluntary enlistments in the province of Quebec. While that was the attitude of that province under the voluntary system—indifference, slowness to take hold, lack of enthusiasm on the part of their leaders—when it was found that the voluntary system was not bringing the men forward as fast as the country demanded and conscription was introduced, these men who had taken little advantage of their opportunities under the voluntary system insistently cried out, "Give us the voluntary system again; let us work along the old line." There has not been as much enthusiasm shown by the leaders of the people in the eastern part of Canada, especially in the province of Quebec, as I should like to have seen.

I wish to dwell more particularly on the position occupied by those who are looked upon as formerly entertaining Liberal views, and who now find themselves occupying positions on this side of the House in a Win-the-war Government. Some of us looked, and looked earnestly, to see a united effort on the part of the East and the West to win this war. We felt there was no room for provincial lines, that Canada was in this war, and that every man, every woman and every dollar should be in it, in order that we might win. Seeing the attitude of the Opposition on this win-the-war policy, and the attitude of the Government then in power, and their aggressive mood towards winning the war, we were forced, to the conclusion that the only policy open to those who were in earnest in their determination to win the war was to get together, to stand shoulder to shoulder and to fight it out to a finish.

I have pleasure in expressing my appreciation and delight with the Budget speech as presented by the hon. Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean). It is going a long way in the direction of the teachings set forth by the large interest in the West which I have the honour of belonging to. An hon. member of the Opposition this afternoon read from a certain platform setting forth the views of the Canadian Council of Agriculture and of the Grain Growers associations, but, instead of reading the whole of that platform the hon. member only read a part of it. He stopped at the place that suited his purpose. He gave us the policy dealing with the tariff and I want to say to that hon. gentleman and hon. gentlemen before me to-night that the people in the West representing the great agricultural industry have not changed their position one iota in regard to the tariff policy. I believe it is the right policy for Canada and we believe the day will come in the not very far distant future when the principles inculcated in the platform which has been laid down by the Grain Growers will have influence and sway in this House and the country will get the benefit of the teaching and thinking that has been put into that platform.

I would like to say, and I say it with a great deal of pleasure, that the Government in power previous to the Union Government had their ear pretty close to the ground in regard to some of the planks in that platform and in the last session, when the Conservative party were in power, we find that two important planks of that platform were incorporated in the policy of the Government.

The great issue in the last election before the people of the constituency of Macdonald which I have the honour to represent, and on which the battle was fought, was the winning of the war—the German attitude towards civilization and democracy and the conflict was therefore autocracy and democracy. The question was, which should triumph? We believed that the principles of democracy should triumph. That was the platform upon which the battle was fought. The West set forth that platform, the people stood behind it, and as a result the representation in this House is what it is to-day. That was the cry all through the West, the war was the issue.

I believe the people of Canada are behind this Union Government and are saying to it: "Go ahead and win the war; if it takes men to win the war, we will give you men; if it needs money we will give you money, but go ahead and win." I know that here and there you will find men who entertain a different view. You will find those who, because of personal interest, or personal motives, will contend otherwise, but the predominating sentiment of Canada is that there is a struggle going on that will mean much in the future history of the world, and that we must see to it that the principles for which we contend will triumph in that struggle.

Now I propose to deal with a question that I should have dealt with before I expressed the last thought that was in my mind. I want to call attention to the attitude which was taken in the West with regard to the question of the fiscal policy that should be adopted. This policy was very largely discussed on the platforms of the West and the attitude taken by myself, as well as other representatives of the great agricultural organizations, was that if the Government introduced in connection with the winning of the war the other planks of the farmers' platform, they would, through them, in a large measure, secure for war purposes the results that they hoped to secure from the tariff. I would like to see some change in the tariff, even although that change were small. If the present Government could see its way clear to removing the 7½ per cent duty introduced as a war revenue measure, and allow the money which would accrue from this reduction to go for the purpose of increased production, it would at least be a step in the right direction and the country at large would benefit thereby. Failing that, so long as the Government carry out their promise in regard to introducing a fiscal policy that would tax incomes and undue profits made under the tariff system we will give it our support, as by that means the same object would be attained and the money would reach the coffers of the Government for war purposes.

I did not intend to weary the House with a speech, but I only wanted to put myself and the people of the West straight in regard to our attitude in connection with this win-the-war Government.

Mr. L. T. PACAUD (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, it is fortunate for one who is not too well versed in matters of finance, that it should be customary in a debate such as this to drift from the somewhat dry and monotonous discussion of figures to the wider range of national and political issues so intimately involved with the Budget and which have never ceased to interest and to divide men of different political creeds. Whatever justification there may have been in the past for this frank and outspoken exchange of views, it seems to me, Sir, that such a course imposes itself upon us with greater force to-day in view of the unusual circumstances in which we meet. The Acting Minister of Finance, in his annual statement, has given us the financial condition of the country for the last twelve months. In perusing the figures which he presented to us a few days ago, with the care and attention which it was our duty to bring to our task, we could not help but realize still more forcibly the true meaning of war; its ever-increasing toll; the varied and complex problems which have arisen and which will continue to increase as this bitter struggle goes on. Let me summarize, Sir, what, I gather, is our present financial position. It may be said that this war has for the time being apparently made our people prosperous. Our trade has reached an extraordinary figure; and our revenue for the year amounts to $258,000,000. This is, Sir, no doubt, the brightest phase of our financial statement, and yet when we stop to scrutinize its true meaning we are quickly drawn to the conclusion, that this passing wave of prosperity, this enormous expansion of our trade, rests on a purely fictitious basis; that it lacks the permanency which alone would make it sound and stable. We clearly see that when this war comes to an end, as rapidly as our war contracts have ceased to bring in their unusual and abnormal profits, so rapidly shall we return to the normal state of pre-war days. To convince us, Sir, of this fact, we have but to picture to ourselves our munition plants suddenly closing their doors, at least one-half million of men strolling our streets on the lookout for a new means of livelihood, the readjustment of our industrial life made necessary to meet the new conditions and, above all this, the gradual flow of 400,000 men of our Canadian soldiers returning from the fields of Flanders as rapidly as ships can bring them back, all looking for direction and advice from the State which they serve so well and so heroically.

Sir, in the face of such vast problems, coupled with the heavy financial obligations occasioned by the war—a burden which we readily accept, but a burden nevertheless—I venture to suggest that it is high time we Canadians at home should stop nibbling at each other as we have done in the past, stop sowing in this land of liberty the seeds of discord and of hatred, and recognize, late as it may be, that our work, a better or more useful work, lies in another direction.

Sir, this war is costing us over $1,000,000 a day. Our public debt has reached the billion-dollar mark. Our interest charge is estimated at $78,000,000, and when we couple this amount with the sums that will be necessary to meet our payments on pensions, we have before us the prospect of being soon saddled with a fixed annual charge of not less than $100,000,000. We cannot wave aside lightly this enormous financial obligation. It claims our best thought and our best consideration. It reminds us of our plain and paramount duty, of putting into practice that policy of economy and retrenchment, which this Government has been most lavishly preaching to others without ever living up to it themselves, as their record of the last four years so clearly demonstrates, as the expenditures of the last year, amounting to $203,000,000, has again clearly shown to us. Let me hasten to say, that I know full well, that heavy as this financial burden may be, it will not deter the people of this country from doing their full duty to the bitter end. However long may last this war, the same spirit which animated the people of the country four years ago is still intact to-day. We then unanimously decided to take our part in the fight for freedom. We, to-day, with the same unanimous voice, proclaim our determination to stand by our allies, until complete victory has crowned our efforts. It is, Sir, in this spirit, shared alike by all Canadians, that we have put to ourselves these two questions: First, how can we best serve to-day our allies? Second, in what way can our continued and active participation in the war be most effective to achieve the common purpose we have in view?

There are those who believe that however long the struggle, the policy of Canada should be more men and still more men for the front. It was this feeling, this belief, this policy, which brought about conscription. It was apparently upon this policy that Union Government was formed. It is not my intention to dwell on the absolute failure of selective conscription. I was against that policy last year, I am still against it to-day. May I underline that by introducing amendments to the Military Service Act, so as to make it more drastic, and in their opinion more effective, the Government themselves have recognized this failure. But, Sir, there are others in this country, who though they believe that the decision that was taken in 1914, in so far as our participation in this war was concerned, should not be altered to-day, are nevertheless of the opinion, that in view of the new conditions that have arisen, we must change our war methods, respond to the call of our allies, direct our national energy, not only in getting men to the front but also in meeting the new problem that is now upon us, the acceleration of our food production as an essential and vital war measure.

Sir, We cannot minimize the vast importance of our food production at this moment. The Prime Minister in his speech on the Address, used these words:

> I cannot emphasize too strongly the absolute, urgent, vital necessity of increased production of food in Canada during the next year. The issue of the war depends on it.

Are we to remain deaf to this call from the front? Are we to minimize the importance of a policy, upon the success of which, the Prime Minister himself admits, "depends the issue of the war"? There can be but one answer to this question, and it is with this thought, prompted by this high motive, that those who have never ceased to advocate greater production have ventured not only to criticise the Government,—who went back on their policy in this connection—but again to suggest the best and only means to attain the object we had in view. Is it not reasonable, Sir, that taking it for granted that we are all of one mind in acknowledging the importance of food production, we should also be united in a policy which tends to prevent that shortage of farm labour, by keeping our young farmers to their work, by educating them as to the importance of straining every nerve to do their utmost to produce food and still more food? And yet, Sir, the policy of the Government to-day tends to weaken, if not to destroy, this very purpose. What we are preaching to-day the Government had in mind when they drafted this Order in Council of the 3rd of December last. Political exigencies may have forced them to change their minds; national exigencies have prompted us to remain true to this very policy. Was not its importance again underlined at this very session by the Prime Minister himself, by the words which he uttered and which I have already cited? Again, if we are to have more food production in this country—the issue of the war depends on it—is it not reasonable and logical that we should endeavour to lay aside every obstacle which may curtail its success—a success without which, as Lord Rhondda says, "Victory may eventually slip from our grasp?" And when in pursuance of that policy we suggest that the duties on farming implements should be abolished, I ask you, Sir, is it fair, is it in the public interest, that our motives in this regard should be challenged, as they were challenged a few days ago by the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames)? I can only say that the views that have been expressed in this House are shared by a great many Canadians throughout the country. In this connection may I be permitted to read a short article on this very subject which appeared in the Saskatoon Star. It illustrates the case most satisfactorily, and is as follows:

TWO MILLION FOR DUTIES ON IMPLEMENTS.

According to a statement prepared by the Minister of Customs, Hon. A. L. Sifton, agricultural implements entering Canada during the past fiscal year paid import duties aggregating $2,120,000. This is divided among the following items: Separators, $353,000; parts of separators, $124,000; tractors, $896,000; binders, $89,000; ploughs, $373,000; other farm machinery and parts, $280,000.

"Produce! Produce!!" is the cry that comes from Great Britain to Canada. It is echoed and re-echoed from Ottawa, from all parts of Canada.

Produce with what? Land must be broken to produce, and that means traction power, for horses are not available. Item: Tractors, customs duty, $896,000. It means ploughs, for there are not sufficient ploughs in the country to produce more largely. Item: ploughs, customs duty, $373,000. It means binders, to reap the crop. Item: Binders, customs duty, $89,000. It means separators, to thrash the grain. Item: Separators, customs duty, $353,000; parts of separators, customs duty, $124,000.

Certainly it is economic folly, but apparently our fiscal system must remain unchanged, though it put a handicap upon every laudable effort of the people of the country are making, and though it put a heavy handicap upon our greatest war contribution.

The cry for greater production, from the lips of those who are taking no part in the endeavour to get these unnecessary and foolish restrictions upon greater production removed, would be laughable if it were not tragic.

I waive the right, Sir, to comment on the force of this article. To my mind its logic is unanswerable. Be it sufficient for me to say that my conviction as to the necessity of food production in Canada grows deeper as I follow step by step the long trail of devastation and mourning which this war of nations still stretches across so many lands. During the three better years of this deadly conflict, amidst vicissitudes of varied character, which have brought to us, with the regularity of a pendulum, news which caused us joy as well as that which caused us sorrow, we have never wavered in our belief that final victory would eventually crown our efforts.

We saw the millions of Russia, barely on the threshold of their new-born liberty, forced to lay down their arms and sign a disastrous peace. The steam roller of former days had been cheated of its power by a dangerous and unscrupulous foe. But, Sir, before this downfall in the East, there arose in the West the millions of the American nation, taking up the sword to assure for the democracy of the world safety from the onslaughts of conquering empires. From these two outstanding events in the world's present tragedy can we not deduce, as certainly as is possible when unveiling the near future, these two propositions to guide us in our continued efforts to destroy the system which has been the curse of humanity; on the one hand, that the entrance of the United States into the struggle will mean the final overthrow of Prussian militarism, and on the other hand that the Russian collapse will tend to prolong the war beyond the limit of time which, previous to that event, we might reasonably have thought possible? These are, in my opinion, the new conditions which Canada must face to-day. The longer the struggle the more acute will become the food situation. We once thought that this war would be a battle of armies. We know to-day that it is a battle of nations, in which, in addition to the fighting army, is wielded the new weapon of economic warfare, each side striving to starve the other. Sir, we cannot remain indifferent to this new fact. Our Allies are faced with a food menace. It is our duty to see to it that our farms are not depleted.

Mr. F. L. DAVIS (Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a word or two in this debate, may I say, before proceeding to the point I wish to discuss, that I have listened to many of the speeches with a feeling that they were not dealing with present-day problems, and I would like to tell some of my own experiences in politics. For some twenty-five years I preserved all the political literature on both sides of controversy in Canada, but about two years ago I threw it all into the furnace. I think it would be a good thing if some of us could wipe our minds as clean of some of the things of the past as I cleared my drawers and receptacles of that defunct political literature. In saying this I think my remarks would apply to both sides of the House. I hope the time will never come when the Ottawa river will be the Rhine of Canada, for in listening to much that has been said one would think some such result might be our destiny.

Now, we are not all meeting with the very greatest of commendation from our constituents. I looked over a couple of local papers the other day and noticed that two of the editors were of opinion that I had as much chance of another nomination as I had of being president of the United States. That was with reference to some of the actions of this House. I have no hesitation whatever in accepting any responsibility I may have incurred in respect of the recent Order in Council calling out men for military service. The Government may lose some support as the result of that, but any backward step will cost them not only loss of support, but also loss of prestige, and I cannot think that the Government will entertain any such idea. So many speakers on the Opposition side have suggested that some backward step should be taken that I may just as well state how the supporters of the Government feel on that question, and I am quite sure that the Government feel the same way. No backward step will be taken. The steps now to be taken must be founded on what is already accomplished fact, upon what is already done.

Further, in introduction, I would compliment the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. A. K. Maclean) upon his Budget speech. It was compact, pointed, clear, easily listened to and readily grasped. It was the best Budget that I ever heard, but as it was the only one I ever heard there is no suggestion of odious comparison of the statements of previous Finance Ministers. However, I have read some Budget speeches, and I assure the Acting Finance Minister that it came up to my expectations formed on what I had known of his career.

But, Sir, I wish to comment upon one statement in this speech. With regard to taxation, the Acting Finance Minister said:

> Again, inevitably there must be wide differences of opinion as to the form and degree of taxation that shall prevail. One might safely say that no system of taxation should be enforced which has a repressive effect on production and trade.

I take issue with that statement. The Acting Finance Minister proceeds:

> But as some one has said, no tax should paralyse industry of any kind, hamper enterprise, or breed discontent among our people, but that none should be avoided which are essential to provide the revenue required and that will distribute the incidence of taxation as equitably as conditions and experience dictate.

It is generally known among business men that $1,000 in the bank provides a basis for an extension of credit five to seven times that amount. In other words, to-day our business is based upon a currency which is very largely credit. The basis of credit is the general wealth of the country, and it is possible at times fictitiously to increase currency and thereby fictitiously to increase prices. It is common knowledge that during the last four years our prices have increased about 150 per cent; that is, what cost us $5 in 1914 now costs in the neighbourhood of $12 or $12.50. That is due not only to the shortage of goods, but very largely to the inflation of our currency. We do not in these days inflate our currency by printing more greenbacks, as was done in the Civil War, or by issuing fiat money, as was done by the kings of long ago; but we do it through our banking system. There is a ready, automatic check upon the balance between the amount of the currency and the amount of goods in the country in ordinary times. If we increase our currency our prices increase; goods come in to take advantage of the better prices; we have a larger international balance to settle; we send out gold, and the amount of our currency comes back to a proper relative proportion with the amount of the goods.

But at present that is not being done. We are borrowing money very largely and creating credits which are reflected in our bank statements. I have before me the Canadian bank statements of 31st March, 1914, and 30th March, 1918. The total liabilities of the banks were $1,323,000,000 in March, 1914, and $2,053,000,000 in March, 1918. Their assets were $1,547,000,000 in 1914, and $2,302,000,000 in 1918. It has been calculated that on the very system which we are pursuing, Great Britain has increased her currency to the extent of £400,000,000, and that is one reason why prices have so greatly increased in that country. I would commend these figures to the attention of hon. members of the House. For instance, in Dominion and provincial government securities and municipal and other public securities, the banks were holding in March, 1914, $35,000,000; to-day they are holding ten times that amount, and that is made a basis for the extension of credit, thereby relatively increasing the currency of the country, making money cheap and goods dear. That is a consequence of our system of borrowing so largely to carry on the war. I know that there are checks upon our taking from the people all the money to carry on the war. I know that by taxing the people too heavily there is a possibility, perhaps, of driving capital from the country. Many disadvantages might result if we got out of step too greatly with the legislation and financing of neighbouring countries. But what the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) said to-night was reasonable: That $400,000,000 might have been raised by taxation of the people in this war time.

What are the principles with regard to taxation? We know that it is easier to get taxes in war time, because the patriotism of our people is excited and they will more readily pay them. Not only that, but in war time taxes are not such a hindrance to industry as they are at any other time, because there is a certain market for the goods produced. The Government is in the field, buying largely; neutrals who have made much money out of the war are in the field, buying large quantities of our produce. Our competitors—Germany, and others who had goods to offer—are shut off from the seas, and our manufacturers and producers have markets for their goods. All the time prices are relatively increasing, and our manufacturers are in a position to transfer the taxation to the purchaser of his goods—to add it to his price and to be sure that he has a market. For that reason I think we might have increased the taxes which we are taking. I am speaking not particularly for this year, because, as Sir Auckland Geddes has said, we must not make our calculations on the assumption that the war will last only three or six months; we must look three or four years ahead. In all probability the war will last two years yet, perhaps three; and we must increase the amount which we take from our people. By increasing the amount that we take in taxes we not only get a revenue, but we govern the individual's disposition of his own purchases. By proceeding as we have been proceeding, we have made money plentiful; we have left the individual in the market as a competitor against us at a time when labour is short and when there is an immense demand for goods. He is asking for the goods which minister to his comfort and are luxuries, when, by increasing taxation, we would cut off his ability to purchase these. Parenthetically, and to illustrate: The man who lends $1,000 is not in the same position as the man who pays out $1,000. The former considers that he has an asset, and so has less incentive to save than the other man has. Hence by taxation we do two things: we get the revenue and we govern the production of non-essential goods; that is, we cut it down. We have not, so far, fully dealt with that situation, and we have to deal with it now, because we have not governed it by taxation. We have to begin to govern it by artificial methods. I have again and again wondered what the Government intends to do with its registration of the labour power of this country. I am satisfied that registration is but the gathering of information for a scheme which must be worked out and laid before our people, and I have been hoping that the Government would inform the House as to what the plan was. It would help our farmers, in the present agitation and in respect to the present delegations, if they knew what the Government's plan was for obtaining labour for production. I can see only one application that can be made. You cannot go through three or four or five million names and pick out a man here or there who may be suitable for work on the farm. You have to classify the men and deal with them in classes, and I have seen no way in which to do that except the plan that was recommended a few days ago by the Committee on Agriculture; that is that we should make certain restricted occupations. We should restrict non-essential industries. I am told that a piano company in Ontario, which, before the war, was putting out six pianos per day, is, at the present time, producing and selling fifteen pianos per day. That is an absolutely non-essential industry, and that is but an instance. Pianolas, grafanolas and victrolas are being sold throughout the country. Even automobiles are in the same class, and we must in some way reduce the output of those non-essential industries if we are going to get the men to carry on our essential industries. The reason I have raised this point is that I believe, by a proper system of taxation, we would be doing something to limit the production of non-essential goods. But now I see that we must attack the question in another way, and the only way I can see is by limiting the production or, in other words, bringing about by artificial means that condition which a depression of business will bring about. At a time of depression the factories close or they reduce their output, and men are thrown out of employment and are bound, under changed economic conditions, to seek new employment. We must create those conditions. We have yet, it seems to me, in the consideration of the problems of this Dominion, to look to the future after the war is over, to the time of readjustment, to that period of dislocation which will follow when war ceases and all war industries are cut off. We have to look to the amount of money which we shall then have to raise to pay interest and sinking fund upon those large debts which we are now piling up. It seems to me that we can do much to prevent that dislocation creating a panicky condition, if we but recognize what are just and proper ways of raising the money the state requires. Finally, lest I should be misunderstood, because I have spent most of my time in urging that our taxation should be greater, I know that must be made conditional, in some measure, upon similar operations of surrounding states, but I should like to see our Government setting a lead in the measures by which it levies this taxation.

Mr. J. F. FAFARD (L'Islet) (translation): Mr. Speaker, the discussion anent the budget statement presented by the Government for the fiscal year of 1918-19 has already brought forth—not always light—but often enough, suggestions of a judicious and practical character. On the whole the Government cannot help being grateful for the good advice given, and taking advantage of it. However, in order that the results should go hand in hand with the wisdom of certain observations, too much self-interest, too much narrow-mindedness should not paralyze, on the part of my hon. colleagues on the other side of this Chamber, the execution of what has been suggested to the Government.

As the representative of a purely agricultural county I feel it my duty to express my opinion in a special way on certain features of the present Budget. So I shall leave to more experienced political minds the task of exploring the vast domains of political economy. Following my custom, as a surveyor, I shall go, in straight line, and with the shortest possible delay, to the goal I wish to reach. All of which means that I intend making a few brief remarks on the important question of agriculture. My last words will have to do with the loyal attitude of the province of Quebec—and that of the immense majority of its representatives—with regard to the help given to carry on this struggle for the cause of civilization and mankind.

Now, a few words about agriculture. On the one hand, Mr. Speaker, the Government is preaching a policy of increased production. Every day, in all the newspapers of the country the Government is appealing to the population asking for an increase in our yield. We hear repeated every other moment that Canada's increased production will save Europe from starvation, consequently that this increased production will save the Allies. "Produce more," cries the Government to the farmers, "Raise cattle; concentrate on your dairy industry; preserve your perishable products by building cold storage chambers; hold big fairs to learn to perfect your methods of cultivation; see that your stock is always healthy; improve their strain finally, intensify production. Victory against Germany demands these things."

That, Mr. Speaker, is the tone of the Government talk, on the one hand. But, on the other, this same Government reduces, by $528,348.40, the appropriations that we were to vote for the furthering of agriculture and increased production. The farmers are told to produce more and then over half a million dollars of appropriations are taken away from them, in comparison with what they were allowed in the Budget of 1917-18. Out of the reductions of $2,015,-378.28 that the Government announces in the administrative expenses of the different departments, the Department of Agriculture alone has suffered a decrease of $528,-348.40. So that more than one-quarter of these reductions were knocked off the appropriations meant to promote farming.

And when they have taken over half a million away from the farmers the Government, far from being abashed, have the nerve to ask the farmers to toil from sun-up till sun-down to insure increased production. It is not necessary to be a great logician, nor to have spent twenty years in this House in order to realize how very illogical such a policy decidely is. "Raise cattle," says the Government, and in the estimates for 1918-19 the tidy sum of $100,000 is taken away from cattle-raisers. "Give more attention to your dairy produce," says the Government and, in this year's Budget, grants not one sou more than last year. "Build cold storage plants" says the Government again, and with one sweep they knock $25,000 off the amount voted for this purpose in 1917-18; while in the cold storage establishments they let over 350,000 pounds of meat and fish go to rot. "Hold fairs; they will be a great help to you," says the Government to the farmers, and then, in the present Budget, we notice a reduction of $25,000 from the sum voted last year. "Take every means to keep your cattle in good health," still the Government exhorts the farmer; but to make the thing a certainty the Government subtracts $102,000 this year from the amount voted to help the farmers in the sanitary supervision of their stock.

If this be the way, by reducing the help given to the farmers, that the Government claims to promote increased production, you must admit, Mr. Speaker, that it is rather a strange policy. I say strange so as not to use the term guilty. Indeed, I would understand the curtailing of expenses in certain departments where the work could very well wait till later on, after the war. But it appears that the Government has turned things upside down from the point of view of enlightened wisdom and the most elementary knowledge of economic factors. The estimates for civil government have been increased $356,555.04; $6,812.50 more to the Dominion Police; $18,000 more for penitentiaries; $148,900 more for railways and canals; $52,172.14 more for ocean and lake shipping; $160,664.73 more to the Post Office Department; and similar increases in other Government departments.

But when it comes to Agriculture $600,000 are struck off the estimates at one sweep, and then the farmers are asked to increase production. It is useless, Mr. Speaker, to pile up lengthy arguments in order to persuade this House of the utter injustice of such treatment being meted out to our very large class of farmers in this country. In the face of the figures which I have just quoted and which I extracted from the estimates submitted by the Government itself, I hope the gentlemen on the Treasury Benches will give justice to whom justice is due and show themselves less reluctant to loosen their purse-strings to assist the farmers.

Before leaving this subject I wish to call the attention of the House to an item of $21,091.58 under the head of the experimental farm at Spirit Lake, in the province of Quebec. I have always understood that the institution at Spirit Lake was used as a detention camp, and I am quite positive it was utilised for that purpose, since I visited the place myself some two years ago when I was roaming up that way. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that such an item should properly come under the expense column of the Department of Militia and Defence. Why should the Department of Agriculture pay the expenses of the Department of Militia and Defence? Besides, isn't it a rather queer procedure to open up, at such a place, and at such a critical period as that we are living in to-day, what is an experimental farm in name only? The other day the Hon. Minister of Justice answered me in this House that the Government had spent $32,500 for the military organization of this so-called experimental farm, or rather of this internment camp. So to-day when I find another item of $21,091.58 for agricultural purposes at this same place I am forced to conclude that the Government has spent the pretty husky sum of $53,591.58 for the satisfaction of having an experimental farm together with an internment camp; where, moreover, there seems to have been produced not one single bushel of wheat, nor one single bushel of oats, and where not a single head of cattle was sold. All that this hermaphrodite establishment seems to have produced is pulp-wood, to the value of $15,946. You will admit, Mr. Speaker, that the experimental farm which produces only pulp-wood is some experimental farm. There were barely fifty families and 400 Indians there when work was begun on this undertaking. Who will dare tell us that these few people were in need of an experimental farm? Was it for the Indians? If such were the intention of the Government, they were mistaken, very much mistaken, on the score of the results which would accrue. When I passed through there I thought I was doing a favour to an Indian by supplying him with seed potatoes in the expectation that he would get a good crop the following autumn. Some days later I was astonished to see the Indian digging up the precious potatoes. "What are you doing?" I asked him; and he came back with this: "Do you think I intend to wait till next Fall before using them? The crop is too long coming; I'd rather eat them now!" A man who lives within six miles of the camp, told me that only one family spent the winter at Sipirt Lake last year.

When the Government has gone to this expense they should see that the farm produces something in return. Since it has been used, so far, solely as an internment camp, the item of $21,091.58 should be paid by the Department of Militia and Defence. This amount could have been distributed with much more justice among those real farmers who deserve encouragement. Fortunately this district has undergone an extraordinary development in the last few months and these hardworking settlers will get some good out of the place when it is used as an experimental farm.

Mr. Speaker, I feel in duty bound to thank the Minister of Agriculture for the $60,000 given to the province of Quebec for a campaign of agricultural education; but it appears to me that the amounts voted for the promotion of increased production are not sufficiently generous. Everywhere we hear the cry that famine threatens us; still the Government is taking no means to seriously assist the farmer. According to my humble opinion if we spend $200,000 for food control, we should spend millions more than we do to insure increased production. We have spent millions upon millions, on the ground that the enemy threatened us and we hesitate to come to the aid of those who are alone able to save us from starvation. Let us be more generous with our help to the farmer. And one of the best ways of helping him, Mr. Speaker, would be to put all farm implements on the free list. I will not dwell upon this question which every one, apparently, admits. I understand that certain concessions have been made in the matter of tractors; but these are not used on the ordinary sized farm. With this protection, which smacks of unfairness, the Government is proving once more that it has no intention of assisting the farmers, but only those capitalists who shout "Win the War" when their personal interests are concerned.

Another means of doing justice to the farmer—and I insist on this means—would be to exempt from military service all bona fide farmers. A few days before election we saw in the newspapers under scare headlines that "Farmers were exempted by Order-in-Council;" but once the elections were over, the Government whistled a different tune. Such a step would moreover be in absolute accord with the decision reached in March last by the convention of official agricultural experts. Here is the text of the resolution adopted at the Quebec convention, the very words which were forwarded to the ministers of the Government:

> That the official agricultural experts, the agricultural representatives of the district, the professors in the agricultural colleges and the travelling agricultural instructors, met in convention to promote the campaign in favour of increased production, this 25th day of March, 1918, urge upon the higher authorities of the country the imperative necessity of decreeing clearly and effectively the exemption from military service of every agricultural worker duly engaged to labour on a farm during the present year.

It is by encouraging and protecting the farmer that we will obtain increased production. Everybody is aware that the price of an article is based on the price of production. On the other hand, the increase in production is based on the means afforded the farmer to help him in his task. Now, to encourage the farmer, we must allow him to make as much profit as possible out of his labour. Besides, that is what was understood and what was done when we sought to encourage our industrial captains to engage in munitions-making and in shipbuilding. Yes, sir, these companies were allowed profits of from 500 to 800 per cent. What is good, even excellent, for the one, cannot fail to be of advantage to the other. And I say that the farmer much less exacting than the capitalist would be fully satisfied if he could sell his produce directly to the consumer and thus eliminate the profits which find their way into the pockets of the middlemen. Has the Government acted dutifully in this matter? No, it has been lax in its duty; it has done nothing.

I wish to add, Mr Speaker, that the demonstration farms for the promotion of the increased production campaign are not sufficiently numerous. Still, they constitute a powerful means of helping the farmer and enabling him to ascertain just what results follow certain methods of cultivation on the experimental farms. From the bottom of my heart I congratulate those city people who cultivate their back-yards. They are proving their patriotism. However, at the same time we must not get them confused with the real farmers who are alone in a position to insure an effective increase in food production.

We are piling up debts and expenses in a way that would be alarming were it not for the wonderful resources of our country.

But, no matter how wonderful and how varied these resources of Canada may be, it is nevertheless incumbent upon us to exercise the wisest, the strictest economy in every channel of the public service. I believe, moreover, that a number of the public works proposed could very well have been put off till later and the money thus saved appropriated in the form of a sort of rural credit, to assist the farmer in improving his land, buying his seed and obtaining the implements he needs.

All this is so much food for thought, and I submit these few reflections without any party spirit, to those who wish to see Canada fulfil her role in the great war.

There is another matter. Why should not the Government establish shipyards in Quebec and British Columbia for the construction of wooden bottoms? Aren't the Quebec workingmen sufficiently adept at ship construction? By encouraging this industry in the province of Quebec the Government would be merely doing justice to a great part of the population which it is their mission to guide in the paths of economy and progress, and thus help, both during and after the war, the cause of the Allies, and Canada.

I promised to say, in closing, a few words concerning the attitude of the province of Quebec and of the vast majority of those who represent that province in this House, with regard to the help furnished the Government in carrying out its war policy.
